26. It is important not to conflate the chance involved in relation to recklessness (i.e., that an appreciable risk of death was probable) with the chance involved in relation to dangerousness (i.e. that the risk of death was appreciable) (R v Abdul-Rasool (2008) 18 VR 586; Mutemeri v Cheesman [1998] 4 VR 484).

Lawful Authority or Excuse

27. The prosecution must disprove any defences that are raised on the evidence (Crimes Act 1958 s 22).

Last updated: 7 February 2014

7.4.14.1 Charge: Conduct Endangering Life

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of conduct endangering life. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused committed the conduct alleged in the presentment.

Two – the accused committed that conduct voluntarily.

Three – that conduct endangered another person's life.

Four – the accused acted recklessly.

Five – the accused acted without lawful authority or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in detail.

Conduct

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed the conduct alleged in the presentment. That is, s/he [describe relevant conduct].

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, it is not disputed that NOA [describe relevant conduct]. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is disputed, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA did [describe relevant conduct and summarise prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing that [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Voluntariness

The second element the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed the relevant conduct voluntarily. That is, you must be satisfied that NOA [describe relevant conduct] deliberately, rather than accidentally.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

This element is not in dispute in this case. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is disputed, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA voluntarily [describe relevant conduct and summarise prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing that [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Endangerment

The third element the prosecution must prove is that the accused's conduct endangered another person's life.

This requires you to be satisfied that a reasonable person who committed the same conduct as the accused, in the same circumstances, would have realised that s/he was placing another person at risk of death, or may have been placing another person at risk of death.

The risk must have been what the law calls an "appreciable risk" of death. That is, it must have been more than a remote risk or a "mere possibility". The law is only concerned with real risks, and not hypothetical risks.

In this case, the prosecution argued that a reasonable person who was in the same circumstances as the accused – that is, who [describe relevant circumstances, including any knowledge the accused possessed which may have affected his or her assessment of the risk] – would have realised that, by [describe relevant conduct], s/he was, or may have been, placing another person at risk of death. [Summarise relevant prosecution arguments and/or evidence.] The defence denied this, arguing [summarise relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence and using your own knowledge and common sense, whether a reasonable person in the accused's position would have realised the risk s/he was creating. It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he would have realised that s/he was placing another person at risk of death, or may have been placing another person at risk of death, that this third element will be met.

Recklessness

The fourth element the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted recklessly.

The law says that NOA will have acted recklessly if, when s/he committed the relevant conduct, s/he foresaw that an appreciable risk of death was a probable consequence of that conduct. That is, s/he knew that his/her actions would probably create a real risk of death.

It is not enough for NOA to have known that it was possible that his/her actions would create an appreciable risk of death. For this element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOA knew that an appreciable risk of death would probably result from his/her actions.

Unlike the third element, which focuses on what the reasonable person would have realised in the circumstances, this element focuses on what was in NOA's mind. It will only be met if you are satisfied that NOA him/herself realised, when s/he [describe relevant conduct], that his/her actions would probably create an appreciable risk of death.

It is important to note that NOA does not need to have foreseen that his/her conduct would probably cause death. For this element to be met, you only need to be satisfied that NOA foresaw that his/her actions would probably create an appreciable risk of death.

You must assess NOA's state of mind at the time s/he [describe relevant conduct]. It is not enough for him/her to have realised later that what s/he had done was dangerous. This element will only be met if s/he realised it was dangerous when s/he performed the act.

The prosecution alleged that this was the case here. [Describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Lawful Excuse

The fifth element the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted without lawful authority or reasonable excuse.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

This is not in issue in this case. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is in issue*, explain any relevant defences or justifications*.]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of conduct endangering life, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA [describe relevant conduct]; and

Two – That NOA voluntarily committed that conduct; and

Three – That a reasonable person would have realised that that conduct placed, or may have placed, another person at an appreciable risk of death; and

Four – That NOA acted recklessly, because s/he foresaw that an appreciable risk of death was a probable consequence of that conduct; and

Five – That NOA acted without lawful excuse or authority.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of conduct endangering life.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

7.4.14.2 Checklist: Conduct Endangering Life

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused committed the conduct alleged in the presentment; and
2. The accused committed that conduct voluntarily; and
3. That conduct endangered another person's life; and
4. The accused acted recklessly; and
5. The accused acted without lawful authority or excuse.

Conduct

1. Did the accused commit the conduct alleged in the presentment?

If Yes, then go to Question 2

If No, then the accused is Not Guilty of Conduct Endangering Life

Voluntariness

2. Did the accused voluntarily commit that conduct?

If Yes, then go to Question 3.1

If No, then the accused is Not Guilty of Conduct Endangering Life

Endangerment

3. Did the accused's conduct endanger another person's life?

3.1 Would a reasonable person who committed the same conduct as the accused, in the same circumstances, have realised that s/he was placing another person at an appreciable risk of death?

Consider – There must be more than a remote risk of death.

If Yes, then go to Question 4.1

If No, then go to Question 3.2

3.2 Would a reasonable person who committed the same conduct as the accused, in the same circumstances, have realised that s/he may have been placing another person at an appreciable risk of death?

Consider – There must be more than a remote risk of death.

If Yes, then go to Question 4.1

If No, then the accused is Not Guilty of Conduct Endangering Life

Recklessness

4. Did the accused act recklessly?

4.1 At the time the accused committed the relevant conduct, did s/he foresee that an appreciable risk of death was a probable consequence of his/her actions?

Consider – The risk must have been probable rather than possible.

Consider – The accused does not need to have foreseen that his conduct would probably cause death. S/he must have foreseen that his/her actions would probably create an appreciable risk of death.

If Yes, then go to Question 5

If No, then the accused is Not Guilty of Conduct Endangering Life

Lawful excuse

5. Did the accused act without any lawful authority or excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is Guilty of Conduct Endangering Life (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2, 3.1 or 3.2 and 4.1)

If No, then the accused is Not Guilty of Conduct Endangering Life

Last updated: 1 November 2014

7.4.15 Conduct Endangering Persons

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. A person must not recklessly engage in conduct that places or may place another person in danger of serious injury (Crimes Act 1958 s 23).
2. This is a general offence of endangerment, which replaced the various specific endangerment offences that existed prior to its enactment (R v Nuri [1990] VR 641).
3. Conduct endangering persons is an offence against the person. An accused who creates a risk of serious injury to multiple individuals may be charged with multiple counts of conduct endangering persons (R v Bekhazi (2001) 3 VR 321).
4. The offence has the following 5 elements:

   i) The accused engaged in conduct;

   ii) The accused's conduct was voluntary;

   iii) The accused's conduct endangered another person;

iv) The accused acted recklessly; and

v) The accused acted without lawful authority or excuse (R v Nuri [1990] VR 641; Filmer v Barclay [1994] 2 VR 269; Mutemeri v Cheesman [1998] 4 VR 484; R v Wilson [2005] VSCA 78; R v Abdul-Rasool (2008) 18 VR 586).

Conduct

5. The accused must have engaged in the conduct alleged (R v Abdul-Rasool (2008) 18 VR 586).

Voluntariness

6. The accused's conduct must have been voluntary (R v Abdul-Rasool (2008) 18 VR 586; R v Wilson [2005] VSCA 78).
7. When explaining this element to the jury, the judge should not use the word "intentional". The terms "intentional" and "voluntary" are not interchangeable (R v Marijancevic (2009) 22 VR 576).[879]
8. It is a misdirection to tell the jury that the trial "starts with the proposition that acts are voluntary". It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused's acts are voluntary (R v Marijancevic (2009) 22 VR 576).

Endangerment

9. The accused's conduct must have endangered another person (Crimes Act 1958 s 23).
10. For this element to be met, the prosecution must prove that a reasonable person, taking the same actions as the accused, would have realised that his/her conduct:
    - Placed another person in danger of serious injury; or
    - May have placed another person in danger of serious injury (Crimes Act 1958 s 23; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641; R v Holzer [1968] VR 481).
11. According to this test, it is not necessary to prove that a person was actually put in danger. It is only necessary to show that the accused's conduct had the potential to place a person in danger of serious injury (R v Abdul-Rasool (2008) 18 VR 586).

Degree of Danger

12. The degree of danger must be an "appreciable risk" of serious injury (R v B Vic SC 19/7/1995; R v Abdul-Rasool (2008) 18 VR 586; Mutemeri v Cheesman [1998] 4 VR 484).
13. An "appreciable risk" means more than a remote or mere possibility of serious injury (R v B 19/7/1995 Vic SC; R v Wilson [2005] VSCA 78; R v D Vic SC 1/5/1996).
14. It is not appropriate to assess the level of dangerousness by reference to a mathematical probability (R v B Vic SC 19/7/1995; R v Boughey (1986) 161 CLR 10; R v D Vic SC 1/5/1996).
15. It is inherent in the notion of risk that the risk may not materialise. However, the risk must be real and not simply hypothetical (R v Abdul-Rasool (2008) 18 VR 586; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641; R v Lam [2006] VSCA 162).

---

[879] As far as possible, the use of the word "intention" should be limited to expressing the intention to achieve the consequences of a voluntary or willed act (i.e. to achieve some result or consequence, or to fulfil some purpose) (Timbu Kolian v R (1968) 119 CLR 47; R v Marijancevic (2009) 22 VR 576).

Content of the Risk

16. The conduct must have placed a person at risk of "serious injury". This is defined in Crimes Act 1958 s 15 as:

> serious injury means-
>
> (a) an injury (including the cumulative effect of more than one injury) that–
>
> (i) endangers life; or
>
> (ii) is substantial and protracted; or
>
> (b) the destruction, other than in the course of a medical procedure, of the foetus of a pregnant woman, whether or not the woman suffers any other harm;

17. This definition was introduced by the Crimes Amendment (Gross Violence Offences) Act 2013 and commenced operation on 1 July 2013. Prior to that date, the definition of serious injury was:

> serious injury includes-
>
> (a) a combination of injuries; and
>
> (b) the destruction, other than in the course of a medical procedure, of the foetus of a pregnant woman, whether or not the woman suffers any other harm;

18. This Charge Book contains separate directions, depending on whether the offence was alleged to have been committed before or after 1 July 2013.

19. More guidance on the meaning of serious injury is provided in 7.4.2 Intentionally Causing Serious Injury.

Danger Must Not be Contingent on Other Conduct

20. Conduct endangering persons is not a crime of attempt. The conduct of the accused must complete the creation of the risk of serious injury (R v Abdul-Rasool (2008) 18 VR 586; [2008] VSCA 13).

21. The risk of serious injury must therefore not be contingent on some other conduct that has not occurred. The jury may only consider conduct the accused has actually engaged in. They may not consider any possible future acts the accused may have been going to commit (R v Abdul-Rasool (2008) 18 VR 586; R v Lam [2006] VSCA 162).

The "Reasonable Person"

22. The reasonable person must be attributed with any knowledge the accused possessed which may have affected his or her assessment of the risk (R v Abdul-Rasool (2008) 18 VR 586; R v Besim (No 2) (2004) 148 A Crim R 28).

23. The reasonable person does not suffer from any defects of reasoning held by the accused. The accused's emotional or mental state must not be attributed to the reasonable person (R v Wills [1983] 2 VR 201; R v Besim (No 2) (2004) 148 A Crim R 28).

Recklessness

24. The accused must have acted recklessly (Crimes Act 1958 s 23).

25. This requires the accused to have foreseen that an appreciable risk of serious injury was a probable consequence of his or her conduct (Mutemeri v Cheesman [1998] 4 VR 484; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641; R v McCarthy Vic CA 4/11/1993). See 7.1.3 Recklessness for further information about recklessness.

26. The accused does not need to have foreseen that his or her conduct would probably cause serious injury. This element requires the accused to have foreseen that his or her conduct would probably create an appreciable risk of serious injury (R v Toms [2006] VSCA 101*; R v Lam* [2006] VSCA 162).

27. It is not sufficient for the prosecution to prove that the accused foresaw the likely physical result of his or her conduct (e.g. s/he foresaw that if s/he dropped his/her cigarette a fire would probably start). The prosecution must prove that the accused foresaw the risk of serious injury created by his/her conduct (e.g. s/he foresaw that there was an appreciable risk that someone would be seriously injured in the fire created by his/her cigarette) (Filmer v Barclay [1994] 2 VR 269).

28. The accused's state of mind must be assessed at the time the conduct was committed. It is not sufficient for the prosecution to prove that the accused later realised that his or her conduct was dangerous (R v Wilson [2005] VSCA 78).

29. It is important not to conflate the chance involved in relation to recklessness (i.e., that an appreciable risk of serious injury was probable) with the chance involved in relation to dangerousness (i.e. that the risk of serious injury was appreciable) (R v Abdul-Rasool (2008) 18 VR 586; Mutemeri v Cheesman [1998] 4 VR 484).

Lawful Authority or Excuse

30. The prosecution must disprove any defences that are raised on the evidence (Crimes Act 1958 s 23).

Last updated: 30 November 2015

7.4.15.1 Charge: Conduct Endangering Persons (From 1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge is for cases where the conduct took place on or after 1 July 2013. For offences before that date, use 7.4.15.3 Charge: Conduct Endangering Persons (Pre-1/7/13).

I must now direct you about the crime of conduct endangering persons. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused committed the conduct alleged in the presentment.

Two – the accused committed that conduct voluntarily.

Three – the conduct endangered another person.

Four – the accused acted recklessly.

Five – the accused acted without lawful authority or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in detail.

Conduct

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed the conduct alleged in the presentment. That is, s/he [describe relevant conduct].

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, it is not disputed that NOA [describe relevant conduct]. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is disputed, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA did [describe relevant conduct and summarise prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing that [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Voluntariness

The second element the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed the relevant conduct voluntarily. That is, you must be satisfied that NOA [describe relevant conduct] deliberately, rather than accidentally.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

This element is not in dispute in this case. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is disputed, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA voluntarily [describe relevant conduct and summarise prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing that [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Endangerment

The third element the prosecution must prove is that the accused's conduct endangered another person.

This requires you to be satisfied that a reasonable person who committed the same conduct as the accused, in the same circumstances, would have realised that s/he was placing another person at risk of serious injury, or may have been placing another person at risk of serious injury.

In making your determination, you must consider the likely severity of any injuries that could have been caused by the accused's conduct. For this element to be satisfied, there must have been a risk that someone would be "seriously injured" by that conduct.

The law defines the word injury to mean physical injury or harm to mental health, whether temporary or permanent. A serious injury is an injury which endangers life or is substantial and protracted.[880]

The potential danger must have been what the law calls an "appreciable risk" of serious injury. That is, it must have been more than a remote risk or a "mere possibility". The law is only concerned with real risks, and not hypothetical risks.

[If there was a risk of multiple injuries, add the following shaded section.]

In making your decision, you do not have to look at each of the injuries NOV was at risk of sustaining individually, and decide whether or not any one of them is a serious injury. A person may suffer a serious injury because of the cumulative effect of several injuries.

In this case, the prosecution argued that a reasonable person who was in the same circumstances as the accused – that is, who [describe relevant circumstances, including any knowledge the accused possessed which may have affected his or her assessment of the risk] – would have realised that, by [describe relevant conduct], s/he was, or may have been, placing another person at risk of serious injury. [Summarise relevant prosecution arguments and/or evidence.] The defence denied this, arguing [summarise relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

[880] The judge should consider including an example of a serious injury, such as brain damage, or a stabbing which causes significant blood loss.

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence and using your own knowledge and common sense, whether a reasonable person in the accused's position would have realised the risk s/he was creating. It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he would have realised that s/he was placing another person at risk of serious injury, or may have been placing another person at risk of serious injury, that this third element will be met.

Recklessness

The fourth element the prosecution must prove is that the acted recklessly.

The law says that NOA will have acted recklessly if, when s/he committed the relevant conduct, s/he foresaw that an appreciable risk of serious injury was a probable consequence of that conduct. That is, s/he knew that his/her actions would probably create a real risk of serious injury. As I told you in relation to the third element, a serious injury is an injury which endangers life or is substantial and protracted.

It is not enough for NOA to have known that it was possible that his/her actions would create an appreciable risk of serious injury. For this element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOA knew that an appreciable risk of serious injury would probably result from his/her actions.

Unlike the third element, which focuses on what the reasonable person would have realised in the circumstances, this element focuses on what was in NOA's mind. It will only be met if you are satisfied that NOA him/herself realised, when s/he [describe relevant conduct], that his/her actions would probably create an appreciable risk of serious injury.

It is important to note that NOA does not need to have foreseen that his/her conduct would probably cause serious injury. For this element to be met, you only need to be satisfied that NOA foresaw that his/her actions would probably create an appreciable risk of serious injury.

You must assess NOA's state of mind at the time s/he [describe relevant conduct]. It is not enough for him/her to have realised later that what s/he had done was dangerous. This element will only be met if s/he realised it was dangerous when s/he performed the act.

The prosecution alleged that this was the case here. [Describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Lawful Excuse

The fifth element the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted without lawful authority or reasonable excuse.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

This is not in issue in this case. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is in issue*, explain any relevant defences or justifications*.]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of conduct endangering persons, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA [describe relevant conduct]; and

Two – That NOA voluntarily committed that conduct; and

Three – That a reasonable person would have realised that that conduct placed, or may have placed, another person at an appreciable risk of serious injury; and

Four – That NOA acted recklessly, because s/he foresaw that an appreciable risk of serious injury was a probable consequence of that conduct; and

Five – That NOA acted without lawful excuse or authority.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of conduct endangering persons.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

7.4.15.2 Checklist: Conduct Endangering Persons (From 1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused committed the conduct alleged in the presentment; and
2. The accused committed that conduct voluntarily; and
3. That conduct endangered another person; and
4. The accused acted recklessly; and
5. The accused acted without lawful authority or excuse.

Conduct

1. Did the accused commit the conduct alleged in the presentment?

If Yes, then go to Question 2

If No, then the accused is Not Guilty of Conduct Endangering Persons

Voluntariness

2. Did the accused voluntarily commit that conduct?

If Yes, then go to Question 3.1

If No, then the accused is Not Guilty of Conduct Endangering Persons

Endangerment

3. Did the accused's conduct endanger another person?

3.1 Would a reasonable person who committed the same conduct as the accused, in the same circumstances, have realised that s/he was placing another person at an appreciable risk of serious injury?

Consider – There must be more than a remote risk of serious injury.

Consider – The risk must be of "serious" injury.

Consider – A serious injury is an injury which endangers life or is substantial and protracted

If Yes, then go to Question 4.1

If No, then go to Question 3.2

3.2 Would a reasonable person who committed the same conduct as the accused, in the same circumstances, have realised that s/he may have been placing another person at an appreciable risk of serious injury?

Consider – There must be more than a remote risk of serious injury.

Consider – The risk must be of "serious" injury.

Consider – A serious injury is an injury which endangers life or is substantial and protracted

If Yes, then go to Question 4.1

If No, then the accused is Not Guilty of Conduct Endangering Persons

Recklessness

4. At the time the accused committed the relevant conduct, did s/he foresee that an appreciable risk of serious injury was a probable consequence of his/her actions?

Consider – The risk must have been probable rather than possible.

Consider – The accused does not need to have foreseen that his conduct would probably cause serious injury. S/he must have foreseen that his/her actions would probably create an appreciable risk of serious injury.

If Yes, then go to Question 5

If No, then the accused is Not Guilty of Conduct Endangering Persons

Lawful excuse

5. Did the accused act without any lawful authority or excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is Guilty of Conduct Endangering Persons (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2, 3.1 or 3.2 and 4)

If No, then the accused is Not Guilty of Conduct Endangering Persons

Last updated: 12 September 2019

7.4.15.3 Charge: Conduct Endangering Persons (Pre-1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge is for cases where the conduct occurred before 1 July 2013. Otherwise, use Charge: Conduct Endangering Persons (From 1/7/13).

I must now direct you about the crime of conduct endangering persons. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused committed the conduct alleged in the presentment.

Two – the accused committed that conduct voluntarily.

Three – that the conduct endangered another person.

Four – the accused acted recklessly.

Five – the accused acted without lawful authority or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in detail.

Conduct

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed the conduct alleged in the presentment. That is, s/he [describe relevant conduct].

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, it is not disputed that NOA [describe relevant conduct]. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is disputed, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA did [describe relevant conduct and summarise prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing that [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Voluntariness

The second element the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed the relevant conduct voluntarily. That is, you must be satisfied that NOA [describe relevant conduct] deliberately, rather than accidentally.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

This element is not in dispute in this case. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is disputed, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA voluntarily [describe relevant conduct and summarise prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing that [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Endangerment

The third element the prosecution must prove is that the accused's conduct endangered another person.

This requires you to be satisfied that a reasonable person who committed the same conduct as the accused, in the same circumstances, would have realised that s/he was placing another person at risk of serious injury, or may have been placing another person at risk of serious injury.

In making your determination, you must consider the likely severity of any injuries that could have been caused by the accused's conduct. For this element to be satisfied, there must have been a risk that someone would be "seriously" injured by that conduct.

The law does not define what a "serious injury" is. It is for you to determine whether the accused's conduct had the potential to "seriously" injure a person, rather than simply "injuring" them or not harming them at all.

The potential danger must have been what the law calls an "appreciable risk" of serious injury. That is, it must have been more than a remote risk or a "mere possibility". The law is only concerned with real risks, and not hypothetical risks.

In this case, the prosecution argued that a reasonable person who was in the same circumstances as the accused – that is, who [describe relevant circumstances, including any knowledge the accused possessed which may have affected his or her assessment of the risk] – would have realised that, by [describe relevant conduct], s/he was, or may have been, placing another person at risk of serious injury. [Summarise relevant prosecution arguments and/or evidence.] The defence denied this, arguing [summarise relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence and using your own knowledge and common sense, whether a reasonable person in the accused's position would have realised the risk s/he was creating. It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he would have realised that s/he was placing another person at risk of serious injury, or may have been placing another person at risk of serious injury, that this third element will be met.

Recklessness

The fourth element the prosecution must prove is that the acted recklessly.

The law says that NOA will have acted recklessly if, when s/he committed the relevant conduct, s/he foresaw that an appreciable risk of serious injury was a probable consequence of that conduct. That is, s/he knew that his/her actions would probably create a real risk of serious injury.

It is not enough for NOA to have known that it was possible that his/her actions would create an appreciable risk of serious injury. For this element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOA knew that an appreciable risk of serious injury would probably result from his/her actions.

Unlike the third element, which focuses on what the reasonable person would have realised in the circumstances, this element focuses on what was in NOA's mind. It will only be met if you are satisfied that NOA him/herself realised, when s/he [describe relevant conduct], that his/her actions would probably create an appreciable risk of serious injury.

It is important to note that NOA does not need to have foreseen that his/her conduct would probably cause serious injury. For this element to be met, you only need to be satisfied that NOA foresaw that his/her actions would probably create an appreciable risk of serious injury.

You must assess NOA's state of mind at the time s/he [describe relevant conduct]. It is not enough for him/her to have realised later that what s/he had done was dangerous. This element will only be met if s/he realised it was dangerous when s/he performed the act.

The prosecution alleged that this was the case here. [Describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Lawful Excuse

The fifth element the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted without lawful authority or reasonable excuse.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

This is not in issue in this case. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is in issue*, explain any relevant defences or justifications*.]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of conduct endangering persons, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA [describe relevant conduct]; and

Two – That NOA voluntarily committed that conduct; and

Three – That a reasonable person would have realised that that conduct placed, or may have placed, another person at an appreciable risk of serious injury; and

Four – That NOA acted recklessly, because s/he foresaw that an appreciable risk of serious injury was a probable consequence of that conduct; and

Five – That NOA acted without lawful excuse or authority.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of conduct endangering persons.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

7.4.15.4 Checklist: Conduct Endangering Persons (Pre-1/7/13)

Click here for a Word version of this document for adaptation

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused committed the conduct alleged in the presentment; and

2. The conduct was voluntary; and

3. The conduct endangered another person; and

4. The accused acted recklessly; and

5. The accused acted without lawful authority or excuse.

Conduct

1. Did the accused commit the conduct alleged in the presentment?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of conduct endangering persons

Voluntariness

2. Did the accused voluntarily commit that conduct?

If Yes, then go to 3.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of conduct endangering persons

Endangerment

3. Did the accused's conduct endanger another person?

3.1. Would a reasonable person who committed the same conduct as the accused, in the same circumstances, realised that s/he was placing another person at an appreciable risk of serious injury?

Consider – There must be more than a remote risk of serious injury.

Consider – The risk must be of "serious" injury.

Consider – Injury includes unconsciousness, hysteria, pain and any substantial impairment of bodily function; and Serious injury includes a combination of injuries.

If Yes, go to 4

If No, go to 3.2

3.2. Would a reasonable person who committed the same conduct as the accused, in the same circumstances, realised that s/he may have been placing another person at an appreciable risk of serious injury?

Consider – There must be more than a remote risk of serious injury.

Consider – The risk must be of "serious" injury.

Consider – Injury includes unconsciousness, hysteria, pain and any substantial impairment of bodily function; and Serious injury includes a combination of injuries.

If Yes, go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of conduct endangering persons

Recklessness

4. At the time the accused committed the relevant conduct, did s/he foresee that an appreciable risk of serious injury was a probable consequence of his/her actions?

Consider – The risk must have been probable rather than possible.

Consider – The accused does not need to have foreseen that his/her conduct would probably cause serious injury. S/he must have foreseen that his/her actions would probably create an appreciable risk of serious injury.

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of conduct endangering persons

Lawful excuse

5. Did the accused act without lawful authority or excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of conduct endangering persons (as long as you answered yes to Questions 1, 2, 3.1 or 3.2 and 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of conduct endangering persons

Last updated: 12 September 2019

7.4.16 Extortion

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. The Crimes Act 1958 contains two separate extortion offences:
    - Extortion with a threat to kill, injure or endanger life (Crimes Act 1958 s 27); or
    - Extortion with a threat to destroy or endanger property (Crimes Act 1958 s 28).

Extortion with threat to Kill, injure or endanger life

2. Extortion with threat to kill, injure or endanger life is an offence under Crimes Act 1958 s 27.[881]
3. The offence has the following three elements:
    i) The accused made a demand.
    ii) The demand was accompanied by a threat to:
        (a) Kill or injure a person other than the accused or an accomplice of the accused; or
        (b) Commit an act which would endanger the life of a person other than the accused or an accomplice of the accused.
    iii) The accused intended the recipient of the threat to fear that the threat would be carried out unless the recipient complied with the demand.

Making a demand

4. The first element the prosecution must prove is that the accused made a demand of the victim (Crimes Act 1958 s 27).
5. The nature of the demand is immaterial. Unlike the offence of blackmail the demand does not need to be made with a view to gain or an intent to cause a loss (compare Crimes Act 1958 s 87).
6. The demand may be implicit or explicit (R v Clear [1968] 1 QB 670; R v Collister (1955) 39 Cr App R 100; R v Lambert [2010] 1 Cr App R 21; R v Akhmatov [2004] EWCA Crim 1004; R v Studer (1915) 11 Cr App R 307; R v Jessen [1997] 2 Qd R 213).
7. It is for the jury to determine whether, in all the circumstances of the case, there was a demand. The test is whether a reasonable person would have understood that a demand was being made (R v Collister (1955) 39 Cr App R 100).
8. In determining this issue, the jury should consider matters such as the accused's demeanour and the circumstances that existed at the time of the alleged demand (R v Collister (1955) 39 Cr App R 100).

---

[881] Although the heading to s 27 is "Extortion with threat to kill", the offence covers threats to inflict injury or endanger life. We have chosen to use the broader heading "Extortion with threat to kill, injure or endanger life" to reflect this fact.

9. A statement phrased as a request may, in some cases, constitute a demand, such as where it is backed up by a threat (R v Clear [1968] 1 QB 670; R v Collister (1955) 39 Cr App R 100; R v Lambert [2010] 1 Cr App R 21; R v Akhmatov [2004] EWCA Crim 1004; R v Studer (1915) 11 Cr App R 307; R v Jessen [1997] 2 Qd R 213).

10. While the demand must have been made in circumstances in which it was apt to reach the intended recipient, it does not need to have been successfully communicated to the intended recipient (Austin v The Queen (1989) 166 CLR 669; Treacy v DPP [1971] AC 537; Bank of Valletta PLC v NCA [1999] FCA 791).[882]

11. Principles of agency should not be used when analysing or explaining the process of making a demand (Latorre v R [2012] VSCA 280). If the prosecution argues that the accused committed the offence in conjunction with another person, the judge should explain the principles of complicity or the doctrine of innocent agency.

12. Where a person is able to recall or rescind a demand before it is received by the recipient, it may not be appropriate to find that the demand has been made. This may occur, for example, when the person uses a courier to deliver a letter and retains control over whether the courier completes the process (see Austin v The Queen (1989) 166 CLR 669; Treacy v DPP [1971] AC 537).

Threat to Kill, Injure or Endanger Life

13. The second element the prosecution must prove is that the demand was accompanied by a threat to:

    - Kill or injure a person other than the accused or an accomplice of the accused; or
    - Commit an act which would endanger the life of a person other than the accused or an accomplice of the accused (Crimes Act 1958 s 27).

14. In the latter case, the conduct threatened must be such that it would endanger a person's life. It is not sufficient that the conduct threatened would risk causing injury. See 7.4.14 Conduct Endangering Life for information about when the life of a person is endangered.

How Can a Threat be Made?

15. A threat can be made by words or conduct or both (R v Rich Vic CA 17/12/1997).

16. A threat can be made in writing and delivered or left with another person. The threat does not have to be received at the same time that it is made (R v Jones (1851) 5 Cox CC 226).

17. It is not necessary for the prosecution or the judge to identify the precise words or conduct that constituted the threat. Where the accused acted in a continuously threatening and abusive manner, the jury may consider whether his or her conduct as a whole amounted to a threat (R v Rich CA Vic 17/12/1997).

18. In determining whether there has been a "threat", the jury must consider the relationship between the accused and the recipient. Violent or colourful language that may appear threatening at first sight, may in fact not be a "threat" when the relationship is taken into account. For example, in the context of the parties' relationship, it may be clear that the accused did not intend to move beyond heated words and gestures (Barbaro v Quilty [1999] ACTSC 119).

---

[882] It is unlikely that a person can be charged with attempted extortion, as the demand is either made or it is not made (see Austin v The Queen (1989) 166 CLR 669; R v Moran (1952) 36 Cr App R 10). However, some authors have suggested that an attempted demand may arise where the accused is interrupted while making the demand, such as by being stopped while attempting to post a letter.

Nature of the Threat

19. The recipient of the demand need not be the person threatened. The accused may have threatened to harm or endanger any person other than the accused or an accomplice of the accused (Crimes Act 1958 s 27; R v Dixon-Jenkins (1985) 14 A Crim R 372).

20. It is not necessary that the recipient of the threat have any particular relationship with the person threatened. This element will be satisfied even if the accused threatens to harm someone that the recipient does not know (R v Solanke [1970] 1 WLR 1; R v Syme (1911) 6 Cr App R 257).

21. It is also not necessary that the subject of the threat be a specific person, or that the accused had made arrangements to carry out the threat (R v Chapple, VSCFC, 11/11/1980).

22. The accused does not need to state that he or she personally intends to execute the threat. The accused may threaten to have someone else kill, injure or endanger a person's life (Barbaro v Quilty [1999] ACTSC 119).

23. A threat can be conditional on the occurrence of a future event. It is not necessary that the accused have the immediate capacity or intention to carry out the threat (R v Leece (1995) 125 ACTR 1; Barbaro v Quilty [1999] ACTSC 119).

Impact of the Threat

24. It not necessary for the prosecution to prove that the complainant feared that the threat would be carried out, nor is it sufficient for the prosecution to prove that the complainant did feel such fear (R v Leece (1995) 125 ACTR 1; R v Rich Vic CA 17/12/1997; R v Alexander [2007] VSCA 178).

Intention

25. The prosecution must prove that the accused intended the recipient of the threat to fear that the threat would be carried out (R v Dixon-Jenkins (1985) 14 A Crim R 372).

26. The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to carry out the threat (R v Dixon-Jenkins (1985) 14 A Crim R 372).

Extortion with threat to destroy or endanger property

27. Extortion with threat to destroy or endanger property is an offence under Crimes Act 1958 s 28.

28. The offence has the following three elements:

    i) The accused made a demand;

    ii) The demand was accompanied by a threat to destroy or endanger a specified type of property; and

    iii) The accused intended the recipient of the threat to fear that the threat would be carried out unless the recipient complied with the demand.

29. The first and third elements of this offence are the same as for the offence of extortion with threat to kill, injure or endanger life (Crimes Act 1958 s 27).

Threat to Destroy or Endanger Property

30. The second element the prosecution must prove is that the demand was accompanied by a threat to destroy or endanger a:

    - Building;
    - Structure in the nature of a building;

- Bridge;
- Mine;
- Aircraft;
- Vessel;
- Motor vehicle;
- Railway engine; or
- Railway carriage.

31. See 7.4.14 Conduct Endangering Life for information concerning the concept of "endangerment".

Last updated: 14 December 2012

7.4.16.1 Charge: Extortion

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge is designed for use where it is alleged that the accused committed extortion with a threat to kill (Crimes Act 1958 s 27). It can be adapted for use where the accused is charged with:

• Extortion with a threat to injure (Crimes Act 1958 s 27);

• Extortion with a threat to endanger life (Crimes Act 1958 s 27);

• Extortion with a threat to destroy property (Crimes Act 1958 s 28); or

• Extortion with a threat to endanger property (Crimes Act 1958 s 28).

Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of extortion with a threat to kill. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – The accused made a demand.

Two – The accused reinforced the demand with a threat to kill.

Three – The accused intended the complainant to fear that the threat would be carried out if s/he didn't comply with the demand.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

The Accused Made a Demand

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused made a demand.

The demand does not need to have been clearly spelt out or made explicit. A person can make a demand indirectly or implicitly. This element will be met if a reasonable person would have understood that a demand was being made in the circumstances.

[Insert relevant evidence and arguments.]

The Demand was Accompanied by a Threat

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused reinforced the demand with a threat to kill another person. In this case it is alleged that NOA threatened to kill [NOC/NO3P] by [describe threat].[883]

[Add any of the following directions that are relevant to the case.]

- A threat does not need to be spoken. It can be made in writing, by conduct, or by a combination of these forms of communication.
- This element will not be satisfied if you consider that the accused only threatened to injure [NOC/NO3P].
- The accused does not need to have threatened to immediately kill [NOC/NO3P]. This element will be satisfied even if the threatened action was not to be carried out for some time.
- The threat to kill does not need to have been unconditional. This element will be satisfied even if the accused made his/her threat dependent on something else happening first.
- The accused does not need to have threatened to personally kill [NOC/NO3P]. This element will be satisfied if the accused threatened to have another person kill [NOC/NO3P].
- This element will not be met if NOA threatened to kill him/herself or an accomplice. You must be satisfied that the threat was to kill someone else.

In determining whether the accused has made a threat to kill, you must take into account all of the circumstances of the alleged threat [if relevant add: including the relationship between NOA and NOC].

It is important to note that you do not need to find that NOC thought that NOA would carry out the threat. Similarly, you do not need to determine whether NOA intended to carry out the threat. The question is whether or not NOA made a threat to kill.

[Insert relevant evidence and arguments.]

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused made a threat to kill in the sense that I have described that this second element will be met.

The Accused Intended to Cause Fear

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intended the complainant to fear that the threat would be carried out if s/he didn't comply with the demand.

It does not matter whether or not NOC actually felt any alarm or fear. This element only requires proof that the accused intended that NOC would fear that the threat would be carried out.

[Insert relevant evidence and arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of extortion with threat to kill, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA made a demand; and

Two – that NOA reinforced the demand with a threat to kill another person; and

---

[883] This charge must be adapted if the prosecution alleges that the accused threatened to engage in conduct that would endanger the life of another.

Three – that NOA intended NOC to fear that the threat would be carried out if s/he didn't comply with the demand.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of extortion with threat to kill.

Last updated: 4 December 2012

7.4.16.2 Checklist: Extortion

Click here for a word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist is designed for use where it is alleged that the accused committed extortion with a threat to kill (Crimes Act 1958 s 27).

It can be adapted for use where the accused is charged with:

Extortion with a threat to injure (Crimes Act 1958 s 27);

Extortion with a threat to endanger life (Crimes Act 1958 s 27);

Extortion with a threat to destroy property (Crimes Act 1958 s 28); or

Extortion with a threat to endanger property (Crimes Act 1958 s 28)

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused made a demand; and

2. The accused reinforced the demand with a threat to kill; and

3. The accused intended that the complainant would fear that the threat would be carried out if s/he didn't comply with the demand.

Demand

1. Did the accused make a demand?

If yes, go to 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of Extortion

Threat to kill

2. Did the accused reinforce the demand with a threat to kill?

If yes, go to 3

If no, then the accused is not guilty of Extortion

Intention that complainant fear that threat be carried out

3. Did the accused intend that the complainant would fear that the threat would be carried out if the demand was not met?

If yes, then the accused is guilty of Extortion (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 and 2)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of Extortion

Last updated: 4 December 2012

7.4.17 False Imprisonment

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Elements

1. False imprisonment is a common law offence. It has the following three elements:

   i) The accused deprived another person of his or her liberty;

   ii) The accused intended to deprive the person of his or her liberty; and

   iii) The deprivation of liberty was unlawful (Macpherson v Brown (1975) 12 SASR 184; R v Vollmer [1996] 1 VR 95; R v Huynh [2006] VSCA 213; R v Busuttil [2006] SASC 47).

2. There is no need to prove that the imprisonment was imposed "injuriously", or that the accused intended to injure the complainant in any way (R v Vollmer [1996] 1 VR 95; JCS v R [2006] NSWCCA 221).

Deprivation of Liberty

3. The first element the prosecution must prove is that the accused deprived another person of his or her liberty (R v Vollmer [1996] 1 VR 95; R v Huynh [2006] VSCA 213; Macpherson v Brown (1975) 12 SASR 184; R v Busuttil [2006] SASC 47).

4. This requires proof that the accused deprived a person of his or her freedom to move from one place to another (R v Huynh [2006] VSCA 213; R v Rahman (1985) 81 Cr App R 349).

5. As the offence is concerned with the deprivation of liberty, and not a mere interference with convenience, the complainant's liberty must have been totally obstructed. A partial obstruction is not sufficient (Bird v Jones (1845) 7 QB 742; R v Garrett (1988) 50 SASR 392; McFadzean v CFMEU (2007) 20 VR 250; Symes v Mahon (1922) SASR 447).

6. It is a question of fact for the jury whether the accused's conduct has deprived the complainant of his or her liberty. The complainant's personal characteristics (such as age, ethnic origin, knowledge of English, intellectual qualities and physical or mental disabilities) may be relevant to the jury's assessment (R v Awang [2004] 2 Qd R 672).

7. A person's liberty may be restrained in various ways, including by physical restraint, by threats of harm to the complainant or another, or by other intimidating conduct (Homsi v R [2011] NSWCCA 164; McFadzean v CFMEU (2007) 20 VR 250; R v Garrett (1988) 50 SASR 392; Myer Stores Pty Ltd v Soo [1991] 2 VR 597).

8. A person may be deprived of their liberty by fraud (Davis v R [2006] NSWCCA 392; Go v R (1990) 73 NTR 1).

9. However, there is no deprivation of liberty where an accused induces another person by fraudulent misrepresentation to go unaccompanied from one place to another (R v Hendy-Freegard [2008] QB 57).

"Against the complainant's will"

10. In most cases the prosecution must prove that the deprivation of liberty was against the complainant's will. There is no deprivation of liberty if the complainant, of his or her own free will, agrees to go to or remain in a place nominated by the accused (McFadzean v CFMEU (2007) 20 VR 250. See also Myer Stores Pty Ltd v Soo [1991] 2 VR 597; R v Garrett (1988) 50 SASR 392).

11. It is unclear whether the deprivation of liberty must always be against the complainant's will. While some cases have held that it must be (e.g. R v Bournewood Community and Mental Health NHS Trust; Ex parte L [1999] 1 AC 458), others have held that is not the case (see, e.g. JCS v The Queen [2006] NSWCCA 221). See McFadzean v CFMEU (2007) 20 VR 250 for a discussion of this issue.

12. To prove that the deprivation of liberty was against the complainant's will, the prosecution must prove:

    - That the accused's conduct was of a coercive character; and
    - That the complainant would not have submitted to the deprivation of liberty but for the accused's conduct (i.e., his or her will was overborne) (McFadzean v CFMEU (2007) 20 VR 250; Paton v R [2011] VSCA 72. Cf Homsi v R [2011] NSWCCA 164).

13. Thus, even if the accused has blocked the complainant's ability to leave a location, this element will not be met if the complainant remains at that location for his or her own reasons, uninfluenced by the accused's actions (McFadzean v CFMEU (2007) 20 VR 250).

14. A complainant may, in the course of an extended detention, change his or her mind and consent to the detention. From that point in time the accused is no longer depriving the complainant of his or her liberty (R v Nguyen & Tran [1998] 4 VR 394).

15. In addition, where a person consents to the imprisonment, it will not be unlawful (R v Vollmer [1996] 1 VR 95). See Unlawfulness (below).

16. If the complainant was incapable of consenting to the deprivation of liberty (e.g. a young child), a jury will readily infer that the complainant did not consent (R v D [1984] AC 778).

Knowledge of the deprivation

17. It is unclear whether the complainant must know that his or her means of leaving a place have been blocked. While some cases have suggested that false imprisonment may occur without the complainant's knowledge (see, e.g. JCS v The Queen [2006] NSWCCA 221; R v Awang [2004] 2 Qd R 672; Go v R (1990) 73 NTR 1), others have held that the complainant must be aware of the imprisonment (see, e.g. R v Bournewood Community and Mental Health NHS Trust; Ex parte L [1999] 1 AC 458. See also McFadzean v CFMEU (2007) 20 VR 250).

Conditional deprivation

18. An issue concerning this element may arise where:

    - The complainant voluntarily enters into an arrangement which restricts his or her liberty and makes release contingent on some event;
    - He or she seeks to be released prior to the occurrence of that event; and
    - The accused prevents him or her from leaving (because the condition has not been fulfilled).

19. In such circumstances, the complainant has not been deprived of his or her liberty simply because he or she has been detained. There will only be a deprivation of liberty if the complainant did not consent to being detained in such circumstances (The Balmain New Ferry Co v Robertson (1906) 4 CLR 379).

20. To determine if the complainant consented to the deprivation, the jury must examine the terms of the relevant arrangement (The Balmain New Ferry Co v Robertson (1906) 4 CLR 379).

21. There will be a deprivation of liberty if the accused does not seek to give effect to the purpose for which the arrangement was entered into, and does not give the complainant a reasonable opportunity to leave (R v Huynh [2006] VSCA 213).

Means of escape

22. There is no deprivation of liberty if the complainant had a reasonable means of escape available (McFadzean v CFMEU (2007) 20 VR 250).

23. Where there was a reasonable means of escape, it does not matter that the complainant did not make use of it. Its existence is sufficient to negate this element (McFadzean v CFMEU (2007) 20 VR 250).

24. The issue is not whether it would have been reasonable for any person to escape. The court must consider a proposed means of escape was reasonable for the complainant. This may depend on factors such as the physical or mental condition of the complainant (McFadzean v CFMEU (2007) 20 VR 250).

25. The following factors are also relevant to assessing the reasonableness of a means of escape:

    - Threat or danger to the complainant or other people;
    - Threat or danger to property (including property of others);
    - Distance and time;
    - Legality (McFadzean v CFMEU (2007) 20 VR 250. See also The Balmain New Ferry Co v Robertson (1906) 4 CLR 379; Burton v Davies and General Fire Accident and Life Assurance Corporation Ltd [1953] St R Qd 26).

26. The fact that a means of escape is inconvenient does not make it unreasonable. For example, it has been held to be reasonable for a complainant to have to swim from Circular Quay to the shore, or to journey through the bush for two hours (McFadzean v CFMEU (2007) 20 VR 250; Balmain New Ferry Co v Robertson (1906) 4 CLR 379).

27. A means of escape may be reasonable even if it requires the complainant to commit a minor trespass (McFadzean v CFMEU (2007) 20 VR 250; Wright v Wilson (1699) 91 ER 1394).

28. The fact that the complainant could have sought assistance from police to escape does not mean that they had a reasonable means of escape (McFadzean v CFMEU (2007) 20 VR 250).

29. Where is person is deprived of his or her liberty by threats, the availability of a means of physical escape which the complainant chooses not to use does not imply consent to the imprisonment (R v Garrett (1988) 50 SASR 392; McFadzean v CFMEU (2007) 20 VR 250)

30. Where there is a reasonable means of escape, and the complainant hesitates before using it, there is no false imprisonment during the period of hesitation. By contrast, where there is a means of escape which is not reasonable, and the complainant hesitates before using it, there is false imprisonment during the period of hesitation (McFadzean v CFMEU (2007) 20 VR 250).

Avoid using the word "compel"

31. As "compelling" a person to remain in a particular place or go to a particular place does not necessarily involve restraint on a person's freedom of movement, judges should avoid using the term "compel" in their directions (R v Huynh [2006] VSCA 213).

Intention

32. The second element the prosecution must prove is that the accused intended to deprive the complainant of his or her liberty (Macpherson v Brown (1975) 12 SASR 184; R v Garrett (1988) 50 SASR 392; R v Busuttil [2006] SASC 47; Paton v R [2011] VSCA 72).

33. There is no need to prove that the accused intended to arouse fear of violence, or foresaw that the complainant may fear violence (Macpherson v Brown (1975) 12 SASR 184; R v Vollmer [1996] 1 VR 95).

34. This element will not be met if the accused mistakenly believed that the complainant consented to the deprivation of liberty (R v Faraj [2007] 2 Cr App R 25; Defina v R, VSC, 3/3/1993; R v Vollmer [1996] 1 VR 95).

35. It is not necessary to show that the asserted belief was reasonable. The reasonableness of the belief is relevant only to whether the accused held the belief (R v Faraj [2007] 2 Cr App R 25).

36. The judge must determine whether there is an evidentiary basis for a claim of mistaken belief before leaving this issue for the jury (Defina v R, VSC, 3/3/1993; R v Vollmer [1996] 1 VR 95; R v Faraj [2007] 2 Cr App R 25).

Unlawfulness

37. The third element the prosecution must prove is that the deprivation of liberty was unlawful (R v Vollmer [1996] 1 VR 95; R v Huynh [2006] VSCA 213).

38. It is unlawful to deprive a person of his or her liberty unless the deprivation is authorised (e.g. by a court order, the common law or statutory authority) (R v Vollmer [1996] 1 VR 95).

39. This element will be met if a police officer arrests, imprisons or otherwise detains someone in circumstances where they had no lawful authority to do so (McIntosh v Webster (1980) 30 ACTR 19; R v Banner [1970] VR 240; Myer Stores Pty Ltd v Soo [1991] 2 VR 597; R v Faraj [2007] 2 Cr App R 25).

40. Parents may lawfully detain their children for the purposes of discipline. However, excessive detention may move beyond the bounds of reasonable parental discipline and render the detention unlawful (R v Rahman (1985) 81 Cr App R 349; JCS v R [2006] NSWCCA 221).

41. Defence of another or defence of property can provide a lawful basis for detaining a person (R v Faraj [2007] 2 Cr App R 25).

Alternative Offences

42. There are some older authorities that suggest that every false imprisonment connotes an assault. However, false imprisonment and assault are now considered to be two distinct crimes (MacPherson v Brown (1975) 12 SASR 184; McFadzean v CFMEU (2007) 20 VR 250).

43. While assault may be a factual alternative to false imprisonment, this is not necessarily the case (MacPherson v Brown (1975) 12 SASR 184; Zanker v Vartzokas (1988) 34 A Crim R 11).

44. Judges will need to consider the position of the parties and whether there is a request to leave assault as an alternative offence before directing the jury on that offence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 11).

45. The distinction between common law kidnapping and false imprisonment is that in kidnapping, the complainant is taken away from some place. There is no element of taking away in the offence of false imprisonment (Davis v R [2006] NSWCCA 392; R v Wellard [1978] 3 All ER 161).[884]

Last updated: 29 June 2015

7.4.17.1 Charge: False Imprisonment

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

I must now direct you about the crime of false imprisonment. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – The accused deprived another person of his or her liberty;

Two – The accused intended to deprive that person of his or her liberty; and [884] The offence of kidnapping under Crimes Act 1958 s 63A does not require proof that the complainant was taken away (see Davis v R [2006] NSWCCA 392).

Three – The deprivation of liberty was unlawful.

I will now explain each element in more detail.[885]

Deprivation of Liberty

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused deprived another person of his or her liberty.

This requires the prosecution to prove that NOA prevented NOC from freely moving from one place to another, against NOC's will.

[If it is alleged that the complainant was deprived of his/her liberty by non-physical means*, add the following shaded section*.]

NOA does not need to have physically prevented NOC from moving. A person can be deprived of their liberty by [insert relevant example, e.g. "threats or other intimidating conduct".]

[If the complainant's consent is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

You can only find this first element established if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not freely agree to [describe circumstances of alleged detention]. S/he will not have been deprived of his/her liberty if s/he agreed to remain at [identify location] for his/her own reasons, rather than because s/he was made to do so by NOA.

[If the reasonableness of any means of escape are in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In deciding whether NOA deprived NOC of his/her liberty, you must consider whether NOC had a reasonable means of escape. A person who has a reasonable means of escape is not unlawfully imprisoned.

To determine whether a means of escape was reasonable, you must consider [describe factors relevant to the reasonableness of escape, including risks to the victim, risks to property, distance and time required to escape and the legality of the means of escape].

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC had no reasonable means of escape. If they are unable to do so, then you must find NOA not guilty of false of imprisonment.

[Summarise evidence and/or arguments.]

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intended to deprive the complainant of his/her liberty.

[Summarise evidence and/or arguments.]

Lawful Excuse

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused's deprivation of the complainant's liberty was unlawful.

As a matter of law, a deprivation of liberty will be unlawful unless it is lawfully justified. The accused has argued his/her conduct was lawfully justified because [identify lawful excuse].

---

[885] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

As I have told you, the prosecution is responsible for proving each element. The accused does not have to prove anything.

So for this element, the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused was not [identify lawful excuse]. To do this, the prosecution must prove that [describe facts required to disprove any alleged lawful excuse].

[Summarise evidence and/or arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of false imprisonment the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA deprived NOC of his/her liberty against his/her will;

Two – That NOA intended to deprive NOC of his/her liberty; and Three – That NOA's deprivation of NOC's liberty was unlawful.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of false imprisonment.

Last updated: 20 May 2022

7.4.17.2 Checklist: False Imprisonment

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused deprived the complainant of his or her liberty; and

2. The accused intended to deprive the complainant of his or her liberty; and

3. The deprivation of liberty was unlawful.

Deprivation of Liberty

1. Did the accused deprive the complainant of his or her liberty?

If Yes, then go to 2.

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of False Imprisonment

Intention

2. Did the accused intend to deprive the complainant of his or her liberty?

If Yes, then go to 3.

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of False Imprisonment

Unlawful

3. Did the accused act without lawful justification or excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of False Imprisonment (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2 and 3).

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of False Imprisonment

Last updated: 18 November 2013

7.4.18 Child Stealing

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Section 63 of the Crimes Act 1958 creates three discrete offences that may be called 'Child stealing'.
2. The first child stealing offence requires that the prosecution prove the following 5 elements:
   (a) The accused took, decoyed, enticed away or detained a person;
   (b) That person was a child under the age of 16;
   (c) The taking or other conduct was achieved by force or fraud
   (d) The accused intended to:
      i) deprive any parent, guardian or any other person having the lawful care or charge of the child of the possession of the child; or
      ii) steal any item from the child.
   (e) The accused acted without lawful excuse (Crimes Act 1958 s 63(1)).
3. The second child stealing offence requires that the prosecution prove that:
   (a) The accused received or harboured a person;
   (b) That person was a child under the age of 16;
   (c) The accused intended to:
      i) deprive any parent or guardian or any other person having the lawful care or charge of such child of the possession of such child; or
      ii) steal any article upon or about the person of such child;
   (d) The accused knew that the child had been led, taken, decoyed, enticed away or detained by force or fraud (Crimes Act 1958 s 63(1)).
4. The third child stealing offence requires the prosecution to prove that:
   (a) The accused took away, decoyed or enticed away a person;
   (b) The person was a child under the age of 16;
   (c) The accused took the child out of the possession of the child's parent, guardian or other person with lawful care or charge of the person;
   (d) The taking was against the will of the child's parent, guardian or other person with lawful care or charge of the person;
   (e) At the time of his or her conduct, the accused intended to take a child, known or believed to be under the age of 16, from the care of a parent or guardian and that the taking was against the will of the child's parent or guardian; and
   (f) The accused acted without lawful excuse (Crimes Act 1958 s 63(2); Moore v Police (2008) 100 SASR 277).

5. The offence of child stealing is a form of kidnapping of a child under the age of 16 years for one of the particular purposes designated in the section. The existence of this statutory offence does not affect the common law offence of kidnapping (R v D [1984] AC 778; R v Nguyen [1998] 4 VR 394; R v McEachran (2006) 15 VR 615).

6. This topic focuses on the elements of the third form of child stealing identified above. 7.4.19 Kidnapping (Common Law) provides some assistance on aspects of the first and second forms of child stealing.

Taking away

7. The first element the prosecution must prove is that the accused took a person away (Crimes Act 1958 s 63).

8. This element requires the prosecution to establish a causal relationship between the conduct of the accused and the departure of the person from his or her parents or guardians (R v Stanton (1981) 3 A Crim R 294; James v R [2013] VSCA 177; Jac*kson v R* (1999) 113 A Crim R 299).

9. The accused must be an effective cause of the person leaving, rather than being inconsequential or peripheral to the person's departure. However, it is not necessary to show that the accused's conduct was the sole cause (R v A [2000] 1 WLR 189; Moore v Police (2008) 100 SASR 277; R v Stanton (1981) 3 A Crim R 294; R v Mackney (1903) 29 VLR 22).

10. This requires the prosecution to show that the accused took an active part in the person's departure, such as by offering inducements or persuasion (R v Jarvis (1903) 20 Cox CC 249).

11. The consent of the child does not provide a defence. A jury may find that the accused took the child away even if the child consented (R v A [2000] 1 WLR 1879; R v Olifer (1866) 10 Cox CC 402; R v Mackney (1903) 29 VLR 22).

12. It is not necessary to show that the accused used force or fraud to take the child away. This is only an element of the first two forms of child stealing identified at the start of this topic (compare Crimes Act 1958 s 63(1) and (2); R v Mejac [1954] Tas SR 26).

Taking Away and Absconding Children

13. When a child leaves home and goes to the accused, there may be a moral obligation on the accused to report the child's whereabouts to the parents. However, there is no legal obligation and failure to notify the child's parents does not constitute taking away the child (James v R [2013] VSCA 177; Moore v Police (2008) 100 SASR 277; R v Olifer (1866) 10 Cox CC 402; R v Henkers (1887) 16 Cox CC 257).

14. This element is not established where the child independently decided to leave his or her parents and the accused passively harboured the child and offered no inducement to the child (see James v R [2013] VSCA 177; R v Jackson [1999] NSWCCA 387; R v Jarvis (1903) 20 Cox CC 249; R v Mejac [1954] Tas SR 26; R v Charman (1910) 10 SR 540; R v Macney (1903) 29 VLR 22; R v Olifer (1866) 10 Cox CC 402; Moore v Police (2008) 100 SASR 277; R v Stanton (1981) 3 A Crim R 294).

15. However, where the child leaves home without a plan and then jointly formulates a plan with the accused, or where the accused actively assists the child, then the first element may be proved. The accused can also take a child away where the child instigates a plan to leave his or her parents due to the accused's previous suggestions or influence (compare R v Mejac [1954] Tas SR 26 and R v Jackson [1999] NSWCCA 387. See also R v Jarvis (1903) 20 Cox CC 249; James v R [2013] VSCA 177).

Out of Possession

16. The prosecution must prove that the accused took the child out of the possession of the parent or guardian. This requires a substantial interference with the possessory relationship of parent and child (see R v Jones [1973] Crim LR 621; Moore v Police (2008) 100 SASR 277).

17. It is not necessary to show an intention to take the child permanently. A temporary taking is sufficient (R v Baille (1859) 8 Cox CC 238. But c.f. R v Jones [1973] Crim LR 621).

18. Possession for the purpose of s 63 refers to both the parent or guardian's right to exercise care, custody and control of a child and the actual exercise of that right (Moore v Police (2008) 100 SASR 277).

19. The exercise of the right of care, custody and control of a child is not limited to situations in which a child is in physical proximity to a parent or guardian. It extends to situations where a child is acting under the direction or with the consent of a parent or guardian, such as by travelling unsupervised to a park (Moore v Police (2008) 100 SASR 277; R v Leather (1993) 98 Cr App R 179; R v Charman (1910) 10 SR (NSW) 540; James v R [2013] VSCA 177).

20. Where the evidence raises it as an issue, the jury must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the child had not voluntarily left the possession of the parent or guardian prior to the accused's conduct (R v Jackson [1999] NSWCCA 387; R v Stanton (1981) 3 A Crim R 294; R v Henkers (1887) 16 Cox CC 257; Foster v DPP [2005] 1 WLR 1400).

21. For information on whether the action of the accused took the child out of the possession of the parent or guardian, or whether the child's own actions did so, see Taking Away and Absconding Children (above).

Against the Will

22. The fourth element requires the prosecution to prove that the taking was against the will of the child's parent or guardian.

23. Others who take care, custody and control of a child, such as school teachers, carers or relatives may take possession of a child from time to time, where the taking is not 'against the will' of the parent or guardian (Moore v Police (2008) 100 SASR 277).

Intention of accused

24. There are conflicting authorities on whether the prosecution must prove that the accused knew that the child was under 16, or alternatively, whether an honest and reasonable belief that the child was over 16 would provide a defence. Judges will need to consider this issue in a case where it is relevant (compare Foster v DPP [2005] 1 WLR 1400 and R v Olifer (1866) 10 Cox CC 402; R v Stanton (1981) 3 A Crim R 294 (Brinsden J); Moore v Police (2008) 100 SASR 277; R v Mousir [1987] Crim LR 561).

25. In accordance with general principles of criminal responsibility, this Charge Book assumes that the prosecution must prove that the accused intended to take a child, known or believed to be under the age of 16, out of the possession and against the will of the parent or guardian (see He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523).

Without lawful excuse

26. The sixth element is that the taking was without lawful excuse.

27. The word "unlawfully" in s 63 means "without lawful excuse" (R v Austin (1981) 72 Cr App R 104).

28. It is beyond the scope of this topic to identify all possible bases of lawful excuse. Judges will need to direct on this element when it arises as an issue.

Claim of right

29. Section 63 provides a statutory bar to prosecutions where the accused raises a claim of right to a charge of child stealing. The following people may not be prosecuted for taking a child out of the possession of a person having the lawful care or charge of the child:

    - The mother of the child;

- A person who has claimed to be the father of an illegitimate child;
- A person who has claimed any right to the possession of the child.

30. This statutory prohibition on prosecution is not the same as a statutory defence. The provision operates only to prohibit proceedings against any of the three classes of people for an offence under s 63. However, the prosecution may bring proceedings for a conspiracy to commit child stealing, or against accessories who assist a person described in s 63 to commit an act of child stealing. The fact that the prosecution cannot bring proceedings against an exempt person does not prevent the prosecution, in the trial of an accessory, from proving that an exempt person committed the crime of child stealing (R v Burns (1984) 79 Cr App R 173; R v Austin (1981) 72 Cr App R 104).
31. The class of exempt persons is very limited. According to UK authority on equivalent provisions, it consists only of the mother and father of the child, a guardian appointed by a testamentary document or an order conferring the status of guardianship, or a person who is the subject of an order conferring a form of care, control, custody or access (R v Austin (1981) 72 Cr App R 104).

Last updated: 2 December 2013

7.4.18.1 Charge: Child Stealing

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of child stealing. That crime has the following six elements:

One – The accused took away, decoyed, or enticed away a person

Two – That person was a child under the age of 16

Three – The accused took the child out of the possession of the person with lawful care of the child

Four – The taking was against the will of the person with lawful care of the child

Five – The accused intended to take a child, known or believed to be under the age of 16, out of the possession and against the will of the person with lawful care of the child.

Six – The accused acted without lawful excuse

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Taking away

The first element the prosecution must prove is that NOA took away, decoyed or enticed away NOC.

To establish this element, the prosecution must show that NOA was an active and effective cause of NOC leaving NOG.[886] The prosecution say that NOA did this by [describe alleged manner of taking].

[Where the child may have left the possession of the parent or guardian without the accused's influence, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, one issue you must consider is whether NOC had already left the possession of NOG at the time the prosecution say that NOA committed this offence. In other words, you must consider whether NOC took himself/herself away, or whether NOA took him/her away. You can only find this first element proved if the prosecution establishes that NOA caused NOC to leave NOG.

[886] Name of parent, guardian or other person with lawful care or charge of the child.

To prove this offence, it is not enough to say that NOA was under a moral duty to return NOC to NOG. The prosecution must prove that NOA took NOC away, and not merely found him/her after s/he left his/her parents/guardian.

For this offence, it does not matter whether NOC freely agreed to go with NOA.[887]

[Summarise competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Child

The second element the prosecution must prove is that NOC is under the age of 16. You have heard evidence that NOC was born on [insert date of birth] and was aged [insert age] on [insert date of offence]. You should not have any difficulty finding this element proven.

Out of possession

The third element the prosecution must prove is that NOA took NOC out of the possession of [describe relevant person with lawful care of the child and the basis of that lawful relationship, e.g. "his/her parents, Mr and Mrs Smith"].

This element requires the prosecution to show that NOA interfered in a substantial manner with NOG's right to exercise care, custody and control of NOC or NOG's ability to exercise of that right.

[Summarise competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Against the will

The fourth element the prosecution must prove is that the taking was against the will of NOG.

[Summarise competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Intention

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that NOA intended to take a child, known or believed to be under the age of 16, out of the possession and against the will of NOG.

This element looks at the accused's state of mind. You must consider what s/he knew and what s/he intended at the time that [describe factual basis for offence]. In order to prove this element, the prosecution must establish the following three matters:

One – That NOA knew or believed that NOC was aged under 16;

Two – That NOA intended to take NOC out of the possession of the person with lawful care of him/her;

Three – That NOA knew that this was against the will of the person with lawful care of the NOC.

If you are not satisfied that NOA had these three states of mind at the time that [describe factual basis for offence], then this element is not established and you must find NOA not guilty of child stealing.

[Summarise competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

---

[887] Where there is a dispute over whether the child left his or her parents or guardians without the influence of the accused, the judge should give the jury additional guidance on when the accused's conduct is an active taking or a passive receiving. See 7.4.18 Child Stealing for guidance.

Without lawful excuse

The sixth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

This means that the prosecution must prove that [describe facts required to disprove any alleged lawful excuse].

[Summarise competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of child stealing, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA took away, decoyed, or enticed away NOC;

Two – That NOC was a child under the age of 16;

Three – That NOA took NOC out of the possession of NOG;

Four – That this taking was against the will of NOG;

Five – That NOA intended to take a child, known or believed to be under the age of 16, out of the possession and against the will of the person with lawful care of the child;

Six – That NOA acted without any lawful justification or excuse. If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of child stealing.

Last updated: 2 December 2013

7.4.18.2 Checklist: Child Stealing

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Six elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused took away, decoyed or enticed a person; and

2. The person was a child under the age of 16; and

3. The accused took the child out of the possession of the person with lawful care of the child; and

4. The taking was against the will of the person with lawful care; and

5. The accused intended to take a child, known or believed to be under the age of 16, out of the possession and against the will of the person with lawful care of the child; and

6. The accused acted without lawful excuse

Took away, decoyed or enticed a person

1. Did the accused take away, entice or decoy a person?

Consider – Was the accused the effective cause of the person leaving his or her parent or guardian?

If yes, then go to 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of child stealing

Child

2. Was the person a child under the age of 16?

If yes, then go to 3

If no, then the accused is not guilty of child stealing

Out of the possession

3. Did the accused take the child out of the possession of the person with lawful care of the child?

If yes, then go to 4

If no, then the accused is not guilty of child stealing

Against the will

4. Was the taking against the will of the child's parent or guardian?

If yes, then go to 5.1

If no, then the accused is not guilty of child stealing

Intention

5.1 Did the accused know or believe that the child was under 16?

If yes, then go to 5.2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of child stealing

5.2 Did the accused intend to take the child out of the possession of the child's parent or guardian?

If yes, then go to 5.3

If no, then the accused is not guilty of child stealing

5.3 Did the accused know that the taking was against the will of the parent or guardian?

If yes, then go to 6

If no, then the accused is not guilty of child stealing

Without lawful excuse

6. Did the accused act without lawful excuse?

If yes, then the accused is guilty of child stealing (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3, 4, 5.1, 5.2 and 5.3)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of child stealing

Last updated: 30 May 2014

7.4.19 Kidnapping (Common Law)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Scope

1. Kidnapping is both an offence under the common law and an offence contrary to Crimes Act 1958 s 63A.[888]

2. This topic looks at the common law offence.[889] For an examination of the statutory offence see 7.4.20 Kidnapping (Statutory).

Overview

3. Kidnapping at common law has the following five elements:

   (a) The accused took or carried that person away;

   (b) The accused deprived another person of his or her liberty;

   (c) The accused did this by force or fraud;

   (d) The person taken or carried away did not consent to that conduct; and

   (e) The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse (R v D [1984] AC 778; R v Nguyen [1998] 4 VR 394; R v McEachran (2006) 15 VR 615; R v Hendy-Freegard [2008] QB 57; R v Vu [2011] BCCA 112).

4. While it has been suggested that the element of taking or carrying away is the only matter that distinguishes kidnapping from false imprisonment, this Charge Book refers to the traditional elements of kidnapping, rather than treating the offence as an aggravated form of false imprisonment (see Davis v R [2006] NSWCCA 392).

5. The elements of the offence are the same regardless of the victim's age (R v Nguyen [1998] 4 VR 394; Evans v His Honour Judge Shelton [1998] VSCA 29).

6. Kidnapping is a continuing offence that begins when the victim is initially taken away, and ends when the victim is released. It is not necessary to separately charge false imprisonment when the victim taken away and then detained at a fixed location. In addition, a co-offender may be liable for kidnapping by participating in the continued detention of the victim, even if he or she was not involved in initially taking the victim (see Davis v R [2006] NSWCCA 392; R v Vu [2011] BCCA 112).

Taking or Carrying Away

7. For the first element to be met, the jury must be satisfied that the accused took or carried the victim from one place to another (R v Wellard [1978] 1 WLR 921; R v Reid [1973] QB 299; R v Hendy-Freegard [2008] QB 57; R v Vu [2011] BCCA 112; R v Pollitt (2007) 97 SASR 332; R v Fetherston [2006] VSCA 278).

---

[888] The enactment of Crimes Act 1958 s 63A did not abolish the common law offence (R v Nguyen [1998] 4 VR 394; Evans v His Honour Judge Shelton [1998] VSCA 29).

[889] For a detailed discussion of the history of the offence of kidnapping see R v D [1984] AC 778; R v Nguyen [1998] 4 VR 394 at 407–411.

8. For the accused's conduct to amount to "taking away", that conduct must be an effective cause of the victim accompanying the accused to another place. It is not necessary to prove that the accused physically "carried away" or otherwise physically "removed" the victim (R v Wellard [1978] 1 WLR 921; Davis v R [2006] NSWCCA 392; R v Fetherston [2006] VSCA 278).

9. This can also be expressed as a requirement that the victim was taken away from the place s/he wished to be (R v Wellard [1978] 1 WLR 921).

10. The victim does not have to be taken away any great distance, but there must be sufficient movement from where the victim wished to be for the conduct to amount to a "carrying away". Where in issue, the sufficiency of the distance travelled is a jury question and to be decided on the facts of each case (R v Wellard [1978] 1 WLR 921; Davis v R [2006] NSWCCA 392; R v Campbell and Brennan [1981] Qd R 516).

11. The offence is committed when accused takes the victim away from the place the victim wished to be. It is not necessary to show that the victim was taken to the place the kidnapper intended (R v Wellard [1978] 1 WLR 921).

Deprivation of Liberty

12. For the second element to be met, the jury must be satisfied that the accused deprived the victim of his or her liberty (R v Hendy-Freegard [2008] QB 57; R v Tremblay (1997) 117 CCC (3d) 86. See also R v D [1984] AC 778; R v Wellard [1978] 1 WLR 921).

13. A misrepresentation to the effect that the accused has lawful authority to direct a person's movements may be sufficient to deprive the person of their liberty. However a misrepresentation that induces the other person to choose to go to or stay at a particular place will not establish this element (R v Hendy-Freegard [2008] QB 57).

14. For information on the meaning of deprivation of liberty, see 7.4.17 False Imprisonment.

By force or by fraud

15. The third element of kidnapping requires the prosecution to prove that the accused committed the conduct constituting the first and second elements "by force or fraud" (R v Wellard [1978] 1 WLR 921; R v D [1984] AC 778; R v Nguyen [1998] 4 VR 394; R v McEachran (2006) 15 VR 615; R v Hendy-Freegard [2008] QB 57).

16. It has been questioned whether this should be treated as a separate element or simply as part of the fourth element requirement that the "carrying away" be without consent. However, it currently remains a separate element (R v Nguyen [1998] 4 VR 394).[890]

Kidnapping by Force

17. Force may be understood to mean "a hostile intent calculated to cause apprehension in the mind of a complainant, together with the acts that caused the complainant to apprehend immediate and unlawful violence" (R v Pollitt (2007) 97 SASR 332 at 346).

18. There is no legal standard for the minimum physical contact capable of constituting a "use of force". If placed in issue, it is for the jury to determine whether a particular physical contact amounts to a "use of force" (R v Dawson & James (1976) 64 Crim App R 170).

---

[890] In the case of very young children, courts may be willing to adopt a wide definition of fraud, due to the risk of a child willingly accompanying a stranger who merely asks the child to do so without any force or fraud (See R v Gallup [2002] ABQB 638).

19. It is not necessary to show that the accused physically carried the victim off. For the purpose of kidnapping, force includes a threat of force (R v Wellard [1978] 1 WLR 921; R v Pollitt (2007) 97 SASR 332).

Kidnapping by Fraud

20. The form of fraud relied upon must be a kind of fraud which vitiates the consent of the victim, as the prosecution must show that the conduct was against the will of the victim (R v Gallup [2002] ABQB 638; Go v R (1990) 73 NTR 1; R v Awang [2004] 2 Qd R 672).

21. Where fraud is relied upon, it must be a positive misrepresentation rather than just the suppression of the truth (R v Cort [2003] 3 WLR 1300).

22. Kidnapping by fraud can raise difficult issues associated with other elements of the offence in particular circumstances. Judges will need to consider whether the fraud affects the issue of whether the victim was deprived of his or her liberty and whether the fraud vitiates consent.[891]

Absence of Consent

23. The fourth element of the kidnapping requires that the deprivation of liberty and the taking away were against the will of the victim (R v D [1984] AC 778; R v Nguyen [1998] 4 VR 394; R v McEachran (2006) 15 VR 615; R v Hendy-Freegard [2008] QB 57).

24. The prosecution must prove that there was not informed consent which was freely and voluntarily given. Submission, or consent that is vitiated by fraud, does not disprove this element (R v Gallup [2002] ABQB 638).

25. Regardless of the age of the alleged victim, in all cases the jury must consider whether the alleged victim consented to the kidnapping. Consent of the parent of a child under the age of discretion is relevant only to the extent that it may separately provide a lawful excuse (R v Hendy-Freegard [2008] QB 57; R v D [1984] AC 778; R v Nguyen [1998] 4 VR 394; Evans v Shelton [1998] VSCA 29; c.f. R v Gallup [2002] ABQB 638).

26. Even if consent is vitiated by fraud, the jury must still consider whether the taking away involved a deprivation of liberty. In some cases, a fraudulent ruse that leads someone to go to another place does not involve a deprivation of liberty (R v Hendy-Freegard [2008] QB 57).

Consent by children

27. The relevant state of consent is that of the person taken or carried away, even where that person is a very young child. At no point does this element depend upon the consent of a third party, such as the parent or guardian of a child (R v D [1984] AC 778).

28. As the element concerns the absence of consent, proof that the victim is incapable of consenting will establish this element. In the case of a very young child, a jury may readily infer that the child was incapable of consenting. For older children, the jury must consider whether the child had sufficient understanding and intelligence in order to consent (R v D [1984] AC 778).

29. The absence of consent may be a necessary inference from the age of a child who is very young and does not have the understanding or the intelligence to consent (R v D [1984] AC 778).

---

[891] For example, a person might, by fraud, induce another person to travel to another location. Depending on the nature of the fraud, this may or may not involve a deprivation of liberty and so that part of the first element might not be met (see R v Hendy-Freegard [2008] QB 57).

30. If capacity to consent is in issue (for example, for older children) it is a jury question. If the jury is satisfied that the child does have capacity to consent the jury must then consider whether it is satisfied that the child did in fact give consent. There is no arbitrary "age of discretion" (R v D [1984] AC 778).

Without lawful excuse

31. The final element of the offence is that the offender acted without lawful excuse (R v D [1984] AC 778).

32. Consent by the lawful guardian of a child may provide a lawful excuse, though there is little clear guidance on when consent of the guardian will be relevant.[892] As the parent of a child may be guilty of kidnapping the child, there are circumstances where consent of the parent is not a lawful excuse (See R v Hendy-Freegard [2008] QB 57; R v D [1984] AC 778; R v Nguyen [1998] 4 VR 394; Evans v Shelton [1998] VSCA 29).

33. The relationship of husband and wife does not provide a lawful excuse for kidnapping (R v Reid [1973] QB 299; R v C (1981) 3 A Crim R 146).

Obsolete Elements of the Offence

34. While it is no longer an element of the offence that the victim is taken to a place outside the "country" (or jurisdiction), such conduct may be an aggravating feature for the purpose of sentencing (R v D [1984] AC 778; R v Nguyen [1998] 4 VR 394).

35. "Secreting" the person is also no longer a further or alternative element of the offence (R v D [1984] AC 778; R v Reid [1973] QB 299).

Last updated: 18 November 2013

7.4.19.1 Charge: Kidnapping (Common Law)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge can be used when the accused is charged with kidnapping at common law.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of kidnapping. That crime has the following five elements:

One – The accused took or carried the complainant away.

Two – The accused deprived the complainant of his or her liberty.

Three – The accused did this by force or fraud.

Four – The complainant did not consent.

Five – The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

Before you can find NOA guilty of kidnapping you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proved all five of these elements beyond reasonable doubt.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

---

[892] Kidnapping by one parent in the context of family law disputes should generally be dealt with as a contempt of court if there are relevant family law orders. The matter should be treated as kidnapping only if the conduct of the parent was so serious that the ordinary person would regard it as criminal (R v D [1984] AC 778).

Take or Carry Away

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused took or carried NOC away.

The words "took" and "carried" are ordinary words that have their ordinary meaning. The element looks at whether NOA took NOC from where s/he wished to be to some other place.

[If the NOA only took NOC a short distance, add the following shaded section.]

The law does not proscribe a minimum distance that must be travelled before this element may be met. It is a matter for you to consider whether NOA took NOC far enough from where NOC wished to be that you can say the accused took or carried him/her away.

[Summarise competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Deprivation of liberty

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused deprived another person of his or her liberty.

To establish this element, the prosecution must show that NOA prevented NOC from freely moving from one place to another.

[If the reasonableness of any means of escape are in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In deciding whether NOA deprived NOC of his/her liberty, you must consider whether NOC had a reasonable means of escape. A person who has a reasonable means of escape is not unlawfully imprisoned. To determine whether a means of escape was reasonable, you must consider [describe factors relevant to the reasonableness of escape, including risks to the victim, risks to property, distance and time required to escape and the legality of the means of escape].

[Summarise competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Force or Fraud

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused deprived NOC of liberty and took or carried him/her away by force or fraud.

[Summarise competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Without consent

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused deprived NOC of liberty and took or carried him/her away without consent. That is, the conduct alleged must have occurred against the will of the complainant.

[If fraud is capable of vitiating consent, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution have argued that while NOC willingly accompanied NOA, this consent was obtained by fraud and should not be treated as real and effective consent. If you find that NOC only accompanied NOC because [describe factual findings necessary for fraud to vitiate consent, e.g. "NOA impersonated a police office and told NOC that s/he must go with him/her to the police station"], then you may find this fourth element proven.

[If the complainant is a young child, add the following shaded section.]

As NOC is a child of [insert age of child], there are two matters you should consider when determining whether the prosecution has proven this element. First, you should consider whether NOC was old enough to have sufficient understanding and intelligence that s/he was capable of consenting. If you find that NOC did not have sufficient maturity to be capable of freely agreeing to being deprived of his/her liberty and taken or carried away, then you may find this element proven. Secondly, if you find that NOC did have sufficient understanding and intelligence to be capable of consenting, then you must consider whether the prosecution has proved that s/he did not consent to being deprived of his/her liberty and taken or carried away.

[Summarise competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Without lawful excuse

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

This means that the prosecution must prove that [describe facts required to disprove any alleged lawful excuse].

[Summarise competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of kidnapping the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA deprived NOC of his/her liberty;

Two – That NOA took or carried away NOC;

Three – That NOA did so by force or fraud;

Four – That NOC did not consent;

Five – That NOA acted without any lawful justification or excuse.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of kidnapping.

Last updated: 18 November 2013

7.4.19.2 Checklist: Kidnapping (Common Law)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused took or carried the complainant away; and

2. The accused deprived the complainant of his or her liberty; and

3. The accused did so by force or fraud; and

4. The complainant did not consent; and

5. The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

Took or Carried Away

1. Did the accused take or carry the complainant from one place to another?

    If Yes, then go to 2.

    If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Kidnapping

Deprivation of Liberty

2. Did the accused deprive the complainant of his or her liberty?

If Yes, then go to 3.

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Kidnapping

Force or Fraud

3. Did the accused take or carry the complainant and deprive him or her of liberty by force or fraud?

If Yes, then go to 4.

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Kidnapping

Consent

4. Was the taking or carrying of the complainant and the deprivation of liberty without the consent of the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 5.

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Kidnapping

Lawful excuse

5. Did the accused act without lawful justification or excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Kidnapping. (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2, 3 and 4).

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Kidnapping

Last updated: 18 November 2013

7.4.20 Kidnapping (Statutory)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. The offence of kidnapping is created by Crimes Act 1958 s 63A.
2. The common law offence of kidnapping continues to exist, despite the statutory kidnapping offence (R v Nguyen [1998] 4 VR 394). For information on the common law offence, see 7.4.19 Kidnapping (Common Law).

Elements

3. Statutory kidnapping has the following two elements:
   (a) The accused led, took or enticed away or detained a person;
   (b) The accused did so either:
      i) With the intent to demand from that person or any other person any payment by way of ransom for the return or release of that person; or

ii) With intent to gain for him or herself or any other person an advantage, however arising, from the detention of that person (Crimes Act 1958 s 63A).

4. The purpose of the provision is to prevent the interference with the liberty of the victim for the purpose of obtaining an advantage (Davis v R [2006] NSWCCA 392).
5. Kidnapping is a continuing offence that begins when the victim is initially taken away, and ends when the victim is released. The primary offender is liable at the moment the victim is taken or detained with the necessary intent. Despite that, a secondary offender may be liable for kidnapping by participating in the continued detention of the victim, even if he or she was not involved in initially detaining the victim, provided all the elements are established (see Davis v R [2006] NSWCCA 392; R v Vu [2011] BCCA 112; Charlesworth v R [2009] NSWCCA 27; R v Manwaring [1983] 2 NSWLR 82).
6. Where the accused takes the victim away and detains him or her, the jury may find the accused guilty of statutory kidnapping if satisfied that the necessary intent was formed during the detention, even if the accused did not have that intention at the time of taking the person away (R v Rowe (1996) 89 A Crim R 467).

Taking or enticing away or detaining of a person

7. The first element of kidnapping can be satisfied in four different ways. The jury may find that the accused:
    - Lead a person away;
    - Took a person away;
    - Enticed a person away; or
    - Detained a person (Crimes Act 1958 s 63A).
8. Section 63A does not create multiple separate offences. Instead, the first element can be performed in any of four different ways, and the prosecution may particularise more than one form of interference with liberty, such as that the accused took and detained the victim (Davis v R [2006] NSWCCA 392).
9. However, while any of those four forms of conduct may constitute the first element, the judge must direct the jury only on the forms of conduct specified by the prosecution and should not include forms of conduct not specifically alleged (R v DMC (2002) 137 A Crim R 246).
10. Unlike the common law offence of kidnapping, section 63A does not require proof that the offender carried the victim away. It includes culpability on the basis of detention alone (Davis v R [2006] NSWCCA 392).
11. For the accused's conduct to amount to "taking away", that conduct must be an effective cause of the victim accompanying the accused to another place (R v Wellard [1978] 1 WLR 921; Davis v R [2006] NSWCCA 392; R v Fetherston [2006] VSCA 278).
12. This can also be expressed as a requirement that the victim was taken away from the place s/he wished to be (R v Wellard [1978] 1 WLR 921).
13. Where the prosecution particularises its case on the basis of "detaining", it must prove that the victim did not consent to the detaining and that the accused did not believe that the complainant was willing or consenting (R v DMC (2002) 137 A Crim R 246). It is not clear whether the prosecution must prove an absence of consent in relation to the other forms of conduct.
14. The offence concerns the fact of interference with the liberty of the victim, rather than the duration or magnitude of that interference. Where in issue, the sufficiency of the distance travelled, or the length of time the person is detained, is a jury question and to be decided on the facts of each case (R v Wellard [1978] 1 WLR 921; Davis v R [2006] NSWCCA 392; R v Campbell and Brennan [1981] Qd R 516).

15. The offence is committed when accused leads, take or entices the victim away from the place the victim wished to be. It is not necessary to show that the victim reached the destination the kidnapper intended (R v Wellard [1978] 1 WLR 921).

16. An accused cannot rely on a claim of right to justify the detention of a person in order to enforce a debt. The circumstances in which a person has a lawful power to detain another are limited, and include the relationship of parent or guardian and child, or a lawful power to arrest or detain (Williams v R [2006] NSWCCA 26).

Intention

17. The second element concerns the offender's intention. Section 63A specifies two forms of intention that may establish the offence.

Intent to demand a ransom

18. The first way to establish the second element is to show that the offender intended to demand payment by way of ransom for the release or return of the victim (Crimes Act 1958 s 63A).

19. Demand for ransom from a 'person' may include a demand made to the State and arguably other organisations that that are not natural persons (R v Boland [1974] VR 849; Austin v R (1988) 49 SASR 108).

20. The demand may also be made to the person who was detained or taken away or to a third person (Crimes Act 1958 s 63A; R v Campbell & Brennan [1981] Qd R 516).

21. It is not necessary to show that any demand or threat was actually made, or that it reached its intended recipient (Crimes Act 1958 s 63A; Austin v The Queen (1989) 166 CLR 669).

Intent to gain an advantage

22. The second way in which the prosecution may prove the second element is to show that the offender intended to gain an advantage from the detention of the victim (Crimes Act 1958 s 63A).

23. This basis of proving the second element is therefore limited to cases in which the prosecution proves the first element by showing that the accused detained the victim. Merely luring or taking the victim away will not provide the factual basis for meeting this element without also proving that the victim was detained (see Crimes Act 1958 s 63A and R v Hendy-Freegard [2008] QB 57). See 7.4.17 False Imprisonment for information on when a person is detained.

24. The advantage need not be a pecuniary one and may be satisfied in a variety of ways. It can include psychological satisfaction from spending time in the company of the victim or sexual gratification (R v Nguyen [1998] 4 VR 394; R v Robson & Collett [1978] 1 NSWLR 73; R v Stuart, NSW DC, 20/5/1976; Davis v R [2006] NSWCCA 392; R v Rowe (1996) 89 A Crim R 467; R v Rose [2003] NSWCCA 411).

25. The advantage may be obtained from the victim of the detention and the offence is not limited to an intention to gain an advantage from a third person (R v Robson & Collett [1978] 1 NSWLR 73).

26. An intent to prevent a disadvantage (such as preventing a victim from escaping who could otherwise inform police of the offender's location) may be treated as an intent to gain an advantage (R v Robson & Collett [1978] 1 NSWLR 73).

27. The process of detaining the victim may itself provide an advantage, such as where a kidnapper demands transportation from the victim (R v Campbell & Brennan [1981] Qd R 516).

Last updated: 2 December 2013

7.4.20.1 Charge: Kidnapping (Statutory)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used when the accuse is charged with kidnapping contrary to Crimes Act 1958 s 63A.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of kidnapping. That crime has the following two elements which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

One – The accused led, took or enticed the complainant away, or detained the complainant.

Two – The accused did so with the intention of demanding a ransom or gaining an advantage.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[893]

Leading, taking, enticing or detaining

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused led, took or enticed NOC away, or detained NOC.

[If the accused is alleged to have led, took or enticed the complainant, add the following shaded section.]

To establish this element, the prosecution must prove that NOA's actions were an effective cause of NOC accompanying him/her to another place. It does not matter whether this was accomplished by violence or by persuasion. What matters is whether NOA caused NOC to accompany him/her.

[If the accused is alleged to have detained the complainant, add the following shaded section.]

To establish this element, the prosecution must show that NOA prevented NOC from freely moving from one place to another. [If the reasonableness of any means of escape are in issue, add the following darker shaded section.]

In deciding whether NOA detained NOC, you must consider whether NOC had a reasonable means of escape. A person who has a reasonable means of escape is not detained. To determine whether a means of escape was reasonable, you must consider [describe factors relevant to the reasonableness of escape, including risks to the victim, risks to property, distance and time required to escape and the legality of the means of escape].

[Summarise competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Intention

The second element is that at the time of [leading NOC away/taking NOC away/enticing NOC away/detaining NOC], NOA intended to demand a ransom or gain an advantage from detaining NOC. There are two possible intentions that will meet this element – intending to demand a ransom or gain an advantage from detaining NOC.

In this case, the prosecution says that NOA intended to [demand a ransom/gain an advantage from detaining NOC].

---

[893] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[If the prosecution relies on an intent to demand a ransom, add the following shaded section.]

A ransom is a payment for the release or return of a person. The law says that a person may be guilty of this offence by intending to demand a ransom from either NOC, or from another person. In considering this element, it does not matter if NOA did not demand a ransom or did not successfully communicate this demand. This element is only concerned with NOA's intention at the time s/he [led NOC away/took NOC away/enticed NOC away/detained NOC].[894]

[If the prosecution relies on an intent to gain an advantage, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that NOA may intend to gain an advantage for him/herself or another, and that advantage has a very broad meaning. If you are satisfied that, by detaining NOC, NOA intended [describe advantage relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "to have the benefit of NOC's company"/"to stop NOC from reporting his location to police"], then you may find this element proven.

[Summarise competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of kidnapping the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA led, took or enticed NOC away, or detained NOC;

Two – That NOA did so with the intention of demanding a ransom or gaining an advantage.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of kidnapping.

Last updated: 2 December 2013

7.4.20.2 Checklist: Kidnapping (Statutory)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Two elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused led, took or enticed the complainant away, or detained the complainant; and

2. The accused did so with the intention of demanding a ransom or gaining an advantage.

Taking the complainant

1.1 Did the accused lead, take or entice the complainant away?

Consider – Was the accused the effective cause of the complainant accompanying him or her?

If yes, then go to 2.1

If no, then go to 1.2

1.2 Did the accused detain the complainant?

Consider – Did the accused prevent the complainant from moving freely from one place to another, [894] If the accused's intention may have changed over time, the judge should explain how those changes may be relevant.

without a reasonable means of escape?

If yes, then go to 2.1

If no, then the accused is not guilty of kidnapping

Intention of accused

2.1 Did the accused take or detain the complainant with the intention of demanding a ransom?

If yes, then the accused is guilty of kidnapping (as long as you also answered yes to question 1.1 or 1.2)

If no, then go to 2.2

2.2 Did the accused take or detain the complaint with the intention of gaining an advantage?

If yes, then the accused is guilty of kidnapping (as long as you also answered yes to question 1.1 or 1.2)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of kidnapping

Last updated: 30 May 2014

7.4.21 Common Law Riot

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Introduction

1. At common law, an assembly of three or more people is an 'unlawful assembly' if it is carried out with the intention to commit a crime by open force or to carry out any lawful or unlawful common purpose in a manner that gives firm and courageous people in the neighbourhood reasonable grounds to apprehend a breach of the peace (R v O'Sullivan (1948) 48 SR (NSW) 400; 65 WN (NSW) 155; see also Black v Corkery (1988) 33 A Crim R 134).
2. A lawful assembly of three or more people may become unlawful if a proposal is made to it to commit a violent act which will disturb the public peace, and that proposal is acted on (R v O'Sullivan (1948) 48 SR (NSW) 400; 65 WN (NSW) 155; see also Black v Corkery (1988) 33 A Crim R 134).
3. An 'unlawful assembly' becomes a 'rout' as soon as the assembled persons do anything toward carrying out the illegal common purpose which makes their assembly unlawful. A 'rout' becomes a 'riot' when this illegal purpose is forcibly effected by persons mutually intending to resist any opposition (Halsbury's Laws of England (4th ed, 1976) Vol 11, paras 856–862).

Riots, routs and unlawful assembly distinguished

4. It is suggested that the distinction between a riot, rout and unlawful assembly is that a riot is a tumultuous meeting of people who are guilty of actual violence; a rout occurs where such people try to commit an act that would make them rioters; and an unlawful assembly occurs where such people meet intending to make a riot, but neither carry their purpose into effect, nor make any attempt to.
5. Like an affray, a riot involves both violence and public alarm. They involve public alarm because they are currently or potentially dangerous.

Elements

6. For an accused to be guilty of riot, the following five elements must be satisfied simultaneously:
   (a) Three or more people assembled, of which the accused is one;
   (b) At least three of these people, including the accused, had a common purpose;
   (c) The assembled people, including the accused, embarked on executing that common purpose;
   (d) The people who had the common purpose intended to help each other, by force if necessary, against any person who may oppose them in the execution of their common purpose, and the accused also intended to provide such help; and
   (e) The people who had the common purpose used such violence as would alarm at least one person of reasonable firmness and courage (R v McCormack [1981] VR 104; Anderson v Attorney-General (NSW) (1987) 10 NSWLR 198; Cook, Hartigan and McCarr v R [1995] 2 Qd R 77; Boxer v R (1995) 14 WAR 505).
7. The requirement of a common purpose means that participants in a riot may be jointly charged only if they were contemporaneously involved in the alleged riot (Anderson v Attorney-General (NSW) (1987) 10 NSWLR 198).
8. A jury may find an accused guilty of rout or unlawful assembly as alternative verdicts to riot if the prosecution fails to prove all the essential elements of riot (R v Wright (1994) 74 A Crim R 152; R v Cook [1995] 2 Qd R 77; Boxer v The Queen (1995) 14 WAR 505).

Three or more people assembled

9. The first element that the prosecution must prove is that there were three or more persons assembled, and that the accused was one of those persons.
10. All alleged participants must be present at the scene of the riot at the same time, unless they incited the riot that subsequently ensued in their absence (Anderson v Attorney-General (NSW) (1987) 10 NSWLR 198; see also R v Sharpe (1848) 3 Cox CC 288; R v Caird (1970) 54 Cr App R 499).
11. Thus, when several accused are alleged to have committed the same offence of riot and one leaves the scene, they cannot be jointly guilty of the offence from the time that person leaves (Anderson v Attorney-General (NSW) (1987) 10 NSWLR 198).
12. The exception to this is where an accused encourages or incites the others to continue the riot, even though he or she has left the scene. In that instance, the accused may be charged as a principal along with the others (Anderson v Attorney-General (NSW) (1987) 10 NSWLR 198; see also R v Sharpe (1848) 3 Cox CC 288).
13. Where a crowd temporarily disperses, but a significant number of them later reassemble, valid charges of riot may still be brought (Tomarchio v Pocock [2002] WASCA 156).

For a common purpose

14. The second element is that at least three persons, one of which must be the accused, must have been assembled for a common purpose.
15. The common purpose may be lawful or unlawful (Cunninghame, Graham and Burns (1888) 16 Cox CC 420).
16. It may also be a private or public or political purpose (O'Brien v Friel [1974] NI 29).
17. The common purpose cannot be constituted by continuing the riot itself. Thus, it is not sufficient to prove a common purpose to show that, once a riot has commenced and extended over a period of time, people, otherwise than peaceably, joined the assembly and participated in it (Anderson v Attorney-General (NSW) (1987) 10 NSWLR 198).

Who embark on executing that common purpose

18. The third element requires those persons to have embarked on that common purpose (Field v The Receiver of the Metropolitan Police [1921] 2 KB 853).

19. For an accused to be guilty of the offence of riot, he or she must have been involved in at least some of the activity that makes the assembly a riot (R v Wright (1994) 74 A Crim R 152; R v Cook [1995] 2 Qd R 77; Boxer v The Queen (1995) 14 WAR 505).

20. Whether a particular accused is sufficiently involved is a question for the jury (R v Cook [1995] 2 Qd R 77).

21. However, it has been suggested that, where the behaviour that is alleged to make an assembly a riot is comprised of the assembly moving in a threatening way, the accused must participate in such movement. If the alleged behaviour is made up of several elements, such as movement, threats and property damage, it would be sufficient for the accused to be involved in some of that activity (R v Cook [1995] 2 Qd R 77; see also R v Thomas [1993] 1 Qd R 323).

22. Where some, but not all, of the members of a group that is unlawfully assembled engage in riotous behaviour, only those who actively engage in such behaviour will be guilty of the offence of riot (R v Cook [1995] 2 Qd R 77).

Intending to help each other by force if necessary

23. The next element that needs to be proved requires the assembled persons to have intended to help each other by force if necessary (Field v The Receiver of the Metropolitan Police [1921] 2 KB 853; see also R v Murray (1992) 16 Crim LJ 273).

24. The accused must also have individually had that same intent to help the other members of the group by force if necessary.

25. It has been noted that this element means that it is difficult to envisage a situation where a person can be guilty of the same offence of riot as another person unless at some point in time they were present together in the assembly (Anderson v Attorney-General (NSW) (1987) 10 NSWLR 198).

26. Therefore, if several accused are charged with the one offence of riot, they each must have had both a common purpose and intention to help each other, by force if necessary, against any person who might oppose them in execution of that common purpose (Anderson v Attorney-General (NSW) (1987) 10 NSWLR 198).

Who use such violence to alarm at least one person of reasonable firmness and courage

27. The final element requires those persons to use such violence to alarm at least one person of reasonable firmness and courage.

28. It is doubtful that this requires a real person to be alarmed. The better view is that the violence must be of such a level that a hypothetical bystander of reasonable firmness and courage would be put in fear by the display (Anderson v Attorney-General (NSW) (1987) 10 NSWLR 198; see also J W Dwyer Ltd v Metropolitan Police District Receiver [1967] 2 QB 970; Kamara v Director of Public Prosecutions [1974] AC 104).

29. The assembly of persons becomes riotous at the latest when alarming force or violence begins to be used (Anderson v Attorney-General (NSW) (1987) 10 NSWLR 198).

30. The alleged force and violence needs to occur simultaneously with the execution of the common purpose. Therefore, if a group of three or more assemble together for a common purpose and incidentally display force and violence, but then peacefully set out to execute the common purpose, no offence of riot will have been committed. However, they could be guilty of participating in an unlawful assembly (Anderson v Attorney-General (NSW) (1987) 10 NSWLR 198).

31. It has been suggested that the degree of force required to be displayed to constitute the offence of riot must be 'so tumultuous ... as to disturb the peace' (Boxer v The Queen (1995) 14 WAR 505).

32. This does not necessarily require physical violence, personal injury or property damage. It only requires 'tumult', which has been interpreted as involving several people being involved in agitated movement, or an excited and emotionally aroused assembly of people, which is usually (although not necessarily) accompanied by noise (R v Thomas [1993] 1 Qd R 323; see also Boxer v The Queen (1995) 14 WAR 505; J W Dwyer Ltd v Metropolitan Police District Receiver [1967] 2 QB 970).

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.4.21.1 Charge: Common Law Riot

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

I must now direct you about the crime of riot. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following five elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused was one of three or more people who were assembled.

Two – at least three of these people, including the accused, had a common purpose.

Three – the people who had the common purpose, including the accused, embarked on executing that common purpose.

Four – the people who had the common purpose intended to help each other, by force if necessary, against any person who may oppose the group in the execution of its common purpose, and the accused also intended to provide such help.

Five – the people with the common purpose used such violence to alarm at least one person of reasonable firmness and courage.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

The accused was one of three or more people who were assembled

The first element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused was one of three or more people who were assembled. The accused must have been present at the scene with these people at the same time, unless s/he incited the riot that subsequently ensued in his/her absence.

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA was part of the following group: [identify alleged group].

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments about alleged group.]

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether NOA was one of three or more persons who were assembled. It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he did, that this first element will be met.

Those people had a common purpose

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that at least three of these people, including the accused, had a common purpose. The common purpose may be lawful or unlawful. It may also be a private or public or political purpose.

In this case the prosecution alleged that at least three of these people, including NOA, had the following common purpose: [identify alleged common purpose].

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments about alleged common purpose.]

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments about accused's purpose.]

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that at least three people, including NOA, had a common purpose, that this second element will be met.

The group embarked on executing that common purpose

The third element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the people with the common purpose, including the accused, embarked on executing that common purpose.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that the people with the common purpose, including NOA, embarked on executing that common purpose by: [identify acts alleged to have been done in pursuance of that common purpose].

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments about acts alleged to have been done in pursuance of the common purpose.]

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the assembled people, including NOA, embarked on executing that common purpose, that this third element will be met.

The group including the accused intended to help each other by force if necessary

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the people who had the common purpose intended to help each other by force if necessary and that the accused individually had that intent.

In this case the prosecution alleged that the people who had the common purpose intended to help each other by force if necessary because: [identify evidence alleged to prove intent of group].

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments about evidence alleged to prove intent of people with common purpose.]

The prosecution also alleged that NOA had that intent individually because: [identify evidence alleged to prove intent of NOA].

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments about evidence alleged to prove intent of NOA.]

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the people who had the common purpose intended to help each other by force if necessary, and that NOA individually had that same intent, that this fourth element will be met.

The group used such violence to alarm at least one person of reasonable firmness and courage

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the group with the common purpose used such violence so as to alarm at least one person of reasonable firmness and courage.

In this case the prosecution alleged that the group with the common purpose used such violence to alarm at least one person of reasonable firmness and courage by: [identify alleged acts of violence].

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments about evidence regarding acts of violence and their capacity to cause the requisite level of alarm.]

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the group used such violence to alarm at least one person of reasonable firmness and courage, that this fifth element will be met.

Relate law to the evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of riot the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that s/he was one of three or more people who were assembled; and

Two – that at least three of these people, including NOA, had a common purpose; and

Three – the people with the common purpose, including NOA, embarked on executing that common purpose; and

Four – the people who had the common purpose intended to help each other by force if necessary and NOA also intended to provide such help; and Five – that the people with the common purpose used such violence to alarm at least one person of reasonable firmness and courage.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of riot.

Rout or unlawful assembly

[In most cases, it will be necessary to leave a rout or unlawful assembly offence as an alternative offence. In such cases, a suitably modified version of the appropriate charge should be inserted here. When modifying the charge, the judge must carefully explain the differences between riot, rout and unlawful assembly.]

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.4.21.2 Checklist: Common Law Riot

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

[This checklist is based on intentional riot. If recklessness is in issue it will need to be amended as necessary.]

Five elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

33. The accused was one of three or more people who were assembled; and
34. At least three of these people, including the accused, had a common purpose; and
35. The people who had the common purpose, including the accused, embarked on executing that common purpose; and
36. The people who had the common purpose intended to help each other by force if necessary and the accused also intended to provide such help; and
37. The group used such violence to alarm at least one person of reasonable firmness and courage.

Assembly of people

1. Was the accused one of three or more people who were assembled?

If Yes, then go to 2.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of riot

Common purpose

2.1 Did at least three of those people have a common purpose?

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of riot

2.2 Did the accused have that same common purpose?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of riot

Execution of common purpose

3. Did the people who had the common purpose, including the accused, embark on executing that common purpose?

If Yes then go to 4.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of riot

Intention

4.1. Did the people who had the common purpose intend to help each other, by force if necessary, against any person who may oppose the group in the execution of its common purpose?

If Yes, go to 4.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of riot

4.2 Did the accused also intend to provide such help?

If Yes, go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of riot

Use of violence

5. Did the people with the common purpose use such violence to alarm at least one person of reasonable firmness and courage?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of riot (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of riot

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.4.22 Affray

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Introduction

1. Affray is a statutory offence under Crimes Act 1958 s 195H.
2. Before the commencement of Crimes Act 1958 s 195G, affray was a common law offence.

3. The common law offence was defined as where the accused participates in unlawful violence of such a kind as is calculated to cause any person of reasonable firmness who might witness it to be terrified (Attorney General's Reference (No 3 of 1983) [1985] 1 All ER 501; DPP v Russell (2014) 44 VR 471).
4. Under the Crimes Act 1958, affray is committed where a person uses or threatens unlawful violence and whose conduct would cause a person of reasonable firmness present at the scene to be terrified.
5. The statutory offence largely had the effect of expanding the common law offence to explicitly include threats of violence in addition to the use of violence. The statutory provision also simplified the law regarding whether a "person of reasonable firmness" need be present.
6. Unless stated otherwise, all statutory references are to sections of the Crimes Act 1958.

Elements

7. For an accused to be guilty of affray, the following elements must be satisfied:
   (a) The accused used or threatened unlawful violence;
   (b) The accused's conduct was intentional or reckless;
   (c) The accused's conduct would cause a person of reasonable firmness present at the scene to be terrified.

Used or threatened unlawful violence

8. The first element the prosecution must prove is that the accused used or threatened unlawful violence.
9. An affray can occur in private as well as public places (Crimes Act 1958 s 195H(4)(a); Button v DPP [1966] AC 591, Taylor v DPP [1973] AC 964).

'Unlawful violence'

10. The Crimes Act 1958 does not define 'unlawful violence' for affray. It does, however identify "engaging in unlawful fighting with another person" as an example of "unlawful violence" (Crimes Act 1958 s 195H(1)).
11. Common law prosecutions for affray provide further examples of unlawful violence, including face-to-face confrontations where violence was used or threatened (I v Director of Public Prosecutions [2002] 1 AC 285) and one or more people shouting, struggling, threatening, waving weapons, throwing objects and exchanging and threatening blows (R v Smith [1997] 1 Cr App R 14).
12. In the context of interpreting the term "act of violence" in Crimes Act 1958 s 3A, the Full Court explained that violence was not limited to physical force, but included threats and menaces to induce fear or terror or to intimidate in order to remove resistance (R v Butcher [1986] VR 43; R v Galas (2007) 18 VR 205, [31]; Rich v R (2014) 43 VR 558, [258]).

'Threatened'

13. Mere possession of weapons does not amount to a threat of unlawful violence. However, where the weapons are visible, or held or brandished in a threatening way, this might amount to unlawful violence (I v Director of Public Prosecutions [2002] 1 AC 285).
14. Words alone are not sufficient to provide a threat of unlawful violence (Crimes Act 1958 s 195H(3); R v Robinson [1993] Crim LR 581). However, a verbal threat of unlawful violence which is accompanied by brandishing a weapon of some kind may be sufficient (R v Dixon [1993] Crim LR 579).

Number of persons

15. Affray can be committed by one person alone, if they are using or threatening unlawful violence in a manner that might reasonably be expected to terrify a bystander (Taylor v DPP [1973] AC 964; Attorney General's Reference (No 3 of 1983) [1985] 1 All ER 501; Colosimo and Ors v Director of Public Prosecutions [2005] NSWSC 854).

16. If two or more persons threaten unlawful violence, their conduct will be considered together, and it is immaterial whether they used or threatened unlawful violence simultaneously (Crimes Act 1958 s 195H(5)).

Intentionally or recklessly

17. The second element the prosecution must prove is that the accused's conduct was intentional or reckless.

18. The accused must have intended to use or threaten violence or was reckless as to whether the person's conduct involved the use of violence or threatend violence (Crimes Act 1958 s 195H(2)).

19. Reckless in this context means acting in the knowledge that unlawful violence would probably result from their conduct but deciding to continue regardless (R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464).

Would cause a person of reasonable firmness to be terrified

20. The third element the prosecution must prove is that the conduct of the accused would cause a person of reasonable firmness present at the scene to be terrified.

21. This element is concerned with whether the conduct would cause a hypothetical person of reasonable firmness to fear for their safety, rather than a specific person at the scene (I v Director of Public Prosecutions [2002] 1 AC 285).

22. In assessing this element, the jury is concerned with the reaction of the hypothetical reasonable person at the time of the accused's acts of intentional violence (R v Novakovic [2019] VSC 339, [396]).

23. It is not necessary to prove that a person of reasonable firmness was present at the time of the alleged affray (Crimes Act 1958 s 195H(4)(b)).

24. At common law, this element operated differently for affrays in public and in private. For public affrays, it was unnecessary to prove the presence or likely presence of a person of reasonable firmness (Attorney General's Reference (No 3 of 1983) [1985] 1 All ER 501), whereas for private affrays, the prosecution needed to prove the actual presence of persons of reasonable firmness (R v Taylor [1973] AC 964). Under statute, the presence of a person of reasonable firmness is not required in any case.

25. The prosecution need only prove that the violence was capable of terrifying a bystander of reasonable firmness (R v Sharp [1957] 1 QB 552; Paisley v R [2012] VSCA 79). The conduct must be examined objectively.

'Reasonable firmness'

26. The meaning of "reasonable firmness" is not defined in the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic).

27. Common law authorities often referred to a person of "reasonableness firmness and courage" (R v Ly [2004] VSCA 45; DPP v Russell (2014) 44 VR 471) or "reasonably firm character" (R v Taylor [1973] AC 964).

'Terrified'

28. 'Terrified' is a more agitated emotional state than "nervous" or "frightened" (Paisley v R [2012] VSCA 79).

29. The circumstances of affray are varied. Affray may involve trivial rowdy scenes which terrify for a short time or at the other end of the scale, an extensive skirmish involving numerous casualties (R v Keys (1987) 84 Cr App R 204).

Affray while wearing a face covering

30. Section 195H(1)(b) specifies a higher maximum penalty that applies if, at the time of committing the offence, the accused was wearing a face covering primarily:

    i) To conceal the person's identity; or

    ii) To protect the person from the effects of a crowd-controlling substance (Crimes Act 1958 s 195H(1)(b)).

31. While this provision has not yet been considered, it is likely that the higher maximum penalty will only apply where the prosecution specifies that the face-covering was present as part of its statement of the offence, and the jury is satisfied of proof of these additional matters beyond reasonable doubt as elements of an aggravated offence (see R v Courtie (1984) AC 463; Kingswell v The Queen (1985) 159 CLR 264; R v Meaton (1986) 160 CLR 359; R v Satalich (2001) 3 VR 231).

32. Cases involving face-covering therefore require proof of two additional elements:

    (a) That the accused was wearing a face covering at the time of committing the offence; and

    (b) That the accused's purpose of wearing the face-covering was to conceal his or her identity or to protect from the effects of a crowd-controlling substance.

Self-defence

33. Self-defence is a complete defence to the charge of affray (Attorney General's Reference (No 3 of 1983) [1985] 1 All ER 501; Honeysett v The Queen (1987) 10 NSWLR 638; R v Nguyen (1995) 36 NSWLR 397).

34. If self-defence arises, the jury will need to be instructed about that issue. See 8.1 Statutory Self-defence (From 1/11/14).

Last updated: 17 February 2020

7.4.22.1 Charge: Affray

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge should be used when the prosecution alleges that the accused committed the offence of affray but the accused, at the time of committing the offence, was not wearing a face covering.

This charge will need to be modified where the accused is one of several people allegedly involved in the affray. See Statutory Complicity (From 1/11/14) and Charge: Common law riot for guidance.

I must now direct you about the crime of affray. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following three elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused used or threatened unlawful violence.

Two – the accused's use or threat of violence was [intentional/reckless].

Three – the accused's conduct would cause a person of reasonable firmness to be terrified.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Used or threatened unlawful violence

The first element the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused used or threatened unlawful violence.

There are two parts to this element, and the prosecution must prove both parts beyond reasonable doubt.

Firstly, you need to be satisfied that NOA actually engaged in the conduct alleged by the prosecution.

In this case the prosecution has alleged that NOA [identify alleged conduct].

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments about NOA's specific conduct.]

The second part of this element is that the accused's conduct involved the use or threat of unlawful violence. There is no dispute that, if NOA [identify alleged conduct], that conduct involves unlawful violence.[895]

If you are satisfied that NOA [identify alleged unlawful violence], and that this conduct constitutes unlawful violence for the purposes of the offence of affray, then this first element will be met.

Intentional or reckless

The second element goes to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused used or threatened violence [intentionally/recklessly].

[If the prosecution alleges that the accused acted reckless, add the following shaded section.]

To prove this element, the prosecution must prove that NOA was aware that [his/her] conduct would probably involve [using/threatening] unlawful violence.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments regarding intention and/or recklessness.]

It is only if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused's use or threat of violence was [intentional/reckless] that this second element will be met.

A person of reasonable firmness would be terrified

The third element the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused's conduct would cause a person of reasonable firmness present at the scene to be terrified.

The prosecution does not need to prove that any person of reasonable firmness actually was present at the time, or was terrified. Instead, the question is whether NOA's conduct was capable of terrifying such a person, if such a person had been present.

The law does not define the phrase 'reasonable firmness'. It is up to you to decide what it means, and how it operates for this charge.

[If two or more people are alleged to have used or threatened unlawful violence, add the following shaded section.]

When you are considering the impact of the violence on a person of reasonable firmness, you must also take into account any unlawful violence by [identify other relevant people]. You must assess the total impact of all the conduct of [identify relevant people] which you find proved. For this purpose, you are not limited to conduct that occurred at the exact same time. [If appropriate, give an example of non-simultaneous conduct in the circumstances of the case.]

---

[895] If the characterisation of the conduct as unlawful violence is in issue, this part of the direction must be modified to explain the issues.

[Summarise relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments regarding the conduct and whether it would have been terrifying to a person of reasonable firmness.]

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the NOA's conduct would cause a person of reasonable firmness present at the scene to be terrified, that this third element will be met.

Relate law to the evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of affray the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused used or threatened unlawful violence; and

Two – the accused's use or threat of violence was [intentional/reckless]; and

Three – the accused's conduct would cause a person of reasonable firmness present at the scene to be terrified.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of affray.

Last updated: 17 April 2019

7.4.22.2 Checklist: Affray

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused used or threatened unlawful violence; and

2. The accused's conduct was intentional or reckless; and

3. The accused's conduct would cause a person of reasonable firmness present at the scene to be terrified.

Use or threaten unlawful violence

1. Did the accused use or threaten unlawful violence?

If yes, then go to 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of affray

State of Mind

2. Was the accused's conduct [intentional/reckless]?

Consider – Reckless means aware that it was probable that the conduct involved unlawful violence

If yes, then go to 3

If no, then the accused is not guilty of affray

Person of reasonable firmness would be terrified

3. Would the accused's conduct have caused a person of reasonable firmness present at the scene to be terrified?

If yes, then the accused is guilty of affray (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1 and 2)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of affray

Last updated: 17 April 2019

7.4.22.3 Charge: Affray with Face Covering

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge should be used when the prosecution alleges that the accused committed the offence of affray and the accused, while committing the offence, was wearing a face covering.

If the accused was not wearing a face covering, use Charge: Affray.

This charge will need to be modified where the accused is one of several people allegedly involved in the affray. See Statutory Complicity (From 1/11/14) and 7.4.21.1 Charge: Common law riot for guidance.

I must now direct you about the crime of affray with face covering. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following five elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused used or threatened unlawful violence.

Two – the accused's use or threat of violence was [intentional/reckless].

Three – the accused's conduct would cause a person of reasonable firmness to be terrified.

Four – the accused, while engaging in the conduct, was wearing a face covering.

Five – the accused was wearing the face covering used primarily to conceal their identity or to protect the person from the effects of a crowd-controlling substance.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Used or threatened unlawful violence

The first element the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused used or threatened unlawful violence.

There are two parts to this element, and the prosecution must prove both parts beyond reasonable doubt.

Firstly, you need to be satisfied that NOA actually engaged in the conduct alleged by the prosecution.

In this case the prosecution has alleged that NOA [identify alleged conduct].

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments about NOA's specific conduct.]

The second part of this element is that the accused's conduct involved the use or threat of unlawful violence. There is no dispute that, if NOA [identify alleged conduct], that conduct involves unlawful violence.[896]

If you are satisfied that NOA [identify alleged unlawful violence], and that this conduct constitutes unlawful violence for the purposes of the offence of affray, then this first element will be met.

[896] If the characterisation of the conduct as unlawful violence is in issue, this part of the direction must be modified to explain the issues.

Intentional or reckless

The second element goes to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused used or threatened violence [intentionally/recklessly].

[If the prosecution alleges that the accused acted reckless, add the following shaded section.]

To prove this element, the prosecution must prove that NOA was aware that [his/her] conduct would probably involve [using/threatening] unlawful violence.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments regarding intention and/or recklessness.]

It is only if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused's use or threat of violence was [intentional/reckless] that this second element will be met.

A person of reasonable firmness would be terrified

The third element the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused's conduct would cause a person of reasonable firmness present at the scene to be terrified.

The prosecution does not need to prove that any person of reasonable firmness actually was present at the time, or was terrified. Instead, the question is whether NOA's conduct was capable of terrifying such a person, if such a person had been present.

The law does not define the phrase 'reasonable firmness'. It is up to you to decide what it means, and how it operates for this charge.

[If two or more people are alleged to have used or threatened unlawful violence, add the following shaded section.]

When you are considering the impact of the violence on a person of reasonable firmness, you must also take into account any unlawful violence by [identify other relevant people]. You must assess the total impact of all the conduct of [identify relevant people] which you find proved. For this purpose, you are not limited to conduct that occurred at the exact same time. [If appropriate, give an example of non-simultaneous conduct in the circumstances of the case.]

[Summarise relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments regarding the conduct and whether it would have been terrifying to a person of reasonable firmness.]

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the NOA's conduct would cause a person of reasonable firmness present at the scene to be terrified, that this third element will be met.

Wearing a face covering

The fourth element the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused, while engaging in the conduct was wearing a face covering.

In this case the prosecution has alleged that the NOA, while [identify alleged unlawful violence], wore a [identify specific type of face covering].

[Summarise relevant evidence about NOA's face covering.]

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused was wearing a face covering while engaging in the conduct, that this fourth element will be met.

Face covering used to conceal identity or protect from crowd-controlling substance

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused was wearing a face covering primarily [to conceal their identity/to protect the person from the effects of a crowd-controlling substance].

[Summarise relevant evidence about primary purpose of NOA's face covering.]

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused wore a face covering primarily to [conceal his/her identity/protect himself/herself from the effects of a crowd controlling substance] that this fifth element will be met.

Relate law to the evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of affray the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused used or threatened unlawful violence; and

Two – the accused's use or threat of violence was [intentional/reckless]; and

Three – the accused's conduct would cause a person of reasonable firmness present at the scene to be terrified.

Four – the accused, while engaging in the conduct, was wearing a face covering.

Five – the accused was wearing the face covering primarily [to conceal his/her identity/to protect himself/herself from the effects of a crowd-controlling substance].

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of affray with face covering.

Last updated: 17 April 2019

7.4.22.4 Checklist: Affray with Face Covering

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused used or threatened unlawful violence; and

2. The accused's use or threat of violence was intentional or reckless; and

3. The accused's conduct would cause a person of reasonable firmness present at the scene to be terrified; and

4. The accused was wearing a face covering;

5. The accused was wearing the face covering primarily to [conceal their identity/protect themselves from the effects of a crowd-controlling substance]

Use or threaten unlawful violence

1. Did the accused use or threaten unlawful violence?

If yes, then go to 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of affray with face covering

State of Mind

2. Was the accused's use or threat of unlawful violence [intentional/reckless]?

Consider – Reckless means aware that it was probable that the conduct involved unlawful violence

If yes, then go to 3

If no, then the accused is not guilty of affray with face covering

Person of reasonable firmness would be terrified

3. Would the accused's conduct have caused a person of reasonable firmness present at the scene to be terrified?

If yes, then go to 4

If no, then the accused is not guilty of affray with face covering

Wearing a Face Covering

4. Was the accused wearing a face covering when he/she used or threatened violence?

If yes, then go to 5

If no, then the accused is not guilty of affray with face covering

Face Covering Used to Conceal Identity or Protect from Crowd-Controlling Substance

5. Was the accused's primary purpose of wearing the face covering to [conceal his/her identity/protect himself/herself from the effects of a crowd-controlling substance]?

If yes, then the accused is guilty of affray with face covering (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of affray with face covering

Last updated: 17 April 2019

7.5 Dishonesty and Property Offences

7.5.1 Theft

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. While the offence of theft is created by Crimes Act 1958 s 74, its basic definition is set out in s 72(1), with further explanation provided by s 73.

2. The offence has the following three elements which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

   i) The accused appropriated property belonging to another;

   ii) The accused did so with the intention of permanently depriving the other of the property; and

   iii) The accused acted dishonestly (Crimes Act 1958 s 72).

3. The law of theft draws heavily upon the civil law of property. This commentary does not attempt to offer a detailed discussion of that law.

Appropriation of property belonging to another

4. For the first element to be met, the jury must be satisfied that:

   - The accused appropriated something;
   - The thing appropriated was property; and
   - The property belonged to another person.

Appropriation

5. Theft can only be committed by an act of "appropriation" (Crimes Act 1958 s 72(1)).
6. The accused will have "appropriated" property if s/he:

   - Assumed any of the rights of the owner (Crimes Act 1958 s 73(4)); and
   - Adversely interfered with or usurped the owner's rights in some way (Roffel v R [1985] VR 511).

Assumption of the owner's rights

7. A person "assumes the rights" of an owner by taking on the right to do something which the owner has the right to do by virtue of his or her ownership (Stein v Henshall [1976] VR 612).
8. There is no simple categorisation of the rights which constitute "the rights of the owner". This must be determined by reference to the civil law of property (Roffel v R [1985] VR 511; Stein v Henshall [1976] VR 612; W (a child) v Woodrow [1988] VR 358).
9. The rights of the owner generally include the right to control the property and the right to possess it (see, e.g. Roffel v R [1985] VR 511; Stein v Henshall [1976] VR 612; W (a child) v Woodrow [1988] VR 358).
10. This requirement will be satisfied if the accused has taken on any of the owner's rights. The prosecution does not need to prove the accused assumed all of those rights (Stein v Henshall [1976] VR 612; W (a child) v Woodrow [1988] VR 358).
11. Depending on the circumstances, "appropriation" can involve taking, using, damaging, extinguishing, lending, retaining or offering to sell another person's property (or any of their property rights) (see, e.g. R v Williams (2001) 1 Cr App R 23; Roffel v R [1985] VR 511; Stein v Henshall [1976] VR 612; W (a child) v Woodrow [1988] VR 358).

Adverse interference with the owner's rights

12. To have "appropriated" property, the accused must have adversely interfered with or usurped the owner's rights in some way (R v Morris [1984] AC 320; Roffel v R [1985] VR 511).[897]

13. The accused will therefore not have appropriated property if s/he acted with the owner's consent (R v Morris [1984] AC 320; Roffel v R [1985] VR 511).

14. The owner's consent will only prevent an act from being considered an "appropriation" if that consent was real. If the consent was induced by fraud, deception or false representation, the accused will be regarded as having appropriated the property, despite the owner's purported consent (Lawrence v Metropolitan Police Commissioner [1972] AC 626; R v Baruday [1984] VR 685; R v Gomez [1993] VR 685).

Innocent acquisition of property

15. If the accused came by the property innocently, but later assumed a right to it by keeping or dealing with it as an owner, s/he will have appropriated it (Crimes Act 1958 s 73(4)).

16. However, if s/he purchased the property (or any "right or interest" in property) in good faith for value, but received a defective title, his/her assumption of the owner's rights are deemed not to be theft (Crimes Act 1958 s 73(5)).

Property

17. The thing that the accused appropriated must have been "property" (Crimes Act 1958 s 72(1)).

18. "Property" is defined to include "money and all other property real or personal including things in action and other intangible property" (Crimes Act 1958 s 71(1)).

19. This definition includes some things with no physical existence, such as debts (R v Baruday [1984] VR 685; R v Holt (1983) 12 A Crim R 1, 16–17).

20. However, other intangible items may not be classified as property. For example, in England it has been held that confidential information is not property (Oxford v Moss (1978) 68 Cr App R 183), and copyright may not be (R v Lloyd [1985] 1 QB 829).

21. While electricity is not property under this definition (Low v Blease [1975] Crim L R 513), fraudulent abstraction, wastage, use, diversion or consumption of electricity is punishable as theft through the combined effect of State Electricity Commission Act 1958 s 107 and Electric Light and Power Act 1958 s 51 (repealed).

22. Whether the thing assumed by the accused was "property" can involve questions of both law and fact. It is for the judge to determine as a question of law whether a particular circumstance creates a property right, but if in issue, it will be for the jury to determine whether that circumstance existed as a question of fact (See R v Hall [1973] QB 126).

Special forms of property

23. Land and things forming part of land can only be stolen in the limited circumstances specified in Crimes Act 1958 s 73(6).

24. Section 73(6) provides that a person may commit theft of land or fixtures where:

---

[897] The proposition that appropriation must involve an adverse interference with the owner's rights was rejected by the House of Lords in R v Gomez [1993] AC 442 and R v Hicks [2000] 4 All ER 833, and was also criticised (in obiter) by McHugh and Callinan JJ in MacLeod v The Queen (2003) 214 CLR 230. However, Roffel v R [1985] VR 511 remains the leading authority on the issue in Victoria.

- the accused is a trustee, personal representative or authorised by power of attorney or as a liquidator of a company to sell or dispose of land belonging to another and deals with it in breach of the confidence reposed in him or her;
- where the accused severs something from the land; or
- where a tenant appropriates a fixture or structure let to be used with the land.

25. Section 73(6)(a) specifically recognises that a person may be a personal representative but not a trustee. The section also allows land to be stolen even if the accused is both the legal and beneficial owner of the land, where there is a dealing with it in breach of confidence (Coleman v DPP [2018] VSCA 264, [6], [110]).
26. Wild animals are regarded as property, but may only be stolen in the circumstances specified in Crimes Act 1958 s 73(7).[898]

Property must be in existence

27. Property must be in existence before it can be appropriated (Akbulut v Grimshaw [1998] 3 VR 756).
28. Accordingly, creating a future obligation in the owner of a telephone service to pay for unauthorised telephone calls does not involve theft of property (Akbulut v Grimshaw [1998] 3 VR 756).

Belonging to another

29. It is only theft if a person appropriates property "belonging to another" (s 72(1)).
30. Property "belongs" to anyone who has possession or control of it, or who has any other proprietary right or interest in it (Crimes Act 1958 s 71(2)).
31. These interests include legal and equitable proprietary interests (R v Clowes (No 2) [1994] 2 All ER 316).
32. However, property does not "belong" to a person who only has an equitable interest in that property, if that equitable interest arose from an agreement to transfer the property or grant an interest in it (Crimes Act 1958 s 71(2)).
33. Whether a person has a proprietary right or interest is a question of civil property law (R v Walker [1984] Crim LR 112).
34. The prosecution needs only to establish that someone other than the accused had property rights that were appropriated. There is no requirement that the prosecution prove who actually held those rights (Lodge v Lawton [1978] VR 112).
35. It does not matter if the accused has property rights in the relevant property. If someone else also has property rights in it (e.g. a partner), the property "belongs to another" and can be appropriated (R v Bonner [1970] WLR 838).

Abandoned property

36. Property no longer "belongs" to a person who has intentionally relinquished all ownership rights (abandoned the property) (R v Small [1987] Crim LR 777).
37. However, there is a distinction between "losing" and "abandoning" property. Property which is merely lost still "belongs" to the owner and can be appropriated (R v Small [1987] Crim LR 777).

---

[898] These include where the animal is tamed and kept in captivity; where the animal has been reduced into possession and has not been lost or abandoned; or where a person is in the course of reducing the animal into possession.

Ownership in special cases

38. Section 73 of the Crimes Act 1958 describes four special cases where property is deemed to "belong to" people who might not otherwise be regarded as property owners. These cases are where the property is:

    i) Subject to a trust (s 73(8));

    ii) Held under a fiduciary obligation (s 73(9));

    iii) Subject to an obligation to make restoration (s 73(10)); or

    iv) The property of a corporation sole (s 73(11)).

Property subject to a trust (s 73(8))

39. Although trust property will ordinarily "belong to" the beneficiaries of the trust (due to the application of Crimes Act 1958 s 71(2)), in some cases there will not be any beneficiaries (e.g. a purpose trust).

40. In such cases, the property subject to the trust is deemed to belong to anybody having a right to enforce the trust (Crimes Act 1958 s 73(8)).

Property held under a fiduciary obligation (s 73(9))

41. Section 73(9) covers the situation where a person, who is not a trustee, appropriates property (or proceeds from property) while under a fiduciary obligation to use the property in a particular way. In such a case, the property is deemed (as against the fiduciary) to belong to the beneficiary of the obligation.

42. The "obligation" must be a "legal obligation" (R v Meech [1974] QB 549; R v Arnold [1997] 4 All ER 1).

43. This provision applies only where the accused was required to deal with the particular property (or its proceeds) in a particular way. A mere contractual obligation to provide a service in return for payment is not sufficient (R v Hall [1973] QB 126).

44. Accordingly, this provision was held not to apply where a travel agent received payments for air tickets, but did not provide the tickets or return the money. It was held that the accused had only entered a contractual obligation to provide the air tickets, and was not required to use the customer's particular deposit for obtaining those tickets (R v Hall [1973] QB 126).

Property subject to an obligation to make restoration (s 73(10))

45. Crimes Act 1958 s 73(10) addresses the situation where:

- A person (the "receiver") received property by the mistake of another;
- The receiver was not aware at the time that a mistake was being made, or had not yet decided to dishonestly retain the property;[899]
- The mistake was not "fundamental" (i.e. it did not concern the identity of the receiver, or the nature or volume of the property);[900] and
- The receiver is under an obligation to return the property.

---

[899] If the receiver was aware that a mistake was being made, and dishonestly decided to accept the property anyway, s 73(10) will not be necessary – as the property will still have "belonged" to the person making the mistake at the time of the appropriation.

[900] If the mistake was fundamental, then the original owner will retain property rights in the relevant property, and so s 73(10) will not be necessary.

46. Section 73(10) provides that in such circumstances, the property is to be regarded (as against the receiver) to belong to the person entitled to restoration. A dishonest decision not to return the property can therefore amount to theft (see, e.g. Attorney-General's Reference (No 1 of 1983) [1985] QB 182).

47. The obligation to restore the property must be a "legal obligation" (R v Gilks [1972] 1 WLR 1341).

48. Whether there is a legal obligation to restore is a question of civil property law (Chase Manhattan Bank NA v Israel-British Bank (London) Ltd [1981] Ch 105).

Property of a corporation sole (s 73(11))

49. The property of a corporation sole is regarded as belonging to the corporation, notwithstanding any vacancy in the corporation (Crimes Act 1958 s 73(11)).

50. This provision covers the situation where property is stolen from a corporation sole, and the incumbent is dead or the position is otherwise vacant.

Intention to permanently deprive

51. The second element of theft requires the accused to have intended to permanently deprive the owner of the property when s/he appropriated it (Crimes Act 1958 s 72(1)).

52. If the accused only had an intention to temporarily deprive the owner of his or her property, this element will not be met (subject to the exceptions specified in s 73 (see below)) (R v Lloyd [1985] 1 QB 829).

53. Similarly, this element will not be met if the accused had not decided how s/he was going to dispose of the property when s/he appropriated it (subject to the exceptions specified in s 73 (see below)). She must have already formed the intention to permanently deprive the owner of the property at the time of the appropriation (R v Easom [1971] 2 QB 315; Sharp v McCormick [1986] VR 869).

54. Where the period or circumstances of the appropriation are such that the accused intends to return the property only after the owner's interest has been fundamentally changed (e.g. returning a concert ticket after the performance), this may amount to an intention to permanently deprive the owner of that property (R v Lloyd [1985] 1 QB 829).

55. A person who takes property (e.g. goods or cash), intending to return equivalent (but not identical) property, will have an intention to permanently deprive the owner of the property (because s/he does not intend to return the exact same coins, notes or goods that s/he took) (R v Williams [1953] 1 QB 660; R v Cockburn [1968] 1 All ER 466; R v Pace [1965] 3 Can CC 55 (NSSC)).

Acting regardless of the owner's rights: s 73(12)

56. The accused is deemed to have an intention to permanently deprive a person of property, despite the fact that s/he did not actually have that intention when s/he appropriated the property, if s/he intends to treat the property as his or her own to dispose of regardless of the owner's rights (Crimes Act 1958 s 73(12)).

57. Section 73(12) will only be relevant in exceptional cases. It is apt to confuse and should only rarely be introduced into a charge (R v Dardovska (2003) 6 VR 628).

58. Circumstances in which s 73(12) has been held to be relevant include:

    - Where the accused takes the property, promising to return it only in exchange for payment (R v Lloyd [1985] 1 QB 829);
    - Where the accused takes the property, intending to return it only after fundamentally altering its nature (e.g. returning the piece of paper a cheque is written on, after receiving payment from the bank) (R v Duru [1974] 1 WLR 2);
    - Where the accused takes the property, while leaving open the possibility that s/he might return it to the owner at a later date, but in the meantime treats it as his/her own (Sharp v McCormick [1986] VR 869).

59. Two other circumstances in which s 73(12) may be relevant are:

    - Where the accused borrows the property from its owner, ultimately intending to return it; or
    - Where the accused lends the owner's property to a third party, intending to return it to the owner upon retrieving it.

    In such cases, the accused will only be deemed to have an intention to permanently deprive the owner of the property if the borrowing or lending was for a period, or in circumstances, which made it equivalent to an outright taking or disposal (Crimes Act 1958 s 73(12)).

60. Section 73(12) may also be relevant where the accused parts with property belonging to another, under a condition as to its return which s/he may not be able to perform (e.g. pawning it). If this was done for the accused's own purposes, and without the consent of the owner, the accused will be deemed to have treated the property as his or her own to dispose of regardless of the owner's rights (Crimes Act 1958 s 73(13)). By virtue of s 73(12), s/he will be regarded as having had an intention to permanently deprive the owner of that property.

Motor vehicles and aircraft

61. Proof that a person used, in any manner, a motor vehicle or aircraft without the consent of the owner or lawful possessor is conclusive evidence that the person intended to permanently deprive the owner of that property (Crimes Act 1958 s 73(14)).

62. Section 73(14) applies if the vehicle is used "in any manner". This can include situations where there is no movement or attempted movement of the vehicle (Inglis v Davies [1974] VR 438).

63. The provision can also apply to a person who rides as a passenger in a vehicle he or she knows to be stolen (W (a child) v Woodrow [1988] VR 358).

Intention to deprive special owners

64. A person who intends to defeat a trust is regarded as having an intention to deprive any person having a right to enforce the trust of the trust property (Crimes Act 1958 s 73(8)).

65. Where a person receives property by mistake, and is under an obligation to restore that property, an intention not to do so is regarded as an intention to deprive the person of the property (or its proceeds) (Crimes Act 1958 s 73(10)).

Dishonesty

66. The accused's appropriation of property belonging to another will only be theft if it is "dishonest" (Crimes Act 1958 s 72(1)).

67. Dishonesty has a special meaning when used in Division 2 of the Crimes Act 1958. It means that the accused acted without any claim of legal right (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; R v Bonollo [1981] VR 633 and R v Brow [1981] VR 783).

68. This interpretation of "dishonesty" differs from the interpretation of "dishonesty" in the equivalent provision of the English Theft Act and the interpretation of "dishonesty" in s 86 of the Commonwealth Crimes Act 1914. In those jurisdictions, "dishonesty" has its ordinary meaning, and is assessed according to the standards of the ordinary person (Peters v the Queen (1998) 192 CLR 493; Macleod v the Queen (2003) 214 CLR 230; R v Ghosh [1982] QB 1053).[901]

[901] Other Australian jurisdictions adopt different approaches to dishonesty, and their authorities should be approached with caution.

69. In Victoria, section 73(2) restates this general definition in the context of theft, and adds two deeming provisions. It provides that a person's appropriation is not to be regarded as dishonest if the person believed that:

    i) S/he had a legal right to deprive the owner of the property; or

    ii) The owner would have consented to the appropriation if s/he had known of it and the circumstances surrounding it; or

    iii) The owner could not be discovered by taking reasonable steps.

70. The term "dishonestly" in s 72(1) has no residual meaning beyond this statutory definition (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; see also R v Bonollo [1981] VR 633 and R v Brow [1981] VR 783).

Belief in a legal right to deprive: s 73(2)(a)

71. The accused's appropriation of property will not have been dishonest if s/he believed that s/he had a legal right to deprive the other person of the property (s 73(2)(a)).

72. The belief must relate to a right "in law" – a claim of legal right. A claim of moral right is not sufficient (Crimes Act 1958 s 73(2)(a)).

73. The claim of right must extend to all of the property taken, not just to part of it (R v Bedford (2007) 98 SASR 514).

74. It does not matter if the accused's belief was based on a mistake of fact[902] or a mistake of law.[903] If the accused genuinely believed s/he had a legal claim of right, s/he will not have acted dishonestly (R v Langham (1984) 36 SASR 48; R v Lopatta (1983) 35 SASR 101).

75. The accused merely needs to have believed s/he had a legal right to the property. S/he does not need to have believed that s/he had the right to use the measures s/he used to take the property (R v Bedford (2007) 98 SASR 514; R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).

76. So even if the accused used violent measures to take the property, s/he should not be convicted of theft if s/he genuinely believed s/he had a right to the property. However, s/he may be convicted of an offence relating to the violence used (R v Bedford (2007) 98 SASR 514; R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).

Belief that the owner cannot be discovered: s 73(2)(c)

77. A person will not have acted dishonestly if s/he appropriated the property in the belief that the person to whom the property belongs could not be discovered by taking reasonable steps (Crimes Act 1958 s 73(2)(c)).

78. This provision covers the case of a person who finds property, or who receives property by mistake. As long as the finder or receiver genuinely believed that the owner could not be identified or located by taking reasonable steps, they will not be guilty of theft (R v MacDonald (1983) 8 A Crim R 248).

79. This provision does not apply where the accused gained the property as a trustee or personal representative (Crimes Act 1958 s 73(2)(c)).

---

[902] A mistaken belief that certain facts existed, which would have created a legal claim if true.

[903] A mistaken belief that certain interests create legal rights.

The nature of the accused's beliefs

80. Dishonesty is a subjective concept. The jury is concerned with the accused's subjective beliefs (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401 (Murphy J)).

81. Each form of "honesty" outlined in s 73(2) relies upon the accused having held a particular belief. That belief:

    - Must have been honestly or genuinely held (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; R v Bernhard (1984) SASR 48); and
    - Does not need to have been reasonable. The jury can, however, take into account the reasonableness of the belief in assessing if it was genuinely held (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; R v Dardovska (2003) 6 VR 628).

Willingness to pay for the property: s 73(3)

82. The accused's appropriation of property belonging to another may have been dishonest, even though s/he was willing to pay for the property (Crimes Act 1958 s 73(3)).

83. This does not mean that the accused's willingness to pay can never prove that she was not acting dishonestly. It simply means that the fact that s/he was willing to pay does not necessarily exclude dishonesty (R v Senese [2004] VSCA 136).

Need for concurrency of elements

84. The prosecution must prove that each of the three elements of theft existed at the same time (R v Greenberg [1972] Crim LR 331).

85. In cases where the accused appropriates property which s/he was under a fiduciary obligation to use in a particular way, it is sufficient that the person acted dishonestly at the point of appropriation. There is no need for the receipt of the property and the dishonest appropriation to coincide (R v Hall [1973] QB 126).

Last updated: 11 September 2020

7.5.1.1 Charge: Theft (Short)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge is adapted for use in cases where the only issue is whether or not the accused was the thief.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of theft. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused appropriated property that belonged to another person.

Two – the accused intended to permanently deprive that person of his or her property.

Three – the accused acted dishonestly.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Appropriation of Property Belonging to Another

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused appropriated property that belonged to another person.

Although the word "appropriation" has a technical legal meaning, and includes many different types of acts, here it simply means to take something without the owner's consent.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA took [identify property] that belonged to [identify owner]. [Summarise prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether NOA took the [describe property]. It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he did that this first element will be met.

Intention to Permanently Deprive

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that, when the accused appropriated the [describe property], s/he intended to permanently deprive the owner of it. That is, s/he intended that the owner would never get it back.

It does not matter whether the accused intended to keep, sell, give away, destroy or hide the appropriated property. If his/her intention was that the owner would not get the property back, then s/he will have had the necessary intention.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA had such an intention [identify prosecution evidence and/or arguments].

Dishonesty

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that at the time of the appropriation, the accused was acting dishonestly.

In this context, "dishonesty" does not have its ordinary meaning. It is given a special legal meaning. The basic legal meaning is that people act dishonestly when they appropriate property if they do not believe that they have a legal right to take that property.

In this case there is no evidence that the accused had any honest belief in respect of the appropriation. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of theft, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA appropriated property belonging to NOC; and

Two – that NOA intended to permanently deprive NOC of that property; and

Three – that NOA appropriated the property dishonestly.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of theft.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of theft. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused appropriated property that belonged to another person.

Two – the accused intended to permanently deprive that person of his or her property.

Three – the accused acted dishonestly.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Appropriation of Property Belonging to Another

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused appropriated property that belonged to another person.

There are three parts to this element:

- First, the accused must have appropriated something;
- Second, the thing appropriated must have been property; and
- Third, that property must have belonged to another person when it was appropriated.

[If it is not disputed that the thing stolen was property belonging to another, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, it is alleged that NOA appropriated [identify property]. It is not disputed that [describe item] is property, nor that this [identify property] belonged to another person, NOC, at the relevant time. The main issue for you to determine in relation to this element is whether NOA appropriated that property.

Appropriation

[If, in the circumstances of the case, appropriation means taking without consent, add the following shaded section.]

Although the word "appropriation" has a technical legal meaning, and includes many different types of acts, here it simply means to take something without the owner's consent.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA took the [identify property and summarise prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

[If, in the circumstances of the case, appropriation means something other than taking without consent, add the following shaded section.]

The word "appropriation" has a technical legal meaning, and includes many different types of acts. For example, it includes physically taking an object without the owner's consent.

However, appropriation is not limited to physically taking an object, in the sense of grabbing it with the hands. The law says that any assumption of a person's property rights that adversely interferes with those rights amounts to an "appropriation".

This means that a person appropriates property whenever s/he:

- Takes on any right to do something with that property, if that right belongs to the owner of the property by virtue of his or her ownership; and
- By doing so interferes unfavourably with the owner's property rights.

[If relevant to the circumstances of the case, add: The accused does not need to have interfered with all of the owner's property rights. S/he only needs to have interfered with any one of those rights.]

In this case it is alleged that NOA appropriated the [identify property] by [describe the form of appropriation; the findings of fact necessary for the jury to find that the accused appropriated the property; and the prosecution evidence and/or arguments concerning appropriation]. The defence denied that NOA appropriated the property, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

[If consent is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

If you find that NOC consented to NOA [describe form of appropriation] the [describe property], then NOA will not have appropriated that property.[904] An "appropriation" requires the accused to have acted without consent.

It is important to note that it is not for the defence to prove that NOC consented. It is for the prosecution to prove that s/he did not. If the prosecution cannot prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not consent, then this first element will not be met.

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether NOA appropriated property that belonged to another person. It is only if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that NOA [describe form of appropriation and identify property], that this element will be met. If you are not satisfied that this is the case, then NOA will be not guilty of theft.

Property

[If there is an issue about whether the thing appropriated was property, add the following shaded section.]

The second part of this element requires the thing appropriated to be "property".

"Property" is also a technical legal term, which includes many different things. It does not only refer to physical objects.

Of relevance to this case, [describe relevant type of property] is a type of "property". This means that this part of the first element will be met if you are satisfied that what NOA appropriated was [describe type of property].

The prosecution argued [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denies that this was the case, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

For this element to be satisfied, you must find that [explain findings necessary for the relevant item to be classified as property]. If you are not satisfied that this was the case, then the accused will be not guilty of theft.

Belonging to Another

[If there is an issue about whether the property appropriated belonged to another, add the following shaded section.]

The third part of this element requires the thing appropriated to have belonged to another person at the time of the appropriation.

The law says that property "belongs" to anyone who has possession or control of that property, or

---

[904] This part of the charge is based on the assumption that the issue of consent was outlined in the judge's summary of the defence arguments re appropriation. If this was not the case, then it will need to be modified accordingly.

who has any other proprietary right or interest in it. This includes [insert relevant example].[905]

In this case the prosecution alleged that the [describe property] belonged to NOC. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

[If there is uncertainty about which third party the property belonged to, add the following darker shaded section.]

The prosecution does not need to prove who the property actually belonged to, as long as they can prove that it belonged to someone other than the accused.

[If it is alleged that the accused had a property right in the relevant property, add the following darker shaded section.]

It does not matter if you find that the accused had [describe property right]. If another person also had [describe property right] that was appropriated, then for the purposes of this element the property belonged to another person.

[If it is alleged that the complainant had abandoned the relevant property, add the following darker shaded section.]

If you find that NOC had abandoned the [describe property], giving up all ownership rights to it, then that property will no longer have belonged to him/her when it was appropriated.

However, there is a difference between abandoning property and losing it. If NOC had only lost the [describe property], then it still belonged to him/her, even though s/he didn't know where it was.

It is for the prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOC had not abandoned the property. If they cannot do this, then NOA will be not guilty of theft.

Intention to Permanently Deprive

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that, when the accused appropriated the property, s/he intended to permanently deprive the owner of it. That is, s/he intended that the owner would never get the property back.

It does not matter whether the accused intended to keep, sell, give away, destroy or hide the appropriated property. If his/her intention was that the owner would not get it back, then s/he will have had the necessary intention.

[If the accused may not yet have formed the relevant intention when s/he appropriated the property, add the following shaded section.]

For this element to be met, the accused must have already decided not to return the property to its owner when s/he appropriated it. This element will not be satisfied if, when the accused appropriated the property, s/he was not yet certain whether or not s/he would give it back – only deciding later that s/he was going to keep it.

[If the accused may have only had an intention to temporarily deprive the owner of his/her property, add the following shaded section.]

The accused's intention must have been to permanently deprive the owner of the property. This [905] If it is alleged that the property was subject to a trust, held under a fiduciary obligation, subject to an obligation to make restoration, or the property of a corporation sole, this section may need to be expanded. See 7.5.1 Theft for further information.

---

element will not be met if s/he only meant to deprive the owner of his/her property temporarily, and then to give it back to him/her.

[If it is alleged that the accused was going to return the property only after its nature had been fundamentally changed, add the following darker shaded section.]

However, if the accused was only planning on returning the property after its nature had been fundamentally changed, you may find that s/he intended to permanently deprive the owner of that property. This is because, although it may seem that s/he intended to return the owner's property, in reality s/he did not intend to give back what s/he took – s/he intended to return something that was completely different.

That is what the prosecution argued happened here. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, alleging [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

[If it is alleged that the accused was only borrowing the property, add the following shaded section.]

In this case the defence alleged that the accused did not intend to keep the property in question, but was merely borrowing it. [Identify relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is not theft to borrow something if the borrower intends to return that property. This is true even if the borrowing is done without permission.

[If the borrowing may have amounted to an outright taking, add the following darker shaded section.]

Warning: this direction will only be relevant in exceptional cases. See the discussion of s 73(12) in 7.5.1 Theft.

However, if the accused borrowed the property for a period, or in circumstances, which made it equivalent to an outright taking or disposal, then the law says that s/he will have had an intention to permanently deprive the owner of the property. This will be the case even if s/he intended to give the property back eventually.

That is what the prosecution alleged happened here. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

[If it is alleged that the accused intended to replace the money or goods appropriated, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, you have heard evidence that although NOA took [money/describe object] from NOC, s/he intended to replace it.

Even if you find this to be the case, that does not mean that NOA did not intend to permanently deprive NOC of his/her property. Unless s/he was planning on returning to NOC the exact same [notes/coins/object] that s/he took, NOA will have had an intention to permanently deprive NOC of his/her property. Returning an equivalent [amount of money/item] is not sufficient.

[If the appropriated property is a motor vehicle or aircraft, add the following shaded section.]

A special rule applies where an accused is charged with the theft of [a motor car/an aircraft]. The law says that proof that the accused took, or in any way used the [car/aircraft] without the consent of the [owner/person who was in lawful possession] is conclusive evidence that the accused intended to permanently deprive the owner of that vehicle.

This means that if you are satisfied that NOA appropriated the vehicle, and that s/he did not have the permission of [the owner/someone entitled to give that permission], then this element will be proven.

[If the accused did not have an intention to permanently deprive, but may have had an intention to treat the property as his/her own, add the following shaded section.]

[This direction is based Crimes Act 1958 s 73(12). It should only be used in exceptional cases. See 7.5.1 Theft for further information.]

There is one exception to the rule that the accused had to intend to permanently deprive the owner of his/her property. This arises where, despite not having such an intention, the accused appropriated the property intending to treat it as his/her own to dispose of regardless of the owner's rights.

[If it is alleged that the accused parted with the property under a condition as to its return that s/he may not have been able to perform (e.g. by pawning the property), add the following darker shaded section.]

The law says that a person will have done this if, for his/her own purposes and without the owner's consent, s/he parted with the property under a condition that s/he may not be able to meet.

The prosecution alleges that that was the case here. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denies this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused did intend to treat the [describe property] as his/her own to dispose of regardless of NOC's rights, then this element will be proven, even if NOA ultimately intended to give back the property.

[If there is evidence that the property belonged to the complainant in one of the special senses described in section 74 (e.g. as a person with a right to enforce a trust*, or as a person entitled to* restoration of property following mistaken delivery), an additional direction will need to be given concerning the intention to permanently deprive. See 7.5.1 Theft for further information.]

Dishonesty

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that at the time of the appropriation, the accused was acting dishonestly.

In this context, "dishonesty" does not have its ordinary meaning. It is given a special legal meaning. The basic legal meaning is that people act dishonestly when they appropriate property if they do not believe that they have a legal right to take that property.

[If other s 72(3) beliefs are raised on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

The law also says that people act dishonestly when they appropriate property if they:

[Add relevant bulleted paragraphs

- Do not believe that the owner would have consented to the appropriation if he or she had known all the circumstances; [and]
- Do not believe that the owner could not be discovered by taking reasonable steps.]

For this element to be met, the prosecution must prove that the accused did not have [this/any of these/either of these] belief(s). If it is reasonably possible that the accused did have [this/one of these] belief(s), then s/he will not have acted dishonestly.

Belief in Legal Right

[If there is evidence that the accused believed s/he had a right to the property, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the defence alleged that NOA was not acting dishonestly when s/he appropriated the [describe property] because s/he believed that s/he had a legal right to take the property. [Describe defence

evidence and/or arguments.]

If the accused genuinely had this belief s/he will not be guilty of theft, even if his/her belief was legally wrong. However, s/he must have believed that s/he had a legal right to take the property. It is not sufficient for him/her to have believed that s/he had a moral right to the property.

[If the circumstances of appropriation were potentially dishonest, add the following darker shaded section.]

The issue here is solely whether the accused believed s/he had a legal right to take the property. S/he does not need to have believed that s/he had a legal right to take the property in the way that s/he did. Even if the accused knew that s/he should not take the property in that way, or acted illegally in the way that s/he took it, she will not be guilty of theft if s/he believed s/he had a legal right to the property.

Belief that the Owner Would Have Consented

[If there is evidence that the accused believed the owner would have consented, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the defence alleged that NOA was not acting dishonestly when s/he appropriated the [describe property] because s/he believed that, if the owner had have known of the appropriation and the circumstances surrounding it, s/he would have consented. [Describe defence evidence and/or arguments.]

This question relates to the accused's state of mind. The question is whether NOA believed, at the time s/he appropriated the property, that NOC would have consented. It does not matter whether or not NOC actually would have consented, as long as NOA genuinely believed that s/he would have if s/he had been aware of all the circumstances.

Belief that the Owner Could Not Be Discovered

[If there is evidence that the accused believed the owner could not be discovered, add the following shaded section.]

[Note: this explanation cannot be relied upon by a person who received the property as a trustee or personal representative.]

In this case, the defence alleged that NOA was not acting dishonestly when s/he appropriated the [describe property] because s/he believed that the owner of the property could not be discovered by taking reasonable steps. [Describe defence evidence and/or arguments.]

This requires the accused to not only have believed that s/he could not identify or locate the owner of the property, but to have believed that s/he could not do so even if s/he took reasonable steps.

Willingness to Pay

[If there is evidence that the accused was willing to pay for the property, add the following shaded section.]

[Note: while this direction is primarily relevant to a claim of belief in consent, it may also be relevant to a claim of legal right.]

In this case, you have heard evidence that, at the time NOA took the property, s/he was willing to pay for it. This does not necessarily mean that s/he was not dishonest. The law says that the appropriation of another person's property may be dishonest even if the accused is willing to pay for it.

Mistaken Belief

[If the accused's belief may have been incorrect or unreasonable, add the following shaded section.]

It is important to note that the accused's belief does not need to have been correct, or even reasonable. All that is necessary is that it is reasonably possible that NOA genuinely held that belief. If s/he did, s/he will not have acted dishonestly, even if his/her belief was wrong or unreasonable.

However, the reasonableness of the accused's alleged belief is not irrelevant. In determining whether or not NOA in fact held that belief, you may consider whether his/her belief was reasonable in all the circumstances. This is because the more reasonable NOA's belief was, the more likely you might think it is that s/he actually believed what s/he says s/he believed.

Onus of Proof

[If dishonesty is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

I want to reiterate that it is for the prosecution to prove that the accused was acting dishonestly. It is not for the defence to prove that s/he acted honestly.

In this case, that means that the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA did not believe that [describe relevant belief]. The defence do not have to prove that s/he had that belief.

In determining whether the accused acted dishonestly, your sole focus should be on his/her state of mind at the time s/he [describe relevant act]. The issue is not whether you think s/he was right or wrong to do what s/he did, but whether s/he had the relevant belief at that time.

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused did not believe [describe relevant belief] that this third element will be met.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of theft, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA appropriated property belonging to NOC; and

Two – that NOA intended to permanently deprive NOC of that property; and

Three – that NOA appropriated the property dishonestly.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of theft.

Last updated: 5 December 2007

7.5.1.3 Checklist: Theft

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused appropriated property belonging to another; and
2. The accused did so with the intention of permanently depriving the other of that property; and
3. The accused appropriated the property dishonestly.

Appropriation of Property Belonging to Another

1. Did the accused appropriate property that belonged to another person?

Consider – Did the accused [take the property/assume the rights of an owner/interfere with the rights of the owner] in the way alleged by the prosecution?

Consider – Did the accused do this without consent?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Theft

Intention to Permanently Deprive

2. Did the accused intend to permanently deprive another person of that property?

Consider – Did the accused intend that the owner would never get the property back?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Theft

Dishonesty

3. Did the accused appropriate the property dishonestly?

Consider – Has the prosecution proved that the accused did not believe that he/she had a legal right to obtain the property?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Theft (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1 and 2)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Theft

Last updated: 5 June 2009

7.5.2 Robbery

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Robbery is an offence under Crimes Act 1958 s 75.
2. The offence has the following three elements:
   i) The accused stole something (i.e., committed "theft");
   ii) Immediately before or at the time of the theft, the accused:
      - Used force on any person; or
      - Put any person in fear that s/he or another person would, then and there, be subject to the use of force; or
      - Sought to put any person in fear that s/he or another person would, then and there, be subject to the use of force.
   iii) The accused did so in order to commit the theft.

The accused committed theft

3. The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused stole something (Crimes Act 1958 s 75(1)).

4. A person "steals" (and thereby commits the offence of "theft") if s/he
    - Appropriates property belonging to another;
    - Does so with the intention of permanently depriving the other of the property; and
    - Acts dishonestly (Crimes Act s 72).
5. See 7.5.1 Theft for further information concerning each of these requirements.

The accused used force or fear of force

6. The second element that the prosecution must prove is that, immediately before or at the time of the theft, the accused:

    i) Used force on any person; or

    ii) Put any person in fear that s/he or another person would, then and there, be subject to the use of force; or

    iii) Sought to put any person in fear that s/he or another person would, then and there, be subject to the use of force (Crimes Act 1958 s 75(1)).

Use of force

7. There is no legal standard for the minimum physical contact that can constitute the "use of force" (Dawson & James (1976) 64 Crim App R 170; Hood v R [2000] WASCA 98).
8. If there is an issue about whether the accused's actions constituted a "use of force", it is for the jury to determine (Dawson & James (1976) 64 Crim App R 170; cf. Hood v R [2000] WASCA 98).
9. The "force" does not need to have been applied directly to the victim's body. It is sufficient if it was applied to items carried by the victim (R v Clouden [1987] Crim LR 56).

Putting a person in fear of the use of force

10. Where it is alleged that the accused put the victim in fear that s/he or another person would be subject to the use of force, the victim must have feared that the force would be used "then and there" (Crimes Act 1958 s 75(1)).
11. While any physical contact may be legally sufficient to meet this element where the "use of force" is relied upon, there is a minimum standard for threats capable of meeting this element. The accused's threat must place the victim "in fear" of the use of force. This means the threat must be sufficient to cause personal intimidation (R v Butcher [1986] VR 43).

Seeking to put a person in fear of the use of force

12. It is not necessary for the victim to have actually feared that s/he or someone else would be subjected to force for this element to be met. It will be met if the accused "sought" to put the victim in such fear, even if that attempt was not successful (Crimes Act 1958 s 75(1)).

"Immediately before or at the time of theft"

13. The accused must have used force, or put or sought to put the victim in fear of the use of force, "immediately before or at the time" of the theft (Crimes Act 1958 s 75(1)).[906]

14. This element will therefore not be met if the force was applied, or the fear induced, after the property was appropriated (R v Foster (1995) 78 A Crim R 517 (NSWCCA)).[907]

15. An act of appropriation may be a continuing act. If the accused used force, or put or sought to put the victim in fear of the use of force, at any point in time prior to the appropriation being complete, this element will be satisfied (R v Hale (1978) 68 Cr App R 415).

16. If there is an issue about whether or not the appropriation was already complete by the time the accused used force, or put or sought to put the victim in fear of the use of force, it is for the jury to determine when the appropriation was complete (R v Hale (1978) 68 Cr App R 415).

Victim may be "any person"

17. It is not necessary for the victim to have been the subject of the use or threat of force. This element will be met if the accused used force against any person, or put or sought to put the victim in fear that another person would be subjected to force (Crimes Act 1958 s 75(1)).

18. A "person" must have been the subject of the use or threat of force (Crimes Act 1958 s 75(1)). It is therefore not sufficient to prove that force was used or threatened against property.[908] However, if the accused, by the (threatened) use of force against property, puts (or seeks to put) the victim in fear that s/he or another person will themselves be subject to the use of force, this element will be satisfied.

Conduct was committed "in order" to steal

19. The third element requires the prosecution to prove that the force was used or threatened "in order to" carry out the theft (Crimes Act 1958 s 75(1)).

20. In determining whether this element is met, the jury must consider the accused's purpose when s/he committed the relevant acts. S/he must have committed those acts so that s/he could steal.

21. This test differs from the former common law test in two ways:

    - It does not require proof that the force, or the threat of force, caused the victim to part with the property taken (see, e.g. R v Foster (1995) 78 A Crim R 517 (NSWCCA)).
    - It does not require the force to have been used for the purpose of overpowering the party robbed (rather than simply using the amount of force necessary to get possession of the property) (see, e.g. Hood v the Queen [2000] WASCA 98).

22. As the purpose of the use or threat of force must have been to commit theft, this element will not be met if the accused used, or threatened to use, force upon the victim for a different reason, but upon seeing an unanticipated opportunity created by his or her actions, stole the victim's property.

---

[906] This requirement replaced the former common law requirement that the property must have been taken from, or in the presence of, the victim of the violence (see, e.g. R v McNamara [1965] VR 372). There is no reason to believe that this "presence" requirement is preserved in the statutory offence.

[907] The accused may, however, be guilty of another offence, such as assault.

[908] Where force is used or threatened against property, the accused may be guilty of another offence, such as blackmail (Crimes Act 1958 s 87).

Defences

23. Any defence to theft will also be defence to robbery. For example, as an honest belief in a claim of right to property is a defence to theft (see 7.5.1 Theft), it is not robbery if the accused honestly believed in his or her entitlement to take the property (R v Skivvington [1968] 1 QB 166).

24. For a claim of right to succeed, the accused does not need to have believed that s/he had a legal right to appropriate the property by the use of force. S/he merely needs to have believed that s/he had a legal right to appropriate the property. The use of force was simply his or her means of achieving that goal (R v Skivvington [1968] 1 QB 166; R v Robinson [1977] Crim LR 173. See also R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; R v Bedford (2007) 98 SASR 514).[909]

Last updated: 24 January 2017

7.5.2.1 Charge: Robbery (Short)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used where the only defence relied upon by the accused, or raised by the evidence, is that the accused was not the offender.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of robbery. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused committed theft.

Two – immediately before or at the time of the theft, the accused either:

- Used force on a person; or
- Put a person in fear, or sought to put a person in fear, that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there.

Three – the accused acted in that way in order to commit the theft.

Facts in Issue

In this case the defence did not contest the evidence that someone [summarise evidence of robbery]. They agreed that these events occurred, and that the person who was responsible for them is guilty of robbery.[910] However, they denied that NOA was the person who acted in that way.[911]

Consequently, the only issue for your consideration [on this count] is whether or not the prosecution have proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was the person who [describe alleged conduct]. If you are satisfied that it was NOA who did those acts, you should have no difficulty finding all three elements of this offence to have been proved.

---

[909] In such circumstances, the accused may be convicted of an offence relating to the violence used (R v Bedford (2007) 98 SASR 514; [2007] SASC 276; R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).

[910] If this concession has not been made, care should be taken before abbreviating the charge in this way.

[911] This charge will need to be adapted if it is alleged that the accused was guilty on the basis of some form of accessorial liability. See Part 5: Complicity.

The evidence was [describe evidence relevant to identification]. Counsel argued [describe arguments relevant to identification].

[If not done elsewhere, include directions and warnings about identification evidence. See 4.12 Identification Evidence and 4.12.1 Charges: Identification Evidence for assistance.]

Summary

To summarise, you have only one issue to decide in respect of this count. That issue is, have the prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt that NOA was the person who [describe alleged conduct].

If you are satisfied that they have, then you should have no difficulty finding all the elements of this offence proved. In such circumstances you should find NOA guilty of robbery.

However, if you are not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that it was NOA who [describe alleged conduct], you must find him/her not guilty of robbery.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

7.5.2.2 Charge: Robbery (Extended)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used where one or more elements of the offence are in issue. If the only issue relied upon by the accused, or raised by the evidence, is that the accused was not the offender, see 7.5.2.1 Charge: Robbery (Short).

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of robbery. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused committed theft.

Two – immediately before or at the time of the theft, the accused either:

- Used force on a person; or
- Put a person in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there; or
- Sought to put a person in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there.

Three – the accused acted in that way in order to commit the theft.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[912]

[912] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be explained briefly, and followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meet the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

Theft

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed theft. In order to do this, the prosecution must prove three things.[913]

First, they must prove that the accused appropriated property that belonged to another person. Although the word "appropriation" has a technical legal meaning, and includes many different types of acts, here it simply means to take something without the owner's consent.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA took [identify property] that belonged to [identify owner]. [Summarise prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that, when the accused appropriated the [describe property], s/he intended to permanently deprive the owner of it. That is, s/he intended that the owner would never get it back.

It does not matter whether the accused intended to keep, sell, give away, destroy or hide the appropriated property. If his/her intention was that the owner would not get the property back, then s/he will have had the necessary intention.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA had such an intention. [Identify prosecution evidence and/or arguments.]

Thirdly, the prosecution must prove that, at the time of the appropriation, the accused was acting dishonestly. In this context, "dishonesty" does not have its ordinary meaning. It is given a special legal meaning, which says that the accused will have acted dishonestly if, when s/he took the property, s/he did not believe that s/he had a legal right to take it.

In this case there is no evidence that the accused believed s/he had a legal right to take the [identify property]. So if you are satisfied that NOA took that property, you should have no difficulty finding this requirement proven.

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether NOA committed theft. This will only be the case if you are satisfied that all three of the requirements I have just outlined have been proven beyond reasonable doubt.

Force or fear of force

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that, immediately before or at the time of the theft, the accused either:

- Used force on a person; or
- Put a person in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there; or
- Sought to put a person in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there.

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA [identify relevant ground[s] *and people involved, e.g. "used force against NOC"*] when s/he [describe relevant conduct]. The defence denied this, arguing [describe defence evidence and/or arguments].

---

[913] This part of the charge is designed for use in cases where the theft element does not raise any technical issues. If such issues do arise, the charge should be adapted or expanded accordingly. Guidance can be obtained from 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended).

[If it is alleged that the accused put, or sought to put, a person in fear, add the following shaded section.]

You will note that it is not enough for the prosecution to prove that NOA put, or sought to put, NOC in fear that force was going to be used on him/her/NO3P[914] at some distant or uncertain time. To prove this element on the basis of the threatened use of force, the prosecution must prove that NOA put, or sought to put, NOC in fear that force was going to be used on him/her/NO3P then and there.

You will also note that, while this element will be met if you are satisfied that NOC was actually fearful that such force was going to be used, this is not necessary. This element will be met if the prosecution can prove that NOA sought to put NOC in fear, even if that attempt was unsuccessful.

Conduct was committed "in order" to steal

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted in the way s/he did in order to commit the theft. That is, NOA must have [used force on NOC/put NOC in fear of the use of force/sought to put NOC in fear of the use of force] for the purpose of stealing the [identify property], rather than for another reason.

[Insert any relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of robbery, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA committed theft, by dishonestly appropriating property that belonged to another person, intending to permanently deprive the owner of that property; and

Two – that immediately before or at the time of the theft, NOA either:

- Used force on NOC; or
- Put NOC in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there; or
- Sought to put NOC in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there; and

Three – that NOA acted in this way in order to commit the theft.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of robbery.

Theft

I must also direct you about the crime of theft. This is an alternative to the crime of robbery. That means you only need to return a verdict on the crime of theft if you are not satisfied that the prosecution have proved all the elements of robbery beyond reasonable doubt. If you decide that NOA is guilty of robbery, then you do not need to return a verdict on this alternative.

I have already explained the elements of theft to you, when instructing you about the first element of robbery. They are:

One – that the accused appropriated property belonging to another person; and

Two – that the accused intended to permanently deprive the other person of that property; and

---

[914] Name of third party.

Three – that the accused appropriated the property dishonestly, in that s/he did not believe that s/he had a legal right to take it.

For NOA to be guilty of theft, you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proved all of these matters beyond reasonable doubt. If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of theft.

Last updated: 27 March 2013

7.5.2.3 Checklist: Robbery

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused committed theft; and
2. Immediately before or at the time of the theft, the accused either:
    - Used force on a person; or
    - Put or sought to put a person in fear that force was going to be used against someone, then and there; and
3. The accused acted in that way in order to commit the theft.

Theft

1. Did the accused commit theft?

1.1 Did the accused appropriate property that belonged to another person?

*Consider – Did the accused take something without the owner's consent?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Robbery

1.2 Did the accused intend to permanently deprive another person of that property?

If Yes, then go to 1.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Robbery

1.3 Was the accused acting dishonestly?

Consider – Might the accused have believed that s/he had a legal right to take the property?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Robbery

Use of Force

2.1 Immediately before or at the time of the theft, did the accused use force against another person?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, go to 2.2

2.2 Immediately before or at the time of the theft, did the accused put a person in fear, or seek to put a person in fear, that force was going to be used on him or her or another person, then and there?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Robbery

Force Used in Order to Commit Theft

3. Did the accused act in this way in order to commit the theft?

Consider – Did the accused use or threaten the use of force for the purpose of stealing, rather than for another purpose?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Robbery

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Robbery

Last updated: 13 August 2009

7.5.3 Armed Robbery

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Armed robbery is an offence under the Crimes Act 1958 s 75A.
2. The offence has the following two elements:
   i) The accused committed robbery; and
   ii) At that time the accused had a firearm, imitation firearm, offensive weapon, explosive or imitation explosive with him or her.

The accused committed robbery

3. The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed robbery (Crimes Act 1958 s 75A(1)).
4. The accused will have committed robbery if s/he:
   i) Stole something (i.e., committed "theft");
   ii) Immediately before or at the time of the theft:
      (a) Used force on any person; or
      (b) Put any person in fear that s/he or another person would, then and there, be subject to the use of force; or
      (c) Sought to put any person in fear that s/he or another person would, then and there, be subject to the use of force; and

iii) Did so in order to commit the theft (Crimes Act 1958 s 75).

5. See 7.5.2 Robbery and 7.5.1 Theft for further information concerning each of these requirements.

The accused was armed

6. The second element that the prosecution must prove is that, at the time s/he committed the robbery, the accused had one of the following five articles with him or her:

   i) A firearm;

   ii) An imitation firearm;

   iii) An offensive weapon;

   iv) An explosive; or

   v) An imitation explosive (Crimes Act 1958 s 75A).

7. These articles have the meaning assigned to them in Crimes Act 1958 s 77(1) (Crimes Act 1958 s 75A(1)).

Specified articles

Firearms

8. The term "firearm" is defined to have the same meaning as provided in section 3 of the Firearms Act 1996 (Crimes Act 1958 s 77(1A)).

9. That provision defines firearms broadly to include devices that are:

   - Designed or adapted to discharge shot, bullets or other missiles
   - By the expansion of gases or by compressed gas (Firearms Act 1996 s 3 "firearm"(a)).

10. It does not matter whether the device is assembled or disassembled, complete or incomplete, operable or inoperable (Firearms Act 1996 s 3 "firearm").

11. The definition of "firearm" excludes:

    - Certain specified industrial tools (Firearms Act 1996 s 3 "firearm" (c),(d),(h));
    - Underwater spear guns (Firearms Act 1996 s 3 "firearm" (e));
    - Signal flare devices and line throwers (Firearms Act 1996 s 3 "firearm" (f),(i)); and
    - Devices of a prescribed class (Firearms Act 1996 s 3 "firearm" (j)). These currently include certain cannons or field guns, nets for catching animals, and devices mounted to model warships (see Firearms Regulations 2008 s 20).[915]

Imitation firearms

12. An "imitation firearm" is anything which has the appearance of being a firearm, whether or not it is capable of being discharged (Crimes Act 1958 s 77(1A)).

13. As the definition of "firearm" in section 3 of the Firearms Act 1996 extends to devices which "have the appearance of" a firearm, the definitions of "firearm" and "imitation firearm" overlap.

---

[915] While these articles will not be firearms, they may still be "offensive weapons" for the purposes of this offence.

Offensive weapons

14. An "offensive weapon" is any article which:

    - Is made for causing injury or incapacitation to a person; or
    - Is adapted for the use of causing injury or incapacitation to a person; or
    - The accused threatens to use for the purpose of causing injury or incapacitation to a person; or
    - The accused intends to use for the purpose of causing injury or incapacitation to a person (Crimes Act 1958 s 77(1A)).

Articles made for causing injury or incapacitation

15. An article is "made for use" in causing injury or incapacitation to a person if it is normally used only for that purpose (Wilson v Kuhl [1979] VR 315).

16. Examples of this kind of article include knuckle dusters and sawn-off shotguns. Carving knives and walking sticks are not articles of this kind (Wilson v Kuhl [1979] VR 315).

17. Articles that fall within this category will be offensive weapons regardless of how the accused intends to use them (Wilson v Kuhl [1979] VR 315).

Articles adapted for the use of causing injury of incapacitation

18. An otherwise inoffensive article is "adapted" for the use of causing injury or incapacitation if it is physically modified to transform it into a dangerous or threatening object (R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551).

19. A glass bottle may therefore become an offensive weapon if it is smashed to produce jagged edges (R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551).

20. An article will not be "adapted" into an "offensive weapon" merely by being handled or presented aggressively. It must undergo some kind of physical transformation (R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551).[916]

Articles the accused intends or threatens to use to cause injury or incapacitation

21. An unmodified and otherwise inoffensive article may become an "offensive weapon" if it is carried (or kept available) by a person who intends or threatens to use it to injure or incapacitate (Crimes Act 1958 s 77(1A); Wilson v Kuhl [1979] VR 315; R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551).

22. Kitchen knives, walking sticks and silk stockings carried with aggressive intent are examples of articles that fall into this category (Wilson v Kuhl [1979] VR 315; R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551).

23. An item as innocuous as a half-full plastic drink bottle, when wielded in a manner capable of causing injury, can also fall into this category (R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551).

24. It is not necessary to prove that the accused's original intention in carrying the article was to use it offensively. It is sufficient if the prosecution can prove that the accused had that intention at the time of the robbery (R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551).

25. An accused's threat to use an article to cause injury or incapacitation will not qualify the article as an offensive weapon if the victim knows the threat is fanciful (R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551).

Explosives and imitation explosives

26. An "explosive" is any article that is:

    - Manufactured for the purpose of producing a practical effect by explosion; or
    - Which the accused intends to have that purpose (Crimes Act 1958 s 77(1A)).

---

[916] However, a mundane item that is handled aggressively may be an "offensive weapon" due to its intended or threatened use (see below).

27. An "imitation explosive" is any article which might reasonably be taken to be, or to contain, an explosive (Crimes Act 1958 s 77(1A)).

The accused had the article "with" him or her

28. For this element to be met, the accused must have had one of the specified articles "with" him or her at the time of the robbery (Crimes Act 1958 s 75A).
29. A person will have had the article "with" him or her if, at the time of the robbery, he or she had the article either on his or her person, or readily available for use (R v Hartwick (1985) 17 A Crim R 281).
30. This element will only be met if the accused knew that he or she had the article with him or her, or available for use (R v Kolb & Adams 14/12/1979 CCA Vic; R v Cugullere [1961] 1 WLR 858).
31. A person does not have an article "with" him or her if it is possessed in such a way that it cannot be used (e.g. if it is concealed on his or her person in a sealed package) (R v Kolb & Adams 14/12/1979 CCA Vic; R v Pawlicki [1992] 3 All ER 902).
32. However, an instrument may be "used" by doing no more than drawing attention to its existence (R v Kolb & Adams 14/12/1979 CCA Vic).
33. The ordinary principles of criminal complicity apply to this offence. This means that this element will be met if an accomplice, acting in concert with the accused, had the article "with" him or her (R v Hartwick (1985) 17 A Crim R 281). See Part 5: Complicity for further information about the principles of criminal complicity.

Possession must be for the purpose of the robbery

34. The expression "has with him" creates an implied requirement that the accused possessed the article for the purpose of the robbery (R v Reid 7/4/1998 CA Vic; R v Kolb & Adams 14/12/1979 CCA Vic).
35. To establish that the accused possessed an article for the purpose of the robbery, the prosecution must prove that the accused intended to:
    - Use the article to apply force to a person; or
    - Use the article to put a person in fear that s/he or another person would, then and there, be subject to the use of force (R v Kolb & Adams 14/12/1979 CCA Vic).
36. The accused will have possessed an article for the purpose of the robbery if s/he intended to use it for that purpose, even if it was not actually used (R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551).
37. It is the accused's purpose or intention at the time of the robbery that matters (rather than when s/he originally equipped him/herself with the article) (R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551).

Last updated: 24 January 2017

7.5.3.1 Charge: Armed Robbery (Short)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used where the only defence relied upon by the accused, or raised by the evidence, is that the accused was not the offender.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of armed robbery. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused committed theft.

Two – that, immediately before or at the time of the theft, the accused either:

- Used force on a person; or
- Put a person in fear, or sought to put a person in fear, that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there.

Three – the accused acted in that way in order to commit the theft.

Four – the accused had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her at the time of the theft.

Facts in Issue

In this case the defence did not contest the evidence that someone [summarise evidence of armed robbery]. They agreed that these events occurred, and that the person who was responsible for them is guilty of armed robbery.[917] However, they denied that NOA was the person who acted in that way.[918]

Consequently, the only issue for your consideration [on this count] is whether or not the prosecution have proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was the person who [describe alleged conduct]. If you are satisfied that it was NOA who did those acts, you should have no difficulty finding all four elements of this offence to have been proved.

The evidence was [describe evidence relevant to identification]. Counsel argued [describe arguments relevant to identification].

[If not done elsewhere, include directions and warnings about identification evidence. See 4.12 Identification Evidence and 4.12.1 Charges: Identification Evidence for assistance.]

Summary

To summarise, you have only one issue to decide in respect of this count. That issue is, have the prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt that NOA was the person who [describe alleged conduct].

If you are satisfied that they have, then you should have no difficulty finding all the elements of this offence proved. In such circumstances you should find NOA guilty of armed robbery.

However, if you are not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that it was NOA who [describe alleged conduct], you must find him/her not guilty of armed robbery.

Last updated: 26 March 2009

7.5.3.2 Charge: Armed Robbery (Extended)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used where one or more elements of the offence are in issue. If the only issue relied upon by the accused, or raised by the evidence, is that the accused was not the offender, see 7.5.3.1 Charge: Armed Robbery (Short).

[917] If this concession has not been made, care should be taken before abbreviating the charge in this way.

[918] This charge will need to be adapted if it is alleged that the accused was guilty on the basis of some form of accessorial liability. See Part 5: Complicity.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of armed robbery. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused committed theft.

Two – that, immediately before or at the time of the theft, the accused either:

- Used force on a person; or
- Put a person in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there; or
- Sought to put a person in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there.

Three – the accused acted in that way in order to commit the theft.

Four – the accused had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her at the time of the theft.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[919]

Theft

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed theft. In order to do this, the prosecution must prove three things.[920]

First, they must prove that the accused appropriated property that belonged to another person. Although the word "appropriation" has a technical legal meaning, and includes many different types of acts, here it simply means to take something without the owner's consent.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA took [identify property] that belonged to [identify owner]. [Summarise prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that, when the accused appropriated the [describe property], s/he intended to permanently deprive the owner of it. That is, s/he intended that the owner would never get it back.

It does not matter whether the accused intended to keep, sell, give away, destroy or hide the appropriated property. If his/her intention was that the owner would not get the property back, then s/he will have had the necessary intention.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA had such an intention. [Identify prosecution evidence and/or arguments.]

---

[919] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be explained briefly, and followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meet the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[920] This part of the charge is designed for use in cases where the theft element does not raise any technical issues. If such issues do arise, the charge should be adapted or expanded accordingly. Guidance can be obtained from 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended).

Thirdly, the prosecution must prove that, at the time of the appropriation, the accused was acting dishonestly. In this context, "dishonesty" does not have its ordinary meaning. It is given a special legal meaning, which says that the accused will have acted dishonestly if, when s/he took the property, s/he did not believe that s/he had a legal right to take it.

In this case there is no evidence that the accused believed s/he had a legal right to take the [identify property]. So if you are satisfied that NOA took that property, you should have no difficulty finding this requirement proved.

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether NOA committed theft. This will only be the case if you are satisfied that all three of the requirements I have just outlined have been proved beyond reasonable doubt.

Force or fear of force

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that, immediately before or at the time of the theft, the accused either:

- Used force on a person; or
- Put a person in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there; or
- Sought to put a person in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there.

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA [identify relevant ground[s] *and people involved, e.g. "used force against NOC"*] when s/he [describe relevant conduct]. The defence denied this, arguing [describe defence evidence and/or arguments].

[If it is alleged that the accused put, or sought to put, a person in fear, add the following shaded section.]

You will note that it is not enough for the prosecution to prove that NOA put, or sought to put, NOC in fear that force was going to be used on him/her/NO3P[921] at some distant or uncertain time. To prove this element on the basis of the threatened use of force, the prosecution must prove that NOA put, or sought to put, NOC in fear that force was going to be used on him/her/NO3P then and there.

You will also note that, while this element will be met if you are satisfied that NOC was actually fearful that such force was going to be used, this is not necessary. This element will be met if the prosecution can prove that NOA sought to put NOC in fear, even if that attempt was unsuccessful.

Conduct was committed "in order" to steal

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted in the way s/he did in order to commit the theft. That is, NOA must have [used force on NOC/put NOC in fear of the use of force/sought to put NOC in fear of the use of force] for the purpose of stealing the [identify property], rather than for another reason.

[Insert any relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

The accused was armed

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her at the time of the theft. For this element to be met, there are three things that the prosecution must prove.

---

[921] Name of third party.

First, they must prove that, at the time of the theft, NOA had [identify item] either on him/her or readily available for use.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that [identify item] falls within the category of [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive].

[Where there is a dispute about whether the article possessed was a firearm, add relevant parts of the following shaded section.]

The law defines a "firearm" to be any device which is designed or adapted to discharge bullets or other missiles, either by the expansion of gases produced in the device by the ignition of strongly combustible materials, or by compressed air or other gases. The definition of "firearm" also includes anything which looks like such a device.

However, certain things are excluded from the definition of a "firearm". These include [identify relevant exception, e.g. "underwater spear guns"].

To be a "firearm", the device does not need to be assembled, complete or operational. If it fits the definition I have just given you, it will be a "firearm", whether or not it actually works.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an imitation firearm with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

An "imitation firearm" is anything which has the appearance of being a firearm, whether or not it is capable of being shot.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an offensive weapon with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

An "offensive weapon" can be an item which is specifically made or adapted for the use of injuring or incapacitating a person. An ordinarily inoffensive item can also become an "offensive weapon" if the person carrying it intends or threatens to use it to injure or incapacitate a person.

[If it is alleged that the relevant article was made for the use of injuring or incapacitating a person, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution argued that the [identify item] is an "offensive weapon" because it is made for injuring or incapacitating people. That is, it is an item that is normally used for this purpose.

[If it is alleged that the relevant article was adapted for the use of injuring or incapacitating a person, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution argued that the [identify item] was an "offensive weapon" because it was adapted for the use of injuring or incapacitating people. That is, it was physically modified so that it could cause injury or incapacitate a person.

[If it is alleged that an ordinary article became an offensive weapon because of the accused's use, threats or intention, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution argued that the [identify item] was an "offensive weapon" because NOA [used/threatened to use/intended to use] it for the purpose of injuring or incapacitating a person.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an explosive with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

An "explosive" is any item which is manufactured for the purpose of producing a practical effect by explosion, or which is intended to have that purpose. Any item that fits this definition will be an "explosive", whether or not it actually works.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an imitation explosive with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

An "imitation explosive" is any item which might reasonably be taken to be, or to contain, an explosive.

Thirdly, the prosecution must prove that NOA had the [identify item] with him/her for the purpose of the robbery. That is, s/he intended to use the [identify item] to apply force to a person, or to put a person in fear that s/he or another person would, then and there, be subject to the use of force.

[If the accused may not have used the article for this purpose, add the following shaded section.]

It does not matter whether NOA actually used the [identify item] for this purpose. What is important is whether s/he intended to use it for the purpose of the robbery.

In determining this matter you should focus on NOA's intention at the time of the robbery. It does not matter what his/her intention was at the time s/he first handled the [identify item].

In this case the prosecution argued that all three of these requirements have been met. [Describe prosecution evidence and/or arguments.]

The defence [describe defence case [if any] in respect of this element, e.g.

- denied that NOA had a gun with him/her at the time of the robbery;
- denied that the bottle was an offensive weapon;
- denied that NOA had the knife with him/her for the purpose of the robbery].

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether all three of these matters have been proved beyond reasonable doubt. It is only if you are satisfied that NOA had [identify item] with him/her at the time of the theft, that [identify item] was a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive], and that NOA had that item with him/her for the purposes of the robbery that this element will be met.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of armed robbery, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA committed theft, by dishonestly appropriating property that belonged to another person, intending to permanently deprive the owner of that property; and

Two – that immediately before or at the time of the theft, NOA either:

- Used force on NOC; or
- Put NOC in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there; or
- Sought to put NOC in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there; and

Three – that NOA acted in this way in order to commit the theft; and

Four – that NOA had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her at the time of the theft. That is:

- At the time of the theft, s/he had a [identify item] on him/her or readily available;
- That a [identify item] falls within the category of a [identify category]; and
- That NOA had the [identify item] with him/her for the purpose of the robbery.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of armed robbery.

Robbery

In this case, there are two alternatives to the offence of armed robbery. The first is the offence of robbery.

This is an alternative to the offence of armed robbery. That means that you will only be asked to return a verdict on this offence if you are not satisfied that the prosecution has proved the offence of armed robbery beyond reasonable doubt. If you decide that NOA is guilty of armed robbery, then you do not need to deliver a verdict on this alternative.

The offence of robbery is very similar to the offence of armed robbery, with one important difference: the accused does not need to have had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her at the time of the theft.

In other words, if you are satisfied that the prosecution have proved the first three elements I just described beyond reasonable doubt, but are not satisfied that they have proved element four, then you should find the accused guilty of robbery. However, if you find that any of the first three elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find the accused not guilty of robbery.

Theft

The second alternative offence is theft. As theft is an alternative to the offences of robbery and armed robbery, you will only be asked to return a verdict on the offence of theft if you are not satisfied that the prosecution have proved either of those offences beyond reasonable doubt. If you decide that NOA is guilty of either armed robbery or robbery, then you do not need to deliver a verdict on this alternative.

I have already explained the elements of theft to you, when instructing you about the first element of armed robbery. They are:

One – that the accused appropriated property belonging to another person; and

Two – that the accused intended to permanently deprive the other person of that property; and

Three – that the accused appropriated the property dishonestly, in that s/he did not believe that s/he had a legal right to take it.

For NOA to be guilty of theft, you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proved all of these matters beyond reasonable doubt. If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of theft.

Last updated: 27 March 2013

7.5.3.3 Checklist: Armed Robbery

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused committed theft; and
2. Immediately before or at the time of the theft, the accused either:
    - Used force on a person; or
    - Put or sought to put a person in fear that force was going to be used against someone, then and there; and
3. The accused acted in that way in order to commit the theft; and
4. The accused had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her at the time of the theft.

Theft

1. Did the accused commit theft?

1.1 Did the accused appropriate property that belonged to another person?

*Consider – Did the accused take something without the owner's consent?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Armed Robbery

1.2 Did the accused intend to permanently deprive another person of that property?

If Yes, then go to 1.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Armed Robbery

1.3 Was the accused acting dishonestly?

Consider – Might the accused have believed that s/he had a legal right to take the property?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Armed Robbery

Use of Force

2.1 Immediately before or at the time of the theft, did the accused use force against another person?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, go to 2.2

2.2 Immediately before or at the time of the theft, did the accused put a person in fear, or seek to put a person in fear, that force was going to be used on him or her or another person, then and there?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Armed Robbery

Force Used in Order to Commit Theft

3. Did the accused act in this way in order to commit the theft?

Consider – Did the accused use or threaten the use of force for the purpose of stealing, rather than for another purpose?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Armed Robbery

The Accused was Armed

4. Did the accused have a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her at the time of the theft?

4.1 Did the accused have this item either on him/her or readily available for use?

If Yes, then go to 4.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Armed Robbery

4.2 Was the item a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive]?

If Yes, then go to 4.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Armed Robbery

4.3 Did the accused have this item with him/her for the purpose of the robbery?

Consider – Did the accused intend to use the item to apply force to a person, or to put a person in fear that s/he or another person would, then and there, be subject to the use of force?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Armed Robbery

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Armed Robbery

Last updated: 13 August 2009

7.5.4 Burglary

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Burglary is an offence under Crimes Act 1958 s 76.
2. The offence has the following three elements:
   i) The accused entered a building (or part of a building);
   ii) The accused did so as a trespasser; and
   iii) The accused intended to:
      - Steal something from the building or part in question; or
      - Commit an offence punishable by imprisonment for a term of five years or more involving either:

- An assault to a person in the building or part in question; or
- Damage to the building or to property in the location (Crimes Act 1958 s 76).

The accused entered a building or part of a building

3. The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered a "building" or "part of a building" (Crimes Act 1958 s 76(1)).

Entering a "building"

4. Whether or not a structure is a "building" is a question of fact for the jury. Relevant characteristics include size, weight, permanence of position, the presence of doors and locks, and the availability of electricity (B and S v Leathley [1979] Crim LR 314).
5. Inhabited vehicles and vessels are treated as "buildings" for the purposes of this offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 76(2)).
6. Issues can arise where the accused entered the external structure of a building (e.g. the porch). In such cases it is for the jury to determine whether the accused entered the "building", or simply entered a space outside the building (R v Cahill [1999] 2 VR 387).

Entering "part of a building"

7. Sometimes a person will be lawfully allowed to enter certain parts of a building, but prohibited from entering other parts. This first element will be met if the accused enters an unauthorised "part of a building" (Crimes Act 1958 s 76(1)).
8. In this context, there are only two distinguishable "parts" to a building: the part of a building that the accused could lawfully enter, and the remainder of the building (R v Walkington [1979] 1 WLR 1169).
9. While these "parts" do not need to be physically demarcated, apparent demarcations will be pertinent to the jury's assessment of whether or not the "part of the building" the accused entered was in fact "off-limits", and whether or not the accused was aware of that fact. These considerations will be relevant for the purpose of determining whether the accused was knowingly trespassing (the second element) (R v Walkington [1979] 1 WLR 1169).

Entry as a trespasser

10. The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered the building (or part of a building) "as a trespasser" (Crimes Act 1958 s 76(1)).
11. This requires the prosecution to prove that the accused entered the building (or part of the building) without right or authority to enter (Barker v R (1983) 153 CLR 338).[922]
12. The prosecution must also prove that the accused entered the building (or part of the building):

    i) Knowing that he or she had no right or authority to enter; or

    ii) Being reckless as to whether he or she had any right or authority to enter (Barker v R (1983) 153 CLR 338).

[922] This is the same physical act that is required for "trespass" at civil law, but the mental state required differs (see below) (Barker v R (1983) 153 CLR 338).

13. When a person enters a building as a trespasser, s/he will still be a trespasser when s/he enters a room in that house (R v Chimirri [2010] VSCA 57).

Absence of right or authority to enter

14. A person does not enter a building (or part of a building) as a trespasser if his or her entry is justified by right or authority (Barker v R (1983) 153 CLR 338).

15. A variety of "rights" and "authorities" arise under the civil law. As listed by Brennan and Deane JJ in Barker v R (1983) 153 CLR 338, they include the following:

    - A paramount right to possession;
    - Some other statutory or common law right of entry;
    - Involuntary and inevitable accident; or
    - The licence of the person in possession of the property (Barker v R (1983) 153 CLR 338).

16. If the trial judge directs the jury in terms of a "right", "licence" or "authority" to enter, he or she should describe the meaning of that term (R v Taylor (2004) 10 VR 199).

Limited authority to enter

17. The accused's authority to enter a building (or part of a building) may be subject to express or implied limitations regarding the time, place, manner or purpose of entry. In such cases, any entry outside those terms may be a trespass (Barker v R (1983) 153 CLR 338).

18. Whether or not the accused's authority to enter a building (or part of a building) is limited in any way is a question of fact. It cannot be assumed that the authority to enter is subject to any particular limitations (e.g. limits concerning the purpose of the entry) (Barker v R (1983) 153 CLR 338).

19. A specific limitation cannot be implied just because it is probable that, if raised, it would have been incorporated as a limitation to the authority (Barker v R (1983) 153 CLR 338).

20. Where the authority to enter is based on general law, that authority will ordinarily be limited to entry for the purpose for which the authority exists. Any entry for a purpose other than the authorised purpose is likely to be a trespass (Barker v R (1983) 153 CLR 338).

21. It is therefore trespass if a person is authorised to enter a property for the purpose of protecting its contents, but instead enters the property for the purpose of stealing those contents (Barker v R (1983) 153 CLR 338).

22. The accused will not have entered as a trespasser if he or she complied with all of the express and implied limitations of the authority to enter, even if he or she entered the property with the intention of violating a fundamental interest of the authorising party (e.g. by stealing or damaging property, or by assaulting a person) (Barker v R (1983) 153 CLR 338).

Unlimited authority to enter

23. Sometimes a person will have unlimited authority to enter a building (or part of a building), such as where they are a tenant. A person who has a right of exclusive possession of the relevant premises cannot be a trespasser (BA v The King [2023] HCA 14, [69]–[101]).

24. The position in relation to a person who has an unqualified licence to enter premises is less clear.

25. In England and Wales it has been held that a person who enters a building with an undisclosed intention to steal enters as a trespasser, even if he or she has unlimited authority to enter the building (R v Jones & Smith [1976] 1 WLR 672; R v Taylor (2004) 10 VR 199).

26. In Australia, Brennan, Deane and Murphy JJ in Barker v The Queen doubted whether a person with an unqualified licence to enter would become a trespasser when they entered premises for the purpose of committing some offence (see Barker v The Queen (1983) 153 CLR 338 (obiter per Brennan, Deane and Murphy JJ). But c.f. R v Munro [2006] VSCA 94).

27. The Charge Book burglary and aggravated burglary charges adopt the narrower approach suggested in Barker v R (1983) 153 CLR 338. That is, they direct the jury that an undisclosed intention to commit an offence cannot by itself convert an authorised visitor into a trespasser.

Remaining on property after authority has been withdrawn

28. Sometimes a person will remain upon property after his or her authority to be there has ended or been withdrawn. While at civil law he or she may be treated as having been a trespasser from the time of entry (a trespasser ab initio), this is not the case in criminal proceedings. In such proceedings a lawful entry cannot be retrospectively transformed into a trespassory entry (Barker v R (1983) 153 CLR 338; Victoria v Second Comet Pty Ltd (Vic SC 21/12/1994).

29. It follows that if the accused lawfully enters a building, but his or her authority to be there is subsequently terminated, he or she will not become a burglar simply by remaining there in order to steal or commit another relevant offence. For this second element to be met, he or she must make a fresh "entry" into the building or distinguishable part of the building.

The Accused's Mental State

30. For the purposes of the offence of burglary, a person only enters a building (or part of a building) as a trespasser if he or she enters:

    - Knowing that he or she has no right or authority to enter; or
    - Being reckless as to whether he or not she has any such right or authority (Barker v R (1983) 153 CLR 338; R v Taylor (2004) 10 VR 199; R v Lambourn [2007] VSCA 187).

31. For the accused to have been "reckless" as to whether he or not she had the right or authority to enter a building (or part of a building), he or she must have believed that it was probable that s/he had no right or authority to enter the building (or its relevant part) (See R v Verde [2009] VSCA 16, [21]. See also R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641; R v Kalajdic [2005] VSCA 160, [30]–[31]; DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2021] HCA 26; DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2020] VSCA 181).

32. It is not sufficient that the accused was merely aware of the possibility that his or her entry was unauthorised (see R v Verde [2009] VSCA 16, [21]; R v Kalajdic [2005] VSCA 160, [30]–[31]; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641).

33. The trial judge should direct the jury on the meaning of the term "recklessness" where that concept is in issue. Failure to direct on the meaning of this term risks the jury deciding the issue on the basis of the lower standards of carelessness or negligence (R v Taylor (2004) 10 VR 199).

Intention to commit a prescribed offence

34. The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered the building (or part of the building) with the intention of committing an offence prescribed in s 76(1)(a) or (b) (Crimes Act 1958 s 76(1)).

35. The offences prescribed by Crimes Act 1958 s 76(1) are:

    i) The theft of anything in the building or unauthorised part of the building (s 76(1)(a));

    ii) An offence punishable by imprisonment for a term of five years or more that:

        - Involves an assault to a person in the building or unauthorised part of the building (s 76(1)(b)(i)); or
        - Involves any damage to the building or property in the or unauthorised part of the building (s 76(1)(b)(ii)).

36. Whether a particular offence is an offence "punishable by imprisonment" for any particular term is a question of law for the judge. This legal requirement does not create any factual issue for determination by the jury. So while the judge may need to make a ruling in this regard, it is not necessary to direct the jury on this issue.

37. The prosecution must prove that the accused intended to commit the prescribed offence at the time of entry. This element is not satisfied if that intention was only formed after the accused entered the building (R v Verde [2009] VSCA 16; R v Walkington [1979] 1 WLR 1169).

38. It seems that satisfaction of this element may depend on the way in which the presentment is framed. For example:

    - If it is alleged in the presentment that the accused entered the house as a trespasser, it will be necessary for the prosecution to prove that s/he had the requisite intention when s/he initially entered the house.
    - If it is alleged in the presentment that the accused entered a particular room in the house as a trespasser, the prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to commit the prescribed offence when initially entering the house. Instead, they only need to prove that the accused had that intention when entering the room identified in the presentment (R v Chimirri [2010] VSCA 57).

39. The accused may form the necessary intent even though important matters remain outside his or her knowledge or control. For example, this element will be satisfied if the accused entered the building (or part of the building) with an intention:

    - To steal anything of value which may be inside;
    - To assault any person who he or she may find inside; or
    - To assault a particular person if he or she finds them inside (R v Verde [2009] VSCA 16; R v Walkington [1979] 1 WLR 1169; R v Garlett (1987) 31 A Crim R 75).

40. This element is separate to and distinct from the mens rea component of the second element (i.e., the accused knowing that he or she had no right or authority to enter, or being reckless as to that possibility). The jury should be directed separately about these elements (R v Spero (2006) 13 VR 225).

41. It is permissible for the prosecution to allege different intents as alternatives bases of culpability in the one charge.[923] Where it does so, the jury should be directed that they must agree, not just on their ultimate verdict, but also on the basis of culpability. See Unanimous and Majority Verdicts for further information about this issue.

Intention to steal

42. The first way in which this element may be met is by proving that the accused intended to steal anything in the building or unauthorised part of the building (Crimes Act 1958 s 76(1)(a)).

43. In such cases the prosecution only needs to prove that the accused intended to steal "anything in the building". It does not need to prove:

    - That the accused intended to steal a specific item;
    - That the accused actually stole anything; or
    - That there was anything on the premises worth stealing (R v Walkington [1979] 1 WLR 1169; R v Nilson [1968] VR 238).

44. If the accused's intention was to take property in circumstances not amounting to theft (e.g. because s/he believed that s/he had a legal claim of right), then this element will not be met. For more information about what amounts to theft, see 7.5.1 Theft.

---

[923] For example, the prosecution could allege that the accused entered the building with an intention "to steal therein and/or to commit an assault to a person therein".

Intention to assault a person

45. The second way in which this element may be met is if the accused entered the building (or part of the building) with an intent to "commit an offence involving an assault upon a person in the building… which is punishable by imprisonment for a term of five years or more" (Crimes Act 1958 s 76(1)(b)(i)).

46. The definition of assault in s 31(2) does not apply to burglary. It applies only to s 31(1) and s 40(1) of the Crimes Act 1958.

47. The s 76(1)(b)(i) formula most straightforwardly translates into an intention to commit the offence of common law assault. That offence is punishable by 5 years imprisonment (Crimes Act 1958 s 320).

48. The prosecution can therefore meet this element by proving that the accused entered the property:

    - Intending to apply force to the body of a relevant person; or
    - Intending to cause a relevant person to apprehend the immediate application of force to his or her body (See 7.4.8 Common Law Assault for more information).

49. Numerous other offences against the person "involve an assault" in the sense that they involve actual touching, or causing physical injury, or threatened immediate application of force. If the prosecution relies upon an alternative offence then the charge will need to reflect the mental element of that offence.[924]

50. If the accused's intention was to engage in conduct that did not amount to an offence involving an assault (e.g. where consent is a defence to the relevant offence, and the accused believed the victim was consenting) then this element will not be met.

51. Where the accused is alleged to have offended as part of a group, this element can be proved by showing either that the accused intended to commit an assault personally, or that the accused intended to assist or encourage another person in the group to commit an assault (R v Novakovic [2019] VSC 339, [365]–[382]).

Intention to damage property

52. The third way in which this element may be met is if the accused entered the building (or part of the building) with an intent to "commit an offence involving any damage to the building or to property in the building … which is punishable by imprisonment for a term of five years or more" (Crimes Act 1958 s 76(1)(b)(ii)).

53. The offences most commonly relied upon in this respect are the offences of arson or destroying or damaging property contrary to Crimes Act 1958 s 197.

54. See 7.5.16 Criminal Damage for further information.

Last updated: 30 July 2023

7.5.4.1 Charge: Burglary (Short)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

[924] The jury need only be charged on the elements of the secondary offence to the extent that they are relevant to the allegation that the accused intended to commit that offence.

This abbreviated charge should only be used where the sole defence relied upon by the accused, or raised by the evidence, is that the accused was not the offender.[925]

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of burglary. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused entered [part of] a building.

Two – the accused did so as a trespasser.

Three – that, when s/he entered the [relevant part of the] building, the accused intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault", "criminal damage"].

Facts in Issue

In this case the defence did not contest the evidence that someone [summarise evidence burglary]. They agreed that you should be satisfied these events occurred, and that the person who was responsible for them is guilty of burglary.[926] However, they denied that NOA was the person who acted in that way.[927]

Consequently, the only issue for your consideration [on this count] is whether or not the prosecution have proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was the person who [describe alleged conduct]. If you are satisfied that it was NOA who did those acts, you should have no difficulty finding all three elements of this offence to have been proven.

The evidence was [describe evidence relevant to identification]. Counsel argued [describe arguments relevant to identification].

[If not done elsewhere, include directions and warnings about identification evidence*. See* 4.12 Identification Evidence and 4.12.1 Charges: Identification Evidence for assistance.]

Summary

To summarise, you have only one issue to decide in respect of this count. That issue is, have the prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt that NOA was the person who [describe alleged conduct].

If you are satisfied that they have, then you should have no difficulty finding all the elements of this offence proved. In such circumstances you should find NOA guilty of burglary.

However, if you are not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that it was NOA who [describe alleged conduct], you must find him/her not guilty of burglary.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

---

[925] Abbreviated charges should normally be discussed with counsel before being used. Caution should be exercised before using this charge over the objection of counsel.

[926] If this concession has not been made, care should be taken before abbreviating the charge in this way.

[927] This charge will need to be adapted if it is alleged that the accused was guilty on the basis of some form of accessorial liability. See Part 5: Complicity.

7.5.4.2 Charge: Burglary

Click here to obtain a word version of this document for adaptation

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of burglary. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused entered [part of] a building.

Two – the accused did so as a trespasser.

Three – that, when s/he entered the [part of the] building, the accused intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault", "criminal damage"].

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[928]

The accused entered a building or part of a building

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered [part of] a building.

In this case the [part of the] building it is alleged that NOA entered is [identify relevant building or part of the building].

[If the "building" is an inhabited vehicle or vessel, add the following shaded section.]

While you may not think that a [identify relevant class of vehicle or vessel, e.g. "caravan", "trailer", "houseboat"] is a "building", for the purposes of this offence a vehicle or vessel is treated as a "building" if it was inhabited at the time of the offence.

A vehicle or vessel will have been "inhabited" at the time of the offence if a person was living in it at that time. No-one needs to have actually been present in the vehicle or vessel at the time of the burglary. This requirement will be satisfied as long as someone was living there, even if they were out when the burglary took place.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether NOA entered the [identify relevant building or part of the building]. It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he did, that this first element will be met.

The accused entered as a trespasser

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered the [part of the] building as a trespasser. For this element to be met, there are two things the prosecution must prove.

First, they must prove that NOA entered the [identify relevant building or part of the building] without any right or authority to enter. That is, that [part of the] building must have been "off-limits" to him/her.

[If it is alleged that the accused entered a prohibited part of a building, add the following shaded section.]

It is important to note that, in this case, the prosecution did not allege that the entire building was "off-limits" to NOA. They accepted that s/he was authorised to enter certain parts of the building, such as the [identify authorised parts of the building]. However, they argued that NOA was forbidden from entering the [identify prohibited part of the building]. That is, s/he had no right or authority to be there.

[928] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be explained briefly, and followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meet the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is for you to determine whether that part of the building really was "off-limits" to NOA. This part of the second element will only be satisfied if you find that it was.

[If it is alleged that the accused had limited authority to enter, but exceeded that authority, add the following shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution did not deny that NOA had some authority to enter [identify building or relevant part of building]. However, they argued that s/he only had authority to enter [that part of] the building if s/he complied with certain conditions, such as [identify alleged conditions.]

The prosecution alleged that when NOA entered the [part of the] building s/he was not complying with these conditions, and so had no right or authority to enter. She was therefore trespassing.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is for you to determine if NOA's authority to enter [identify building or relevant part of building] was subject to any conditions. In making this determination you can consider everything that was said and done by the parties, and also the way that people generally conduct themselves. However, you cannot assume that certain conditions were imposed just because those limits would have been imposed if the issue had been raised. You must be satisfied that those conditions actually were imposed.

If you find that NOA's authority to enter the [identify building or relevant part of building] was not subject to any conditions, then the second element will not be met. In such circumstances, the accused will have had unlimited authority to enter the [part of the] building, and so cannot have been trespassing, no matter what s/he intended to do. Even if s/he entered with some undesirable purpose in mind, s/he still had a right to enter.

If you find that NOA's authority to enter was subject to certain conditions, you must then determine whether or not, when s/he entered the [part of the] building, s/he was complying with those conditions. If s/he was, then s/he will not have been trespassing. That is, s/he will have had a right or authority to enter that [part of the] building.

However, if s/he was not complying with those conditions, then s/he will have had no right or authority to enter the building, and this part of the second element will be met.

To summarise, this part of the second element will only be met if you are satisfied that NOA was only authorised to enter [identify building or relevant part of building] if s/he complied with certain conditions, and you find that s/he did not comply with those conditions when s/he entered. If you are not satisfied of either of these matters beyond reasonable doubt, then this element will not be met.

The second matter that the prosecution must prove for the second element to be met is that the accused either knew that s/he had no right or authority to enter [identify building or relevant part of building], or s/he believed that it was probable that she had no such right or authority.

For this part of the second element to be satisfied, it is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that she had no right or authority to enter the [part of the] building. S/he must have at least known that this was probably the case.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA entered the [identify relevant building or part of the building] without any right or authority to enter, and that s/he knew that s/he had no right or authority to enter that [part of the] building, or at least knew that that was probably the case, that this second element will be met. If you are not satisfied about both of these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of burglary.

The accused intended to commit an offence

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that, when s/he entered the [part of the] building, the accused intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault", "criminal damage"].

[Where the relevant offence is theft, add the following shaded section.]

In order to do this, the prosecution must prove three things.[929]

First, they must prove that the accused intended to appropriate property that belonged to another person. In this case the word "appropriate" simply means to take something without the owner's consent.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that the accused intended to permanently deprive the owner of the property in question. That is, the accused must have intended that the owner would never get it back.

Thirdly, the prosecution must prove that when s/he entered the [part of the] building, the accused did not believe that s/he had a legal right to take the property in question.

[If further elaboration is necessary, include any relevant bullet points from the following list.]

- The prosecution does not need to prove that any property was in fact stolen. They only need to prove that the accused intended to steal.
- The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to steal any particular property. They only need to prove that s/he intended to steal property of some kind from inside the building.
- This element will be met if the prosecution can prove that, although the accused did not know what s/he would find in the [part of the] building, s/he intended to steal anything of value that s/he might come across.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

[Where the relevant offence is common assault, add the following shaded section.]

In order to do this the prosecution must prove two things.[930]

First, they must prove that the accused intended either to apply force to a person's body, or to act in a way that would cause a person to apprehend the immediate application of force to his or her body.[931]

---

[929] This charge is designed for use in cases where this element raises only simple issues. If more complex issues arise, the charge should be expanded accordingly. Guidance can be obtained from 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended).

[930] This charge is designed for use in cases where this element raises only simple issues. If more complex issues arise, the charge should be expanded accordingly. Guidance can be obtained from 7.4.8.1 Charge: Assault – Application of Force or 7.4.8.3 Charge: Assault – No Application of Force.

[If further elaboration is necessary, include any relevant directions from the following bullet list.]

- [For application of force cases] It does not matter how much force the accused intended to apply. Nor does it matter whether or not that force would have harmed the person. An intention to merely touch someone is enough.
- [For application of force cases] It does not matter whether s/he would have actually been able to apply the force. It is sufficient for the accused to have intended to apply force.
- [For apprehension cases] S/he does not need to have intended to actually apply such force. The accused only needs to have intended to cause someone to apprehend that force would be applied.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that the accused intended to act in this way in circumstances in which there was no lawful justification or excuse for his/her conduct.

[Possible forms of lawful justification or excuse include consent, self-defence, arrest, the lawful correction of children and ordinary social activity. For guidance on directions for these matters see 7.4.8 Common Law Assault and 7.4.8.1 Charge: Assault – Application of Force and/or 7.4.8.3 Charge: Assault – No Application of Force.

[If no lawful justifications or excuses are open on the evidence, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case, it has not been suggested that there was a lawful justification or excuse for the accused's alleged actions. You should therefore have no difficulty finding that, if NOA intended to [apply force to a person's body/act in a way that would cause a person to apprehend the immediate application of force to his or her body], that was done without lawful justification or excuse.

[If any lawful justifications or excuses are open on the evidence, give appropriate directions incorporating reference to the evidence and arguments relevant to the justification or excuse, and concluding with the following darker shaded section.]

Remember, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused's behaviour was without lawful [justification/excuse]. The defence does not need to prove that NOA had such a [justification/excuse].

The accused must have had the relevant intention at the time s/he entered the [part of the] building. If you accept that it is reasonably possible that NOA only formed that intention after entering the [part of the] building, then this element will not be satisfied.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of burglary, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA entered [part of] a building; and

Two – that NOA did so as a trespasser. That is:

- S/he entered the [part of the] building without any right or authority to enter; and

[931] If the prosecution relies on only one basis of culpability, directions on the alternative basis should be omitted.

- S/he knew that s/he had no right or authority to enter that [part of the] building, or at least knew that that was probably the case; and

Three – that at that time NOA intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault", "criminal damage"].

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of burglary.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

7.5.4.3 Checklist: Burglary

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist includes two possible third elements. Judges must omit or adapt this checklist depending on how the prosecution seeks to prove the third element.

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused entered [part of] a building; and
2. The accused did so as a trespasser; and
3. At the time of entry the accused intended to commit the offence of [theft/common assault/criminal damage etc.] within the [part of the] building.

Entry into [part of] a building

1. Did the accused enter the [part of the] building?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary

Entry as a trespasser

2. Did the accused enter as a trespasser?

2.1 Did the accused have a right or authority to enter the [part of the] building?

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then go to 2.3

2.2 Did the accused enter the [part of the] building in circumstances that were not permitted by his or her right or authority to enter?

Consider – Was the accused only permitted to enter for a specific purpose or in specific circumstances, and did he or she in fact enter for a different purpose, or in different circumstances?

If Yes, then go to 2.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary

2.3 Did the accused know or believe it was probable either that he or she had no right to enter the [part of the] building or that he or she was entering in circumstances that were not permitted by his or her right or authority to enter?

If Yes, then go to 3

If no, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary

The Accused Intended to Steal

3. At the time of entry, did the accused intend to steal property from within the [part of the] building?

3.1 Did the accused intend to appropriate property that belonged to another person?

Consider – Did the accused intend to take something without the owner's consent?

If Yes, then go to 3.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary

3.2 Did the accused intend to permanently deprive another person of that property?

If Yes, then go to 3.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary

3.3 Did the accused believe that s/he had a legal right to take the property?

If No, then the accused is guilty of Burglary

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary (as long as you answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3.1 & 3.2)

The Accused Intended to Assault a Person Inside the Building

3. At the time of entry, did the accused intend to assault a person in the [part of the] building?

3.1 Did the accused intend to apply force to the body of a person in the building?

If No, then go to 3.2

If Yes, then go to 3.3

3.2 Did the accused intend to act in a way that would cause a person in the building to apprehend the immediate application of force to his or her body?

If Yes, then go to 3.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary

3.3 Did the accused have a lawful justification to act in this way?

If No, then the accused is guilty of Burglary (as long as you answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3.1 & 3.2)

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary

Last updated: 22 May 2009

7.5.5 Aggravated Burglary

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. Aggravated burglary is an offence under the Crimes Act 1958 s 77.
2. The offence can be committed in two alternative ways:
   - aggravated burglary while armed (s 77(1)(a)); or
   - aggravated burglary where a person was present (s 77(1)(b)).

   These are addressed in turn below.

Aggravated burglary while armed

3. Aggravated burglary while armed has the following two elements:

   i) the accused committed burglary; and

   ii) at that time the accused had a firearm, imitation firearm, offensive weapon, explosive or imitation explosive with him or her.

The accused committed burglary

4. The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed burglary (Crimes Act 1958 s 77(1)(a)).
5. The accused will have committed burglary if he or she:

   (a) entered a building (or part of a building); and

   (b) did so as a trespasser; and

   (c) intended to:

   i) steal something from the building or part in question; or

   ii) commit an offence punishable by imprisonment for a term of five years or more involving either:

   (a) an assault to a person in the building or part in question; or

   (b) damage to the building or to property in the location (Crimes Act 1958 s 76).

6. See 7.5.4 Burglary for further information concerning each of these requirements.

The accused was armed

7. The second element that the prosecution must prove (if it is alleged that the accused committed aggravated burglary while armed) is that, at the time the accused committed the burglary, he or she had one of the following five articles with him or her:

    i) a firearm;

    ii) an imitation firearm;

    iii) an offensive weapon;

    iv) an explosive; or

    v) an imitation explosive (Crimes Act 1958 s 77(1A)).

Specified articles

Firearms

8. The term "firearm" is defined to have the same meaning as provided in section 3 of the Firearms Act 1996 (Crimes Act 1958 s 77(1A)).

9. That provision defines firearms broadly to include devices that are:

    - designed or adapted to discharge shot, bullets or other missiles
    - by the expansion of gases or by compressed gas (Firearms Act 1996 s 3 "firearm"(a)).

10. It does not matter whether the device is assembled or disassembled, complete or incomplete, operable or inoperable (Firearms Act 1996 s 3 "firearm").

11. The definition of "firearm" excludes:

    - certain specified industrial tools (Firearms Act 1996 s 3 "firearm" (c), (d), (h));
    - underwater spear guns (Firearms Act 1996 s 3 "firearm" (e));
    - signal flare devices and line throwers (Firearms Act 1996 s 3 "firearm" (f), (i)); and
    - devices of a prescribed class (Firearms Act 1996 s 3 "firearm" (j)). These currently include certain cannons or field guns, nets for catching animals, and devices mounted to model warships (see Firearms Regulations 2008 s 20).[932]

Imitation firearms

12. An "imitation firearm" is anything which has the appearance of being a firearm, whether or not it is capable of being discharged (Crimes Act 1958 s 77(1A)).

13. As the definition of "firearm" in section 3 of the Firearms Act 1996 extends to devices which "have the appearance of" a firearm, the definitions of "firearm" and "imitation firearm" overlap.

Offensive weapons

14. An "offensive weapon" is any article which:

    - is made for causing injury or incapacitation to a person; or
    - is adapted for the use of causing injury or incapacitation to a person; or
    - the accused threatens to use for the purpose of causing injury or incapacitation to a person; or

---

[932] While these articles will not be firearms, they may still be "offensive weapons" for the purposes of this offence.

- the accused intends to use for the purpose of causing injury or incapacitation to a person (Crimes Act 1958 s 77(1A)).

15. Where the accused is charged with aggravated burglary as a secondary party and the accused does not have the article in question, the fourth limb of the definition likely requires proof that the accused intended that the co-offender would use the article for the purpose of causing injury or incapacitation, or was aware that it was probable that the co-offender would use the article for that purpose (see Crimes Act 1958 s 323(1) and Kargar v R [2018] VSCA 148, [42]).

Articles made for causing injury or incapacitation

16. An article is "made for use" in causing injury or incapacitation to a person if it is normally used only for that purpose (Wilson v Kuhl [1979] VR 315).

17. Examples of this kind of article include knuckle dusters and sawn-off shotguns. Carving knives and walking sticks are not articles of this kind (Wilson v Kuhl [1979] VR 315).

18. Articles that fall within this category will be offensive weapons regardless of how the accused intends to use them (Wilson v Kuhl [1979] VR 315).

Articles adapted for the use of causing injury of incapacitation

19. An otherwise inoffensive article is "adapted" for the use of causing injury or incapacitation if it is physically modified to transform it into a dangerous or threatening object (R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551).

20. A glass bottle may therefore become an offensive weapon if it is smashed to produce jagged edges (R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551).

21. An article will not be "adapted" into an "offensive weapon" merely by being handled or presented aggressively. It must undergo some kind of physical transformation (R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551).[933]

Articles the accused intends or threatens to use to cause injury or incapacitation

22. An unmodified and otherwise inoffensive article may become an "offensive weapon" if it is carried (or kept available) by a person who intends or threatens to use it to injure or incapacitate (Crimes Act 1958 s 77(1A); Wilson v Kuhl [1979] VR 315; R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551).

23. Kitchen knives, walking sticks and silk stockings carried with aggressive intent are examples of articles that fall into this category (Wilson v Kuhl [1979] VR 315; R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551).

24. An item as innocuous as a half-full plastic drink bottle, when wielded in a manner capable of causing injury, can also fall into this category (R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551).

25. It is not necessary to prove that the accused's original intention in carrying the article was to use it offensively. It is sufficient if the prosecution can prove that the accused had that intention at the time of the burglary (R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551).

26. An accused's threat to use an article to cause injury or incapacitation will not qualify the article as an offensive weapon if the victim knows the threat is fanciful (R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551).

Explosives and imitation explosives

27. An "explosive" is any article that is:

    - manufactured for the purpose of producing a practical effect by explosion; or
    - which the accused intends to have that purpose (Crimes Act 1958 s 77(1A)).

28. An "imitation explosive" is any article which might reasonably be taken to be, or to contain, an explosive (Crimes Act 1958 s 77(1A)).

---

[933] However, a mundane item that is handled aggressively may be an "offensive weapon" due to its intended or threatened use (see below).

The accused had the article "with" him or her

29. For this element to be met, the accused must have had one of the specified articles "with" him or her at the time of the burglary (Crimes Act 1958 s 77(1)(a)).

30. A person will have had the article "with" him or her if, at the time of the burglary, he or she had the article either on his or her person, or readily available for use (R v Hartwick (1985) 17 A Crim R 281).

31. This element will only be met if the accused knew that he or she had the article with him or her, or available for use (R v Kolb & Adams 14/12/1979 CCA Vic; R v Cugullere [1961] 1 WLR 858).

32. A person does not have an article "with" him or her if it is possessed in such a way that it cannot be used (e.g. if it is concealed on his or her person in a sealed package)(R v Kolb & Adams 14/12/1979 CCA Vic; R v Pawlicki [1992] 3 All ER 902).

33. However, an instrument may be "used" by doing no more than drawing attention to its existence (R v Kolb & Adams 14/12/1979 CCA Vic).

34. The ordinary principles of criminal complicity apply to this offence. This means that this element will be met if an accomplice, acting in concert with the accused, had the article "with" him or her (R v Hartwick (1985) 17 A Crim R 281; R v Khammash (2004) 89 SASR 488). See Part 5: Complicity for further information about the principles of criminal complicity.

Possession must be for the purpose of the burglary

35. In relation to the offence of armed robbery (Crimes Act 1958 s 75A), the expression "has with him" has been held to create an implied requirement that the accused possessed the article for the purpose of the robbery (R v Kolb & Adams 14/12/1979 CCA Vic. See 7.5.3 Armed Robbery).

36. It is likely that the interpretation of the phrase "has with him" in s 75A will guide the interpretation of this phrase in its use in s 77. However, this conclusion is not wholly certain (R v Munro [2006] VSCA 94; DPP v Woodward [2006] VSC 299]).

37. If the phrase "has with him" is interpreted in the same way for s 77 as for s 75A, it will create an implied requirement that the accused possessed the article for the purpose of the burglary.

38. It is likely that the "purposes" of burglary will be determined by reference to the elements of the offence of burglary. They are therefore unlikely to be the same as the purposes of robbery discussed in 7.5.3 Armed Robbery.

39. It is likely that the "purposes" of burglary will vary according to the secondary offence that the accused is alleged to have intended to commit. This means that:

    - where it is alleged that the accused trespassed with intent to commit theft, this aspect of the element will be met if the accused possessed the item intending to use it to steal;
    - where it is alleged that the accused trespassed with intent to assault, this aspect of the element will be met if the accused possessed the item intending to use it to assault a person;
    - where it is alleged that the accused trespassed with intent to damage property, this aspect of the element will be met if the accused possessed the item intending to use it to damage property.

40. The accused will have possessed an article for the purpose of the burglary if s/he intended to use it for that purpose, even if it was not actually used (R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551).

41. It is the accused's purpose or intention at the time of the entry that matters:

    - it does not matter what his or her intent was when s/he originally equipped him/herself with the article;
    - it is not sufficient if the accused formed the relevant intent after entering the building or relevant part of the building (R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551; R v Munro [2006] VSCA 94).

Aggravated burglary where a person was present

42. Aggravated burglary where a person was present has the following three elements:

    i) the accused committed burglary; and

    ii) a person was then present in the building or part of the building; and

    iii) the accused knew that a person was then so present, or was reckless as to whether or not a person was then so present (Crimes Act 1958 s 77).

The accused committed burglary

43. The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed burglary (Crimes Act 1958 s 77).

44. See above for a brief outline of the elements of burglary. See 7.5.4 Burglary for more information concerning each of these elements.

A person was present

45. The second element that the prosecution must prove (to prove this form of the offence) is that a person was present in the building or relevant part of the building at the time of the burglary (Crimes Act 1958 s 77(1)(b)).

The accused's mental state

46. The third element the prosecution must prove (to prove this form of the offence) is that, at the time of the burglary, the accused either:

    - knew that a person was present in the building or unauthorised part of the building; or
    - was reckless as to whether or not a person was present in the building or unauthorised part of the building (Crimes Act 1958 s 77(1)(b)).

47. An accused is reckless about whether or not a person is present in a location if s/he believes that a person is probably present (See R v Verde [2009] VSCA 16, [21]. See also R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641; DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2021] HCA 26; DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2020] VSCA 181; R v Kalajdic [2005] VSCA 160, [30]–[31]).

48. It is not sufficient that the accused knew that it was possible that a person was present in the building or unauthorised part of the building at the time of the burglary (See R v Verde [2009] VSCA 16, [21]; R v Kalajdic [2005] VSCA 160, [30]–[31]; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641).

49. Satisfaction of this element may depend on the way in which the presentment is framed. For example:

    - if it is alleged in the presentment that the accused entered the house as a trespasser, it will be necessary for the prosecution to prove that s/he had the requisite mental state when s/he initially entered the house.
    - if it is alleged in the presentment that the accused entered a particular room in the house as a trespasser, the prosecution does not need to prove that the accused knew a person was present when initially entering the house, or was reckless as to their presence. Instead, they only need to prove that the accused had the requisite mental state when entering that room (R v Chimirri [2010] VSCA 57).

Agreement about basis of culpability

50. In some cases the prosecution may seek to prove aggravated burglary by presenting both forms of aggravation in the alternative. The prosecution is likely to do this by alleging the two forms of aggravation in the one count, relying upon Crimes Act 1958 Schedule 6 Rule 5.[934]

51. The alternative elements for the two forms of aggravated burglary are proven by evidence of substantially different facts. They do not present a case where the jury verdict depends on different assessments of the same facts. It is therefore relatively clear that these offences should be treated as analogous to culpable driving rather than murder (R v Walsh (2002) 131 A Crim R 299).

52. It follows that where the jury are asked to consider more than one basis of culpability for aggravated burglary, they must agree on the mode of culpability before they can find the accused guilty. It is not just the ultimate verdict that the jury must agree upon, but the form of offence which has been committed (e.g. aggravated burglary "while armed" or aggravated burglary "where a person was present") (R v Beach (1994) 75 A Crim R 447; R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26; R v Secombe [2010] VSCA 58).

53. The jury should give a single verdict, and they should not be asked to identify the basis of their verdict (R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26).

54. See Unanimous and Majority Verdicts for further information about this issue.

Last updated: 27 October 2022

7.5.5.1 Charge: Aggravated Burglary while Armed (Short)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge may be used where it is alleged that the accused was armed with a firearm, imitation firearm, offensive weapon, explosive, or imitation explosive at the time of the burglary.

This abbreviated charge should only be used where the sole defence relied upon by the accused, or raised by the evidence, is that the accused was not the offender.[935]

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of aggravated burglary. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following four elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused entered [part of] a building.

Two – the accused did so as a trespasser.

Three – when s/he entered the [relevant part of the] building, the accused intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault", "criminal damage"].

Four – the accused had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her when s/he entered the [relevant part of the] building.

---

[934] However it is not unlawful to allege the alternative forms of culpability in separate counts. See R v Davidson; R v Konestabo [2008] VSCA 188.

[935] Abbreviated charges should normally be discussed with counsel before being used. Caution should be exercised before using this charge over the objection of counsel.

Facts in Issue

In this case the defence did not contest the evidence that someone [summarise evidence of aggravated burglary]. They agreed that you should be satisfied these events occurred, and that the person who was responsible for them is guilty of aggravated burglary.[936] However, they denied that NOA was the person who acted in that way.[937]

Consequently, the only issue for your consideration [on this count] is whether or not the prosecution have proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was the person who [describe alleged conduct]. If you are satisfied that it was NOA who did those acts, you should have no difficulty finding all four elements of this offence to have been proven.

The evidence was [describe evidence relevant to identification]. Counsel argued [describe arguments relevant to identification].

[If not done elsewhere, include directions and warnings about identification evidence*. See* 4.12 Identification Evidence and 4.12.1 Charges: Identification Evidence for assistance.]

Summary

To summarise, you have only one issue to decide in respect of this count. That issue is, have the prosecution proven beyond reasonable doubt that NOA was the person who [describe alleged conduct].

If you are satisfied that they have, then you should have no difficulty finding all the elements of this offence proven. In such circumstances you should find NOA guilty of aggravated burglary.

However, if you are not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that it was NOA who [describe alleged conduct], you must find him/her not guilty of aggravated burglary.

Last updated: 13 February 2013

7.5.5.2 Charge: Aggravated Burglary while Armed

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used where it is alleged that the accused was armed with a firearm, imitation firearm, offensive weapon, explosive, or imitation explosive at the time of the burglary.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of aggravated burglary. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused entered [part of] a building.

Two – the accused did so as a trespasser.

Three – when s/he entered the [part of the] building, the accused intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault", "criminal damage"].

Four – the accused had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her when s/he entered the [part of the] building.

---

[936] If this concession has not been made, care should be taken before abbreviating the charge in this way.

[937] This charge will need to be adapted if it is alleged that the accused was guilty on the basis of some form of accessorial liability. See Part 5: Complicity.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[938]

The accused entered a building or part of a building

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered [part of] a building.

In this case the [part of the] building it is alleged that NOA entered is [identify relevant building or part of the building].

[If the "building is an inhabited vehicle or vessel, add the following shaded section.]

While you may not think that a [identify relevant class of vehicle or vessel, e.g. "caravan", "trailer", "houseboat"] is a "building", for the purposes of this offence a vehicle or vessel is treated as a "building" if it was inhabited at the time of the offence.

A vehicle or vessel will have been "inhabited" at the time of the offence if a person was living in it at that time. No-one needs to have actually been present in the vehicle or vessel at the time of the burglary. This requirement will be satisfied as long as someone was living there, even if they were out when the burglary took place.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether NOA entered the [identify relevant building or part of the building]. It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he did, that this first element will be met.

The accused entered as a trespasser

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered the [part of the] building as a trespasser. For this element to be met, there are two things the prosecution must prove.

First, they must prove that NOA entered the [identify relevant building or part of the building] without any right or authority to enter. That is, that [part of the] building must have been "off-limits" to him/her.

[If it is alleged that the accused entered a prohibited part of a building, add the following shaded section.]

It is important to note that, in this case, the prosecution did not allege that the entire building was "off-limits" to NOA. They accepted that s/he was authorised to enter certain parts of the building, such as the [identify authorised parts of the building]. However, they argued that NOA was forbidden from entering the [identify prohibited part of the building]. That is, s/he had no right or authority to be there.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is for you to determine whether that part of the building really was "off-limits" to NOA. This part of the second element will only be satisfied if you find that it was.

[If it is alleged that the accused had limited authority to enter, but exceeded that authority, add the following shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution did not deny that NOA had some authority to enter [identify building or relevant part of building]. However, they argued that s/he only had authority to enter [that part of] the building if s/he complied with certain conditions, such as [identify alleged conditions.]

[938] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be explained briefly, and followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meet the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

The prosecution alleged that when NOA entered the [part of the] building s/he was not complying with these conditions, and so had no right or authority to enter. She was therefore trespassing.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is for you to determine if NOA's authority to enter [identify building or relevant part of building] was subject to any conditions. In making this determination you can consider everything that was said and done by the parties, and also the way that people generally conduct themselves. However, you cannot assume that certain conditions were imposed just because those limits would have been imposed if the issue had been raised. You must be satisfied that those conditions actually were imposed.

If you find that NOA's authority to enter the [identify building or relevant part of building] was not subject to any conditions, then the second element will not be met. In such circumstances, the accused will have had unlimited authority to enter the [part of the] building, and so cannot have been trespassing, no matter what s/he intended to do. Even if s/he entered with some undesirable purpose in mind, s/he still had a right to enter.

If you find that NOA's authority to enter was subject to certain conditions, you must then determine whether or not, when s/he entered the [part of the] building, s/he was complying with those conditions. If s/he was, then s/he will not have been trespassing. That is, s/he will have had a right or authority to enter that [part of the] building.

However, if s/he was not complying with those conditions, then s/he will have had no right or authority to enter the building, and this part of the second element will be met.

To summarise, this part of the second element will only be met if you are satisfied that NOA was only authorised to enter [identify building or relevant part of building] if s/he complied with certain conditions, and you find that s/he did not comply with those conditions when s/he entered. If you are not satisfied of either of these matters beyond reasonable doubt, then this element will not be met.

The second matter that the prosecution must prove for the second element to be met is that the accused either knew that s/he had no right or authority to enter [identify building or relevant part of building], or s/he believed that it was probable that she had no such right or authority.

For this part of the second element to be satisfied, it is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that she had no right or authority to enter the [part of the] building. S/he must have at least known that this was probably the case.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA entered the [identify relevant building or part of the building] without any right or authority to enter, and that s/he knew that s/he had no right or authority to enter that [part of the] building, or at least knew that that was probably the case, that this second element will be met. If you are not satisfied about both of these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of aggravated burglary.

The accused intended to commit an offence

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that, when s/he entered the [part of the] building, the accused intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault", "criminal damage"].

[Where the relevant offence is theft, add the following shaded section.]

In order to do this, the prosecution must prove three things.[939]

First, they must prove that the accused intended to appropriate property that belonged to another person. In this case the word "appropriate" simply means to take something without the owner's consent.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that the accused intended to permanently deprive the owner of the property in question. That is, the accused must have intended that the owner would never get it back.

Thirdly, the prosecution must prove that when s/he entered the [part of the] building, the accused did not believe that s/he had a legal right to take the property in question.

[If further elaboration is necessary, include any relevant bullet points from the following list.]

- The prosecution does not need to prove that any property was in fact stolen. They only need to prove that the accused intended to steal.
- The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to steal any particular property. They only need to prove that s/he intended to steal property of some kind from inside the building.
- This element will be met if the prosecution can prove that, although the accused did not know what s/he would find in the [part of the] building, s/he intended to steal anything of value that s/he might come across

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

[Where the relevant offence is common assault, add the following shaded section.]

In order to do this the prosecution must prove two things.[940]

First, they must prove that the accused intended either to apply force to a person's body, or to act in a way that would cause a person to apprehend the immediate application of force to his or her body.[941]

[If further elaboration is necessary, include any relevant directions from the following bullet list.]

- [For application of force cases] It does not matter how much force the accused intended to apply. Nor does it matter whether or not that force would have harmed the person. An intention to merely touch someone is enough.
- [For application of force cases] It does not matter whether s/he would have actually been able to apply the force. It is sufficient for the accused to have intended to apply force.

[939] This charge is designed for use in cases where this element raises only simple issues. If more complex issues arise, the charge should be expanded accordingly. Guidance can be obtained from 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended).

[940] This charge is designed for use in cases where this element raises only simple issues. If more complex issues arise, the charge should be expanded accordingly. Guidance can be obtained from 7.4.8.1 Charge: Assault – Application of Force or 7.4.8.3 Charge: Assault – No Application of Force.

[941] If the prosecution relies on only one basis of culpability, directions on the alternative basis should be omitted.

- [For apprehension cases] S/he does not need to have intended to actually apply such force. The accused only needs to have intended to cause someone to apprehend that force would be applied.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that the accused intended to act in this way in circumstances in which there was no lawful justification or excuse for his/her conduct.

[Possible forms of lawful justification or excuse include consent, self-defence, arrest, the lawful correction of children and ordinary social activity. For guidance on directions for these matters see 7.4.8 Common Law Assault.]

[If no lawful justifications or excuses are open on the evidence, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case, it has not been suggested that there was a lawful justification or excuse for the accused's alleged actions. You should therefore have no difficulty finding that, if NOA intended to [apply force to a person's body/act in a way that would cause a person to apprehend the immediate application of force to his or her body], that was done without lawful justification or excuse.

[If any lawful justifications or excuses are open on the evidence, give appropriate directions incorporating reference to the evidence and arguments relevant to the justification or excuse, and concluding with the darker shaded section.]

Remember, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused's behaviour was without lawful [justification/excuse]. The defence does not need to prove that NOA had such a [justification/excuse].

The accused must have had the relevant intention at the time s/he entered the [part of the] building. If you accept that it is reasonably possible that NOA only formed that intention after entering the [part of the] building, then this element will not be satisfied.

The accused was armed

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her at the time of entering the [part of the] building.

For this element to be met, there are three things that the prosecution must prove.

First, they must prove that, at the time of entering the [part of the] building, NOA had [identify item] either on him/her or readily available for use.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that [identify item] falls within the category of [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive].

[Where there is a dispute about whether the article possessed was a firearm, add relevant parts of the following shaded section.]

The law defines a "firearm" to be any device which is designed or adapted to discharge bullets or other missiles, either by the expansion of gases produced in the device by the ignition of strongly combustible materials, or by compressed air or other gases. The definition of "firearm" also includes anything which looks like such a device.

However, certain things are excluded from the definition of a "firearm". These include [identify relevant exception, e.g. "underwater spear guns"].

To be a "firearm", the device does not need to be assembled, complete or operational. If it fits the definition I have just given you, it will be a "firearm", whether or not it actually works.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an imitation firearm with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

An "imitation firearm" is anything which has the appearance of being a firearm, whether or not it is capable of being shot.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an offensive weapon with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

The law defines two different kinds of items as "offensive weapons". First, an item is an offensive weapon if it is specifically made or adapted for the use of injuring or incapacitating a person. Secondly, an ordinarily inoffensive item that does not meet this criterion can also become an "offensive weapon" if the person carrying it intends or threatens to use it to injure or incapacitate a person.

[If it is alleged that the relevant article was made for the use of injuring or incapacitating a person, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution argued that the [identify item] is an "offensive weapon" because it is made for injuring or incapacitating people. That is, it is an item that is normally used for this purpose.

[If it is alleged that the relevant article was adapted for the use of injuring or incapacitating a person, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution argued that the [identify item] was an "offensive weapon" because it was adapted for the use of injuring or incapacitating people. That is, it was physically modified so that it could cause injury or incapacitate a person.

[If it is alleged that an ordinary article became an offensive weapon because of the accused's use, threats or intention, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution argued that the [identify item] was an "offensive weapon" because NOA [used/threatened to use/intended to use] it for the purpose of injuring or incapacitating a person.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an explosive with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

An "explosive" is any item which is manufactured for the purpose of producing a practical effect by explosion, or which is intended to have that purpose. Any item that fits this definition will be an "explosive", whether or not it actually works.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an imitation explosive with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

An "imitation explosive" is any item which might reasonably be taken to be, or to contain, an explosive.

Thirdly, the prosecution must prove that the accused had the [identify item] with him/her for the purpose of the burglary. This will be the case if NOA had the [identify item] with him/her for the purpose of [stealing property from within the [part of the] building/assaulting a person within the [part of the] building/causing criminal damage within the building].

In determining this matter you should focus on NOA's intention at the time s/he entered the [part of] the building. It does not matter what his/her intention was at the time s/he first handled the [identify item].

In this case the prosecution argued that all three of these requirements have been met. [Describe prosecution evidence and/or arguments.]

The defence [describe defence case [if any] in respect of this element, e.g.

- denied that NOA had a gun with him/her at the time of the burglary;
- denied that the bottle was an offensive weapon;
- denied that NOA had the knife with him/her for the purpose of the burglary].

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether all three of these matters have been proved beyond reasonable doubt. It is only if you are satisfied that NOA had [identify item] with him/her at the time of the entry, that [identify item] was a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive], and that NOA had that item with him/her for the purposes of the burglary that this element will be met.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of aggravated burglary, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA entered [part of] a building; and

Two – that NOA did so as a trespasser. That is:

- S/he entered the [part of the] building without any right or authority to enter; and
- S/he knew that s/he had no right or authority to enter that [part of the] building, or at least knew that that was probably the case; and

Three – that at that time NOA intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault", "criminal damage"]; and

Four – that NOA had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her at the time of the entry. That is:

- When s/he entered the [part of the] building, s/he had a [identify item] on him/her or readily available; and
- That a [identify item] falls within the category of a [identify category]; and
- That NOA had the [identify item] with him/her for the purpose of the burglary.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of aggravated burglary.

Burglary

I must also direct you about the crime of burglary. This is an alternative to the crime of aggravated burglary. That means you only need to return a verdict on the crime of burglary if you were not satisfied that the prosecution have proved all the elements of aggravated burglary beyond reasonable doubt. If you decide that NOA is guilty of aggravated burglary, then you do not need to return a verdict on this alternative.

The offence of burglary is very similar to the offence of aggravated burglary, with one important difference: the accused does not need to have had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her when s/he entered the [part of] the building.

In other words, if you are satisfied that the prosecution have proved the first three elements I just described beyond reasonable doubt, but are not satisfied that they have proved element four, then you should find the accused guilty of burglary. However, if you find that any of the first three elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must also find the accused not guilty of burglary.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

7.5.5.3 Checklist: Aggravated Burglary while Armed

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist includes two possible third elements. Judges must omit or adapt this checklist depending on how the prosecution seeks to prove the third element.

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused entered [part of] a building; and
2. The accused did so as a trespasser; and
3. At the time of entry the accused intended to commit the offence of [theft/common assault/criminal damage etc.] within the [part of the] building; and
4. The accused had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her at the time of entering the [part of the] building.

Entry into [part of] a building

1. Did the accused enter the [part of the] building?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

Entry as a trespasser

2. Did the accused enter as a trespasser?

2.1 Did the accused have a right or authority to enter the [part of the] building?

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then go to 2.3

2.2 Did the accused enter the [part of the] building in circumstances that were not permitted by his or her right or authority to enter?

Consider – Was the accused only permitted to enter for a specific purpose or in specific circumstances, and did he or she in fact enter for a different purpose, or in different circumstances?

If Yes, then go to 2.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

2.3 Did the accused know or believe it was probable either that he or she had no right to enter the [part of the] building or that he or she was entering in circumstances that were not permitted by his or her right or authority to enter?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

The Accused Intended to Steal

3. At the time of entry, did the accused intend to steal property from within the [part of the] building?

3.1 Did the accused intend to appropriate property that belonged to another person?

Consider – Did the accused intend to take something without the owner's consent?

If Yes, then go to 3.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

3.2 Did the accused intend to permanently deprive another person of that property?

If Yes, then go to 3.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

3.3 Did the accused believe that s/he had a legal right to take the property?

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

If No, then go to 4

The Accused Intended to Assault a Person Inside the Building

3. At the time of entry, did the accused intend to assault a person in the [part of the] building?

3.1 Did the accused intend to apply force to the body of a person in the building?

If Yes, then go to 3.3

If No, then go to 3.2

3.2 Did the accused intend to act in a way that would cause a person in the building to apprehend the immediate application of force to his or her body?

If Yes, then go to 3.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

3.3 Did the accused have a lawful justification to act in this way?

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

If No, then go to 4.

The Accused was Armed

4. Did the accused have a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her at the time of the entry?

4.1 Did the accused have this item either on him/her or readily available for use?

If Yes, then go to 4.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Aggravated Burglary, but guilty of Burglary (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 to 3)

4.2 Was the item a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive]?

If Yes, then go to 4.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Aggravated Burglary, but guilty of Burglary (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 to 3)

4.3 Did the accused have this item with him/her for the purpose of the burglary?

Consider – Did the accused intend to use the item for the purpose of [stealing property from/assaulting a person within] the [part of the] building?

If Yes, the accused is guilty of Aggravated Burglary

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Aggravated Burglary, but guilty of Burglary (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 to 3)

Last updated: 22 May 2009

7.5.5.4 Charge: Aggravated Burglary where Person Present (Short)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge may be used where it is alleged that the accused burgled a building where a person was present.

This abbreviated charge should only be used where the sole defence relied upon by the accused, or raised by the evidence, is that the accused was not the offender.[942]

[942] Abbreviated charges should normally be discussed with counsel before being used. Caution should be exercised before using this charge over the objection of counsel.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of aggravated burglary. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused entered [part of] a building.

Two – that the accused did so as a trespasser.

Three – when s/he entered the [part of the] building, the accused intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault", "criminal damage"].

Four – when the accused entered the [part of the] building a person was present in that [building/location].

Five – when s/he entered the [part of the] building the accused knew that a person was then present in that [part of the] building, or was reckless as to whether or not a person was then so present.

Facts in Issue

In this case the defence did not contest the evidence that someone [summarise evidence of aggravated burglary]. They agreed that you should be satisfied these events occurred, and that the person who was responsible for them is guilty of aggravated burglary.[943] However, they denied that NOA was the person who acted in that way.[944]

Consequently, the only issue for your consideration [on this count] is whether or not the prosecution have proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was the person who [describe alleged conduct]. If you are satisfied that it was NOA who did those acts, you should have no difficulty finding all five elements of this offence to have been proven.

The evidence was [describe evidence relevant to identification]. Counsel argued [describe arguments relevant to identification].

[If not done elsewhere, include directions and warnings about identification evidence*. See* 4.12 Identification Evidence for assistance.]

Summary

To summarise, you have only one issue to decide in respect of this count. That issue is, have the prosecution proven beyond reasonable doubt that NOA was the person who [describe alleged conduct].

If you are satisfied that they have, then you should have no difficulty finding all the elements of this offence proven. In such circumstances you should find NOA guilty of aggravated burglary.

However, if you are not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that it was NOA who [describe alleged conduct], you must find him/her not guilty of aggravated burglary.

Last updated: 13 February 2013

7.5.5.5 Charge: Aggravated Burglary where Person Present

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

---

[943] If this concession has not been made, care should be taken before abbreviating the charge in this way.

[944] This charge will need to be adapted if it is alleged that the accused was guilty on the basis of some form of accessorial liability. See Part 5: Complicity.

This charge should be used where it is alleged that the accused burgled a building where a person was present.

If it is alleged that the accused was armed with a firearm, imitation firearm, offensive weapon, explosive, or imitation explosive, use 7.5.5.2 Charge: Aggravated Burglary while Armed instead.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of aggravated burglary. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused entered [part of] a building.

Two – the accused did so as a trespasser.

Three – when s/he entered the [part of the] building, the accused intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault", "criminal damage"].

Four – when the accused entered the [part of the] building a person was present in that [building/location].

Five – when s/he entered the [part of the] building the accused knew that a person was then present in that [part of the] building, or was reckless as to whether or not a person was then so present.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[945]

The accused entered a building or part of a building

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered [part of] a building.

In this case the [part of the] building it is alleged that NOA entered is [identify relevant building or part of the building].

[If the "building" is an inhabited vehicle or vessel, add the following shaded section.]

While you may not think that a [identify relevant class of vehicle or vessel, e.g. "caravan", "trailer", "houseboat"] is a "building", for the purposes of this offence a vehicle or vessel is treated as a "building" if it was inhabited at the time of the offence.

A vehicle or vessel will have been "inhabited" at the time of the offence if a person was living in it at that time. No-one needs to have actually been present in the vehicle or vessel at the time of the burglary. This requirement will be satisfied as long as someone was living there, even if they were out when the burglary took place.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether NOA entered the [identify relevant building or part of the building]. It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he did, that this first element will be met.

[945] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be explained briefly, and followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meet the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

The accused entered as a trespasser

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered the [part of the] building as a trespasser. For this element to be met, there are two things the prosecution must prove.

First, they must prove that NOA entered the [identify relevant building or part of the building] without any right or authority to enter. That is, that [part of the] building must have been "off-limits" to him/her.

[If it is alleged that the accused entered a prohibited part of a building, add the following shaded section.]

It is important to note that, in this case, the prosecution did not allege that the entire building was "off-limits" to NOA. They accepted that s/he was authorised to enter certain parts of the building, such as the [identify authorised parts of the building]. However, they argued that NOA was forbidden from entering the [identify prohibited part of the building]. That is, s/he had no right or authority to be there.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is for you to determine whether that part of the building really was "off-limits" to NOA. This part of the second element will only be satisfied if you find that it was.

[If it is alleged that the accused had limited authority to enter, but exceeded that authority, add the following shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution did not deny that NOA had some authority to enter [identify building or relevant part of building]. However, they argued that s/he only had authority to enter [that part of] the building if s/he complied with certain conditions, such as [identify alleged conditions.]

The prosecution alleged that when NOA entered the [part of the] building s/he was not complying with these conditions, and so had no right or authority to enter. She was therefore trespassing.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is for you to determine if NOA's authority to enter [identify building or relevant part of building] was subject to any conditions. In making this determination you can consider everything that was said and done by the parties, and also the way that people generally conduct themselves. However, you cannot assume that certain conditions were imposed just because those limits would have been imposed if the issue had been raised. You must be satisfied that those conditions actually were imposed.

If you find that NOA's authority to enter the [identify building or relevant part of building] was not subject to any conditions, then the second element will not be met. In such circumstances, the accused will have had unlimited authority to enter the [part of the] building, and so cannot have been trespassing, no matter what s/he intended to do. Even if s/he entered with some undesirable purpose in mind, s/he still had a right to enter.

If you find that NOA's authority to enter was subject to certain conditions, you must then determine whether or not, when s/he entered the [part of the] building, s/he was complying with those conditions. If s/he was, then s/he will not have been trespassing. That is, s/he will have had a right or authority to enter that [part of the] building.

However, if s/he was not complying with those conditions, then s/he will have had no right or authority to enter the building, and this part of the second element will be met.

To summarise, this part of the second element will only be met if you are satisfied that NOA was only authorised to enter [identify building or relevant part of building] if s/he complied with certain conditions, and you find that s/he did not comply with those conditions when s/he entered. If you are not satisfied of either of these matters beyond reasonable doubt, then this element will not be met.

The second matter that the prosecution must prove for the second element to be met is that the accused either knew that s/he had no right or authority to enter [identify building or relevant part of building], or s/he believed that it was probable that she had no such right or authority.

For this part of the second element to be satisfied, it is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that she had no right or authority to enter the [part of the] building. S/he must have at least known that this was probably the case.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA entered the [identify relevant building or part of the building] without any right or authority to enter, and that s/he knew that s/he had no right or authority to enter that [part of the] building, or at least knew that that was probably the case, that this second element will be met. If you are not satisfied about both of these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of aggravated burglary.

The accused intended to commit an offence

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that, when s/he entered the [part of the] building, the accused intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault", "criminal damage"].

[Where the relevant offence is theft, add the following shaded section.]

In order to do this, the prosecution must prove three things.[946]

First, they must prove that the accused intended to appropriate property that belonged to another person. In this case the word "appropriate" simply means to take something without the owner's consent.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that the accused intended to permanently deprive the owner of the property in question. That is, the accused must have intended that the owner would never get it back.

Thirdly, the prosecution must prove that when s/he entered the [part of the] building, the accused did not believe that s/he had a legal right to take the property in question.

[If further elaboration is necessary, include any relevant bullet points from the following list.]

- The prosecution does not need to prove that any property was in fact stolen. They only need to prove that the accused intended to steal.
- The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to steal any particular property. They only need to prove that s/he intended to steal property of some kind from inside the building.
- This element will be met if the prosecution can prove that, although the accused did not know what s/he would find in the [part of the] building, s/he intended to steal anything of value that s/he might come across.

[946] This charge is designed for use in cases where this element raises only simple issues. If more complex issues arise, the charge should be expanded accordingly. Guidance can be obtained from 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended).

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

[Where the relevant offence is common assault, add the following shaded section.]

In order to do this the prosecution must prove two things.[947]

First, they must prove that the accused intended either to apply force to a person's body, or to act in a way that would cause a person to apprehend the immediate application of force to his or her body.[948]

[If further elaboration is necessary, include any relevant directions from the following bullet list.]

- [For application of force cases] It does not matter how much force the accused intended to apply. Nor does it matter whether or not that force would have harmed the person. An intention to merely touch someone is enough.
- [For application of force cases] It does not matter whether s/he would have actually been able to apply the force. It is sufficient for the accused to have intended to apply force.
- [For apprehension cases] S/he does not need to have intended to actually apply such force. The accused only needs to have intended to cause someone to apprehend that force would be applied.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that the accused intended to act in this way in circumstances in which there was no lawful justification or excuse for his/her conduct.

[Possible forms of lawful justification or excuse include consent, self-defence, arrest, the lawful correction of children and ordinary social activity. For guidance on directions for these matters see 7.4.8 Common Law Assault.]

If no lawful justifications or excuses are open on the evidence, add the following darker shaded text

In this case, it has not been suggested that there was a lawful justification or excuse for the accused's alleged actions. You should therefore have no difficulty finding that, if NOA intended to [apply force to a person's body/act in a way that would cause a person to apprehend the immediate application of force to his or her body], that was done without lawful justification or excuse.

[If any lawful justification or excuse is open on the evidence, give appropriate directions incorporating reference to the evidence and arguments relevant to the justification or excuse, and concluding with the following darker shaded section:]

Remember, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused's behaviour was without lawful [justification/excuse]. The defence does not need to prove that NOA had such a [justification/excuse].

The accused must have had the relevant intention at the time s/he entered the [part of the] building. If you accept that it is reasonably possible that NOA only formed that intention after entering the [part of the] building, then this element will not be satisfied.

---

[947] This charge is designed for use in cases where this element raises only simple issues. If more complex issues arise, the charge should be expanded accordingly. Guidance can be obtained from 7.4.8.1 Charge: Assault – Application of Force or 7.4.8.3 Charge: Assault – No Application of Force.

[948] If the prosecution relies on only one basis of culpability, directions on the alternative basis should be omitted.

A person was present

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that when the accused entered the [part of the] building a person was present in that [building/location].

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

The accused's mental state

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that when s/he entered the [part of the] building the accused knew that a person was then present in that [part of the] building, or was reckless as to whether or not a person was then so present.

The law says that an accused will have been reckless in this way if s/he believed at the time of his/her entry, that another person was probably present in that [building/location].

It is not sufficient for the prosecution to prove that NOA believed that it was possible that a person was present. They must prove that s/he believed that this was probably the case.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of aggravated burglary, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA entered [part of] a building; and

Two – that NOA did so as a trespasser. That is:

- S/he entered the [part of the] building without any right or authority to enter; and
- S/he knew that s/he had no right or authority to enter that [part of the] building, or at least knew that that was probably the case; and

Three – that at that time NOA intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault", "criminal damage"]; and

Four – that at that time a person was present in the [part of the] building; and

Five – that at that time the accused knew that a person was present in that [part of the] building, or was reckless as to whether or not a person was then so present.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of aggravated burglary.

Burglary

I must also direct you about the crime of burglary. This is an alternative to the crime of aggravated burglary. That means you only need to return a verdict on the crime of burglary if you were not satisfied that the prosecution have proved all the elements of aggravated burglary beyond reasonable doubt. If you decide that NOA is guilty of aggravated burglary, then you do not need to return a verdict on this alternative.

The offence of burglary is very similar to the offence of aggravated burglary, with two important differences: a person does not need to have been present at the time the accused entered the [part of the] building, and consequently the accused does not need to have had any knowledge about a person's presence at that location.

In other words, if you are satisfied that the prosecution have proved the first three elements I just described beyond reasonable doubt, but are not satisfied that they have proved either element four or five, then you should find the accused guilty of burglary. However, if you find that any of the first three elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must also find the accused not guilty of burglary.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

7.5.5.6 Checklist: Aggravated Burglary where Person Present

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist includes two possible third elements. Judges must omit or adapt this checklist depending on how the prosecution seeks to prove the third element.

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused entered [part of] a building; and
2. The accused did so as a trespasser; and
3. At the time of entry the accused intended to commit the offence of [theft/common assault/criminal damage etc.] within the [part of the] building; and
4. At the time of entry a person was present in that [part of the] building.
5. The accused knew that a person was present in that [part of the] building, or was reckless as to whether or not a person was present.

Entry into [part of] a building

1. Did the accused enter the [part of the] building?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

Entry as a trespasser

2. Did the accused enter as a trespasser?

2.1 Did the accused have a right or authority to enter the [part of the] building?

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then go to 2.3

2.2 Did the accused enter the [part of the] building in circumstances that were not permitted by his or her right or authority to enter?

Consider – Was the accused only permitted to enter for a specific purpose or in specific circumstances, and did he or she in fact enter for a different purpose, or in different circumstances?

If Yes, then go to 2.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

2.3 Did the accused know or believe it was probable either that he or she had no right to enter the [part of the] building or that he or she was entering in circumstances that were not permitted by his or her right or authority to enter?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

The Accused Intended to Steal

3. At the time of entry, did the accused intend to steal property from within the [part of the] building?

3.1 Did the accused intend to appropriate property that belonged to another person?

Consider – Did the accused intend to take something without the owner's consent?

If Yes, then go to 3.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

3.2 Did the accused intend to permanently deprive another person of that property?

If Yes, then go to 3.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

3.3 Did the accused believe that s/he had a legal right to take the property?

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

If No, then go to 4

The Accused Intended to Assault a Person Inside the Building

3. At the time of entry, did the accused intend to assault a person in the [part of the] building?

3.1 Did the accused intend to apply force to the body of a person in the building?

If Yes, then go to 3.3

If No, then go to 3.2

3.2 Did the accused intend to act in a way that would cause a person in the building to apprehend the immediate application of force to his or her body?

If Yes, then go to 3.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

3.3 Did the accused have a lawful justification to act in this way?

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

If No, then go to 4.

A Person was Present

4. Was a person present in the [part of the] building?

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Aggravated Burglary, but guilty of Burglary (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 to 3)

The Accused's State of Mind

5. Did the accused have the necessary state of mind about the person's presence?

5.1 Did the accused know that a person was present in the [part of the] building?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Aggravated Burglary (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 to 4)

If No, then go to 5.2

5.2 Was the accused reckless as to whether or not a person was present in the [part of the] building?

Consider – Did the accused believe it was probable that a person was present in the [part of the] building?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Aggravated Burglary (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 to 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Aggravated Burglary, but guilty of Burglary (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 to 3)

Last updated: 22 May 2009

7.5.5.7 Charge: Aggravated Burglary Combined Bases

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used where the prosecution alleges both that the accused was armed with a firearm, imitation firearm, offensive weapon, explosive, or imitation explosive at the time of the burglary and that the accused burgled a building where a person was present.

If the prosecution relies on only one of these bases, use either 7.5.5.2 Charge: Aggravated Burglary While Armed or 7.5.5.5 Charge: Aggravated Burglary Where Person Present instead.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of aggravated burglary. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused entered [part of] a building.

Two – the accused did so as a trespasser.

Three – when s/he entered the [part of the] building, the accused intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault", "criminal damage"].

Four – the accused entered the [part of the] building in aggravating circumstances.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[949]

The accused entered a building or part of a building

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered [part of] a building.

In this case the [part of the] building it is alleged that NOA entered is [identify relevant building or part of the building].

[If the "building" is an inhabited vehicle or vessel, add the following shaded section.]

While you may not think that a [identify relevant class of vehicle or vessel, e.g. "caravan", "trailer", "houseboat"] is a "building", for the purposes of this offence a vehicle or vessel is treated as a "building" if it was inhabited at the time of the offence.

A vehicle or vessel will have been "inhabited" at the time of the offence if a person was living in it at that time. No-one needs to have actually been present in the vehicle or vessel at the time of the burglary. This requirement will be satisfied as long as someone was living there, even if they were out when the burglary took place.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether NOA entered the [identify relevant building or part of the building]. It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he did, that this first element will be met.

The accused entered as a trespasser

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered the [part of the] building as a trespasser. For this element to be met, there are two things the prosecution must prove.

First, they must prove that NOA entered the [identify relevant building or part of the building] without any right or authority to enter. That is, that [part of the] building must have been "off-limits" to him/her.

[If it is alleged that the accused entered a prohibited part of a building, add the following shaded section.]

[949] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be explained briefly, and followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meet the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

It is important to note that, in this case, the prosecution did not allege that the entire building was "off-limits" to NOA. They accepted that s/he was authorised to enter certain parts of the building, such as the [identify authorised parts of the building]. However, they argued that NOA was forbidden from entering the [identify prohibited part of the building]. That is, s/he had no right or authority to be there.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is for you to determine whether that part of the building really was "off-limits" to NOA. This part of the second element will only be satisfied if you find that it was.

[If it is alleged that the accused had limited authority to enter, but exceeded that authority, add the following shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution did not deny that NOA had some authority to enter [identify building or relevant part of building]. However, they argued that s/he only had authority to enter [that part of] the building if s/he complied with certain conditions, such as [identify alleged conditions.]

The prosecution alleged that when NOA entered the [part of the] building s/he was not complying with these conditions, and so had no right or authority to enter. She was therefore trespassing.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is for you to determine if NOA's authority to enter [identify building or relevant part of building] was subject to any conditions. In making this determination you can consider everything that was said and done by the parties, and also the way that people generally conduct themselves. However, you cannot assume that certain conditions were imposed just because those limits would have been imposed if the issue had been raised. You must be satisfied that those conditions actually were imposed.

If you find that NOA's authority to enter the [identify building or relevant part of building] was not subject to any conditions, then the second element will not be met. In such circumstances, the accused will have had unlimited authority to enter the [part of the] building, and so cannot have been trespassing, no matter what s/he intended to do. Even if s/he entered with some undesirable purpose in mind, s/he still had a right to enter.

If you find that NOA's authority to enter was subject to certain conditions, you must then determine whether or not, when s/he entered the [part of the] building, s/he was complying with those conditions. If s/he was, then s/he will not have been trespassing. That is, s/he will have had a right or authority to enter that [part of the] building.

However, if s/he was not complying with those conditions, then s/he will have had no right or authority to enter the building, and this part of the second element will be met.

To summarise, this part of the second element will only be met if you are satisfied that NOA was only authorised to enter [identify building or relevant part of building] if s/he complied with certain conditions, and you find that s/he did not comply with those conditions when s/he entered. If you are not satisfied of either of these matters beyond reasonable doubt, then this element will not be met.

The second matter that the prosecution must prove for the second element to be met is that the accused either knew that s/he had no right or authority to enter [identify building or relevant part of building], or s/he believed that it was probable that she had no such right or authority.

For this part of the second element to be satisfied, it is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that she had no right or authority to enter the [part of the] building. S/he must have at least known that this was probably the case.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA entered the [identify relevant building or part of the building] without any right or authority to enter, and that s/he knew that s/he had no right or authority to enter that [part of the] building, or at least knew that that was probably the case, that this second element will be met. If you are not satisfied about both of these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of aggravated burglary.

The accused intended to commit an offence

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that, when s/he entered the [part of the] building, the accused intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault", "criminal damage"].

[Where the relevant offence is theft, add the following shaded section.]

In order to do this, the prosecution must prove three things.[950]

First, they must prove that the accused intended to appropriate property that belonged to another person. In this case the word "appropriate" simply means to take something without the owner's consent.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that the accused intended to permanently deprive the owner of the property in question. That is, the accused must have intended that the owner would never get it back.

Thirdly, the prosecution must prove that when s/he entered the [part of the] building, the accused did not believe that s/he had a legal right to take the property in question.

[If further elaboration is necessary, include any relevant bullet points from the following list.]

- The prosecution does not need to prove that any property was in fact stolen. They only need to prove that the accused intended to steal.
- The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to steal any particular property. They only need to prove that s/he intended to steal property of some kind from inside the building.
- This element will be met if the prosecution can prove that, although the accused did not know what s/he would find in the [part of the] building, s/he intended to steal anything of value that s/he might come across.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

[Where the relevant offence is common assault, add the following shaded section.]

In order to do this the prosecution must prove two things.[951]

---

[950] This charge is designed for use in cases where this element raises only simple issues. If more complex issues arise, the charge should be expanded accordingly. Guidance can be obtained from 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended).

[951] This charge is designed for use in cases where this element raises only simple issues. If more complex issues arise, the charge should be expanded accordingly. Guidance can be obtained from 7.4.8.1 Charge: Assault – Application of Force or 7.4.8.3 Charge: Assault – No Application of Force.

First, they must prove that the accused intended either to apply force to a person's body, or to act in a way that would cause a person to apprehend the immediate application of force to his or her body.[952]

[If further elaboration is necessary, include any relevant directions from the following bullet list.]

- [For application of force cases] It does not matter how much force the accused intended to apply. Nor does it matter whether or not that force would have harmed the person. An intention to merely touch someone is enough.
- [For application of force cases] It does not matter whether s/he would have actually been able to apply the force. It is sufficient for the accused to have intended to apply force.
- [For apprehension cases] S/he does not need to have intended to actually apply such force. The accused only needs to have intended to cause someone to apprehend that force would be applied.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that the accused intended to act in this way in circumstances in which there was no lawful justification or excuse for his/her conduct.

[Possible forms of lawful justification or excuse include consent, self-defence, arrest, the lawful correction of children and ordinary social activity. For guidance on directions for these matters see 7.4.8 Common Law Assault.]

[If no lawful justifications or excuses are open on the evidence, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case, it has not been suggested that there was a lawful justification or excuse for the accused's alleged actions. You should therefore have no difficulty finding that, if NOA intended to [apply force to a person's body/act in a way that would cause a person to apprehend the immediate application of force to his or her body], that was done without lawful justification or excuse.

[If any lawful justifications or excuses are open on the evidence, give appropriate directions incorporating reference to the evidence and arguments relevant to the justification or excuse, and concluding with the darker shaded section.]

Remember, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused's behaviour was without lawful [justification/excuse]. The defence does not need to prove that NOA had such a [justification/excuse].

The accused must have had the relevant intention at the time s/he entered the [part of the] building. If you accept that it is reasonably possible that NOA only formed that intention after entering the [part of the] building, then this element will not be satisfied.

The accused entered in aggravating circumstances

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered the [part of the] building in aggravating circumstances.

The prosecution can meet this element in two ways.

First, it may do this by proving that the accused had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her when s/he entered the [part of the] building.

Alternately, the prosecution can prove this element by proving that a person was present in the building at the time of the accused's entry, and that the accused knew that a person was then present in that [part of the] building, or was reckless as to whether or not a person was then so present.

---

[952] If the prosecution relies on only one basis of culpability, directions on the alternative basis should be omitted.

Need for unanimity

For this fourth element to be satisfied, you do not need to find that the prosecution have proved both these aggravating circumstances. It is sufficient if you find one of these matters proven beyond reasonable doubt.

However, all twelve of you must agree that the same aggravating circumstance has been proven. For example, you must all agree that NOA was "armed", in the sense I have outlined and will explain further. Or you must all agree that a person was present in the building and that NOA knew that this person was present, or was reckless as to whether or not a person was then so present.

If some of you find only the first circumstance proven, and others find only the second circumstance proven, then you will not have reached a unanimous verdict, as you are required to do.[953]

I will now explain these two aggravating circumstances in more detail.

The accused was armed

The first way that the prosecution can prove this fourth element is by proving that the accused had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her at the time of entering the [part of the] building.

For this element to be met in this way, there are three things that the prosecution must prove.

First, they must prove that, at the time of entering the [part of the] building, NOA had [identify item] either on him/her or readily available for use.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that [identify item] falls within the category of [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive].

[Where there is a dispute about whether the article possessed was a firearm, add relevant parts of the following shaded section.]

The law defines a "firearm" to be any device which is designed or adapted to discharge bullets or other missiles, either by the expansion of gases produced in the device by the ignition of strongly combustible materials, or by compressed air or other gases. The definition of "firearm" also includes anything which looks like such a device.

However, certain things are excluded from the definition of a "firearm". These include [identify relevant exception, e.g. "underwater spear guns"].

To be a "firearm", the device does not need to be assembled, complete or operational. If it fits the definition I have just given you, it will be a "firearm", whether or not it actually works.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an imitation firearm with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

An "imitation firearm" is anything which has the appearance of being a firearm, whether or not it is capable of being shot.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an offensive weapon with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

The law defines two different kinds of items as "offensive weapons". First, an item is an offensive weapon if it is specifically made or adapted for the use of injuring or incapacitating a person. Secondly, an ordinarily inoffensive item that does not meet this criterion can also become an [953] This part of the charge assumes that the jury has been directed about the need for a unanimous verdict. If this has not occurred, the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

"offensive weapon" if the person carrying it intends or threatens to use it to injure or incapacitate a person.

[If it is alleged that the relevant article was made for the use of injuring or incapacitating a person, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution argued that the [identify item] is an "offensive weapon" because it is made for injuring or incapacitating people. That is, it is an item that is normally used for this purpose.

[If it is alleged that the relevant article was adapted for the use of injuring or incapacitating a person, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution argued that the [identify item] was an "offensive weapon" because it was adapted for the use of injuring or incapacitating people. That is, it was physically modified so that it could cause injury or incapacitate a person.

[If it is alleged that an ordinary article became an offensive weapon because of the accused's use, threats or intention, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution argued that the [identify item] was an "offensive weapon" because NOA [used/threatened to use/intended to use] it for the purpose of injuring or incapacitating a person.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an explosive with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

An "explosive" is any item which is manufactured for the purpose of producing a practical effect by explosion, or which is intended to have that purpose. Any item that fits this definition will be an "explosive", whether or not it actually works.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an imitation explosive with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

An "imitation explosive" is any item which might reasonably be taken to be, or to contain, an explosive.

Thirdly, the prosecution must prove that the accused had the [identify item] with him/her for the purpose of the burglary. This will be the case if NOA had the [identify item] with him/her for the purpose of [stealing property from within the [part of the] building/assaulting a person within the [part of the] building/causing criminal damage within the building].

In determining this matter you should focus on NOA's intention at the time s/he entered the [part of] the building. It does not matter what his/her intention was at the time s/he first handled the [identify item].

In this case the prosecution argued that all three of these requirements have been met. [Describe prosecution evidence and/or arguments.]

The defence [describe defence case [if any] in respect of this element, e.g.

- denied that NOA had a gun with him/her at the time of the burglary;
- denied that the bottle was an offensive weapon;
- denied that NOA had the knife with him/her for the purpose of the burglary].

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether all three of these matters have been proven beyond reasonable doubt. It is only if you are satisfied that NOA had [identify item] with him/her at the time of the entry, that [identify item] was a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive], and that NOA had that item with him/her for the purposes of the burglary that this element will be met in this way.

A person was present

However, if you are not satisfied that this first aggravated circumstance has been proven, you should consider whether this element has been met in the alternative way that I will now explain.

For this element to be met in this second way, there are two things that the prosecution must prove.

First, they must prove that when the accused entered the [part of the] building a person was present in that [building/location]; and

Secondly, they must prove that at the time of that entry, the accused knew that a person was then present in that [part of the] building, or was reckless as to whether or not a person was then so present.

The law says that an accused will have been reckless in this way if s/he believed at the time of his/her entry, that another person was probably present in that [building/location].

It is not sufficient for the prosecution to prove that NOA believed that it was possible that a person was present. They must prove that s/he believed that this was probably the case.

In respect of this second matter, it is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that a person was present. S/he must have at least known that this was probably the case.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

I remind you, for this fourth element to be met, the prosecution must prove that the accused entered the building in one of these aggravating circumstances.

You do not need to find that both of these matters have been proven. It is sufficient if you find one aggravating circumstance proven beyond reasonable doubt.

However, I want to emphasise again that, in order to reach a unanimous verdict, you must all agree that the same aggravating circumstance has been proven. It is not enough for some of you to find the element proven on the first basis, while others find it proven on the second basis.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of aggravated burglary, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA entered [part of] a building; and

Two – that NOA did so as a trespasser. That is:

- S/he entered [part of] the building without any right or authority to enter; and
- S/he knew that s/he had no right or authority to enter that [part of the] building, or at least knew that that was probably the case; and

Three – that at that time NOA intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault", "criminal damage"]; and Four – NOA entered [part of the] building in aggravating circumstances. That is, at the time of his/her entry:

- NOA had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her; or
- A person was present in the [part of the] building, and the NOA knew that a person was then so present or was reckless as to whether or not this was the case.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of aggravated burglary.

Burglary

I must also direct you about the crime of burglary. This is an alternative to the crime of aggravated burglary. That means you only need to return a verdict on the crime of burglary if you were not satisfied that the prosecution have proved all the elements of aggravated burglary beyond reasonable doubt. If you decide that NOA is guilty of aggravated burglary, then you do not need to return a verdict on this alternative.

The offence of burglary is very similar to the offence of aggravated burglary, with one important difference: the prosecution does not need to prove that the accused entered the [part of the] building in aggravating circumstances.

In other words, if you are satisfied that the prosecution have proved the first three elements I just described beyond reasonable doubt, but are not satisfied that they have proved element four, then you should find the accused guilty of burglary. However, if you find that any of the first three elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must also find the accused not guilty of burglary.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

7.5.5.8 Checklist: Aggravated Burglary Combined Bases

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused entered [part of] a building; and
2. The accused did so as a trespasser; and
3. At the time of entry the accused intended to commit the offence of [theft/common assault/criminal damage etc.] within the [part of the] building; and
4. The accused was armed or the offence was aggravated by the presence of a person in the [part of the] building.

Entry into [part of] a building

1. Did the accused enter the [part of the] building?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

---

Entry as a trespasser

2. Did the accused enter as a trespasser?

2.1 Did the accused have a right or authority to enter the [part of the] building?

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then go to 2.3

2.2 Did the accused enter the [part of the] building in circumstances that were not permitted by his or her right or authority to enter?

Consider – Was the accused only permitted to enter for a specific purpose or in specific circumstances, and did he or she in fact enter for a different purpose, or in different circumstances?

If Yes, then go to 2.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

2.3 Did the accused know or believe it was probable either that he or she had no right to enter the [part of the] building or that he or she was entering in circumstances that were not permitted by his or her right or authority to enter?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

---

The Accused Intended to Steal

[3rd Element – where the prosecution alleges "intention to steal"]

3. At the time of entry, did the accused intend to steal property from within the [part of the] building?

3.1 Did the accused intend to appropriate property that belonged to another person?

*Consider – Did the accused intend to take something without the owner's consent?

If Yes, then go to 3.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

3.2 Did the accused intend to permanently deprive another person of that property?

If Yes, then go to 3.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

3.3 Did the accused believe that s/he had a legal right to take the property?

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

If No, then go to 4

The Accused Intended to Assault a Person Inside the Building

[3rd Element – where the prosecution alleges "intention to assault"]

3. At the time of entry, did the accused intend to assault a person in the [part of the] building?

3.1 Did the accused intend to apply force to the body of a person in the building?

If Yes, then go to 3.3

If No, then go to 3.2

3.2 Did the accused intend to act in a way that would cause a person in the building to apprehend the immediate application of force to his or her body?

If Yes, then go to 3.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

3.3 Did the accused have a lawful justification to act in this way?

If No, then go to 4.

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of Burglary or Aggravated Burglary

---

The Accused Entered in Aggravating Circumstances

4.1 Was the accused armed at the time of the entry?

4.1.1 At the time of the entry, did the accused have a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] either on him/her or readily available for use?

If Yes, then go to 4.1.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Aggravated Burglary, but guilty of Burglary (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 to 3)

4.1.2 Was the item a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive]?

If Yes, then go to 4.1.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Aggravated Burglary, but guilty of Burglary (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 to 3)

4.1.3 Did the accused have this item with him/her for the purpose of the burglary?

Consider – Did the accused intend to use the item for the purpose of [stealing property from/assaulting a person within] the [part of the] building?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Aggravated Burglary (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 to 3)

If No, then go to 4.2

4.2 Was the offence aggravated by the presence of a person in the [part of the] building?

4.2.1 Was a person present in the [part of the] building?

If Yes, then go to 4.2.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Aggravated Burglary, but guilty of Burglary (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 to 3)

4.2.2 Did the accused know that a person was present in the [part of the] building?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Aggravated Burglary (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 to 3)

If No, then go to 4.2.3

4.2.3 Was the accused reckless as to whether or not a person was present in the [part of the] building?

Consider – Did the accused believe it was probable that a person was present in the [part of the] building?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Aggravated Burglary (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 to 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Aggravated Burglary, but guilty of Burglary (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 to 3)

Last updated: 22 May 2009

7.5.6 Home Invasion

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. Home invasion is an offence under the Crimes Act 1958 s 77A.
2. The offence can be committed in two alternative ways:
   - Home invasion while armed (s 77A(1)(c)(i)); or
   - Home invasion where a person was present (s 77(1)(c)(ii)).

   These are addressed in turn below.

Home invasion while armed

3. Home invasion while armed has the following three elements:

   i) The accused committed burglary of a home;

   ii) The accused entered the home in company with one or more other persons; and

iii) At that time the accused had a firearm, imitation firearm, offensive weapon, explosive or imitation explosive with him or her.

The accused committed burglary of a home

4. The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed burglary of a home (Crimes Act 1958 s 77A(1)(a)).

5. The prosecution must prove that the accused:

   i) Entered a home; and

   ii) Did so as a trespasser; and

   iii) Intended to:

   - Steal something from the home; or
   - Commit an offence punishable by imprisonment for a term of five years or more involving either:
     - An assault to a person in the home; or
     - Damage to the home or to property in the home (Crimes Act 1958 s 77A(1)(a)).

6. 7.5.4 Burglary explains these requirements in more detail. The difference between burglary and home invasion for the purpose of this element is that burglary applies to any building, whereas home invasion is limited to a 'home'.

7. Home is defined in Crimes Act 1958 section 77A(5) as any building, part of a building or other structure intended for occupation as a dwelling and includes the following –

   (a) any part of commercial or industrial premises that is used as residential premises;

   (b) a motel room or hotel room or other temporary accommodation provided on a commercial basis;

   (c) a rooming house within the meaning of the Residential Tenancies Act 1997;

   (d) a room provided to a person as accommodation in a residential care service, hospital or any other premises involved in the provision of health services to the person;

   (e) a caravan within the meaning of the Residential Tenancies Act 1997 or any vehicle or vessel used as a residence.

The accused entered the home in company with one or more persons

8. The second element the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered the home 'in company' with one or more other persons (Crimes Act 1958 s 77A(1)(b)).

9. The phrase 'in company' rarely appears in Victorian legislation, but has been considered in other states which contain offences or aggravating factors of offending 'in company'.

10. The following sections explain the meaning of 'in company' as it has been developed in other States, while recognising that such principles have not yet been considered in relation to Victorian legislation.

11. The element of company requires three key components:

    - The offender must share a common purpose to commit the offence with the secondary parties;

- The secondary parties must be physically present;
- The secondary parties must actually contribute or be able to contribute, either by emboldening or reassuring the accused by being in a position to assist, or by intimidating the victim (R v Button & Griffen (2002) 54 NSWLR 455, [120] (Kirby J)).

12. Proof of a common purpose requires an express or implied agreement or understanding to achieve an agreed end (Markou v R [2012] NSWCCA 64, [28]).
13. It is not necessary that the secondary parties physically assisted in the commission of the offence. It is sufficient if they are present so that the victim is confronted by the combined force of two or more people and the secondary party is in a position to assist if necessary (R v Brougham (1986) 43 SASR 187, 191; R v Galey [1985] 1 NZLR 230; WA v Dick [2006] WASC 81).
14. Where the victim is aware of the presence of the secondary parties and is confronted with that combined force, it is not necessary to show that the secondary parties actually intended to assist (R v Leoni [1999] NSWCCA 14, [16]–[20]; R v Villar & Zugecic [2004] NSWCCA 302, [68]).
15. In some cases, it is not necessary that the victim of the offence know about the presence of the secondary parties. However, in that situation, the secondary parties must be physically present and intending to assist the accused if necessary (R v Leoni [1999] NSWCCA 14, [16]–[20]). However, the concept of assistance is flexible and is not limited to physical assistance (see FP v R [2012] NSWCCA 182, [140]).
16. Physical presence is an elastic concept. It depends on the layout, geography and circumstances of the case. The question is whether the secondary parties remain in a location where they are able to exercise a coercive effect, either by continuing to intimidate the victim, or being ready and able to assist the accused if necessary (R v Button & Griffen (2002) 54 NSWLR 455, [123]–[125]).
17. Despite the flexibility of the concept of physical presence, a person standing lookout, an accessory before the fact, or a getaway driver, is not physically present for the purpose of offending in company (R v Button & Griffen (2002) 54 NSWLR 455, [120]; R v Brougham (1986) 43 SASR 187 at 191. See also WA v Dick [2006] WASC 81, [33]–[38]).
18. Based on these cases, the approach in this charge book is that this element requires proof that at least one other person was 'involved in the commission of the offence' for the purpose of Crimes Act 1958 s 323, was physically present when the offence was committed and either directly engaged in the offence, intended to embolden or reassure the accused if necessary or was observed by the victim so that the victim was confronted by a combined presence.
19. For information on when a person is 'involved in the commission of an offence' see Statutory Complicity for more information.
20. It is not necessary that the purported co-offender has been prosecuted for or found guilty of this offence in order to sustain the conviction of the accused (Crimes Act 1958 s 77A(4)).

The accused was armed

21. The third element that the prosecution must prove for this form of home invasion is that, at the time the accused committed the home invasion, he or she had one of the following five articles with him or her:

    i) A firearm;

    ii) An imitation firearm;

    iii) An offensive weapon;

    iv) An explosive; or

    v) An imitation explosive (Crimes Act 1958 s 77A(1)(c)).

22. For more information on these items, see 7.5.5 Aggravated Burglary.

The accused had the article "with" him or her

23. For this element to be met, the accused must have had one of the specified articles "with" him or her at the time of the home invasion (Crimes Act 1958 s 77A(1)(c)).

24. A person will have had the article "with" him or her if, at the time of the home invasion, he or she had the article either on his or her person, or readily available for use (R v Hartwick (1985) 17 A Crim R 281).

25. This element will only be met if the accused knew that he or she had the article with him or her, or available for use (R v Kolb & Adams 14/12/1979 CCA Vic; R v Cugullere [1961] 1 WLR 858).

26. A person does not have an article "with" him or her if it is possessed in such a way that it cannot be used (e.g. if it is concealed on his or her person in a sealed package) (R v Kolb & Adams 14/12/1979 CCA Vic; R v Pawlicki [1992] 3 All ER 902).

27. However, an instrument may be "used" by doing no more than drawing attention to its existence (R v Kolb & Adams 14/12/1979 CCA Vic).

28. The ordinary principles of criminal complicity apply to this offence. This means that this element will be met if an accomplice, acting in concert with the accused, had the article "with" him or her (R v Hartwick (1985) 17 A Crim R 281; R v Khammash (2004) 89 SASR 488). See Part 5: Complicity for further information about the principles of criminal complicity.

Possession must be for the purpose of the home invasion

29. In relation to the offence of armed robbery (Crimes Act 1958 s 75A), the expression "has with him" has been held to create an implied requirement that the accused possessed the article for the purpose of the robbery (R v Kolb & Adams 14/12/1979 CCA Vic. See 7.5.3 Armed Robbery).

30. It is likely that the interpretation of the phrase "has with him" in s 75A will guide the interpretation of this phrase in its use in s 77A. However, this conclusion is not wholly certain (see DPP v Woodward [2006] VSC 299).

31. If the phrase "has with him" is interpreted in the same way for s 77A as for s 75A, it will create an implied requirement that the accused possessed the article for the purpose of the home invasion.

32. It is likely that the "purposes" of home invasion will be determined by reference to the elements of the offence of home invasion. They are therefore unlikely to be the same as the purposes of robbery discussed in 7.5.3 Armed Robbery.

33. It is likely that the "purposes" of home invasion will vary according to the secondary offence that the accused is alleged to have intended to commit. This means that:

    - Where it is alleged that the accused trespassed with intent to steal, this aspect of the element will be met if the accused possessed the item intending to use it to steal;
    - Where it is alleged that the accused trespassed with intent to assault, this aspect of the element will be met if the accused possessed the item intending to use it to assault a person;
    - Where it is alleged that the accused trespassed with intent to damage property, this aspect of the element will be met if the accused possessed the item intending to use it to damage property.

34. The accused will have possessed an article for the purpose of the home invasion if s/he intended to use it for that purpose, even if it was not actually used (R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551).

35. It is the accused's purpose or intention at the time of the entry that matters:

    - It does not matter what his or her intent was when s/he originally equipped him/herself with the article;
    - It is not sufficient if the accused formed the relevant intent after entering the home or relevant part of the home (R v Nguyen [1997] 1 VR 551; R v Munro [2006] VSCA 94).

Home invasion where a person was present

36. Home invasion where a person was present has the following three elements:

    i) The accused committed burglary of a home;

    ii) The accused entered the home in company with one or more other persons; and

    iii) A person was present in the home (Crimes Act 1958 s 77A).

The accused committed burglary

37. The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed burglary of a home (Crimes Act 1958 s 77A).

38. See above for a brief outline of the elements of burglary. See 7.5.4 Burglary for more information concerning each of these elements.

Entered the home in company with one or more other persons

39. The second element is common to both forms of home invasion. See above for a discussion of this element (see Crimes Act 1958 s 77A).

A person was present

40. The third element that the prosecution must prove for this form of the offence is that a person (other than the person the accused entered the home in company with) was present in the home at any time while the accused was present (Crimes Act 1958 s 77A(1)(c)(ii)).

41. The drafting of this provision indicates that the element may be satisfied either where the third person was present at the time of entry, or arrives while the accused is present in the home as a trespasser.

42. There is no fault element associated with this element. It does not matter whether the accused knew that there was or would be another person in the home (Crimes Act 1958 s 77A(2)). This distinguishes this form of the offence from aggravated burglary (compare Crimes Act 1958 s 77).

Agreement about basis of culpability

43. In some cases the prosecution may seek to prove home invasion by presenting both forms of offence in the alternative. The prosecution is likely to do this by alleging the two forms of offence in the one count, relying upon Criminal Procedure Act 2009 Schedule 1 Clause 3(3).[954]

44. In relation to aggravated burglary, it has been held that the two forms of that offence are proven by evidence of substantially different facts and the jury must be unanimous about the basis of culpability (R v Secombe [2010] VSCA 58).

45. It there therefore highly likely that the same principle will apply to home invasion.

46. The jury should give a single verdict, and they should not be asked to identify the basis of their verdict (R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26).

---

[954] However it is not unlawful to allege the alternative forms of culpability in separate counts. See R v Davidson; R v Konestabo [2008] VSCA 188.

47. See Unanimous and Majority Verdicts for further information about this issue.

Last updated: 9 March 2017

7.5.6.1 Charge: Home Invasion (while Armed)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of home invasion. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused entered [part of] a home.

Two – s/he did so as a trespasser.

Three – when s/he entered the [part of the] home, the accused intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault"].

Four – the accused entered the home in company with one or more other people;

Five – the accused had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her when s/he entered the [part of the] home.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[955]

The accused entered a home or part of a home

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered [part of] a home.

In this case the [part of the] home it is alleged that NOA entered is [identify relevant home or part of the home].

[If the "home" is an inhabited vehicle or vessel, add the following shaded section.]

While you may not think that a [identify relevant class of vehicle or vessel, e.g. "caravan", "trailer", "houseboat"] is a "home", for the purposes of this offence a vehicle or vessel is treated as a "home" if it was intended for occupation and used as a residence.

A vehicle or vessel will have been used as a residence at the time of the offence if a person was living in it at that time. No-one needs to have actually been present in the vehicle or vessel at the time of the home invasion. This requirement will be satisfied as long as someone was living there, even if they were out when the alleged home invasion took place.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

The accused entered as a trespasser

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered the [part of the] home as a trespasser. For this element to be met, there are two things the prosecution must prove.

First, they must prove that NOA entered the [identify relevant home or part of the home] without any right or authority to enter. That is, that [part of the] home must have been "off-limits" to him/her.

---

[955] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be explained briefly, and followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meet the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[If it is alleged that the accused entered a prohibited part of a home, add the following shaded section.]

It is important to note that, in this case, the prosecution did not allege that the entire home was "off-limits" to NOA. They accepted that s/he was authorised to enter certain parts of the home, such as the [identify authorised parts of the home]. However, they argued that NOA was forbidden from entering the [identify prohibited part of the home]. That is, s/he had no right or authority to be there.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is for you to determine whether that part of the home really was "off-limits" to NOA. This part of the second element will only be satisfied if you find that it was.

[If it is alleged that the accused had limited authority to enter, but exceeded that authority, add the following shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution did not deny that NOA had some authority to enter [identify home or relevant part of home]. However, they argued that s/he only had authority to enter [that part of] the home if s/he complied with certain conditions, such as [identify alleged conditions.]

The prosecution alleged that when NOA entered the [part of the] home s/he was not complying with these conditions, and so had no right or authority to enter. She was therefore trespassing.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is for you to determine if NOA's authority to enter [identify home or relevant part of home] was subject to any conditions. In making this decision you can consider everything that was said and done by the parties, and also the way that people generally conduct themselves. However, you cannot assume that certain conditions were imposed just because those limits would have been imposed if the issue had been raised. You must be satisfied that those conditions actually were imposed.

If you find that NOA's authority to enter the [identify home or relevant part of the home] was not subject to any conditions, then the second element will not be met. In such circumstances, the accused will have had unlimited authority to enter the [part of the] home, and so cannot have been trespassing, no matter what s/he intended to do. Even if s/he entered with some undesirable purpose in mind, s/he still had a right to enter.

If you find that NOA's authority to enter was subject to certain conditions, you must then determine whether or not, when s/he entered the [part of the] home, s/he was complying with those conditions. If s/he was, then s/he will not have been trespassing. That is, s/he will have had a right or authority to enter that [part of the] home.

However, if s/he was not complying with those conditions, then s/he will have had no right or authority to enter the home, and this part of the second element will be met.

To summarise, this part of the second element will only be met if you are satisfied that NOA was only authorised to enter [identify home or relevant part of home] if s/he complied with certain conditions, and you find that s/he did not comply with those conditions when s/he entered. If you are not satisfied of either of these matters beyond reasonable doubt, then this element will not be met.

The second matter that the prosecution must prove for the second element to be met is that the accused either knew that s/he had no right or authority to enter [identify home or relevant part of home], or s/he believed that it was probable that she had no such right or authority.

For this part of the second element to be satisfied, it is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that she had no right or authority to enter the [part of the] home. S/he must have at least known that this was probably the case.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA entered the [identify relevant home or part of the home] without any right or authority to enter, and that s/he knew that s/he had no right or authority to enter that [part of the] home, or at least knew that that was probably the case, that this second element will be met.

The accused intended to commit an offence

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that, when s/he entered the [part of the] home, the accused intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault"].

[Where the relevant offence is theft, add the following shaded section.]

In order to do this, the prosecution must prove three things.[956]

First, they must prove that the accused intended to take property that belonged to another person without the owner's consent.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that the accused intended to permanently deprive the owner of the property in question. That is, the accused must have intended that the owner would never get it back.

Thirdly, the prosecution must prove that when s/he entered the [part of the] home, the accused did not believe that s/he had a legal right to take the property in question.

[If further elaboration is necessary, include any relevant bullet points from the following list.]

- – The prosecution does not need to prove that any property was in fact stolen. They only need to prove that the accused intended to steal.
- – The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to steal any particular property. They only need to prove that s/he intended to steal property of some kind from inside the home.
- – This element will be met if the prosecution can prove that, although the accused did not know what s/he would find in the [part of the] home, s/he intended to steal anything of value that s/he might come across.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

[Where the relevant offence is common assault, add the following shaded section.]

In order to do this the prosecution must prove two things.[957]

First, they must prove that the accused intended either to apply force to a person's body, or to act in a way that would cause a person to think that force would immediately be applied to his or her body.[958]

---

[956] This charge is designed for use in cases where this element raises only simple issues. If more complex issues arise, the charge should be expanded accordingly. Guidance can be obtained from 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended).

[957] This charge is designed for use in cases where this element raises only simple issues. If more complex issues arise, the charge should be expanded accordingly. Guidance can be obtained from 7.4.8.1 Charge: Assault – Application of Force or 7.4.8.3 Charge: Assault – No Application of Force.

[If further elaboration is necessary, include any relevant directions from the following list.]

- [For application of force cases] It does not matter how much force the accused intended to apply. Nor does it matter whether or not that force would have harmed the person. An intention to merely touch someone is enough.
- [For application of force cases] It does not matter whether s/he would have actually been able to apply the force. It is sufficient for the accused to have intended to apply force.
- [For apprehension of force cases] S/he does not need to have intended to actually apply such force. The accused only needs to have intended to cause someone to believe that force would be applied.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that the accused intended to act in this way in circumstances in which there was no lawful justification or excuse for his/her conduct.

[Possible forms of lawful justification or excuse include consent, self-defence, arrest, the lawful correction of children and ordinary social activity. For guidance on directions for these matters see 7.4.8 Common Law Assault.]

[If no lawful justifications or excuses are open on the evidence, add the following darker shaded text.]

In this case, it has not been suggested that there was a lawful justification or excuse for the accused's alleged actions. You should therefore have no difficulty finding that, if NOA intended to [apply force to a person's body/act in a way that would cause a person to think that force would immediately be applied to his or her body], that was done without lawful justification or excuse.

[If any lawful justifications or excuses are open on the evidence, give appropriate directions incorporating reference to the evidence and arguments relevant to the justification or excuse, and concluding with the darker shaded text.

Remember, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused's behaviour was without lawful [justification/excuse]. The defence does not need to prove that NOA had such a [justification/excuse].

The accused must have had the relevant intention at the time s/he entered the [part of the] home. If you accept that it is reasonably possible that NOA only formed that intention after entering the [part of the] home, then this element will not be satisfied.

Entry in company

Warning! This element has not been considered by Victorian courts. Judges should seek submissions before directing the jury about this element.

The fourth element the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered the home "in company" with one or more other people.

[958] If the prosecution relies on only one basis of culpability, directions on the alternative basis should be omitted.

In this case, the prosecution says that NOA entered the home "in company" with [identify those said to be in company].[959]

To prove this element, the prosecution must prove three matters.

One – NOA must have had a "common purpose" with [identify those said to be in company] to commit the home invasion.

This means that s/he must have agreed with [identify those said to be in company] to commit the home invasion.[960]

The second matter is that [at least one of] [identify those said to be in company] must have been physically present at the home invasion.

This means that [at least one of] [identify those said to be in company] must have entered the [part of the] home with NOA. It would not be enough that the other people stood outside as lookouts, or getaway drivers.

The third matter is that [i*dentify those said to be in company*] must have been able to contribute to the offending, by encouraging NOA or intimidating anyone else in the [part of the] home.[961]

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

The accused was armed

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her at the time of entering the [part of the] home.

For this element to be met, there are three things that the prosecution must prove.

First, they must prove that, at the time of entering the [part of the] home, NOA had [identify item] either on him/her or readily available for use.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that [identify item] falls within the category of [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive].

[Where there is a dispute about whether the article possessed was a firearm, add relevant parts of the following shaded section.]

The law defines a "firearm" to be any device which is designed or adapted to discharge bullets or other missiles, either by the expansion of gases produced in the device by the ignition of strongly combustible materials, or by compressed air or other gases. The definition of "firearm" also includes anything which looks like such a device.

However, certain things are excluded from the definition of a "firearm". These include [identify relevant exception, e.g. "underwater spear guns"].

To be a "firearm", the device does not need to be assembled, complete or operational. If it fits the definition I have just given you, it will be a "firearm", whether or not it actually works.

---

[959] Where the other offenders cannot be identified, the names of the co-offenders should be replaced with a statement such as "three other people who have not been identified".

[960] Where the scope of the agreement is in issue, this direction may be modified. See Charge: Statutory Complicity (Agreement, Arrangement or Understanding) for guidance.

[961] In cases where any victim of the offence is not aware of the additional people, the discussion of this third requirement must be modified. See 7.5.6 Home Invasion for guidance.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an imitation firearm with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

An "imitation firearm" is anything which has the appearance of being a firearm, whether or not it is capable of being fired.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an offensive weapon with him/her, add the following shaded section]

The law defines two different kinds of items as "offensive weapons". First, an item is an offensive weapon if it is specifically made or adapted for the use of injuring or incapacitating a person. Secondly, an ordinarily inoffensive item that does not meet this criterion can also become an "offensive weapon" if the person carrying it intends or threatens to use it to injure or incapacitate a person.

[If it is alleged that the relevant article was made for the use of injuring or incapacitating a person, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution argued that the [identify item] is an "offensive weapon" because it is made for injuring or incapacitating people. That is, it is an item that is normally used for this purpose.

[If it is alleged that the relevant article was adapted for the use of injuring or incapacitating a person, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution argued that the [identify item] was an "offensive weapon" because it was adapted for the use of injuring or incapacitating people. That is, it was physically modified so that it could cause injury or incapacitate a person.

[If it is alleged that an ordinary article became an offensive weapon because of the accused's use, threats or intention, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution argued that the [identify item] was an "offensive weapon" because NOA [used/threatened to use/intended to use] it for the purpose of injuring or incapacitating a person.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an explosive with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

An "explosive" is any item which is manufactured for the purpose of producing a practical effect by explosion, or which is intended to have that purpose. Any item that fits this definition will be an "explosive", whether or not it actually works.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an imitation explosive with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

An "imitation explosive" is any item which might reasonably be taken to be, or to contain, an explosive.

Thirdly, the prosecution must prove that the accused had the [identify item] with him/her for the purpose of the home invasion. This will be the case if NOA had the [identify item] with him/her for the purpose of [stealing property from within the [part of the] home/assaulting a person within the [part of the] home].

In determining this matter you should focus on NOA's intention at the time s/he entered the [part of] the home. It does not matter what his/her intention was at the time s/he first handled the [identify item].

In this case the prosecution argued that all three of these requirements have been met. [Describe prosecution evidence and/or arguments.]

The defence [describe defence case [if any] in respect of this element, e.g.

- denied that NOA had a gun with him/her at the time of the home invasion;
- denied that the bottle was an offensive weapon;

- denied that NOA had the knife with him/her for the purpose of the home invasion.]

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether all three of these matters have been proven beyond reasonable doubt. It is only if you are satisfied that NOA had [identify item] with him/her at the time of the entry, that [identify item] was a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive], and that NOA had that item with him/her for the purposes of the home invasion that this element will be met.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of home invasion, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA entered [part of] a home; and

Two – that NOA did so as a trespasser. That is:

- S/he entered the [part of the] home without any right or authority to enter; and
- S/he knew that s/he had no right or authority to enter that [part of the] home, or at least knew that that was probably the case; and

Three – that at that time NOA intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault"]; and

Four – that NOA entered the home in company with at least one other person; and

Five – that NOA had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her at the time of the entry. That is:

- When s/he entered the [part of the] home, s/he had a [identify item] on him/her or readily available; and
- That a [identify item] falls within the category of a [identify category]; and
- That NOA had the [identify item] with him/her for the purpose of the home invasion.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of home invasion.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

7.5.6.2 Checklist: Home Invasion (while Armed)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

The Elements

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. NOA entered a home.
2. NOA entered the home as a trespasser.
3. NOA entered the home intending to [identify secondary offence].
4. NOA entered the home in company with one or more other people.
5. NOA had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her when s/he entered the home.

Entered a home

1. Did NOA enter a home?

1.1 Is [identify premises] a home?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Home Invasion

1.2 Did NOA enter [identify premises]?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Home Invasion

Entry as a trespasser

2. Did NOA enter the home as a trespasser?

2.1 Did NOA enter the home without any right or authority to enter?

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Home Invasion

2.2 Did NOA know that s/he had no right to enter the home or did NOA believe it was probable that s/he had no right to enter?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Home Invasion

Enter intending to commit an offence

3. Did NOA enter the home intending to commit [insert offence]?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Home Invasion

Entry in company

4. Did NOA enter the home in company with one or more other people?

4.1 Did NOA agree with [identify alleged co-offenders] to commit the home invasion?

If Yes, then go to 4.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Home Invasion

4.2 Was at least one of [identify alleged co-offenders] physically present in the home with NOA?

If Yes, then go to 4.3

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Home Invasion

4.3 Was a physically present co-offender able to contribute to the offending?

Consider – A co-offender may be able to contribute by encouraging NOA or by intimidating others in the home

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Home Invasion

[Firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive]

5. Did NOA have a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her at the time of the home invasion?

5.1 Did NOA have [identify item] on him/her or readily available for use at the time of entering the home?

If Yes, then go to 5.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Home Invasion

5.2 Is [identify item] a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive]?

If Yes, then go to 5.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Home Invasion

5.3 Did NOA have [identify item] for the purpose of the alleged home invasion?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Home Invasion (provided you have answered yes to questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Home Invasion

Last updated: 9 March 2017

7.5.6.3 Charge: Home Invasion (Person Present)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of home invasion. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused entered [part of] a home.

Two – s/he did so as a trespasser.

Three – when s/he entered the [part of the] home, the accused intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault"].

Four – the accused entered the home in company with one or more other people;

Five – a person was present at some stage while NOA was in the [part of the] home.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[962]

The accused entered a home or part of a home

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered [part of] a home.

In this case the [part of the] home it is alleged that NOA entered is [identify relevant home or part of the home].

[If the "home" is an inhabited vehicle or vessel, add the following shaded section.]

While you may not think that a [identify relevant class of vehicle or vessel, e.g. "caravan", "trailer", "houseboat"] is a "home", for the purposes of this offence a vehicle or vessel is treated as a "home" if it was intended for occupation and used as a residence.

A vehicle or vessel will have been used as a residence at the time of the offence if a person was living in it at that time. No-one needs to have actually been present in the vehicle or vessel at the time of the home invasion. This requirement will be satisfied as long as someone was living there, even if they were out when the alleged home invasion took place.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

The accused entered as a trespasser

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered the [part of the] home as a trespasser. For this element to be met, there are two things the prosecution must prove.

First, they must prove that NOA entered the [identify relevant home or part of the home] without any right or authority to enter. That is, that [part of the] home must have been "off-limits" to him/her.

[If it is alleged that the accused entered a prohibited part of a home, add the following shaded section.]

It is important to note that, in this case, the prosecution did not allege that the entire home was "off-limits" to NOA. They accepted that s/he was authorised to enter certain parts of the home, such as the [identify authorised parts of the home]. However, they argued that NOA was forbidden from entering the [identify prohibited part of the home]. That is, s/he had no right or authority to be there.

---

[962] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be explained briefly, and followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meet the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is for you to determine whether that part of the home really was "off-limits" to NOA. This part of the second element will only be satisfied if you find that it was.

[If it is alleged that the accused had limited authority to enter, but exceeded that authority, add the following shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution did not deny that NOA had some authority to enter [identify home or relevant part of home]. However, they argued that s/he only had authority to enter [that part of] the home if s/he complied with certain conditions, such as [identify alleged conditions.]

The prosecution alleged that when NOA entered the [part of the] home s/he was not complying with these conditions, and so had no right or authority to enter. She was therefore trespassing.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is for you to determine if NOA's authority to enter [identify home or relevant part of home] was subject to any conditions. In making this decision you can consider everything that was said and done by the parties, and also the way that people generally conduct themselves. However, you cannot assume that certain conditions were imposed just because those limits would have been imposed if the issue had been raised. You must be satisfied that those conditions actually were imposed.

If you find that NOA's authority to enter the [identify home or relevant part of the home] was not subject to any conditions, then the second element will not be met. In such circumstances, the accused will have had unlimited authority to enter the [part of the] home, and so cannot have been trespassing, no matter what s/he intended to do. Even if s/he entered with some undesirable purpose in mind, s/he still had a right to enter.

If you find that NOA's authority to enter was subject to certain conditions, you must then determine whether or not, when s/he entered the [part of the] home, s/he was complying with those conditions. If s/he was, then s/he will not have been trespassing. That is, s/he will have had a right or authority to enter that [part of the] home.

However, if s/he was not complying with those conditions, then s/he will have had no right or authority to enter the home, and this part of the second element will be met.

To summarise, this part of the second element will only be met if you are satisfied that NOA was only authorised to enter [identify home or relevant part of home] if s/he complied with certain conditions, and you find that s/he did not comply with those conditions when s/he entered. If you are not satisfied of either of these matters beyond reasonable doubt, then this element will not be met.

The second matter that the prosecution must prove for the second element to be met is that the accused either knew that s/he had no right or authority to enter [identify home or relevant part of home], or s/he believed that it was probable that she had no such right or authority.

For this part of the second element to be satisfied, it is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that she had no right or authority to enter the [part of the] home. S/he must have at least known that this was probably the case.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA entered the [identify relevant home or part of the home] without any right or authority to enter, and that s/he knew that s/he had no right or authority to enter that [part of the] home, or at least knew that that was probably the case, that this second element will be met.

The accused intended to commit an offence

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that, when s/he entered the [part of the] home, the accused intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault"].

[Where the relevant offence is theft, add the following shaded section.]

In order to do this, the prosecution must prove three things.[963]

First, they must prove that the accused intended to take property that belonged to another person without the owner's consent.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that the accused intended to permanently deprive the owner of the property in question. That is, the accused must have intended that the owner would never get it back.

Thirdly, the prosecution must prove that when s/he entered the [part of the] home, the accused did not believe that s/he had a legal right to take the property in question.

[If further elaboration is necessary, include any relevant bullet points from the following list.]

- The prosecution does not need to prove that any property was in fact stolen. They only need to prove that the accused intended to steal.
- The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to steal any particular property. They only need to prove that s/he intended to steal property of some kind from inside the home.
- This element will be met if the prosecution can prove that, although the accused did not know what s/he would find in the [part of the] home, s/he intended to steal anything of value that s/he might come across.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

[Where the relevant offence is common assault, add the following shaded section.]

In order to do this the prosecution must prove two things.[964]

First, they must prove that the accused intended either to apply force to a person's body, or to act in a way that would cause a person to think that force would immediately be applied to his or her body.[965]

---

[963] This charge is designed for use in cases where this element raises only simple issues. If more complex issues arise, the charge should be expanded accordingly. Guidance can be obtained from 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended).

[964] This charge is designed for use in cases where this element raises only simple issues. If more complex issues arise, the charge should be expanded accordingly. Guidance can be obtained from 7.4.8.1 Charge: Assault – Application of Force or 7.4.8.3 Charge: Assault – No Application of Force.

[965] If the prosecution relies on only one basis of culpability, directions on the alternative basis should be omitted.

[If further elaboration is necessary, include any relevant directions from the following bullet list.]

- [For application of force cases] It does not matter how much force the accused intended to apply. Nor does it matter whether or not that force would have harmed the person. An intention to merely touch someone is enough.
- [For application of force cases] It does not matter whether s/he would have actually been able to apply the force. It is sufficient for the accused to have intended to apply force.
- [For apprehension of force cases] S/he does not need to have intended to actually apply such force. The accused only needs to have intended to cause someone to believe that force would be applied.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that the accused intended to act in this way in circumstances in which there was no lawful justification or excuse for his/her conduct.

[Possible forms of lawful justification or excuse include consent, self-defence, arrest, the lawful correction of children and ordinary social activity. For guidance on directions for these matters see 7.4.8 Common Law Assault.]

[If no lawful justifications or excuses are open on the evidence, add the following darker shaded text.

In this case, it has not been suggested that there was a lawful justification or excuse for the accused's alleged actions. You should therefore have no difficulty finding that, if NOA intended to [apply force to a person's body/act in a way that would cause a person to think that force would immediately be applied to his or her body], that was done without lawful justification or excuse.

[If any lawful justifications or excuses are open on the evidence, give appropriate directions incorporating reference to the evidence and arguments relevant to the justification or excuse, and concluding with the darker shaded text.

Remember, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused's behaviour was without lawful [justification/excuse]. The defence does not need to prove that NOA had such a [justification/excuse].

The accused must have had the relevant intention at the time s/he entered the [part of the] home. If you accept that it is reasonably possible that NOA only formed that intention after entering the [part of the] home, then this element will not be satisfied.

Entry in company

Warning! This element has not been considered by Victorian courts. Judges should seek submissions before directing the jury about this element.

The fourth element the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered the home "in company" with one or more other people.

In this case, the prosecution says that NOA entered the home "in company" with [identify those said to be in company].[966]

To prove this element, the prosecution must prove three matters.

One – NOA must have had a "common purpose" with [identify those said to be in company] to commit the home invasion.

[966] Where the other offenders cannot be identified, the names of the co-offenders should be replaced with a statement such as "three other people who have not been identified".

This means that s/he must have agreed with [identify those said to be in company] to commit the home invasion.[967]

The second matter is that [at least one of] [identify those said to be in company] must have been physically present at the home invasion.

This means that [at least one of] [identify those said to be in company] must have entered the [part of the] home with NOA. It would not be enough that the other people stood outside as lookouts, or getaway drivers.

The third matter is that [i*dentify those said to be in company*] must have been able to contribute to the offending, by encouraging NOA or intimidating anyone else in the [part of the] home.[968]

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

A person was present

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that a person, other than a co-offender, was present in the home at any stage while NOA was trespassing in the [part of the] home.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of home invasion, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA entered [part of] a home; and

Two – that NOA did so as a trespasser. That is:

- S/he entered the [part of the] home without any right or authority to enter; and
- S/he knew that s/he had no right or authority to enter that [part of the] home, or at least knew that that was probably the case; and

Three – that at that time NOA intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault"]; and

Four – that NOA entered the home in company with at least one other person; and

Five – that a person was present when NOA was in the [part of the] home as a trespasser.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of home invasion.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

7.5.6.4 Checklist: Home Invasion (Person Present)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

---

[967] Where the scope of the agreement is in issue, this direction may be modified. See Charge: Statutory Complicity (Agreement, Arrangement or Understanding) for guidance.

[968] In cases where any victim of the offence is not aware of the additional people, the discussion of this third requirement must be modified. See 7.5.6 Home Invasion for guidance.

The Elements

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. NOA entered a home.
2. NOA entered the home as a trespasser.
3. NOA entered the home intending to [identify secondary offence]
4. NOA entered the home in company with one or more other people.
5. A person was present while NOA was in the home.

Entered a home

1. Did NOA enter a home?

1.1 Is [identify premises] a home?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Home Invasion

1.2 Did NOA enter [identify premises]?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Home Invasion

Entry as a trespasser

2. Did NOA enter the home as a trespasser?

2.1 Did NOA enter the home without any right or authority to enter?

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Home Invasion

2.2 Did NOA know that s/he had no right to enter the home or did NOA believe it was probable that s/he had no right to enter?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Home Invasion

Enter intending to commit an offence

3. Did NOA enter the home intending to commit [insert offence]?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Home Invasion

Entry in company

4. Did NOA enter the home in company with one or more other people?

4.1 Did NOA agree with [identify alleged co-offenders] to commit the home invasion?

If Yes, then go to 4.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Home Invasion

4.2 Was at least one of [identify alleged co-offenders] physically present in the home with NOA?

If Yes, then go to 4.3

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Home Invasion

4.3 Was a physically present co-offender able to contribute to the offending?

Consider – A co-offender may be able to contribute by encouraging NOA or by intimidating others in the home

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Home Invasion

Person present in the home

5. Was there a person other than a co-offender present in the home while NOA was trespassing in the home?

If Yes, then the Accused is guilty of Home Invasion (provided you have answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Home Invasion

Last updated: 9 March 2017

7.5.7 Aggravated Home Invasion

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. Aggravated home invasion is an offence under the Crimes Act 1958 s 77B.
2. The offence has the following five elements:
   (a) The accused committed burglary of a home;

(b) The accused entered the home in company with two or more other persons;

(c) At the time of entry the accused had with them a firearm, an imitation firearm, an offensive weapon, an explosive or an imitation explosive;

(d) At the time of entry the accused knows or is reckless as to whether there is or will be another person (other than a co-offender) in the home while the accused is present; and

(e) While the accused was in the home, a person (other than a co-offender) was present in the home (Crimes Act 1958 s 77B).

3. These are addressed in turn below.

Burglary of a home

4. The first element is that the accused committed a burglary of a home (Crimes Act 1958 s 77B(1)(a)).

5. This is the same element as for the basic offence of home invasion. See 7.5.6 Home Invasion and 7.5.4 Burglary for information about this element.

Entry in company with two or more people

6. The second element is that the accused entered the home in company with two or more other people (Crimes Act 1958 s 77B(1)(b)).

7. For a discussion of the meaning of "entry in company", see 7.5.6 Home Invasion.

8. This offence requires two or more co-offenders, whereas the basic offence of home invasion could be committed with a single co-offender.

The accused was armed

9. The third element that the prosecution must prove is that at the time the accused entered the home he or she had one of the following items with him or her:

i) A firearm;

ii) An imitation firearm;

iii) An offensive weapon;

iv) An explosive; or

v) An imitation explosive (Crimes Act 1958 s 77B(1)(c)(i)).

10. For more information on this element, see 7.5.5 Aggravated Burglary and 7.5.6 Home Invasion.

Knowledge or recklessness of inhabitants

11. The fourth element the prosecution have to prove is that at the time the accused entered the home he or she either:

i) Knew that a person was present, or would be present, in the home; or

ii) Was reckless about whether a person was present or would be present (Crimes Act 1958 s 77B(1)(c)(ii)).

12. For this element, the other person present in the home must not be a person with whom the accused entered the home in company with for the purpose of the second element.

13. For more information about this element, see 7.5.5 Aggravated Burglary.

Presence of inhabitants

14. The fifth element the prosecution must prove is that while the accused was present in the home, another person (other than a person with whom the accused entered the home in company with) was present in the home (Crimes Act 1958 s 77B(1)(d)).

Proceedings against co-offenders

15. Section 77B(3) provides that a person may be found guilty of this offence whether or not the co-offenders have been prosecuted for or found guilty of the offence.

16. This is equivalent to the provision which exists in relation to co-offenders charged under statutory complicity (see Crimes Act 1958 s 324A).

Alternative verdict

17. The basic offence of home invasion is a statutory alternative to aggravated home invasion (Crimes Act 1958 s 77C).

Last updated: 9 March 2017

7.5.7.1 Charge: Aggravated Home Invasion

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of aggravated home invasion. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 7 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused entered [part of] a home;

Two – s/he did so as a trespasser;

Three – when s/he entered the [part of the] home, the accused intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault"];

Four – the accused entered the home in company with two or more other people;

Five – the accused had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her when s/he entered the [part of the] home;

Six – the accused knew or was reckless as to the presence of another person in the [part of the] home when s/he entered that [part of the] home;

Seven – a person was present at some stage while NOA was in the [part of the] home.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[969]

The accused entered a home or part of a home

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered [part of] a home.

---

[969] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be explained briefly, and followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meet the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

In this case the [part of the] home it is alleged that NOA entered is [identify relevant home or part of the home].

[If the "home" is an inhabited vehicle or vessel, add the following shaded section.]

While you may not think that a [identify relevant class of vehicle or vessel, e.g. "caravan", "trailer", "houseboat"] is a "home", for the purposes of this offence a vehicle or vessel is treated as a "home" if it was intended for occupation and used as a residence.

A vehicle or vessel will have been used as a residence at the time of the offence if a person was living in it at that time. No-one needs to have actually been present in the vehicle or vessel at the time of the home invasion. This requirement will be satisfied as long as someone was living there, even if they were out when the alleged aggravated home invasion took place.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

The accused entered as a trespasser

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered the [part of the] home as a trespasser. For this element to be met, there are two things the prosecution must prove.

First, they must prove that NOA entered the [identify relevant home or part of the home] without any right or authority to enter. That is, that [part of the] home must have been "off-limits" to him/her.

[If it is alleged that the accused entered a prohibited part of a home, add the following shaded section.]

It is important to note that, in this case, the prosecution did not allege that the entire home was "off-limits" to NOA. They accepted that s/he was authorised to enter certain parts of the home, such as the [identify authorised parts of the home]. However, they argued that NOA was forbidden from entering the [identify prohibited part of the home]. That is, s/he had no right or authority to be there.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is for you to determine whether that part of the home really was "off-limits" to NOA. This part of the second element will only be satisfied if you find that it was.

[If it is alleged that the accused had limited authority to enter, but exceeded that authority, add the following shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution did not deny that NOA had some authority to enter [identify home or relevant part of home]. However, they argued that s/he only had authority to enter [that part of] the home if s/he complied with certain conditions, such as [identify alleged conditions.]

The prosecution alleged that when NOA entered the [part of the] home s/he was not complying with these conditions, and so had no right or authority to enter. She was therefore trespassing.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is for you to determine if NOA's authority to enter [identify home or relevant part of home] was subject to any conditions. In making this decision you can consider everything that was said and done by the parties, and also the way that people generally conduct themselves. However, you cannot assume that certain conditions were imposed just because those limits would have been imposed if the issue had been raised. You must be satisfied that those conditions actually were imposed.

If you find that NOA's authority to enter the [identify home or relevant part of the home] was not subject to any conditions, then the second element will not be met. In such circumstances, the accused will have had unlimited authority to enter the [part of the] home, and so cannot have been trespassing, no matter what s/he intended to do. Even if s/he entered with some undesirable purpose in mind, s/he still had a right to enter.

If you find that NOA's authority to enter was subject to certain conditions, you must then determine whether or not, when s/he entered the [part of the] home, s/he was complying with those conditions. If s/he was, then s/he will not have been trespassing. That is, s/he will have had a right or authority to enter that [part of the] home.

However, if s/he was not complying with those conditions, then s/he will have had no right or authority to enter the home, and this part of the second element will be met.

To summarise, this part of the second element will only be met if you are satisfied that NOA was only authorised to enter [identify home or relevant part of home] if s/he complied with certain conditions, and you find that s/he did not comply with those conditions when s/he entered. If you are not satisfied of either of these matters beyond reasonable doubt, then this element will not be met.

The second matter that the prosecution must prove for the second element to be met is that the accused either knew that s/he had no right or authority to enter [identify home or relevant part of home], or s/he believed that it was probable that she had no such right or authority.

For this part of the second element to be satisfied, it is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that she had no right or authority to enter the [part of the] home. S/he must have at least known that this was probably the case.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA entered the [identify relevant home or part of the home] without any right or authority to enter, and that s/he knew that s/he had no right or authority to enter that [part of the] home, or at least knew that that was probably the case, that this second element will be met.

The accused intended to commit an offence

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that, when s/he entered the [part of the] home, the accused intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault", "criminal damage"].

[Where the relevant offence is theft, add the following shaded section.]

In order to do this, the prosecution must prove three things.[970]

First, they must prove that the accused intended to take property that belonged to another person without the owner's consent.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that the accused intended to permanently deprive the owner of the property in question. That is, the accused must have intended that the owner would never get it back.

Thirdly, the prosecution must prove that when s/he entered the [part of the] home, the accused did not believe that s/he had a legal right to take the property in question.

[If further elaboration is necessary, include any relevant bullet points from the following list.]

---

[970] This charge is designed for use in cases where this element raises only simple issues. If more complex issues arise, the charge should be expanded accordingly. Guidance can be obtained from 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended).

The prosecution does not need to prove that any property was in fact stolen. They only need to prove that the accused intended to steal.

The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to steal any particular property. They only need to prove that s/he intended to steal property of some kind from inside the home.

This element will be met if the prosecution can prove that, although the accused did not know what s/he would find in the [part of the] home, s/he intended to steal anything of value that s/he might come across.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

[Where the relevant offence is common assault, add the following shaded section.]

In order to do this the prosecution must prove two things.[971]

First, they must prove that the accused intended either to apply force to a person's body, or to act in a way that would cause a person to think that force would immediately be applied to his or her body.[972]

[If further elaboration is necessary, include any relevant directions from the following bullet list.]

- [For application of force cases] It does not matter how much force the accused intended to apply. Nor does it matter whether or not that force would have harmed the person. An intention to merely touch someone is enough.
- [For application of force cases] It does not matter whether s/he would have actually been able to apply the force. It is sufficient for the accused to have intended to apply force.
- [For apprehension of force cases] S/he does not need to have intended to actually apply such force. The accused only needs to have intended to cause someone to believe that force would be applied.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that the accused intended to act in this way in circumstances in which there was no lawful justification or excuse for his/her conduct.

[Possible forms of lawful justification or excuse include consent, self-defence, arrest, the lawful correction of children and ordinary social activity. For guidance on directions for these matters see 7.4.8 Common Law Assault.]

[If no lawful justifications or excuses are open on the evidence, add the following darker shaded text.]

In this case, it has not been suggested that there was a lawful justification or excuse for the accused's alleged actions. You should therefore have no difficulty finding that, if NOA intended to [apply force to a person's body/act in a way that would cause a person to think that force would immediately be applied to his or her body], that was done without lawful justification or excuse.

[If any lawful justifications or excuses are open on the evidence, give appropriate directions incorporating reference to the evidence and arguments relevant to the justification or excuse, and concluding with the darker shaded text.]

---

[971] This charge is designed for use in cases where this element raises only simple issues. If more complex issues arise, the charge should be expanded accordingly. Guidance can be obtained from 7.4.8.1 Charge: Assault – Application of Force or 7.4.8.3 Charge: Assault – No Application of Force.

[972] If the prosecution relies on only one basis of culpability, directions on the alternative basis should be omitted.

Remember, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused's behaviour was without lawful [justification/excuse]. The defence does not need to prove that NOA had such a [justification/excuse].

The accused must have had the relevant intention at the time s/he entered the [part of the] home. If you accept that it is reasonably possible that NOA only formed that intention after entering the [part of the] home, then this element will not be satisfied.

Entry in company

Warning! This element has not been considered by Victorian courts. Judges should seek submissions before directing the jury about this element.

The fourth element the prosecution must prove is that the accused entered the home "in company" with two or more other people.

In this case, the prosecution says that NOA entered the home "in company" with [identify those said to be in company].[973]

To prove this element, the prosecution must prove three matters.

One – NOA must have had a "common purpose" with [identify those said to be in company] to commit the home invasion.

This means that s/he must have agreed with [identify those said to be in company] to commit the home invasion.[974]

The second matter is that [at least two of] [identify those said to be in company] must have been physically present at the home invasion.

This means that [at least two of] [identify those said to be in company] must have entered the [part of the] home with NOA. It would not be enough if one person entered with NOA and others stood outside as lookouts, or getaway drivers.

The third matter is that [i*dentify those said to be in company*] must have been able to contribute to the offending, by encouraging NOA or intimidating anyone else in the [part of the] home.[975]

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

The accused was armed

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her at the time of entering the [part of the] home.

For this element to be met, there are three things that the prosecution must prove.

---

[973] Where the other offenders cannot be identified, the names of the co-offenders should be replaced with a statement such as "three other people who have not been identified".

[974] Where the scope of the agreement is in issue, this direction may be modified. See Charge: Statutory Complicity (Agreement, Arrangement or Understanding) for guidance.

[975] In cases where any victim of the offence is not aware of the additional people, the discussion of this third requirement must be modified. See 7.5.7 Aggravated Home Invasion for guidance.

First, they must prove that, at the time of entering the [part of the] home, NOA had [identify item] either on him/her or readily available for use.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that [identify item] falls within the category of [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive].

[Where there is a dispute about whether the article possessed was a firearm, add relevant parts of the following shaded section.]

The law defines a "firearm" to be any device which is designed or adapted to discharge bullets or other missiles, either by the expansion of gases produced in the device by the ignition of strongly combustible materials, or by compressed air or other gases. The definition of "firearm" also includes anything which looks like such a device.

However, certain things are excluded from the definition of a "firearm". These include [identify relevant exception, e.g. "underwater spear guns"].

To be a "firearm", the device does not need to be assembled, complete or operational. If it fits the definition I have just given you, it will be a "firearm", whether or not it actually works.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an imitation firearm with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

An "imitation firearm" is anything which has the appearance of being a firearm, whether or not it is capable of being fired.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an offensive weapon with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

The law defines two different kinds of items as "offensive weapons". First, an item is an offensive weapon if it is specifically made or adapted for the use of injuring or incapacitating a person. Secondly, an ordinarily inoffensive item that does not meet this criterion can also become an "offensive weapon" if the person carrying it intends or threatens to use it to injure or incapacitate a person.

[If it is alleged that the relevant article was made for the use of injuring or incapacitating a person, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution argued that the [identify item] is an "offensive weapon" because it is made for injuring or incapacitating people. That is, it is an item that is normally used for this purpose.

[If it is alleged that the relevant article was adapted for the use of injuring or incapacitating a person, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution argued that the [identify item] was an "offensive weapon" because it was adapted for the use of injuring or incapacitating people. That is, it was physically modified so that it could cause injury or incapacitate a person.

[If it is alleged that an ordinary article became an offensive weapon because of the accused's use, threats or intention, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution argued that the [identify item] was an "offensive weapon" because NOA [used/threatened to use/intended to use] it for the purpose of injuring or incapacitating a person.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an explosive with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

An "explosive" is any item which is manufactured for the purpose of producing a practical effect by explosion, or which is intended to have that purpose. Any item that fits this definition will be an "explosive", whether or not it actually works.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an imitation explosive with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

An "imitation explosive" is any item which might reasonably be taken to be, or to contain, an explosive.

Thirdly, the prosecution must prove that the accused had the [identify item] with him/her for the purpose of the home invasion. This will be the case if NOA had the [identify item] with him/her for the purpose of [stealing property from within the [part of the] home/assaulting a person within the [part of the] home].

In determining this matter you should focus on NOA's intention at the time s/he entered the [part of] the home. It does not matter what his/her intention was at the time s/he first handled the [identify item].

In this case the prosecution argued that all three of these requirements have been met. [Describe prosecution evidence and/or arguments.]

The defence [describe defence case [if any] in respect of this element, e.g.

- denied that NOA had a gun with him/her at the time of the burglary;
- denied that the bottle was an offensive weapon;
- denied that NOA had the knife with him/her for the purpose of the home invasion.]

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether all three of these matters have been proven beyond reasonable doubt. It is only if you are satisfied that NOA had [identify item] with him/her at the time of the entry, that [identify item] was a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive], and that NOA had that item with him/her for the purposes of the home invasion that this element will be met.

Knowledge or recklessness of inhabitants

The sixth element that the prosecution must prove is that when s/he entered the [part of the] home the accused knew that a person was then present in that [part of the] home, or was reckless as to whether or not a person was then so present.

The law says that an accused will have been reckless in this way if s/he believed at the time of his/her entry, that another person was probably present in that [part of the] home.

It is not sufficient for the prosecution to prove that NOA believed that it was possible that a person was present. They must prove that s/he believed that this was probably the case.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

A person was present

The seventh element that the prosecution must prove is that a person, other than a co-offender, was present in the home at any stage while NOA was trespassing in the [part of the] home.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of home invasion, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA entered [part of] a home; and

Two – that NOA did so as a trespasser. That is:

- S/he entered the [part of the] home without any right or authority to enter; and

- S/he knew that s/he had no right or authority to enter that [part of the] home, or at least knew that that was probably the case; and

Three – that at that time NOA intended to commit the offence of [insert offence relied upon by the prosecution, e.g. "theft", "common assault"]; and

Four – that NOA entered the home in company with at least two other people; and

Five – that NOA had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her when s/he entered the [part of the] home; and

Six – that NOA knew or was reckless as to the presence of another person in the [part of the] home when s/he entered that [part of the] home; and Seven – that a person was present while NOA was in the [part of the] home as a trespasser.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of home invasion.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

7.5.7.2 Checklist: Aggravated Home Invasion

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

The Elements

Seven elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. NOA entered a home.
2. NOA entered the home as a trespasser.
3. NOA entered the home intending to [identify secondary offence].
4. NOA entered the home in company with two or more other people.
5. NOA had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her when s/he entered the home.
6. At the time of entering the home, NOA knew or was reckless as to there being another person present in the home.
7. A person was present while NOA was in the home.

Entered a home

1. Did NOA enter a home?

    1.1 Is [identify premises] a home?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Aggravated Home Invasion

    1.2 Did NOA enter [identify premises]?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Aggravated Home Invasion

Entry as a trespasser

2. Did NOA enter the home as a trespasser?

2.1 Did NOA enter the home without any right or authority to enter?

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Aggravated Home Invasion

2.2 Did NOA know that s/he had no right to enter the home or did NOA believe it was probable that s/he had no right to enter?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Aggravated Home Invasion

Enter intending to commit an offence

3. Did NOA enter the home intending to commit [insert offence]?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Aggravated Home Invasion

Entry in company

4. Did NOA enter the home in company with two or more other people?

4.1 Did NOA agree with [identify alleged co-offenders] to commit the home invasion?

If Yes, then go to 4.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Aggravated Home Invasion

4.2 Were at least two of [identify alleged co-offenders] physically present in the home with NOA?

If Yes, then go to 4.3

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Aggravated Home Invasion

4.3 Were physically present co-offenders able to contribute to the offending?

Consider – Co-offenders may be able to contribute by encouraging NOA or by intimidating others in the home

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Aggravated Home Invasion

[Firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive]

5. Did NOA have a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her at the time of the home invasion?

5.1 Did NOA have [identify item] on him/her or readily available for use at the time of entering the home?

If Yes, then go to 5.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Aggravated Home Invasion

5.2 Is [identify item] a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive]?

If Yes, then go to 5.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Aggravated Home Invasion

5.3 Did NOA have [identify item] for the purpose of the alleged home invasion?

If Yes, then go to 6

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Aggravated Home Invasion

Knowledge of person present

6. At the time of entering the home, did NOA either know that a person was present in the home or did NOA believe it was probable that a person would be present in the home?

If Yes, then go to 7

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Aggravated Home Invasion

Person present in the home

7. Was there a person other than a co-offender present in the home while NOA was trespassing in the home?

If Yes, then the Accused is guilty of Aggravated Home Invasion (provided you have answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6)

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Aggravated Home Invasion

Last updated: 9 March 2017

7.5.8 Carjacking

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Carjacking is an offence under Crimes Act 1958 s 79.
2. The offence has the following three elements:
   i) The accused stole a vehicle;
   ii) Immediately before or at the time of the theft, the accused:
      (a) Used force on any person; or
      (b) Put any person in fear that s/he or another person would, then and there, be subject to the use of force; or
      (c) Sought to put any person in fear that s/he or another person would, then and there, be subject to the use of force; and
   iii) The accused did so in order to commit the theft (Crimes Act 1958 s 79(1)).
3. Apart from one difference, this offence is the same as robbery. The one difference is that whereas robbery can involve theft of any property, carjacking must involve theft of a vehicle.
4. A vehicle is defined to include:
   (a) A motor vehicle;
   (b) A vessel within the meaning of the Marine Safety Act 2010 (Crimes Act 1958 s 79(3)).
5. As noted in 7.5.1 Theft, Crimes Act 1958 s 73(14) provides that proof that a person uses a vehicle without the consent of the owner is conclusive evidence that the person intends to permanently deprive the owner of that vehicle.
6. Users should refer to 7.5.2 Robbery for details about the elements of this offence.

Last updated: 9 March 2017

7.5.8.1 Charge: Carjacking

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge can be used where one or more elements of the offence are in issue. If the only issue relied upon by the accused, or raised by the evidence, is that the accused was not the offender, this charge should be adapted. See 7.5.2.1 Charge: Robbery (Short) for guidance on possible adaptions.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of carjacking. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused committed theft of a vehicle.

Two – immediately before or at the time of the theft, the accused either:

- Used force on a person; or
- Put a person in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there; or
- Sought to put a person in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there.

Three – the accused acted in that way in order to commit the theft.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[976]

Theft

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed theft of a vehicle. In order to do this, the prosecution must prove four things.[977]

First, they must prove that the accused appropriated property that belonged to another person. Although the word "appropriation" has a technical legal meaning, and includes many different types of acts, here it simply means to take something without the owner's consent.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA took [identify vehicle] that belonged to [identify owner]. [Summarise prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

Second, the prosecution must prove that the property was a "vehicle". There is no dispute that [identify vehicle] is a vehicle.[978]

Third, the prosecution must prove that, when the accused appropriated the vehicle, s/he intended to permanently deprive the owner of it. That is, s/he intended that the owner would never get it back.

For this offence, the law states that the prosecution can prove an intention to permanently deprive by showing that the accused took or used the vehicle without the consent of the owner.

[Identify prosecution evidence and/or arguments.]

Fourth, the prosecution must prove that, at the time of the appropriation, the accused was acting dishonestly. In this context, "dishonesty" does not have its ordinary meaning. It is given a special legal meaning, which says that the accused will have acted dishonestly if, when s/he took the vehicle, s/he did not believe that s/he had a legal right to take it.

In this case there is no evidence that the accused believed s/he had a legal right to take the vehicle. So if you are satisfied that NOA took the vehicle, you should have no difficulty finding this requirement proven.

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether NOA committed theft of a vehicle. This will only be the case if you are satisfied that all four of the requirements I have just outlined have been proven beyond reasonable doubt.

---

[976] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be explained briefly, and followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meet the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[977] This part of the charge is designed for use in cases where the theft element does not raise any technical issues. If such issues do arise, the charge should be adapted or expanded accordingly. Guidance can be obtained from 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended).

[978] If the nature of the property as a vehicle is in issue, or if the jury might be surprised that the relevant property is a vehicle (e.g. a house boat), this direction should be expanded.

Force or fear of force

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that, immediately before or at the time of the theft, the accused either:

- Used force on a person; or
- Put a person in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there; or
- Sought to put a person in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there.

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA [identify relevant ground[s] *and people involved, e.g. "used force against NOC"*] when s/he [describe relevant conduct]. The defence denied this, arguing [describe defence evidence and/or arguments].

[If it is alleged that the accused put, or sought to put, a person in fear, add the following shaded section.]

You will note that it is not enough for the prosecution to prove that NOA put, or sought to put, NOC in fear that force was going to be used on him/her/NO3P[979] at some distant or uncertain time. To prove this element on the basis of the threatened use of force, the prosecution must prove that NOA put, or sought to put, NOC in fear that force was going to be used on him/her/NO3P then and there.

You will also note that, while this element will be met if you are satisfied that NOC was actually fearful that such force was going to be used, this is not necessary. This element will be met if the prosecution can prove that NOA sought to put NOC in fear, even if that attempt was unsuccessful.

Conduct was committed "in order" to steal

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted in the way s/he did in order to commit the theft of the vehicle. That is, NOA must have [used force on NOC/put NOC in fear of the use of force/sought to put NOC in fear of the use of force] for the purpose of stealing the vehicle, rather than for another reason.

[Insert any relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of carjacking, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA committed theft of a vehicle, by dishonestly appropriating a vehicle that belonged to another person, intending to permanently deprive the owner of that vehicle; and

Two – that immediately before or at the time of the theft, NOA either:

- Used force on NOC; or
- Put NOC in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there; or
- Sought to put NOC in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there; and [979] Name of third party.

Three – that NOA acted in this way in order to commit the theft of the vehicle.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of carjacking.

Last updated: 9 March 2017

7.5.8.2 Checklist: Carjacking

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

The Elements

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. NOA committed theft of a vehicle.
2. Immediately before or at the time of the theft NOA:
   (a) Used force on NOC;
   (b) Put NOC in fear that force was going to be used then and there; or
   (c) Sought to put NOC in fear that force was going to be used then and there.
3. NOA acted in this way in order to commit the theft.

Theft of a vehicle

1. Did NOA commit theft of a vehicle?

1.1 Did NOA appropriate property belonging to another?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Carjacking

1.2 Is [identify vehicle] a vehicle?

If Yes, then go to 1.3

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Carjacking

1.3 Did NOA intend to permanently deprive the owner of the vehicle?

Consider – A person intends to permanently deprive the owner of a vehicle if s/he takes or uses the vehicle without the consent of the owner

If Yes, then go to 1.4

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Carjacking

1.4 Was NOA acting dishonestly?

Consider – For this purpose, "dishonestly" means "without a belief in a legal right to take the vehicle"

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Carjacking

Use of force

2. Has the prosecution proved any of the following uses of force?

2.1 Did NOA use force on NOC?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then go to 2.2

2.2 Did NOA put NOC in fear that force was going to be used on him/her/another person then and there?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then go to 2.3

2.3 Did NOA seek to put NOC in fear that force was going to be used on him/her/another person then and there?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Carjacking

Conduct committed in order to steal

3. Did NOA use force, put NOC in fear of force or seek to put NOC in fear of force in order to steal the car?

*Consider – What was the purpose of NOA's actions?

If Yes, then the Accused is guilty of Carjacking (provided you have answered yes to questions 1 and 2)

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Carjacking

Last updated: 9 March 2017

7.5.9 Aggravated Carjacking

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Aggravated carjacking is an offence under Crimes Act 1958 s 79A.
2. The offence has the following three elements:

   i) The accused commits carjacking; and

   ii) Either

   (a) at the time the person has with them a firearm, an imitation firearm, an offensive weapon, an explosive or an imitation explosive; or

   (b) in the course of the carjacking the person causes injury to another person (Crimes Act 1958 s 79A(1)).

3. As noted in 7.5.8 Carjacking, the basic offence of carjacking consists of robbery where the property stolen is a car. See 7.5.2 Robbery for information on the first element.
4. The second element consists of two alternatives: Possession of a proscribed weapon; or Causing injury to a person.
5. For information on possession of a proscribed weapon, see 7.5.3 Armed Robbery.
6. In relation to the alternative second element of causing injury to a person, the Crimes Act 1958 specifies that injury has the same meaning as in section 15 (Crimes Act 1958 s 79A(3)).
7. Section 15 contains the following relevant definitions:

   > Injury means:
   > a) Physical injury; or > b) Harm to mental health;
   > whether temporary or permanent
   > Harm to mental health includes psychological harm but does not include an emotional reaction such as distress, grief, fear or anger unless it results in psychological harm;
   > Physical injury includes unconsciousness, disfigurement, substantial pain, infection with a disease and an impairment of bodily function.

8. The element requires proof that the accused caused the injury 'in the course of the carjacking'. This likely requires proof that the accused caused the injury as part of, or for the purpose of, the carjacking. It will likely be a matter of fact and degree for the jury to determine whether the prosecution has proved the necessary relationship between the causing injury and the carjacking.
9. The Act is silent on any fault element associated with this alternative second element. Judges will therefore need to engage in a process of statutory construction, taking into account principles relevant to the interpretation of ambiguous penal statutes (see Coco v R (1994) 179 CLR 427; Bropho v State of Western Australia (1990) 171 CLR 1; Beckwith v R (1976) 135 CLR 569).
10. As a matter of prudence, the model charge in this Charge Book assumes for this element that the accused must intend to cause injury.

Last updated: 9 March 2017

7.5.9.1 Charge: Aggravated Carjacking

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge can be used where one or more elements of the offence are in issue. If the only issue relied upon by the accused, or raised by the evidence, is that the accused was not the offender, this charge should be adapted. See Charge: Robbery (Short) for guidance on possible adaptions.

This direction is written as if the prosecution relies on both Crimes Act 1958 s 79A(1)(a) and s 79A(1)(b) as forms of aggravation. It must be modified if the prosecution elects to rely on only one form of aggravation.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of aggravated carjacking. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt. The first three make up the crime of carjacking, and the four is what changes carjacking into aggravated carjacking.

One – the accused committed theft of a vehicle.

Two – immediately before or at the time of the theft, the accused either:

- Used force on a person; or
- Put a person in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there; or
- Sought to put a person in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there.

Three – the accused acted in that way in order to commit the theft.

Four – The accused either had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her or intentionally caused injury to a person during the alleged carjacking.[980]

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[981]

Theft

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed theft of a vehicle. In order to do this, the prosecution must prove four things.[982]

First, they must prove that the accused appropriated property that belonged to another person. Although the word "appropriation" has a technical legal meaning, and includes many different types of acts, here it simply means to take something without the owner's consent.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA took [identify vehicle] that belonged to [identify owner]. [Summarise prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

Second, the prosecution must prove that the property was a "vehicle". There is no dispute that [identify vehicle] is a vehicle.[983]

---

[980] Where the prosecution only relies on one form of aggravation, this statement of the element should only refer to that form of aggravation.

[981] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be explained briefly, and followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meet the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[982] This part of the charge is designed for use in cases where the theft element does not raise any technical issues. If such issues do arise, the charge should be adapted or expanded accordingly. Guidance can be obtained from 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended).

[983] If the nature of the property as a vehicle is in issue, or if the jury might be surprised that the relevant property is a vehicle (e.g. a house boat), this direction should be expanded.

Thirdly, the prosecution must prove that, when the accused appropriated the vehicle, s/he intended to permanently deprive the owner of it. That is, s/he intended that the owner would never get it back.

For this offence, the law states that the prosecution can prove an intention to permanently deprive by showing that the accused took or used the vehicle without the consent of the owner.

[Identify prosecution evidence and/or arguments.]

Fourthly, the prosecution must prove that, at the time of the appropriation, the accused was acting dishonestly. In this context, "dishonesty" does not have its ordinary meaning. It is given a special legal meaning, which says that the accused will have acted dishonestly if, when s/he took the vehicle, s/he did not believe that s/he had a legal right to take it.

In this case there is no evidence that the accused believed s/he had a legal right to take the vehicle. So if you are satisfied that NOA took the vehicle, you should have no difficulty finding this requirement proven.

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether NOA committed theft of a vehicle. This will only be the case if you are satisfied that all four of the requirements I have just outlined have been proven beyond reasonable doubt.

Force or fear of force

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that, immediately before or at the time of the theft, the accused either:

- Used force on a person; or
- Put a person in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there; or
- Sought to put a person in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there.

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA [identify relevant ground[s] *and people involved, e.g. "used force against NOC"*] when s/he [describe relevant conduct]. The defence denied this, arguing [describe defence evidence and/or arguments].

[If it is alleged that the accused put, or sought to put, a person in fear, add the following shaded section.]

You will note that it is not enough for the prosecution to prove that NOA put, or sought to put, NOC in fear that force was going to be used on him/her/NO3P[984] at some distant or uncertain time. To prove this element on the basis of the threatened use of force, the prosecution must prove that NOA put, or sought to put, NOC in fear that force was going to be used on him/her/NO3P then and there.

You will also note that, while this element will be met if you are satisfied that NOC was actually fearful that such force was going to be used, this is not necessary. This element will be met if the prosecution can prove that NOA sought to put NOC in fear, even if that attempt was unsuccessful.

Conduct was committed "in order" to steal

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted in the way s/he did in order to commit the theft of the vehicle. That is, NOA must have [used force on NOC/put NOC in fear of the use of force/sought to put NOC in fear of the use of force] for the purpose of stealing the vehicle, rather than for another reason.

[Insert any relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

---

[984] Name of third party.

Aggravating element

The fourth element is called the aggravating element. It makes this form of alleged carjacking more serious than other forms of alleged carjacking. The prosecution relies on two alternative aggravating elements. If you find either of these elements proved, then you may find this fourth element proved.[985]

The first aggravating element is that the accused, at the time of the alleged carjacking, had with him/her a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/an imitation explosive].

For this aggravating element to be proved, there are three things that the prosecution must prove.

First, they must prove that, at the time of the alleged carjacking NOA had [identify item] either on him/her or readily available for use.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that [identify item] falls within the category of [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive].

[Where there is a dispute about whether the article possessed was a firearm, add relevant parts of the following shaded section.]

The law defines a "firearm" to be any device which is designed or adapted to discharge bullets or other missiles, either by the expansion of gases produced in the device by the ignition of strongly combustible materials, or by compressed air or other gases. The definition of "firearm" also includes anything which looks like such a device.

However, certain things are excluded from the definition of a "firearm". These include [identify relevant exception, e.g. "underwater spear guns"].

To be a "firearm", the device does not need to be assembled, complete or operational. If it fits the definition I have just given you, it will be a "firearm", whether or not it actually works.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an imitation firearm with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

An "imitation firearm" is anything which has the appearance of being a firearm, whether or not it is capable of being fired.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an offensive weapon with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

The law defines two different kinds of items as "offensive weapons". First, an item is an offensive weapon if it is specifically made or adapted for the use of injuring or incapacitating a person. Secondly, an ordinarily inoffensive item that does not meet this criterion can also become an "offensive weapon" if the person carrying it intends or threatens to use it to injure or incapacitate a person.

[If it is alleged that the relevant article was made for the use of injuring or incapacitating a person, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution argued that the [identify item] is an "offensive weapon" because it is made for injuring or incapacitating people. That is, it is an item that is normally used for this purpose.

[If it is alleged that the relevant article was adapted for the use of injuring or incapacitating a person, add the [985] If the prosecution only relies on one form of aggravation, this paragraph and the directions on this element should be modified to only refer to the form of aggravation in issue.

following darker shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution argued that the [identify item] was an "offensive weapon" because it was adapted for the use of injuring or incapacitating people. That is, it was physically modified so that it could cause injury or incapacitate a person.

[If it is alleged that an ordinary article became an offensive weapon because of the accused's use, threats or intention, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution argued that the [identify item] was an "offensive weapon" because NOA [used/threatened to use/intended to use] it for the purpose of injuring or incapacitating a person.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an explosive with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

An "explosive" is any item which is manufactured for the purpose of producing a practical effect by explosion, or which is intended to have that purpose. Any item that fits this definition will be an "explosive", whether or not it actually works.

[Where it is alleged that the accused had an imitation explosive with him/her, add the following shaded section.]

An "imitation explosive" is any item which might reasonably be taken to be, or to contain, an explosive.

Thirdly, the prosecution must prove that the accused had the [identify item] with him/her for the purpose of the alleged carjacking. This will be the case if NOA had the [identify item] with him/her for the purpose of stealing the vehicle and either using force on NOC or putting or seeking to put NOC in fear that s/he or another person will then and there be subject to force.

In determining this matter you should focus on NOA's intention at the time s/he is alleged to have stolen the vehicle. It does not matter what his/her intention was at the time s/he first handled the [identify item].

In this case the prosecution argued that all three of these requirements have been met. [Describe prosecution evidence and/or arguments.]

The defence [describe defence case [if any] in respect of this element, e.g.

- denied that NOA had a gun with him/her at the time of the burglary;
- denied that the bottle was an offensive weapon;
- denied that NOA had the knife with him/her for the purpose of the home invasion.]

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether all three of these matters have been proven beyond reasonable doubt. It is only if you are satisfied that NOA had [identify item] with him/her at the time of the carjacking, that [identify item] was a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive], and that NOA had that item with him/her for the purposes of the carjacking that this first aggravating element will be proved.

The second aggravating element is that in the course of the carjacking NOA intentionally caused injury to another person. There are three parts to this aggravating element.

First, NOA must have caused injury to NOC. The law says that injury means a physical injury or harm to mental health, whether temporary or permanent. Physical injury includes unconsciousness, disfigurement, substantial pain, infection with a disease and an impairment of bodily function. It also includes all the things that you would, as a matter of ordinary experience, call an injury. Harm to mental health includes psychological harm, but not emotional reactions such as distress, grief, fear or anger which do not result in psychological harm.

To prove this element, the prosecution must show that NOC suffered an injury, rather than some superficial or trivial harm.

Second, NOA must have intended to cause injury to NOC. That is, at the time of the acts which caused the injury, NOA must have intended to injure NOC.

It is not, however, necessary that NOA intended to inflict the injury that NOC actually suffered. This third element will be satisfied even if NOA intended to inflict a different kind of injury.

Third, NOA must have caused the injury in the course of the alleged carjacking. The prosecution must show that NOA causing NOC injury was not separate or unrelated to the alleged carjacking.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Remember, the prosecution must prove one of these two aggravating elements beyond reasonable doubt. As this is an element of the offence, you can only find NOA guilty of this offence if you all agree which aggravating element has been proved.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of aggravated carjacking, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA committed theft of a vehicle, by dishonestly appropriating a vehicle that belonged to another person, intending to permanently deprive the owner of that vehicle; and

Two – that immediately before or at the time of the theft, NOA either:

- Used force on NOC; or
- Put NOC in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there; or
- Sought to put NOC in fear that force was going to be used on him/her [or another person], then and there; and

Three – that NOA acted in this way in order to commit the theft.

Four – that NOA either had with him/her a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] or in the course of the carjacking NOA intentionally caused injury to another person.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of aggravated carjacking.

Last updated: 20 March 2023

7.5.9.2 Checklist: Aggravated Carjacking

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

The Elements

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. NOA committed theft of a vehicle.
2. Immediately before or at the time of the theft NOA:
   (a) Used force on NOC;
   (b) Put NOC in fear that force was going to be used then and there; or
   (c) Sought to put NOC in fear that force was going to be used then and there.
3. NOA acted in this way in order to commit the theft.
4. NOA either:

(a) Had a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her; or

(b) Intentionally caused injury to another person in the course of the carjacking

Theft of a vehicle

1. Did NOA commit theft of a vehicle?

1.1 Did NOA appropriate property belonging to another?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Aggravated Carjacking

1.2 Is [identify vehicle] a vehicle?

If Yes, then go to 1.3

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Aggravated Carjacking

1.3 Did NOA intend to permanently deprive the owner of the vehicle?

Consider – A person intends to permanently deprive the owner of a vehicle if s/he takes or uses the vehicle without the consent of the owner

If Yes, then go to 1.4

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Aggravated Carjacking

1.4 Was NOA acting dishonestly?

Consider – For this purpose, "dishonestly" means "without a belief in a legal right to take the vehicle"

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Aggravated Carjacking

Use of force

2. Has the prosecution proved any of the following uses of force?

2.1 Did NOA use force on NOC?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then go to 2.2

2.2 Did NOA put NOC in fear that force was going to be used on him/her/another person then and there?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then go to 2.3

2.3 Did NOA seek to put NOC in fear that force was going to be used on him/her/another person then and there?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Aggravated Carjacking

Conduct committed in order to steal

3. Did NOA use force, put NOC in fear of force or seek to put NOC in fear of force in order to steal the car?

*Consider – What was the purpose of NOA's actions?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Aggravated Carjacking

Aggravating element – [Firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive]

4. Did NOA have a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive] with him/her at the time of the carjacking?

4.1 Did NOA have [identify item] on him/her or readily available for use at the time of the alleged carjacking?

If Yes, then go to 4.2

If No, then go to 5

4.2 Is [identify item] a [firearm/imitation firearm/offensive weapon/explosive/imitation explosive]?

If Yes, then go to 4.3

If No, then go to 5

4.3 Did NOA have [identify item] for the purpose of the alleged carjacking?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Aggravated Carjacking (provided you have answered yes to questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then go to 5

Aggravating element – Intentionally causing injury

5. Did NOA intentionally cause injury to a person in the course of the alleged carjacking?

5.1 Did NOA cause injury to NOC?

Consider – Injury can be "physical injury" or "harm to mental health"

Consider – "Physical injury" includes unconsciousness, disfigurement, substantial pain, infection with a disease and an impairment of bodily function

Consider – Harm to mental health includes psychological harm, but not emotional reactions such as distress, grief, fear or anger which do not result in psychological harm

If Yes, then go to 5.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Aggravated Carjacking

5.2 Did NOA cause injury intentionally?

If Yes, then go to 5.3

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Aggravated Carjacking

5.3 Did NOA cause the injury in the course of the alleged carjacking?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Aggravated Carjacking (provided you have answered yes to questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Aggravated Carjacking

Last updated: 9 March 2017

7.5.10 Handling Stolen Goods

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Handling stolen goods is an offence under Crimes Act 1958 s 88.
2. The offence has the following four elements:
   i) The accused handled goods;
   ii) The goods were stolen goods at the time that the accused handled them;

iii) The accused knew or believed at the time that he or she handled the goods that they were stolen goods; and

iv) The accused's handling of the goods was dishonest (Crimes Act 1958 s 88; R v Henderson & Warwick (2009) 22 VR 662; R v Georgiou [2009] VSCA 57).

Handling of Goods

3. The first element the prosecution must prove is that the accused "handled goods" (Crimes Act 1958 s 88(1)).

4. "Goods" include:

   - Money;
   - Every other type of property except land; and
   - Things severed from land by stealing (Crimes Act 1958 s 71(1)).

5. Section 88(1) of the Crimes Act 1958 states that a person "handles" goods if he or she "receives the goods or brings them into Victoria, or… undertakes or assists in bringing them into Victoria or in their retention, removal, disposal or realization by or for the benefit of another person, or if he arranges to do so".

6. This provision specifies 24 different ways in which a person can "handle" goods:

   - By "receiving" the goods (1);
   - By bringing the goods into Victoria (2), or undertaking (3) or assisting in (4) bringing them into Victoria;
   - By undertaking the retention (5), removal (6), disposal (7) or realisation (8) of the goods for the benefit of another person;
   - By assisting in the retention (9), removal (10), disposal (11) or realisation (12) of the goods by another person; or
   - By arranging to do any of the 12 matters listed above (13–24).

7. Not all of these matters have been addressed by the courts. This topic only addresses those areas which have been the subject of judicial guidance.

Receiving goods

8. A person "receives" goods by taking them into his or her possession (R v Cottrell [1983] 1 VR 143).

9. To establish that the accused took goods into his or her possession, the prosecution must prove that he or she:

   i) Had custody of or control over the goods; and

   ii) Intended to have custody of or exercise control over the goods (DPP v Brooks [1974] AC 862; He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523; R v Maio [1989] VR 281; R v Mateiasevici [1999] 3 VR 185).

10. The fact that a third party has actual possession of the goods does not mean the accused cannot have "received" the goods. For example, if the accused has sufficient control over the third party, such that the goods are available to him or her upon request, he or she will have "received" them (R v Cottrell [1983] 1 VR 143).

11. A person cannot receive goods from him or herself (R v Seymour [1954] 1 All ER 1006).

12. For further information concerning possession, see "Common Law Possession" in 7.6.3 Possession of a Drug of Dependence.

Undertaking and assisting

13. There is a difference between "undertaking" and "assisting":
    - When the accused "undertakes" one of the prohibited activities, he or she does it him or herself;
    - When the accused "assists" one of the prohibited activities, he or she helps another person to perform that activity (R v Bloxham [1983] 1 AC 109).
14. A person can "assist" in one of the prohibited activities even if that assistance is futile. For example, a person "assists" in the retention of stolen goods by lying to the police about the existence of the goods, even if the police know the person is lying (R v Kanwar [1982] 2 All ER 528).

By or for the benefit of another person

15. Where it is alleged that the act of handling involved the retention, removal, disposal or realization of stolen goods, the accused must have either:
    - Undertaken (or arranged to undertake) that activity him or herself for the benefit of another person; or
    - Assisted (or arranged to assist) another person to carry out that activity (Crimes Act 1958 s 88(1); R v Bloxham [1983] 1 AC 109).
16. Thus, a person who simply retains stolen goods does not "handle" them. He or she must do one of the following:
    - Retain the goods for the benefit of another person;
    - Assist another person to retain the goods; or
    - Arrange to do one of the above activities (R v Brown [1970] 1 QB 105).
17. Similarly, a person who sells stolen goods, and keeps all of the proceeds for him or herself, does not "handle" the goods by disposing of or realising them for the benefit of another. The fact that the purchaser has benefited (in the sense of acquiring the goods) is not sufficient. To have "handled" the goods, the accused must have sold them for the benefit of a person other than the purchaser (R v Bloxham [1983] 1 AC 109).[986]
18. However, a vendor of stolen goods may have:
    - Committed other acts of handling, such as bringing the goods into Victoria; or
    - Committed other offences, such as obtaining property by deception (see 7.5.12 Obtaining Property by Deception) or aiding and abetting the handling of stolen goods by the purchaser (Carter Patersons & Pickfords Carriers Ltd v Wessel [1947] KB 849. See also Aiding, Abetting, Counselling or Procuring).

[986] R v Bloxham [1983] 1 AC 109 did not consider the separate question of whether the act of selling stolen goods involves receiving goods that represent the stolen goods under the tracing rules in Crimes Act 1958 s 90(2), or assisting the purchaser in the disposal of goods that represent the stolen goods. The implications of s 90(2) have not yet been fully explored. See also Farrugia v R [2011] VSCA 201 at footnote 3.

19. There is conflict in the authorities about whether the purchaser of stolen goods "handles" them by undertaking the realisation of goods for the benefit of the vendor (compare R v Bloxham [1981] 1 WLR 859 and R v Deakin [1972] 3 All ER 803). However, this conflict is unlikely to matter in practice, as a purchaser of stolen goods will usually "handle" the goods by receiving them, or by assisting in the vendor's realisation of the goods.[987]

20. The "other person" for whose benefit the action must have been committed cannot be a co-accused on the same handling charge (R v Gingell (2000) 1 Cr App R 88).

Arranging to do a prohibited activity

21. The closing words of s 88(1) – "or if he arranges to do so" – apply to all of the forms of handling specified in the section (see R v Bloxham [1983] 1 AC 109; Property Offences (1986), Law Book Co, 2nd ed, 376).

22. These words give rise to a substantive, rather than inchoate, offence of arranging to handle. This requires a bilateral agreement that would amount to a conspiracy to handle stolen goods (Property Offences (1986), Law Book Co, 2nd ed, 376).

The prosecution should specify the form of handling alleged

23. While it is not mandatory, the prosecution should specify in the indictment the particular forms of handling alleged (R v Nicklin [1977] 2 All ER 444; R v Ikpong [1972] Crim LR 432; Property Offences (1986), Law Book Company, 2nd ed, 376).

24. While the prosecution may charge the accused with different forms of handling as alternatives, they should generally not use more than two charges to cover the alternatives. One charge will specify handling by receiving, and the other charge will specify any other form of handling that is relevant in the case (e.g. handling by assisting in the disposal of goods for the benefit of another person) (R v Nicklin [1977] 2 All ER 444; R v Ikpong [1972] Crim LR 432; Property Offences (1986), Law Book Company, 2nd ed, 376).

25. The jury may only convict the accused of a type of handling that is specified in the indictment (R v Nicklin [1971] 1 WLR 403).

Stolen Goods

26. The second element the prosecution must prove is that the goods were "stolen goods" at the time that the accused handled them (Crimes Act 1958 s 88(1); Mabbott v R [1990] WAR 323; R v Park (1988) 87 Cr App R 164).

27. "Stolen goods" include:

    i) Goods stolen in Victoria or elsewhere, whether before or after the commencement of the Crimes Act 1958, provided that:

        - The stealing was an offence under the Crimes Act 1958; or
        - The stealing amounted to an offence where and at the time when the goods were stolen (Crimes Act 1958 s 90(1));

    ii) Goods which represent the stolen goods in the hands of the thief or a handler, those goods being the proceeds of any disposal or realisation of the whole or part of the goods stolen or of [987] The issue of whether a purchaser undertakes the realisation of goods is only likely to arise if the prosecution particularises an inappropriate form of handling in the indictment.

---

goods which represent them (Crimes Act 1958 s 90(2)); and

iii) Goods obtained in Victoria or elsewhere either by blackmail or by deception in the circumstances described in Crimes Act 1958 s 81(1) (Crimes Act 1958 s 90(4)).

28. Goods which were originally taken by a legally innocent person (such as a child under the age of criminal responsibility, or a person protected by the defence of mental impairment) are not "stolen goods". Consequently, a person who subsequently handles those goods will not be guilty of this offence (Walters v Lunt [1951] 2 All ER 645; Property Offences (1986), Law Book Co, 2nd ed, 354).

29. This element will not be met where there is an arrangement to handle goods that will be stolen. The goods must have been stolen at the time of the handling (R v Park (1988) 87 Cr App R 164).[988]

Goods may cease to be "stolen goods"

30. This element will not be met if the goods have ceased to be stolen goods at the time of the handling (see, e.g. R v Dolan (1855) 6 Cox CC 449; R v Villensky [1892] 2 QB 597).

31. Goods cease to be stolen goods when:

i) They are restored to the person from whom they were stolen;

ii) They are restored to other lawful possession or custody; or

iii) The person from whom they were stolen and any other person claiming through him or her have otherwise ceased to have any right to restitution of those goods in respect of the theft (Crimes Act 1958 s 90(3)).

32. Goods will have been restored "to the person from whom they were stolen" if that person found them and resumed possession. This element will therefore not be met if the owner subsequently bails the goods to the thief in order to identify who the ultimate receiver was to be (R v Dolan (1855) 6 Cox CC 449; R v Villensky [1892] 2 QB 597).

33. Goods will have been restored to "other lawful possession or custody" when a police officer, in the course of his or her duty, takes possession or custody of them (R v Alexander and Keeley [1981] VR 277; Attorney-General's Reference (No 1 of 1974) [1974] QB 744). See "Receiving goods" above for the meaning of "possession".

34. Whether goods have been taken into the lawful possession or custody of a police officer is a question of fact that partly depends on the intention of the officer. It is for the jury to determine whether the officer took custody of the goods (Attorney-General's Reference (No 1 of 1974) [1974] QB 744).

35. A person does not take lawful possession of goods merely by:

i) Examining goods to discover whether or not they are stolen (R v Alexander and Keeley [1981] VR 277);

ii) Forming an intention to take exclusive control of the goods upon the happening of certain future events (R v Alexander and Keeley [1981] VR 277); or

iii) Watching goods with a view to catching the receiver (Attorney-General's Reference (No 1 of 1974) [1974] QB 744).

---

[988] The appropriate charge where there is an agreement to handle goods that will be stolen is conspiracy to handle stolen goods (R v Park (1988) 87 Cr App R 164).

Proving that the goods were stolen

36. The circumstances in which goods were handled may provide sufficient proof that they were stolen (R v Sbarra (1919) 13 Cr App R 118; Mabbott v R [1990] WAR 323).

37. An accused may also admit that the goods were stolen (Mabbott v R [1990] WAR 323; Ollerton v R (1989) 40 A Crim R 133).

38. Where the accused admits that goods were stolen, the weight the jury should give to that admission will depend on the reliability of the basis of the accused's knowledge:

    - An admission based on the hearsay statements of others may be unreliable, and have very little probative value;
    - An admission based on the accused's personal knowledge or experience may be reliable, and establish that the goods were stolen (Parks v Bullock [1982] VR 258; DPP v Parsons [1993] 1 VR 1; Bailey v Hinch [1989] VR 78; Reardon v Baker [1987] VR 887; Anglim & Cooke v Thomas [1974] VR 363).

Knowledge or Belief that the Goods were Stolen

39. The third element requires the prosecution to prove that at the time the accused handled the goods, he or she knew or believed that the goods were stolen goods (Crimes Act 1958 s 88(1); R v Grainge [1974] 1 WLR 619; De Bono v Nielsen (1996) 88 A Crim R 46; R v Henderson & Warwick (2009) 22 VR 662).

40. This element requires actual knowledge or belief. A suspicion that the goods were stolen is not sufficient (R v Grainge [1974] 1 WLR 619; R v Raad [1983] 3 NSWLR 344; R v Henderson & Warwick (2009) 22 VR 662).

41. "Belief" is an ordinary English word and a judge generally does not need to define it for the jury. If the jury asks what belief means, the judge may explain that it is a state of mind in which the accused accepts the truth of the belief, and that the state of mind characterised by mere suspicion is not sufficient (R v Smith (1976) 64 Cr App R 217; R v Raad [1983] 3 NSWLR 344).

42. As there is a difference between "belief" and "realisation of a high likelihood or a real chance", a judge must be careful to properly instruct the jury on the meaning of "belief" in any case where that is a real issue (R v Henderson & Warwick (2009) 22 VR 662).

43. In determining what the accused knew or believed, the jury may examine the circumstances in which the accused handled the goods. Those circumstances may provide sufficient proof that the accused knew that the goods were stolen (R v Sbarra (1919) 13 Cr App R 118; R v Fuschillo [1940] 2 All ER 489; R v Young [1953] 1 All ER 21; Mabbott v R [1990] WAR 323; see also Bird v Adams [1972] Crim LR 174; R v Chatwood [1980] 1 WLR 874; R v Pfitzner (1976) 15 SASR 171).

44. Evidence that the accused knew facts which should have put him or her on notice as to whether the goods were stolen does not necessarily prove that the accused knew or believed that the goods had been stolen. If the jury is satisfied that the accused ignored suspicious circumstances, they must determine whether this was because the accused knew or believed the goods were stolen. They must reject the possibility that the accused was simply gullible, naive or absent-minded (Atwal v Massey (1971) 56 Cr App R 6; R v Grainge [1974] 1 WLR 619; R v Bellenie [1980] Crim LR 437; R v Park (1988) 87 Cr App R 164).

45. The judge should clearly explain that the test is subjective, rather than objective. The jury may use the accused's failure to enquire as a basis for inferring the accused's subjective knowledge or belief. The judge should also explain that mere suspicion that the goods are stolen is not sufficient (R v Dykyj (1993) 29 NSWLR 672; R v Schipanski (1989) 17 NSWLR 618; R v Pethick [1980] Crim LR 242; R v Griffiths (1974) 60 Cr App R 14).

46. Negligence or gross negligence in handling goods is insufficient to prove knowledge or a belief that the goods were stolen (R v Dykyj (1993) 29 NSWLR 672; R v Havard (1916) 11 Cr App R 2; Atwal v Massey (1971) 56 Cr App R 6; R v Grainge [1974] 1 WLR 619).

Dishonesty

47. The fourth element the prosecution must prove is that the accused handled the stolen goods dishonestly (Crimes Act 1958 s 88(1)).

48. Dishonesty has a special meaning in Division 2 of the Crimes Act 1958. It means that the accused acted without any claim of legal right (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; R v Bonollo [1981] VR 633; R v Brow [1981] VR 783). See 7.5.1 Theft for further information concerning the meaning of dishonesty.

49. In some cases, a finding that the accused acted dishonestly will be inevitable once the jury is satisfied of all other elements of the offence (R v Henderson & Warwick (2009) 22 VR 662).

Doctrine of Recent Possession

50. In some circumstances, a jury may be able to infer from the fact that the accused was found in possession of recently stolen property that he or she is guilty of this offence. See 7.5.11 Recent Possession for further information.

Theft and Handling

Insertion of s 88A

51. Prior to 13 October 2004, the prosecution was also required to prove that the handling took place "otherwise than in the course of the stealing".

52. While this requirement prevented people from being convicted of both theft and handling for the same act, it created a difficulty in cases where the jury was satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused was guilty of either theft or handling, but were unsure whether or not he or she was the person who stole the goods. In such circumstances the jury was required to acquit the accused of both offences (R v Bruce [1988] VR 579; De Bono v Nielson (1996) 88 A Crim R 46; R v Marijancevic (2001) 2 VR 611).

53. In order to overcome this difficulty, s 88A was inserted into the Crimes Act 1958. This section applies to cases in which charges for theft and handling stolen goods are joined in an indictment as alternative charges and tried together. It provides that, in such cases, if the jury is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused is guilty of either theft or handling but cannot agree which, they must acquit the accused of handling stolen goods and find him or her guilty of theft (Crimes Act 1958 s 88A).

54. Section 88A applies to any trial that commenced on or after 13 October 2004, regardless of when the offence was alleged to have been committed (Crimes Act 1958 s 600(2)).

55. Section 88A only applies when charges of theft and handling are joined in one indictment as alternative charges. It is likely that the section does not apply in summary proceedings or where the accused is charged with a more serious offence (e.g. armed robbery or burglary) and theft is left to the jury as a common law alternative (see Crimes Act 1958 s 88A and Criminal Procedure Act 2009 ss 239, 240).

Removal of "otherwise than in the course of stealing"

56. At the same time as s 88A was inserted into the Crimes Act 1958, the phrase "otherwise than in the course of the stealing" was removed from s 88.

57. Unlike s 88A (which applies to all trials commenced on or after 13 October 2004), this amendment only applies to offences alleged to have been committed on or after 13 October 2004 (Crimes Act 1958 s 600(1)).

58. This means that, for offences committed on or after 13 October 2004, the jury do not need to be satisfied that the handling took place otherwise than in the course of the stealing.

Last updated: 1 July 2011

7.5.10.1 Charge: Handling by Receiving

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge should be given when it is alleged that the accused handled goods by receiving them. It will need to be modified if it is alleged that the accused handled the goods in any other way.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of handling stolen goods. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused handled goods.

Two – those goods were stolen goods.

Three – the accused knew or believed that they were stolen goods.

Four – the handling was dishonest.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Handling of goods

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused handled goods. In this case, the goods we are talking about are [identify goods].

The word "handling" is a technical legal term, which covers many different types of activities. In this case, it is alleged that the accused "handled" the goods by "receiving" them.

A person "receives" goods if he or she takes them into his or her possession or under his or her control.[989] Thus, for this element to be met you must be satisfied that NOA took possession of [identify goods], or had control over them.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Goods were Stolen Goods

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the goods were stolen goods at the time NOA received them.

[989] If possession is in issue, it may be necessary to direct the jury about the requirements of common law possession. See 7.3.30.1 Charge: Possession of Child Pornography for assistance.

This means that someone must have committed the crime of theft in relation to the goods before NOA handled the goods.[990]

[Where there is a dispute about whether a person had committed the crime of theft, add appropriately modified directions here, based on 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended)]

In this case [insert relevant evidence and arguments].

Knowledge or Belief

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused knew or believed that the goods were stolen goods at the time of the handling.

"Knew" and "believed" are ordinary words. A person either knows something or they don't. A belief is less than actual knowledge, but more than a suspicion. It involves being aware of a fact and requires a firm conviction.

When you consider what the accused knew or believed about the goods, you may take into account the circumstances in which the accused acquired the goods. However, it is not enough that the accused should have known that the goods were stolen. This element only looks at what the accused in fact knew or believed.

You must focus on the accused's state of mind at the time of the handling. A person is not guilty of handling stolen goods if s/he receives goods and then later discovers that those goods were stolen goods. The knowledge or belief that the goods were stolen must have existed at the time s/he took possession or control of the goods.

In this case [insert relevant evidence and arguments].

Dishonesty

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that at the time of the handling, the accused was acting dishonestly.

In this context, "dishonesty" has a special legal meaning. A person acts dishonestly when he or she handles property and does not believe that he or she has a legal right to do so.

In this case there is no evidence that the accused had any honest belief in respect of the handling. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.[991]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of handling stolen goods, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA handled goods; and

Two – that those goods were stolen goods at that time; and

Three – that at that time NOA knew or believed those goods were stolen goods; and Four – that NOA handled the goods dishonestly.

---

[990] If the goods may be "stolen goods" for another reason (e.g. because they were obtained through blackmail) this section will need to be modified accordingly. See 7.5.10 Handling Stolen Goods for information concerning the meaning of "stolen goods".

[991] If the issue of dishonesty is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly. See 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended) for assistance.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of handling stolen goods.

Section 88A – Handling and Theft as Alternative Offences

[If the accused is charged with both handling stolen goods and theft in the indictment, add the following shaded section.]

As you are aware, in this case NOA has been charged with both theft of [identify goods] and handling stolen goods. [Identify relevant counts on the indictment.] These are alternative charges. It is the prosecution's case that NOA either stole the goods him/herself, and so is guilty of theft, or s/he received them, and so is guilty of handling stolen goods.

There are, then, four possible views you might take about this case.

One – You are satisfied that the accused is guilty of theft;

Two – You are satisfied that the accused is guilty of handling stolen goods;

Three – You are satisfied that the accused is guilty of one of theft or handling stolen goods, but are unable to decide which one;

Four – You are not satisfied that the accused is guilty of either theft or handling.

I must direct you as a matter of law that if each of you are individually satisfied of one of the first three possibilities I just mentioned, but you are unable to unanimously agree on which offence the accused committed, the law requires you in that situation to find the accused guilty of theft and not guilty of handling, as theft is considered the less serious offence.

I emphasise that this only applies if you are all satisfied that the accused is guilty of either theft or guilty of handling. If any juror is not satisfied that the accused is guilty of theft or handling, then you will either return a verdict of not guilty of both offences, if you all take that view, or you will inform me that you are unable to reach a unanimous decision, if that is the case.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

7.5.10.2 Charge: Handling for the Benefit of Another

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge should be given when it is alleged that the accused handled goods by undertaking or assisting in their retention, removal, disposal or realization. It will need to be modified if it is alleged that the accused handled the goods in any other way.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of handling stolen goods. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused handled goods.

Two – those goods were stolen goods.

Three – the accused knew or believed that they were stolen goods.

Four – the handling was dishonest.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Handling of goods

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused handled goods. In this case, the goods we are talking about are [identify goods].

The word "handling" is a technical legal term, which covers many different types of activities. In this case, it is alleged that the accused "handled" the goods by [insert relevant type of handling, e.g. "assisting another person to dispose of them].

[If it is alleged that the accused undertook the prohibited activity him or herself, add the following shaded section.]

A person "undertakes" an activity if he or she does it him or herself. However, to be classified as "handling", that activity must be done for the benefit of another person. It is not sufficient that the accused undertakes the activity for his/her own benefit.

[If it is alleged that the accused assisted someone else to perform the prohibited activity, add the following shaded section.]

A person "assists" someone in an activity if s/he acts in a way that is intended to help them to perform that activity. It does not matter whether or not the assistance is successful.

[If relevant, add: Passively standing by, failing to speak, or failing to stop another person, is not "assistance" for the purpose of this offence.]

[If more than one person has been charged with the handling count, add the following shaded section.]

The person that NOA [assisted/undertook the activity for] cannot have been [identify co-accused]. There must have been another person for whose benefit NOA was acting.

[If it is alleged that the accused undertook or assisted in the realisation of the goods, add the following shaded section.]

A person "realises" goods if he or she exchanges them for value, such as when a person sells goods.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Goods were Stolen Goods

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the goods were stolen goods at the time NOA handled them.

This means that someone must have committed the crime of theft in relation to the goods before NOA handled the goods.[992]

In this case [insert relevant evidence and arguments].

Knowledge or Belief

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused knew or believed that the goods were stolen goods at the time of the handling.

"Knew" and "believed" are ordinary words. A person either knows something or they don't. A belief is less than actual knowledge, but more than a suspicion. It involves being aware of a fact and requires a firm conviction.

---

[992] If the goods may be "stolen goods" for another reason (e.g. because they were obtained through blackmail) this section will need to be modified accordingly. See 7.5.10 Handling Stolen Goods for information concerning the meaning of "stolen goods".

When you consider what the accused knew or believed about the goods, you may take into account the circumstances in which the accused handled the goods. However, it is not enough that the accused should have known that the goods were stolen. This element only looks at what the accused in fact knew or believed.

You must focus on the accused's state of mind at the time of the handling. A person is not guilty of handling stolen goods if s/he [identify type of handling, e.g. assists another person to dispose of them] and then later discovers that those goods were stolen goods. The knowledge or belief that the goods were stolen must have existed at the time s/he handled the goods.

In this case [insert relevant evidence and arguments].

Dishonesty

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that at the time of the handling, the accused was acting dishonestly.

In this context, "dishonesty" has a special legal meaning. A person acts dishonestly when he or she handles property and does not believe that he or she has a legal right to do so.

In this case there is no evidence that the accused had any honest belief in respect of the handling. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.[993]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of handling stolen goods, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA handled goods; and

Two – that those goods were stolen goods at that time; and

Three – that at that time NOA knew or believed those goods were stolen goods; and

Four – that NOA handled the goods dishonestly.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of handling stolen goods.

Section 88A – Handling and Theft as Alternative Offences

[If the accused is charged with both handling stolen goods and theft in the indictment, add the following shaded section.]

As you are aware, in this case NOA has been charged with both theft of [identify goods] and handling stolen goods. [Identify relevant counts on the indictment.] These are alternative charges. It is the prosecution's case that NOA either stole the goods him/herself, and so is guilty of theft, or s/he received them, and so is guilty of handling stolen goods.

There are, then, four possible views you might take about this case.

One – You are satisfied that the accused is guilty of theft;

---

[993] If the issue of dishonesty is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly. See 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended) for assistance.

Two – You are satisfied that the accused is guilty of handling stolen goods;

Three – You are satisfied that the accused is guilty of one of theft or handling stolen goods, but are unable to decide which one;

Four – You are not satisfied that the accused is guilty of either theft or handling.

I must direct you as a matter of law that if each of you are individually satisfied of one of the first three possibilities I just mentioned, but you are unable to unanimously agree on which offence the accused committed, the law requires you in that situation to find the accused guilty of theft and not guilty of handling, as theft is considered the less serious offence.

I emphasise that this only applies if you are all satisfied that the accused is guilty of either theft or guilty of handling. If any juror is not satisfied that the accused is guilty of theft or handling, then you will either return a verdict of not guilty of both offences, if you all take that view, or you will inform me that you are unable to reach a unanimous decision, if that is the case.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

7.5.10.3 Checklist: Handling Stolen Goods

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused handled goods; and
2. The goods were stolen goods; and
3. The accused knew or believed the goods were stolen goods; and
4. The accused handled the goods dishonestly.

Handling goods

1. Did the accused handle goods?

Consider – Did the accused [identify goods and relevant form of handling]?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Handling Stolen Goods

Stolen Goods

2. Were the goods the accused handled stolen goods?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Handling Stolen Goods

Knew or believed the goods were stolen

3. Did the accused know or believe that the goods were stolen at the time of the handling?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Handling Stolen Goods

Dishonesty

4. Was the accused acting dishonestly at the time of handling the goods?

Consider – Has the prosecution proved that the accused did not believe that he/she had a legal right to [identify relevant form of handling]?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Handling Stolen Goods (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Handling Stolen Goods

Last updated: 1 July 2011

7.5.11 Recent Possession

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. According to the "doctrine of recent possession", when a person is found in possession of recently stolen property, and cannot provide a reasonable explanation for that fact, the jury may infer that he or she either stole the property or received the property knowing that it was stolen (Bruce v R (1987) 74 ALR 219; Trainer v R (1906) 4 CLR 126; R v Langmead (1864) Le & Ca 427).
2. While referred to as a "doctrine", this is simply a matter of the jury drawing an inference from a common piece of circumstantial evidence (that the accused possessed recently stolen property) (Raptopoulos v Police [2005] SASC 374; Schiffmann v R (1910) 11 CLR 255; R v Trifilo [2009] VSCA 194; Gilson v R (1991) 172 CLR 353; Trainer v R (1906) 4 CLR 126).
3. Despite being called the doctrine of "recent possession", the inference is drawn from possession of recently stolen property, rather than recently taking possession of stolen property (R v Smale NSW CCA 15/8/1986).
4. Evidence that the accused possessed recently stolen property does not give rise to a presumption of guilt, or place any legal or evidentiary burden on the accused. The onus always remains on the prosecution to prove the elements of the relevant offence (R v Bellamy [1981] 2 NSWLR 727; R v Beljajev [1984] VR 657; R v Cross (1995) 84 A Crim R 242; R v Wanganeen (1988) 50 SASR 433).

What Inference May the Jury Draw?

5. Evidence that the accused possessed recently stolen property may support an inference that:

   i) the accused stole the property; or

   ii) the accused knowingly received stolen property (Trainer v R (1906) 4 CLR 126; R v Langmead (1864) Le & Ca 427; Gilson v R (1991) 172 CLR 353).

Application of the Doctrine

6. The doctrine of recent possession does not only apply to cases where theft and handling stolen goods are charged as alternatives. The doctrine may apply where a person is charged with just one of those offences. The fact that evidence that the accused possessed recently stolen property might also support the uncharged offence does not mean the jury cannot use evidence of recent possession as part of the evidence leading to guilt (see R v Henstridge & Ors SA CCA 19/6/1998).

7. While the doctrine of recent possession is most often used in relation to charges of theft or handling stolen goods, the same form of inferential reasoning may also apply to other larceny offences, such as armed robbery and burglary (R v Schama & Abramovitch (1914) 11 Cr App R 45; R v Short & Ors (1928) St R Qd 246; R v McCarthy (1984) 13 A Crim R 13; Gilson v R (1991) 172 CLR 353; R v Connolly (No 2) [1991] 2 Qd R 661; R v Ugle (1989) 43 A Crim R 63).

Requirements

8. Before the jury can draw an inference from the accused's possession of recently stolen property (a "recent possession inference"), it must be satisfied of three matters:

    i) That the accused was in possession of property;

    ii) That the property was recently stolen; and

    iii) That there was no reasonable explanation for the accused's possession of the stolen property.

Possession of property

9. The prosecution must establish that the accused had possession of the property in question (R v Cross (1995) 84 A Crim R 242; R v Khalil (1987) 44 SASR 23; R v Cottrell [1983] 1 VR 143).

10. This requires the prosecution to prove that the accused:

    i) Had custody of or control over that property; and

    ii) Intended to have custody of or exercise control over that property (DPP v Brooks [1974] AC 862; He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523; R v Maio [1989] VR 281; R v Mateiasevici [1999] 3 VR 185. See also R v Cross (1995) 84 A Crim R 242; R v Saleam (1989) 41 A Crim R 108; R v Cottrell [1983] 1 VR 143; R v Khalil (1987) 44 SASR 23).

11. The prosecution may not rely on principles of deemed possession[994] to prove possession for the purposes of this doctrine (R v Cross (1995) 84 A Crim R 242; R v McCarthy (1993) 71 A Crim R 395).

12. The fact that a third party has physical possession of the property does not mean it cannot have been "possessed" by the accused. For example, if the accused has sufficient control over the third party, such that the property will be available to him or her upon request, the accused "possesses" that property (R v McCarthy (1993) 71 A Crim R 395; R v Saleam (1989) 41 A Crim R 108; R v Cottrell [1983] 1 VR 143).

13. The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused was actually caught with the property in his or her possession. It is sufficient to prove that the accused possessed the property at a relevant time (R v Cross (1995) 84 A Crim R 242; R v Saleam (1989) 41 A Crim R 108).

14. While the prosecution will usually rely on direct evidence to establish possession, circumstantial evidence or admissions may also be sufficient (R v Cross (1995) 84 A Crim R 242; R v Saleam (1989) 41 A Crim R 108).

15. For further information concerning possession, see "Common Law Possession" in 7.6.3 Possession of a Drug of Dependence.

---

[994] E.g. Under the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981 s 5, the accused is 'deemed' to be in possession of drugs in certain circumstances.

Recently stolen property

16. The doctrine of recent possession only applies if the jury is satisfied that the property was recently stolen (Trainer v R (1906) 4 CLR 126; R v Trifilo [2009] VSCA 194; R v Cross (1995) 84 A Crim R 242; R v Sinanovic [2000] NSWCCA 395; R v Bruce [1988] VR 579).

17. There are two aspects to this requirement:

    - The jury must be satisfied that the property was "stolen"; and
    - The jury must be satisfied that the stealing was "recent".

18. For information on when property is stolen, see 7.5.1 Theft.

19. The term "recent" depends on the nature of the property. Frequently circulated property such as bank notes remain "recently stolen" for a far shorter period than less frequently traded objects like cars or clothing (R v Sinanovic [2000] NSWCCA 395; R v McCaffery (1911) VLR 92; R v Smale NSW CCA 15/8/1986; R v Mahoney [2000] NSWCCA 256; R v Khalil (1987) 44 SASR 23; R v Beljajev [1984] VR 657).

20. The judge must initially determine, as a question of law, whether it is open to the jury to find that the property was "recently stolen". Once the judge makes that determination, it is for the jury to determine, based on the facts, whether that was the case (R v Bellamy [1981] 2 NSWLR 727; R v Wanganeen (1988) 50 SASR 433; R v Smale NSW CCA 15/8/1986; R v Beljajev [1984] VR 657).

21. The prosecution may prove that goods were recently stolen by direct evidence, or by other circumstantial evidence concerning the nature of the goods and the circumstances of the accused's possession (R v Trifilo [2009] VSCA 194).

Absence of a reasonable explanation

22. The jury may draw an inference on the basis of recent possession if there is no other reasonable explanation for the accused's possession of the property that is consistent with innocence (Bruce v R (1987) 74 ALR 219).

23. Due to the operation of the common law and statutory provisions associated with the right to silence, the inference is drawn due to the unexplained possession of recently stolen property, rather than the accused's failure to give an explanation for that fact (see, e.g. Bruce v R (1987) 74 ALR 219).

24. A distinction can be drawn between cases in which the accused attempts to explain his or her possession of the property, and those in which no explanation is given. These are addressed in turn below.

Attempts to explain possession of recently stolen property

25. Where the accused provides an explanation for his or her possession of recently stolen property, the jury may only draw a recent possession inference if it rejects that explanation as a reasonable possibility (R v Weetra SA CCA 7/8/1996; R v Aves [1950] 2 All ER 330; R v Glen [1973] VR 809; R v Bellamy [1981] 2 NSWLR 727).

26. The prosecution must lead evidence of any explanations the accused has offered. Such statements are not excluded on the basis of being self-serving hearsay (Hudson v R [2003] WASCA 304; Rymer v R [2005] NSWCCA 310. But c.f. Barry v Police [2009] SASC 295).

27. The jury should consider all explanations the accused has provided, and whether any of those explanations may be true. There is no principle that the jury may only consider one explanation. However, inconsistencies between various explanations may affect the accused's credit or the plausibility of the explanation (R v Wanganeen (1988) 50 SASR 433; R v Bellamy [1981] 2 NSWLR 727).

28. The jury cannot use the fact that the accused provided an explanation for the first time at trial as a reason for rejecting that explanation (R v Beljajev [1984] VR 657; Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95). See "Failure to Raise a Defence" in Silence in Response to People in Authority.

29. Rejection of the accused's explanation does not depend on the jury deciding that the explanation was deliberately false. The jury may reject an explanation due to finding that it is mistaken (R v Weetra SA CCA 7/8/1996; R v Aves [1950] 2 All ER 330; R v Glen [1973] VR 809; R v Bellamy [1981] 2 NSWLR 727).

30. However, where the jury finds that an explanation was deliberately false, this may also allow the jury to use "consciousness of guilt" reasoning. The judge must be careful when directing the jury about this possibility to ensure that use of a rejected explanation as a lie evidencing consciousness of guilt does not involve "bootstraps" reasoning. For this reason, judges should consider only give both a "recent possession" direction and a "consciousness of guilt" direction in appropriate cases (see R v Zheng (1995) 83 A Crim R 572; R v Laz [1998] 1 VR 453; R v Sirillas [2006] VSCA 234; R v Beljajev [1984] VR 657; R v Wanganeen (1988) 50 SASR 433). The availability of "consciousness of guilty" reasoning in relation to a rejected explanation will depend on whether the prosecution has given notice of its intention to rely on that evidence and the judge's grant of leave to rely on the evidence for that purpose. See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 20.

Failure to provide an explanation

31. Where the accused fails to provide an explanation for his or her possession of recently stolen property, the jury may only draw a recent possession inference if it is satisfied that there was no reasonable explanation for that failure (Bruce v R (1987) 74 ALR 219; R v Sinanovic [2000] NSWCCA 395).

32. It seems that exercising the right to silence does not provide a reasonable explanation for failing to explain the possession of recently stolen goods (see, e.g. Bruce v R (1987) 74 ALR 219; R v Wanganeen (1988) 50 SASR 433; Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95 (Brennan J)).

33. The doctrine of recent possession does not constitute an exception to the right to silence. An adverse inference on the basis of recent possession is not drawn from the exercise of the right to silence, but from the accused's unexplained possession of recently stolen property (Bruce v R (1987) 74 ALR 219; Raviraj v R (1987) 85 Cr App R 93; R v Beljajev [1984] VR 657).

Consequences of Meeting the Requirements

34. Where the jury is satisfied that the three requirements outlined above have been met, they may infer that the accused either stole the property or received the property knowing that it was stolen (Bruce v R (1987) 74 ALR 219; Trainer v R (1906) 4 CLR 126; R v Langmead (1864) Le & Ca 427).

35. Early authorities suggested that the prima facie inference was that the accused stole the property (see, e.g. Trainer v R (1906) 4 CLR 126 (Griffith CJ)). However, it is now recognised that there is no such presumption (Maslin v Searle [2010] WASC 146).

36. The jury is not required to draw any inference. The doctrine of recent possession simply describes a reasoning process that is open to the jury, upon the satisfaction of certain requirements (R v Schama & Abramovitch (1914) 11 Cr App R 45; R v Ugle (1989) 43 A Crim R 63; R v Bruce [1988] VR 579; R v Bellamy [1981] 2 NSWLR 727).

37. In determining whether to draw a recent possession inference, and where to draw a further inference that the accused committed one offence rather than another, the jury should look at all of the circumstances of the case, including:

    - The nature of the property;
    - The circumstances in which the accused was found in possession of the property;
    - The time between the alleged theft and the accused acquiring possession of the property, and the likelihood that the property was sold in that period; and
    - The existence of any links between the accused and the victim of the theft (see Raptopoulos v Police [2005] SASC 374; R v Connolly (No 2) [1991] 2 Qd R 661; Laurens v Willers [2002] WASCA 183).

38. The consequences of drawing an inference will depend on what offence(s) the accused is charged with, and the nature of the inference drawn. For example:

    - Where the jury infer that the accused stole the property in question, they may convict him or her of a charge of theft. Where they infer that the accused received the property knowing that it was stolen, they may convict him or her of a charge of handling stolen goods;
    - When charges of theft and handling stolen goods are joined in one indictment as alternative charges, and the jury is satisfied that they can infer that the accused either stole the property or knowingly received it, but are unsure which was the case, they may convict him or her of theft.[995]
    - Where the accused is charged with another larceny offence, such as robbery, and the jury infer that he or she stole the property in question, the theft-related element of that offence will be met. However, before the jury can convict the accused of that offence, they must also be satisfied that the other elements of the offence (e.g. that the accused used force on a person in order to commit the theft) have been proven.

When to Direct the Jury About Recent Possession

39. A direction about the doctrine of recent possession is not required in all cases in which the accused is found in possession of stolen goods. The need for a direction will depend on:

    - The facts of the case; and
    - The degree to which the prosecution relies on the evidence of recent possession (R v Weetra SA CCA 7/8/1996).

Content of the Direction

40. A direction on the doctrine of recent possession should:

    - Explain the three requirements for drawing an inference;
    - Explain the inference the jury may draw if satisfied that those requirements have been met; and
    - Explain the consequences of drawing the relevant inference (see, e.g. R v Sinanovic [2000] NSWCCA 395; R v Wanganeen (1988) 50 SASR 433; R v Bellamy [1981] 2 NSWLR 727).

41. The judge must make it clear that the directions describe an inference the jury may draw, and does not describe an inference the jury must or should draw (R v Schama & Abramovitch (1914) 11 Cr App R 45; R v Ugle (1989) 43 A Crim R 63; R v Bruce [1988] VR 579; R v Bellamy [1981] 2 NSWLR 727).

42. The judge should not tell the jury that it may use evidence of recent possession to infer "guilty knowledge". Instead, the judge should explain the specific inference the jury may draw in the case (i.e., that the accused stole the property or knowingly received it) (Ryman v R SA CCA 3/10/1991).

43. The judge should direct the jury about the meaning of the words "recent" and "possession" in all cases where the prosecution relies on the doctrine (R v Khalil (1987) 44 SASR 23; R v Beljajev [1984] VR 657; c.f. R v Saleam (1989) 41 A Crim R 108).

44. Where the evidence leaves open two or more dates on which the accused may have possessed the property, the judge must:

---

[995] See Crimes Act 1958 s 88A. This provision only applies to trials that commenced on or after 13 October 2004. See "Theft and Handling" in 7.5.10 Handling Stolen Goods for further information about this issue.

- Identify those possible dates; and
- Instruct the jury that its findings about when the accused was in possession of the property may affect its determination of whether the property was recently stolen (R v Khalil (1987) 44 SASR 23; Tasovac v Lawson [2009] WASCA 394).

45. The judge must be careful to avoid pre-judging questions of fact. It is a matter for the jury to decide whether the accused had possession of the goods and whether those goods were recently stolen (R v Beljajev [1984] VR 657).

Other possible explanations

46. When explaining the third requirement, the judge should direct the jury that they may only draw a recent possession inference if they can exclude other reasonable explanations that are consistent with innocence. This includes any explanations offered by the accused or that arise from the circumstances of the case (R v Wanganeen (1988) 50 SASR 433).

47. Where the accused has provided an explanation, the judge must explain that the jury cannot draw a recent possession inference if they find that the explanation may reasonably be true. However, even if the jury cannot exclude the possibility that the accused's explanation is true, they may still convict him or her if there is other evidence which, in conjunction with the evidence of recent possession, establishes his or her guilt (R v Bellamy [1981] 2 NSWLR 727, R v Tribett NSW CCA 13/6/1991).

48. The judge must ensure the jury does not confuse an explanation for the possession of recently stolen items (requirement three) with a denial that the items were stolen at all (requirement two). This will be particularly important in cases where the property in question has no distinguishing marks, and the accused asserts that he or she acquired the property legitimately. In making such an assertion, the accused may (depending on the circumstances) be arguing:
    - That the property he or she possessed was different from the property in issue, and had not been stolen; or
    - That while the property he or she possessed may be the stolen property in issue, it had been purchased legitimately, and so there was a reasonable explanation for its possession (see, e.g. Tasovac v Lawson [2009] WASCA 394).

Identify matters relevant to drawing the inference

49. The judge should identify matters to be considered by the jury when deciding whether or not to draw a recent possession inference. These may include:
    - The temporal proximity between the theft and the possession;
    - What is known of the circumstances in which the accused acquired the goods;
    - The nature and value of the goods; and
    - The circumstances in which the accused was found in possession of the goods (R v Wanganeen (1988) 50 SASR 433; R v Sinanovic [2000] NSWCCA 395).

Onus of proof

50. Judges must ensure that their directions on recent possession do not undermine the onus of proof. In particular, they must not:
    - Suggest that evidence of recent possession gives rise to a "presumption" of guilt;
    - State that the accused must "rebut" an inference of guilt by providing an explanation;
    - Suggest that the accused must convince the jury to "accept" his or her explanation; or

- Suggest that evidence of recent possession gives rise to a rule of law, or that recent possession is different to circumstantial evidence (see R v Bellamy [1981] 2 NSWLR 727; R v Beljajev [1984] VR 657; R v Stafford (1976) 13 SASR 392; R v Wanganeen (1988) 50 SASR 433).

51. Judges should not refer to the "doctrine" of recent possession, as this may suggest that the relevant principle is a rule of law, rather than an application of the general principles of circumstantial evidence (R v Bellamy [1981] 2 NSWLR 727 (Reynolds JA); R v Ugle (1989) 43 A Crim R 63. See also R v Wanganeen (1988) 50 SASR 433).

Standard of proof

52. At common law, judges were required to direct the jury that the three requirements of recent possession must be proved beyond reasonable doubt before the jury could use evidence of recent possession (R v Cross (1995) 84 A Crim R 242; R v Wanganeen (1988) 50 SASR 433).

53. It is not clear whether this was a special rule of the doctrine of recent possession, or an application of the principles from Shepherd's case to essential intermediate facts (But see Sartori v Trent, Unreported, WASC, 23/8/1996; F v Forbes [2010] WASC 252).

54. Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, the only matters which need to be proved beyond reasonable doubt are the elements and the absence of any defences (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 61). It therefore appears that judges can no longer require proof of the three requirements of recent possession beyond reasonable doubt before the jury draws an inference from evidence of recent possession. However, as a form of circumstantial evidence, the jury must still exclude hypotheses consistent with innocence.

Right to silence

55. When directing a jury about the doctrine of recent possession, judges must take great care not to breach the common law or statutory prohibitions (Evidence Act 2008 s 89) on drawing adverse inferences from pre-trial silence (see Silence in Response to People in Authority).

56. To avoid breaching these prohibitions, it is important that judges make it clear that the recent possession inference is based on the unexplained possession of recently stolen property (rather than the accused's failure to give an explanation for that fact) (see, e.g. Bruce v R (1987) 74 ALR 219).

57. Depending on the circumstances, a judge may also need to give one of the following charges:

    - Failure to Answer Police Questions;
    - Section 41 Direction.

Last updated: 30 November 2015

7.5.11.1 Charge: Recent Possession

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge is drafted for use in cases in which:

i) Charges for theft and handling stolen goods are joined in an indictment as alternative charges and tried together; and

ii) Evidence of recent possession can support a conclusion that the accused either stole or received the property.

It will need to be modified if the accused is solely charged with theft or handling, or is charged with another offence such as robbery or burglary.

This charge should be given after the judge has directed the jury about the elements of theft and handling stolen goods.

In this case, the prosecution has argued that you can conclude from the evidence that [describe evidence of recent possession, e.g. "the stolen televisions were found in NOA's house"] that NOA either stole those goods, or that s/he received them knowing they were stolen.

Requirements

There are three matters you must be satisfied of before you may draw this conclusion from that evidence.

First, you must be satisfied that NOA possessed the [describe goods]. This requires the prosecution to prove that NOA had custody or control over those goods, and intended to have custody or exercise control.[996]

[Summarise evidence and/or arguments concerning possession.]

Second, you must be satisfied that those goods had been recently stolen.[997] In this case, it is alleged that those goods were stolen from [describe alleged circumstances and date of theft, e.g. "Mr X's house on 1/1/10"].

It is for you to determine whether the goods the prosecution alleged were found [describe location, e.g. "in NOA's house"] were stolen goods, and whether they had been stolen "recently".

The term "recently" is a relative one, that varies with the nature of the goods and how often goods of that kind change hands. Frequently circulated goods like coins or bank notes will only remain "recently stolen" for a short period of time, whereas less frequently traded goods, such as a cars or famous paintings, may remain "recently stolen" for months or even years. You must consider whether NOA acquired the goods so recently after they were stolen that s/he must have either stolen the goods himself/herself, or received them knowing they were stolen.

[Summarise evidence and/or arguments concerning whether the goods had been recently stolen.]

Third, you must be satisfied that there is no reasonable explanation for the accused's possession of the [identify goods].

[If the defence has provided an explanation, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the defence has argued [summarise explanation]. You may not conclude that NOA stole the [identify goods], or received them knowing they were stolen, unless you are satisfied that there is no reasonable possibility that this explanation is true.

[Summarise evidence and/or arguments concerning other possible explanations for the possession of the goods.]

Conclusions

If you are satisfied that the prosecution has proven these three matters, then you may conclude that the accused either stole the [identify goods], or that s/he received them knowing they were stolen.

---

[996] Where possession is in issue, further assistance on its requirements may be obtained from 7.6.3.5 Charge: Possession of a Drug of Dependence (Common Law Possession).

[997] Where there is an issue about whether goods have been "stolen", assistance may be obtained from 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended).

It is for you to decide whether to draw this conclusion. Even if you are satisfied that the accused was in possession of recently stolen goods and there is no reasonable explanation for that possession, you are not required to draw this conclusion. You will remember what I told you about drawing conclusions earlier.[998]

If you decide that any of the three requirements have not been established, or decide not to draw any conclusion from the accused's possession of the goods, that does not mean that you must acquit NOA of charges [state charge numbers]. You may still convict him/her of one of those offences if, based on all of the evidence in the case, you are satisfied that all of the elements of that offence have been met.

In making your decision, you should consider all of the circumstances of the case, including the nature and value of the goods and the circumstances in which NOA was found in possession. You should also consider matters such as the time between the alleged theft and NOA acquiring possession, the likelihood that the goods were sold during that period of time, and the existence of any links between NOA and the owner of the goods.

[If the accused chose not to explain his/her possession either to the police or in court, add the following shaded section.]

It is important that you bear in mind the fact that the accused has the right to not answer police questions and to not give evidence in court. It would therefore be wrong for you to use the fact that s/he remained silent against him/her in any way.

The fact that a person chooses not to answer police questions, or to give evidence in court, does not mean that s/he has something to hide, or has admitted his/her guilt. That fact may not be used to fill gaps in the evidence led by the prosecution, and does not add to or strengthen the prosecution's case in any way. It proves nothing at all.

You therefore must not draw any conclusions against the accused for failing to answer police questions or give evidence in court. To use an accused person's silence in such a way would be to undermine a fundamental right provided by the law.

However, that does not mean that you cannot conclude from a person's unexplained possession of recently stolen goods that s/he stole the goods, or received them knowing they were stolen. In such circumstances you are not drawing a conclusion from his/her exercise of the right to silence, but from the fact that, after hearing all the evidence, you find that there is no reasonable explanation for his/her possession of those goods.

Last updated: 30 November 2015

7.5.12 Obtaining Property by Deception

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. It is an offence to obtain property by deception (Crimes Act 1958 s 81).
2. The offence has the following four elements:
    i) The accused obtained property belonging to another;

[998] This charge is based on the assumption that the judge has already instructed the jury about circumstantial evidence. It will need to be modified if that has not been done.

ii) The accused did so with the intention of permanently depriving the other of the property;

iii) The accused used deceit to obtain the property; and

iv) The accused obtained the property dishonestly (Crimes Act 1958 s 81. See, e.g. R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; R v Jost (2002) 135 A Crim R 202).

3. The law in this area draws heavily upon the civil law of property. This commentary does not attempt to offer a detailed discussion of that law.

Relationship With Other Property Offences

4. The offences in ss 74, 75, 75A, 76, 77 and 81 of the Crimes Act 1958 must all be committed:
    - "Dishonestly";
    - Against or in respect of "property belong to another"; and
    - With the "intention of permanently depriving" a person of that property (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).[999]
5. The distinguishing features of s 81 are that the accused must have:
    - "Obtained" the property;
    - "By deception" (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).

Obtaining Property Belonging to Another

6. For the first element to be met, the jury must be satisfied that:
    - The accused obtained something;
    - The thing obtained was property; and
    - The property belonged to another person.

Obtaining

7. The accused "obtains" property by deception if s/he obtains ownership, possession or control of it (Crimes Act 1958 s 81(2)).
8. This differs from theft, where the accused must have "appropriated" the property by adversely assuming any of the owner's rights (see 7.5.1 Theft).
9. The accused does not need to have obtained the property for him or herself. This element will be satisfied if s/he obtained the property for another person, or enabled another person to obtain or retain the property (Crimes Act 1958 s 81(2)).
10. Where the accused deceives someone with the intention of obtaining property, but fails to obtain the property, s/he may be guilty of attempting to obtain property by deception (R v Kalajdic [2005] VSCA 160; R v King [1987] QB 547).

Property

11. The thing that the accused obtained must have been "property" (Crimes Act 1958 s 81(1)).

---

[999] In relation to ss 76 and 77, these requirements only apply when it is alleged that the accused intended to steal something.

12. "Property" is defined to include "money and all other property real or personal including things in action and other intangible property" (Crimes Act 1958 s 71(1)).

13. This definition includes some things with no physical existence, such as debts (R v Baruday [1984] VR 685; R v Holt (1983) 12 A Crim R 1, 16–17).

14. However, other intangible items may not be classified as property. For example, in England it has been held that confidential information is not property (Oxford v Moss (1978) 68 Cr App R 183), and copyright may not be (R v Lloyd [1985] 1 QB 829).

15. Whether the thing obtained by the accused was "property" can involve questions of both law and fact. It is for the judge to determine as a question of law whether a particular circumstance creates a property right. It is for the jury to determine whether that circumstance existed as a question of fact (See R v Hall [1973] QB 126; see also R v Baruday [1984] VR 685, Parsons v the Queen (1999) 195 CLR 619 and cf R v Preddy [1996] AC 815).

16. Sections 73(6) and 7 of the Crimes Act 1958 (concerning when land and wild animals are considered to be "property") do not apply to the offence of obtaining property by deception (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).

Belonging to Another

17. The accused must have obtained property "belonging to another" (Crimes Act 1958 s 81(1)).

18. Property "belongs" to anyone who has possession or control of it, or who has any other proprietary right or interest in it (Crimes Act 1958 s 71(2); R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).

19. These interests include legal and equitable proprietary interests (R v Clowes (No 2) [1994] 2 All ER 316).

20. However, property does not "belong" to a person who only has an equitable interest in that property, if that equitable interest arose from an agreement to transfer the property or grant an interest in it (Crimes Act 1958 s 71(2)).

21. Whether a person has a proprietary right or interest is a question of civil property law (R v Walker [1984] Crim LR 112).

22. Sections 73(8)–(11) of the Crimes Act 1958 ss 73(8)–(11) (which deem certain property to "belong to" people who might not otherwise be regarded as property owners) do not apply to the offence of obtaining property by deception (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).

23. The prosecution needs only to establish that someone other than the accused had the relevant property rights. There is no requirement that the prosecution prove who actually held those rights (Lodge v Lawton [1978] VR 112).

Abandoned Property

24. Property no longer "belongs" to a person who has intentionally relinquished all ownership rights (abandoned the property) (R v Small [1987] Crim LR 777).

25. However, there is a distinction between "losing" and "abandoning" property. Property which is merely lost still "belongs" to the owner and can be obtained by deception(R v Small [1987] Crim LR 777).

Intention to Permanently Deprive

26. The second element requires the accused to have intended to permanently deprive the owner of the property when s/he obtained it (Crimes Act 1958 s 81(1); R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).

27. The jury must consider the accused's state of mind at the time s/he obtained the property. If the accused had an intention to permanently deprive the owner of the property at that time then this element will be satisfied – even if the accused later decided to return the property (see, e.g. R v Jost (2002) 135 A Crim R 202).

28. If the accused only had an intention to temporarily deprive the owner of his or her property, this element will not be met (subject to the exceptions specified in ss 73(12) and (13)) (R v Lloyd [1985] 1 QB 829).

29. Similarly, this element will not be met if the accused had not decided how s/he was going to dispose of the property when s/he obtained it (subject to the exceptions specified in ss 73(12) and (13)). S/he must have already formed the intention to permanently deprive the owner of the property at the time s/he obtained it (R v Easom [1971] 2 QB 315; Sharp v McCormick [1986] VR 869).

30. A person who takes property (e.g. goods or cash), intending to return equivalent (but not identical) property, will have an intention to permanently deprive the owner of the property (because s/he does not intend to return the exact same coins, notes or goods that s/he took) (R v Williams [1953] 1 QB 660; R v Cockburn [1968] 1 All ER 466; R v Pace [1965] 3 Can CC 55 (NSSC)).

Acting Regardless of the Owner's Rights: ss 73(12)–(13)

31. Sections 73(12) and (13) of the Crimes Act 1958 apply (with necessary adaptations) to the offence of obtaining property by deception (Crimes Act 1958 s 81(3); R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).

32. The accused is deemed to have an intention to permanently deprive a person of property, despite the fact that s/he did not actually have that intention when s/he obtained the property, if s/he intends to treat the property as his or her own to dispose of regardless of the owner's rights (Crimes Act 1958 s 73(12)).

33. Section 73(12) will only be relevant in exceptional cases. It is apt to confuse and should only rarely be introduced into a charge (R v Dardovska (2003) 6 VR 628).

34. Circumstances in which s 73(12) has been held to be relevant include:

    - Where the accused takes the property, promising to return it only in exchange for payment (R v Lloyd [1985] 1 QB 829);
    - Where the accused takes the property, intending to return it only after fundamentally altering its nature (e.g. returning the piece of paper a cheque is written on, after receiving payment from the bank) (R v Duru [1974] 1 WLR 2);
    - Where the accused takes the property, while leaving open the possibility that s/he might return it to the owner at a later date, but in the meantime treats it as his/her own (Sharp v McCormick [1986] VR 869).

35. Two other circumstances in which s 73(12) may be relevant are:

    - Where the accused borrows the property from its owner, ultimately intending to return it; or
    - Where the accused lends the owner's property to a third party, intending to return it to the owner upon retrieving it.

36. In such cases, the accused will only be deemed to have an intention to permanently deprive the owner of the property if the borrowing or lending was for a period, or in circumstances, which made it equivalent to an outright taking or disposal (Crimes Act 1958 s 73(12)).

37. Section 73(12) may also be relevant where the accused parts with property belonging to another, under a condition as to its return which s/he may not be able to perform (e.g. pawning it). If this was done for the accused's own purposes, and without the consent of the owner, the accused will be deemed to have treated the property as his or her own to dispose of regardless of the owner's rights (Crimes Act 1958 s 73(13)). By virtue of s 73(12), s/he will be regarded as having had an intention to permanently deprive the owner of that property.

Deception

38. The third element requires the accused to have obtained the property by deception (Crimes Act 1958 s 81(1); R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).

39. For this element to be met, the prosecution must prove that:
    - The accused made a representation by words or conduct;
    - The representation was about existing or past facts or law;
    - The representation was false;
    - The accused knew the representation was false, or was reckless as to whether it was true or false;
    - The accused intended to obtain the property by making the representation;
    - The false representation was believed by the victim (who was thereby deceived); and
    - The accused obtained the property as a result of the deception.
40. The jury must be unanimous about the particular representation which the accused made (Magnus v R (2013) 41 VR 612; R v Brown (1984) 79 Cr App R 115; R v Holmes [2006] VSCA 73).
41. As "deception" has the same meaning in relation to the offence of obtaining a financial advantage by deception as it does for the offence of obtaining property by deception (Crimes Act 1958 s 82(2)), cases decided in relation to that offence will be applicable to s 81.

Representation by Words or Conduct

42. The accused must have made a representation in words (spoken or written) or by conduct (Crimes Act 1958 s 81(4)(a); R v Benli [1998] 2 VR 157).
43. The representation may be constituted by a number of statements or a course of conduct (R v Lo Presti (2005) 158 A Crim R 54).
44. The representation does not need to be explicit. It can be implied from the accused's words or conduct (DPP v Ray [1974] AC 370; Smith v R (1982) 7 A Crim R 437 (Vic CCA); R v Vasic (2005) 11 VR 380).
45. There will often be implicit representations in ordinary transactions. For example:
    - When a person orders food in a restaurant, s/he implicitly agrees to pay for the food if it is provided properly (DPP v Ray [1974] AC 370).
    - When a person proffers a cheque to another person in payment of a debt, s/he implies that ordinarily the cheque will be honoured by a bank upon presentation at the bank upon which it has been drawn (Smith v R (1982) 7 A Crim R 437 (Vic CCA); R v Vasic (2005) 11 VR 380).
    - When a person uses a credit card, s/he implies that s/he is acting within the terms of the contract with the card provider (R v Lambie [1982] AC 449; Metropolitan Police Commissioner v Charles [1977] AC 177).

Representation About Existing or Past Facts or Law

46. The representation must have been about existing or past facts or law. This is defined to include representations about a person's present intentions (Crimes Act 1958 s 81(4)(a); R v Lo Presti (2005) 158 A Crim R 54).
47. This element will not have been met if the representation was about something that was going to happen in the future (e.g. a promise). Representations about what will occur in the future cannot amount to a "fact" (R v Lo Presti (2005) 158 A Crim R 54).

48. However, most promises implicitly carry with them a representation that it is the person's present intention to bring about the predicted event. This aspect of the third element will be satisfied if it can be shown that the accused made such a representation when s/he made the promise (R v Lo Presti (2005) 158 A Crim R 54; R v Dent [1955] 2 QB 590; R v Gilmartin [1983] QB 953).[1000]

49. As it is unlikely that the accused will have explicitly stated that s/he had an "intention" to do anything, it will usually be left to the jury to infer that the promise implied that the accused intended to do what was promised (R v Lo Presti (2005) 158 A Crim R 54).

50. The jury must be able to infer, beyond reasonable doubt, that when the accused made the promise, s/he was stating his or her current intention to carry out the promise (R v Lo Presti (2005) 158 A Crim R 54).

51. Service of an unverified statement of claim is not to be treated as a positive representation regarding the truth of the facts contained in the statement (Jamieson v the Queen (1993) 177 CLR 574).

Falsity of the Representation

52. A person only deceives someone if s/he induces them to believe that something which is actually false is true (DPP v Ray [1974] AC 370; In re London and Globe Financing Corporation Ltd [1903] 1 Ch 728).

53. The prosecution must therefore demonstrate that the alleged representation was false at the time it was made (R v Lo Presti (2005) 158 A Crim R 54).

Deception by Silence about Changed Circumstances

54. Difficulties can arise where:

    - The accused made a representation which was initially true;
    - That representation subsequently became false; and
    - The accused knew the representation had become false, but did not advise the other party prior to obtaining the property (see, e.g. DPP v Ray [1974] AC 370).

55. In such circumstances, it may appear that the accused has not made a false representation. However, it has been held that the accused's silence in such circumstances can be considered to be an implicit (false) representation that the situation remains the same as initially represented (DPP v Ray [1974] AC 370; R v Firth (1989) 91 Cr App R 217).[1001]

Broken Promises

56. Where a case is based on a promise made by the accused (see "Representation About Existing or Past Facts or Law" above), it is not sufficient for the prosecution to prove that the promise was not fulfilled. The prosecution must prove that, at the time the representation was made and acted upon, the accused had no intention to carry out the promise (R v Lo Presti (2005) 158 A Crim R 54; Johnston v The Queen [2021] VSCA 11, [26]–[29]).

57. The non-fulfilment of the promise may be used as evidence that, when s/he made the promise, the accused had no intention to carry it out (R v Lo Presti (2005) 158 A Crim R 54).

58. It is important to instruct the jury clearly about this issue, as without such instruction the jury may wrongly think that a bare broken promise, without more, is sufficient (R v Lo Presti (2005) 158 A Crim R 54).

[1000] In such cases, the count and the particulars should refer to the accused's (implicit) representation about his or her intentions when s/he made the promise, rather than the promise itself (R v Lo Presti (2005) 158 A Crim R 54).

[1001] In R v Vasic (2005) 11 VR 380 the court held that it was Parliament's intention that the English cases in this area, including DPP v Ray, would be followed in Victoria.

Knowledge or Recklessness as to Falsity

59. The deception must have been deliberate or reckless (Crimes Act 1958 s 81(4)(a)).

60. This requires the false representation to have been made:

    - With knowledge of its falsity; or
    - Recklessly without an honest belief in its truth, careless of whether it were true or false (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; Mattingley v Tuckwood (1989) 43 A Crim R 11 (ACT SC)).

61. This element will not be satisfied if the accused made an innocent misrepresentation which misled the victim (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; Mattingley v Tuckwood (1989) 43 A Crim R 11 (ACT SC)).

Reckless Deception

62. In this context, "recklessness" is a subjective concept. It focuses on the accused's state of mind at the relevant time (R v Smith (1982) 7 A Crim R 437; Pollard v Cth DPP (1992) 28 NSWLR 659).

63. For the deception to have been reckless, the accused must have known that the representation was probably untrue (R v Kalajdic [2005] VSCA 160, [31]. See also R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641; DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2020] VSCA 181; DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2021] HCA 26).

64. Some authorities have applied a weaker "substantial risk" test. Under this test, an accused makes a false representation recklessly if he or she makes a representation knowing that there is a substantial risk that the representation is untrue (R v Kalajdic [2005] VSCA 160, [31]; Mattingley v Tuckwood (1989) 43 A Crim R 11 (ACT SC); Smith v R (1982) 7 A Crim R 437 (Vic CCA)).

65. It is likely that the "substantial risk" test understates the mens rea requirement for this element. It is also inconsistent with the recklessness test that is now required in more settled areas of the law – see 7.1.3 Recklessness. As a result the Charge Book Deception charges adopt only the "probably untrue" test.

66. It is not sufficient that the accused knew that the representation was possibly untrue (R v Kalajdic [2005] VSCA 160, [31]; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641).

67. Mere carelessness or negligence is not sufficient. The accused must have known that the representation was probably false but been indifferent as to whether the representation was true or false (Smith v R (1982) 7 A Crim R 437 (Vic CCA); Mattingley v Tuckwood (1989) 43 A Crim R 11 (ACT SC); Pollard v Cth DPP (1992) 28 NSWLR 659).

Accused's Intention

68. At the time s/he made the representation, the accused must have intended to obtain the property by his or her words or conduct (DPP v Stonehouse [1978] AC 55; Mattingley v Tuckwood (1989) 43 A Crim R 11 (ACT SC); R v Lo Presti (2005) 158 A Crim R 54).

69. In most cases[1002] this requires the accused, at the time s/he made the representation, to have intended that:

    - The representation would be communicated to a person;
    - That person would believe that the representation was true;
    - That belief would cause someone to part with ownership, possession or control of property; and [1002] An exception occurs where it is a computer or a machine that is deceived: see "Deception of Computers and Machines" below.

- The accused would thereby obtain that property (for him or herself or someone else) (DPP v Stonehouse [1978] AC 55; Mattingley v Tuckwood (1989) 43 A Crim R 11 (ACT SC)).

The False Representation was Believed

70. In most cases[1003] a person or persons must have believed the false representation, and thus been deceived (DPP v Ray [1974] AC 370; R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).

71. Even where the victim is a company, the prosecution must prove that a natural person was deceived (R v Jenkins (2002) 6 VR 81.

72. The person deceived does not need to be the same as the person from whom the property is ultimately obtained. This element will be satisfied as long as the accused deceives someone, and that deception causes the accused to obtain the property (see "The Property was Obtained as a Result of the Deception" below) (R v Benli [1998] 2 VR 157; R v Clarkson [1987] VR 962).

Deception of Computers and Machines

73. "Deception" is defined to include acts or omissions done with the intention of causing a computer system, or a machine that is designed to operate by means of payment or identification, to make a response which the accused is not authorised to cause the computer or machine to make (Crimes Act 1958 s 81(4)(b)).

74. This provision allows this element to be met even if the accused has not made a false representation to a person, and no person has been deceived. As long as the accused intended to cause the computer or machine to respond in an unauthorised matter s/he will have engaged in "deception".

75. Accordingly, the element of deception will be satisfied where a person:

    - Uses his or her own card to withdraw money from an ATM, despite having closed his or her account; or
    - Uses another person's card to withdraw money from an ATM without their authority (see, e.g. Kennison v Daire (1986) 160 CLR 129).

76. The fact that an ATM is programmed to give out money if a card is inserted and the correct password used does not mean that the bank consents to the withdrawal of money in that way by a person who does not have an account with the bank. The bank only consents to the withdrawal of money by people with current accounts (Kennison v Daire (1986) 160 CLR 129).

The Property was Obtained as a Result of the Deception

77. The property must have been obtained as a result of the deception. That is, there must have been a causal connection between the deception used and the obtaining of the property (R v Jenkins (2002) 6 VR 81; R v Clarkson [1987] VR 962; R v King [1987] QB 547).

78. For this requirement to be met, the prosecution must prove that the deception operated on the mind of the person deceived (R v Jenkins (2002) 6 VR 81).

79. It is a question of fact for the jury to decide whether the deception was an "operative cause" of the obtaining (R v King [1987] QB 547).

80. As long as this causal connection is proved, the property does not need to have been obtained from the same person who was deceived (R v Benli [1998] 2 VR 157; R v Clarkson [1987] VR 962; R v Jenkins (2002) 6 VR 81).

[1003] It is also possible for a computer or a machine to have been deceived: see "Deception of Computers and Machines".

81. It is not necessary to prove that the person deceived suffered a loss (R v Jenkins (2002) 6 VR 81).

Proving Causation

82. Direct evidence should ordinarily be used to prove that the deception operated on the mind of the person deceived (R v Jenkins (2002) 6 VR 81; R v Laverty (1970) 54 Cr App R 495).[1004]

83. However, direct evidence need not be given if the facts are such that the alleged false representation is the only reason which could be suggested as having been the operative inducement (R v Jenkins (2002) 6 VR 81; R v Sullivan (1945) 30 Cr App R 132).

84. In such circumstances, it is for the jury to determine whether the only inference which could be reasonably drawn is that the relevant party would not have parted with the property had the true position been known, and thus the deception was the cause of the obtaining (R v Jenkins (2002) 6 VR 81; R v Lambie [1982] AC 449).

Dishonesty

85. The fourth element requires the property to have been obtained "dishonestly" (Crimes Act 1958 s 81(1); R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).

86. This requirement is additional to the requirement that the property be obtained "by deception". The prosecution must prove that when the accused, by deception, obtained the property, s/he was acting dishonestly (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; Pollard v Cth DPP (1992) 28 NSWLR 659).

87. Whilst in a loose sense any form of deception might be characterised as "dishonest", that is not the meaning which "dishonestly" bears in s 81 (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; Pollard v Cth DPP (1992) 28 NSWLR 659).

88. Dishonesty has a special meaning in s 81. It means that the accused acted without a belief in a legal right to obtain the property (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; R v Bonollo [1981] VR 633; R v Brow [1981] VR 783; R v Todo (2004) 10 VR 244).

89. This interpretation of "dishonesty" differs from the interpretation of "dishonesty" in the equivalent provision of the English Theft Act and the interpretation of "dishonesty" in s 86 of the Commonwealth Crimes Act 1914. In those jurisdictions, "dishonesty" has its ordinary meaning, and is assessed according to the standards of the ordinary person (Peters v the Queen (1998) 192 CLR 493; Macleod v R (2003) 214 CLR 230; R v Ghosh [1982] QB 1053).[1005]

90. The claim of legal right must extend to all of the property taken, not just to part of it (R v Bedford (2007) 98 SASR 514).

91. A moral belief in the right to obtain the property is not sufficient (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; R v Bonollo [1981] VR 633).

92. The relevant belief is not a belief in ownership or in a right to possession or control. The accused must have believed that s/he had a legal right to obtain possession of the property. That is, s/he must have believed that s/he had legal right to take the property and deprive the other person of possession (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).

[1004] In most cases the person deceived will give evidence that s/he believed the representation, and that is why s/he parted with the property (R v Sullivan (1945) 30 Cr App R 132; R v Jenkins (2002) 6 VR 81).

[1005] Other Australian jurisdictions adopt different approaches to dishonesty, and their authorities should be approached with caution.

93. If the accused did not believe that s/he had a legal right to obtain the property, then s/he will have acted dishonestly, even if s/he intended to prevent the true owner from suffering any loss (R v Brow [1981] VR 783).

Subjective Concept

94. Dishonesty is a subjective concept. It relates to the accused's mental state (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; R v Bonollo [1981] VR 633; R v Brow [1981] VR 783).

95. The prosecution must prove that the accused himself or herself did not believe that s/he had, in all the circumstances, a legal right to obtain the property (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; R v Bonollo [1981] VR 633; R v Brow [1981] VR 783).

96. It does not matter if the accused's belief was based on a mistake of fact[1006] or a mistake of law.[1007] If the accused genuinely believed s/he had a legal claim of right, s/he will not have acted dishonestly (R v Langham (1984) 36 SASR 48; R v Lopatta (1983) 35 SASR 101).

97. The accused's belief does not need to have been reasonable (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; R v Dardovska (2003) 6 VR 628).

98. If the jury is left in doubt whether the accused in fact believed that s/he had a legal right in the circumstances to obtain the property, the element will not be established (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).

Exhaustive Definition

99. The word "dishonestly" in s 81 is to be defined exclusively as meaning without belief by the accused that s/he had a legal right to obtain the property (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; R v Bonollo [1981] VR 633; R v Brow [1981] VR 783).

100. As this definition of "dishonestly" is exhaustive, if the accused did not believe s/he had a legal right to the property, then s/he will have acted "dishonestly" (R v Brow [1981] VR 783).

101. The provisions of ss 73(2) and (3), which state that in certain circumstances an accused person's appropriation of property is not to be regarded as dishonest, do not apply to s 81 (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).

No Need to Believe in Right to Deceive

102. The accused does not need to have believed that s/he had a legal right to obtain the property by deception, or by the particular means employed. S/he merely needs to have believed that s/he had a legal right to obtain the property. The deception was simply his or her means of achieving that goal (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; R v Bedford (2007) 98 SASR 514).

103. So even if the accused used violent measures to take the property, s/he should not be convicted of obtaining property by deception if s/he genuinely believed s/he had a legal right to the property. However, s/he may be convicted of an offence relating to the violence used (R v Bedford (2007) 98 SASR 514; R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).

104. It will therefore be a misdirection to tell the jury that the prosecution must prove that the accused believed s/he had a right to take the property by the deception actually employed. The jury should instead be directed that the prosecution must prove that the accused did not believe s/he had a legal right to obtain the property (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).

[1006] A mistaken belief that certain facts existed, which would have created a legal claim if true.

[1007] A mistaken belief that certain interests create legal rights.

Relationship Between "Dishonesty" and "Deception"

105. There may be cases where property belonging to another has been obtained by deception, with the intention of permanently depriving the other of it, but which has not been done dishonestly (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; Pollard v Cth DPP (1992) 28 NSWLR 659).[1008]

106. Thus, the mere fact that the accused obtained the property by deception is not enough to prove that s/he acted dishonestly. The prosecution must prove that the accused acted without a claim of legal right (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).

107. However, in many cases the practising of a deception will be strongly evidentiary of whether the acts charged were done dishonestly. The jury may be able to infer from the fact that the accused acted deceitfully that s/he was not making a claim of right (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; Pollard v Cth DPP (1992) 28 NSWLR 659).

108. While in many cases the deception practised will be highly relevant to the element of dishonesty, this will not always be the case. For example, where the accused admits engaging in deception, but advances an explanation for why s/he did so, the jury may not be able to infer anything about the accused's dishonesty from the fact that s/he was deceitful (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).

Need for Jury Directions

109. Due to the difficulty in understanding the relationship between deception and dishonesty, and the special sense in which "dishonestly" is used in this context, the judge must explain the concept of "dishonestly" to the jury (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; R v Bonollo [1981] VR 633; R v Todo (2004) 10 VR 244).

110. In such cases, the judge must:

- Tell the jury that the prosecution must prove that the property had been obtained dishonestly, in the sense that the accused did not believe that s/he had a legal right to it; and
- Assist the jury by relating the facts to the law, and the facts and issues raised by counsel to the actual charges (R v Todo (2004) 10 VR 244).

111. In some cases it may be desirable to point out that the question as to what constitutes "dishonestly" is not to be answered by considering the morality of the accused's actions, but by considering whether the accused believed that s/he had a legal right to obtain the relevant property (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).

Offences Committed by Bodies Corporate

112. The offence of obtaining property by deception may be committed by a body corporate (Crimes Act 1958 s 84).

[1008] In R v Salvo [1980] VR 401 the court gives the example of a robber who forcibly detains goods from the true owner. Because the robber has possession or control of the goods, they are deemed to belong to him by virtue of s 71(2). If the true owner, by a stratagem of deception, obtains the goods from the robber, he will not have acted dishonestly – as he believes he has a legal claim to the goods (and in fact does have a legal right to regain the goods by seizure).

113. Where an offence committed by a body corporate is proved to have been committed with the consent or connivance of any director, manager, secretary or other similar officer of the body corporate, or any person who was purporting to act in any such capacity, that person will also be guilty of the offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 84(1)).

114. Where the affairs of the body corporate are managed by its members, the members may also be found guilty of the offence (if they acted in connection with their management function) (Crimes Act 1958 s 84(2)).

Extraterritorial Offences

115. It is not necessary that the property was obtained in Victoria. Section 81 applies where there is a "real and substantial link" between the relevant act and Victoria (Crimes Act 1958 s 80A).

116. The concept of a "real and substantial link" is defined in s 80A(2). It includes cases where:

- A "significant part" of the conduct relating to, or constituting, the relevant act occurred in Victoria; or
- The act was done with the intention that substantial harmful effects arise in Victoria, and such effects did arise.

117. The words in s 80A should be given their natural meaning (R v Keech (2002) 5 VR 312).

118. An act which forms an essential link in the chain of deception (rather than merely being part of the surrounding circumstances) is a "significant part" of the relevant conduct (R v Keech (2002) 5 VR 312).

Last updated: 27 October 2022

7.5.12.1 Charge: Obtaining Property by Deception

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of obtaining property by deception. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused obtained property that belonged to another person.

Two – the accused intended to permanently deprive that person of his or her property.

Three – the accused obtained the property by deception.

Four – the accused obtained the property dishonestly.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[1009]

Obtaining Property Belonging to Another

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused obtained property that belonged to another person.

There are three parts to this element:

[1009] If an element or part of an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be explained briefly, and followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meet the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

- First, the accused must have obtained something;
- Second, the thing obtained must have been property; and
- Third, that property must have belonged to another person when it was obtained.

Obtaining

For the first part of this element to be met, the prosecution must prove that the accused obtained the [identify property].

The law says that a person "obtains" something if s/he obtains ownership, possession or control of it.

[If the accused did not obtain the property for him or herself, add the following shaded section.]

The accused does not need to have obtained the property for him/herself. This requirement will be satisfied if s/he [obtained the property for another person/enabled another person to obtain the property/enabled another person to retain the property].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA obtained the [identify property] because s/he [describe prosecution arguments and evidence concerning the way in which the accused obtained the property]. The defence denied this, arguing [describe defence arguments and evidence].

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether NOA obtained the [identify property]. If you are not satisfied that s/he did, then s/he will be not guilty of obtaining property by deception.

Property

The second part of this element requires the thing obtained to be "property".

"Property" is a technical legal term, which includes many different things. It does not only refer to physical objects.

Of relevance to this case, [describe relevant type of property] is a type of "property". This means that this part of the first element will be met if you are satisfied that what NOA obtained was [describe type of property].

The prosecution argued [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied that this was the case, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

For this element to be satisfied, you must find that [explain findings necessary for the relevant item to be classified as property]. If you are not satisfied that this was the case, then the accused will be not guilty of obtaining property by deception.

Belonging to Another

[If there is an issue about whether the property belonged to another*, add the following shaded section.*]

The third part of this element requires the thing obtained to have belonged to another person at the time it was obtained.

The law says that property "belongs" to anyone who has possession or control of that property, or who has any other proprietary right or interest in it. This includes [insert relevant example].

In this case the prosecution alleged that the [describe property] belonged to NOC. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

[If there is uncertainty about which third party the property belonged to, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution does not need to prove who the property actually belonged to, as long as they can prove that it belonged to someone other than the accused.

[If it is alleged that the accused had a proprietary right in the relevant property, add the following shaded section.]

It does not matter if you find that the accused had [describe property right]. If another person also had [describe property right] that was obtained, then for the purposes of this element the property belonged to another person.

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether [identify property] belonged to another person. It is only if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that it did that this element will be met. If you are not satisfied that this is the case, then NOA will be not guilty of obtaining property by deception.

Intention to Permanently Deprive

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that, when the accused obtained the property, s/he intended to permanently deprive the owner of it. That is, s/he intended that the owner would never get the property back.

It does not matter whether the accused intended to keep, sell, give away, destroy or hide the property. If his/her intention was that the owner would not get it back, then s/he will have had the necessary intention.

[If the accused may not yet have formed the relevant intention when s/he obtained the property, add the following shaded section.]

For this element to be met, the accused must have already decided not to return the property to its owner when s/he obtained it. This element will not be satisfied if, when the accused obtained the property, s/he was not yet certain whether or not s/he would give it back – only deciding later that s/he was going to keep it.

[If the accused may have only had an intention to temporarily deprive the owner of his/her property, add the following shaded section.]

The accused's intention must have been to permanently deprive the owner of the property. This element will not be met if s/he only meant to deprive the owner of his/her property temporarily, and then to give it back to him/her.

[If it is alleged that the accused was only going to return the property after its nature had been fundamentally changed, add the following darker shaded section.]

However, if the accused was only planning on returning the property after its nature had been fundamentally changed, you may find that s/he intended to permanently deprive the owner of that property. This is because, although it may seem that s/he intended to return the owner's property, in reality s/he did not intend to give back what s/he took – s/he intended to return something that was completely different.

That is what the prosecution argued happened here. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, alleging [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

[If it is alleged that the accused was only borrowing the property, add the following shaded section.]

In this case the defence alleged that the accused did not intend to keep the property in question, but was merely borrowing it. [Identify relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

This element will not be met if you find that NOA intended to return the [identify property]. This is true even if s/he borrowed it without permission.

[If the borrowing may have amounted to an outright taking, add the following darker shaded section.]

Warning: this direction will only be relevant in exceptional cases. See the discussion of s 73(12) in 7.5.12 Obtaining Property by Deception.

However, if the accused borrowed the property for a period, or in circumstances, which made it equivalent to an outright taking or disposal, then the law says that s/he will have had an intention to permanently deprive the owner of the property. This will be the case even if s/he intended to give the property back eventually.

That is what the prosecution alleged happened here. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

[If it is alleged that the accused intended to replace the money or goods obtained, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, you have heard evidence that although NOA received [money/describe object] from NOC, s/he intended to replace it.

Even if you find this to be the case, that does not mean that NOA did not intend to permanently deprive NOC of his/her property. Unless s/he was planning on returning to NOC the exact same [notes/coins/object] that s/he obtained, NOA will have had an intention to permanently deprive NOC of his/her property. Returning an equivalent [amount of money/item] is not sufficient.

[If the accused did not have an intention to permanently deprive, but may have had an intention to treat the property as his/her own, add the following shaded section.]

[This direction is based Crimes Act 1958 s 73(12). It should only be used in exceptional cases. See 7.5.12 Obtaining Property by Deception for further information.]

There is one exception to the rule that the accused had to intend to permanently deprive the owner of his/her property. This arises where, despite not having such an intention, the accused intended to treat the property as his/her own to dispose of regardless of the owner's rights.

[If it is alleged that the accused parted with the property under a condition as to its return that s/he may not have been able to perform (e.g. by pawning the property), add the following darker shaded section.]

The law says that a person will have done this if, for his/her own purposes and without the owner's consent, s/he parted with the property under a condition that s/he may not be able to meet.

The prosecution alleged that that was the case here. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused did intend to treat the [describe property] as his/her own to dispose of regardless of NOC's rights, then this element will be proven, even if NOA ultimately intended to give back the property.

Deception

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused obtained the property by deception.

There are four parts to this element, all of which must be proven beyond reasonable doubt:

- First, the accused must have made a false representation;
- Second, the accused must have known the representation was false or was probably false when s/he made it;
- Third, the accused must have intended that the false representation be acted upon; and

- Fourth, the accused must have obtained the property as a result of making that false representation.

I will now explain each of these parts in more detail.

False Representation

For the first part of this element to be met the accused must have made a false representation.

The representation can have been made in words or by conduct, and does not need to have been explicit. That is, you may be able to infer the representation from the accused's words or conduct. You will remember what I have told you about inferences.[1010]

[If it is alleged that the representation only became false after it was made, add the following shaded section.]

The representation must have been false at the time it was made. This part of the third element will not be satisfied if the representation was true at that point in time, but later became false.[1011]

In this case it is alleged that the accused falsely represented that [describe alleged false representation].[1012]

[If the representation is to be implied from a promise, add the following shaded section.]

You will notice that although it is alleged that the accused promised [describe promise], that promise is not the representation that I just mentioned. Instead, the alleged representation that you must focus on is [describe implicit representation].

This is because the law says that the false representation must be about existing or past facts. It cannot be a representation about something that is going to happen in the future.

This part of the third element will therefore not be satisfied simply because a person makes a promise which they do not keep. A broken promise is not a false representation about an existing of past fact.

However, when a person makes a promise s/he may make an implicit or unspoken representation that s/he intends to act in a certain way. For example, s/he may represent that s/he intends to keep the promise by performing specific actions. As such a representation is about that person's present intentions, it meets the requirement that the representation be about an existing fact.

So in this case, it is not enough for you to find that NOA promised to [describe promise] and broke that promise. You must also be able to infer, beyond reasonable doubt, that when NOA made the promise, s/he was stating his/her current intention to [describe alleged intention] – and that that representation was false.

[Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments concerning the making of the representation and its falsity].

[If the defence denied that the accused made the alleged representation, add the following shaded section.]

[1010] This charge assumes that the jury has already been charged about inferences. If this has not been done, the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[1011] If it is alleged that the accused knew that his or her original representation had become false, and kept silent about it – thereby implicitly representing that the situation remained the same – it will be necessary to explain that it is that implicit representation that forms the basis of the charge, not the original representation. See 7.5.12 Obtaining Property by Deception for guidance.

[1012] If the representation is to be implied from a promise, care must be taken to refer to the accused's implicit representation about his or her intentions when s/he made the promise, rather than the promise itself: see 7.5.12 Obtaining Property by Deception.

The defence denied that NOA made that representation, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

[If the defence denied that the representation was false, add the following shaded section.]

While the defence agreed that NOA made that representation, they denied that it was false at the time it was made. [Insert defence evidence and/or arguments.]

It is for you to determine whether or not NOA represented that [describe representation], and whether that representation was false when it was made. It is only if you are satisfied that s/he did make a false representation that this part of the third element will be satisfied.

Knowledge of Falsity/Recklessness

For the second part of this element to be met the accused must have known that the representation was false or was probably false when s/he made it.

It is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that the representation was false. S/he must have at least known that it was probably false.

In determining this part of the element, you must be satisfied that NOA him/herself knew of the likelihood that the representation was untrue. It is not enough that you or a reasonable person would have recognised that probability in the circumstances.

In this case, the following evidence is relevant to your assessment of NOA's state of mind: [Identify relevant evidence and the inferences to be drawn from that evidence].

Intention That Representation Be Acted Upon

For the third part of this element to be met the accused must have intended that the false representation be acted upon by NOC.

If you consider that it is reasonably possible that NOA did not intend NOC to act upon that representation and thereby permit NOA to obtain the [describe property], then NOA will not be guilty of this offence.

[Insert any relevant evidence or arguments.]

Causation

For the fourth part of this element to be met the accused must have obtained the property as a result of making the false representation.

In this case, that requires you to find that NOC would not have acted in the way s/he did had it not been for NOA's representation [describe representation].

[If it is not alleged that the property was obtained from the same person who was deceived, add the following shaded section.]

In this case you will notice that it was not NOC's property that NOA is alleged to have obtained as a result of the deception. That does not matter. You do not need to find that the property was obtained from the same person who was deceived. This part of the third element will be satisfied as long as you find that the accused deceived someone, and that as a result the accused obtained the property.

The prosecution alleged that that was the case here. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments, identifying who it is alleged believed the representation and how that led to the accused obtaining the property.]

The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is only if you are satisfied that NOA made a false representation despite knowing it was false or probably false, and that s/he intended that representation would be acted upon, and that s/he obtained the property as a result of making that false representation, that this third element will be met. If any of these matters have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then NOA will be not guilty of obtaining property by deception.

Dishonesty

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that when the accused obtained the property, s/he was acting dishonestly.

In this context, "dishonesty" has a special legal meaning. The law says that people act dishonestly when they obtain property if they do not believe that they have a legal right to obtain that property.

In this case, the defence alleged that NOA did believe that s/he had a legal right to obtain the property. [Describe defence evidence and/or arguments.]

To prove this element, the prosecution must prove that NOA did not have this belief.

The issue here is whether the prosecution have proved that NOA did not believe s/he had a legal right to obtain the property. This is solely a question about NOA's state of mind about his/her legal entitlement to the property. This is not a question about whether or not NOA believed s/he was entitled to use deception to obtain the property. Even if NOA knew that s/he should not have obtained the property in the way that s/he did, s/he will only be guilty of obtaining property by deception if the prosecution prove that s/he did not believe s/he had a legal right to the property.

[If the accused may have believed s/he had a moral right to take the property, add the shaded section.]

The prosecution need only prove that NOA did not believe that s/he had a legal right to take the property. It is no defence for NOA to have believed that s/he had a moral right to the property.

[If the accused's belief may have been incorrect or unreasonable, add the following darker shaded section.]

It is important to note that NOA's belief does not need to have been correct, or even reasonable. However, the reasonableness of the accused's alleged belief is not irrelevant. In determining whether the prosecution have proved that NOA did not in fact believe s/he had a legal right to obtain the property, you may consider whether his/her asserted belief was reasonable in all the circumstances.

I want to reiterate that it is for the prosecution to prove that the accused did not believe that s/he had a legal right to obtain the property. It is not for the defence to prove that s/he did have such a belief.

In determining whether NOA did not have this belief, your sole focus should be on his/her state of mind at the time s/he [describe relevant act]. The issue is not whether you think s/he was right or wrong to do what s/he did, but whether s/he did not believe s/he had a right to obtain the property.

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused did not believe [describe relevant belief] that this fourth element will be met.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of obtaining property by deception, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA obtained property that belonged to NOC; and

Two – that NOA intended to permanently deprive NOC of that property; and Three – that NOA obtained the property by deception. That is:

- S/he made a false representation; and
- S/he knew that representation was false or probably false; and
- S/he intended that the false representation be acted upon; and

- S/he obtained the property as a result of making that false representation; and Four – that NOA obtained the property dishonestly.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of obtaining property by deception.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

7.5.12.2 Checklist: Obtaining Property by Deception

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused obtained property belonging to another; and
2. The accused did so with the intention of permanently depriving the other of that property; and
3. The accused obtained the property by deception; and
4. The accused obtained the property dishonestly.

Obtaining Property Belonging to Another

1. Did the accused obtain property that belonged to another person?

Consider – Did the accused obtain ownership, possession or control of property belonging to another person?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Obtaining Property by Deception

Intention to Permanently Deprive

2. Did the accused intend to permanently deprive another person of that property?

Consider – Did the accused intend that the owner would never get the property back?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Obtaining Property by Deception

Deception

3. Did the accused obtain the property by deception?

3.1 Did the accused make a false representation?

Consider – Did the accused make the representation alleged by the prosecution. Was that representation false when it was made?

If Yes, then go to 3.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Obtaining Property by Deception

3.2 At the time of making the representation, did the accused know that the representation was false, or that it was probably false?

If Yes, then go to 3.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Obtaining Property by Deception

3.3 Did the accused intend that the false representation would be acted upon?

If Yes, then go to 3.4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Obtaining Property by Deception

3.4 Did the accused obtain the property as a result of making the false representation?

Consider – Did the false representation cause a relevant person to give the accused ownership, possession or control of the property?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Obtaining Property by Deception

---

Dishonesty

4. Did the accused obtain the property dishonestly?

Consider – Has the prosecution proved that the accused did not believe that he/she had a legal right to obtain the property?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Obtaining Property by Deception (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Obtaining Property by Deception

Last updated: 4 June 2009

7.5.13 Obtaining a Financial Advantage by Deception

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. It is an offence to obtain a financial advantage by deception (Crimes Act 1958 s 82).
2. The offence has the following three elements:
   i) The accused obtained a financial advantage for himself or herself or another;
   ii) The accused used deceit to obtain the financial advantage; and
   iii) The accused obtained the financial advantage dishonestly (Crimes Act 1958 s 82. See, e.g. R v Vasic (2005) 11 VR 380; Anile v The Queen [2018] VSCA 235R, [187]).

Relationship With Other Property Offences

3. The offence of obtaining a financial advantage by deception was created for cases where the accused dishonestly obtained credit or services – circumstances not covered by the offences of theft (Crimes Act 1958 s 72) or obtaining property by deception (Crimes Act 1958 s 81) (R v Vasic (2005) 11 VR 380).
4. Like the offences in ss 74, 75, 75A, 76, 77 and 81 of the Crimes Act 1958, the offence of obtaining a financial advantage by deception must be committed "dishonestly".
5. However, unlike those offences, s 82 does not require the offence to have been committed:
    - Against or in respect of property "belonging to another"; or
    - With the "intention of permanently depriving" a person of that property.

Obtaining a Financial Advantage

6. For the first element to be met, the jury must be satisfied that:
    - The accused obtained something; and
    - The thing obtained was a financial advantage.

Obtaining

7. The accused must have "obtained" a financial advantage (Crimes Act 1958 s 82(1)).
8. This differs from theft, where the accused must have "appropriated" the property by adversely assuming any of the owner's rights (see 7.5.1 Theft).
9. The word "obtains" is not defined for the purposes of s 82.[1013] It should be given its ordinary meaning.
10. The accused does not need to have obtained the financial advantage for him or herself. This element will be satisfied if s/he obtained the financial advantage for another person (Crimes Act 1958 s 82(1). See, e.g. Richardson v Skells [1976] Crim LR 448; Anile v The Queen [2018] VSCA 235R, [187]).
11. Where the accused deceives someone with the intention of obtaining a financial advantage, but fails to obtain the financial advantage, s/he may be guilty of attempting to obtain a financial advantage by deception (R v Kalajdic [2005] VSCA 160; R v King [1987] QB 547).

Financial Advantage

12. The thing that the accused obtained must have been a "financial advantage" (Crimes Act 1958 s 82(1)).
13. The Act does not define "financial advantage". The words should be given their plain meaning, and should not be narrowly construed (R v Walsh (1990) 52 A Crim R 80; Matthews v Fountain [1982] VR 1045).
14. If the term "financial advantage" needs to be elaborated upon, then it occurs where a person obtains a more favourable economic, monetary or commercial position than otherwise (Fisher v Bennett (1987) 85 FLR 469, 472; Taylor v The Queen [2019] VSCA 162, [99]).

[1013] This is in contrast to the offence of obtaining property by deception (Crimes Act 1958 s 81), for which "obtains" is defined to mean obtaining ownership, possession or control (see 7.5.12 Obtaining Property by Deception).

15. The term "financial advantage" was intended to be broader than the term "pecuniary advantage" (which is used in s 16 of the Theft Act 1968 (UK)), and to cover at least all of the things covered by that term (R v Vasic (2005) 11 VR 380).

16. Thus, a "financial advantage" includes (but is not limited to) the following circumstances (which were covered by s 16 of the Theft Act 1968 (UK) at the time s 82 was introduced):

    - When a debt or charge for which the accused is or may become liable (including one which is not legally enforceable) is reduced or in whole or part evaded or deferred;
    - When the accused is allowed to borrow by way of overdraft or to take out any policy of insurance or annuity contract, or obtains an improvement of the terms on which he is allowed to do so; and
    - When the accused is given the opportunity to earn remuneration or greater remuneration in an office or employment, or to win money by betting (R v Vasic (2005) 11 VR 380).

17. A financial advantage may include a situation where a person obtains the opportunity to earn remuneration in employment (Taylor v The Queen [2019] VSCA 162, [99]–[101]).

Evading Debts

18. A person obtains a financial advantage by evading a debt, even if the evasion is only temporary (R v Vasic (2005) 11 VR 380; R v Turner [1974] AC 357).

19. A financial advantage is obtained whenever a debt is deferred, no matter how poor the accused is. This is because the accused is relieved of a claim upon such money or ability to generate it as they may have, for the period of the deferral (R v Vasic (2005) 11 VR 380).

20. A financial advantage will therefore be obtained when a creditor is given a cheque which the debtor knows to be worthless, in pretended payment of the debt. In such circumstances, the debtor gains the advantage of having the debt deferred (R v Vasic (2005) 11 VR 380; Matthews v Fountain [1982] VR 1045).

21. A person will not be guilty of obtaining a financial advantage by deception simply because s/he cannot repay a debt. S/he will only be guilty if s/he evades the debt by deception (e.g. by falsely telling the debtor that s/he is not able to repay the debt) (R v Vasic (2005) 11 VR 380).

Deception

22. The second element requires the accused to have obtained the financial advantage by deception (Crimes Act 1958 s 82(1)).

23. "Deception" has the same meaning as it does for the offence of obtaining property by deception (Crimes Act 1958 s 82(2); Smith v R (1982) 7 A Crim R 437 (Vic CCA)).

24. See 7.5.12 Obtaining Property by Deception for further information concerning this element.

25. The judge must direct the jury about the need for unanimity on the particular deception used (Magnus v R (2013) 41 VR 612; R v Brown (1984) 79 Cr App R 115; R v Holmes [2006] VSCA 73).

Dishonesty

26. The third element requires the financial advantage to have been obtained "dishonestly" (Crimes Act 1958 s 82(1); R v Salvo [1980] VR 401).

27. This requirement is additional to the requirement that the financial advantage be obtained "by deception". The prosecution must prove that when the accused, by deception, obtained the financial advantage, s/he was acting dishonestly (R v Salvo [1980] VR 401; Pollard v Cth DPP (1992) 28 NSWLR 659).

28. See 7.5.12 Obtaining Property by Deception for information concerning this element.

Offences Committed by Bodies Corporate

29. The offence of obtaining property by financial advantage may be committed by a body corporate (Crimes Act 1958 s 84).

30. Where an offence committed by a body corporate is proved to have been committed with the consent or connivance of any director, manager, secretary or other similar officer of the body corporate, or any person who was purporting to act in any such capacity, that person will also be guilty of the offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 84(1)).

31. Where the affairs of the body corporate are managed by its members, the members may also be found guilty of the offence (if they acted in connection with their management function) (Crimes Act 1958 s 84(2)).

Extraterritorial Offences

32. It is not necessary that the financial advantage was obtained in Victoria. Section 82 applies where there is a "real and substantial link" between the relevant act and Victoria (Crimes Act 1958 s 80A).

33. The concept of a "real and substantial link" is defined in s 80A(2). It includes cases where:

    - A "significant part" of the conduct relating to, or constituting, the relevant act occurred in Victoria; or
    - The act was done with the intention that substantial harmful effects arise in Victoria, and such effects did arise.

34. The words in s 80A should be given their natural meaning (R v Keech (2002) 5 VR 312).

35. An act which forms an essential link in the chain of deception (rather than merely being part of the surrounding circumstances) is a "significant part" of the relevant conduct (R v Keech (2002) 5 VR 312).

Last updated: 28 August 2019

7.5.13.1 Charge: Obtaining a Financial Advantage by Deception

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of obtaining a financial advantage by deception. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused obtained a financial advantage.

Two – the accused obtained the financial advantage by deception.

Three – the accused obtained the financial advantage dishonestly.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[1014]

[1014] If an element or part of an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be explained briefly, and followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meet the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

Obtaining a Financial Advantage

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused obtained a financial advantage.

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA obtained the following financial advantage: [describe financial advantage and prosecution evidence and/or arguments].

[If the accused did not obtain the financial advantage for him or herself, add the following shaded section.]

You will notice that it is not alleged that the accused obtained a financial advantage for him/herself. That does not matter. This element will be satisfied if s/he obtained a financial advantage for another person.

The defence denied that [describe defence argument, e.g. "that any financial advantage was obtained" or "that what the accused obtained was a "financial advantage"". Insert defence evidence.]

[If there is an issue about whether a "financial advantage" was obtained, add the following shaded section.]

In determining whether the accused obtained a financial advantage, you should give the words "financial advantage" their plain meaning. They cover any type of financial advantage, including [insert relevant example]. This means that the first element will be met if you are satisfied that [explain findings necessary for the relevant accused to have obtained a financial advantage].

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether NOA obtained a financial advantage. If you are not satisfied that s/he did, then s/he will be not guilty of obtaining a financial advantage by deception.

Deception

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused obtained the financial advantage by deception.

There are four parts to this element, all of which must be proven beyond reasonable doubt:

- First, the accused must have made a false representation;
- Second, the accused must have known the representation was false or was probably false when s/he made it;
- Third, the accused must have intended that the false representation be acted upon; and
- Fourth, the accused must have obtained the financial advantage as a result of making that false representation.

I will now explain each of these parts in more detail.

False Representation

For the first part of this element to be met the accused must have made a false representation.

The representation can have been made in words or by conduct, and does not need to have been explicit. That is, you may be able to infer the representation from the accused's words or conduct. You will remember what I have told you about inferences.[1015]

[If it is alleged that the representation only became false after it was made, add the following shaded section.]

[1015] This charge assumes that the jury has already been charged about inferences. If this has not been done, the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

The representation must have been false at the time it was made. This part of the second element will not be satisfied if the representation was true at that point in time, but later became false.[1016]

In this case it is alleged that the accused falsely represented that [describe alleged false representation].[1017]

[If the representation is to be implied from a promise, add the following shaded section.]

You will notice that although it is alleged that the accused promised [describe promise], that promise is not the representation that I just mentioned. Instead, the alleged representation that you must focus on is [describe implicit representation].

This is because the law says that the false representation must be about existing or past facts. It cannot be a representation about something that is going to happen in the future.

This part of the second element will therefore not be satisfied simply because a person makes a promise which they do not keep. A broken promise is not a false representation about an existing of past fact.

However, when a person makes a promise s/he may make an implicit or unspoken representation that s/he intends to act in a certain way. For example, s/he may represent that s/he intends to keep the promise by performing specific actions. As such a representation is about that person's present intentions, it meets the requirement that the representation be about an existing fact.

So in this case, it is not enough for you to find that NOA promised to [describe promise] and broke that promise. You must also be able to infer, beyond reasonable doubt, that when NOA made the promise, s/he was stating his/her current intention to [describe alleged intention] – and that that representation was false.

[Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments concerning the making of the representation and its falsity].

[If the defence denied that the accused made the alleged representation, add the following shaded section.]

The defence denied that NOA made that representation, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

[If the defence denied that the representation was false, add the following shaded section.]

While the defence agreed that NOA made that representation, they denied that it was false at the time it was made. [Insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine whether or not NOA represented that [describe representation], and whether that representation was false when it was made. It is only if you are satisfied that s/he did make a false representation that this part of the second element will be satisfied.

[1016] If it is alleged that the accused knew that his or her original representation had become false, and kept silent about it – thereby implicitly representing that the situation remained the same – it will be necessary to explain that it is that implicit representation that forms the basis of the charge, not the original representation. See 7.5.12 Obtaining Property by Deception for guidance.

[1017] If the representation is to be implied from a promise, care must be taken to refer to the accused's implicit representation about his or her intentions when s/he made the promise, rather than the promise itself: see 7.5.12 Obtaining Property by Deception.

Knowledge of Falsity/Recklessness

For the second part of this element to be met the accused must have known that the representation was false or was probably false when s/he made it.

It is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that the representation was false. S/he must have at least known that it was probably false.

In determining this part of the element, you must be satisfied that NOA him/herself knew of the likelihood that the representation was untrue. It is not enough that you or a reasonable person would have recognised that probability in the circumstances.

In this case, the following evidence is relevant to your assessment of NOA's state of mind: [Identify relevant evidence and the inferences to be drawn from that evidence].

Intention that Representation be Acted Upon

For the third part of this element to be met the accused must have intended that the false representation be acted upon by NOC.

If you consider that it is reasonably possible that NOA did not intend NOC to act upon that representation and thereby permit NOA to obtain the financial advantage, then NOA will not be guilty of this offence.

[Insert any relevant evidence or arguments.]

Causation

For the fourth part of this element to be met the accused must have obtained the financial advantage as a result of making the false representation.

In this case, that requires you to find that NOC would not have acted in the way s/he did had it not been for NOA's representation that [describe representation].

[If it is not alleged that the financial advantage was obtained from the same person who was deceived, add the following shaded section.]

In this case you will notice that NOA did not obtain the financial advantage directly from NOC. That does not matter. You do not need to find that the financial advantage was obtained from the same person who was deceived. This part of the second element will be satisfied as long as you find that the accused deceived someone, and that as a result the accused obtained a financial advantage.

The prosecution alleged that that was the case here. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments, identifying who it is alleged believed the representation and how that led to the accused obtaining the financial advantage.]

The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is only if you are satisfied that NOA made a false representation despite knowing it was false or probably false, and that s/he intended that representation would be acted upon, and that s/he obtained the financial advantage as a result of making that false representation, that this second element will be met. If any of these matters have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then NOA will be not guilty of obtaining a financial advantage by deception.

Dishonesty

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that when the accused obtained the financial advantage, s/he was acting dishonestly.

In this context, "dishonesty" does not have its ordinary meaning. The law says that a person acts dishonestly when obtaining a financial advantage if that person does not believe that he or she has a legal right to obtain that financial advantage.

In this case, the defence alleged that NOA did believe that s/he had a legal right to obtain the financial advantage. [Describe defence evidence and/or arguments.]

To prove this element, the prosecution must prove that NOA did not have this belief.

The issue here is whether the prosecution have proved that NOA did not believe s/he had a legal right to obtain the financial advantage. This is solely a question about NOA's state of mind about his/her legal entitlement to the financial advantage. This is not a question about whether or not NOA believed s/he was entitled to use deception to obtain the financial advantage. Even if NOA knew that s/he should not have obtained the financial advantage in the way that s/he did, s/he will only be guilty of obtaining financial advantage by deception if the prosecution prove that s/he did not believe s/he had a legal right to the financial advantage.

[If the accused may have believed s/he had a moral right to the financial advantage, add the shaded section.]

The prosecution need only prove that NOA did not believe that s/he had a legal right to the financial advantage. It is no defence for NOA to have believed that s/he had a moral right to the financial advantage.

[If the accused's belief may have been incorrect or unreasonable, add the following shaded section.]

It is important to note that NOA's belief does not need to have been correct, or even reasonable. However, the reasonableness of the accused's alleged belief is not irrelevant. In determining whether the prosecution have proved that NOA did not in fact believe s/he had a legal right to obtain the financial advantage, you may consider whether his/her asserted belief was reasonable in all the circumstances.

I want to reiterate that it is for the prosecution to prove that the accused did not believe that s/he had a legal right to obtain the financial advantage. It is not for the defence to prove that s/he did have such a belief.

In determining whether NOA did not have this belief, your sole focus should be on his/her state of mind at the time s/he [describe relevant act]. The issue is not whether you think s/he was right or wrong to do what s/he did, but whether s/he did not believe s/he had a right to obtain the financial advantage.

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused did not believe [describe relevant belief] that this third element will be met.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of obtaining a financial advantage by deception, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA obtained a financial advantage; and

Two – that NOA obtained the financial advantage by deception. That is:

- S/he made a false representation; and
- S/he knew that representation was false or probably false; and
- S/he intended that the false representation be acted upon; and
- S/he obtained the financial advantage as a result of making that false representation; and

Three – that NOA did not believe that s/he had a legal right to obtain the financial advantage.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of obtaining a financial advantage by deception.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

7.5.13.2 Checklist: Obtaining a Financial Advantage by Deception

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

36. The accused obtained a financial advantage; and
37. The accused obtained that financial advantage by deception; and
38. The accused obtained the financial advantage dishonestly.

Obtaining a Financial Advantage

1. Did the accused obtain a financial advantage?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Obtaining a Financial Advantage by Deception

Deception

2. Did the accused obtain the financial advantage by deception?

2.1 Did the accused make a false representation?

Consider – Did the accused make the representation alleged by the prosecution? Was that representation false when it was made?

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Obtaining a Financial Advantage by Deception

2.2 At the time of making the representation, did the accused know that the representation was false, or that it was probably false?

If Yes, then go to 2.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Obtaining a Financial Advantage by Deception

2.3 Did the accused intend that the false representation would be acted upon?

If Yes, then go to 2.4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Obtaining a Financial Advantage by Deception

2.4 Did the accused obtain the financial advantage as a result of making the false representation?

Consider – Did the false representation cause a relevant person to give the accused ownership, possession or control of the property?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Obtaining a Financial Advantage by Deception

Dishonesty

3. Did the accused obtain the financial advantage dishonestly?

Consider – Has the prosecution proved that the accused did not believe that he/she had a legal right to obtain the financial advantage?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Obtaining a Financial Advantage by Deception (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1 and 2)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Obtaining a Financial Advantage by Deception

Last updated: 4 June 2009

7.5.14 Making or Using a False Document

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Offences

1. In 1988–89 the common law offences of forgery and uttering were replaced by the statutory offences contained in Crimes Act 1958 s 83A.[1018] This section now codifies the offences arising out of the making and use of false documents (R v Gatzka (2004) 9 VR 459).
2. Section 83A creates a series of offences which include:
    - Making a false document (s 83A(1));
    - Using a false document (s 83A(2));
    - Making a copy of a false document (s 83A(3)); and
    - Using a copy of a false document (s 83A(4)).[1019]
3. Due to the substantial overlap in elements between the offences, this commentary addresses all of them. They are, however, discrete offences, and the judge must correctly instruct the jury on the specific offence alleged in the indictment.

Elements

4. Each offence has five elements, which address the following issues:

    i) The creation or use of the document;

[1018] Section 83A commenced operation on 1 June 1988. The offences of forgery and uttering were abolished on 25 June 1989 (but continue to apply to offences committed before that date) (Crimes Act 1958 s 83B).

[1019] Four further offences are created by ss 83A(5)–(5C). It is not anticipated that those offences will be addressed in the Charge Book. However, some aspects of this commentary (e.g. the meaning of "false") will be relevant to those offences.

ii) The false nature of the document;

iii) The accused's knowledge of the falsity;

iv) The accused's intention that someone be induced to accept the document as genuine; and

v) The accused's intention that acceptance of the document as genuine will result in prejudice to a person.

5. It is not necessary to show that the accused achieved his or her intended purpose. The gist of the offence lies in intention, rather than consequence. The offence is similar to inchoate offences, in that it punishes preparatory acts (R v Ceylan (2002) 4 VR 208; Attorney-General's Reference (No 1 of 2000) [2001] 1 WLR 331; R v Garcia (1988) 87 Cr App R 175; R v O'Hara [2005] VSCA 62).

Making or using a document

6. The requirements of the first element differ depending on which offence has been charged:
    - For two of the offences (ss 83A(1) and (3)) the accused must have "made" something, while for the other offences (ss 83A(2) and (4)) he or she must have "used" something; and
    - For two of the offences (ss 83A(1) and (2)) the thing made or used must have been an "original document", while for the other offences (ss 83A(3) and (4)) it must have been a "copy of a document".

When does a person "make" or "use" a document?

7. A person "makes" a document if he or she is ultimately responsible for it coming into existence (Nikolaidis v R [2008] NSWCCA 323 (Simpson J)).

8. A person "makes" a new document when he or she alters an existing document (Crimes Act 1958 s 83A(7). See also Nikolaidis v R [2008] NSWCCA 323; R v Ondhia [1998] 2 Cr App R 150).

9. A person "uses" a document when he or she deploys the document (Sultan v R [2008] NSWCCA 175).

10. Mere presence at the time a document is deployed by another does not constitute "use". There must be a direct link between the accused and the deployment (Sultan v R [2008] NSWCCA 175).

When is a document "copied"?

11. A person "copies" a document by making an exact replica of that document.

12. If a person makes any modifications to a document in the course of copying it, he or she has not made a copy. He or she has made an original document and should be charged with an offence under s 83A(1) (Nikolaidis v R [2008] NSWCCA 323; R v Ondhia [1998] 2 Cr App R 150. See also Crimes Act 1958 s 83A(7)).

13. Thus, in deciding whether the accused has made or used an original document or a copy of a document, the fact that the document appears to be a copy is not determinative. The question is whether the accused made or used a copy of an existing document, or created a false copy of a document him or herself. This may depend on the way in which the accused used or intended to use the document (see Nikolaidis v R [2008] NSWCCA 323; R v Ondhia [1998] 2 Cr App R 150; R v Harris [1966] 1 QB 184).

What is a "document"?

14. A "document" includes:

    (a) any book, map, plan, graph or drawing;

    (b) any photograph;

    (c) any label, marking or other writing which identifies or describes anything of which it forms part, or to which it is attached by any means whatsoever;

(d) any disc, tape, sound track or other device in which sounds or other data (not being visual images) are embodied so as to be capable (with or without the aid of some other equipment) of being reproduced therefrom;

(e) any film (including microfilm), negative, tape or other device in which one or more visual images are embodied so as to be capable (with or without the aid of some other equipment) of being reproduced therefrom; and

(f) anything whatsoever on which is marked any words, figures, letters or symbols which are capable of carrying a definite meaning to persons conversant with them (Interpretation of Legislation Act 1984 s 38).

15. This definition is substantially broader than the common law definition of "document", or the term "instrument" that is used in the section in the Forgery and Counterfeiting Act 1981 (UK) on which s 83A is based. Cases from other jurisdictions must therefore be treated with caution.

16. This definition may therefore include:

- A painter's signature in a painting (c.f. R v Closs (1858) Dears & B 460);
- Data in a computer system (see, e.g. DPP v Murdoch [1993] 1 VR 406).

False documents

17. The second element the prosecution must prove is that the document the accused made or used (either the original or the copy, depending on the offence charged) was "false".

18. Section 83A(6) exhaustively defines the ways in which a document may be "false" for the purpose of these offences. According to this section, a document is "false" if it purports:

(a) to have been made in the form in which it is made by a person who did not in fact make it in that form; or

(b) to have been made in the form in which it is made on the authority of a person who did not in fact authorise its making in that form; or

(c) to have been made in the terms in which it is made by a person who did not in fact make it in those terms; or

(d) to have been made in the terms in which it is made on the authority of a person who did not in fact authorise its making in those terms; or

(e) to have been altered in any respect by a person who did not in fact alter it in that respect; or

(f) to have been altered in any respect on the authority of a person who did not in fact authorise the alteration in that respect; or

(g) to have been made or altered on a date on which, or at a place at which, or otherwise in circumstances in which, it was not in fact made or altered; or

(h) to have been made or altered by an existing person who did not in fact exist.

19. Where the accused is charged with "making" a false document by altering an existing document, it does not matter if that original document was already false. If the accused alters it so as to make it "false" in any of the respects outlined above, he or she will have made a false document (Crimes Act 1958 s 83A(7)).

The document must "tell a lie about itself"

20. A document is not "false" simply because it contains untruths. To be "false", the document must purport to be something which it is not (R v Ceylan (2002) 4 VR 208; Brott v R (1992) 173 CLR 426; HKSAR v Muoi [2001] HKCA 95).

21. While traditionally this has been referred to as a requirement that the document must "tell a lie about itself", that phrase is best avoided as it can be unhelpful and misleading (Brott v R (1992) 173 CLR 426 (Deane J)).[1020]

22. The distinction between a document that contains falsehoods and a document that purports to be something which it is not may, in some cases, depend on the manner in which the document was created (see, e.g. Attorney-General's Reference (No 1 of 2000) [2001] 1 WLR 331).[1021]

Types of falsity

Non-authorised documents

23. One way in which a document will be "false" is if it purports to have been made in the form or terms in which it is made, on the authority of a person who did not in fact authorise its making in that form or terms (Crimes Act 1958 ss 83A(6)(b), (d)).

24. This meaning of "false" may be relevant where a document is created in the name of a company. For example, where an employee of a company is not authorised to issue an invoice or receipt in the name of that company, but nevertheless does so, he or she will have made a false document (DPP v Logan-Pye [2007] NSWSC 1492).

False circumstances

25. Another way in which a document will be "false" is if it purports to have been made or altered "in circumstances in which it was not in fact made or altered" (s 83A(6)(g)).

26. This definition of falsity applies where:

    - There are circumstances that need to exist before a document can properly be made or altered; and
    - Those circumstances did not exist at the time the document was made or altered (Attorney-General's Reference (No 1 of 2000) [2001] 1 WLR 331).

27. For example, the following documents have been held to be "false" under s 83A(6)(g):

    - A valuation of non-existent goods (as the goods needed to exist before the valuation could properly be made) (R v Donnelly [1984] 1 WLR 1017);
    - A fake employment reference (as an employment relationship needed to exist before a reference could be made) (Secretary for Justice v Keung [2007] HKCA 392; Attorney-General's Reference (No 1 of 2000) [2001] 1 WLR 331);
    - A document that purported to be made in the presence of people who were not present (R v Warneford [1994] Crim LR 753. See also Brott v R (1992) 173 CLR 426 at 443).

Documents made by a non-existent person

28. A third way in which a document will be "false" is if it purports "to have been made or altered by an existing person who did not in fact exist" (s 83A(6)(h)).

[1020] For example, Deane J notes that a biased document that describes itself as "unbiased" may "tell a lie about itself", but is not a "false" document for the purpose of this section.

[1021] For example, in Attorney-General's Reference (No 1 of 2000) [2001] 1 WLR 331 a bus driver operated a machine that created an automated record suggesting that someone else had been driving at a certain time, when in fact he had been. It was held that if the accused had hand-written a record wrongly noting that someone else had been driving at that time, that would not have been a "false" document. However, because of the use of the machine, the driver had purported to make a document in circumstances in which it was not in fact made, and so fell within the scope of the English equivalent of s 83A(6)(g).

29. It is not clear precisely what documents are covered by this meaning of "false". While it would appear to include documents made using a false identity, an alias or nom de plume, decided cases do not support that proposition (see R v More [1987] 1 WLR 1578; R v Fischetti & Sharma (2003) 192 FLR 119; Brott v R (1992) 173 CLR 426 at 446).

The false document must be clearly identified

30. The indictment should clearly identify the document that is said to be false. The prosecution cannot expand its case to rely on the falsity of other documents that are attached or annexed to the document specified in the indictment (e.g. supporting documentation for a loan application) (R v Ceylan (2002) 4 VR 208).

Directing the jury about the meaning of "false"

31. It is not appropriate for a judge to merely read out the text of s 83A(6), or provide the jury with a copy of the statute, and expect the jury to choose an appropriate form of falsity. The judge must instruct the jury on how it may find that a document is "false" (R v O'Hara [2005] VSCA 62; Nikolaidis v R [2008] NSWCCA 323).

32. The judge should only direct the jury about the types of falsity that are relevant to the circumstances of the case (R v O'Hara [2005] VSCA 62; Nikolaidis v R [2008] NSWCCA 323).

33. In cases where the nature of the alleged falsity is clear, the judge may instruct the jury that if they accept the prosecution case that the accused fabricated the document, and that the document was not what it purported to be, then they may find this element proven (R v O'Hara [2005] VSCA 62).

Knowledge that the Document is False

34. The third element the prosecution must prove is that the accused knew about the falsity (Crimes Act 1958 s 83A; R v O'Hara [2005] VSCA 62; Nikolaidis v R [2008] NSWCCA 323).

35. Precisely which document the accused must have known was false will vary depending on the offence charged:

    - Where the offence involves the accused making or using an original document (ss 83A(1) and (2)), the prosecution must prove that the accused knew that that document was false;
    - Where the offence involves the accused making or using a copy of a document (ss 83A(3) and (4)), the prosecution must prove that the accused knew that the original document (i.e., the document that was copied) was false.

Intention

36. The fourth and fifth elements both focus on the accused's intention:

    - The fourth element requires the accused to have intended that somebody (the "victim") would be induced to accept the false document as genuine;
    - The fifth element requires the accused to have intended that, due to accepting the document as genuine, the victim would act (or not act) in a way that prejudices somebody.

37. The prosecution must prove that these intentions existed at the time the accused made or used the document, depending on which offence is charged (R v Gatzka (2004) 9 VR 459; R v Ondhia [1998] 2 Cr App R 150; R v Tobierre [1986] 1 WLR 125).

Intention that the document be accepted as genuine

38. The requirements of the fourth element differ depending on whether the accused is charged with making or using a false document:

- Where the accused is charged with making the document (ss 83A(1) and (3)), the prosecution must prove that he or she did so with the intention that someone (including, potentially, the accused him or herself) would use it to induce another person to accept it as genuine (see R v Utting [1987] 1 WLR 1375; R v Johnson [1997] 8 Archbold News 1 (CA)).
- Where the accused is charged with using the document (ss 83A(2) and (4)), the prosecution must prove that he did so with the intention of personally inducing another person to accept it as genuine.

39. This element may be satisfied where the accused intended to cause a machine to respond to a false document (e.g. by using a false credit card or ATM card) (Crimes Act 1958 s 83A(9)(a)).

40. The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended that any particular person would accept the document as genuine. The intention may be directed generally, at prospective victims of the accused's plan (Crimes Act 1958 s 83A(10); R v O'Hara [2005] VSCA 62).

41. Where the accused is charged with making a false document:
    - The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused knew precisely how the document was going to be used. For example, this element may be met even if the accused was uncertain, when making the document, about how it was going to be provided to the intended victim; and
    - This element may be met where the accused planned to communicate the false document by fax. In such a case, the accused may be found to have intended to induce the recipient to accept the original false document (c.f. the faxed copy) as genuine, even though the recipient would never actually see that version of the document (R v Ondhia [1998] 2 Cr App R 150).

Intention that the victim act to somebody's prejudice

42. The fifth element requires the accused to have intended that, due to accepting the document as genuine, or as a copy of a genuine document, the victim would act (or not act) in a way that prejudices somebody other than the accused (Crimes Act 1958 s 83A(1)–(4); Nikolaidis v R [2008] NSWCCA 323; R v Gatzka (2004) 9 VR 459; R v Garcia (1988) 87 Cr App R 175; R v Utting [1987] 1 WLR 1375).

43. Where it is alleged that the accused intended that the victim not act in a certain way, it must be proved that he or she intended that omission to cause prejudice to somebody. It is not an offence to make or use a false document with the intention of inducing a person to refrain from causing prejudice (R v Utting [1987] 1 WLR 1375).

44. This element will be satisfied where it is intended that a machine will respond in a manner which, if a person did so, would be to a person's prejudice (Crimes Act 1958 s 83A(9)(b)).

Meaning of "prejudice"

45. The meaning of "prejudice" is defined in Crimes Act 1958 s 83A(8):

For the purposes of this section, an act or omission is to a person's prejudice if, and only if, it is one that, if it occurs:

(a) will result–

(i) in the person's temporary or permanent loss of property; or

(ii) in the person's being deprived of an opportunity to earn remuneration or greater remuneration; or

(iii) in the person's being deprived of an opportunity to obtain a financial advantage otherwise than by way of remuneration; or

(b) will result in any person being given an opportunity-

(i) to earn remuneration or greater remuneration from the first-mentioned person; or

(ii) to obtain a financial advantage from the first-mentioned person otherwise than by way of remuneration; or

(c) will be the result of the person's having accepted a false document as genuine, or a copy of a false document as a copy of a genuine one, in connection with the person's performance of a duty.

46. This definition is exhaustive (R v Gatzka (2004) 9 VR 459).

Prejudice in connection with a duty

47. To prove that the accused intended to cause the kind of prejudice specified in s 83A(8)(c) (prejudice in connection with a duty), the prosecution must prove that the accused intended that:
    - The victim would accept the document as genuine; and
    - As a result of accepting the document as genuine, the victim[1022] would perform (or fail to perform) his or her duties in a particular way (R v Utting [1987] 1 WLR 1375).
48. This type of prejudice primarily (if not exclusively) concerns acts or omissions which represent a deviation from the victim's existing duties (DPP v Murdoch [1993] 1 VR 406).
49. Consequently, there may be no prejudice where the victim was already legally bound to commit the act which the accused intended to induce through the use of the false document (see, e.g. DPP v Murdoch [1993] 1 VR 406).
50. Where it is alleged that there was a pre-existing duty to commit the relevant act, care must be taken to examine the precise scope of the legal obligation. It is possible that the victim will only be legally bound to commit the relevant act if certain requirements are satisfied.[1023] Attempting to circumvent those requirements through the use of a false document may constitute an intention to cause prejudice (see, e.g. R v Winston [1999] 1 Cr App R 337).

[1022] Contrary to the situation with other forms of prejudice (see below), where the prosecution relies on the definition of prejudice in s 83A(8)(c), the person who is induced to perform an act or omission (the victim) must be the person who performs the duty (R v Winston [1999] 1 Cr App R 337).

[1023] For example, while the accused may be entitled to payment of a certain benefit, he or she may only be entitled to that payment upon provision of the appropriate documentation (see R v Winston [1999] 1 Cr App R 337).

Prejudice "will result"

51. The use of the words "will result" in the definition of prejudice means that it is not sufficient for the accused to intend to induce an act or omission that, if it occurs, may cause prejudice. The accused must intend to induce an act or omission that, if it occurs, must result in prejudice (R v Garcia (1988) 87 Cr App R 175).

52. It is not, however, necessary to show that the false document was successfully used, or that successful use was imminent or even likely. The focus of the offence is on the creation or use of false documents with the prescribed intention, rather than the outcome of giving effect to that intention (Brott v R (1992) 173 CLR 426; R v Ondhia [1998] 2 Cr App R 150; R v O'Hara [2005] VSCA 62).

53. The fact that the document succeeded in causing prejudice may be used as evidence of the accused's intention. Depending on the circumstances, the jury may be able to infer the requisite intention from that fact (Brott v R (1992) 173 CLR 426; R v Ondhia [1998] 2 Cr App R 150; R v O'Hara [2005] VSCA 62).

The victim may not be the person prejudiced

54. Unless the accused intends to cause prejudice in connection with a duty (see above), the person who it is intended will be prejudiced does not need to have been the victim (i.e., the person who it is intended will be induced to accept the document as genuine). This element may be met where it is intended that the victim act (or not act) in a way that prejudices a third party (Crimes Act 1958 s 83A(1)–(4)).

55. However, the accused must intend that prejudice will be caused to another person. This element will not be met where the accused intends to cause prejudice to him or herself (R v Utting [1987] 1 WLR 1375).

56. The prosecution must identify the person who it is intended will be prejudiced. This can be done by either nominating a specific individual, or by specifying a certain class of people who will be prejudiced if they act (or fail to act) due to accepting the document as genuine (see, e.g. R v O'Hara [2005] VSCA 62).[1024]

57. Where a class of people is specified, the prosecution must show that the accused intended that all the people in that class will inevitably suffer prejudice if they act (or fail to act) in reliance on the false document. It is not sufficient that they may suffer such prejudice (R v Garcia (1988) 87 Cr App R 175).

58. The judge must clearly direct the jury about:

    - Which person (or people) the accused intended would be induced to accept the false document as genuine; and
    - Which person (or people) the accused intended would be prejudiced by acceptance of the document (Nikolaidis v R [2008] NSWCCA 323).

Need for a causal connection

59. The accused must have intended that the victim would act (or not act) to a person's prejudice "by reason of" accepting the document as genuine, or as a copy of a genuine document. This requires the accused to have intended that acceptance of the false document would cause that prejudice to result.

Directing the jury about prejudice

60. When directing the jury about this element, a judge should not read out the whole of s 83A(8) and leave it to the jury to identify which forms of prejudice are relevant in the case. He or she should:

[1024] For example, where the accused has falsely created documents designed to convince prospective purchasers about the provenance of an item that is for sale, the prosecution may identify the prospective purchasers as the people who it is intended will be prejudiced (see R v O'Hara [2005] VSCA 62).

- Direct the jury only about the particular forms of prejudice that are relevant in the case; and
- Explain how those forms of prejudice may be relevant in the case (R v O'Hara [2005] VSCA 62).

61. As the definition of prejudice in s 83A(8) is exhaustive, the judge must not specify any forms of harm that are outside that definition (R v Garcia (1988) 87 Cr App R 175).

No Need to Prove Dishonesty

62. Unlike offences such as theft and obtaining property by deception, making or using a false document does not require proof of a dishonest intent (R v Gatzka (2004) 9 VR 459).

63. The lack of any need to prove dishonesty means that the accused cannot rely on a defence of claim of right (R v Gatzka (2004) 9 VR 459).

64. However, in exceptional circumstances, the existence of a claim of right may be relevant to proof of the fifth element (compare R v Gatzka (2004) 9 VR 459 and Attorney-General's Reference (No 1 of 2001) [2003] 1 WLR 395. See also DPP v Murdoch [1993] 1 VR 406; R v Winston [1999] 1 Cr App R 337).

Last updated: 3 June 2011

7.5.14.1 Charge: Make False Document

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used when the accused is charged with making a false document under Crimes Act 1958 s 83A(1).

The charge may be adapted if the accused is charged with making a copy of a false document under Crimes Act 1958 s 83A(3).

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of making a false document. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That the accused made a document;

Two – That the document the accused made was false;

Three – That the accused knew that s/he was making a false document;

Four – That the accused intended that somebody would use the document to deceive another person to accept that it was genuine;

Five – That the accused intended that, as a result of accepting the document as genuine, that person would act in a way that prejudices somebody.[1025]

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[1026]

[1025] Where the prosecution alleges that the accused intended that a person would cause prejudice by failing to act, the description (and discussion) of this element should be modified.

[1026] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

The Accused Made a Document

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused made a document.

[If it is alleged that the accused altered an existing document, add the following shaded section.]

This does not require the accused to have created a new document from scratch. The law says that any time a person alters an existing document, he or she "makes" a new document.

In this case it is alleged that the accused made [identify document]. I direct you as a matter of law that [describe document, e.g. "a photograph"] is a document.[1027] This element will therefore be satisfied if you find that [identify document] was made by NOA.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

The Document was False

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the document NOA made was false.

The law says that a document is not "false" merely because it contains untrue or incorrect information. To be "false" for the purposes of this offence, the document must purport to have been:

[Select the relevant form[s] of falsity from the list below. Only include types of falsity that are relevant to the circumstances of the case:

- Made in the form in which it was made by a person who did not in fact make it in that form;
- Made in the form in which it was made on the authority of a person who did not in fact authorise it to be made in that form;
- Made in the terms in which it was made by a person who did not in fact make it in those terms;
- Made in the terms in which it was made on the authority of a person who did not in fact authorise it to be made in those terms;
- Altered in any respect by a person who did not in fact alter it in that respect;
- Altered in any respect on the authority of a person who did not in fact authorise it to be altered in that respect;
- Made or altered on a date on which it was not in fact made or altered;
- Made or altered at a place at which it was not in fact made or altered;
- Made in circumstances in which it was not in fact made or altered;
- Made or altered by a person who did not in fact exist.]

The word "purports" means "pretends". So what the prosecution must prove is that the document pretends to be something that it is not. In this case, the prosecution argued that [describe relevant document] is "false" because it pretends [describe relevant form of falsity in terms of the facts of the case, e.g. "to have been made by John Smith"] when in fact [describe true state of affairs, e.g. "it was made by the accused"].

[If it is alleged that the accused altered a existing document that may already have been false, add the following shaded section.]

[1027] This charge is based on the assumption that it is clear that the relevant item is a "document". It should be adapted if that matter is in dispute. See 7.5.14 Making or Using a False Document for guidance on the meaning of the term "document".

It does not matter if the document already purported to be something that it was not before the accused altered it. If s/he altered it to make it false in some other respect, s/he will have made a "false document".

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

The Accused Knew the Document was False

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that, when the accused made the [identify document], s/he knew that s/he was making a false document.

For this element to be met, it is not enough for the prosecution to prove that NOA should have known that s/he was making a false document. They must prove that NOA was aware that the document s/he was making was false.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Intention that the Document be Accepted as Genuine

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that, when the accused made the false document, s/he intended to use it to deceive someone to accept that it was genuine, or intended that someone else would do so.

[If the accused intended to induce a machine to accept it as genuine, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that this includes intending to cause a machine to accept the document as genuine.

[If it is not alleged that accused intended to induce a particular person, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended that any particular person would be deceived into accepting the document was genuine. The intention may be directed generally, at prospective victims of his or her plan.

In this case it is alleged that when NOA made the [identify document], s/he intended that he/she/NO3P would use it to deceive [identify intended victim or class of victims] to accept that it was genuine.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Intention that the Victim Act to Somebody's Prejudice

The fifth element also focuses on the accused's intention. The prosecution must prove that s/he intended that [describe intended victim or class of victim of the deception] would, as a result of accepting the document as genuine, act to somebody's prejudice.[1028]

The term "prejudice" has a technical legal meaning. An act will prejudice someone if it will:

[Select and explain the relevant form[s] of prejudice from the list below. Only include types of prejudice that are relevant to the circumstances of the case:

- Result in their temporary or permanent loss of property;
- Result in them being deprived of an opportunity to [earn remuneration/earn greater remuneration/obtain a financial advantage];

[1028] Where the accused intends that the victim of the deception would act to his or her own prejudice, the judge may tell the jury that "the accused intended that, due to accepting the document as genuine, a person would act to his/her prejudice."

- Result in any other person being given an opportunity to [earn remuneration/earn greater remuneration/obtain a financial advantage] from them;
- Be the result of them having accepted a false document as genuine in connection with his or her performance of a duty.]

The person the accused intended would be prejudiced may be the same person s/he intended would be deceived into accepting the document was genuine, or may be someone else.

[If the accused intended to cause a machine to respond to a document, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that this element will be satisfied if the accused intended to cause a machine to respond in a manner which, if a person did so, would be to that person's prejudice.

[If it is not alleged that accused intended that a particular person would be prejudiced, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended that any particular person would be prejudiced. The intention may be directed generally, at prospective victims of his or her plan.

For this element to be satisfied, it is not sufficient for the accused to have intended that someone would act in a way that may cause prejudice. The accused must intend that someone would act in a way that must result in prejudice.

However, that does not mean that you must find that someone actually was prejudiced as a result of accepting the document as genuine. The focus here is on the accused's intention at the time s/he made the document. If s/he intended that, due to accepting the document as genuine, a person would act in a way that would prejudice somebody, this element will be met regardless of whether that in fact happened.

In this case, it is alleged that NOA intended that, as a result of accepting that [identify document] was genuine, [identify intended victim] would act in a way that would prejudice [him/herself/NO3P], because it would result in [explain nature of prejudice].

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of making a false document the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA made a document;

Two – That the document NOA made was false;

Three – That NOA knew that s/he was making a false document;

Four – That NOA intended that [s/he/identify relevant person] would use the document to deceive [identify intended victim] to accept that the document was genuine; and

Five – That NOA intended that, as a result of accepting the document as genuine, [identify intended victim] would act in a way that would prejudice [identify intended target].

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of making a false document.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

7.5.14.2 Checklist: Make False Original Document

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused made a document; and

2. The document the accused made was false; and
3. The accused knew that s/he was making a false document; and
4. The accused intended someone would use the document to deceive another person into accepting the document as genuine; and
5. The accused intended that as a result of accepting the document as genuine, that person would act in a way that prejudices somebody.

Making a document

1. Did the accused make a document?

If Yes, go to question 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of making a false document

False document

2. Was the document a false document?

Consider – A false document is one that purports to have been [insert relevant form of falsity].

If Yes, go to question 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of making a false document

Knew the document was false

3. Did the accused know that s/he was making a false document?

If Yes, go to question 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of making a false document

Intention that document be accepted as genuine

4. Did the accused intend that someone would use the document to deceive another to accept it as genuine?

Consider – The accused may intend to use the document himself/herself.

If Yes, go to question 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of making a false document

Intention to cause prejudice

5. Did the accused intend that a person would, due to accepting the document as genuine, act to somebody's prejudice?

Consider – A person acts to somebody's prejudice if [insert relevant form of prejudice].

Consider – The person the accused intended to be prejudiced may be the person deceived by the document or may be somebody else.

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of making a false document (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 to 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of making a false document

Last updated: 3 June 2011

7.5.14.3 Checklist: Make False Copy Document

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused made a copy of a document; and
2. The document the accused made a copy of was false; and
3. The accused knew that s/he was making a copy of a false document; and
4. The accused intended someone would use the copy document to deceive another person into accepting it as a copy of a genuine document; and
5. The accused intended that as a result of accepting the document as a copy of a genuine document, that person would act in a way that prejudices somebody.

Making a document

1. Did the accused make a copy of a document?

If yes, go to question 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of making a false document

False document

2. Was the original document a false document?

Consider – A false document is one that purports to have been [insert relevant form of falsity].

If yes, go to question 3

If no, then the accused is not guilty of making a false document

Knew the document was false

3. Did the accused know that s/he was making a copy of a false document?

If yes, go to question 4

If no, then the accused is not guilty of making a false document

Intention that document be accepted as genuine

4. Did the accused intend that someone would use the copy document to deceive another to accept it as a copy of a genuine document?

If yes, go to question 4

If no, then the accused is not guilty of making a false document

Intention to cause prejudice

5. Did the accused intend that a person would, due to accepting the document as a copy of a genuine document, act to somebody's prejudice?

Consider – A person acts to another's prejudice if [insert relevant form of prejudice].

Consider – The person the accused intended to be prejudiced may be the person deceived by the document or may be somebody else.

If yes, then the accused is guilty of making a false document (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 to 4)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of making a false document

Last updated: 3 June 2011

7.5.14.4 Charge: Use False Document

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used when the accused is charged with using a false document under Crimes Act 1958 s 83A(2).

The charge may be adapted if the accused is charged with using a copy of a false document under Crimes Act 1958 s 83A(4).

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of using a false document. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That the accused used a document;

Two – That the document the accused used was false;

Three – That the accused knew that s/he was using a false document;

Four – That the accused used the document with the intention of deceiving a person to accept that it was genuine;

Five – That the accused intended that, as a result of accepting the document as genuine, that person would act in a way that prejudices somebody.[1029]

[1029] Where the prosecution alleges that the accused intended to cause prejudice by failing to act, the description (and discussion) of this element should be modified.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[1030]

The Accused Used a Document

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused used a document.

In this case it is alleged that the accused used [identify document] by [identify alleged use]. I direct you as a matter of law that [describe document, e.g. "a photograph"] is a document.[1031] This element will therefore be satisfied if you find that [summarise necessary findings].

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

The Document was False

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the document NOA used was false.

The law says that a document is not "false" merely because it contains untrue or incorrect information. To be "false" for the purposes of this offence, the document must purport to have been:

[Select the relevant form[s] of falsity from the list below. Only include types of falsity that are relevant to the circumstances of the case:

- Made in the form in which it was made by a person who did not in fact make it in that form;
- Made in the form in which it was made on the authority of a person who did not in fact authorise it to be made in that form;
- Made in the terms in which it was made by a person who did not in fact make it in those terms;
- Made in the terms in which it was made on the authority of a person who did not in fact authorise it to be made in those terms;
- Altered in any respect by a person who did not in fact alter it in that respect;
- Altered in any respect on the authority of a person who did not in fact authorise it to be altered in that respect;
- Made or altered on a date on which it was not in fact made or altered;
- Made or altered at a place at which it was not in fact made or altered;
- Made in circumstances in which it was not in fact made or altered;
- Made or altered by a person who did not in fact exist.]

The word "purports" means "pretends". So what the prosecution must prove is that the document pretends to be something that it is not. In this case, the prosecution argued that [describe relevant document] is "false" because it pretends [describe relevant form of falsity in terms of the facts of the case, e.g. "to have been made by John Smith"] when in fact [describe true state of affairs, e.g. "it was made by the accused"].

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

[1030] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[1031] This charge is based on the assumption that it is clear that the relevant item is a "document". It should be adapted if that matter is in dispute. See 7.5.14 Making or Using a False Document for guidance on the meaning of the term "document".

The Accused Knew the Document was False

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that, when the accused used the [identify document], s/he knew that s/he was using a false document.

For this element to be met, it is not enough for the prosecution to prove that NOA should have known that s/he was using a false document. They must prove that NOA was aware that the document s/he was using was false.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Intention that the Document be Accepted as Genuine

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove the accused used the document intending to deceive someone to accept that it was genuine.

[If the accused intended to induce a machine to accept it as genuine, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that this includes intending to cause a machine to accept the document as genuine.

[If it is not alleged that accused intended to induce a particular person, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended that any particular person would be persuaded to accept the document as genuine. The intention may be directed generally, at prospective victims of his or her plan.

In this case it is alleged that NOA used the [identify document] with the intention of persuading [identify intended victim or class of victims] that it was genuine.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Intention that the Victim Act to Somebody's Prejudice

The fifth element also focuses on the accused's intention. The prosecution must prove that s/he intended that [describe intended victim or class of victim of the deception] would, as a result of accepting the document as genuine, act to somebody's prejudice.[1032]

The term "prejudice" has a technical legal meaning. An act will prejudice someone if it will:

[Select and explain the relevant form[s] of prejudice from the list below. Only include types of prejudice that are relevant to the circumstances of the case:

- Result in their temporary or permanent loss of property;
- Result in them being deprived of an opportunity to [earn remuneration/earn greater remuneration/obtain a financial advantage];
- Result in any other person being given an opportunity to [earn remuneration/earn greater remuneration/obtain a financial advantage] from them;
- Be the result of them having accepted a false document as genuine in connection with his or her performance of a duty.]

[1032] Where the accused intends that the victim of the deception would act to his or her own prejudice, the judge may tell the jury that "the accused intended that, due to accepting the document as genuine, a person would act to his/her prejudice.

The person the accused intended would be prejudiced may be the same person s/he intended would be deceived to accept the document as genuine, or may be someone else.

[If it is possible that the accused would be prejudiced, add the following shaded section.]

However, it is not sufficient for you to find that the accused intended that s/he would be prejudiced him/herself. S/he must have intended that another person would be prejudiced.

[If the accused intended to cause a machine to respond to a document, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that this element will be satisfied if the accused intended to cause a machine to respond in a manner which, if a person did so, would be to that person's prejudice.

[If it is not alleged that accused intended that a particular person would be prejudiced, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended that any particular person would be prejudiced. The intention may be directed generally, at prospective victims of his or her plan.

For this element to be satisfied, it is not sufficient for the accused to have intended that someone would act in a way that may cause prejudice. The accused must intend that someone would act in a way that must result in prejudice.

However, that does not mean that you must find that someone actually was prejudiced as a result of accepting the document as genuine. The focus here is on the accused's intention at the time s/he used the document. If s/he intended that, due to accepting the document as genuine, a person would act in a way that would prejudice somebody, this element will be met regardless of whether that in fact happened.

In this case, it is alleged that NOA intended that, as a result of accepting that [identify document] was genuine, [identify intended victim] would act in a way that would prejudice [him/herself/NO3P], because it would result in [explain nature of prejudice].

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of using a false document the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA used a document;

Two – That the document NOA used was false;

Three – That NOA knew that s/he was using a false document;

Four – That NOA intended to use the document to deceive [identify intended victim] to accept that the document was genuine; and

Five – That NOA intended that, as a result of accepting the document as genuine, [identify intended victim] would act in a way that would prejudice [identify intended target].

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of using a false document.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

7.5.14.5 Checklist: Use False Original Document

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused used a document; and

2. The document the accused used was false; and
3. The accused knew that s/he was using a false document; and
4. The accused used the document intending to deceive another person into accepting the document as genuine; and
5. The accused intended that as a result of accepting the document as genuine, that person would act in a way that prejudices somebody.

Using a document

1. Did the accused use a document?

If yes, go to question 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of using a false document

False document

2. Was the document a false document?

Consider – A false document is one that purports to have been [insert relevant form of falsity].

If yes, go to question 3

If no, then the accused is not guilty of using a false document

Knew the document was false

3. Did the accused know that s/he was using a false document?

If yes, go to question 4

If no, then the accused is not guilty of using a false document

Intention that document be accepted as genuine

4. Did the accused use the document intending to deceive another to accept the document as genuine?

If yes, go to question 4

If no, then the accused is not guilty of using a false document

Intention to cause prejudice

5. Did the accused intend that a person would, due to accepting the document as genuine, act to somebody's prejudice?

Consider – A person acts to another's prejudice if [insert relevant form of prejudice].

Consider – The person the accused intended to be prejudiced may be the person deceived by the document or may be somebody else.

If yes, then the accused is guilty of using a false document (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 to 4)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of using a false document

Last updated: 3 June 2011

7.5.14.6 Checklist: Use False Copy Document

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused used a copy of a document; and
2. The document the accused used a copy of was false; and
3. The accused knew that s/he was using a copy of a false document; and
4. The accused used the copy document intending to deceive another person into accepting the document as a copy of a genuine document; and
5. The accused intended that as a result of accepting the document as a copy of a genuine document, that person would act in a way that prejudices somebody.

Using a document

1. Did the accused use a copy of a document?

If yes, go to question 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of using a false document

False document

2. Was the original document a false document?

Consider – A document is false if it purports to have been [insert relevant form of falsity].

If yes, go to question 3

If no, then the accused is not guilty of using a false document

Knew the document was false

3. Did the accused know that s/he was using a copy of a false document?

If yes, go to question 4

If no, then the accused is not guilty of using a false document

Intention that document be accepted as genuine

4. Did the accused use the copy document intending to deceive another to accept it as a copy of a genuine document?

If yes, go to question 4

If no, then the accused is not guilty of using a false document

Intention to cause prejudice

5. Did the accused intend that a person would, due to accepting the document as a copy of a genuine document, act to somebody's prejudice?

Consider – A person acts to another's prejudice if [insert relevant form of prejudice]

Consider – The person the accused intended to be prejudiced may be the person deceived by the document or may be somebody else.

If yes, then the accused is guilty of using a false document (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 to 4)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of using a false document

Last updated: 3 June 2011

7.5.15 Blackmail

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Blackmail is an offence under the Crimes Act 1958 s 87.
2. The offence has the following five elements:
   i) The accused made a demand;
   ii) The demand was made with a view to gain for the accused or another, or with intent to cause loss to another;
   iii) The demand was made with menaces;
   iv) The demand was unwarranted;
   v) The accused intended to make an unwarranted demand with menaces.

Making a Demand

3. The first element the prosecution must prove is that the accused made a demand of the victim (Crimes Act 1958 s 87(1)).
4. The nature of the demand is immaterial (Crimes Act 1958 87(2)).[1033]
5. The demand may be implicit or explicit (R v Clear [1968] 1 QB 670; R v Collister (1955) 39 Cr App R 100; R v Lambert [2010] 1 Cr App R 21; R v Akhmatov [2004] EWCA Crim 1004; R v Studer (1915) 11 Cr App R 307; R v Jessen [1997] 2 Qd R 213).

[1033] Although there is no requirement that the demand be for money or property, the second element requires the demand to have been made with a view to gain money or property, or with an intention to cause its loss: see below.

6. It is for the jury to determine whether, in all the circumstances of the case, there was a demand. The test is whether a reasonable person in the victim's circumstances would have understood that a demand was being made (R v Collister (1955) 39 Cr App R 100).

7. In determining this issue, the jury should consider matters such as the accused's demeanour and the circumstances that existed at the time of the alleged demand (R v Collister (1955) 39 Cr App R 100).

8. A statement phrased as a request may, in some cases, constitute a demand, such as where it is backed up by a threat (R v Clear [1968] 1 QB 670; R v Collister (1955) 39 Cr App R 100; R v Lambert [2010] 1 Cr App R 21; R v Akhmatov [2004] EWCA Crim 1004; R v Studer (1915) 11 Cr App R 307; R v Jessen [1997] 2 Qd R 213).

9. The offence does not require proof that the demand was successfully communicated. It is sufficient if the demand was made in circumstances in which it was likely that the demand would reach the intended recipient (Austin v The Queen (1989) 166 CLR 669; Treacy v DPP [1971] AC 537; Bank of Valletta PLC v NCA [1999] FCA 791).[1034]

10. Principles of agency should not be used when analysing or explaining the process of making a demand (Latorre v R [2012] VSCA 280). If the prosecution argues that the accused committed the offence in conjunction with another person, the judge should explain the principles of complicity or the doctrine of innocent agency.

11. Where a person is able to recall or rescind a demand before it is received by the recipient, it may not be appropriate to find that the demand has been made. This may occur, for example, when the person uses a courier to deliver a letter and retains control over whether the courier completes the process (see Austin v The Queen (1989) 166 CLR 669; Treacy v DPP [1971] AC 537).

Demand made with a View to Gain or Intent to Cause Loss

12. The second element the prosecution must prove is that the demand was made with:
    - A view to gain for the accused or another; or
    - An intention to cause loss to another (Crimes Act 1958 s 87(1)).

13. "Gain" and "loss" are to be construed as extending only to gains or losses in money or other property (Crimes Act 1958 s 71).

14. Consequently, while the demand itself does not need to be for money or property (see above), the accused must make that demand with a view to gain money or property for him/herself or another, or with an intention of causing another person to lose money or property.

15. Demands for custody of a child, sexual intercourse or the withholding of evidence therefore do not satisfy the second element (E Griew, The Theft Acts, 7th ed, London, Sweet & Maxwell, 1995. See Crimes Act 1958 s 71(1)).

16. Unlike theft, blackmail does not require proof of an intention to permanently deprive. The definition of "gain" and "loss" in the Crimes Act 1958 includes temporary gains and losses (s 71).

17. "Gain" includes keeping what one has, as well as obtaining something one does not (Crimes Act 1958 s 71).

[1034] It is unlikely that a person can be charged with attempted blackmail, as the demand is either made or it is not made (see Austin v The Queen (1989) 166 CLR 669; R v Moran (1952) 36 Cr App R 10). However, some authors have suggested that an attempted demand may arise where the accused is interrupted while making the demand, such as by being stopped while attempting to post a letter.

18. This element will therefore be met even if the accused demands payment of a debt owed to him or her, as the realisation of a debt involves obtaining something one does not have (i.e., "hard cash" rather than a mere right of action) (R v Parkes [1973] Crim LR 358. See also R v Lawrence (1973) 57 Cr App R 64; Attorney-Generals Reference (No 1 of 2001) [2002] 3 All ER 840).

19. "Loss" includes not getting what one might, as well as parting with what one has (Crimes Act 1958 s 71).

The Demand was made with Menaces

20. The third element the prosecution must prove is that the demand was made with menaces (Crimes Act 1958 s 87(1)).

21. The words "menaces" and "threats" have substantially the same meaning (R v Clear [1968] 1 QB 670).[1035]

22. It is for the jury to determine whether the demand was made with menaces (R v Clear [1968] 1 QB 670; R v Tomlinson [1895] 1 QB 706; DPP v Kuo (1999) 49 NSWLR 226).

23. The menaces must have been of such a nature and extent that they might have influenced the mind of an ordinary person of normal stability and courage (R v Clear [1968] 1 QB 670).

24. The question of whether the demand was made with menaces is an objective one. While the response of the victim is relevant, it is not determinative (R v Rasmussen (1928) 28 SR (NSW) 349; Benasic and Malavetas v R (1987) 77 ALR 340; R v Harry [1974] Crim LR 32).

25. The word "menaces" should be interpreted liberally and is not limited to threats of violence. It includes threats of any unpleasant or detrimental action (Thorne v Motor Trade Association [1937] AC 797; R v Tomlinson [1895] 1 QB 706; Director of Public Prosecutions v Kuo (1999) 49 NSWLR 226; R v Boyle [1914] 3 KB 339; R v Collister (1955) 39 Cr App R 100).

26. The following have been held to be "menaces":

    i) Threats to steal property (Director of Public Prosecutions v Kuo (1999) 49 NSWLR 226);

    ii) Threats to damage a corporation's share price by revealing damaging information (R v Boyle [1914] 3 KB 339);

    iii) Threats to injure a third person (R v Collister (1955) 39 Cr App R 100);

    iv) Threats to accuse a person of a crime or non-criminal misconduct, or to withhold evidence in a legal proceeding (R v Tomlinson [1895] 1 QB 706; R v Clear [1968] 1 QB 670; R v Jessen [1997] 2 Qd R 213).

27. A demand may be made with menaces even though there were circumstances unknown to the accused that rendered the threat ineffective (R v Clear [1968] 1 QB 670).

28. A threat may be a "menace" even if the action threatened is legal (e.g. a threat to reveal criminal conduct to the police) (Thorne v Motor Trade Association [1937] AC 797; R v Alexander (2005) 206 CCC (3d) 233);

[1035] While the Criminal Law Revision Committee agree that "menaces" and "threats" have very similar meanings, they suggest that the word "menaces" is stronger than "threats", and so slightly restricts the scope of the offence: Eighth Report: Theft and Related Offences (Cmnd 2977), p60.

29. A false statement that a third party will harm the accused if the victim fails to comply with the demand may be a "menace". It does not matter that it is the accused him or herself that is being (falsely) "threatened" (R v Lambert [2010] 1 Cr App R 21).

30. Behaviour or words which would not intimidate any person into complying with the demand are not "menaces" (Benasic & Malavetas v R (1987) 77 ALR 340; R v Clear [1968] 1 QB 670; R v Boyle [1914] 3 KB 339; R v Harry [1974] Crim LR 32).

31. Judicial guidance may be required if the victim was not intimidated by the threat, but an ordinary person might have been. In such circumstances, the judge should explain that this element will be met if the threat may have caused a person of ordinary firmness of mind to comply with the demand (see R v Garwood [1987] 1 WLR 319; R v Clear [1968] 1 QB 670; R v Lawrence (1973) 57 Cr App R 64; R v Tomlinson [1895] 1 QB 706; Benasic and Malavetas v R (1987) 77 ALR 340; R v Rasmussen (1928) 28 SR (NSW) 349; R v Clear [1968] 1 QB 670; R v Walton (1863) 9 Cox CC 268).

32. Guidance may also be required where the victim is especially timid and was overawed by the threat, even though an ordinary person would not have been. In such cases the judge should explain that the element will be met if the accused was aware that his or her actions were likely to affect the victim in that way (see R v Garwood [1987] 1 WLR 319; R v Lawrence (1973) 57 Cr App R 64; R v Tomlinson [1895] 1 QB 706; Benasic and Malavetas v R (1987) 77 ALR 340; R v Rasmussen (1928) 28 SR (NSW) 349; R v Clear [1968] 1 QB 670; R v Walton (1863) 9 Cox CC 268).

The Demand was Unwarranted

33. The fourth element the prosecution must prove is that the demand was unwarranted (Crimes Act 1958 s 87(1)).

34. A demand is unwarranted unless, at the relevant time, the accused believed that:

    i) He or she had reasonable grounds for making the demand; and

    ii) The use of menaces was a proper means of reinforcing the demand (Crimes Act 1958 s 87(1)(a) and (b)).

35. The accused carries an evidentiary onus to establish that a demand was not unwarranted.

36. Whether a demand is unwarranted depends purely on the subjective state of mind of the accused at the time the demand was made. It is not sufficient for the prosecution to prove that the accused lacked objectively reasonable grounds for making the demand, or that the use of menaces was objectively improper (R v Lambert [1972] Crim LR 422; R v Harvey (1981) 72 Cr App R 139; Murdoch v R [2012] VSCA 7)).

37. However, the belief of a reasonable person may be relevant if it sheds light on what the accused actually believed (R v Lambert [1972] Crim LR 422; R v Harvey (1981) 72 Cr App R 139; Murdoch v R [2012] VSCA 7).

38. The word "proper" has a wide meaning. It means morally or socially acceptable (Criminal Law Revision Committee, Eighth Report: Theft and Related Offences (Cmnd 2977). See also R v Harvey (1981) 72 Cr App R 139).

39. If the accused knew or suspected that the threat (or the act threatened) was unlawful, he or she cannot have believed that his or her actions were "proper". This will be the case even if the accused believed his or her actions to be justified in the circumstances (R v Harvey (1981) 72 Cr App R 139).

40. However, even if the threatened action is clearly unlawful, the prosecution must prove that the accused did not believe that action was a lawful means of reinforcing the demand (R v Harvey (1981) 72 Cr App R 139).

41. Consequently, the judge must not tell the jury that this element is proven if they find that the accused threatened an unlawful act. The jury must focus on the accused's mental state, not the nature of the act threatened (R v Harvey (1981) 72 Cr App R 139).

42. The judge may, however, comment on the unlikelihood of the accused believing that a serious offence (e.g. murder or rape) is lawful (R v Harvey (1981) 72 Cr App R 139).

43. It is not necessary to give a detailed direction about this element where the only issue in the case is whether the demand was made (and the accused accepts that if the demand was made, it was unwarranted) (R v Lawrence (1973) 57 Cr App R 64; R v Harvey (1981) 72 Cr App R 139).

Intention

44. The fifth element the prosecution must prove is that the accused intended to make an unwarranted demand with menaces. This requires proof that the accused intended to make an express or implied threat, and that the recipient would act unwillingly in response to the threat (Petch v The Queen [2020] NSWCCA 133, [46]–[52]. See also R v Dixon-Jenkins (1985) 14 A Crim R 372).

Last updated: 21 July 2021

7.5.15.1 Charge: Blackmail

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of blackmail. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – The accused made a demand.

Two – The demand was made with an intention to [gain money or property/cause someone to lose money or property].

Three – The accused reinforced the demand with menaces.

Four – The demand was unwarranted.

Five – The accused intended to make an unwarranted demand with menaces.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[1036]

The Accused Made a Demand

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused made a demand.

The demand does not need to have been clearly spelt out or made explicit. A person can make a demand indirectly or implicitly. This element will be met if a reasonable person would have understood that a demand was being made in the circumstances.

[Insert relevant evidence and arguments.]

View to Gain or Intent to Cause Loss

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused made the demand with the intention of [insert relevant intention, e.g. "gaining money for him/herself" or "causing NOV to lose property"].

[1036] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[Describe relevant evidence and arguments.]

The Demand was Accompanied by Menaces

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused reinforced the demand with menaces.

This means that the accused must have made some threat to NOC. In this case, the prosecution say that NOA threatened to [describe alleged threat] unless [describe alleged demand].

[If relevant, add the following shaded section.]

To prove this element, the threat does not need to have been a threat of violent or criminal behaviour. This element will be met if the accused threatened any kind of negative or unpleasant action.

As was the case in relation to "demands", the threat does not need to have been clearly spelt out or made explicit. A person can make a threat indirectly or implicitly. It is for you to determine whether a threat was made, bearing in mind all of the evidence in the case.

[If there is evidence that NOV was not affected by the threat*, add the following shaded section.*]

You are not required to find that NOV actually felt threatened by NOA's [words/conduct]. A threat that does not achieve its purpose is still a threat.

However, you must be satisfied that NOA's [words/conduct] could have caused an ordinary person of normal stability and courage to comply with the demand against his/her will. If those [words/acts] would not have intimidated anybody into complying with the demand, they will not have been a "threat".

[If NOV was affected by the threat due to being especially timid, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution argued that NOA threatened NOV by [describe threat]. The defence denied this, arguing that NOA's alleged [words/behaviour] did not constitute a "threat". In particular, they argued that an ordinary person would not have felt threatened by [those words/that behaviour], and the only reason NOV felt that way was because s/he is an especially timid or vulnerable person.

Ordinarily, [words/acts] that would not intimidate an ordinary person of normal stability and courage into complying with a demand will not be considered a "threat". However, there is a limited exception to this rule. If a person knows or suspects that the victim is likely to be threatened by his/her [words/conduct], because s/he knows that the victim is an especially timid or vulnerable person, then his/her actions will constitute a "threat". In such circumstances, it does not matter that an ordinary person would not have been intimidated by his/her [words/conduct].

[Insert relevant evidence and arguments.]

The Demand was Unwarranted

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the demand was unwarranted.

To prove that the demand was unwarranted, the prosecution must prove that when s/he made the demand, NOA either:

- Did not believe that s/he had reasonable grounds for making the demand; or
- Did not believe that his/her use of threats was a proper way of reinforcing that demand.

The focus of this element is on the accused's beliefs at the time s/he made the demand. It is not enough to find that a reasonable person would not have believed that s/he had reasonable grounds for making the demand, or that a reasonable person would not have believed that the use of threats was proper. You must find that the accused did not have one or other of those beliefs.

This element will be satisfied if the prosecution proves that the accused did not believe that the use of threats was morally or socially acceptable. This is because it is not "proper" to reinforce a demand in a morally or socially unacceptable way.

[Where the threatened action is unlawful, add the following shaded section.]

Similarly, this element will also be met if the accused knew or suspected that the threatened action was unlawful. The law says that a person cannot believe that it is "proper" to behave in what s/he knows to be an unlawful manner, even if s/he believes his/her actions are somehow justified.

[Insert relevant evidence and arguments.]

The Accused Intended to make an unwarranted demand with menaces

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intended to make an unwarranted demand with menaces.

There are two parts to this element.

First, the prosecution must prove that the accused intended to threaten NOC.

Second, the prosecution must prove the accused intended that NOC would fear that the threat would be carried out if s/he didn't comply with the demand.

It does not matter whether or not NOC actually felt any alarm or fear. This element only requires proof that the accused intended that NOC would fear that the threat would be carried out.

[Insert relevant evidence and arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of blackmail, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA made a demand; and

Two – that NOA made the demand with an intention to [gain money or property/cause someone to lose money or property]; and

Three – that NOA reinforced the demand with menaces; and Four – that NOA's demand was unwarranted; and Five – that NOA intended to make an unwarranted demand with menaces.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of blackmail.

Last updated: 21 July 2021

7.5.15.2 Checklist: Blackmail

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused made a demand; and

2. The demand was made with an intention to [gain money or property/cause someone to lose money or property]; and

3. The accused reinforced the demand with menaces; and

4. The accused intended the complainant to fear that the threat would be carried out if s/he didn't comply with the demand; and

5. The demand was unwarranted.

Demand

1. Did the accused make a demand?

If yes, go to 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of Blackmail

Intention to gain or cause loss

2. When s/he made the demand, did the accused intend to [gain money or property/cause someone to lose money or property]?

If yes, go to 3

If no, then the accused is not guilty of Blackmail

Menaces

3. Did the accused reinforce the demand with menaces?

Consider – Did the accused threaten to do something if the demand was not met?

If yes, go to 4

If no, then the accused is not guilty of Blackmail

Intention that complainant fear that threat be carried out

4. Did the accused intend that the complainant would fear that the threat would be carried out if the demand was not met?

If yes, go to 5

If no, then the accused is not guilty of Blackmail

Demand was unwarranted

5. Was the demand unwarranted?

5.1. Did the accused believe that s/he had reasonable grounds for making the demand?

If yes, go to 5.2

If no, then the accused is guilty of Blackmail (as long as you answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

5.2. Did the accused believe that the use of threats was a proper means of reinforcing the demand?

If yes, then the accused is not guilty of Blackmail

If no, then the accused is guilty of Blackmail (as long as you answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

Last updated: 4 December 2012

7.5.16 Criminal Damage

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Criminal damage is an offence under Crimes Act 1958 s 197(1).
2. A number of related but discrete offences have also been created by s 197 and the surrounding provisions. These are addressed separately in the following topics:
    - 7.5.17 Criminal Damage Intending to Endanger Life (s 197(2));
    - 7.5.18 Criminal Damage with a View to Gain (s 197(3));
    - 7.5.19 Arson (s 197(6));
    - 7.5.20 Arson Causing Death (s 197A);
    - 7.5.21 Intentionally or Recklessly Causing a Bushfire (s 201A).

Elements

3. The offence of criminal damage has the following four elements:

    i) The accused destroyed or damaged property;

    ii) The property belonged to another;

    iii) The accused intended to destroy or damage property;

    iv) The accused did not have a lawful excuse for his or her actions.

Destroying or Damaging Property

4. The first element the prosecution must prove is that the accused destroyed or damaged property (Crimes Act 1958 s 197(1)).

What is "property"?

5. For the purposes of this offence, property is defined as real or personal property of a tangible nature (Crimes Act 1958 s 196(1)).
6. This is specifically stated to include the following objects:
    - Money;
    - Wild creatures which have been tamed or are ordinarily domesticated;
    - Other wild creatures or their carcasses that:
    - Have been reduced into possession that has not been lost or abandoned; or

- Are in the course of being reduced into possession (Crimes Act 1958 s 196(1)).[1037]

7. This definition of property differs from the definition of property that is used in relation to the offence of theft. In particular:
    - It excludes intangible property (cf s 71(1)); and
    - It does not restrict the circumstances in which real property may be the subject of the offence (cf s 73(6)).

What does it mean to "destroy or damage" property?

8. The words "destroy" and "damage" are not defined in the Crimes Act.
9. Destroying property involves rendering it useless for the purpose for which it exists (A Smith, Property Offences (1994), 835).
10. Damage involves a permanent or temporary alteration to the physical integrity of the property (Grajewski v DPP [2019] HCA 8, [13]).
11. A temporary interference or obstruction in the operation of property, which does not interfere with its physical integrity, does not constitute damage (Grajewski v DPP [2019] HCA 8, [13], [21]).
12. Historically, some cases have held that damage occurs where there is a permanent or temporary reduction in the functionality, utility or value of the object (cases). In Grajewski v DPP, the High Court held that this did not give rise to an alternative meaning of damage. Instead, it held that those earlier cases all involved inference with the functionality, utility or value of the object by physical alteration to the integrity of the property, even if that alteration was temporary (Grajewski v DPP [2019] HCA 8, [29]).
13. The High Court has rejected a test of "temporary functional derangement" as a criterion for determining criminal damage of property (Grajewski v DPP [2019] HCA 8, [46]; c.f. Samuel v Stubbs (1972) 4 SASR 200; R v Heyne (unreported, Court of Criminal Appeal of New South Wales, 18 September 1998)).
14. While rendering property inoperative may be a consequence of damage, it does not itself constitute damage to property. For property to be "damaged", there must have been some kind of interference with the integrity of the property. Cases have therefore drawn a distinction between letting the air out of a tire and attaching a wheel clamp. In the former case, the physical integrity of the tyre is altered, whereas in the latter case, there is no damage unless the clamp physically alters the tyre, even if the vehicle remains inoperable while the clamp is in place (Grajewski v DPP [2019] HCA 8, [49], [53]. See also Drake v DPP [1994] Crim LR 855; Lloyd v DPP [1992] 1 All ER 982; R v Mitchell [2004] RTR 14).
15. Mere interference with the safe operation of property, without any alteration to the physical integrity of the property, is not damage. Therefore, acts such as tying a person to a bulldozer, or climbing onto a crane, are not acts of criminal damage. In each case, the bulldozer or crane remains functional, but is not operated because of the operator's desire not to injure the protester (Grajewski v DPP [2019] HCA 8, [49]).
16. Property may be "damaged" by virtue of being defaced, even if the operation of the item in question is not affected. Whether a defaced item has been "damaged" is a question of fact for the jury (R v Zische [1983] 1 Qd R 240; Roe v Kingerlee [1986] Crim LR 735; Hardman v Chief Constable of Avon & Somerset [1986] Crim LR 330).

[1037] For information on when a wild animal is in the course of being reduced into possession, see Cresswell & Anor v DPP [2006] EWHC 3379 (Admin).

17. Removing part of an object, such as by dismantling or sabotaging a machine, may also constitute "damage", even if there is no damage to the individual components. However, much will depend on whether the accused has been charged with damaging the machine itself, or the components (R v Nesbitt [2004] QCA 333; R v Zische [1983] 1 Qd R 240; R v Fisher (1865) LR 1 CCR 7; but compare R v Nyawo (1966) 2 SA 61).

18. While the property that is damaged must be tangible (see "What is property?" above), the damage does not need to be tangible. Erasure of electronic data may therefore constitute criminal damage (see Cox v Riley (1986) 83 Cr App R 54; R v Whitely (1991) 93 Cr App R 25).[1038] Such activity is also now covered by the specific offences in Subdivision 6 of Part I of the Crimes Act 1958.[1039]

19. It is possible to damage real property. For example:

    - A fixture or the land itself may be physically harmed, either temporarily or permanently; or
    - The land may be physically altered, such as by covering previously clear land with waste materials (McIntosh v Shelley (1908) 25 WN (NSW) 188*; R v Maund* (1866) 3 WW & A'B (L) 96; R v Henderson & Battley, Court of Appeal Criminal Division, 29/11/1984; Grajewski v DPP [2019] HCA 8, [33]–[35]).

20. When proving that an item was damaged, it is not necessary to show that there were costs associated with repairing the item. Costs of repairs are merely evidence that may show that the item was damaged (R v Previsic [2008] VSCA 112; R v Zischke [1983] 1 Qd R 240).

Destroying or damaging property by omission

21. While this element will usually be proven by establishing a positive act, it is possible for a person to destroy or damage property by omission (R v Miller [1983] 2 AC 161).

22. This may occur where the accused has created a dangerous situation, and has a duty to take action within his or her capabilities to address the dangers he or she has created. The first element of the offence will be met if the prosecution can prove that the accused knowingly failed to act in the way he or she was required to, and as a result property was damaged or destroyed (R v Miller [1983] 2 AC 161).

Indirect damage

23. It is not necessary to show that the accused directly damaged or destroyed the property in question. This element may be met where the accused sets off a chain of events which lead to the property being damaged or destroyed (R v Hayes [2008] QCA 371).

24. In such cases, it may be necessary to examine the issue of causation. In particular, the jury may need to determine whether the accused's acts were a "real and substantial cause" of the damage or destruction. See 7.1.2 Causation for further information.

Belonging to Another Person

25. The second element the prosecution must prove is that the damaged or destroyed property either:

[1038] Electronic data is tangible (and therefore "property") because it is grounded in a physical state, such as a specific pattern of magnetisation in a computer hard drive.

[1039] Subdivision 6 was added by the Crimes (Property Damage and Computer Offences) Act 2003, which implemented the recommendations of Chapter 4 of the Model Criminal Code Report. That report, while recommending the creation of specific offences for interfering with a computer, acknowledged that the offences may overlap with general criminal damage offences.

- Belonged to another person; or
- Belonged to the accused and another person (Crimes Act 1958 s 197(1)).

When does property "belong" to another person?

26. Property "belongs" to a person where that person has:
    - Custody or control of it;
    - A proprietary right or interest in it (other than one arising from an equitable agreement to grant or transfer an interest); or
    - A charge on it (Crimes Act 1958 s 196(2)).
27. This includes the interest of a mortgagee (Holden v R (1998) 103 A Crim R 70).
28. Property which is subject to a trust "belongs" to the trustees and the people who have a right to enforce the trust (Crimes Act 1958 s 196(3)).
29. Property of a corporation "belongs" to the corporation, regardless of any vacancies within that corporation (Crimes Act 1958 s 196(4)).
30. As abandoned property does not "belong" to anyone, this element is not met where the property in question has been abandoned (R v McClymont; Ex parte Attorney-General [1987] 2 Qd R 442; R v Webb; Ex parte Attorney-General [1990] 2 Qd R 275).

Who must the property belong to?

31. While the property must belong to "another person", that person does not need to be the sole owner. It is possible for the accused to commit an offence by damaging or destroying property that he or she co-owns with someone else (Crimes Act 1958 s 197(1); Howell v Dakin [1965] Tas SR 142).
32. While this element requires the prosecution to prove that some other person owned the property, it is not necessary to prove the identity of that person (Lodge v Lawton [1978] VR 112. See also R v McClymont; Ex parte Attorney-General [1987] 2 Qd R 442).
33. Where the prosecution alleges that a specific person owns the damaged property and the evidence fails to establish that person's rights of ownership, the prosecution may need to seek leave to amend the particulars in the indictment (R v McClymont; Ex parte Attorney-General [1987] 2 Qd R 442).

Intending to Destroy or Damage Property

34. The third element the prosecution must prove is that the accused intended to damage or destroy the property (Crimes Act 1958 s 197(1)).
35. Section 197(4) sets out the requirements for proving this element. A person only intends to destroy or damage property if:
    (a) One of his or her purposes is to destroy or damage property; or
    (b) He or she knows or believes that his or her conduct is more likely than not to result in destruction of or damage to property (see also R v Hayes [2008] QCA 371).
36. The test in s 197(4)(b) differs from the common law recklessness test:
    - The test in s 197(4)(b) requires the jury to find the required consequence to be "more likely than not" (i.e. a greater than 50 percent chance);
    - The recklessness test requires the jury to find the required consequence to be "probable" or "likely". This may be greater or less than a 50 per cent chance (see Darkan & Ors v R (2006) 227 CLR 373; Boughey v R (1986) 161 CLR 10).

37. The prosecution must prove that the accused had the required intention at the time he or she did the relevant act or made the relevant omission (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378. See also R v Miller [1983] 2 AC 161).

38. The offender's age may be relevant when determining whether he or she knew or believed that his or her conduct was more likely than not to result in the property being damaged or destroyed (R v T [1997] 1 Qd R 623).

Without Lawful Excuse

39. The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted without lawful excuse (Crimes Act 1958 s 197(1)).

Statutory Excuses

Belief in authority to destroy or damage

40. A person has a lawful excuse to a charge under s 197(1) if, at the time the relevant act was committed, he or she believed that:

    - The property belonged solely to him or herself (s 201(2)(a)(i));
    - He or she held a right or interest in the property which authorised him or her to engage in the conduct (s 201(2)(a)(ii)); or
    - The people he or she believed were entitled to consent to the destruction or damage had consented, or would have consented if they had known the circumstances of the destruction or damage (s 201(2)(a)(iii)).

41. Each of these excuses depend on the accused having held a particular belief at the relevant time. As long as that belief was honestly held, it does not matter whether it was:

    - Accurate (R v Smith [1974] QB 354; R v Waine [2006] 1 Qd R 458); or
    - Justified (Crimes Act 1958 s 201(3)).

Belief that damage was necessary to protect property

42. A person has a lawful excuse to a charge under s 197(1) if he or she engaged in the conduct in order to protect property belonging to him or herself or another, or a right or interest in property which was or which he believed to be vested in himself or another, and at the time of such conduct he or she believed that:

    - The property, right or interest was in immediate need of protection; and
    - The means adopted or proposed to be adopted to protect the property, right or interest were or would be reasonable in all the circumstances (s 201(2)(b)).

Scope of s 201(2)(b)

43. The wording of s 201(2)(b) draws a distinction between "property" and "rights or interests" in property:

    - In the case of "property", the excuse only applies to property that belongs to the accused or another person. It does not apply to property the accused believes belongs to him or herself or someone else.
    - In the case of "rights or interests" in property, the excuse applies both to rights or interests that actually vest in the accused or another person, or that the accused believes to vest in him or herself or someone else.

44. A "right or interest" in property is stated to include any right or privilege in or over land, whether created by grant, licence or otherwise (Crimes Act 1958 s 201(4)).

45. Consequently, the excuse extends to protecting rights or interests such as easements or rights of way (see Chamberlain v Lindon [1998] EWHC Admin 329).

46. As the property must belong to the accused or another person, the excuse does not apply to actions taken to protect abandoned property (see Cresswell & Anor v DPP [2006] EWHC 3379 (Admin)).

47. As the excuse uses the definition of "property" contained in s 196(1) (see "What is 'property'?" above), it also does not apply to actions taken to protect things that falls outside the scope of that definition (e.g. intangible property and wild animals) (Cresswell & Anor v DPP [2006] EWHC 3379 (Admin)).

Requirements of s 201(2)(b)

48. The accused can only rely on the defence in s 201(2)(b) of the Crimes Act 1958 if he or she:

    i) Acted in order to protect the relevant property, right or interest;

    ii) Believed that the property, right or interest was in immediate need of protection, and

    iii) Believed that the means of protection adopted were reasonable in the circumstances (Crimes Act 1958 s 201(2)(b)).

49. The jury must objectively assess whether the accused acted to protect the relevant property, right or interest. A mere assertion by the accused that his or her actions were done for such a purpose is not conclusive (R v Jones & Ors [2004] EWCA Crim 1981; R v Hunt (1978) 66 Cr App R 105).

50. As long as the accused honestly believed the property was in immediate need of protection, and that the means used to protect the property were reasonable, it is immaterial whether those beliefs were justified (Crimes Act 1958 s 201(3); R v Jones & Ors [2004] EWCA Crim 1981).

51. When assessing the reasonableness of the accused's conduct, the jury must take into account the circumstances which led to the need to protect the relevant property, right or interest. For example, when a person illegally leaves his or her car in a location where it may be immobilised using a wheel clamp, it will generally be unreasonable to protect his or her interest in the car by damaging or destroying the clamp, rather than paying the cost to have the clamp removed (Drake v DPP [1994] Crim LR 855; Lloyd v DPP [1992] 1 All ER 982; R v Mitchell [2004] RTR 14).

52. Interference with a right or interest may give rise to an ongoing and immediate need to protect the right or interest. The fact that the accused had taken other steps to try to protect the right or interest prior to damaging the property (e.g. he or she had entered into negotiations with the owner of the property) does not necessarily mean that the right or interest was not in immediate need of protection (Chamberlain v Lindon [1998] EWHC Admin 329).

53. Section 201(2)(b) does not allow a person to stop an owner of property from damaging or destroying that property, unless the damage or destruction is itself illegal, or someone else has an interest in the property in question (Cresswell & Anor v DPP [2006] EWHC 3379 (Admin)).

Common law defences and excuses

54. The lawful excuses spelt out in s 201 operate in addition to any other defences or excuses that arise by statute or under the common law (Crimes Act 1958 s 201(2), (5)).

55. There are two matters that may be of particular relevance to this offence:

- Self-defence; and
- Consent.

Self-defence

56. In some cases, a person may believe, on reasonable grounds, that it is necessary to damage or destroy property belonging to another person, in order to defend him or herself or another person. In such cases, the person should not be convicted of criminal damage (see, e.g. R v Wilkins [1996] EWCA Crim 1126).

57. Although not clear, it seems that the same principles may also apply if property is damaged or destroyed in order to protect personal property, or to prevent crime (see, e.g. R v McKay [1957] VR 560). However, given the uncertainties in this area, where the relevant act is committed in defence of property, it is likely to be preferable for the accused to rely on Crimes Act 1958 s 201(2)(b) (see, e.g. Cresswell & Anor v DPP [2006] EWHC 3379 (Admin); DPP v Bayer [2003] EWHC 2567 (Admin)).

58. For further information concerning self-defence, see 8.1 Statutory Self-Defence (From 1/11/14).

Consent

59. A person will have a lawful excuse to criminal damage if the owner(s) of the property consented to its damage or destruction. The owner of property has the right to damage or destroy his or her own property, or to authorise another person to do so (R v Denton (1982) 74 Cr App R 81).

60. This excuse will only apply where the accused had the consent of all co-owners. The authority of only one co-owner is not sufficient if there are other co-owners who have not consented (see Howell v Dakin [1965] Tas SR 142).

61. Even if the relevant act was carried out for an illegal purpose, such as to facilitate fraud against an insurance company, the accused will generally[1040] have a lawful excuse to a charge of criminal damage if the owner consented to the damage or destruction (R v Denton (1982) 74 Cr App R 81). However, he or she may be guilty of another offence, such as Criminal Damage with a View to Gain.

62. While the prosecution must prove that the owner did not consent to the damage or destruction, the circumstances of the damage or destruction alone may allow the jury to infer a lack of consent (R v Stevenson (1996) 90 A Crim R 259).

Last updated: 27 March 2019

7.5.16.1 Charge: Criminal Damage

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used when the accused is charged with criminal damage under Crimes Act 1958 s 197(1).

I must now direct you about the crime of criminal damage. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That the accused damaged or destroyed property;

Two – That the property belonged to another;

Three – That the accused purposely damaged or destroyed the property, or knew or believed that damage or destruction was the likely result of his/her actions; and

Four – That the accused had no lawful excuse for damaging or destroying the property.

[1040] Where the owner of the property is a corporation, the consent of a director of the corporation may not be sufficient. A director may not be competent to consent to fraudulent damage or destruction of property owned by the company (R v Appleyard (1987) 81 Cr App R 319).

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[1041]

Damaging or Destroying Property

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused damaged or destroyed property.

[If there is a dispute about whether the relevant harm constitutes "damage", add the following shaded section.]

In deciding whether [identify relevant property] has been damaged, you must decide if there has been some change to its physical integrity. This can be a permanent or temporary change.

In this case, it is alleged that NOA damaged or destroyed [identify relevant property] by [identify relevant action].[1042] [Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

This first element will be met if you are satisfied that NOA [identify relevant act], [where relevant add: and that what s/he did amounts to "damage"].

Property Belonging to Another

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the property belonged to another person.[1043]

In this case the prosecution alleged that the [describe property] belonged to NOC. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

Intention to Damage or Destroy Property

There are two ways in which the prosecution can prove the third element of this offence.

First, they can prove that, when NOA [identify act], it was his/her purpose to damage or destroy the property, or one of his/her purposes.

Alternatively, they can prove that, when NOA [identify act], s/he knew or believed that his/her actions were more likely than not to result in the property being damaged or destroyed.

"Knowledge" and "belief" are both ordinary words. For this element to be proven on the basis of the accused's knowledge or belief, the prosecution must prove that the accused thought about the likely consequences of his/her actions. If s/he did not think about whether his/her actions would cause the property to be damaged or destroyed, then this element will not be met.

[1041] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[1042] If there is a factual dispute over whether the damaged object is "property", a direction on that issue will need to be given. See 7.5.16 Criminal Damage for information about the definition of "property". Some guidance on charging the jury on this issue can be obtained from 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended). However, due to the slightly different definition of "property", judges should proceed with care.

[1043] If there are any issues about whether the property "belonged to another", adapt the direction on "belonging to another" from 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended).

However, it is not enough to find that NOA simply thought about the possibility of damage or destruction. This element will not be met if the accused thought his/her actions might damage the property, but probably would not. It will only be satisfied if the prosecution can prove that NOA knew or believed that his/her actions were more likely than not to result in the property being damaged or destroyed, or that at least one of his purposes in [identify act] was to damage or destroy the property.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Without Lawful Excuse

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused had no lawful excuse for damaging or destroying the property.

The law recognises that a person has a lawful excuse for damaging or destroying property if s/he [describe relevant defence, e.g. honestly believed that the owner of the property had consented to the damage].

[Where a statutory excuse under s 201(2) has been raised, add the following shaded section.]

The focus of this element is on what NOA actually believed at the time s/he [identify act]. It does not matter if that belief was neither accurate nor justified.

It is not for the accused to prove that [describe relevant defence]. Instead, it is for the prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused did not [describe relevant defence].

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty criminal damage, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That the accused damaged or destroyed property;

Two – That the property belonged to another person;

Three – That the accused purposely damaged or destroyed the property, or knew or believed that damage or destruction was the likely result of his/her actions; and

Four – That the accused had no lawful excuse for damaging or destroying the property.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of criminal damage.

Last updated: 27 March 2019

7.5.16.2 Checklist: Criminal Damage

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused damaged or destroyed property; and

2. The property belonged to another person; and

3. The accused purposely damaged or destroyed the property, or knew or believed that damage or destruction was the likely result of his or her actions; and

4. The accused had no lawful excuse for damaging or destroying the property.

Damage or Destroy Property

1. Did the accused damage or destroy property?

If yes, then go to 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of criminal damage

Belonging to Another

2. Did the property belong to another person?

If yes, then go to 3.1

If no, then the accused is not guilty of criminal damage

State of Mind of Accused

3.1 Did the accused act with the purpose of damaging or destroying the property?

If yes, then go to 4

If no, then go to 3.2

3.2 Did the accused know or believe that his or her actions were more likely than not to damage or destroy the property?

Consider – It is not enough to show that the accused realised that damage or destruction might occur, or was possible.

If yes, then go to 4

If no, then the accused is not guilty of criminal damage

Without Lawful Excuse

4. Did the accused act without lawful excuse?

If yes, then the accused is guilty of criminal damage (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1, 2 and 3.1 or 3.2)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of criminal damage

Last updated: 30 May 2014

7.5.17 Criminal Damage Intending to Endanger Life

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Criminal damage intending to endanger the life of another is an offence under Crimes Act 1958 s 197(2).
2. A number of related but discrete offences have also been created by s 197 and the surrounding provisions. These are addressed separately in the following topics:
    - 7.5.16 Criminal damage (s 197(1));

- 7.5.18 Criminal damage with a view to gain (s 197(3));
- 7.5.19 Arson (s 197(6));
- 7.5.20 Arson causing death (s 197A);
- 7.5.21 Intentionally or recklessly causing a bushfire (s 201A).

Elements

3. The offence of criminal damage intending to endanger the life of another has the following four elements:

   i) The accused destroyed or damaged property;

   ii) The accused intended to destroy or damage property;

   iii) The accused intended by the damage or destruction to endanger the life of another;

   iv) The accused did not have a lawful excuse for his or her actions.

4. There is significant overlap between the elements of this offence and the elements of criminal damage (s 197(1)). However, there are three important differences:
   - The prosecution does not need to establish that the property in question belonged to another person;
   - The prosecution does need to establish that the accused intended to endanger the life of another person; and
   - The lawful excuses contained in Crimes Act 1958 s 201 are not available. Consequently, the prosecution only needs to rebut any defences or excuses that arise at common law.
5. This topic only addresses the third element of the offence. For information concerning the other elements, see 7.5.16 Criminal Damage.

Intending to Endanger the Life of Another

6. The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intended, by the damage or destruction, to endanger the life of another person (Crimes Act 1958 s 197(2)).
7. Section 197(5) sets out the requirements for proving this element. A person only intends to endanger the life of another person if:

   (a) One of his or her purposes is to endanger the life of another by the damage or destruction; or

   (b) He or she knows or believes that the life of another is more likely than not to be endangered by the damage or destruction (Crimes Act 1958 s 197(5)).
8. The prosecution must prove that the accused intended the danger to arise from the damage or destruction, rather than from the act that caused that damage or destruction (R v Steer [1988] AC 111; R v Wenton [2010] EWCA Crim 2361; R v Webster [1995] 2 All ER 168).
9. Thus, if the relevant act is dropping a rock on a passing train:
   - This element will not be met if the accused intended that the rock would pass through the roof of the train and fatally injure a passenger;
   - This element will be met if the accused intended that the rock would damage the train in such a way that a passenger's life would be put in danger (see R v Webster [1995] 2 All ER 168).

10. Given the potentially fine distinctions that must be drawn in relation to this issue, it is essential that the trial judge carefully identify the way in which the prosecution alleges that the accused intended to endanger life. The directions must not conflate the danger created by the damage to the property with any danger created by the act causing the damage (R v Steer [1988] AC 111; R v Wenton [2010] EWCA Crim 2361; R v Webster [1995] 2 All ER 168).
11. Where a person knows or believes that destroying or damaging property is more likely than not to endanger the life of another, he or she must take steps to avoid creating the risk. It is not sufficient for him or her to take steps to mitigate the danger once it has been created (R v Merrick [1995] EWCA Crim 5; Chief Constable of Avon v Shimmen [1987] 84 Cr App R 7).
12. The jury must look at the degree and type of damage the accused intended to cause by his or her conduct. This element may be satisfied even if the accused caused less damage than expected, caused a different kind of damage, or the damage caused did not create an objective risk to another (R v Dudley [1989] Crim LR 57; R v Webster [1995] 2 All ER 168).

Alternative Offence

13. The offence of criminal damage (s 197(1)) is a statutory alternative to the offence of criminal damage intending to endanger the life of another (Crimes Act 1958 s 427).

Last updated: 19 October 2011

7.5.17.1 Charge: Criminal Damage Intending to Endanger Life

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used when the accused is charged with criminal damage intending to endanger life under Crimes Act 1958 s 197(3).

I must now direct you about the crime of criminal damage intending to endanger life. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That the accused damaged or destroyed property;

Two – That the accused purposely damaged or destroyed the property, or knew or believed that damage or destruction was the likely result of his/her actions;

Three – That the accused purposely endangered the life of another person by causing the damage or destruction, or knew or believed that the life of another person was likely to be endangered by the damage or destruction; and

Four – That the accused had no lawful excuse for damaging or destroying the property.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[1044]

Damaging or Destroying Property

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused damaged or destroyed property.

[If there is a dispute about whether the relevant harm constitutes "damage", add the following shaded section.]

In deciding whether [identify relevant property] has been damaged, you must decide if there has been

[1044] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

some change to its physical integrity. This can be a permanent or temporary change.

In this case, it is alleged that NOA damaged or destroyed [identify relevant property] by [identify relevant action].[1045] [Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

This first element will be met if you are satisfied that NOA [identify relevant act], [where relevant add: and that what s/he did amounts to "damage"].

Intention to Damage or Destroy Property

There are two ways in which the prosecution can prove the second element of this offence.

First, they can prove that, when NOA [identify act], it was his/her purpose to damage or destroy the property, or one of his/her purposes.

Alternatively, they can prove that, when NOA [identify act], s/he knew or believed that his/her actions were more likely than not to result in the property being damaged or destroyed.

"Knowledge" and "belief" are both ordinary words. For this element to be proven on the basis of the accused's knowledge or belief, the prosecution must prove that the accused thought about the likely consequences of his/her actions. If s/he did not think about whether his/her actions would cause the property to be damaged or destroyed, then this element will not be met.

However, it is not enough to find that NOA simply thought about the possibility of damage or destruction. This element will not be met if the accused thought his/her actions might damage the property, but probably would not. It will only be satisfied if the prosecution can prove that NOA knew or believed that his/her actions were more likely than not to result in the property being damaged or destroyed, or that at least one of his purposes in [identify act] was to damage or destroy the property.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Intention to endanger

There are also two ways that the prosecution can prove the third element of this offence.

First, they can prove that it was NOA's purpose to endanger the life of another person by causing the damage or destruction, or one of his/her purposes.

Alternatively, they can prove that NOA knew or believed that the life of another person was more likely than not to be endangered by the damage or destruction.

For this element to be met, the accused must have meant to create such a risk by virtue of damaging or destroying the property, or must have known or believed that such a risk was likely to result from the damage or destruction. It is not enough that s/he knew or believed that someone's life would be endangered by his/her act itself, or that s/he meant to put someone's life in danger by that act.

[1045] If there is a factual dispute over whether the damaged object is "property", a direction on that issue will need to be given. See 7.5.16 Criminal Damage for information about the definition of "property". Some guidance on charging the jury on this issue can be obtained from 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended). However, due to the slightly different definition of "property", judges should proceed with care.

This is a difficult distinction, which is probably easiest understood by the use of an example. Imagine that a person places a bomb on a train track, and stands by the side of the tracks waiting for a train before he detonates it. If he detonates it shortly before the train arrives, intending to damage the tracks and knowing or believing that this could derail the train killing the passengers, this element will be satisfied. In such a case he will have meant to put a person's life in danger by virtue of damaging property – in this case, the train tracks. If, however, he waits until the train is above the bomb before detonating, intending that the bomb itself will directly kill the passengers, this element will not be met. This is because his purpose in such a case is to kill the passengers directly, through the use of the bomb, rather than to put a their life in danger by damaging or destroying property. He would be guilty of another offence, probably murder, but not of criminal damage intending to endanger life.

This may seem like a fine distinction, but it is an important one, because this element requires the prosecution to prove that NOA purposely endangered the life of another person by causing the damage or destruction, or knew or believed that the life of another person was likely to be endangered by the damage or destruction.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Without Lawful Excuse

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused had no lawful excuse for damaging or destroying the property.

The law recognises that a person has a lawful excuse for damaging or destroying property if s/he [describe relevant defence, e.g. honestly believed that the owner of the property had consented to the damage].

[Where a statutory excuse under s 201(2) has been raised, add the following shaded section.]

The focus of this element is on what NOA actually believed at the time s/he [identify act]. It does not matter if that belief was neither accurate nor justified.

It is not for the accused to prove that [describe relevant defence]. Instead, it is for the prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused did not [describe relevant defence].

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty criminal damage intending to endanger life, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That the accused damaged or destroyed property;

Two – That the accused purposely damaged or destroyed the property, or knew or believed that damage or destruction was the likely result of his/her actions;

Three – That the accused purposely endangered the life of another person by causing the damage or destruction, or knew or believed that the life of another person was more likely than not to be endangered by the damage or destruction; and

Four – That the accused had no lawful excuse for damaging or destroying the property.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of criminal damage intending to endanger life.

Last updated: 27 March 2019

7.5.17.2 Checklist: Criminal Damage Intending to Endanger Life

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused damaged or destroyed property; and

2. The accused purposely damaged or destroyed the property, or knew or believed that damage or destruction was the likely result of his or her actions; and

3. The accused purposely endangered the life of another person through the damage or destruction of property, or knew or believed that the life of another was likely to be endangered by that damage or destruction; and

4. The accused had no lawful excuse for damaging or destroying the property.

Damage or Destroy Property

1. Did the accused damage or destroy property?

If yes, then go to 2.1

If no, then the accused is not guilty of criminal damage intending to endanger life

State of Mind of Accused

2.1 Did the accused act with the purpose of damaging or destroying the property?

If yes, then go to 3.1

If no, then go to 2.2

2.2 Did the accused know or believe that his or her actions were more likely than not to damage or destroy the property?

Consider – It is not enough to show that the accused realised that damage or destruction might occur, or was possible.

If yes, then go to 3.1

If no, then the accused is not guilty of criminal damage intending to endanger life

Intending to Endanger Life

3.1 Did the accused damage or destroy the property with the purpose of endangering the life of another person?

If yes, then go to 4

If no, then go to 3.2

3.2 Did the accused know or believe that damaging or destroying the property was more likely than not to endanger the life of another person?

If yes, then go to 4

If no, then the accused is not guilty of criminal damage intending to endanger life

Without Lawful Excuse

4. Did the accused act without lawful excuse?

If yes, then the accused is guilty of criminal damage intending to endanger life (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1, 2.1 or 2.2 and 3.1 or 3.2)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of criminal damage intending to endanger life

Last updated: 30 May 2014

7.5.18 Criminal Damage with a View to Gain

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Criminal damage with a view to gain is an offence under Crimes Act 1958 s 197(3).
2. A number of related but discrete offences have also been created by s 197 and the surrounding provisions. These are addressed separately in the following topics:
    - 7.5.16 Criminal damage (s 197(1));
    - 7.5.17 Criminal damage intending to endanger life (s 197(2));
    - 7.5.19 Arson (s 197(6));
    - 7.5.20 Arson causing death (s 197A);
    - 7.5.21 Intentionally or recklessly causing a bushfire (s 201A).

Elements

3. The offence of criminal damage with a view to gain has the following three elements:
    i) The accused damaged or destroyed property;
    ii) The accused did so dishonestly;
    iii) The accused did so with a view to gain for himself or another (Crimes Act 1958 s 197(3)).
4. This offence is primarily aimed at preventing people from damaging or destroying property in order to make false insurance claims (DPP Reference (No 1 of 1988) [1989] VR 857).
5. Consequently, unlike the offence of criminal damage under s 197(1), the prosecution does not need to prove that the property belonged to another. This offence may be committed in relation to property belonging to the accused him or herself, or abandoned property (see DPP Reference (No 1 of 1988) [1989] VR 857).
6. The lawful excuses contained in Crimes Act 1958 s 201 are not available in relation to this offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 201(1)).

Destroying or Damaging Property

7. The first element the prosecution must prove is that the accused destroyed or damaged property (Crimes Act 1958 s 197(3)).
8. For information concerning this element, see 7.5.16 Criminal Damage.

Dishonesty

9. The second element the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted dishonestly (Crimes Act 1958 s 197(3)).

10. While the law is unclear, it is likely that dishonesty in s 197(3) carries its ordinary meaning, rather than the special meaning that applies to offences such as theft or obtaining property by deception.

11. To determine whether the accused acted dishonestly, the jury must:

    - Determine whether the accused had the knowledge, belief or intent which is said to make his or her actions dishonest; and
    - Determine whether, based on that knowledge, belief or intent, the act was dishonest (Peters v R (1998) 192 CLR 493; Macleod v R (2003) 214 CLR 230).

12. The jury must determine whether the act was dishonest according to the standards of ordinary, decent people (Peters v R (1998) 192 CLR 493; Macleod v R (2003) 214 CLR 230).

13. It is only in borderline cases that the jury will need to determine whether the accused's acts should be characterised as "dishonest". In most cases, it will be sufficient for the judge to:

    - Explain which facts it is alleged make the accused's behaviour dishonest; and
    - Direct the jury that this element will be met if they find those facts to be proven (Peters v R (1998) 192 CLR 493; Macleod v R (2003) 214 CLR 230 (Callinan J)).

View to Gain

14. The third element the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted with a view to gain for him or herself or another (Crimes Act 1958 s 197(3)).

15. The Act does not define the term "gain" for the purpose of this offence. This suggests that the word should be give a wide or general interpretation. It may not be limited to "financial advantage" or "profit". "Gain" does not need to be measured in "balance sheet" terms (DPP Reference (No 1 of 1988) [1989] VR 857).

16. The jury must determine whether a view to gain existed at the time the accused damaged or destroyed the property. While it is not necessary for the prosecution to prove that the accused later committed acts in order to gain some kind of benefit from the damage or destruction (e.g. by lodging an insurance claim), evidence of later acts may help to establish this element.

Alternative Offence

17. The offence of criminal damage (s 197(1)) is a statutory alternative to the offence of criminal damage with a view to gain (Crimes Act 1958 s 427).

Last updated: 19 October 2011

7.5.18.1 Charge: Criminal Damage with a View to Gain

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used when the accused is charged with criminal damage with a view to gain under Crimes Act 1958 s 197(3).

I must now direct you about the crime of criminal damage with a view to gain. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That the accused damaged or destroyed property;

Two – That the accused did so dishonestly; and

Three – That the accused did so with a view to gain.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[1046]

Damaging or Destroying Property

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused damaged or destroyed property.

[If there is a dispute about whether the relevant harm constitutes "damage", add the following shaded section.]

In deciding whether [identify relevant property] has been damaged, you must decide if there has been some change to its physical integrity. This can be a permanent or temporary change.

In this case, it is alleged that NOA damaged or destroyed [identify relevant property] by [identify relevant action].[1047] [Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

This first element will be met if you are satisfied that NOA [identify relevant act], [where relevant add: and that what s/he did amounts to "damage"].

Dishonesty

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused damaged or destroyed the property dishonestly.

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA acted dishonestly because [describe the knowledge, intent or belief that is alleged to make the accused's conduct dishonest].

[If the parties agree that the accused will have acted dishonestly if s/he had the alleged state of mind, add the following shaded section.]

If you find that NOA had this [knowledge/intention/belief] when s/he [identify act], then the second element will be met. This is because it is clear that [describe alleged knowledge, intention or belief] is dishonest.

[If the defence contend that the alleged state of mind does not constitute dishonesty, add the following shaded section.]

If you find that NOA had this [knowledge/intention/belief], you must then decide whether that made his/her conduct dishonest. This matter should be decided according to the standards of ordinary, decent people. If an ordinary, decent person would have considered NOA's actions to be dishonest, then this element will be met.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

[1046] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[1047] If there is a factual dispute over whether the damaged object is "property", a direction on that issue will need to be given. See 7.5.16 Criminal Damage for information about the definition of "property". Some guidance on charging the jury on this issue can be obtained from 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended). However, due to the slightly different definition of "property", judges should proceed with care.

View to Gain

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused caused the damage or destruction with a view to gain something for himself/herself or another person.

In this case, the prosecution argued that NOA intended [NO3P] to gain [describe intended gain] by [damaging/destroying] the [identify property].

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty criminal damage with a view to gain, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That the accused destroyed or damaged property;

Two – That the accused did so dishonestly; and

Three – That the accused did so with a view to gain for himself/herself or another person.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of criminal damage with a view to gain.

Last updated: 27 March 2019

7.5.18.2 Checklist: Criminal Damage with a View to Gain

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused damaged or destroyed property; and

2. The accused did so dishonestly; and

3. The accused did so with a view to gain.

Damage or Destroy Property

1. Did the accused damage or destroy property?

    If yes, then go to 2

    If no, then the accused is not guilty of criminal damage with a view to gain

Dishonesty

2. Did the accused damage or destroy the property dishonestly?

    If yes, then go to 3

    If no, then the accused is not guilty of criminal damage with a view to gain

View to Gain

3. Did the accused damage or destroy the property with a view to gain?

    If yes, then the accused is guilty of criminal damage with a view to gain (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1 and 2)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of criminal damage with a view to gain

Last updated: 30 May 2014

7.5.19 Arson

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Arson is an offence under Crimes Act 1958 s 197(7).
2. A number of related but discrete offences have also been created by s 197 and the surrounding provisions. These are addressed separately in the following topics:
    - 7.5.16 Criminal damage (s 197(1));
    - 7.5.17 Criminal damage intending to endanger life (s 197(2));
    - 7.5.18 Criminal damage with a view to gain (s 197(3));
    - 7.5.20 Arson causing death (s 197A);
    - 7.5.21 Intentionally or recklessly causing a bushfire (s 201A).
3. The common law crime of arson has been abolished (Crimes (Criminal Damage) Act 1978 s 3).

Elements

4. A person is guilty of arson if he or she commits one of the offences in sections 197(1), (2) or (3), and the relevant offence is committed by destroying or damaging property by fire (Crimes Act 1958 s 197(6)).
5. Consequently, the elements of arson consist of:
    - The elements of the relevant offence under ss 197(1), (2) or (3);
    - That the damage or destruction occurred by fire; and
    - That the accused intended to damage or destroy the property by fire.[1048]
6. See the following topics for information concerning the elements of ss 197(1), (2) and (3):
    - 7.5.16 Criminal damage (s 197(1));
    - 7.5.17 Criminal damage intending to endanger life (s 197(2));
    - 7.5.18 Criminal damage with a view to gain (s 197(3)).

Relevant Cases Must be Charged as Arson

7. Where one of the relevant criminal damage offences is committed by fire, it must be charged as arson (Crimes Act 1958 s 197(6)).

[1048] It is unclear whether the accused must intend to damage or destroy the property by fire, or whether a general intention to cause damage is sufficient. As a matter of prudence, it is assumed that the more specific intention is required. This is the approach taken in G Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law, 2nd ed, 913 and R v Cooper (G) and Cooper (Y) [1991] Crim LR 524. But compare A Ashworth, "Transferred Malice and Punishment for Unforeseen Consequences" in P Glazebrook, Reshaping the Criminal Law (1978), 92.

8. Consequently, indictments charging one of the offences in ss 197(1)–(3) will be invalid if the property was damaged by fire (R v Wood & Ors [1998] EWCA Crim 2436; R v Cooper (G) and Cooper (Y) [1991] Crim LR 524).
9. However, these offences may be left as common law alternatives to a charge of arson.

Last updated: 19 October 2011

7.5.19.1 Charge: Arson

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used when the accused is charged with arson under Crimes Act 1958 s 197(6), and it is alleged that the accused committed the offence of criminal damage under s 197(1) by fire.

If it is alleged that the accused committed criminal damage by fire intending to endanger life *(*ss 197(2) and (6)) or criminal damage by fire with a view to gain *(*ss 197(3) and (6)) the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

I must now direct you about the crime of arson. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That the accused damaged or destroyed property by fire;

Two – That the property belonged to another;

Three – That the accused purposely damaged or destroyed the property by fire, or knew or believed that damage or destruction by fire was the likely result of his/her actions; and

Four – That the accused had no lawful excuse for damaging or destroying the property.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[1049]

Damaging or Destroying Property by Fire

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused damaged or destroyed property by fire.

[If there is a dispute about whether the relevant harm constitutes "damage", add the following shaded section.]

In deciding whether [identify relevant property] has been damaged, you must decide if there has been some change to its physical integrity. This can be a permanent or temporary change.

In this case, it is alleged that NOA damaged or destroyed [identify relevant property] by [identify relevant action].[1050] [Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

This first element will be met if you are satisfied that NOA [identify relevant act], [where relevant add: and that what s/he did amounts to "damage"].

[1049] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[1050] If there is a factual dispute over whether the damaged object is "property", a direction on that issue will need to be given. See 7.5.16 Criminal Damage for information about the definition of "property". Some guidance on charging the jury on this issue can be obtained from 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended). However, due to the slightly different definition of "property", judges should proceed with care.

Property Belonging to Another

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the property belonged to another person.[1051]

In this case the prosecution alleged that the [describe property] belonged to NOC. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

Intention to Damage or Destroy Property by Fire

There are two ways in which the prosecution can prove the third element of this offence.

First, they can prove that, when NOA [identify act], it was his/her purpose to damage or destroy the property by fire, or one of his/her purposes.

Alternatively, they can prove that, when NOA [identify act], s/he knew or believed that his/her actions were more likely than not to result in the property being damaged or destroyed by fire.

"Knowledge" and "belief" are both ordinary words. For this element to be proven on the basis of the accused's knowledge or belief, the prosecution must prove that the accused thought about the likely consequences of his/her actions. If s/he did not think about whether his/her actions would cause the property to be damaged or destroyed by fire, then this element will not be met.

However, it is not enough to find that NOA simply thought about the possibility of damage or destruction. This element will not be met if the accused thought his/her actions might damage the property, but probably would not. It will only be satisfied if the prosecution can prove that NOA knew or believed that his/her actions were more likely than not to result in the property being damaged or destroyed by fire, or that at least one of his purposes in [identify act] was to damage or destroy the property by fire.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Without Lawful Excuse

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused had no lawful excuse for damaging or destroying the property.

The law recognises that a person has a lawful excuse for damaging or destroying property if s/he [describe relevant defence, e.g. honestly believed that the owner of the property had consented to the damage].

[Where a statutory excuse under s 201(2) has been raised, add the following shaded section.]

The focus of this element is on what NOA actually believed at the time s/he [identify act]. It does not matter if that belief was neither accurate nor justified.

It is not for the accused to prove that [describe relevant defence]. Instead, it is for the prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused did not [describe relevant defence].

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of arson, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

[1051] If there are any issues about whether the property "belonged to another", adapt the direction on "belonging to another" from 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended).

One – That the accused damaged or destroyed property by fire;

Two – That the property belonged to another person;

Three – That the accused purposely damaged or destroyed the property by fire, or knew or believed that damage or destruction by fire was the likely result of his/her actions; and

Four – That the accused had no lawful excuse for damaging or destroying the property.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of arson.

Last updated: 27 March 2019

7.5.19.2 Checklist: Arson

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused damaged or destroyed property by fire; and

2. The property belonged to another person; and

3. The accused purposely damaged or destroyed the property, or knew or believed that damage or destruction was the likely result of his or her actions; and

4. The accused had no lawful excuse for damaging or destroying the property.

Damage or Destroy Property

1. Did the accused damage or destroy property by fire?

If yes, then go to 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of Arson

Belonging to Another

2. Did the property belong to another person?

If yes, then go to 3.1

If no, then the accused is not guilty of Arson

State of Mind of Accused

3.1 Did the accused act with the purpose of damaging or destroying the property by fire?

If yes, then go to 4

If no, then go to 3.2

3.2 Did the accused know or believe that his or her actions were more likely than not to damage or destroy the property by fire?

Consider – It is not enough to show that the accused realised that damage or destruction might occur, or was possible.

If yes, then go to 4

If no, then the accused is not guilty of Arson

Without Lawful Excuse

4. Did the accused act without lawful excuse?

If yes, then the accused is guilty of Arson (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1, 2 and 3.1 or 3.2)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of Arson

Last updated: 30 May 2014

7.5.20 Arson Causing Death

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Arson causing death is an offence under Crimes Act 1958 s 197A.
2. A number of related but discrete offences have also been created by s 197 and the surrounding provisions. These are addressed separately in the following topics:
    - 7.5.16 Criminal damage (s 197(1));
    - 7.5.17 Criminal damage intending to endanger life (s 197(2));
    - 7.5.18 Criminal damage with a view to gain (s 197(3));
    - 7.5.19 Arson (s 197(7));
    - 7.5.21 Intentionally or recklessly causing a bushfire (s 201A).
3. The common law crime of arson has been abolished (Crimes (Criminal Damage) Act 1978 s 3).

Elements

4. A person is guilty of arson if he or she commits the offence of arson as defined in s 197, and thereby causes the death of another person (Crimes Act 1958 s 197A).
5. Consequently, the elements of arson causing death consist of:
    - The elements of the relevant offence under ss 197(1), (2) or (3);
    - That the damage or destruction occurred by fire;
    - That the accused intended to damage or destroy the property by fire;[1052] and
    - That the accused's acts caused a person's death.

[1052] It is unclear whether the accused must intend to damage or destroy the property by fire, or whether a general intention to cause damage is sufficient. As a matter of prudence, it is assumed that the more specific intention is required. This is the approach taken in G Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law, 2nd ed, 913 and R v Cooper (G) and Cooper (Y) [1991] Crim LR 524. But compare A Ashworth, "Transferred Malice and Punishment for Unforeseen Consequences" in P Glazebrook, Reshaping the Criminal Law (1978), 92.

6. The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to cause the death, or was reckless as to that result. It is sufficient to prove that the accused had the mental state necessary for the offence of arson, and that death resulted.
7. See the following topics for information concerning the elements of ss 197(1), (2) and (3):
    - 7.5.16 Criminal damage (s 197(1));
    - 7.5.17 Criminal damage intending to endanger life (s 197(2));
    - 7.5.18 Criminal damage with a view to gain (s 197(3)).
8. See 7.5.19 Arson for information on causing damage or destruction by fire and an intention to cause damage or destruction by fire.
9. See 7.1.2 Causation for information concerning what it means for the accused's acts to have "caused" a person's death.

Last updated: 19 October 2011

7.5.20.1 Charge: Arson Causing Death

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used when the accused is charged with arson causing death under Crimes Act 1958 s 197A, and it is alleged that the accused caused the death by committing the offence of criminal damage under s 197(1) by fire.

If it is alleged that the accused caused death by committing criminal damage by fire intending to endanger life (ss 197(2), 197(6) and 197A) or criminal damage by fire with a view to gain (ss 197(3), 197(6) and 197A) the charge will need to be modified accordingly. Assistance can be obtained from the charges listed below.

I must now direct you about the crime of arson causing death. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following five elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That the accused damaged or destroyed property by fire;

Two – That the property belonged to another;

Three – That the accused purposely damaged or destroyed the property by fire, or knew or believed that damage or destruction by fire was the likely result of his/her actions;

Four – That the accused's acts caused a person's death; and.

Five – That the accused had no lawful excuse for damaging or destroying the property.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[1053]

Damaging or Destroying Property by Fire

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused damaged or destroyed property by fire.

[If there is a dispute about whether the relevant harm constitutes "damage", add the following shaded section.]

[1053] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

In deciding whether [identify relevant property] has been damaged, you must decide if there has been some change to its physical integrity. This can be a permanent or temporary change.

In this case, it is alleged that NOA damaged or destroyed [identify relevant property] by [identify relevant action].[1054] [Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

This first element will be met if you are satisfied that NOA [identify relevant act], [where relevant add: and that what s/he did amounts to "damage"].

Property Belonging to Another

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the property belonged to another person.[1055]

In this case the prosecution alleged that the [describe property] belonged to NOC. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

Intention to Damage or Destroy Property by Fire

There are two ways in which the prosecution can prove the third element of this offence.

First, they can prove that, when NOA [identify act], it was his/her purpose to damage or destroy the property by fire, or one of his/her purposes.

Alternatively, they can prove that, when NOA [identify act], s/he knew or believed that his/her actions were more likely than not to result in the property being damaged or destroyed by fire.

"Knowledge" and "belief" are both ordinary words. For this element to be proven on the basis of the accused's knowledge or belief, the prosecution must prove that the accused thought about the likely consequences of his/her actions. If s/he did not think about whether his/her actions would cause the property to be damaged or destroyed by fire, then this element will not be met.

However, it is not enough to find that NOA simply thought about the possibility of damage or destruction. This element will not be met if the accused thought his/her actions might damage the property, but probably would not. It will only be satisfied if the prosecution can prove that NOA knew or believed that his/her actions were more likely than not to result in the property being damaged or destroyed by fire, or that at least one of his purposes in [identify act] was to damage or destroy the property by fire.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

The Accused's Acts Caused a Person's Death

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused's acts caused a person's death.

[1054] If there is a factual dispute over whether the damaged object is "property", a direction on that issue will need to be given. See 7.5.16 Criminal Damage for information about the definition of "property". Some guidance on charging the jury on this issue can be obtained from 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended). However, due to the slightly different definition of "property", judges should proceed with care.

[1055] If there are any issues about whether the property "belonged to another", adapt the direction on "belonging to another" from 7.5.1.2 Charge: Theft (Extended).

In this case, the prosecution have alleged that by starting the fire, NOA caused NOV to die.[1056] [Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Without Lawful Excuse

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused had no lawful excuse for damaging or destroying the property.

The law recognises that a person has a lawful excuse for damaging or destroying property if s/he [describe relevant defence, e.g. honestly believed that the owner of the property had consented to the damage].

[Where a statutory excuse under s 201(2) has been raised, add the following shaded section.]

The focus of this element is on what NOA actually believed at the time s/he [identify act]. It does not matter if that belief was neither accurate nor justified.

It is not for the accused to prove that [describe relevant defence]. Instead, it is for the prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused did not [describe relevant defence].

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of arson, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That the accused damaged or destroyed property by fire;

Two – That the property belonged to another person;

Three – That the accused purposely damaged or destroyed the property by fire, or knew or believed that damage or destruction by fire was the likely result of his/her actions;

Four – That the accused's acts caused a person's death; and

Five – That the accused had no lawful excuse for damaging or destroying the property.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of arson causing death.

Last updated: 27 March 2019

7.5.20.2 Checklist: Arson Causing Death

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused damaged or destroyed property by fire; and

2. The property belonged to another person; and

3. The accused purposely damaged or destroyed the property, or knew or believed that damage or destruction was the likely result of his or her actions; and

4. The accused caused a person's death; and [1056] If the jury require additional guidance on the meaning of causation, adapt an appropriate direction from 7.1.2.1 Charges: Causation.

5. The accused had no lawful excuse for damaging or destroying the property.

Damage or Destroy Property

1. Did the accused damage or destroy property by fire?

If yes, then go to 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of Arson Causing Death

Belonging to Another

2. Did the property belong to another person?

If yes, then go to 3.1

If no, then the accused is not guilty of Arson Causing Death

State of Mind of Accused

3.1 Did the accused act with the purpose of damaging or destroying the property by fire?

If yes, then go to 4

If no, then go to 3.2

3.2 Did the accused know or believe that his or her actions were more likely than not to damage or destroy the property by fire?

Consider – It is not enough to show that the accused realised that damage or destruction might occur, or was possible.

If yes, then go to 4

If no, then the accused is not guilty of Arson Causing Death

Cause Death

4. Did the accused's conduct cause a person's death?

If yes, then go to 5

If no, then the accused is not guilty of Arson Causing Death

Without Lawful Excuse

5. Did the accused act without lawful excuse?

If yes, then the accused is guilty of Arson Causing Death (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3.1 or 3.2 and 4)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of Arson Causing Death

Last updated: 30 May 2014

7.5.21 Intentionally or Recklessly Causing a Bushfire

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Intentionally or recklessly causing a bushfire is an offence under Crimes Act 1958 s 201A.
2. A number of related but discrete offences have also been created by s 197 and the surrounding provisions. These are addressed separately in the following topics:
    - 7.5.16 Criminal damage (s 197(1))
    - 7.5.17 Criminal damage intending to endanger life (s 197(2));
    - 7.5.18 Criminal damage with a view to gain (s 197(3));
    - 7.5.19 Arson (s 197(6));
    - 7.5.20 Arson causing death (s 197A).

Elements

3. The offence of intentionally or recklessly causing a bushfire has the following three elements:
    i) The accused caused a fire;
    ii) The accused caused the fire intentionally or recklessly;
    iii) The accused was reckless as to the spread of the fire to vegetation on property belonging to another.
4. The Crimes Act 1958 defines causing a fire as including:
    - Lighting a fire;
    - Maintaining a fire;
    - Failing to contain a fire, except if the fire was lit by another person or the fire is beyond the control of the person who lit the fire (Crimes Act 1958 s 201A(4)).
5. The special definition of intention that applies to offences in s 197 does not apply to this offence. The words 'intentionally or recklessly' should therefore be given their conventional meaning.

Recklessness as to the Spread of Fire

6. The Act does not contain any affirmative definition of recklessness. It is likely that the conventional legal meaning of that word applies. The prosecution must prove that the accused foresaw the probability that the fire would spread to vegetation on property belonging to another. See 7.1.3 Recklessness.
7. However, the Act contains a partial negative definition of recklessness that exempts a person who engages in fire prevention or fire suppression activity in accordance with provisions made under an Act or Code of practice and who honestly believes that his or her conduct was justified in the circumstances (Crimes Act 1958 s 201A(2), (3)).
8. The spread of the fire, for the purpose of the third element, is defined as spread of the fire beyond the capacity of the person who caused the fire to extinguish it (Crimes Act 1958 s 201A(4)).

Last updated: 19 October 2011

7.5.21.1 Charge: Intentionally or Recklessly Causing a Bushfire

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used when the accused is charged with intentionally or recklessly causing a bushfire under Crimes Act 1958 s 201A.

I must now direct you about the crime of intentionally or recklessly causing a bushfire. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That the accused caused a fire;

Two – That the accused caused the fire intentionally or recklessly;

Three – That the accused was reckless as to the spread of the fire to vegetation on property belonging to another;

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[1057]

Causing a fire

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused caused a fire.

The law states that a person causes a fire when s/he [add the following where relevant:

- Lights a fire;
- Maintains a fire;
- Fails to control a fire, other than a fire lit by another person;
- Fails to control a fire, other than a fire that is beyond the control of the person who lit it.]

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Intentionally or recklessly causing a fire

The second element relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that s/he caused the fire intentionally or recklessly.

[If recklessness is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

To prove that NOA acted recklessly, the prosecution must prove that s/he was aware that his/her acts would probably cause a fire. It is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that s/he would cause a fire. S/he must have known that that consequence was probable.

In determining this element, you must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew of the probability of causing a fire. It is not enough that you, or a reasonable person, would have recognised that likelihood in the circumstances.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

[1057] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

Recklessness as to spread of fire

The third element also relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that at the time of lighting the fire, the accused was reckless as to the spread of the fire to vegetation on property belonging to another.[1058]

To prove that NOA was reckless as to the spread of fire to vegetation on property belonging to another, the prosecution must prove that the fire would probably spread to vegetation on property belonging to another. It is not sufficient that NOA knew it was possible that it would do so.

In determining this element, you must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew of the probability of the fire spreading to vegetation on property belonging to another. It is not enough that you, or a reasonable person, would have recognised that likelihood in the circumstances.

This element is only concerned about the spread of fire beyond the capacity of the accused to extinguish. Proof that the accused thought s/he could extinguish fire if it did spread to vegetation on property belonging to another is not sufficient to prove this element. The prosecution must prove that the accused foresaw the probability that the fire would spread to vegetation on property belonging to another and that s/he would be unable to extinguish it.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of intentionally or recklessly causing a bushfire, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That the accused caused a fire;

Two – That the accused caused the fire intentionally or recklessly;

Three – That the accused was reckless as to the spread of the fire to vegetation on property belonging to another.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of intentionally or recklessly causing a bushfire.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

7.5.21.2 Checklist: Intentionally or Recklessly Causing a Bushfire

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused caused a fire; and

2. The accused caused the fire intentionally or recklessly; and

3. The accused was reckless as to the spread of the fire to vegetation on property belonging to another.

Cause a Fire

1. Did the accused cause a fire?

[1058] This charge does not address the negative definition of recklessness in Crimes Act 1958 ss 201A(2) and (3). The judge will need to direct the jury on that definition if it is relevant in the case.

If yes, then go to 2.1

If no, then the accused is not guilty of intentionally or recklessly causing a bushfire

---

Intention or Recklessness

2.1 Did the accused cause the fire intentionally?

If yes, then go to 3

If no, then go to 2.2

2.2 Did the accused cause the fire recklessly?

Consider – The accused caused the fire recklessly if he or she was aware that his or her conduct would probably cause a fire

If yes, then go to 3

If no, then the accused is not guilty of intentionally or recklessly causing a bushfire

---

Reckless as to Spread of Fire

3. Was the accused reckless as to the spread of fire to vegetation on property belonging to another?

Consider – The accused will be reckless if he or she was aware that the fire would probably spread to vegetation on property belonging to another

Consider – This element will not be proved if the accused believed that he or she could extinguish the fire if it spread

If yes, then the accused is guilty of intentionally or recklessly causing a bushfire (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1 and 2.1 or 2.2)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of intentionally or recklessly causing a bushfire.

7.5.22 Victorian and Commonwealth money laundering offences

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Victorian offences – Dealing with proceeds of crime

1. The Crimes Act 1958 s 194 creates four offences of cascading severity where a person deals with proceeds of crime.
2. The four offences contain the same physical elements, and different fault elements.
3. The elements are:
   i) That the accused dealt with the property
   ii) That the property is proceeds of crime
   iii) The accused had the relevant fault element.
4. The fault elements differ depending on which offence is charged. The different available fault elements are that the accused:

i) intends to conceal that it is proceeds of crime (Crimes Act 1958 s 194(1))

ii) knows that it is proceeds of crime (Crimes Act 1958 s 194(2))

iii) is reckless as to whether or not it is proceeds of crime (Crimes Act 1958 s 194(3))

iv) is negligent as to whether or not it is proceeds of crime (Crimes Act 1958 s 194(4)).

Dealing with property

5. The Crimes Act 1958 s 193(1) provides that:

> "deal with" includes receive, possess, conceal or dispose of.

6. Section 193 was implemented to replace Confiscation Act 1997 s 122. Under the old provision, the wording of the offence used the composite phrase "receive, possess, conceal, dispose of or bring into Victoria". While the Crimes (Money Laundering) Act 2003 implemented the inclusively defined term "deal with", it is likely that it did not substantively change the meaning of the individual terms.

7. For the purpose the Crimes Act 1958 s 193(1), possess likely requires physical possession and knowledge of possession by the accused (see Rinaldi v Watts [2003] VSC 2, [28]).

8. Property is defined to include "money and all other property real or personal including things in action and other intangible property" (Crimes Act 1958 s 193(1)).

Proceeds of crime

9. The Crimes Act 1958 s 193(1) provides that:

> "proceeds of crime" means property that is derived or realised, directly or indirectly, by any person from the commission of-
>
> (a) an offence referred to in Schedule 1 to the Confiscation Act 1997; or
>
> (b) an offence against a law of the Commonwealth that may be dealt with as an indictable offence (even if it may, in some circumstances, be dealt with as a summary offence); or
>
> (c) an offence against a law of another State, a Territory or a country outside Australia that would have constituted an offence referred to in paragraph (a) if it had been committed in Victoria.

10. The offence which the property is derived or realised from is called the predicate offence.

11. Schedule 1 of the Confiscation Act 1997 contains an extensive list of offences which permit forfeiture on court order. The full list is not extracted here, but it is worth noting that the first item is "an indictable offence against the law of Victoria".

12. There is no need to prove that the property held by the accused has been converted or transformed following the commission of an offence. Stolen goods can, therefore, be treated as "property that is derived ... directly ... from the commission of" the offence of theft (see Rinaldi v Watts [2003] VSC 2, [21]-[24]).

13. The Crimes Act 1958 s 193(2) also states that for the purpose of the definition of proceeds of crime:

> …it is necessary to prove facts that constitute one or more offences referred to in paragraph (a), (b) or (c) of [the definition] but the particulars of an offence need not be proven.

14. Particulars which need not be proved may include who committed the predicate offence or when the predicate offence was committed (see Crimes (Money Laundering) Bill 2003 Explanatory Memorandum). Similarly, the second reading speech gives the example of a person who admits that a large amount of money is the property of an armed robbery, but does not say when the robbery was committed, who committed it, or who the victim was (Victoria, Parliamentary Debates, Legislative Assembly, 6 November 2003, 1609 (Rob Hulls, Attorney-General)).

15. Section 193 is the statutory successor to Crimes (Confiscation of Profits) Act 1986 s 41Q. In relation to s 41Q, the Court of Appeal has held that it is not necessary to identify a particular serious offence. Such a requirement was held not to be supported by the text and would defeat the purpose of the provision, as it would require proof of the commission of a secondary criminal offence, to the knowledge of the accused, and that the property was derived from that offence (Anile v The Queen [2016] VSCA 226, [16]-[17]).

16. In the context of similar Commonwealth and New South Wales legislation, it has been held that a provision of this kind means the prosecution must identify a specific offence but need not identify the specific criminal acts involved in that offence, in the sense of either timing or the individuals involved. This requirement to identify the alleged offence is a necessary part of showing that the property is the proceeds of a crime (see Chen v DPP (2011) 83 NSWLR 224, [29]; R v McKellar (No 3) [2014] NSWSC 106, [7]-[16]).

17. It is suggested that for the purpose of the current provisions, the Commonwealth and New South Wales approach is to be preferred over the approach identified in Anile v The Queen. The Commonwealth and New South Wales approach gives proper effect to Crimes Act 1958 s 193(2), which requires some identification of the predicate offence, but removes the requirement for particulars.

18. The existence of Crimes Act 1958 s 193(2) also removes the point of distinction noted in Anile between Victorian law and the provisions of New Zealand and England, which allowed the Court to distinguish cases from those two jurisdictions (see Anile v The Queen [2016] VSCA 226, [25]).

19. Proof that the property is, in fact, proceeds of crime is part of what distinguishes the offences in Crimes Act 1958 s 194 from the offence in Crimes Act 1958 s 195 of dealing with property suspected of being proceeds of crime (DPP v Marell [2005] VSC 430, [37]-[39]. See also Harper v DPP [2021] VSCA 173, [35]).

20. The offences in Crimes Act 1958 s 194 differ from the equivalent offences in Crimes Act 1958 s 195A, which involve dealing with property that later becomes an instrument of crime. A distinguishing feature of the s 194 offences is that, at the time of the relevant acts, the property already is proceeds of crime.

Intention, knowledge, recklessness and negligence

21. The most serious offence in Crimes Act 1958 s 194 is in subsection (1) – dealing with proceeds of crime intending to conceal that it is proceeds of crime. While the offences in s 194 are often described as money laundering offences, only subsection (1) requires proof of an intention to launder, in the sense of disguising the illegal origins of the property (see Crimes (Money Laundering) Bill 2003 Explanatory Memorandum). The other offences involve dealing with property that is proceeds of crime.

22. The Act does not specify the kind of recklessness required to prove the offence in s 194(3). The explanatory memorandum for the Bill which introduced the provision stated that common law principles of recklessness apply. This was stated to be that the accused was aware of a substantial risk that the property is proceeds of crime and decided to deal with the property despite that risk (Crimes (Money Laundering) Bill 2003 Explanatory Memorandum).

23. It may now be doubted that this accurately states the meaning of recklessness as it applies to Victorian statutory offences, many of which require proof that the accused was aware that a particular harmful consequence would probably result, but decided to continue regardless (see DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2021] HCA 26; DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2020] VSCA 181; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585). As stated in 7.5.12 Obtaining property by deception, it is likely that the substantial risk test understates the relevant mens rea, and so it is not used in this Charge Book.

Victorian offences – Instruments of crime

24. Crimes Act 1958 s 195A contains three offences where a person deals with property that will become an instrument of crime.

25. As with the offences in Crimes Act 1958 s 194, the offences have the same physical elements and different fault elements.

26. The elements are:

    i) That the accused dealt with the property

    ii) That the property subsequently becomes an instrument of crime

    iii) The accused had the relevant fault element.

27. The fault elements differ depending on which offence is charged. The different available fault elements are that the accused:

    i) Intends that the property will become an instrument of crime (Crimes Act 1958 s 194A(1))

    ii) Is reckless as to whether or not the property will become an instrument of crime (Crimes Act 1958 s 195A(2))

    iii) Is negligent as to whether or not the property will become an instrument of crime (Crimes Act 1958 s 195A(3)).

28. The physical elements of property and dealing with property are the same as for the offences in Crimes Act 1958 s 194, described above.

29. Instrument of crime is defined as > property that is used in the commission of, or used to facilitate the commission of—

>
> (a) an offence referred to in Schedule 1 to the Confiscation Act 1997; or
>
> (b) an offence against a law of the Commonwealth that may be dealt with as an indictable offence (even if it may, in some circumstances, be dealt with as a summary offence); or
>
> (c) an offence against a law of another State, a Territory or a country outside Australia that would have constituted an offence referred to in paragraph (a) if it had been committed in Victoria (Crimes Act 1958 s 193).

30. As noted above, Schedule 1 of the Confiscation Act 1997 contains an extensive list of offences which permit forfeiture on court order. The first item on the list is "an indictable offence against the law of Victoria".

31. In Milne v The Queen, the High Court provided the following guidance on the words "use" and "facilitate", for the purpose of the equivalent definition in the Criminal Code:

> An ordinary meaning of the verb "use" is "[t]o make use of (some immaterial thing) as a means or instrument; to employ for a certain end or purpose." That is the relevant ordinary meaning for the definition of "become an instrument of crime" which involves the "use" of property to serve a purpose, namely the "commission of an offence" or "to facilitate the commission of an offence". The relevant ordinary meaning of "facilitate" in this case is "[t]o render easier the performance of (an action), the attainment of (a result); to afford facilities for, promote, help forward (an action or process)." (Milne v The Queen (2014) 252 CLR 149, [33]).

32. The distinguishing difference between the offences in Crimes Act 1958 ss 194 and 195A are that the s 194 offences concern property where an indictable offence has already been committed, whereas the s 195A offences involve an indictable offence that is contemplated in the future (Ansari v The Queen (2007) 70 NSWLR 89, [15]; Milne v The Queen (2014) 252 CLR 149, [9]).

33. The dichotomy between past and future offences means that provisions like Crimes Act 1958 s 195A cannot apply where it is the dealing with the property itself that makes the property an instrument of crime. In other words, the offence does not apply to using property as an instrument of crime (see, e.g., Chen v DPP (2011) 83 NSWLR 224, where Basten and Garling JJ (Simpson J contra) held that the prosecution erroneously sought to use the accused's transfer of money as both a breach of the prohibition on structured transactions in Foreign Transactions Reports Act 1988 s 31 and as a dealing with property intending it become an instrument of crime contrary to Criminal Code s 400.5).

34. There must be a temporal separation between the relevant dealing and the intended use of the property, along with an instrumental connection between the intended use of the property and the future commission or facilitation of the commission of an offence. An instrumental connection is not established merely by the dealing being a necessary condition for the subsequent offending, or by taking advantage of circumstances arising after the relevant dealing (Milne v The Queen (2014) 252 CLR 149, [37]; Cheng v The Queen (2017) 94 NSWLR 72, [44];).

35. However, this need for a temporal separation between the dealing and the future offending can be achieved where the prosecution particularises their case by reference to an earlier dealing, such as possession of money, intending to use the money in the future offending (see Cheng v The Queen (2017) 94 NSWLR 72, [30]-[35], which distinguished Chen v DPP on the basis that the relevant conduct in Chen was the remission of money overseas, whereas the conduct in Cheng was the possession of money. See also Chen v The Queen [2014] HCATrans 140).

Commonwealth offences

36. Division 400 of the Criminal Code contains 43 separate money laundering offences. The offences vary depending on:
    - The value of the property, with separate groups of offences for property valued at over:
        - $10,000,000
        - $1,000,000
        - $100,000
        - $50,000
        - $10,000, and
        - $1,000
    - The accused's state of mind, with separate offences for
        - Intention
        - Knowledge
        - Recklessness
        - Negligence

        - Dealing with property where it is reasonable to suspect the property is proceeds of crime
    - The accused's conduct, with separate offences for:
        - Dealing with property
        - Concealing or disguising the property
    - The number of occasions, with separate offences for:
        - Conduct on a single occasion
        - Conduct on 2 or more occasions

37. Due to the vast array of possibilities, it is not practical to consider every offence within Division 400 in this Charge Book. Instead, the remainder of this commentary will consider only the offences in Criminal Code s 400.9, dealing with property reasonably suspected of being the proceeds of crime.

38. The four offences in s 400.9 contain the following four elements:

    i) The accused deals with money or other property;

    ii) The accused intended to deal with the money or property;

    iii) It is reasonable to suspect that the money or property is the proceeds of indictable crime

    iv) At the time of the dealing, the value of the money or property is of the relevant amount.

Dealing with property

39. Section 400.2 of the Criminal Code is titled "Definition of deals with money or other property". The section covers two forms of dealing – personal dealing, and third party dealing.

40. Personal dealing is where a person:

    (a) receives, possesses, conceals or disposes of money or other property;

    (b) imports money or other property into Australia;

    (c) exports money or other property from Australia;

    (d) engages in a banking transaction relating to money or other property (Criminal Code s 400.2(1)).

41. A person is also deemed to have dealt with money or other property (third party dealing) if:

    (a) a person (the first person) engages in conduct; and

    (b) the first person's conduct causes another person to deal with money or other property (within the meaning of subsection (1)); and

    (c) the first person is reckless as to whether the first person's conduct causes the other person to deal with the money or property (Criminal Code s 400.2(2)).

42. A person causes another person to deal with money or other property if they substantially contribute to the other person dealing with the money or property within the meaning of personal dealing (Criminal Code s 400.2(4)).

43. For the purpose of third party dealing, it does not matter if the identity of the third party cannot be established (Criminal Code ss 400.2(3), (5)).

Intention

44. Dealing with money or other property is a physical element consisting of conduct.

45. The default fault element of intention therefore applies to that element (Criminal Code s 5.6(1)).

46. Intention with respect to conduct requires proof that the person meant to engage in the conduct (Criminal Code s 5.2(1)).

47. As noted above, the definition of dealing includes where a person receives money or other property. A person will not intentionally receive money (or the chose in action arising from the money) where money is deposited in the person's account without the person's knowledge (see Commissioner of Australian Federal Police v Fitzroy All Pty Ltd (2015) 299 FLR 439, [74]-[79]).

Reasonable to suspect that the property is the proceeds of indictable crime

48. The third element of the offence is that it is reasonable to suspect that the property is proceeds of indictable crime.

49. Criminal Code s 400.1 defines proceeds of indictable crime as:

> (a) any money or other property that is wholly or partly derived or realised, directly or indirectly, by any person from the commission of a particular offence against a law of the Commonwealth, a State, a Territory or a foreign country that may be dealt with as an indictable offence (even if it may, in some circumstances, be dealt with as a summary offence); or
>
> (b) any money or other property that is wholly or partly derived or realised, directly or indirectly, by any person from the commission of an offence of a particular kind against a law of the Commonwealth, a State, a Territory or a foreign country that may be dealt with as an indictable offence (even if an offence of that kind may, in some circumstances, be dealt with as a summary offence).

50. A suspicion has been described as a state of conjecture or surmise when proof is lacking, and which is less than a belief (George v Rockett (1990) 170 CLR 104, 115, quoting Hussien v Chong Fook Kam (1970) AC 942, 948), or a positive feeling of apprehension amounting to a slight opinion but without sufficient evidence which is more than a mere idle wondering (Queensland Bacon Pty Ltd v Rees (1966) 115 CLR 266, [303]).

51. A suspicion need only be a reasonable hypothesis in the circumstances. It may be one of several hypotheses available on the evidence – the availability of other hypotheses does not necessarily prevent the jury from finding that it is reasonable to suspect that the property is the proceeds of crime (R v Tween [1965] VR 687, 693 (Sholl J); DPP v Pastras (2005) 11 VR 449, [31]).

52. As with the Victorian offence outlined offence, the offence which the property is derived or realised from is called the predicate offence.

53. Criminal Code s 400.9(2) lists circumstances in which "it is taken to be reasonable to suspect that money or other property is proceeds of indictable crime". These circumstances expand the operation of the substantive offence provision, as paragraphs (a), (aa), (b), (ba), (d) and (da) do not involve indictable offences from which the subject property is derived or realised, and so would not otherwise constitute proceeds of crime (Lin v The Queen [2015] NSWCCA 204, [23]-[24]; c.f. Commissioner of Australian Federal Police v Fitzroy All Pty Ltd (2015) 299 FLR 439, [54]-[62]).

54. The circumstance listed in Criminal Code s 400.9(2)(b) is that "the value of the money and property involved in the conduct is, in the opinion of the trier of fact, grossly out of proportion to the defendant's income and expenditure over a reasonable period within which the conduct occurs". In Commissioner of Australian Federal Police v Nguyen, Fagan J held that, for this purpose, income covered "receipts derived from personal exertion, from the conduct of a business, from investments and the like" but did not include "capital receipts (such as the proceeds of sale of assets) or other inflows of funds (such as gifts)" ([2016] NSWSC 883, [25], [28]).

55. Where the prosecution relies on Criminal Code s 400.9(2), it is not necessary to identify a predicate offence. Instead, the question for the purpose of the third element will be whether the prosecution has proved a dealing with the property which meets the relevant paragraph of subsection (2). The prosecution can therefore particularise the third element by reference to the relevant paragraphs of subsection (2) (Lin v The Queen [2015] NSWCCA 204, [26]. See also Xue v The Queen [2021] NSWCCA 270 at [183]-[186]; Harper v DPP [2021] VSCA 173).

56. It has been left open whether the prosecution must identify a particular predicate offence when it does not rely on Criminal Code s 400.9(2) or whether it is sufficient to establish the basis on which it is suspected that the relevant money is derived from an offence of the kind referred to in the definition of 'proceeds of crime' as distinct from some other lawful enterprise (Harper v DPP [2021] VSCA 173, [38]-[40]. See also DPP v Ngo (2012) 272 FLR 246, [40]). However, it has been held in relation to similar New South Wales provisions that the existence of a defence equivalent to s 400.9(5) is inconsistent with any obligation on the prosecution to particularise the type of offence (see R v Ferguson [2021] NSWDC 226, [26]).

57. It is not necessary to show that the property is, in fact, proceeds of crime (see, eg. DPP v Marell [2005] VSC 430, [24]-[25], [38]; Arora v Cobern (2015) 257 A Crim R 163, [66]).

58. The jury may consider all available and admissible evidence in deciding whether it is reasonable to suspect that the property is proceeds of crime, regardless of whether the evidence existed or was known at the time of the accused's dealing with the property, or came to light after that time (Singh v The Queen [2016] VSCA 163, [52]).

59. Evidence that the property was, in fact, proceeds of crime is relevant and admissible to prove that it is reasonable to suspect the property is proceeds of crime (R v Buckett (1985) 132 ALR 669, 685).

60. The test for this third element is objective and impersonal. The jury does not consider whether a reasonable person in the accused's position would have suspected that the property was proceeds of crime. Similarly, the prosecution does not need to show that an arresting police officer reasonably suspected the property was proceeds of crime (see Singh v The Queen [2016] VSCA 163, [52]-[53]; DPP v Pastras (2005) 11 VR 449, [23]; Ex parte Patmoy; Re Jack (1944) 44 SR (NSW) 351, 356; R v Buckett (1995) 132 ALR 669, 675).

61. Instead, the question is whether the jury holds a reasonable suspicion that the property is the proceeds of crime (DPP v Pastras (2005) 11 VR 449, [23]-[25]; R v Zotti (2002) 82 SASR 554, [6], [40], [127]; DPP v Brown (1994) 72 A Crim R 527, 538; R v Buckett (1995) 132 ALR 669, 675; Anderson v Judges of the District Court of New South Wales (1992) 27 NSWLR 701, 714).

62. One consequence of the fact that the element concerns the jury's own reasonable suspicion is that it is not apt to speak of the reasonableness of the suspicion being proved beyond reasonable doubt. Instead, the question is whether the facts which have been proved beyond reasonable doubt give rise to the reasonable suspicion. The reasonableness of a suspicion is a matter for opinion or judgment and not proof (R v Zotti (2002) 82 SASR 554, [6], [46]-[48], [133], [154] (c.f. [54]-[67]); Tepper v Kelly (1987) 45 SASR 340, 343; Tepper v Kelly (1988) 47 SASR 271, 273*; c.f. R v Buckett* (1985) 132 ALR 669, 687; Ex parte Patmoy; Re Jack (1944) 44 SR (NSW) 351, 356).

63. This also means that there does not need to be contemporaneity between the accused's dealing with the property and the existence of the state of affairs where it is reasonable to suspect that the property is the proceeds of crime (see Singh v The Queen [2016] VSCA 163, [51]; DPP v Pastras (2005) 11 VR 449; R v Zotti (2002) 82 SASR 554, [40], [127]-[128]).

Defendant's suspicion of the nature of the property

64. Absolute liability applies to the third element, and so there is no associated fault element (Criminal Code s 400.9(4)).

65. However, the section does not apply if the defendant proves that they had no reasonable grounds for suspecting that the money or property was "derived or realised, directly or indirectly, from some form of unlawful activity" (Criminal Code s 400.9(5)).

66. The accused bears a legal onus to establish this defence on the balance of probabilities (Criminal Code ss 13.4, 13.5).

67. The exact meaning of this provision does not appear to have been considered by an appellate court.

68. When commenting on the test for an exclusion order under the Confiscation Act 1997 s 52(1)(a)(iii), which requires that the person acquire an interest in property "without knowing, and in circumstances such as not to arouse a reasonable suspicion", the Court of Appeal noted that the test was objective, but assessed by reference to the accused's circumstances. Therefore, the test is not met if a reasonable person in the accused's position would have formed a suspicion (see DPP v Le (2007) 15 VR 352, [23]-[25]).

69. It is suggested that this test reflects the appropriate balance struck between the language of Criminal Code s 400.9(5) ("no reasonable grounds for suspecting") with the structure of the offence provision, where the property itself must be reasonably suspected of being the proceeds of crime on an objective and impersonal basis.

Value of the property

70. The fourth element of the offences in s 400.9 is that, at the time of the dealing, the value of the property is of the relevant amount.

71. Section 400.9 contains four separate offences, with different value thresholds. These thresholds are:

    - The value of the property is $10,000,000 or more – s 400.9(1AA)
    - The value of the property is $1,000,000 or more – s 400.9(1AB)
    - The value of the property is $100,000 or more – s 400.9(1)
    - The value of the property is less than $100,000 – s 400.9(1A)

72. While absolute liability applies to this element and so there is no associated fault element (Criminal Code s 400.9(4)), a mistake of fact defence is available if the accused thought the value of the property was a lower amount (Criminal Code s 400.10).

73. The accused bears an evidentiary onus of raising the mistake of fact defence. Once the defence is raised, the prosecution bears the legal onus of disproving the relevant mistake of fact (Criminal Code s 400.10(1); Singh v The Queen [2016] VSCA 163, [69]).

74. The mistake of fact defence has three components:

(a) at or before the time of dealing with the money or property, the person considered what was the value of the money or property, and was under a mistaken but reasonable belief about that value; and

(aa) in a case where the dealing continued during a period—the person had that belief throughout that period; and

(b) had the value been what the person believed it to be, the person's conduct would have constituted another offence against this Division for which the maximum penalty, in penalty units, is less than the maximum penalty, in penalty units, for the offence charged.

75. Paragraph (aa) was introduced by clause 70 of Schedule 1 of the Crimes Legislation Amendment (Economic Disruption) Act 2021. According to the Explanatory Memorandum, this was designed to reverse the effect of Singh v The Queen [2016] VSCA 163, which had held that where the prosecution relied on receiving and continuing to possess property, then it was sufficient to engage the defence if the accused held the mistaken belief before receiving the goods, even if the accused later learnt the true value of the goods (see Explanatory Memorandum, Crimes Legislation Amendment (Economic Disruption) Bill 2020, [16] and compare Singh v The Queen [2016] VSCA 163, [102]-[104]).

76. It is likely that where the accused establishes the mistake of fact defence, the jury will then need to consider whether to convict the accused by reference to the lower amount. See Alternative Verdicts, below.

Alternative Verdicts

77. Criminal Code s 400.14 states:

If, on a trial for an offence against a provision of this Division (the offence charged), the trier of fact:

(a) is not satisfied that the defendant is guilty of the offence charged; but

(b) is otherwise satisfied that the defendant is guilty of another offence against this Division for which the maximum penalty, in penalty units, is less than the maximum penalty, in penalty units, for the offence charged;

the trier of fact may find the defendant not guilty of the offence charged but guilty of the other offence, so long as the person has been accorded procedural fairness in relation to that finding of guilt.

78. The effect of this provision is that all offences within Division 400 are statutory alternatives to one another, and the jury may return a verdict on any of these statutory alternatives provided:

- The maximum penalty for the alternative offence is less than the maximum penalty for the charged offence
- The accused has been accorded procedural fairness in relation to that statutory alternative.

Last updated: 17 April 2024

7.5.22.1 Charge: Dealing with proceeds of crime intending to conceal

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

I must now direct you about the crime of knowingly dealing with proceeds of crime with intention to conceal. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – That the accused dealt with the property.

Two – That the property was proceeds of crime.

Three – That the accused knew the property was proceeds of crime.

Four – That the accused and intended to conceal that the property was proceeds of crime.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Dealing with property

The first element is that the accused dealt with property.

For this charge, the property in question is [identify relevant property].

In this case, the prosecution says that NOA dealt with the [identify relevant property] by [receiving / possessing / concealing / disposing of] it.

[If possession is in issue, add the following shaded section]

A person possesses property if they have control over the property and they intend to exercise control over the property to exclude anyone else [who did not jointly possess the property]. A person can have control over something even when they are not personally carrying it. For example, a person has possession of something if they have placed it where they have the power/right to take it when they wish.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments]

Proceeds of crime

The second element is that the property is proceeds of crime.

The law defines proceeds of crime, for the purpose of this case, as property that is derived or realised, directly or indirectly, from the commission of an offence in Victoria.[1059]

The words "derived or realised" effectively mean "obtained". In other words, did the accused obtain the property, directly or indirectly, from the commission of an offence. To give you a couple of simple examples, if someone stole a painting, the painting would be proceeds of the crime of theft. If they then sold the painting, the money they received for the sale would also be proceeds of the original crime of theft. And if a person was paid to unlawfully attack someone, the money they received for the attack would be proceeds of crime.

The prosecution argues that the [identify relevant property] was the proceeds of [identify relevant crime].

The prosecution does not need to prove a specific crime, in terms of who committed it, when it was committed and where it was committed. But they do need to prove that property is from a specified offence.

[1059] This direction must be modified if the prosecution relies on paragraphs (b) or (c) of the definition of proceeds of crime.

To give you an example, suppose someone broke into several homes and took money to pay for a drug addiction. The prosecution would not need to prove which money came from which house. But they would need to prove beyond reasonable doubt that it came from breaking into homes, and not from any other type of offending, such as drug trafficking.[1060]

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments]

Knowledge that the property was proceeds of crime

The third element the prosecution must prove is that the accused knew that the property was proceeds of crime.

This element looks at NOA's state of mind.

The prosecution must prove that NOA knew the property was obtained from a criminal offence. There is an important difference between this and the second element. As I have just explained, the second element requires you to decide if the prosecution has proved that the property was, in fact, proceeds of crime. The third element requires the prosecution to prove that NOA knew it was proceeds of crime.

Intention to conceal

The fourth element the prosecution must prove is that the accused intended to conceal that the property was proceeds of crime.

This element looks at how and why NOA dealt with the property. The prosecution must prove that a dominant purpose of NOA [identify act of dealing] was to conceal that it came from [identify relevant alleged offence].

[Identify evidence and arguments].

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of knowingly dealing with proceeds of crime with intention to conceal, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA dealt with property;

Two – That the property is proceeds of crime

Three – That NOA knew the property was proceeds of crime and Four – That NOA dealt with the property intending to conceal that it was proceeds of crime.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of knowingly dealing with proceeds of crime with intention to conceal.

Last updated: 17 April 2024

7.5.22.2 Charge: Knowingly Dealing with proceeds of crime

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

I must now direct you about the crime of knowingly dealing with proceeds of crime. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – That the accused dealt with the property.

[1060] This example may need to be modified depending on the issues in the case.

Two – That the property was proceeds of crime.

Three – That the accused knew the property was proceeds of crime.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Dealing with property

The first element is that the accused dealt with property.

For this charge, the property in question is [identify relevant property].

In this case, the prosecution says that NOA dealt with the [identify relevant property] by [receiving / possessing / concealing / disposing of] it.

[If possession is in issue, add the following shaded section]

A person possesses property if they have control over the property and they intend to exercise control over the property to exclude anyone else [who did not jointly possess the property]. A person can have control over something even when they are not personally carrying it. For example, a person has possession of something if they have placed it where they have the power/right to take it when they wish.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments]

Proceeds of crime

The second element is that the property was proceeds of crime.

The law defines proceeds of crime, for the purpose of this case, as property that is derived or realised, directly or indirectly, from the commission of an offence in Victoria.[1061]

The words "derived or realised" effectively mean "obtained". In other words, did the accused obtain the property, directly or indirectly, from the commission of an offence. To give you a couple of simple examples, if someone stole a painting, the painting would be proceeds of the crime of theft. If they then sold the painting, the money they received for the sale would also be proceeds of the original crime of theft. And if a person was paid to unlawfully attack someone, the money they received for the attack would be proceeds of crime.

The prosecution argues that the [identify relevant property] was the proceeds of [identify relevant crime].

The prosecution does not need to prove a specific crime, in terms of who committed it, when it was committed and where it was committed. But they do need to prove that property is from a specified offence.

To give you an example, suppose someone broke into several homes and took money to pay for a drug addiction. The prosecution would not need to prove which money came from which house. But they would need to prove beyond reasonable doubt that it came from breaking into homes, and not from any other type of offending, such as drug trafficking.[1062]

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments]

[1061] This direction must be modified if the prosecution relies on paragraphs (b) or (c) of the definition of proceeds of crime.

[1062] This example may need to be modified depending on the issues in the case.

Knowledge

The third element the prosecution must prove is that the accused knew that the property was proceeds of crime.

This element looks at NOA's state of mind. Did they know the property was proceeds of crime?

There is an important difference between this and the second element. As I have just explained, the second element requires you to decide if the prosecution has proved that the property was, in fact, proceeds of crime. The third element requires the prosecution to prove that NOA knew it was proceeds of crime.

[Identify evidence and arguments].

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of knowingly dealing with proceeds of crime, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA dealt with property.

Two – That the property was proceeds of crime.

Three – That NOA knew the property was proceeds of crime.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of knowingly dealing with proceeds of crime.

Last updated: 17 April 2024

7.5.22.3 Charge: Recklessly Dealing with proceeds of crime

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

I must now direct you about the crime of recklessly dealing with proceeds of crime. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – That the accused dealt with the property.

Two – That the property was proceeds of crime.

Three – That the accused was reckless as to whether the property was proceeds of crime.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Dealing with property

The first element is that the accused dealt with property.

For this charge, the property in question is [identify relevant property].

In this case, the prosecution says that NOA dealt with the [identify relevant property] by [receiving / possessing / concealing / disposing of] it.

[If possession is in issue, add the following shaded section]

A person possesses property if they have control over the property and they intend to exercise control over the property to exclude anyone else [who did not jointly possess the property]. A person can have control over something even when they are not personally carrying it. For example, a person has possession of something if they have placed it where they have the power/right to take it when they wish.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments]

Proceeds of crime

The second element is that the property was proceeds of crime.

The law defines proceeds of crime, for the purpose of this case, as property that is derived or realised, directly or indirectly, from the commission of an offence in Victoria.[1063]

The words "derived or realised" effectively mean "obtained". In other words, did the accused obtain the property, directly or indirectly, from the commission of an offence. To give you a couple of simple examples, if someone stole a painting, the painting would be proceeds of the crime of theft. If they then sold the painting, the money they received for the sale would also be proceeds of the original crime of theft. And if a person was paid to unlawfully attack someone, the money they received for the attack would be proceeds of crime.

The prosecution argues that the [identify relevant property] was the proceeds of [identify relevant crime].

The prosecution does not need to prove a specific crime, in terms of who committed it, when it was committed and where it was committed. But they do need to prove that property is from a specified offence.

To give you an example, suppose someone had broken into several homes and taken money to pay for a drug addiction. The prosecution does not need to prove which money came from which house. But they would need to prove beyond reasonable doubt that it came from breaking into homes, and not from any other type of offending, such as drug trafficking.[1064]

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments]

Recklessness

The third element the prosecution must prove is that the accused was reckless as to whether the property was proceeds of crime.

This element looks at NOA's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that they knew the property was probably proceeds of crime. It is not enough that NOA thought that the property was possibly proceeds of crime or might have been proceeds of crime. The prosecution must prove that NOA thought it was probable that the property was proceeds of crime. That is what it means to be reckless for this offence.

There is an important difference between this and the second element. As I have just explained, the second element requires you to decide if the prosecution has proved that the property was, in fact, proceeds of crime. The third element requires the prosecution to prove that NOA knew it was probably proceeds of crime.

[Identify evidence and arguments].

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of recklessly dealing with proceeds of crime, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA dealt with property.

Two – That the property was proceeds of crime.

[1063] This direction must be modified if the prosecution relies on paragraphs (b) or (c) of the definition of proceeds of crime.

[1064] This example may need to be modified depending on the issues in the case.

Three – That NOA knew the property was probably proceeds of crime.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of recklessly dealing with proceeds of crime.

Last updated: 17 April 2024

7.5.22.4 Charge: Negligently dealing with proceeds of crime

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

I must now direct you about the crime of negligently dealing with proceeds of crime. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – That the accused dealt with the property.

Two – That the property was proceeds of crime.

Three – That the accused was negligent as to whether the property was proceeds of crime.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Dealing with property

The first element is that the accused dealt with property.

For this charge, the property in question is [identify relevant property].

In this case, the prosecution says that NOA dealt with the [identify relevant property] by [receiving / possessing / concealing / disposing of] it.

[If possession is in issue, add the following shaded section]

A person possesses property if they have control over the property and they intend to exercise control over the property to exclude anyone else [who did not jointly possess the property]. A person can have control over something even when they are not personally carrying it. For example, a person has possession of something if they have placed it where they have the power/right to take it when they wish.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments]

Proceeds of crime

The second element is that the property was proceeds of crime.

The law defines proceeds of crime, for the purpose of this case, as property that is derived or realised, directly or indirectly, from the commission of an offence in Victoria.[1065]

The words "derived or realised" effectively mean "obtained". In other words, did the accused obtain the property, directly or indirectly, from the commission of an offence. To give you a couple of simple examples, if someone stole a painting, the painting would be proceeds of the crime of theft. If they then sold the painting, the money they received for the sale would also be proceeds of the original crime of theft. And if a person was paid to unlawfully attack someone, the money they received for the attack would be proceeds of crime.

The prosecution argues that the [identify relevant property] was the proceeds of [identify relevant crime].

[1065] This direction must be modified if the prosecution relies on paragraphs (b) or (c) of the definition of proceeds of crime.

The prosecution does not need to prove a specific crime, in terms of who committed it, when it was committed and where it was committed. But they do need to prove that property is from a specified offence.

To give you an example, suppose someone broke into several homes and took money to pay for a drug addiction. The prosecution would not need to prove which money came from which house. But they would need to prove beyond reasonable doubt that it came from breaking into homes, and not from any other type of offending, such as drug trafficking.[1066]

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments]

Negligence

The third element the prosecution must prove is that the accused was negligent as to whether the property was proceeds of crime.

This element looks at whether NOA took sufficient care to avoid dealing with property that was proceeds of crime.

The prosecution will prove that NOA was negligent for the purpose of this offence if they prove that NOA's actions to avoid dealing with property that was proceeds of crime fell far short of what a reasonable person would have done and involved a high risk of dealing with proceeds of crime.

This is an objective test. The prosecution does not need to show that NOA knew the property was proceeds of crime, or realised there was a risk that the property was proceeds of crime. What matters is what a reasonable person in NOA's position would have done. The prosecution must prove that a reasonable person in NOA's position would have realised there was a high risk that the property was proceeds of crime.

There is an important difference between this and the second element. As I have just explained, the second element requires you to decide if the prosecution has proved that the property was, in fact, proceeds of crime. The third element requires the prosecution to prove that a reasonable person in NOA's position would have realised there was a high risk that the property was proceeds of crime.

[Identify evidence and arguments].

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of negligently dealing with proceeds of crime, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA dealt with property.

Two – That the property was proceeds of crime.

Three – That a reasonable person in NOA's position would have realised there was a high risk that the property was proceeds of crime.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of negligently dealing with proceeds of crime.

Last updated: 17 April 2024

7.5.22.5 Charge: Intentionally dealing with an instrument of crime

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

[1066] This example may need to be modified depending on the issues in the case.

I must now direct you about the crime of intentionally dealing with property that becomes an instrument of crime. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – That the accused dealt with the property.

Two – That the accused intended that the property become an instrument of crime.

Three – The property subsequently becomes an instrument of crime.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Dealing with property

The first element is that the accused dealt with property.

For this charge, the property in question is [identify relevant property].

In this case, the prosecution says that NOA dealt with the [identify relevant property] by [receiving / possessing / concealing / disposing of] it.

[If possession is in issue, add the following shaded section]

A person possesses property if they have control over the property and they intend to exercise control over the property to exclude anyone else [who did not jointly possess the property]. A person can have control over something even when they are not personally carrying it. For example, a person has possession of something if they have placed it where they have the power/right to take it when they wish.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments]

Intention that property become an instrument of crime

The second element is that the accused intended that the property become an instrument of crime.

The law defines instrument of crime, for the purpose of this case, as property that is used in the commission of, or used to facilitate, an offence in Victoria.[1067]

To give you a simple example, the gun or knife used in an armed robbery is an instrument of crime.

[If it is necessary to explain the need for temporal separation, add the following shaded section]

There must be a separation in time between the accused dealing with the property and the later offence. For instance, if someone steals a painting, they do not take possession of the painting with the intention of it becoming an instrument of the crime of theft. But if they stole it, intending to insure it and destroy it, then it might be instrument of crime for the insurance fraud offence.

[1067] This direction must be modified if the prosecution relies on paragraphs (b) or (c) of the definition of proceeds of crime.

The accused must intend that the property be used in or used to facilitate the offence. You must look at the nature of the connection between the property and the later offence to decide if it was intended to be used. It is not enough that the person takes advantage of a situation that arises after they have dealt with the property.[1068]

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments]

Instrument of crime

The third element the prosecution must prove is that the property subsequently becomes an instrument of crime.

There is an important difference between this and the second element. As I have just explained, the second element requires you to decide if the accused intended that the property become an instrument of crime. This third element looks at whether that, in fact, happened. That is, has the prosecution proved that the property, in fact, was used in the commission of, or used to facilitate, an offence in Victoria.

[Identify evidence and arguments].

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of intentionally dealing with property that becomes an instrument of crime, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA dealt with the property.

Two – That NOA intended that the property become an instrument of crime.

Three – The property subsequently became an instrument of crime.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of intentionally dealing with property that becomes an instrument of crime.

Last updated: 17 April 2024

7.5.22.6 Charge: Dealing with property reasonably suspected of being proceeds of crime (Commonwealth)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

I must now direct you about the crime of dealing with property worth at least [identify relevant amount] which is reasonably suspected of being proceeds of crime. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – That the accused dealt with the property.

Two – The accused intended to deal with the property.

Three – It is reasonable to suspect the property is the proceeds of crime.

Four – The property was worth at least [identify relevant amount].

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

[1068] Add the following example, if appropriate: "Let me give you an example. Suppose I sold shares, intending not to declare any capital gain I made on the shares. In that situation, I have not used the shares to commit tax evasion. Instead, I have taken advantage of a situation that arose after I disposed of the shares".

Dealing with property

The first element is that the accused dealt with property.

For this charge, the property in question is [identify relevant property].

In this case, the prosecution says that NOA dealt with the [identify relevant property] by [receiving / possessing / concealing / disposing of / importing / exporting / engaging in a banking transaction in relation to] it.

[If possession is in issue, add the following shaded section]

A person possesses property if they have control over the property and they intend to exercise control over the property to exclude anyone else [who did not jointly possess the property]. A person can have control over something even when they are not personally carrying it. For example, a person has possession of something if they have placed it where they have the power/right to take it when they wish.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments]

Intention

The second element is that the accused intended to deal with the property.

This means the prosecution must prove that the accused meant to [receive / possess / conceal / dispose of / import / export / engage in a banking transaction in relation to] it.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments}.

Reasonably suspected of being proceeds of crime

The third element is that the property is reasonably suspected of being the proceeds of crime.

For this element, you the jury must decide whether you reasonably suspect that the property is proceeds of crime.

Property is proceeds of crime if it is wholly or partly, derived or realised, directly or indirectly, from the commission of a particular offence, or an offence of a particular kind, against a law of Australia, or an Australian State or Territory.[1069]

The words "derived or realised" effectively mean "obtained". In other words, did the accused obtain the property, directly or indirectly, from the commission of an offence. To give you a couple of simple examples, if someone stole a painting, the painting would be proceeds of the crime of theft. If they then sold the painting, the money they received for the sale would also be proceeds of the original crime of theft. And if a person was paid to unlawfully attack someone, the money they received for the attack would be proceeds of crime.

The prosecution does not need to prove that the property is proceeds of crime. Only that facts exist which lead you as a jury to reasonably suspect that it is.

I told you at the start of the trial that beyond reasonable doubt is the highest standard known to the law, and that it is not enough that the accused is probably or very likely to be guilty. Those directions require some adjustment in relation to this element, and only this element.

[1069] This direction must be modified if the prosecution relies on the commission of an offence in a foreign country.

Here, the fact you need to decide is whether you have a reasonable suspicion that the property is proceeds of crime. A suspicion is a state of conjecture where proof is lacking.

It is enough that you are satisfied that it is a reasonable possibility that the property is proceeds of crime. I told you at the start of the trial that a reasonable doubt is not an imaginary or fanciful doubt or an unrealistic possibility. Equally, a reasonable possibility is not an imaginary or fanciful possibility, or something that is unrealistic.

When you are considering this element, you look at all the evidence that has been presented. You are not limited to the information that was available to NOA at the time he/she/they dealt with the property. For this element, you do not need to think about what NOA knew or should have known.

Instead, the question is this. On the basis of the evidence you accept, do you as reasonable jurors, suspect that the property is the proceeds of crime?

[If the prosecution relies on Criminal Code s 400.9(2), add the following shaded section]

There are certain circumstances which the law recognises as being ones where it is reasonable to suspect that property is the proceeds of crime.[1070] In this case, the relevant circumstance is:

[If the prosecution relies on Criminal Code s 400.9(2)(a) or (aa), add the following darker shaded section]

The money was used in structured transactions. Let me explain what I mean by structured transactions. In Australia, banks and other financial services must report transactions over $10,000 to an agency called AUSTRAC, the Australian Transaction Reports and Analysis Centre. It is a crime to be a party to 2 or more transactions under $10,000 where it is reasonable to conclude that the transactions were structured in that way for the sole or dominant purpose of attempting to ensure the transactions would not be reported to AUSTRAC. In deciding whether it is reasonable to conclude that the transactions were improperly structured, you must take into account how the transactions were conducted and any explanation by the person involved. You also must consider the value of money in each transaction, the total value of the transactions, the period of time over which the transactions took place, the interval between the transactions and the locations of the various transactions. The prosecution says that [identify relevant money] was used in structured transactions.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments]

If you are satisfied that the money was used in structured transactions, then the prosecution has proved the third element.

[If the prosecution relies on Criminal Code s 400.9(2)(b), add the following darker shaded section]

The conduct involved using accounts held with authorised deposit-taking institutions in false names. In this case, you have heard evidence that [identify relevant ADI] is an authorised-deposit taking institution. Therefore, if you are satisfied that NOA dealt with money using accounts held at [identify relevant ADI] in a false name, then the prosecution has proved the third element.

[1070] As explained in Lin v The Queen [2015] NSWCCA 204 at [23]-[24], it may not be strictly correct to say that s 400.9(2) circumstances are ones where it is reasonable to suspect that the property is the proceeds of crime, as some of the s 400.9(2) circumstances do not involve the money being derived or realised from an indictable offence. However, as the Criminal Code makes clear, proof of a s 400.9(2) circumstance is sufficient to prove the third element. If the judge thinks it is necessary to make this point to the jury, then it is suggested that the directions should be written so that the third element does not refer to the prosecution proving that "it is reasonable to suspect the property is the proceeds of crime". Instead, the third element may be described as "the accused dealt with the property in prohibited circumstances" and the prohibited circumstances are either "it is reasonable to suspect the property is proceeds of crime" or the conduct met one of the s 400.9(2) circumstances.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments]

[If the prosecution relies on Criminal Code s 400.9(2)(ba) – breach of s 139, add the following darker shaded section]

The accused allowed a customer to receive a designated service [in a false name / anonymously]. Australian law requires that people who provide [identify relevant designated service] must establish the identity of the customer and must record that name correctly. It is an offence to provide [identify relevant designated service] and [record a false customer name / provide the service on the basis of customer anonymity]. The prosecution says that NOA committed this offence. To prove the third element in this way, the prosecution must prove 3 matters.[1071]

First, that NOA provided [identify relevant designated service].

Second, that NOA provided [identify relevant designated service] [using a false customer name / on the basis of customer anonymity].

Third, that NOA intended to provide [identify relevant designated service] [using a false customer name / on the basis of customer anonymity].

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments].

If you are satisfied that the prosecution has proved these three matters, then the prosecution has proved this third element.

[If the prosecution relies on Criminal Code s 400.9(2)(ba) – breach of s 140, add the following darker shaded section]

The accused received a designated service [in a false name / anonymously]. Australian law requires that people who receive [identify relevant designated service] provide their name. It is an offence to receive [identify relevant designated service] [using a false customer name / on the basis of customer anonymity]. The prosecution says that NOA committed this offence. To prove the third element in this way, the prosecution must prove 3 matters.[1072]

First, that NOA received [identify relevant designated service].

Second, that NOA received [identify relevant designated service] [using a false customer name / on the basis of customer anonymity].

Third, that NOA intended to receive [identify relevant designated service] [using a false customer name / on the basis of customer anonymity].

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments].

[1071] These directions assume that the requirements of Anti-Money Laundering and Counter-Terrorism Financing Act 2006 (Cth) ss 139(1)(a) and (d) or 139(3)(a) and (d) are questions of law and are not in issue. The direction also assumes that the accused does not meet the evidentiary burden in s 139(2A) to establish that a false customer name is justified or excused by or under a law. The direction must be modified if any of these assumptions are not valid.

[1072] These directions assume that the requirements of Anti-Money Laundering and Counter-Terrorism Financing Act 2006 (Cth) ss 140(1)(c) or 140(3)(c) are questions of law and are not in issue. The direction must be modified if these assumptions are not valid.

If you are satisfied that the prosecution has proved these three matters, then the prosecution has proved this third element.

[If the prosecution relies on Criminal Code s 400.9(2)(ba) – section 141, add the following darker shaded section]

The accused receive a designated service without disclosing their other names. Australian law requires that when a person is commonly known by 2 or more names, the person must disclose all of those names when receiving [identify relevant designated service]. It is an offence to fail to provide all commonly known names when receiving [identify relevant designated service]. The prosecution says that NOA committed this offence. To prove the third element in this way, the prosecution must prove 6 matters.[1073]

First, that NOA received [identify relevant designated service].

Second, that NOA is commonly known by 2 or more different names.

Third, that NOA is aware that he is/she is/they are commonly known by 2 or more different names.[1074]

Third, NOA received [identify relevant designated service] using one of those names.

Four, NOA had not previously disclosed the other name or names to [identify relevant designed service provider].

Five, NOA knew of a substantial risk that that he/she/they had not previously disclosed the other name or names to [identify relevant designed service provider] and it was unjustifiable to take that risk in the circumstances.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments].

If you are satisfied that the prosecution has proved these five matters, then the prosecution has proved this third element.

[If the prosecution relies on Criminal Code s 400.9(2)(c), add the following darker shaded section]

The conduct involves money or property, the value of which is, in your opinion, grossly out of proportion to NOA's income and expenditure over a reasonable period within which the conduct occurs.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments]

If you are satisfied that the money or other property NOA dealt with is grossly out of proportion with his/her/their lawful income and expenditure, then the prosecution has proved the third element.

---

[1073] These directions assume that the requirements of Anti-Money Laundering and Counter-Terrorism Financing Act 2006 (Cth) s 141(1)(e) is a question of law and is not in issue. The direction also assumes that the accused does not meet the evidentiary burden in s 139(2A) to establish that a false customer name is justified or excused by or under a law. The direction must be modified if any of these assumptions are not valid.

[1074] This overstates the fault element for Anti-Money Laundering and Counter-Terrorism Financing Act 2006 s 141(1)(b), which only requires proof of recklessness (see Criminal Code ss 2.2 and 5.6(2)). If the prosecution relies on recklessness, substitute the following statement of the element: "Third, that NOA is aware of a substantial risk that he is/she is/they are commonly known by 2 or more names and in the circumstances it is unjustifiable to take that risk."

[If the prosecution relies on Criminal Code s 400.9(2)(d) or (da), add the following darker shaded section]

The accused failed to comply with his/her/their obligations in relation to significant transactions. Let me explain that. Under Australian law, people who provide [identify relevant designated service] are required to report transactions worth $10,000 or more to an agency called AUSTRAC, the Australian Transaction Reports and Analysis Centre. Here, the prosecution says that NOA [identify relevant designated service] and did not properly report that transaction to AUSTRAC. In particular, the prosecution says that NOA [identify how the accused failed their reporting obligations, either by failing to report or by giving false or misleading information].

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments]

If you are satisfied that NOA was required to report [identify relevant transaction] and he/she/they failed to do so, then the prosecution has proved the third element.

[If the prosecution relies on Criminal Code s 400.9(2)(e), add the following darker shaded section]

NOA has stated the conduct was engaged in on behalf of or at the request of another person and he has/she has/they have not provided information enabling the other person to be identified and located. The law states that if you claim to deal with money or other property on behalf of someone else but cannot provide information to allow them to be identified and located, then it is reasonable to suspect the money or other property is the proceeds of crime. In this case, the prosecution say that NOA claimed [when giving evidence/during the interview with police] to be dealing with the property on behalf of NO3P. You have also heard evidence from [identify relevant witness] that they could not locate NO3P.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments]

If you are satisfied that NOA did say that he was/she was/they were dealing with the property on behalf of NO3P, and he/she/they did not provide enough information to enable NO3P to be identified and located, then the prosecution has proved the third element.

Value of property

The fourth element is that the property was worth at least [identify relevant value].

[If the property is not cash or an account balance, add the following shaded section][1075]

As you have heard, the property is the [identify relevant property]. You heard evidence from [identify relevant witness] that this property is worth [identify relevant value]. If you accept that evidence, then you may find the property is worth at least [identify relevant value].

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments].

[If the accused raises the mistake of fact defence, add the following shaded section]

Mistake of fact concerning value of property

In this case, there is some evidence that the accused was not aware that the property was worth [1075] If the property is cash or an account balance it is likely that the element will not be in dispute, unless the accused raises the mistake of fact defence in Criminal Code s 400.10.

[identify relevant value]. Instead, there is evidence that the accused thought he was/she was/they were dealing with property which was only worth [identify lower value]. In particular, you have heard evidence that [identify relevant evidence]. The law states if an accused mistakenly and reasonably thought the value of the property was worth less than the relevant amount, then they may be convicted of a less serious offence based what they thought they were dealing with.

This means that there are three possible verdicts you can return for this charge.[1076]

The first possible verdict is not guilty of charge [number] on the indictment. You must find the accused not guilty of this charge if the prosecution fails to prove any of the four elements I have just explained.

The second possible verdict is guilty of charge [number]. You may deliver this verdict if the prosecution proves the four elements I have just explained and proves the accused did not reasonably believe he was/she was/they were dealing with the lower amount.

The third possible verdict is not guilty of charge [number], but guilty of dealing with property worth at least [identify lower amount] which is reasonably suspected of being the proceeds of crime. This charge is not listed on the indictment, but it is a verdict available to you. You may deliver this verdict if the prosecution proves the four elements I have just explained, but cannot prove the accused did not reasonably believed he was/she was/they were dealing with the lower amount.

There are three ways for the prosecution to prove that the accused did not reasonably believe they were dealing with a lower amount.

One – The accused did not think about the value of the property at the time of, or before, dealing with it. In other words, the accused must have actually thought about and believed the property was worth a particular amount. If the prosecution can prove that he/she/they did not, then you can find him/her/them guilty of the charged offence, provided the prosecution have proved all the elements.

Two – The accused's belief about the value of the property was not reasonable. A belief is reasonable if a reasonable person in the accused's position, knowing what the accused knew, could have formed the same belief. If the prosecution can prove that a reasonable person would not have thought the property was only worth [identify lower amount], then you can find the accused guilty of the charged offence, provided the prosecution have proved all the elements.

Three – The accused did not continue to believe the property was only worth [identify relevant amount] during the period he/she/they dealt with it. If the accused learned new information about the value of the property, and continued to deal with it, then the alternative verdict is not available.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments].

[If the accused has raised the defence in Criminal Code s 400.9(5), add the following shaded section]

Defence – No reasonable grounds to suspect

If the prosecution proves the four elements, there is a further issue you must decide. This final issue is called the defence of no reasonable grounds to suspect. It is different from the four elements, because it is a matter that the accused must prove. It is an exception to the usual rule that the prosecution must prove all matters in the case.

[1076] These directions are designed for the case where the lesser amount is an uncharged alternative. If the prosecution has specified the alternative as a charge on the indictment, then the directions must be modified to make clear that the charges are alternatives, and the appropriate verdict will depend on whether the elements are proved, and whether the defence of reasonable mistake is disproved.

You must find the accused not guilty if the accused proves that there were no reasonable grounds for him/her/them to suspect that the property was proceeds of crime.[1077] This defence is very similar to what the prosecution had to prove for the third element, so I will explain the differences.

In the third element, you the jury decided whether it was reasonable to suspect the property was the proceeds of crime. For this defence, you decide whether the accused has proved that they did not, and a reasonable person in their position would not, have suspected that the property was the proceeds of crime.

For this defence, you only consider what the accused knew at the time he/she/they dealt with the property. You do not take into account anything that occurred later, or which the accused did not know about. For example, if the accused proves that he/she/they did not know that [identify relevant fact], then you ignore that fact when deciding if a reasonable person in the accused's position would have suspected that the property was the proceeds of crime.

For the purpose of this defence, the accused operates under a different standard of proof to the prosecution. The prosecution must prove the elements of the case beyond reasonable doubt. For this defence, the accused is only required to prove the issue on the balance of probabilities. That is, they only need to show that it is more likely than not that there were no reasonable grounds to suspect that the property was the proceeds of crime.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of dealing with property worth at least [identify relevant amount] which is reasonably suspected of being proceeds of crime, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA dealt with the property.

Two – That NOA intended to deal with the property.

Three – It is reasonable to suspect the property is the proceeds of crime.

Four – The property was worth at least [identify relevant amount].

[If the mistake of fact defence is raised, add the following shaded section]

Further, the prosecution must prove that NOA did not reasonably believe that the property was worth at least [identify relevant amount]. Otherwise, you may only consider the alternative offence of dealing with property worth at least [identify lower amount] which is reasonably suspected of being proceeds of crime.

[If the defence in Criminal Code s 400.9(5) is raised, add the following shaded section]

Even if the prosecution has proved these four elements beyond reasonable doubt, you must find the accused not guilty if the accused proves, on the balance of probabilities, that he/she/they had no reasonable grounds to suspect that the property was the proceeds of crime.

[If the defence in Criminal Code s 400.9(5) is not raised, add the following shaded section]

[1077] In most cases, it will be sufficient to explain the defence by reference to the phrase 'proceeds of crime'. It is likely to be an exceptional case where the judge would need to draw the jury's attention to the language of s 400.9(5) ('derived or realised, directly or indirectly, from some form of unlawful activity') rather than the more familiar phrase 'proceeds of crime'.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of dealing with property worth at least [identify relevant/lower amount] which is reasonably suspected of being proceeds of crime.

Last updated: 17 April 2024

7.6 Drug Offences

7.6.1 Trafficking in a Drug of Dependence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Commencement Information

1. The Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981 (Vic) (the "Drugs Act") establishes four trafficking offences, each of which commenced operation on 1 January 2002:

    i) Section 71 – trafficking in a large commercial quantity of a drug of dependence;

    ii) Section 71AA – trafficking in a commercial quantity of a drug of dependence;

    iii) Section 71AB – trafficking in a drug of dependence to a child;

    iv) Section 71AC – trafficking in a drug of dependence.

2. Prior to 1 January 2002 there was only one trafficking provision (s 71), which contained the elements of the offence and specified different penalties depending upon the quantity trafficked. This created uncertainty about whether there was just one offence with aggravating circumstances, or a number of distinct offences (see R v Satalich (2001) 3 VR 231). One of the purposes behind the enactment of the current provisions was to make it clear that there are a number of distinct trafficking offences (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299).
3. If a trafficking offence is alleged to have been committed between dates, one date before and one date on or after 1 January 2002, then the offence is to be treated as having been committed before the commencement of the current provisions (Drugs Act s 137).

Overview of Elements

4. For each of the trafficking offences, the prosecution must prove the following elements beyond reasonable doubt:

    i) That the accused intentionally "trafficked" or "attempted to traffick" in a particular substance; and

    ii) That it was a "drug of dependence" that the accused intentionally trafficked or attempted to traffick.

5. In relation to ss 71 and 71AA, the prosecution must also prove that the accused intentionally trafficked or attempted to traffick in a quantity of drugs that was not less than a large commercial or commercial quantity respectively.
6. In relation to s 71AB, the prosecution must prove that the accused intentionally trafficked or attempted to traffick to a child.
7. Each of the trafficking provisions exclude from their scope people who are authorised or licensed to traffick in a drug of dependence.

Definitions of "Trafficking"

8. "Trafficking" is defined in s 70(1) of the Drugs Act. However, as this definition is inclusive, it is also possible to rely on the common law definition of trafficking (R v Giretti (1986) 24 A Crim R 112). Both of these definitions are addressed in turn below.

9. Each of the trafficking offences requires the prosecution to prove that the relevant act of trafficking was intentional (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300).

Section 70(1) Definition of "Trafficking"

10. Section 70(1) of the Drugs Act defines trafficking to include:

    - Preparing a drug of dependence for trafficking;
    - Manufacturing a drug of dependence; or
    - Selling, exchanging, agreeing to sell, offering for sale or having in possession for sale, a drug of dependence.

11. Although the terms "manufacture" and "sell" are defined in s 4 of the Drugs Act, these definitions do not apply to the trafficking offences (s 70(2)).

Preparing a Drug of Dependence for Trafficking

12. In relation to trafficking by "preparing a drug of dependence for trafficking", the prosecution must prove that the accused:

    - Prepared a drug of dependence;
    - Intended to prepare that drug; and
    - Prepared the drug for the purpose of trafficking (R v Giretti (1986) 24 A Crim R 112).

13. This requires the prosecution to prove that when the accused prepared the drug, they intended either that the drug would be dealt with in one of the ways specified in s 70(1), or that it would be trafficked in the manner defined by the common law (see "Common Law Definition of 'Trafficking'" below).

Agreeing and Offering to Sell a Drug of Dependence

14. In relation to trafficking by making an "agreement" or "offer" to sell a drug of dependence under s 70(1), the prosecution must prove that the accused:

    - Made a genuine agreement or offer to sell a drug of dependence to another person;
    - Intended to make that agreement or offer; and
    - Intended the agreement or offer to be regarded as genuine by the person to whom it was made (R v Peirce [1996] 2 VR 215; Gauci v Driscoll [1985] VR 428; R v Addison (1993) 70 A Crim R 213 (NSW CCA)).

15. It is not necessary for the prosecution to prove that the accused actually possessed the relevant drug, intended to complete the sale, or could ever have supplied the drug to the purchaser (Gauci v Driscoll [1985] VR 428; R v Addison (1993) 70 A Crim R 213 (NSW CCA); R v Peirce [1996] 2 VR 215).

16. It does not matter if the accused intended to provide a different substance from that which they offered, or to provide nothing at all, as long as they intended the agreement or offer to be regarded as genuine by the person to whom it was made (R v Addison (1993) 70 A Crim R 213 (NSW CCA)).

Possessing a Drug of Dependence for Sale

17. In relation to trafficking by "having in possession for sale a drug of dependence" under s 70(1), the prosecution must prove that:

    - The accused possessed a drug of dependence;
    - The accused intended to sell that drug (see, e.g. R v Francis-Wright (2005) 11 VR 354).

18. The prosecution must prove possession for sale by establishing possession at common law. Section 5 of the Act, which deems a person to be in possession of a drug of dependence in specified circumstances, does not apply to trafficking offences (Momcilovic v R (2011) 245 CLR 1).

19. At common law, a person has in their possession whatever is, to their knowledge, physically in their custody or under their physical control (DPP v Brooks [1974] AC 862; He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523; R v Maio [1989] VR 281; R v Mateiasevici [1999] 3 VR 185).

20. According to this definition, common law possession of a drug of dependence has three elements:

    i) The accused had physical custody or control of the drug;

    ii) The accused intended to have custody of or exercise control over the drug; and

    iii) The accused knew that the substance over which they had custody or control was a drug of dependence, or were aware that it was likely that it was a drug of dependence (R v Maio [1989] VR 281. See also He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523; Momcilovic v R (2011) 245 CLR 1).

21. A person may have possession of an item even though they are not carrying the item or do not have it on them, as long as they have physical custody of or control over the item (R v Maio [1989] VR 281; R v Mateiasevici [1999] 3 VR 185).

22. It is not necessary for the prosecution to prove "exclusive possession", that is, the right of the accused to exclude everyone else (other than those with whom s/he was acting in concert) from interference with the drug. The accused will possess a drug if the three elements outlined above are satisfied – even if there is a reasonable possibility that someone else also possessed that drug (R v Tran (2007) 16 VR 673. See also R v Dibb (1991) 52 A Crim R 64 (NSW CCA); R v Cumming (1995) 86 A Crim R 156 (WA CCA) but c.f. Moors v Burke (1919) 26 CLR 265; Williams v Douglas (1949) 78 CLR 521)).

23. It is not always necessary to define the concept of possession at common law – the jury need only be told so much of the law as is necessary for them to know having regard to the issues in the trial (R v Clarke and Johnstone [1986] VR 643; R v Mateiasevici [1999] 3 VR 185; R v Bandiera and Licastro [1999] 3 VR 103; R v Tran [2007] VSCA 19).

24. A distinction is drawn between possessing a drug for the accused's own use and possessing a drug for sale to others. While the former may provide the basis for a charge of possession of a drug of dependence (Drugs Act s 73), it cannot sustain a charge of trafficking (R v Kardogeros [1991] 1 VR 269).

25. The prosecution only needs to prove that the accused had a general intention to sell the drug in the future. It is not necessary to prove that a particular sale was in contemplation at the material time, or that the accused had a specific buyer in mind (Reardon v Baker [1987] VR 887).

26. A drug may be in possession for sale even if the accused intends to mix it with another substance prior to sale (McNair v Terroni [1915] 1 KB 526; cited with approval by McGarvie J in R v Kardogeros [1991] 1 VR 269).

27. It may be possible for the jury to infer from the lack of usability of a portion of drugs possessed that the unusable portion was not possessed for sale. This may affect the quantity of drugs trafficked (see "Determining Quantity" below) (R v Coviello (1995) 81 A Crim R 293 (Vic CCA)).

28. A person who cultivates a drug may be guilty of trafficking (as well as the cultivation offences specified in ss 72, 72A and 72B) if it can be shown that the drug was possessed for sale (R v Bandiera and Licastro [1999] 3 VR 103; R v Kardogeros [1991] 1 VR 269; R v Stavropoulos and Zamouzaris (1990) 50 A Crim R 315; R v Clarke and Johnstone [1986] VR 643. For further information on the interaction of these offences, see "Trafficking, Cultivation and Possession" below).

Common Law Definition of "Trafficking"

29. At common law, the term "trafficking" has been held to at least connote:
    - An activity performed in a commercial setting (i.e. a setting in which it can fairly be inferred that someone involved is making a profit);
    - Participation by the alleged trafficker in the progress of goods from source to consumer; and
    - Contact between the alleged trafficker and at least one other person (R v Holman [1982] VR 471; Giretti v R (1986) 24 A Crim R 112).
30. Mere possession of drugs will not be sufficient to constitute trafficking at common law. A person will not have been involved in common law trafficking if they were not involved in the onward movement of the drugs to the ultimate consumer (R v Holman [1982] VR 471; R v Kloufetos (1985) 14 A Crim R 426 (Vic CCA)).
31. So a person who possessed drugs will not have trafficked at common law even if it can be inferred that they possessed the drugs for a commercial purpose and intended to traffick in the future (cf. under the statutory definition of trafficking: see above). They must have at least committed an overt act directed towards transferring ownership or possession of the drugs (R v Holman [1982] VR 471; R v Kloufetos (1985) 14 A Crim R 426 (Vic CCA)).
32. While it is necessary for there to be contact between the alleged trafficker and at least one other person, it may be sufficient if it can be inferred that a person exists who plays the role of the other person in the movement of the drugs, even if the identity of that person is unknown (R v Holman [1982] VR 471).
33. Trafficking at common law may involve delivering or selling drugs to another person, or possibly purchasing or receiving drugs from another person (R v Holman [1982] VR 471).
34. Bartering, sending or forwarding drugs may also be trafficking at common law (Giretti v R (1986) 24 A Crim R 112).
35. A voluntary trader acting as a link between parties to a transaction may still be involved in trafficking at common law, even if they are acting without reward (Falconer v Pedersen [1974] VR 185).
36. A person need not ever have possessed an item, or held title to it, to have been involved in trafficking at common law (R v Holman [1982] VR 471).

Carrying on a Trafficking Business (Giretti Trafficking)

37. "Trafficking" can be established by proving that the accused committed an identifiable single act or transaction, such as selling drugs on a specific occasion. It can also be established by proving that the accused carried on a drug dealing business over a specified period of time (Giretti v R (1986) 24 A Crim R 112; R v Lao and Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129).
38. This latter type of trafficking (sometimes known as Giretti trafficking) requires the prosecution to prove that the accused was involved in a continuing trade or business of dealing in drugs, or had engaged on a regular and commercial basis in the transmission of drugs from source to consumer (Giretti v R (1986) 24 A Crim R 112; R v Te [1998] 3 VR 566; R v Lao and Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129).

39. The expression "trade" or "business" does not connote the existence of a formal structure or organisation. It is used in a broad sense to encompass a relatively continuous activity, performed over a designated period of time, involving commercial dealings in the prohibited substance (R v Lao and Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129).

40. A charge of trafficking on a Giretti basis will usually allege that the accused conducted the business of trafficking between a start date and an end date. It is open to a jury to conclude that such a business was being carried on if it finds that the accused was conducting such a business for a significant part of the period specified (Mustica v R (2011) 31 VR 367).

41. There is no need for the prosecution to prove that there was an agreement to engage in the business of trafficking. The prosecution must merely prove that the accused was involved in the trafficking business over the relevant period (R v Lao and Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129).

42. It does not matter if the alleged activities were many and varied, and occurred over a long period of time, as long as they were part of a "continuing" offence. That is, they must have taken place with the necessary degree of regularity and system to amount to a business or trade (Giretti v R (1986) 24 A Crim R 112).

43. It is immaterial whether the accused was a supplier or purchaser of the drug, so long as their involvement went beyond being merely a remote and disjunctive commercial seller or buyer. They must have engaged in the continuous commercial activity of trafficking (R v Lao and Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129).

44. The principles set down in Giretti are not limited to businesses that involve a regular ongoing trade in one particular drug. They also apply to businesses in which the accused deals in a diversity of drugs in the usual and ordinary course of their trade. So if it can be shown, for example, that the accused had a business which involved selling both heroin and marijuana on a regular basis, the accused could be convicted of trafficking in both of these drugs (R v Komljenovic (2006) 163 A Crim R 298; [2006] VSCA 136).

45. This will be the case even if the accused mainly trafficked in one type of drug, with other drugs only trafficked occasionally. As long as it can be shown that all of the sales were part of the same drug dealing business, and were not isolated sales which were separate from that business, it does not matter that the frequency and volume of sales in some drugs greatly exceeded that of others (R v Komljenovic (2006) 163 A Crim R 298; [2006] VSCA 136).

46. The jury may decide that a particular sale of drugs was separate from the accused's usual drug dealing business, and so not part of an ongoing trade in drugs. However, as drugs are the stock in trade of drug dealers, any sale of drugs will prima facie be considered to be part of the accused's drug business (R v Komljenovic (2006) 163 A Crim R 298; [2006] VSCA 136).

47. It is possible that an accused who has been in the business of dealing in a number of different drugs might cease to deal in one of them, while continuing to deal in others. In such a case, the accused could no longer be said to be trafficking in the drug which they stopped selling. However, this will be a question of fact for the jury. They will need to determine whether an apparent gap in sales in the drug in question was due to the accused deciding to no longer deal in that drug, or whether it was due to sales being slow. If the latter, then the accused would remain liable for trafficking in that drug, despite the low volume of sales (R v Komljenovic (2006) 163 A Crim R 298; [2006] VSCA 136).

48. The fact that an accused carried on part of their drug trafficking business on their own account, and part in association with other dealers, does not prevent all of their drug trafficking transactions forming part of their drug dealing business. The accused may be liable for all of the transactions, regardless of whether they were solely or jointly responsible for a particular transaction (R v Komljenovic (2006) 163 A Crim R 298; [2006] VSCA 136).

49. Where two accused are joined in a Giretti count of trafficking, it is not necessary for the prosecution to establish that they had entered into an agreement or understanding with each other as to their respective involvements in the business, or were in a joint enterprise with each other. Nor does the prosecution have to prove that the parties ever met or communicated with each other, or were aware of the identity of the other party. It is sufficient if they can prove that the parties were both engaged in the alleged trafficking business (R v Lao and Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129).

50. Giretti trafficking cannot ordinarily be established by simply proving that the accused engaged in a number of relevant transactions over a period of time. A series of isolated sales made over a period of time does not constitute the continuing activity of trafficking (Giretti v R (1986) 24 A Crim R 112; R v Komljenovic (1994) 76 A Crim R 521; R v Hamzy (1994) 74 A Crim R 341 (NSWCCA); R v Lao and Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129).

51. So in the absence of an admission by the accused that they were carrying on a trade or business of dealing in drugs, the jury must be directed that in order to convict an accused of this type of trafficking, they must be able to infer from the evidence that the accused was engaged in such a business (Giretti v R (1986) 24 A Crim R 112; R v Komljenovic (1994) 76 A Crim R 521; R v Hamzy (1994) 74 A Crim R 341 (NSWCCA); R v Lao and Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129).

52. Such an inference can be drawn from evidence of a sufficient number of transactions (e.g. sales and deliveries), together with such other evidence as will enable the jury to conclude that the accused was engaged in the disposition or transmission of drugs on a regular and commercial basis during the period of the alleged offence (Giretti v R (1986) 24 A Crim R 112).

53. It does not matter if the prosecution relies on just two specific instances of trafficking, if the evidence enables the jury to draw an inference that those two acts occurred in the context of a business of trafficking, and were not simply two distinct offences for which separate charges should have been laid (Giretti v R (1986) 24 A Crim R 112; R v Lao and Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129; R v Komljenovic (2006) 163 A Crim R 298; [2006] VSCA 136).

54. It is also unimportant that a Giretti count of trafficking will generally consist of a series of activities or transactions which could each in themselves be described as acts of trafficking, so long as the jury is properly directed that these individual transactions are only relevant to the extent that they provide a basis for drawing an inference that the accused was engaged in the business of trafficking (unless the accused is also charged with trafficking by virtue of those individual transactions as an alternative – see below) (Giretti v R (1986) 24 A Crim R 112).

55. The jury does not need to unanimously agree that all of the instances of drug dealing alleged by the prosecution have been proved, or that any one particular transaction has been proved. The jury only needs to be unanimous in drawing the inference, from the conduct proved, that during the relevant period the accused was engaged in the continuing offence of trafficking (Giretti v R (1986) 24 A Crim R 112; R v Te [1998] 3 VR 566; R v Lao and Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129; Mustica v R (2011) 31 VR 367).

56. The jury can draw the requisite inference in different ways, relying on different facts or circumstances – so long as they are all satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused was guilty of the continuous offence of trafficking over the alleged period (Giretti v R (1986) 24 A Crim R 112; R v Te [1998] 3 VR 566; R v Lao and Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129).

57. It is not necessary for the prosecution to prove that the accused was trafficking 24 hours a day for the whole of the specified period. They need only prove that the accused was carrying on the business of trafficking for some portion of the alleged period (R v Komljenovic (1994) 76 A Crim R 521; Giretti v R (1986) 24 A Crim R 112*; Mustica v R* (2011) 31 VR 367)

58. A presentment which contains one count of engaging in a business of trafficking over a period of time, and a number of alternative counts specifying particular acts alleged to have taken place during that period of time, will not be bad for duplicity. In such a case, the jury should be invited to determine whether they can infer from all of the evidence (including the specified acts) that the accused was carrying on a business of trafficking in drugs over the relevant period. If they can, they should only return a guilty verdict on the Giretti count. If they cannot draw such an inference, they should then look to see if the prosecution has proven any of the alternative specific counts (R v Te [1998] 3 VR 566. See also R v Lao and Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129).[1078]

Attempted Trafficking

59. Each of the trafficking provisions make it an offence to traffick or "attempt to traffick" in the specified manner. A person can therefore be charged with attempted trafficking directly under ss 71, 71AA, 71AB or 71AC of the Drugs Act, rather than having to rely on s 321M of the Crimes Act 1958.

60. A person charged with attempted trafficking under one of these provisions will be subject to the same penalties as a person charged with trafficking. In contrast, a person who is charged with attempted trafficking under s 321M of the Crimes Act 1958 will be subject to the lesser penalties set out in s 321P of that Act.

61. Section 321N of the Crimes Act 1958 sets out the conduct that will constitute an attempt. This section applies to a person charged with attempted trafficking under the provisions of the Drugs Act by virtue of s 321R of the Crimes Act 1958.

62. For more information about attempts see Attempts.

Drug of Dependence

63. Each of the trafficking offences requires the accused to have trafficked in a "drug of dependence". This term is defined in s 4 of the Drugs Act, to include:

    - Any form of the drugs specified in Parts 1 and 3 of Schedule Eleven to the Act, whether natural or synthetic;
    - The salts, analogues, derivatives and isomers of the drugs specified in Parts 1 and 3 of Schedule Eleven to the Act;
    - The salt of the above mentioned analogues, derivatives and isomers;
    - Any substances that are included in the classes of drugs specified above; and
    - The fresh or dried parts of the plants specified in Part 2 of Schedule Eleven.

64. These substances fall within the definition of a "drug of dependence" even if they are contained in or mixed with another substance (except for the plants specified in Part 2 of Schedule Eleven).

65. Unusable portions of a drug (such as the stems, roots and stalks of the cannabis plant) are still considered to be drugs of dependence, so long as they fit within the definition specified by s 4 (R v Coviello (1995) 81 A Crim R 293 (Vic CCA)). The usability of a portion of drugs may, however, affect the question of whether that drug was possessed for sale (see "Possessing a drug of dependence for sale" above) as well as the quantity of drug possessed (see "Determining Quantity" below)).

[1078] While the accused may be presented on both a Giretti count of trafficking and an alternative specific count of trafficking that occurred entirely within the specified period, he or she should not be convicted of both counts (see, e.g. R v Doherty [2009] VSCA 93; R v Bidmade [2009] VSCA 90).

66. Section 120 of the Drugs Act provides that a certificate purporting to be signed by an analyst with respect to any analysis or examination he or she has made shall be sufficient evidence of the identity of the substance analysed, of the result of the analysis and of the matters relevant to the proceedings as stated in the certificate. Section 120 also provides that a certificate purporting to be signed by a botanist shall be sufficient evidence of the identity of the substance examined. There is no need to provide proof that the person who signed the certificate is an analyst or botanist, nor to provide proof of their signature.

67. The provisions in s 120 do not apply if the certificate was not served on the defence at least seven days before the hearing, or if the defence, at least three days before the hearing, gave notice in writing to the informant and the analyst or botanist that the analyst or botanist is required to attend as a witness (s 120(2)).

68. Whether one drug is a salt, analogue, derivative or isomer of a listed drug is a question of fact for the jury. In the case of a derivative, it will require expert evidence which examines matters such as whether one drug can be made from another and whether one drug is structurally related to another (see Daley v Tasmania (2012) 21 Tas R 247; Clegg v Western Australia (No 2) [2017] WASCA 30).

Intention to Traffick in a Drug of Dependence

69. In addition to proving that the accused trafficked in a drug of dependence, each of the trafficking offences requires the prosecution to prove that the accused intended to traffick in a drug of dependence (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; see also He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523; Momcilovic v R (2011) 245 CLR 1).

70. The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to traffick in the particular drug in question. They need only prove that the accused intended to traffick in a drug of dependence (He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523).

71. Although this intention may be proved by an admission by the accused that they intended to traffick in a drug of dependence, in most cases it will be necessary to infer the requisite intention from the performance of the proscribed act and the circumstances in which it was performed (Bahri Kural v R (1987) 162 CLR 502; He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523; R v Page [2008] VSCA 54).

72. It will usually be possible to infer an intention to traffick in a drug of dependence if it can be established that the accused knew of the existence and nature of the substance at the time that it was trafficked (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; Bahri Kural v R (1987) 162 CLR 502; He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523).

73. However, the prosecution does not need to prove knowledge of the existence and nature of the substance. It is possible that the requisite intent could instead be inferred from a lesser state of mind, such as:

    - A belief that it was a drug of dependence that was being trafficked (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; Bahri Kural v R (1987) 162 CLR 502); or
    - An awareness of the likelihood that it was a drug of dependence that was being trafficked (i.e. an awareness that there was a significant or real chance that their conduct involved trafficking in a prohibited drug) (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; Bahri Kural v R (1987) 162 CLR 502; Mustica v R (2011) 31 VR 367)

74. In some cases, it may also be possible to infer an intention to traffic in a drug of dependence from the fact that:

    - The circumstances were such that the accused's suspicions that s/he was trafficking a drug of dependence would have been aroused; and
    - The accused deliberately failed to make inquiries about the substance being trafficked, for fear of learning the truth (See, e.g. R v Garlick (No.2) (2007) 15 VR 388; He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523; Bahri Kural v R (1987) 162 CLR 502; R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464).

75. However, such cases of "wilful blindness" will be rare, and judges should be cautious before charging the jury about this possibility. There must be evidence that the accused realised there was a risk that s/he was trafficking a drug of dependence, and deliberately chose to close his or her eyes to that risk so that s/he could later deny knowledge and avoid liability. In the absence of such evidence, it will be a misdirection to direct the jury about wilful blindness (R v Garlick (No.2) (2007) 15 VR 388).

76. It may be possible for the jury to infer the requisite state of mind from proof that the accused had custody or control of an object found to contain drugs, or from proof of the act of trafficking. However, this will not always be the case (He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523).

77. While the states of mind outlined above (other than wilful blindness) will usually support an inference of the requisite intention, this will not always be the case. A judge should therefore not instruct the jury that they may convict simply because, for example, the prosecution established that the accused was aware that there was a significant or real chance that their conduct involved trafficking in a prohibited drug (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; R v Reed [2008] VSCA 20; R v Page [2008] VSCA 54).

78. The jury should instead be directed that proof that the accused was aware of the likelihood that it was a drug of dependence that was being trafficked is capable of sustaining an inference that the accused intended to traffick in a drug of dependence. At the same time, the judge should make clear to the jury that it is for them to determine whether that inference should be drawn, based on all of the facts and circumstances (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; R v Reed [2008] VSCA 20; R v Page [2008] VSCA 54).

79. In charging the jury on this issue, judges should follow as nearly as possible the language used in R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299. In particular, care must be taken to ensure that the phrase "is capable of sustaining the inference" is used whenever reference is made in this context to proof of belief "in a significant or real chance" (R v Page [2008] VSCA 54).

80. The jury must be instructed that an inference is not to be drawn unless they are satisfied that it is the only inference that is reasonably open in the circumstances of the case (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; R v Page [2008] VSCA 54).

81. Where intention is to be proved by inference, the judge should direct the jury as to any evidence capable of sustaining that inference (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Page [2008] VSCA 54).

82. A judge should not attempt to explain the meaning of the expression "significant or real chance", other than to tell the jury that the words have their ordinary meaning and that it is a question for them to decide (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299).

83. Even though the issue of intent may not be a live issue in a trial, and may not have been raised by the defence, as it is an element of the offence a judge is required to direct the jury about it, unless the defence has conceded that a direction is not required (R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300).

Quantities

Commercial and Large Commercial Quantities

84. There are two trafficking offences that specify the quantity of drugs that must be trafficked if an accused is to be found guilty:

    - Section 71 – trafficking in a "large commercial quantity"; and
    - Section 71AA – trafficking in a "commercial quantity".

85. "Large commercial quantity" is defined in s 70(1) of the Drugs Act to mean:

    - The quantity of drugs, or the number of plants, specified in column 1A of Parts 2 and 3 of Schedule Eleven to the Act; and

- If the drug is contained in or mixed with another substance, the quantity of mixture specified in column 1B of Part 3 of Schedule Eleven.

86. "Commercial quantity" is defined in s 70(1) of the Drugs Act to mean:

    - The quantity of drugs, or the number of plants, specified in column 2 of Parts 1, 2 and 3 of Schedule Eleven; and
    - If the drug is contained in or mixed with another substance, the quantity of mixture specified in column 2A of Part 3 of Schedule Eleven.

87. The trafficking offences specified in ss 71AB and 71AC do not require proof that the accused trafficked in any particular quantity.

88. The quantities of drugs included in Parts 1, 2 and 3 of Schedules Eleven were recently modified by the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances (Amendment) Act 2006, with the new provisions commencing operation on 1 May 2007 unless proclaimed earlier.

Mixtures of Drugs

89. The definitions of "commercial" and "large commercial" quantities draw a distinction between pure quantities and mixed quantities of drugs, specifying different minimum weights for each in Part 3 of Schedule Eleven.

90. It has been held that the amounts specified in relation to mixed quantities of drugs only apply if the drugs in question were actually mixed with another substance, and the total quantity of that mixture was not less than the specified amount. If these conditions are not satisfied, then it is permissible to look at the pure quantity of a drug that is contained within a mixture (R v Zhu (2000) 2 VR 421).

91. This means, for example, that a 400g mixture containing 300g of pure heroin will still be a commercial quantity, despite the fact that the amount of mixture is less than 500g (the requisite amount of mixture specified in column 2A of Part 3 of Schedule 11). This is because the amount of pure heroin contained within that mixture is more than 250g (the requisite amount of a pure drug specified in column 2 of Part 3 of Schedule 11).

92. Care needs to be taken when drafting the presentment in cases where it is alleged that the accused trafficked in a mixture containing two or more drugs of dependence. In such cases, the prosecution has three options:

    i) They may ascertain the pure quantity of each drug of dependence contained within the mixture, and present the accused on individual counts of trafficking in the quantity of each drug ascertained (with each count relating to one of the drugs found); or

    ii) They may select just one of the drugs of dependence within the mixture, and if the quantity of the mixture is a commercial or a large commercial quantity in relation to the selected drug,[1079] present the accused on a single count of trafficking in a commercial or large commercial quantity of that drug; or

    iii) They may aggregate the quantity of each drug of dependence within the mixture (see "Aggregating Quantities" below), and if the aggregate quantity of those drugs is not less than an "aggregated commercial quantity" or an "aggregated large commercial quantity" (as defined in s 70), present the accused on a single count of trafficking in an aggregated commercial or large commercial quantity (R v Ahmed (2007) 17 VR 454 (Nettle JA)).

[1079] As ascertained from Columns 2A and 1B of Part 3 of Schedule 11.

93. In such a case, the accused must not be charged with (or convicted of) separate trafficking offences for each of the drugs of dependence contained within the mixture, using the quantity of the mixture as the relevant measure (R v Ahmed (2007) 17 VR 454).[1080]

Determining Quantity

94. For most drugs of dependence, the relevant quantities are specified by weight. In determining the weight of a drug, it is appropriate to make the measurement in light of the conditions existing at the time that the offence is seen to have been committed (R v Coviello (1995) 81 A Crim R 293 (Vic CCA)).

95. In relation to cannabis, this means that if a crop was "green" at the relevant time, it is the weight of the drug in such a condition which is to be measured. The quantity is not what it would be when dried, even though the drug only becomes usable when in that condition (R v Coviello (1995) 81 A Crim R 293 (Vic CCA)).

96. The quantity of Cannabis L can be determined either by weight or by the number of plants (Part 2 of Schedule Eleven). The word "plant" has been held to be an ordinary English word. Expert evidence about its meaning is therefore inadmissible (R v Francis-Wright (2005) 11 VR 354).

97. Although the word "plant" is an ordinary English word, the jury should not be left at large to determine its meaning, because it is capable of a wide range of interpretations. Where relevant to the issues in the trial, the judge must tell the jury the meaning of the word in its statutory context (R v Francis-Wright (2005) 11 VR 354).

98. For offences committed after 1 May 2007, a "narcotic plant" is defined as including a cutting of a narcotic plant, whether or not the cutting has roots. This reverses the common law position that applied prior to 1 May 2007, which held that a cutting of cannabis becomes a plant when it develops a root, though it did not need to be viable. Once a cutting becomes a plant, it continues to be a plant, even if it dies (Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances (Amendment) Act 2006 s 8; R v Francis-Wright (2005) 11 VR 354).

99. In relation to trafficking by "possession for sale" under s 70(1), the relevant quantity is the quantity of drugs possessed for sale, not simply the quantity of drugs possessed. If it can be shown that a portion of the drugs possessed by the accused was not for sale, that portion should not be included when determining the relevant quantity (R v Coviello (1995) 81 A Crim R 293 (Vic CCA); R v Francis-Wright (2005) 11 VR 354).

[1080] For example, if it is alleged that the accused had one 500g mixture, containing 230g of pure heroin, 220g of pure cocaine and 50g of pure methylamphetamine, the accused must not be charged with 3 counts of trafficking in a commercial quantity of drugs (one based on having a 500g mixture that contains heroin, another based on having a 500g mixture that contains cocaine, and a third based on having a 500g mixture that contains methylamphetamine). Instead, s/he should either be charged with:

Three counts of trafficking in a drug of dependence (one based on having 230g of heroin, the second based on having 220g of cocaine, and the third based on having 50g of methylamphetamine); or

One count of trafficking in a commercial quantity of either heroin, cocaine or methylamphetamine (based on having a 500g mixture that contains the selected drug); or

One count of trafficking in an aggregated commercial quantity of heroin, cocaine and methylamphetamine.

100. It may be possible for the jury to infer from the lack of usability of a portion of drugs that the unusable portion was not possessed for sale (see "Possessing a Drug of Dependence for Sale" above). If the jury finds this to be the case, then the unusable portion of drugs should not be included in a calculation of the quantity of drugs possessed for sale. This is a question of fact for determination by the jury based on all of the relevant evidence (R v Coviello (1995) 81 A Crim R 293 (Vic CCA). Although an unusable portion of drugs may not be possessed for sale, it will still be classified as a drug of dependence. See "Drug of Dependence" above)).

101. Section 120 of the Drugs Act provides that a certificate purporting to be signed by an analyst or botanist with respect to any analysis or examination they have made shall be sufficient evidence of the quantity of the substance analysed or examined. See the section "Drug of Dependence" above for a more detailed discussion of s 120.

Aggregating Quantities

102. Sections 71 and 71AA both state that the specified quantities can be comprised of "2 or more drugs of dependence". Similarly, the definitions of "commercial quantity" and "large commercial quantity" in s 70(1) both include "aggregated" quantities of 2 or more drugs. It is therefore possible to add together quantities of different drugs when determining whether the accused has trafficked in the specified amount.

103. The process for aggregating the quantities of 2 or more drugs of dependence is set out in the definitions of "aggregated commercial quantity" and "aggregated large commercial quantity" in s 70(1). These definitions were recently amended by the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances (Amendment) Act 2006, with the new definitions commencing operation on 1 May 2007 unless proclaimed earlier.

104. In relation to a Giretti count of trafficking, in some cases it may be possible for the jury to aggregate a number of small quantities of drugs sold over a long period of time, to establish that a commercial or large commercial quantity was trafficked. This will only be permissible if each sale formed part of the same criminal enterprise (Giretti v R (1986) 24 A Crim R 112; R v Hamzy (1994) 74 A Crim R 341(NSWCCA); R v Komljenovic (1994) 76 A Crim R 521; R v McCulloch (2009) 21 VR 340; Le v R [2011] VSCA 42; Mustica v R (2011) 31 VR 367).

105. While in many such cases it is likely to be difficult to establish the precise quantities sold over time, the jury may examine the frequency of dealing and the nature of the business conducted, together with the proceeds of the trade, to assess the quantity sold over the relevant period (R v Komljenovic (1994) 76 A Crim R 521).

106. The prosecution only needs to establish that not less than the specified amount was trafficked over the relevant period of time. They do not need to establish the precise amount trafficked (R v Komljenovic (1994) 76 A Crim R 521).

107. The jury does not need to unanimously agree that specific transactions took place. The jury only needs to be unanimous in concluding, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused had trafficked in not less than the specified quantity (Le v R [2011] VSCA 42; Mustica v R (2011) 31 VR 367).

108. If the jury is permitted to add together quantities of drugs sold over time, the jury should be directed in a way that helps them to avoid impermissible aggregation. For example, if it is alleged that the accused possessed drugs for sale and offered those same drugs for sale, the jury should be directed not to count the same drugs twice (R v Hamzy (1994) 74 A Crim R 341 (NSWCCA)).

Intention to Traffick in a Particular Quantity

109. Because the offences specified in ss 71 (trafficking in a large commercial quantity) and 71AA (trafficking in a commercial quantity) are defined by quantities, to convict a person of these offences they must be shown to have intended to traffick in not less than the specified quantity of the relevant drug (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; Mustica v R (2011) 31 VR 367).

110. The accused must have had this intention at the time he or she committed the relevant act of trafficking (Mustica v R (2011) 31 VR 367; R v McCulloch (2009) 21 VR 340).

111. It is not sufficient for the prosecution to prove that the accused intended to traffick in a drug of dependence which in fact weighed the specified amount, or to traffick in an amount which "might approximate" the specified quantity. The intention must be to traffick at least the specified quantity (R v Garlick (No.2) (2007) 15 VR 388).[1081]

112. This does not mean that the accused must have known what the legal threshold was, or what the actual weight or number of the plants cultivated was. The question is whether the accused intended to cultivate a weight or number of plants that was at least the weight or number specified in Schedule Eleven of the Drugs Act (R v Garlick (No.2) (2007) 15 VR 388).

113. This intention can be proved in the same way as is explained in the section "Intention to Traffick in a Drug of Dependence" above. That is, it can be proved directly or by inferences. An inference can be drawn from a state of mind that is less than knowledge, such as proof that the accused was aware that there was a significant or real chance that the amount of drug trafficked was not less than the specified quantity (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; R v Page [2008] VSCA 540; Mustica v R (2011) 31 VR 367).

114. Whether an inference of intention to traffick in not less than the specified quantity can be drawn is a question of fact for the jury to determine based on all of the facts and circumstances. Such an inference should not be drawn if any other inference is reasonably open (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; R v Page [2008] VSCA 54).

115. In charging the jury on this issue, judges should follow as nearly as possible the language used in R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299. In particular, care must be taken to ensure that the phrase "is capable of sustaining the inference" is used whenever reference is made in this context to proof of belief "in a significant or real chance" (R v Page [2008] VSCA 54).

Giretti Trafficking and Intention to Traffick in a Quantity

116. The need to prove that the accused intended to traffick in not less than the specified quantity at the time he or she committed the relevant act of trafficking can create difficulties where the accused is charged with carrying on a trafficking business (Giretti trafficking).

117. Proof that the accused carried on a business of trafficking can established by evidence of acts that took place after the accused formed the intention to traffick in an amount that would exceed the specified quantity. The prosecution cannot rely on conduct that pre-dates the formation of the relevant intention (Mustica v R (2011) 31 VR 367; R v McCulloch (2009) 21 VR 340; Finn v R [2011] VSCA 273).

118. This intention can be proved directly or by inferences. For example, an inference can be drawn from proof that, when the accused set up the trafficking business, he or she was aware that there was a significant or real chance that the amount trafficked over the specified period of time would exceed the designated amount (Mustica v R (2011) 31 VR 367).

[1081] While R v Garlick (No.2) (2007) 15 VR 388 involved a case of cultivation of a commercial quantity of a narcotic plant contrary to s 72A of the Drugs Act, it is likely that the same principles apply to trafficking in a drug of dependence.

119. In determining whether the accused had the requisite intention, the jury may take into account matters such as the frequency of dealings from the outset, the size of individual dealings, the number of dealings and the period of time over which the dealings took place (Mustica v R (2011) 31 VR 367).[1082]

120. Due to the difficulties in proving that the accused had this intention at the outset of the dealings, instead of charging an accused with Giretti trafficking, it may be desirable to charge the accused with a number of counts of trafficking simpliciter, selecting the instances which involve larger quantities (Mustica v R (2011) 31 VR 367).

Trafficking to a Child

121. Section 71AB requires the prosecution to prove that the accused trafficked to a child. "Child" is defined in s 70(1) to be person under the age of 18.

122. Although it has not been determined, it seems likely, following the principles set down in He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523, that the accused must have intended to traffick to a child. This intention can be proved in the way explained in the section "Intention to Traffick in a Drug of Dependence" above. For example, the jury could infer this intention from proof that the accused was aware that there was a significant or real chance that the person to whom they trafficked was under the age of 18.

Possession of a "Traffickable Quantity" of Drugs

123. Section 73(2) of the Drugs Act states that where a person has in their possession not less than a "traffickable quantity" of a drug of dependence, the fact of possession provides prima facie evidence of trafficking.

124. "Traffickable quantity" is defined in s 70(1) of the Drugs Act to mean:

- The quantity of drugs, or the number of plants, specified in column 3 of Parts 1 and 2 of Schedule Eleven; and
- The quantity of drugs, including any other substances in which they are contained or with which they are mixed, specified in column 3 of Part 3 of Schedule Eleven.[1083]

125. For the purposes of s 73(2), "possession" of a traffickable quantity must be established by proving possession at common law. Section 5 of the Act, which deems the accused to be in possession of a drug in certain circumstances, does not does not apply to possession for the purpose of s 73(2) (see Momcilovic v R (2011) 245 CLR 1 (French CJ and Crennan and Kiefel JJ)).

126. Different drugs cannot be aggregated to determine whether the accused has a "traffickable quantity" of drugs under s 73(2), as neither s 73(2) nor the definition of "traffickable quantity" provide for such aggregation.

[1082] For example, the jury may find from evidence showing that the accused supplied drugs on a regular basis to a certain person that he or she had a 'contract' to do so. If the jury find that this contract existed at the time the trafficking business was established, they may be able to infer from that fact that, from the outset, the accused intended to traffick in at least the specified amount.

[1083] This definition was recently amended by the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances (Amendment) Act 2006, with the new definition commencing operation on 1 May 2007 unless proclaimed earlier.

127. Section 73(2) is not to be read as providing that possession of a traffickable quantity of a drug of dependence is prima facie evidence of trafficking in all of the possible ways in which one may traffick (i.e., all of the ways specified in s 70(1)). It is only prima facie evidence of trafficking in a way which is consistent with the evidence. So if, for example, the evidence showed that the person did not manufacture the relevant drug, possession of a traffickable quantity would not be prima facie evidence of trafficking by manufacturing a drug of dependence (R v Clarke and Johnstone [1986] VR 643).

128. The fact that the accused is found to be in possession of a traffickable quantity of a drug of dependence is not conclusive proof that they were trafficking in that drug – it is merely prima facie evidence. This means that while the accused can be convicted based on proof of this fact alone, it is still for the jury to decide, on the whole of the evidence, whether they are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused trafficked in the way alleged (R v Clarke and Johnstone [1986] VR 643; R v Raiacovici (1993) 70 A Crim R 46; R v Tran [2007] VSCA 19; Momcilovic v R (2011) 245 CLR 1 (Bell J)).

129. The jury should therefore be directed that:

- If they are satisfied that the accused possessed a traffickable quantity of drugs, that would be sufficient in the absence of evidence to the contrary to convict the accused;
- While they can use uncontradicted evidence that the accused possessed a traffickable quantity of drugs to convict the accused, they are only entitled to do so if that evidence, either by itself or in conjunction with other evidence, satisfies them beyond reasonable doubt that the accused is guilty of trafficking; and
- They therefore need to look at all of the evidence, including the fact that the accused possessed a traffickable quantity of drugs, and consider whether they are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused trafficked in the way alleged (e.g. by having a drug of dependence in possession for sale) (see, e.g. R v Stavropoulos and Zamouzaris (1990) 50 A Crim R 315).

130. The extent to which it is necessary to elaborate upon the effect of s 73(2) will depend upon the issues in the case. It is not necessary to explain the way in which s 73(2) operates if there is no evidence suggesting that the drug in question was possessed other than for trafficking, and it is common ground that it was possessed for this reason (e.g. if the only issue in the case is whether it was the accused or another person who possessed the relevant drug) (R v Clarke and Johnstone [1986] VR 643; R v Tran [2007] VSCA 19).

131. Section 73(2) does not operate to reverse the onus of proof. If the accused denies that he or she was trafficking, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused was trafficking (R v Clarke and Johnstone [1986] VR 643; Medici v R (1989) 40 A Crim R 413 (Vic CCA)).

Authorisation and Licensing

132. Each of the trafficking offences specifies that a person will be guilty if they traffick in the specified manner, "without being authorised by or licensed under this Act or the regulations to do so".

133. It has been held that the question of authorisation or licensing is a matter of "exception" or "qualification" for the purposes of s 104 of the Drugs Act. This section states that the burden of proving any "matter of exception qualification or defence" lies on the accused. It is therefore for the accused to prove, on the balance of probabilities, that they were appropriately authorised or licensed – rather than being for the prosecution to disprove beyond reasonable doubt (R v Ibrahim (1987) 27 A Crim R 460; Horman v Bingham [1972] VR 29).

134. Provisions concerning authorisation and licensing are contained in Divisions 2 and 4 of the Act respectively.

135. Sections 118 and 119 of the Act contain evidentiary provisions that may be of assistance in cases where there is a dispute about authorisation or licensing.

Trafficking, Cultivation and Possession

136. A plea in bar is not available unless the elements of two counts are identical or the elements of one are wholly included in another count (Pearce v R (1998) 194 CLR 610; R v Sessions [1998] 2 VR 304; R v Lelah [2002] VSCA 96; R v Langdon (2004) 11 VR 18).

137. A plea in bar is therefore not available in respect of the trafficking and cultivation offences (R v Mason [2006] VSCA 55; R v Nguyen [2006] VSCA 158), nor in relation to trafficking and possession of a drug of dependence (R v Langdon (2004) 11 VR 18; R v Nor (2005) 11 VR 390).

138. However, section 51 of the Interpretation of Legislation 1984 (Vic) prevents a person from being punished more than once for the "same act or omission". So a person should not be punished twice for the commission of elements that overlap between the different offences (R v Sessions [1998] 2 VR 304; R v Langdon (2004) 11 VR 18; R v Nunno [2008] VSCA 31; R v Filipovic [2008] VSCA 14).

139. If the relevant acts of trafficking, cultivation and/or possession completely overlap, a conviction should only be recorded in relation to one of the offences (R v Langdon (2004) 11 VR 18; R v Filipovic [2008] VSCA 14; Grixti v R [2011] VSCA 220).[1084]

140. However, if the relevant acts are merely "linked" rather than completely overlapping, convictions may be recorded for all counts. The linking of the acts should be reflected in the sentences imposed, rather than in the convictions recorded (R v Nunno [2008] VSCA 31).

141. Whether it is appropriate to include trafficking, cultivation and possession in the presentment, or proceed to verdict and/or sentencing in relation to each of these offences, will depend on the circumstances of the case. The judge should consider whether there is such an overlap in the circumstances of each offence, and the evidence linking the accused to each of them, that it would be oppressive to take verdicts, proceed to conviction or impose a sentence for each (see, e.g. R v Langdon (2004) 11 VR 18; R v Nor (2005) 11 VR 390; R v Nguyen [2006] VSCA 158; R v Nunno [2008] VSCA 31; Grixti v R [2011] VSCA 220).

Last updated: 2 October 2017

7.6.1.1 Charge: Trafficking a Commercial/Large Commercial Quantity of a Drug of Dependence Giretti Trafficking

Click here for a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge is designed for use where the prosecution alleges that the accused trafficked in a commercial or large commercial quantity of a drug of dependence by carrying on a business of trafficking (Giretti trafficking).

If the accused is charged with trafficking on a Giretti basis to a child, this charge must be modified.

I must now direct you about the crime of trafficking in not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of a drug of dependence. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That the accused carried on a business of trafficking.

Two – That the accused trafficked in not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of a drug of dependence.

[1084] This may occur, for example, where the accused is charged with trafficking and cultivation, and the trafficking charge is based on the fact that the plants were in the accused's possession for sale (see, e.g. R v Mason [2006] VSCA 55; R v Filipovic [2008] VSCA 14).

Three – That the accused intended to traffick in not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of a drug of dependence.

I will now explain these elements in more detail.

Trafficking

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have carried on a business of trafficking.

This requires the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused was involved in a continuing trade or business of dealing in drugs over a period of time, or was involved in getting drugs from source to consumer on a regular basis for money or other payment.

In this case it is alleged that the accused conducted this business between [insert dates]. The business is alleged to have involved [insert acts of trafficking and name of drug].

The prosecution does not have to prove that the accused set up a formal "business" structure, or had an agreement with anyone to traffick in drugs. The word "business" is used to mean that the accused had conducted an ongoing activity, over a period of time, involving commercial dealings in drugs.

The prosecution must prove more than isolated acts of trafficking during this period of time. Proof that the accused sold drugs on two or three isolated occasions is not enough to prove that the accused carried on a trafficking business. For this element to be met, you must be satisfied that the accused's activities took place with some regularity and system so that they amounted to a "business" or "trade".

In other words, the prosecution must prove that NOA carried on a trafficking business for a significant part of the period between [insert dates].

In this case, the prosecution submitted that you should draw this conclusion because [insert evidence capable of sustaining the inference]. The defence responded [insert any evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine whether NOA was involved in a trade or business of dealing in drugs. It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that this was the case that this first element will be met.

To establish this element, you do not all need to agree about which particular acts of trafficking the prosecution has proved – as long as you all agree that the accused conducted a business of trafficking.

Quantity of a Drug of Dependence

The second element also looks at the accused's conduct. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused trafficked in not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of a drug of dependence.

The law says that [insert relevant drug] is a drug of dependence and a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of [insert relevant drug] is [insert commercial/large commercial threshold].

In other words, the prosecution must prove that NOA carried on a business of trafficking which trafficked in at least [insert commercial/large commercial threshold] of [insert relevant drug].

It is not necessary for the prosecution to establish the precise amount of drugs trafficked by the accused. They only need to establish that the amount trafficked was at least [insert relevant weight or number of plants of relevant substance].

[If the prosecution relies on cuttings, add the following shaded section.]

In this case there has been a dispute about the number of plants trafficked by the accused. According to the law, a plant includes a cutting of a plant, whether or not it has roots. Even if it dies before becoming usable, it should still be counted as a "plant".[1085]

[If the prosecution relies on a mixture quantity specified in column 2A of Part 3 of Schedule 11, add the following shaded section.]

You have heard evidence that [insert name of drug] was mixed with another substance. This element will be proved if the weight of the mixed substance was at least [insert commercial/large commercial threshold]. The purity of the mixture and the weight of the pure quantity of [insert name of drug] is not relevant to whether this element is proved.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Intention to Traffick in a Commercial Quantity/Large Commercial Quantity

The third element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused intended to traffick in not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of a drug of dependence. This element looks at the accused's state of mind.

As I have explained, the law states that [insert commercial/large commercial threshold] of [insert relevant drug of dependence] is a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of [insert relevant drug of dependence].

The law also states that for this element, the prosecution must prove that the accused had this intention before s/he trafficked in at least a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of a drug of dependence, and that this intention continued while NOA trafficked the [insert drug of dependence].

There are two ways the prosecution can prove this element.

First, a person intends to traffick in at least a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of [insert relevant drug of dependence] if they know or are aware that they are trafficking in at least a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of a drug of dependence.

Secondly, if you are satisfied that NOA was aware there was a significant or real chance that s/he would traffick in at least a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of [name of drug], then you can consider that awareness in combination with all other evidence to decide whether to draw the conclusion that NOA intended to traffick at least a [commercial/large commercial] quantity.

There is an important difference between these two paths. In the first, knowledge and awareness, that is enough by itself to prove the accused intended to traffick at least a [commercial/large commercial] quantity. The second path involves you drawing a conclusion about what NOA intended from all the evidence, including anything you find proved about NOA's awareness of a significant or real chance that s/he would traffick in at least a [commercial/large commercial] quantity. I remind you that you must not draw a conclusion unless you are satisfied that it is the only conclusion that is reasonably open in the circumstances. If another reasonable explanation is available, then the prosecution will not have proved this third element beyond reasonable doubt.

[If 'wilful blindness' as to the relevant threshold arises as an issue, consider the shaded section.]

"Wilful blindness" may be relevant if there is evidence that the accused realised there was a risk that s/he would traffick more than the relevant threshold, and deliberately chose to close his/her eyes to that risk so that s/he could later deny knowledge and avoid liability.

[1085] This section of the charge will need to be modified if the offence was alleged to have been committed prior to the commencement of s 8 of the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances (Amendment) Act 2006 on 1 May 2007. See 7.6.1 Trafficking in a Drug of Dependence for further information.

Cases of "wilful blindness" will be rare, and judges should be cautious before charging the jury about this possibility: R v Garlick (No.2) (2007) 15 VR 388.

There is also a third path, which is similar to the second path I just described. If the prosecution proves that NOA suspected s/he was going to traffick at least the [weight of drugs/number of plants] that constitutes a [commercial/large commercial] quantity, and chose not to make further inquiries for fear of learning the truth, then that would also provide a basis to draw a conclusion that s/he intended to traffick a [commercial/large commercial] quantity. That is, s/he was aware that there was a risk that s/he would traffick in at least a [commercial/large commercial] quantity, but deliberately closed [his/her] eyes to that risk to avoid possible liability. In such a situation, you may conclude that although NOA did not positively know that s/he was going to traffick in at least a [commercial/large commercial] [weight of drugs/number of plants], s/he still intended to traffick in such a [number/weight]. Again, I remind you that you must not draw a conclusion unless you are satisfied that it is the only conclusion that is reasonably open in the circumstances.

In this case, the prosecution submitted that the accused intended to traffick in at least a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of a drug of dependence because [insert evidence capable of sustaining the inference].

[Summarise relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

[Insert any other defence evidence or arguments.]

So you must decide, based on all of the evidence, whether the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA intended to traffick in at least a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of a drug of dependence over the period of trafficking.

Authorisation/Licence

[If it is alleged that the accused was authorised or licensed to traffick in a drug of dependence, insert 7.6.1.21 Additional Direction: Authorisation and Licensing here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of trafficking in a drug of dependence, the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That s/he carried on a business of trafficking.

Two – That s/he carried on a business of trafficking in not less than a commercial/large commercial quantity of a drug of dependence.

Three – That s/he intended to traffick in not less than a commercial/large commercial quantity of a drug of dependence.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of trafficking in a drug of dependence in not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity.

Last updated: 14 August 2023

7.6.1.2 Charge: Trafficking in a Drug of Dependence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of trafficking in a drug of dependence. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following [2/3] elements[1086] beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused intentionally [committed an act/carried on a business] of trafficking.

Two – the accused intentionally trafficked in a drug of dependence.

[If it is alleged that the accused trafficked in a commercial or large commercial quantity, or to a child, add the following shaded section.]

Three – the accused intentionally trafficked [in not less than a commercial/large commercial quantity of that drug/to a child].

I will now explain these elements in more detail.

Trafficking

[The nature of the first element will depend on the act[s] of trafficking alleged. The judge should insert one or more of the additional directions from the list below, as is relevant to the circumstances of the case.]

- 7.6.1.3 Additional Direction: Selling, Exchanging or Manufacturing a Drug of Dependence*;*
- 7.6.1.6 Additional Direction: Offering or Agreeing to Sell a Drug of Dependence*;*
- 7.6.1.9 Additional Direction: Preparing a Drug of Dependence for Trafficking*;*
- 7.6.1.12 Additional Direction: Possessing a Drug of Dependence for Sale*;*
- 7.6.1.15 Additional Direction: Conducting a Business of Trafficking (Giretti trafficking)

Drug of Dependence

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused intentionally trafficked in a drug of dependence. There are two parts to this element. The prosecution must prove that the substance allegedly trafficked by the accused was a drug of dependence. They must also prove that the accused intended to traffick in a drug of dependence.

The law says that [insert name of drug] is a drug of dependence. The first part of this element will therefore be satisfied if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA [insert relevant act of trafficking – i.e. sold/exchanged/manufactured/offered to sell/agreed to sell/prepared for trafficking/possessed for sale/conducted a business of trafficking involving] any quantity of [insert name of drug].

[If the drug in question was mixed with another substance, add the following shaded section.]

It does not matter whether the [insert name of drug] was mixed with another substance. The issue here

---

[1086] This charge can be used in cases involving:

Trafficking in a commercial or large commercial quantity of a drug of dependence (Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981 ss 71 and 71AA);

Trafficking in a drug of dependence to a child (s 71AB); or Trafficking in a drug of dependence (s 71AC).

There will be two elements if the charge is used for offences under s 71AC, but three elements if used for offences under ss 71, 71AA and 71AB.

is whether the accused trafficked in [insert name of drug] at all – whether in its pure state or mixed with something else.

[If it is alleged that the accused trafficked by offering or agreeing to sell a drug of dependence, add the following shaded section.]

The accused does not need to have ever actually had the [insert name of drug] in their possession. S/he simply needs to have made an [offer/agreement] to sell that drug.

[If it is alleged that a portion of the drug was unusable, add the following shaded section.]

In this case you have heard [evidence/arguments] that [some of] the [insert name of drug] allegedly trafficked by NOA was unusable because [insert evidence]. This is not relevant to the issue of whether or not it was a drug of dependence that the accused trafficked in. Even if a substance is unusable, it is still classified as a drug of dependence as long it contains [insert name of drug].

In this case, the prosecution provided the following evidence that the substance the accused allegedly trafficked was [insert name of drug and summary of relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert any evidence and/or arguments]. It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether that substance was a drug of dependence, namely [insert name of drug].

Intention to traffick in a drug of dependence

For this second element to be satisfied, the prosecution must also prove – beyond reasonable doubt – that the accused intended to traffick in a drug of dependence. That is, the accused deliberately [insert relevant act of trafficking] a prohibited drug.

There are two ways the prosecution can prove this part of the element.

First, the prosecution will prove this element if you are satisfied that NOA knew or was aware that it was a prohibited drug, such as [insert name of drug], that s/he was [insert relevant act of trafficking].

Second, if you are satisfied that NOA was aware there was a significant or real chance that s/he was [insert relevant act of trafficking] a prohibited drug, such as [insert name of drug], then you can consider that awareness in combination with all other evidence to decide whether to draw the conclusion that NOA intended to traffick a drug of dependence.

There is an important difference between these two paths. In the first, knowledge and awareness, that is enough by itself to prove the accused intended to traffick a drug of dependence. The second path involves you drawing a conclusion about what NOA intended from all the evidence, including anything you find proved about NOA's awareness of a significant or real chance that s/he was [insert relevant act of trafficking] a prohibited drug. I remind you that you must not draw a conclusion unless you are satisfied that it is the only conclusion that is reasonably open in the circumstances. If another reasonable explanation is available, then the prosecution will not have proved this element beyond reasonable doubt.

[If "wilful blindness" as to the nature of the substance arises as an issue, consider the shaded section.]

"Wilful blindness" may be relevant if there is evidence that the accused realised there was a risk that s/he was trafficking in a drug of dependence, and deliberately chose to close his/her eyes to that risk so that s/he could later deny knowledge and avoid liability.

There is also a third path to prove this element, which is similar to the second path I just described. If you find that NOA suspected the nature of the substance s/he was [insert relevant act of trafficking], and deliberately failed to make further inquiries for fear of learning the truth, then that would also provide a basis to draw a conclusion that s/he intended to traffick a drug of dependence. That is, s/he was aware that there was a risk that s/he was trafficking in a drug of dependence, but deliberately closed his/her eyes to that risk to avoid possible liability. In such a situation, you may conclude that although NOA did not positively know that s/he was trafficking a drug of dependence, s/he still intended to do so. Again, I remind you that you must not draw a conclusion unless you are satisfied that it is the only conclusion that is reasonably open in the circumstances.[1087]

In this case, the prosecution submitted that you should find that the accused intended to traffick in a drug of dependence from [insert prosecution evidence and argument].

[If the accused denied this intention due to ignorance of the drug's existence, consider the following section.]

[This may be relevant if the accused denied having an intention to traffick in a drug of dependence because they did not know of the existence or nature of the drug, or were not aware of the likelihood that it was a drug of dependence.]

The defence denied that NOA had an intention to traffick in a drug of dependence. They alleged that s/he did not know, or was not aware of the likelihood, that it was a drug s/he was [insert relevant act of trafficking]. [Insert relevant evidence and arguments.]

It is important to remember that it is the prosecution who must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused had the relevant intention. So if you are not satisfied that the accused knew or was aware of the likelihood that it was a drug s/he was trafficking, and there is no other basis from which you can infer that the accused intended to traffick in a drug of dependence, then this second element will not be met.

[Insert any defence evidence or arguments.]

So you must decide, based on all of the evidence, whether the substance trafficked by the accused was a drug of dependence, and that the accused intended to traffick in such a drug. It is only if you are satisfied of both of these matters, beyond reasonable doubt, that this second element will be met.

Possession of a traffickable quantity

[I*f it is alleged that the accused* possessed a traffickable quantity of drugs, and it is not common ground that the drugs were possessed for the purpose of trafficking, insert 7.6.1.16 Additional Direction: Possession of a Traffickable Quantity here.]

Commercial or Large Commercial Quantities

[If it is alleged that the accused trafficked in a large commercial (s 71) or commercial quantity (s 71AA) of a drug of dependence, insert 7.6.1.17 Additional Direction: Commercial or Large Commercial Quantities here.]

Trafficking to a Child

[If it is alleged that the accused trafficked to a child (s 71AB), insert 7.6.1.18 Additional Direction: Traficking to a Child here.]

Authorisation/Licence

[If it is alleged that the accused was authorised or licensed to traffick in a drug of dependence, insert 7.6.1.21 Additional Direction: Authorisation and Licensing here.]

[1087] Such cases of "wilful blindness" will be rare, and judges should be cautious before charging the jury about this possibility: R v Garlick (No.2) (2007) 15 VR 388; [2007] VSCA 23.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of trafficking in a drug of dependence, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that s/he intentionally committed an act of trafficking, being the [insert relevant act of trafficking] of a prohibited drug; and

Two – that s/he intentionally trafficked in a drug of dependence. That is, the substance s/he [insert relevant act of trafficking] was [insert name of drug], and that s/he intended to traffick in a prohibited drug.

[If it is alleged that the accused trafficked to a child, or in a commercial or large commercial quantity, add the following shaded section.]

- Three – that s/he intentionally trafficked [to a child/in not less than a commercial/large commercial quantity of that drug, being [insert quantity and name of drug]].

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of trafficking in a drug of dependence [to a child/in a commercial quantity/in a large commercial quantity].

Last updated:14 August 2023

7.6.1.3 Additional Direction: Selling, Exchanging or Manufacturing a Drug of Dependence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Insert the following section where indicated if it is alleged that the accused trafficked by selling, exchanging or manufacturing a drug of dependence.

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have intentionally committed an act of trafficking.

The law defines "trafficking" to include a number of different activities, such as selling, exchanging, offering to sell, agreeing to sell or manufacturing certain drugs, known as "drugs of dependence".

The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused did all of these things. For this element to be satisfied, the prosecution only needs to prove that the accused intentionally committed at least one of the acts specified by law.

In this case, the relevant act of trafficking is [selling/exchanging/manufacturing] a drug of dependence. This requires the prosecution to prove two things beyond reasonable doubt:

First, that the accused [sold/exchanged/manufactured] a drug of dependence – in this case [insert name of drug]; and Second, that the accused intended to [make that sale/make that exchange/manufacture that drug]. That is, they deliberately [made that sale/made that exchange/manufactured that drug].

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA [sold/exchanged/manufactured] a drug of dependence when [insert relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert any relevant evidence or arguments].

It is for you to determine, based on all of the evidence, whether NOA [sold/exchanged/manufactured] the [insert name of drug], and intended to [make that sale/make that exchange/manufacture that drug]. It is only if you are satisfied of both of these matters, beyond reasonable doubt, that this first element will be met.

Last updated: 2 March 2007

7.6.1.4 Checklist: Trafficking by Sale, Exchange or Manufacture

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used where it is alleged that the accused trafficked by selling, exchanging or manufacturing a drug of dependence.

Two elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

142. The accused intentionally committed an act of trafficking; and

143. The accused intentionally trafficked in a drug of dependence.

An Intentional Act of Trafficking

1.1 Did the accused [sell/exchange/manufacture] a drug?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

1.2 Did the accused intend to [sell/exchange/manufacture] that drug?

If Yes, then go to 2.1

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

A Drug of Dependence

2.1 Was the drug [sold/exchanged/manufactured] a "drug of dependence"?

Consider – [Insert name of drug] is a "drug of dependence"

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

2.2 Did the accused intend to [sell/exchange/manufacture] a drug of dependence?

If Yes, then the Accused is guilty of Trafficking (as long as you have also answered yes to questions 1.1, 1.2, and 2.1)

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

Last updated: 21 September 2011

7.6.1.5 Checklist: Trafficking by Sale, Exchange or Manufacture (Commercial or Large Commercial Quantity)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used where it is alleged that the accused trafficked in a large commercial or commercial quantity of drugs by sale, exchange or manufacture.

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally committed an act of trafficking;
2. The accused intentionally trafficked in a drug of dependence; and
3. The accused intentionally trafficked in not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of that drug.

An Intentional Act of Trafficking

1.1 Did the accused [sell/exchange/manufacture] a drug?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

1.2 Did the accused intend to [sell/exchange/manufacture] that drug?

If Yes, then go to 2.1

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

A Drug of Dependence

2.1 Was the drug [sold/exchanged/manufactured] a "drug of dependence"?

Consider – [Insert name of drug] is a "drug of dependence"

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

2.2 Did the accused intend to [sell/exchange/manufacture] a drug of dependence?

If Yes, then go to 3.1

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

Quantity

3.1 Did the accused [sell/exchange/manufacture] not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of a drug of dependence?

Consider – [Insert relevant weight of drug or number of plants] is a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of [insert name of drug].

If Yes, then go to 3.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking in a [commercial/large commercial quantity]

3.2 Did the accused intend to [sell/exchange/manufacture] not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of a drug of dependence?

If Yes, then the Accused is guilty of Trafficking in a [commercial/large commercial quantity] (as long as you have also answered yes to questions 1.1, 1.2, 2.1, 2.2 and 3.1)

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking in a [commercial/large commercial quantity]

Last updated: 2 March 2007

7.6.1.6 Additional Direction: Offering or Agreeing to Sell a Drug of Dependence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Insert the following section where indicated if it is alleged that the accused trafficked by offering or agreeing to sell a drug of dependence.

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have intentionally committed an act of trafficking.

The law defines "trafficking" to include a number of different activities, such as selling, exchanging, offering to sell, agreeing to sell or manufacturing certain drugs, known as "drugs of dependence".

The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused did all of these things. For this element to be satisfied, the prosecution only needs to prove that the accused intentionally committed at least one of the acts specified by law.

In this case, the relevant act of trafficking is [offering/agreeing] to sell a drug of dependence. This requires the prosecution to prove three things beyond reasonable doubt:

First, that the accused made a genuine [offer/agreement] to sell a drug of dependence – in this case [insert name of drug].

Second, that the accused intended to make that [offer/agreement]. That is, they deliberately [offered/agreed] to sell that drug.

Third, that the accused intended that the [offer/agreement] would be regarded as genuine by the purchaser.

[If relevant, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused actually possessed [insert name of drug], or was able to supply it to the purchaser. Nor do they need to prove that the accused ever intended to carry out the offer by providing [insert name of drug] to the purchaser. Even if the accused intended to supply a different drug, or to provide no drug at all, this first element will be satisfied as long as the prosecution have proved that s/he made a genuine [offer/agreement] to sell [insert name of drug], intending that the [offer/agreement] would be regarded as genuine.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA [offered/agreed] to sell a drug of dependence when [insert relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert any relevant evidence or arguments].

It is for you to determine, based on all of the evidence, whether NOA made a genuine [offer/agreement] to sell a drug of dependence, intended to make that [offer/agreement], and intended that [offer/agreement] to be regarded as genuine by the purchaser. It is only if you are satisfied of all three of these matters, beyond reasonable doubt, that this first element will be met.

Last updated: 2 March 2007

7.6.1.7 Checklist: Trafficking by Offering or Agreeing to Sell

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used where it is alleged that the accused trafficked by offering or agreeing to sell a drug of dependence.

Two elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally committed an act of trafficking; and
2. The accused intentionally trafficked in a drug of dependence.

An Intentional Act of Trafficking

1.1 Did the accused make a genuine [offer/agreement] to sell a drug?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

1.2 Did the accused intend to make that [offer/agreement]?

If Yes, then go to 1.3

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

1.3 Did the accused intend that [offer/agreement] to be regarded as genuine by the purchaser?

If Yes, then go to 2.1

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

A Drug of Dependence

2.1 Was the drug the accused [offered/agreed] to sell a "drug of dependence"?

Consider – [Insert name of drug] is a "drug of dependence"

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

2.2 Did the accused intend to [offer for sale/agree to sell] a drug of dependence?

If Yes, then the Accused is guilty of Trafficking (as long as you have also answered yes to questions 1.1, 1.2, 1.3 and 2.1)

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

Last updated: 2 March 2007

7.6.1.8 Checklist: Trafficking by Offering or Agreeing to Sell (Commercial or Large Commercial Quantity)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used where it is alleged that the accused trafficked in a large commercial or commercial quantity by offering or agreeing to sell a drug of dependence.

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally committed an act of trafficking;
2. The accused intentionally trafficked in a drug of dependence; and
3. The accused intentionally trafficked in not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of that drug.

An Intentional Act of Trafficking

1.1 Did the accused make a genuine [offer/agreement] to sell a drug?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

1.2 Did the accused intend to make that [offer/agreement]?

If Yes, then go to 1.3

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

1.3 Did the accused intend that [offer/agreement] to be regarded as genuine by the purchaser?

If Yes, then go to 2.1

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

2. A Drug of Dependence

2.1 Was the drug the accused [offered/agreed] to sell a "drug of dependence"?

Consider – [Insert name of drug] is a "drug of dependence"

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

2.2 Did the accused intend to [offer for sale/agree to sell] a drug of dependence?

If Yes, then go to 3.1

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

3. Quantity

3.1 Did the accused [offer/agree] to sell not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of a drug of dependence?

Consider – [Insert relevant weight of drug or number of plants] is a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of [insert name of drug].

If Yes, then go to 3.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking in a [commercial/large commercial quantity]

3.2 Did the accused intend to [offer/agree] to sell not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of a drug of dependence?

If Yes, then the Accused is guilty of Trafficking in a [commercial/large commercial quantity] (as long as you have also answered yes to questions 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 2.1, 2.2 and 3.1).

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking in a [commercial/large commercial quantity]

Last updated: 2 March 2007

7.6.1.9 Additional Direction: Preparing a Drug of Dependence for Trafficking

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Insert the following section where indicated if it is alleged that the accused trafficked by preparing a drug for trafficking.

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have intentionally committed an act of trafficking.

The law defines "trafficking" to include a number of different activities, such as selling, exchanging, offering to sell, preparing for trafficking or manufacturing certain drugs, known as "drugs of dependence".

The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused did all of these things. For this element to be satisfied, the prosecution only needs to prove that the accused intentionally committed at least one of the acts specified by law.

In this case, the relevant act of trafficking is preparing a drug of dependence for trafficking. This requires the prosecution to prove three things beyond reasonable doubt:

First, that the accused prepared a drug of dependence – in this case [insert name of drug]. "Prepare" is an ordinary English word, and it is for you to determine whether the [insert name of drug] was prepared by the accused.

Second, that the accused intended to make those preparations. That is, they made those preparations deliberately.

Third, that the accused prepared the drug for the purpose of trafficking. That is, when they prepared the drug, they intended that it would be sold, exchanged or otherwise ultimately moved to a consumer within a setting in which someone involved is making a profit.

In this case, the prosecution alleged NOA prepared a drug of dependence for the purpose of trafficking when [insert relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert any relevant evidence or arguments].

It is for you to determine, based on all of the evidence, whether NOA prepared the [insert name of drug], intended to make those preparations, and prepared it for the purpose of trafficking. It is only if you are satisfied of all three of these matters, beyond reasonable doubt, that this first element will be met.

Last updated: 2 March 2007

7.6.1.10 Checklist: Trafficking by Preparing a Drug for Trafficking

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used where it is alleged that the accused trafficked by preparing a drug of dependence for trafficking.

Two elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally committed an act of trafficking; and
2. The accused intentionally trafficked in a drug of dependence.

An Intentional Act of Trafficking

1.1 Did the accused prepare a drug?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

1.2 Did the accused intend to prepare that drug?

If Yes, then go to 1.3

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

1.3 Did the accused prepare that drug for the purpose of trafficking?

Consider – Did the accused intend that the drug would ultimately be sold, exchanged or otherwise moved from source to consumer within a setting in which someone involved is making a profit?

If Yes, then go to 2.1

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

A Drug of Dependence

2.1 Was the drug the accused prepared a "drug of dependence"?

Consider – [Insert name of drug] is a "drug of dependence"

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

2.2 Did the accused intend to prepare a drug of dependence?

If Yes, then the Accused is guilty of Trafficking (as long as you have also answered yes to questions 1.1, 1.2, 1.3 and 2.1)

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

Last updated: 2 March 2007

7.6.1.11 Checklist: Trafficking by Preparing a Drug for Trafficking (Commercial or Large Commercial Quantity)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used where it is alleged that the accused trafficked in a large commercial or commercial quantity by preparing a drug of dependence for trafficking.

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally committed an act of trafficking;
2. The accused intentionally trafficked in a drug of dependence; and
3. The accused intentionally trafficked in not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of that drug.

An Intentional Act of Trafficking

1.1 Did the accused prepare a drug?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

1.2 Did the accused intend to prepare that drug?

If Yes, then go to 1.3

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

1.3 Did the accused prepare that drug for the purpose of trafficking?

Consider – Did the accused intend that the drug would ultimately be sold, exchanged or otherwise moved from source to consumer within a setting in which someone involved is making a profit?

If Yes, then go to 2.1

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

A Drug of Dependence

2.1 Was the drug the accused prepared a "drug of dependence"?

Consider – [Insert name of drug] is a "drug of dependence"

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

2.2 Did the accused intend to prepare a drug of dependence?

If Yes, then go to 3.1

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

Quantity

3.1 Did the accused prepare for trafficking not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of a drug of dependence?

Consider – Insert relevant weight of drug or number of plants] is a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of [insert name of drug].

If Yes, then go to 3.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking in a [commercial/large commercial quantity]

3.2 Did the accused intend to prepare for trafficking not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of a drug of dependence?

If Yes, then the Accused is guilty of Trafficking in a [commercial/large commercial quantity] (as long as you have also answered yes to questions 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 2.1, 2.2 and 3.1).

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking in a [commercial/large commercial quantity]

Last updated: 2 March 2007

7.6.1.12 Additional Direction: Possessing a Drug of Dependence for Sale

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Insert the following section where indicated if it is alleged that the accused trafficked by possessing a drug for sale.

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have intentionally committed an act of trafficking.

The law defines "trafficking" to include a number of different activities, such as selling, exchanging, offering to sell, agreeing to sell or possessing for sale certain drugs, known as "drugs of dependence".

The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused did all of these things. For this element to be satisfied, the prosecution only needs to prove that the accused intentionally committed at least one of the acts specified by law.

In this case, the relevant act of trafficking is possessing a drug of dependence for sale. This requires the prosecution to prove two things beyond reasonable doubt:

First, that NOA possessed a drug of dependence – in this case [insert name of drug]. I will explain the meaning of "possession" in a moment.

Second, that NOA intended to sell that drug. I will explain what this means after I have told you the meaning of "possession".

Possession

According to the law, a person is said to have in their possession whatever is, to their knowledge, physically in their custody or under their physical control. In relation to the drug in question in this case, the [insert name of drug], this requires the prosecution to prove:

- That the accused had physical custody or control of the drug; and
- That the accused intended to have custody or exercise control over that drug; and
- That the accused knew that the substance over which they had custody or control was a drug, or were at least aware of the likelihood that it was a drug. That is, they were aware that there was a significant or real chance that the substance they possessed was a drug.

[If it is alleged that the accused was in possession of a drug that was not physically with them, add the following shaded section.]

According to this definition of possession, a person does not need to have been carrying the drug or to have had it on them to have it in their possession. They will be in possession of whatever is, to their knowledge, in their custody or under their control, even if it is not with them.

[In cases of joint possession, add the following shaded section.]

It is possible for more than one person to possess an item – so long as they each meet all of the requirements I have just mentioned.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA was in possession of [insert name of drug and insert relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert any relevant evidence or arguments].

It is for you to determine, based on all of the evidence, whether NOA was in possession of the [insert name of drug]. If you decide, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA had physical custody and control of that drug, intended to have such custody or control, and knew that the substance over which they had custody or control was a drug, or were at least aware of the likelihood that it was a drug, then s/he will have been in possession.

Intention to Sell

Even if you find that NOA was in possession of the [insert name of drug], this is not sufficient by itself for this first element to be satisfied. As I mentioned earlier, the prosecution must also prove that s/he intended to sell that drug. In other words, you must be satisfied that the accused possessed the [insert name of drug] for the purpose of selling it, rather than for another reason such as personal use.

It is not necessary for the prosecution to prove that NOA had a particular sale in mind, or knew who s/he was going to sell the drugs to. They only need to prove that the accused had a general intention to sell the drugs in the future.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that the accused had an intention to sell the [insert name of drug and relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert any evidence or arguments].

It is for you to determine, based on all of the evidence, whether NOA both possessed the [insert name of drug], and intended to sell it. It is only if you are satisfied of both of these matters, beyond reasonable doubt, that this first element will be met.

Last updated: 21 September 2011

7.6.1.13 Checklist: Trafficking by Possession for Sale

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Two elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally committed an act of trafficking; and
2. The accused intentionally trafficked in a drug of dependence.

An Intentional Act of Trafficking

1.1 Did the accused possess a drug?

1.1a Did the accused have physical custody or control of a drug?

If Yes, then go to 1.1b

If No, then the Accused did not possess the drug and is not guilty of Trafficking

1.1b Did the accused intend to have custody or exercise control over that drug?

If Yes, then go to 1.1c

If No, then the Accused did not possess the drug and is not guilty of Trafficking

1.1c Did the accused know that the substance over which they had custody or control was a drug, or were they aware of that likelihood?

If Yes, then the accused possessed the drug. Go to 1.2

If No, then the Accused did not possess the drug and is not guilty of Trafficking

1.2 Did the accused intend to sell that drug?

If Yes, then go to 2.1

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

A Drug of Dependence

2.1 Was the drug possessed for sale a "drug of dependence"?

Consider – [Insert name of drug] is a "drug of dependence"

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

2.2 Did the accused intend to possess for sale a drug of dependence?

If Yes, then the Accused is guilty of Trafficking (as long as you have also answered yes to questions 1.1a, 1.1b, 1.1c, 1.2, and 2.1)

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

Last updated: 2 March 2007

7.6.1.14 Checklist: Trafficking by Possession for Sale (Commercial or Large Commercial Quantity)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used where it is alleged that the accused trafficked in a large commercial or commercial quantity of drugs by having those drugs in possession for sale, if the prosecution relies on the common law definition of possession.

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally committed an act of trafficking;
2. The accused intentionally trafficked in a drug of dependence; and
3. The accused intentionally trafficked in not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of that drug.

An Intentional Act of Trafficking

1.1 Did the accused possess a drug?

1.1a Did the accused have physical custody or control of a drug?

If Yes, then go to 1.1b

If No, then the Accused did not possess the drug and is not guilty of Trafficking

1.1b Did the accused intend to have custody or exercise control over that drug?

If Yes, then go to 1.1c

If No, then the Accused did not possess the drug and is not guilty of Trafficking

1.1c Did the accused know that the substance over which they had custody or control was a drug, or were they aware of that likelihood?

If Yes, then the accused possessed the drug. Go to 1.2

If No, then the Accused did not possess the drug and is not guilty of Trafficking

1.2 Did the accused intend to sell that drug?

If Yes, then go to 2.1

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

A Drug of Dependence

2.1 Was the drug possessed for sale a "drug of dependence"?

Consider – [Insert name of drug] is a "drug of dependence"

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

2.2 Did the accused intend to possess for sale a drug of dependence?

If Yes, then go to 3.1

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

Quantity

3.1 Did the accused possess for sale not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of a drug of dependence?

Consider – [Insert relevant weight of drug or number of plants] is a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of [insert name of drug].

If Yes, then go to 3.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking in a [commercial/large commercial quantity]

3.2 Did the accused intend to possess for sale not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of a drug of dependence?

If Yes, then the Accused is guilty of Trafficking in a [commercial/large commercial quantity] (as long as you have also answered yes to questions 1.1a, 1.1b, 1.1c, 1.2, 2.1, 2.2 and 3.1).

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking in a [commercial/large commercial quantity]

Last updated: 21 September 2011

7.6.1.15 Additional Direction: Conducting a Business of Trafficking (Giretti Trafficking)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Insert the following section where indicated if it is alleged that the accused conducted a business of trafficking (Giretti trafficking).

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have carried on a business of trafficking.

This requires the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused was involved in a continuing trade or business of dealing in drugs over a period of time, or had at least been involved in the transmission of drugs from source to consumer on a regular and commercial basis.

In this case it is alleged that the accused conducted this business between [insert dates]. The business is alleged to have involved [insert acts of trafficking and name of drug].

Although for this element to be met you must find that the accused conducted a trafficking "business", it is not necessary for the prosecution to prove that the accused had set up a formal "business" structure, or had entered into an agreement with anyone to traffick in drugs. The word "business" is used in a broad sense, to mean that the accused had conducted a relatively continuous activity, over a period of time, involving commercial dealings in drugs.

You also do not need to find that the accused was conducting this business for the whole of the specified period. It is sufficient for the prosecution to prove that NOA was carrying on such a business for some portion of the period [insert dates].

However, it is not enough for the prosecution to simply prove that the accused committed a number of isolated acts of trafficking during this period of time. For example, proof that the accused sold drugs on two or three occasions during that time would not, by itself, be sufficient for you to find that the accused carried on an ongoing trafficking business. For this element to be met, you must be satisfied that the accused's activities took place with the necessary degree of regularity and system to amount to a "business" or "trade".

In other words, you must be able to draw an inference from all of the evidence in this case that the accused carried on a trafficking business, rather than having merely committed a few unrelated acts of trafficking.[1088] You will remember what I told you about inferences.

That is not to say that the prosecution must prove that the accused committed more than two or three acts of trafficking for this element to be met. Proof of two or three acts may be sufficient, if you can infer from those acts, and all of the other evidence in the case, that the accused was carrying on a business of trafficking over the relevant period.

In this case, the prosecution submitted that this inference should be drawn because [insert evidence capable of sustaining the inference]. The defence responded [insert any evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine whether to infer, from all of the facts and circumstances of the case, that NOA was involved in a continuing trade or business of dealing in drugs, or had at least been involved in the transmission of drugs from source to consumer on a regular and commercial basis. It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that this was the case that this first element will be met.

[1088] If the accused has admitted carrying on a business of trafficking, this section will need to be modified.

As what you are determining is whether the accused carried on a trafficking business, rather than having committed isolated acts of trafficking, this element will be satisfied even if you do not all agree about which particular acts of trafficking alleged by the prosecution have been proven – as long as you all agree that an inference can be drawn from all of the evidence that the accused conducted a business of trafficking.

However, it is important that you do not draw this inference unless you are satisfied that it is the only inference that is reasonably open in the circumstances. If any other reasonable explanation is available, then the prosecution will not have proved this element beyond reasonable doubt.

Last updated: 18 May 2016

7.6.1.16 Additional Direction: Possession of a Traffickable Quantity

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Insert the following section where indicated if it is alleged that the accused possessed a traffickable quantity of drugs, and it is not common ground that the drugs were possessed for the purpose of trafficking.

Note that if the accused has been charged with an offence contrary to ss 71, 71AA or 71AB, this section of the charge will need to modified to reflect the fact that the possession of a traffickable quantity provides sufficient evidence of the first two elements only.

As I have told you, it is for you to determine whether the prosecution has proved the two elements of this offence beyond reasonable doubt. That is, you must be satisfied that NOA intentionally committed an act of trafficking, and that what s/he trafficked in was a drug of dependence.

According to the law, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, proof that the accused possessed no less than [insert traffickable quantity and name of relevant drug] is sufficient to enable you to find that these elements have been met. In other words, if you are satisfied that the accused possessed not less than [insert traffickable quantity and name of relevant drug], that will be sufficient, by itself, for you to convict the accused – unless there is any conflicting evidence.

That is not to say that you must convict the accused in such circumstances. Although you may use uncontradicted evidence that the accused possessed that quantity of drugs to convict them, you may only do so if that evidence – either by itself or together with other evidence – satisfies you that the accused is guilty of trafficking beyond reasonable doubt.

So you must look at all of the evidence, including the quantity of drugs possessed by NOA, and consider whether you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he intentionally [insert relevant act of trafficking] a prohibited drug.

Last updated: 2 March 2007

7.6.1.17 Additional Direction: Commercial or Large Commercial Quantity

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Note – This charge is only for use in cases of trafficking on a single occasion. In cases of Giretti trafficking, use 7.6.1.1 Charge: Trafficking a Commercial/Large Commercial Quantity of a Drug of Dependence – Giretti trafficking.

Insert this section if it is alleged that the accused trafficked in a large commercial (s 71) or commercial quantity (s 71AA) of a drug of dependence.

The third element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused intentionally trafficked in not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of a drug of dependence. There are also two parts to this element. The prosecution must prove that the accused trafficked in the relevant quantity of [insert name of drug]. They must also prove that the accused intended to traffick in not less than that quantity.

The law says that [insert relevant weight or number of plants] is a [commercial/large commercial quantity] of [insert name of drug]. The first part of this element will therefore be satisfied if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA [insert relevant act of trafficking] not less than [insert relevant quantity and name of drug].

It is not necessary for the prosecution to establish the precise amount of drugs trafficked by the accused for this part of the element to be met. They only need to establish that the amount trafficked was not less than the amount specified by the law.

[If the prosecution relies on cuttings, add the following shaded section.]

In this case there has been a dispute about the number of plants trafficked by the accused. According to the law, a plant includes a cutting of a plant, whether or not it has roots. Even if it dies before becoming usable, it should still be counted as a "plant".[1089]

[If the quantity is measured by weight and the drugs had not been sold, add the following shaded section.]

In calculating the weight, you should use the weight of the drug at the time the offence was committed, rather than the amount it would have weighed when it was ultimately sold.

[If it is alleged that the trafficking was by offering or agreeing to sell a drug, add the following shaded section.]

The relevant quantity in this case is the [weight of the drug/number of plants] the accused [offered/agreed] to sell. The amount of drugs actually possessed by the accused, if any, is not relevant to this calculation.

[In cases of possession for sale, if a portion of the drugs possessed were unusable, add the following shaded section.]

The relevant quantity of drugs is not the [weight of the drug/number of plants] possessed by the accused, but the [weight of the drug/number of plants] possessed for sale. You should not include in your calculations any drugs possessed by the accused that they never intended to sell. This includes any portion of the drugs that you find were unusable, if the accused did not plan to sell that portion.

Remember, it is for the prosecution to prove that the accused possessed not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of drugs for sale. So if the prosecution cannot prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOA intended to sell an unusable portion of drugs, then that portion should not be included in your calculations.

In this case, the defence alleged that there was such a portion of unusable drugs. [Insert relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

In this case, the prosecution provided the following evidence that the accused allegedly trafficked in a [commercial/large commercial] quantity. [Insert relevant evidence.] The defence responded [insert any evidence and/or arguments]. It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, what [weight of the drug/number of plants], if any, was trafficked.

[1089] This section of the charge will need to be modified if the offence was alleged to have been committed prior to the commencement of s 8 of the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances (Amendment) Act 2006 on 1 May 2007. See 7.6.1 Trafficking in a Drug of Dependence for further information.

Intention to traffick in a commercial/large commercial quantity

For this third element to be satisfied, the prosecution must also prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that when the accused [describe relevant act of trafficking], s/he intended to traffick in not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity. That is, s/he deliberately [insert relevant act of trafficking] not less than [insert weight of the drug/number of plants and name of drug].

The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to traffick in that precise [weight of the drug/number of plants]. It is sufficient for the prosecution to prove that NOA intended to traffick in not less than [insert relevant weight or number of plants].

Applying my directions to you from the second element, you can find NOA intended to traffick in a commercial/large commercial quantity if you find s/he knew or was aware that s/he was going to traffick at least a commercial/large commercial quantity. You can also find this element proved if you draw a conclusion that s/he intended to traffick in a commercial/large commercial quantity by looking at all the evidence, including any evidence that NOA was aware of a significant or real chance that s/he was going to traffick at least a commercial/large commercial quantity.

You must apply the distinction I directed you about earlier between these two paths. The first proves the element directly. The second involves you drawing a conclusion from all the evidence. Remember that you must not draw a conclusion unless you are satisfied it is the only conclusion that is reasonably open in the circumstances.

[If "wilful blindness" as to the relevant threshold arises as an issue, consider the following shaded section.]

"Wilful blindness" may be relevant if there is evidence that the accused realised there was a risk that s/he was trafficking more than the relevant threshold, and deliberately chose to close his/her eyes to that risk so that s/he could later deny knowledge and avoid liability.

As with the second element, there is also a third path, which is similar to the second path that the accused was aware of a significant or real chance. If the prosecution proves that NOA suspected that the [weight of the drugs/number of plants] being trafficked was at least a commercial/large commercial quantity, and deliberately failed to make further inquiries for fear of learning the truth, then that would also provide a basis to draw a conclusion that s/he intended to traffick that quantity. That is, s/he was aware that there was a risk that s/he was [insert relevant trafficking act and relevant weight or number of plants], but deliberately closed [his/her] eyes to that risk to avoid possible liability. In such a situation, you may conclude that although NOA did not positively know that s/he was trafficking in a [commercial/large commercial] [weight of drugs/number of plants], s/he intended to traffick in such a [number/weight]. Again, you must not draw a conclusion unless you are satisfied that it is the only conclusion that is reasonably open in the circumstances. If another reasonable explanation is available, then the prosecution will not have proved this third element beyond reasonable doubt.[1090]

In this case, the prosecution submitted that you should find that the accused intended to traffick in not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity because [insert evidence capable of sustaining the inference].

[If the accused denied this intention due to ignorance of the quantity trafficked, add the following section.]

[This may be relevant if the accused denied having an intention to traffick in a [commercial/large commercial] quantity because s/he did not know*, or was not aware of the likelihood, that s/he was trafficking in such a quantity*.]

The defence denied that NOA had an intention to traffick in not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity, alleging that s/he did not know, or was not aware of the likelihood, that s/he was [insert relevant act of trafficking] that [weight/number of plants] of [insert name of drug]. [Insert relevant evidence and arguments.]

[1090] Such cases of "wilful blindness" will be rare, and judges should be cautious before charging the jury about this possibility: R v Garlick (No.2) (2007) 15 VR 388; [2007] VSCA 23.

It is important to remember that it is the prosecution who must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused had the relevant intention. So if you are not satisfied that accused knew or was aware of the likelihood s/he was trafficking in not less than a [commercial/large commercial] [weight/number of plants], and there is no other basis from which you can infer that the accused intended to traffick in that quantity, then this third element will not be met.

[Insert any other defence evidence or arguments.]

So you must decide, based on all of the evidence, both whether the accused trafficked in not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of a drug of dependence, and whether the accused intended to traffick in that quantity when s/he [identify relevant act]. It is only if you are satisfied of both of these matters, beyond reasonable doubt, that this third element will be met.

Last updated: 14 August 2023

7.6.1.18 Additional Direction: Trafficking to a Child

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Insert the following section where indicated if it is alleged that the accused trafficked to a child (s 71AB).

The third element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused intentionally trafficked to a child. There are also two parts to this element. The prosecution must prove that the accused trafficked to a child. They must also prove that the accused intended to traffick to a child.

The law says that a child is a person who is under 18 years old. The first part of this element will therefore be satisfied if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA [insert relevant act of trafficking and name of drug] to a person who was under 18 at that time.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA trafficked to a child when [insert summary of relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert any evidence and/or arguments].

Intention to traffick in a drug of dependence

For this third element to be satisfied, the prosecution must also prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused intended to traffick to a child. That is, they deliberately [insert relevant act of trafficking and name of drug] to a child.

Applying my directions to you from the second element, you can find NOA intended to traffick to a child if you find s/he was aware that s/he was going to traffick to a child. You can also find this element proved if you draw a conclusion that he intended to traffick to a child by looking at all the evidence, including any evidence that NOA was aware of a significant or real chance that s/he was going to traffick to a child.

You must apply the distinction I directed you about earlier between these two paths. The first proves the element directly. The second involves you drawing a conclusion from all the evidence. Remember that you must not draw a conclusion unless you are satisfied it is the only conclusion that is reasonably open in the circumstances.

[If the accused may have deliberately failed to inquire about the age of the person, consider the following section.]

[This may be relevant if an inference should be drawn from the fact that the accused deliberately failed to make inquiries about the age of the person they were trafficking to.]

You could also draw an inference that the accused intended to traffick to a child if you find that they deliberately failed to make inquiries about the age of the person to whom they were [insert relevant act of trafficking] the drug, in circumstances where they would have been suspicious about the age of that person. In such a situation, you may conclude that although the accused did not positively know that they were trafficking to a child, they nevertheless intended to traffick to one.

[If "wilful blindness" as to the age of the person being trafficked to arises as an issue, consider the shaded section.[1091]]

"Wilful blindness" may be relevant if there is evidence that the accused realised there was a risk that s/he was trafficking to a child, and deliberately chose to close his/her eyes to that risk so that s/he could later deny knowledge and avoid liability.

You could also draw an inference that NOA intended to traffick to a child if you find that, given the circumstances, [he/she] would have suspected that the person to whom [he/she] was [insert relevant act of trafficking] was under 18, and deliberately failed to make further inquiries for fear of learning the truth. That is, [he/she] was aware that there was a risk that [he/she] was trafficking to a child, but deliberately closed [his/her] eyes to that risk to avoid possible liability. In such a situation, you may conclude that although NOA did not positively know that [he/she] was trafficking to a child, [he/she] nevertheless intended to do so.

In this case, the prosecution submitted that you should infer that the accused intended to traffick to a child because [insert evidence capable of sustaining the inference].

[If the accused denied having this intention because they did not know the child's age, add the following section.]

The defence denied that NOA had an intention to traffick to a child, alleging that [he/she] did not know, or was not aware of the likelihood, that it was a child [he/she] was [insert relevant act of trafficking] the [insert name of drug] to. [Insert relevant evidence and arguments.]

It is important to remember that it is the prosecution who must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused had the relevant intention. So if you are not satisfied that accused knew or was aware of the likelihood that it was a child to whom they were trafficking, and there is no other basis from which you can infer that the accused intended to traffick to a child, then this third element will not be met.

[Insert any other defence evidence or arguments.]

So you must decide, based on all of the evidence, whether the accused trafficked to a child, and whether the accused intended to traffick to a child. It is only if you are satisfied of both of these matters, beyond reasonable doubt, that this third element will be met.

Last updated: 14 August 2023

7.6.1.19 Checklist: Trafficking to a Child (Sale or Exchange)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally committed an act of trafficking;
2. The accused intentionally trafficked in a drug of dependence; and
3. The accused intentionally trafficked to a child.

An Intentional Act of Trafficking

[1091] Such cases of "wilful blindness" will be rare, and judges should be cautious before charging the jury about this possibility: R v Garlick (No.2) (2007) 15 VR 388; [2007] VSCA 23.

1.1 Did the accused [sell/exchange] a drug?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

1.2 Did the accused intend to [sell/exchange] that drug?

If Yes, then go to 2.1

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

A Drug of Dependence

2.1 Was the drug [sold/exchanged] a "drug of dependence"?

Consider – [Insert name of drug] is a "drug of dependence"

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

2.2 Did the accused intend to [sell/exchange] a drug of dependence?

If Yes, then go to 3.1

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

Child

3.1 Did the accused [sell/exchange] a drug of dependence [to/with] a child?

Consider – A child is a person who was under 18 years old at the time the offence was committed.

If Yes, then go to 3.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking to a Child

3.2 Did the accused intend to [sell/exchange] a drug of dependence [to/with] a child?

If Yes, then the Accused is guilty of Trafficking to a Child (as long as you have also answered yes to questions 1.1, 1.2, 2.1, 2.2 and 3.1)

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking to a Child

Last updated: 2 March 2007

7.6.1.20 Checklist: Trafficking to a Child (Offering or Agreeing to Sell)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally committed an act of trafficking;
2. The accused intentionally trafficked in a drug of dependence; and

3. The accused intentionally trafficked to a child.

An Intentional Act of Trafficking

1.1 Did the accused make a genuine [offer/agreement] to sell a drug?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

1.2 Did the accused intend to make that [offer/agreement]?

If Yes, then go to 1.3

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

1.3 Did the accused intend that [offer/agreement] to be regarded as genuine by the purchaser?

If Yes, then go to 2.1

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

A Drug of Dependence

2.1 Was the drug the accused [offered/agreed] to sell a "drug of dependence"?

Consider – [Insert name of drug] is a "drug of dependence"

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

2.2 Did the accused intend to [offer for sale/agree to sell] a drug of dependence?

If Yes, then go to 3.1

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking

Child

3.1 Did the accused [offer/agree] to sell a drug of dependence to a child?

Consider – A child is a person who was under 18 years old at the time the offence was committed.

If Yes, then go to 3.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking to a Child

3.2 Did the accused intend to [offer/agree] to sell a drug of dependence to a child?

If Yes, then the Accused is guilty of Trafficking to a Child (as long as you have also answered yes to questions 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 2.1, 2.2 and 3.1)

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Trafficking to a Child

Last updated: 2 March 2007

7.6.1.21 Additional Direction: Authorisation and Licensing

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Insert this section where indicated if it is alleged that the accused was authorised or licensed to traffick in a drug of dependence.

A person who is [authorised/licensed] to traffick in a drug of dependence will not be guilty of trafficking. In this case, the defence alleged that NOA was [authorised/licensed] to do so by virtue of [insert relevant evidence]. The prosecution disputed this, submitting that [insert relevant evidence].[1092]

Unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – this is a matter which the defence must prove on the balance of probabilities. That is, you must be satisfied by the defence that it is more likely than not that NOA was [authorised/licensed] to traffick in a drug of dependence. If the defence cannot prove this to you, and the prosecution has also proven both elements of the offence, then you should find the accused guilty of trafficking.

Summary

[Insert this section after the summary of the trafficking offence, if it is alleged that the accused was authorised or licensed to traffick in a drug of dependence.]

However, even if you decide that these elements have been proven, NOA will not be guilty if the defence has proven, on the balance of probabilities, that s/he was [authorised/licensed] by law to traffick in a drug of dependence.

Last updated: 2 March 2007

7.6.2 Cultivation of Narcotic Plants

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Commencement Information

1. The Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981 (the "Drugs Act") establishes three separate cultivation offences, each of which came in to force on 1 January 2002:

    i) Section 72 – Cultivation of a large commercial quantity of narcotic plants;

    ii) Section 72A – Cultivation of a commercial quantity of narcotic plants; and

    iii) Section 72B – Cultivation of narcotic plants.

Elements

2. For each of the cultivation offences, the prosecution must prove the following elements beyond reasonable doubt:

    i) That the accused intentionally cultivated or attempted to cultivate a particular substance;

[1092] Provisions concerning authorisation and licensing are contained in Divisions 2 and 4 of the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981. See also ss 118 and 119 of that Act for evidentiary provisions that may be of assistance in relation to such matters.

and

ii) That it was a narcotic plant that the accused cultivated or attempted to cultivate.

3. In relation to ss 72 and 72A the prosecution must also prove that the accused intentionally cultivated, or attempted to cultivate, not less than a large commercial or commercial quantity of narcotic plants respectively.

4. Each of the cultivation provisions exclude from their scope people who are authorised or licensed to cultivate a narcotic plant (see "Authorisation and Licensing" below).

"Cultivation"

5. Section 70(1) defines "cultivate" to include:

   (a) sowing a seed of a narcotic plant; or

   (b) planting, growing, tending, nurturing or harvesting a narcotic plant.

6. This definition has been amended by the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances (Amendment) Act 2006, to include grafting, dividing or transplanting a narcotic plant. The new definition commences operation on 1 May 2007 unless proclaimed earlier.

7. The definition of "cultivate" is inclusive and should not be treated as exhaustive or read down (see, e.g. Eager v Smith (1988) 38 A Crim R 272 (NSW SC) in relation to a similar NSW provision).

8. In New South Wales, the acts of watering a plant or a seed, and keeping a seed in wet tissue paper with the intention of eventually harvesting a fully grown plant, have been held to be acts of "cultivation" (Eager v Smith (1988) 38 A Crim R 272 (NSW SC)).

9. In South Australia it has held that the definition of "cultivation" includes helping to harvest a crop. This is because the term "cultivation" is intended to incorporate the whole process of producing a drug from the soil. It therefore includes all activities associated with production from the soil, from preparing the soil to removing and stacking the harvested crop (Giorgi and Romeo v R (1982) 31 SASR 299).

10. In South Australia it has also been held that a land owner who provides land for cultivation has "cultivated" the plants grown on that land (Pettingill v R (1985) 21 A Crim R 130 (SA SC)).

11. Evidence that a person possessed cannabis seeds will not, by itself, be sufficient to prove cultivation. However, such evidence may be taken into account, with all of the other evidence, when determining whether the accused cultivated a narcotic plant (Orchard v R (1993) 70 A Crim R 289 (NSW CCA)).

12. Evidence that a person possessed cannabis is not evidence that they cultivated the plants which produced the cannabis (Natale v R (1988) 38 A Crim R 122 (Vic CCA)).

13. In Queensland it has been held that while an isolated act may constitute cultivation, normally the activity of cultivation is a continuing one. It is usually constituted by repeated or varying acts, performed with the purpose of fostering the growth of plants and achieving a final harvest from those plants (R v Stratford and McDonald (1984) 1 Qd R 361).

14. In cases involving ongoing activity, it is the whole of the continuing activity which constitutes the cultivation. In cases involving individual acts, the acts themselves constitute the cultivation (R v Stratford and McDonald (1984) 1 Qd R 361).

15. The relevant act of cultivation must have been performed intentionally. It may therefore be necessary to differentiate intentional acts of cultivation from unintentional acts, such as the accidental application of water to a plant, or any other acts which may have the unintended effect of encouraging the growth of a plant (R v Stratford and McDonald (1984) 1 Qd R 361).

Attempted Cultivation

16. Each of the cultivation provisions make it an offence to cultivate or "attempt to cultivate" in the specified manner. A person can therefore be charged with attempted cultivation directly under ss 72, 72A or 72B of the Drugs Act, rather than having to rely on s 321M of the Crimes Act 1958.

17. A person charged with attempted cultivation under one of these provisions will be subject to the same penalties as a person charged with cultivation. In contrast, a person who is charged with attempted cultivation under s 321M of the Crimes Act 1958 will be subject to the lesser penalties set out in s 321P of that Act.

18. Section 321N of the Crimes Act 1958 sets out the conduct that will constitute an attempt. This section applies to a person charged with attempted cultivation under the provisions of the Drugs Act by virtue of s 321R of the Crimes Act 1958.

19. For more information about attempts see Attempts.

"Narcotic Plant"

20. The plant cultivated by the accused must have been a "narcotic plant". Section 70(1) defines "narcotic plant" to mean "any plant the name of which is specified in column 1 of Part 2 of Schedule Eleven" of the Drugs Act. This includes cannabis, as well as two types of coca plant and two types of opium poppy.

21. The definition of "narcotic plant" has been amended by the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances (Amendment) Act 2006, to include a cutting of such a plant, whether or not the cutting has roots. This Act also amends the plants included in Part 2 of Schedule Eleven. The new provisions commence operation on 1 May 2007 unless proclaimed earlier.

22. Section 120 of the Drugs Act provides that a certificate purporting to be signed by an analyst with respect to any analysis or examination he or she has made shall be sufficient evidence of the identity of the substance analysed, of the result of the analysis and of the matters relevant to the proceedings as stated in the certificate. Section 120 also provides that a certificate purporting to be signed by a botanist shall be sufficient evidence of the identity of the substance examined. There is no need to provide proof that the person who signed the certificate is an analyst or botanist, or to provide proof of their signature.

23. The provisions in s 120 do not apply if the certificate was not served on the defence at least seven days before the hearing, or if the defence, at least three days before the hearing, gave notice in writing to the informant and the analyst or botanist that the analyst or botanist is required to attend as a witness (s 120(2)).

No Need to Prove an Intention to Cultivate a Narcotic Plant

24. Although the related offences of trafficking (see 7.6.1 Trafficking in a Drug of Dependence) and possession (see 7.6.3 Possession of a Drug of Dependence) require the prosecution to prove that the accused intended to traffick in or possess a drug of dependence, there is no similar requirement in relation to the cultivation offences. The prosecution does not have to prove that the accused intended to cultivate a narcotic plant (R v Pantorno [1988] VR 195).

25. This is because of s 72C of the Drugs Act. This section states that it is a defence to a charge of cultivation if the accused can prove that they did not know or suspect, and could not reasonably have been expected to have known or suspected, that the narcotic plant was a narcotic plant (see "Knowledge of the Nature of the Plant" below). It has been held that this section places the onus on the accused to prove, on the balance of probabilities, that they did not have the requisite intention, rather than requiring the prosecution to prove that intention (R v Pantorno [1988] VR 195).

Quantities

Commercial and Large Commercial Quantities

26. There are two cultivation offences that specify the quantity of narcotic plants that must be cultivated if an accused is to be found guilty:
    - Section 72 – cultivation of a "large commercial quantity"; and
    - Section 72A – cultivation of a "commercial quantity".
27. "Large commercial quantity" is defined in s 70(1) of the Drugs Act, and includes the quantity of drugs, or the number of plants, specified in column 1A of Part 2 of Schedule Eleven to the Act.
28. "Commercial quantity" is defined in s 70(1) of the Drugs Act and includes the quantity of drugs, or the number of plants, specified in column 2 of Part 2 of Schedule Eleven.
29. The offence of cultivating narcotic plants under s 72B does not require proof that the accused cultivated any particular quantity of narcotic plants.
30. The quantities of drugs included in Part 2 of Schedule Eleven were recently modified by the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances (Amendment) Act 2006, with the new provision commencing operation on 1 May 2007 unless proclaimed earlier.

Determining Quantity

31. The quantity of Cannabis L can be determined either by weight or by the number of plants. The quantity of the other narcotic plants specified in Part 2 of Schedule Eleven must be determined by weight.
32. If determining the quantity by weight, it is appropriate to make the measurement in light of the conditions existing at the time that the offence is seen to have been committed (R v Coviello (1995) 81 A Crim R 293 (Vic CCA)).
33. In relation to cannabis, this means that if a crop was "green" at the relevant time, it is the weight of the drug in such a condition which is to be measured. The quantity is not what it would be when dried, even though the drug only becomes usable when in that condition (R v Coviello (1995) 81 A Crim R 293 (Vic CCA)).
34. If determining the quantity by the number of plants, it may be necessary to define the meaning of the word "plant". It has been held that while the word is an ordinary English word, the jury should not be left at large to determine its meaning, because it is capable of a wide range of interpretations. Where relevant to the issues in the trial, the judge must tell the jury the meaning of the word in its statutory context (R v Francis-Wright (2005) 11 VR 354).
35. It has been held that a cutting of cannabis becomes a plant when it develops a root. It can then be regarded as an entity separate from the plant from which it has been cut, rather than being a part of that plant. The root need not be a root system, nor does it need to be viable. Once a cutting becomes a plant, it continues to be a plant, even if it dies (R v Francis-Wright (2005) 11 VR 354).
36. As the word "plant" is an ordinary English word, expert evidence about its meaning is inadmissible (R v Francis-Wright (2005) 11 VR 354).
37. The definition of "narcotic plant" has recently been amended by the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances (Amendment) Act 2006, to include "a cutting of such a plant, whether or not the cutting has roots". It seems likely that this amendment, which commences operation on 1 May 2007 unless proclaimed earlier, will override the method for determining the number of plants set down in R v Francis-Wright (2005) 11 VR 354.

Intention to Cultivate a Particular Quantity of Plant

38. Because the offences specified in ss 72 (cultivating a large commercial quantity) and 72A (cultivating a commercial quantity) are defined by quantities, to convict a person of these offences they must be shown to have intended to cultivate not less than the specified quantity (R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Garlick [2006] VSCA 127); R v Garlick (No.2) (2007) 15 VR 388; R v Filipovic [2008] VSCA 14; R v Page [2008] VSCA 54; Brooks v R [2010] VSCA 322).

39. The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to cultivate a commercial or large commercial quantity of a narcotic plant. They need only prove that the accused intended to cultivate a commercial or large commercial quantity of the plant in issue.

40. It is not sufficient for the prosecution to prove that the accused intended to cultivate plants, and those plants in fact weighed the specified amount, or that the accused intended to cultivate plants which "might approximate" the specified quantity. The intention must be to cultivate at least the specified quantity (R v Garlick (No.2) (2007) 15 VR 388; R v McKittrick [2008] VSCA 69).

41. This does not mean that the accused must have known what the legal threshold was, or what the actual weight or number of the plants cultivated was. The question is whether the accused intended to cultivate a weight or number of plants that was at least the weight or number specified in Schedule Eleven of the Drugs Act (R v Garlick (No.2) (2007) 15 VR 388; Brooks v R [2010] VSCA 322).

42. Although this intention may be proved by an admission of the accused, in most cases it will be necessary to infer the requisite intention from the performance of the proscribed act and the circumstances in which it was performed (Bahri Kural v R (1987) 162 CLR 502; He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; R v Garlick [2006] VSCA 127; R v Page [2008] VSCA 54).

43. It will usually be possible to infer an intention to cultivate a commercial or large commercial quantity of plants if it can be established that the accused knew that that quantity of plants was being cultivated (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; Bahri Kural v R (1987) 162 CLR 502; He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523).

44. However, the prosecution does not need to prove knowledge of the exact quantity of plants cultivated. It is possible that the requisite intent could instead be inferred from a lesser state of mind, such as:

    - A belief that that quantity was being cultivated (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; Bahri Kural v R (1987) 162 CLR 502); or
    - An awareness that there was a significant or real chance that that quantity was being cultivated (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; Bahri Kural v R (1987) 162 CLR 502; R v Filipovic [2008] VSCA 14; R v Page [2008] VSCA 54; Brooks v R [2010] VSCA 322).

45. In some cases, it may also be possible to infer an intention to cultivate a specified quantity from the fact that:

    - The circumstances were such that the accused's suspicions that the specified quantity of plants was being cultivated would have been aroused; and
    - The accused deliberately failed to make inquiries about the quantity being cultivated, for fear of learning the truth (R v Garlick (No.2) (2007) 15 VR 388. See also He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523; Bahri Kural v R (1987) 162 CLR 502; R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464).

46. However, such cases of "wilful blindness" will be rare, and judges should be cautious before charging the jury about this possibility. There must be evidence that the accused realised there was a risk that s/he was cultivating more than the relevant threshold, and deliberately chose to close his or her eyes to that risk so that s/he could later deny knowledge and avoid liability. In the absence of such evidence, it will be a misdirection to direct the jury about wilful blindness (R v Garlick (No.2) (2007) 15 VR 388).

47. It may be possible for the jury to infer the requisite state of mind from proof that the accused cultivated the required quantity of plants. However, this will not always be the case (He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523).

48. While the states of mind outlined above (other than wilful blindness) will usually support an inference of the requisite intention, this will not always be the case. A judge should therefore not instruct the jury that they may convict simply because, for example, the prosecution established that the accused was aware that there was a significant or real chance that they had cultivated the requisite quantity (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; R v Garlick [2006] VSCA 127; R v Reed [2008] VSCA 20; R v Page [2008] VSCA 54).

49. The jury should instead be directed that proof that the accused was aware of the likelihood that they were cultivating the requisite quantity of plants is capable of sustaining the inference that the accused intended to cultivate that quantity. At the same time, the judge should make clear to the jury that it is for them to determine whether that inference should be drawn, based on all of the facts and circumstances (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; R v Garlick [2006] VSCA 127; R v Reed [2008] VSCA 20; R v Page [2008] VSCA 54).

50. In charging the jury on this issue, judges should follow as nearly as possible the language used in R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299. In particular, care must be taken to ensure that the phrase "is capable of sustaining the inference" is used whenever reference is made in this context to proof of belief "in a significant or real chance" (R v Page [2008] VSCA 54).

51. The jury must be instructed that an inference is not to be drawn unless they are satisfied that it is the only inference that is reasonably open in the circumstances of the case (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; R v Page [2008] VSCA 54).

52. Where intention is to be proved by inference, the judge should direct the jury as to any evidence capable of sustaining that inference (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Page [2008] VSCA 54).

53. A judge should not attempt to explain the meaning of the expression "significant or real chance", other than to tell the jury that the words have their ordinary meaning and that it is a question for them to decide (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299).

54. Even though the issue of intent may not be a live issue in a trial, and may not have been raised by the defence, as it is an element of the offence a judge is required to direct the jury about it, unless the defence has conceded that a direction is not required (R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300).

Defences, Exceptions and Mitigating Circumstances

Authorisation and Licensing

55. Each of the cultivation offences specifies that a person will be guilty if they cultivate in the specified manner, "without being authorized by or licensed under this Act or the regulations to do so".

56. It has been held that the question of authorisation or licensing is a matter of "exception" or "qualification" for the purposes of s 104 of the Drugs Act. This section states that the burden of proving any "matter of exception qualification or defence" lies on the accused. It is therefore for the accused to prove, on the balance of probabilities, that they were appropriately authorised or licensed – rather than being for the prosecution to disprove beyond reasonable doubt (R v Ibrahim (1987) 27 A Crim R 460; Horman v Bingham [1972] VR 29).

57. Provisions concerning authorisation and licensing are contained in Divisions 2 and 4 of the Act respectively.

58. Sections 118 and 119 of the Act contain evidentiary provisions that may be of assistance in cases where there is a dispute about authorisation or licensing.

Knowledge of the Nature of the Plant

59. Under s 72C of the Drugs Act, it will be a defence to a charge of cultivation under sections 72, 72A or 72B if the accused "adduces evidence which satisfies the court on the balance of probabilities that, having regard to all the circumstances (including his or her conduct)... he or she did not know or suspect and could not reasonably have been expected to have known or suspected that the narcotic plant was a narcotic plant".

60. Due to this section, if the accused wishes to argue that they should be found not guilty of cultivation because they did not know or suspect that they were cultivating a narcotic plant, it will be for them to prove to the jury. They will need to prove to the jury, on the balance of probabilities, that:

    - They did not know or suspect that the plant they were cultivating was a narcotic plant; and
    - They could not reasonably have been expected to have known or suspected that it was a narcotic plant.

Mitigating Circumstances

61. Section 72B provides for a lesser penalty where the trial judge (or magistrate) is satisfied that the offence was not committed for any purpose related to trafficking.

62. Prior to 1 January 2002, the legislation stated that the act of cultivation provided prima facie evidence of trafficking. This is no longer the case (see, e.g. R v Mason [2006] VSCA 55).

Trafficking, Cultivation and Possession

63. If the relevant acts of trafficking, cultivation and/or possession completely overlap, a conviction should only be recorded in relation to one of the offences (R v Langdon (2004) 11 VR 18; R v Mason [2006] VSCA 55; R v Nguyen [2006] VSCA 158; R v Nunno [2008] VSCA 31; R v Filipovic [2008] VSCA 14)[1093] See 7.6.1 Trafficking in a Drug of Dependence for further information.

Last updated: 27 March 2019

7.6.2.1 Charge: Cultivation of Narcotic Plants

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of cultivating narcotic plants. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 2 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused intentionally cultivated a plant.

Two – the plant cultivated by the accused was a narcotic plant.

I will now explain these elements in more detail.

Cultivation

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have intentionally cultivated a plant.

[1093] This may occur, for example, where the accused is charged with trafficking and cultivation, and the trafficking charge is based on the fact that the plants were in the accused's possession for sale (see, e.g. R v Mason [2006] VSCA 55; R v Filipovic [2008] VSCA 14).

The law defines cultivation to include [insert one or more of the following as relevant: planting, growing, tending, nurturing, harvesting, sowing the seeds of] a plant.[1094]

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA cultivated a plant when [insert relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert any relevant evidence or arguments].

It is for you to determine, based on all of the evidence, whether NOA cultivated the relevant plants, and did so intentionally. It is only if you are satisfied of this, beyond reasonable doubt, that the first element will be met.

Narcotic Plant

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the plants cultivated by the accused were narcotic plants.

The law says that [insert name of plant] is a narcotic plant. This element will therefore be satisfied if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA cultivated [insert name of plant].

[If it is alleged that a portion of the plant was unusable, add the following shaded section.]

In this case you have heard [evidence/arguments] that [some of] the [insert name of plant] allegedly cultivated by NOA was unusable because [insert evidence]. This is not relevant to the issue of whether or not it was a narcotic plant that the accused cultivated. Even if a substance is unusable, it is still classified as a narcotic plant, as long it is [insert name of plant].

In this case, the prosecution provided the following evidence that the plant allegedly cultivated by the accused was [insert name of plant and summary of relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert any evidence and/or arguments]. It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether that plant was a narcotic plant, namely [insert name of plant].

Lack of Knowledge that the Plant was a Narcotic Plant (Section 72C Defence)

[If the s 72C defence of lack of knowledge is raised, add the shaded section.]

Even if you find that the prosecution has proven both of these elements, NOA will not necessarily be guilty of this offence. This is because there are certain circumstances in which the law allows a person to commit acts that would otherwise be illegal. That is, [he/she] may have a defence to the charge of cultivation.

The law states that it is a defence to the charge of cultivation if a person can prove that [he/she] did not know or suspect, and could not reasonably have been expected to have known or suspected, that the plant [he/she] was cultivating was a narcotic plant.

There are two parts to this defence. First, the accused must prove that [he/she] did not know or suspect that the plant [he/she] was cultivating was a narcotic plant.

Second, the accused must also prove that [he/she] could not reasonably have been expected to have known or suspected that the plant [he/she] was cultivating was a narcotic plant. That is, in all of the circumstances in which it is alleged the cultivation took place, it would have been unreasonable to expect NOA to have known or suspected that the plants [he/she] was cultivating were narcotic plants.

[1094] The definition of cultivation is inclusive. If the specific act of cultivation alleged is not included in the definition above, the charge will need to be adapted accordingly. See 7.6.2 Cultivation of Narcotic Plants for further guidance.

It is the defence who must prove these two matters to you. However, unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – the defence only needs to prove these matters on what is called the "balance of probabilities". That is, the defence needs to prove that it is more probable than not that NOA did not know or suspect, and could not reasonably have been expected to have known or suspected, that the plant he/she was cultivating was a narcotic plant.

If you are satisfied by the defence that both of these matters have been proven on the balance of probabilities, then this defence will be successful and you must find NOA not guilty of cultivation. This will be the case even if you find that both elements of the offence have been met.

However, if the defence cannot prove, on the balance of probabilities, both that NOA did not know or suspect that the plant [he/she] was cultivating was a narcotic plant, and that [he/she] could not reasonably have been expected to have known or suspected that the plant [he/she] was cultivating was a narcotic plant, then this defence will fail. If you are also satisfied that each of the elements of the offence have been proven by the prosecution, beyond reasonable doubt, you should find NOA guilty of cultivation.

[Insert relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Authorisation/License

[If the defence alleged that the accused was authorised to cultivate narcotic plants, add the following shaded section.]

A person who is [authorised/licensed] to cultivate narcotic plants will not be guilty of the offence of cultivation. In this case, the defence alleged that NOA was [authorised/licensed] to do so by virtue of [insert relevant evidence]. The prosecution disputed this, submitting that [insert relevant evidence].[1095]

Unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – this is a matter which the defence must prove on the balance of probabilities. That is, you must be satisfied that it is more likely than not that NOA was [authorised/licensed] to cultivate narcotic plants. If the defence cannot prove this to you, and the prosecution has also proven both of the elements of the offence, then you should find the accused guilty of cultivation.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of cultivation of narcotic plants, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that [he/she] intentionally cultivated a plant; and

Two – that the plant that [he/she] allegedly cultivated was a narcotic plant, in this case [insert name of plant].

If you find that either of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of cultivation of narcotic plants.

[If the s 72C defence of lack of knowledge has been raised, add the following shaded section.]

However, even if you decide that these elements have been proven, NOA will not be guilty if the defence has proven, on the balance of probabilities, that he/she did not know or suspect, and could not reasonably have been expected to have known or suspected, that the plant he/she was cultivating was a narcotic plant.

[1095] Provisions concerning authorization and licensing are contained in Divisions 2 and 4 of the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981. See also ss 118 and 119 of that Act for evidentiary provisions that may be of assistance in relation to such matters.

[If the defence alleged that the accused was authorised to cultivate narcotic plants, add the following shaded section.]

However, even if you decide that these elements have been proven, NOA will not be guilty if the defence has proven, on the balance of probabilities, that he/she was [authorised/licensed] by law to cultivate narcotic plants.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

7.6.2.2 Checklist: Cultivation of Narcotic Plants (Simple)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used if the accused is charged with cultivation of narcotic plants contrary to s 72B, and the accused has not raised a defence under s 72C.

Two elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally cultivated a plant; and
2. The plant cultivated by the accused was a narcotic plant.

An Intentional Act of Cultivation

1. Did the accused intentionally cultivate a plant?

Consider – "Cultivation" includes planting, growing, tending, nurturing, harvesting and sowing the seeds of a plant.

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Cultivation of Narcotic Plants

A Narcotic Plant

2. Was the plant cultivated a "narcotic plant"?

Consider – [Insert name of plant] is a "narcotic plant"

If Yes, then the Accused is guilty of Cultivation of Narcotic Plants (as long as you also answered yes to question 1).

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Cultivation of Narcotic Plants

Last updated: 2 March 2007

7.6.2.3 Checklist: Cultivation of Narcotic Plants (Section 72C Defence)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used if the accused is charged with cultivation of narcotic plants contrary to s 72B, and the accused has raised the s 72C defence that the accused did not know or suspect, and could not reasonably have been expected to have known or suspected, that the plant they were cultivating was a narcotic plant.

Two elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally cultivated a plant; and
2. The plant cultivated by the accused was a narcotic plant.

An Intentional Act of Cultivation

1. Did the accused intentionally cultivate a plant?

Consider – "Cultivation" includes planting, growing, tending, nurturing, harvesting and sowing the seeds of a plant.

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Cultivation of Narcotic Plants

A Narcotic Plant

2. Was the plant cultivated a "narcotic plant"?

Consider – [Insert name of plant] is a "narcotic plant"

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Cultivation of Narcotic Plants

Defence of Lack of Knowledge

Two matters the defence must prove on the balance of probabilities:

3. That the accused did not know or suspect that the plant they were cultivating was a narcotic plant; and

4. That the accused could not reasonably have been expected to have known or suspected that the plant they were cultivating was a narcotic plant.

Accused's Knowledge

3. Has the defence proven, on the balance of probabilities, that the accused did not know or suspect that the plant they were cultivating was a narcotic plant?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the Accused is guilty of Cultivation of Narcotic Plants (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 and 2)

Reasonable Expectation

4. Has the defence proven, on the balance of probabilities, that the accused could not reasonably have been expected to have known or suspected that the plant they were cultivating was a narcotic plant?

If Yes, then the Accused is not guilty of Cultivation of Narcotic Plants (as long as you also answered yes to question 3)

If No, then the Accused is guilty of Cultivation of Narcotic Plants (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 and 2)

Last updated: 2 March 2007

7.6.2.4 Charge: Cultivation of a Commercial or Large Commercial Quantity of Narcotic Plants

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of cultivating a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of a narcotic plant. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused intentionally cultivated a plant.

Two – the plant cultivated by the accused was a narcotic plant.

Three – the accused intentionally cultivated a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of the plant.

I will now explain these elements in more detail.

Cultivation

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have intentionally cultivated a plant.

The law defines cultivation to include [insert one or more of the following as relevant: planting, growing, tending, nurturing, harvesting, sowing the seeds of] a plant.[1096]

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA cultivated a plant when [insert relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert any relevant evidence or arguments].

It is for you to determine, based on all of the evidence, whether NOA cultivated the relevant plants, and did so intentionally. It is only if you are satisfied of this, beyond reasonable doubt, that the first element will be met.

Narcotic Plant

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the plants cultivated by the accused were narcotic plants.

The law says that [insert name of plant] is a narcotic plant. This element will therefore be satisfied if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA cultivated [insert name of plant].

[If it is alleged that a portion of the plant was unusable, add the following shaded section.]

In this case you have heard [evidence/arguments] that [some of] the [insert name of plant] allegedly cultivated by NOA was unusable because [insert evidence]. This is not relevant to the issue of whether or not it was a narcotic plant that the accused cultivated. Even if a substance is unusable, it is still classified as a narcotic plant, as long it is [insert name of plant].

In this case, the prosecution provided the following evidence that the plant allegedly cultivated by the accused was [insert name of plant and summary of relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert any evidence and/or arguments]. It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether that plant was a narcotic plant, namely [insert name of plant].

[1096] The definition of cultivation is inclusive. If the specific act of cultivation alleged is not included in the definition above, the charge will need to be adapted accordingly. See 7.6.2 Cultivation of Narcotic Plants for further guidance.

Commercial or Large Commercial Quantity

The third element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused intentionally cultivated not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of plants.

There are two parts to this element. The prosecution must prove that the accused cultivated not less than a [commercial/large commercial quantity] of [insert name of plant]. They must also prove that the accused intended to cultivate not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of the plant in question.

The law says that [insert relevant weight or number of plants] is a [commercial/large commercial quantity] of [insert name of plant]. The first part of this element will therefore be satisfied if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA cultivated not less than [insert relevant weight or number of plants and name of plant].

It is not necessary for the prosecution to establish the precise [number/weight] of plants cultivated by the accused for this part of the element to be met. They only need to establish that the amount cultivated was not less than the amount specified by the law.

[If the relevant quantity is measured by weight, add the following shaded section.]

In calculating the weight, you should use the weight of the plants as you determine it to have been at the time the offence was committed, rather than what it would have been when dried or ready for consumption.

[If there is a dispute about whether a cutting is a "plant", add the following shaded section.]

In this case there has been a dispute about the number of plants cultivated by the accused, and in particular whether cuttings should be treated as a part of the plant they were cut from, or as a separate "plant". According to the law, a cutting becomes a separate plant when it develops a root. It does not need to be a root system, nor does it need to live. Even if it dies before becoming usable, it should still be counted as a "plant" if it developed a root.[1097]

Intention to cultivate a commercial/large commercial quantity

For this third element to be satisfied, the prosecution must also prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused intended to cultivate not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of plants. That is, s/he deliberately cultivated not less than [insert relevant weight or number] of plants.

The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to cultivate that precise [number/weight] of plants. It is sufficient for the prosecution to prove that NOA intended to cultivate not less than [insert relevant weight or number] of plants.

[If the accused denied knowing that the plants cultivated were narcotic plants, add the following shaded section.]

It is also not necessary for the accused to have intended to cultivate that [number/weight] of [insert name of drug]. This part of the third element will be satisfied as long as the accused intended to cultivate a [commercial/large commercial] [number/weight] of the plants allegedly cultivated at [insert location] – whether s/he believed those plants were [insert name of drug] or something else.

[1097] This section of the charge will need to be modified when the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances (Amendment) Act 2006 commences operation (on 1 May 2007 unless proclaimed earlier), due to changes to the definition of "narcotic plant". See 7.6.2 Cultivation of Narcotic Plants for further information.

In determining whether or not the accused intended to cultivate not less than [insert relevant number or weight] of plants, you will need to decide if you can draw an inference from all of the evidence in the case that s/he had this intention.[1098] You will remember what I have told you about inferences.

You may be able to draw this inference if you find that the accused knew or believed that s/he was cultivating not less than that [number/weight] of plants.

However, you do not need to find that the accused actually knew s/he was cultivating not less than a [commercial/large commercial] [number/weight] of plants in order to draw this inference. Proof that the accused was aware that there was a significant and real chance that s/he was cultivating not less than a [commercial/large commercial] [number/weight] of plants is also capable of sustaining the inference that s/he intended to cultivate that quantity of plants.

This means that, if you find that the accused was aware of the likelihood that s/he was cultivating not less than a [commercial/large commercial] [number/weight], you may draw the inference that s/he had an intention to cultivate that quantity of plants. That is, you may infer that because the accused was aware that there was a significant and real chance that s/he was cultivating not less than a [commercial/large commercial] [number/weight], s/he must have intended to cultivate that [number/weight].

[If "wilful blindness" as to the number/weight of plants arises as an issue, consider the following shaded section.]

"Wilful blindness" may be relevant if there is evidence that the accused realised there was a risk that s/he was cultivating more than the relevant threshold, and deliberately chose to close his/her eyes to that risk so that s/he could later deny knowledge and avoid liability.

You could also draw an inference that NOA intended to cultivate a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of plants if you find that, given the circumstances, s/he would have suspected that that [number/weight] of plants was being cultivated, and deliberately failed to make further inquiries for fear of learning the truth. That is, s/he was aware that there was a risk that s/he was cultivating [insert relevant number or weight] plants, but deliberately closed [his/her] eyes to that risk to avoid possible liability. In such a situation, you may conclude that although NOA did not positively know that s/he was cultivating a [commercial/large commercial] [number/weight] of plants, s/he nevertheless intended to cultivate such a [number/weight].[1099]

It is for you to determine whether to infer, from all of the facts and circumstances of the case, that the accused had this intention. However, it is important that you do not draw such an inference unless you are satisfied that it is the only inference that is reasonably open in the circumstances. If any other reasonable explanation is available, then the prosecution will not have proved this third element beyond reasonable doubt.

In this case, the prosecution submitted that you should infer that the accused intended to cultivate not less than a [commercial/large commercial] [number/weight] of plants because [insert evidence capable of sustaining the inference].

[If the accused denied intention to cultivate due to ignorance of the quantity being cultivated, consider the following shaded section.]

The defence denied that NOA had an intention to cultivate not less than a [commercial/large commercial] [number/weight] of plants, alleging that s/he did not know, or was not aware of the likelihood, that s/he was cultivating that [number/weight] of plants. [Insert relevant evidence and arguments.]

[1098] If it is alleged that the accused admitted having such an intention, this part of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[1099] Such cases of "wilful blindness" will be rare, and judges should be cautious before charging the jury about this possibility: R v Garlick (No.2) (2007) 15 VR 388; [2007] VSCA 23.

It is important to remember that it is the prosecution who must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused had the relevant intention. So if you are not satisfied that accused knew or was aware of the likelihood s/he was cultivating not less than a [commercial/large commercial] [number/weight] of plants, and there is no other basis on which you can infer that the accused intended to cultivate that [number/weight], then this third element will not be met.

[Insert any other defence evidence or arguments.]

So you must decide, based on all of the evidence, whether the accused cultivated not less than a [commercial/large commercial] [number/weight] of narcotic plants, and whether the accused intended to cultivate that number/weight. It is only if you are satisfied of both of these matters, beyond reasonable doubt, that this third element will be met.

Lack of Knowledge that the Plant was a Narcotic Plant (Section 72C Defence)

[If the s 72C defence of lack of knowledge is raised, add the following shaded section.]

Even if you find that the prosecution has proven all of these elements, NOA will not necessarily be guilty of this offence. This is because there are certain circumstances in which the law allows a person to commit acts that would otherwise be illegal. That is, [he/she] may have a defence to the charge of cultivation.

The law states that it is a defence to the charge of cultivation if a person can prove that [he/she] did not know or suspect, and could not reasonably have been expected to have known or suspected, that the plant [he/she] was cultivating was a narcotic plant.

There are two parts to this defence. First, the accused must prove that [he/she] did not know or suspect that the plant [he/she] was cultivating was a narcotic plant.

Second, the accused must also prove that [he/she] could not reasonably have been expected to have known or suspected that the plant [he/she] was cultivating was a narcotic plant. That is, in all of the circumstances in which it is alleged the cultivation took place, it would have been unreasonable to expect NOA to have known or suspected that the plants [he/she] was cultivating were narcotic plants.

It is the defence who must prove these two matters to you. However, unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – the defence only needs to prove these matters on what is called the "balance of probabilities". That is, the defence needs to prove that it is more probable than not that NOA did not know or suspect, and could not reasonably have been expected to have known or suspected, that the plant he/she was cultivating was a narcotic plant.

If you are satisfied by the defence that both of these matters have been proven on the balance of probabilities, then this defence will be successful and you must find NOA not guilty of cultivation. This will be the case even if you find that all three elements of the offence have been met.

However, if the defence cannot prove, on the balance of probabilities, both that NOA did not know or suspect that the plant [he/she] was cultivating was a narcotic plant, and that [he/she] could not reasonably have been expected to have known or suspected that the plant he/she was cultivating was a narcotic plant, then this defence will fail. If you are also satisfied that each of the elements of the offence have been proven by the prosecution, beyond reasonable doubt, you should find NOA guilty of cultivation.

[Insert relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Authorisation/Licence

[If the defence alleged that the accused was authorised or licenced to cultivate narcotic plants, add the following shaded section.]

A person who is [authorised/licensed] to cultivate narcotic plants will not be guilty of the offence of cultivation. In this case, the defence alleged that NOA was [authorised/licensed] to do so by virtue of [insert relevant evidence]. The prosecution disputed this, submitting that [insert relevant evidence].[1100]

Unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – this is a matter which the defence must prove on the balance of probabilities. That is, you must be satisfied that it is more likely than not that NOA was [authorised/licensed] to cultivate narcotic plants. If the defence cannot prove this to you, and the prosecution has also proven all of the elements of the offence, then you should find the accused guilty of cultivation.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of cultivation of a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of narcotic plants, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that s/he intentionally cultivated a plant; and

Two – that the plant that s/he allegedly cultivated was a narcotic plant, in this case [insert name of plant].

Three – that s/he intentionally cultivated not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of that plant, being [insert relevant weight or number of plants].

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of cultivating a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of narcotic plants.

[If the s 72C defence of lack of knowledge has been raised, add the following shaded section.]

However, even if you decide that these elements have been proven, NOA will not be guilty if the defence has proven, on the balance of probabilities, that s/he did not know or suspect, and could not reasonably have been expected to have known or suspected, that the plant s/he was cultivating was a narcotic plant.

[If the defence alleged that the accused was authorised to cultivate narcotic plants, add the following shaded section.]

However, even if you decide that these elements have been proven, NOA will not be guilty if the defence has proven, on the balance of probabilities, that s/he was [authorised/licensed] by law to cultivate a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of narcotic plants.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

7.6.2.5 Checklist: Cultivation of a Commercial or Large Commercial Quantity of Narcotic Plants (Simple)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

[1100] Provisions concerning authorization and licensing are contained in Divisions 2 and 4 of the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981. See also ss 118 and 119 of that Act for evidentiary provisions that may be of assistance in relation to such matters.

This checklist can be used if the accused is charged with cultivation of narcotic plants in a commercial or large commercial quantity, contrary to ss 72 or 72A, and the accused has not raised a defence under s 72C.

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally cultivated a plant; and
2. The plant cultivated by the accused was a narcotic plant; and
3. The accused intentionally cultivated a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of plants.

An Intentional Act of Cultivation

1. Did the accused intentionally cultivate a plant?

Consider – "Cultivation" includes planting, growing, tending, nurturing, harvesting and sowing the seeds of a plant.

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Cultivation of a [Commercial/Large Commercial] Quantity of Narcotic Plants

A Narcotic Plant

2. Was the plant cultivated a "narcotic plant"?

Consider – [Insert name of plant] is a "narcotic plant"

If Yes, then go to 3.1

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Cultivation of a [Commercial/Large Commercial] Quantity of Narcotic Plants

Quantity

3.1 Did the accused cultivate not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of the plant?

Consider – [Insert relevant weight or number of plants] is a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of [insert name of plant].

If Yes, then go to 3.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Cultivation of a [Commercial/Large Commercial] Quantity of Narcotic Plants

3.2 Did the accused intend to cultivate not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of plants?

If Yes, then the Accused is guilty of Cultivation of a [Commercial/Large Commercial] Quantity of Narcotic Plants (as long as you have also answered yes to questions 1, 2 and 3.1).

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Cultivation of a [Commercial/Large Commercial] Quantity of Narcotic Plants

Last updated: 30 August 2006

7.6.2.6 Checklist: Cultivation of a Commercial or Large Commercial Quantity of Narcotic Plants (Section 72C Defence)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used if the accused is charged with cultivation of narcotic plants in a commercial or large commercial quantity, contrary to ss 72 or 72A, and the accused has raised a defence under s 72C.

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally cultivated a plant; and
2. The plant cultivated by the accused was a narcotic plant; and
3. The accused intentionally cultivated a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of plants.

An Intentional Act of Cultivation

1. Did the accused intentionally cultivate a plant?

Consider – "Cultivation" includes planting, growing, tending, nurturing, harvesting and sowing the seeds of a plant.

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Cultivation of a [Commercial/Large Commercial] Quantity of Narcotic Plants

A Narcotic Plant

2. Was the plant cultivated a "narcotic plant"?

Consider – [Insert name of plant] is a "narcotic plant"

If Yes, then go to 3.1

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Cultivation of a [Commercial/Large Commercial] Quantity of Narcotic Plants

Quantity

3.1 Did the accused cultivate not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of the plant?

Consider – [Insert relevant weight or number of plants] is a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of [insert name of plant].

If Yes, then go to 3.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Cultivation of a [Commercial/Large Commercial] Quantity of Narcotic Plants

3.2 Did the accused intend to cultivate not less than a [commercial/large commercial] quantity of plants?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Cultivation of a [Commercial/Large Commercial] Quantity of Narcotic Plants

Defence of Lack of Knowledge

Two matters the defence must prove on the balance of probabilities:

4. That the accused did not know or suspect that the plant they were cultivating was a narcotic plant; and

5. That the accused could not reasonably have been expected to have known or suspected that the plant they were cultivating was a narcotic plant.

Accused's Knowledge

4. Has the defence proven, on the balance of probabilities, that the accused did not know or suspect that the plant they were cultivating was a narcotic plant?

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then the Accused is guilty of Cultivation of Narcotic Plants (as long as you answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3.1 and 3.2)

Reasonable Expectation

5. Has the defence proven, on the balance of probabilities, that the accused could not reasonably have been expected to have known or suspected that the plant they were cultivating was a narcotic plant?

If Yes, then the Accused is not guilty of Cultivation of Narcotic Plants (as long as you also answered yes to question 4)

If No, then the Accused is guilty of Cultivation of Narcotic Plants (as long as you answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3.1 and 3.2)

Last updated: 2 March 2007

7.6.3 Possession of a Drug of Dependence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Possession of a drug of dependence is an offence contrary to s 73 of the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981 (Vic) (the "Drugs Act").
2. The offence has two elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:
   i) That the substance in question was a "drug of dependence"; and
   ii) That the accused "possessed" that substance.
3. The second element can be met either by proving possession at common law, or by satisfying the requirements set out in s 5 of the Drugs Act (R v Marabito (1990) 50 A Crim R 412).
4. People who are authorized or licensed to possess a drug of dependence are excluded from the scope of the offence.

Drug of Dependence

5. The first element the prosecution must prove is that the substance in question was a "drug of dependence". This term is defined in s 4 of the Drugs Act, to include:

    - Any form of the drugs specified in Parts 1 and 3 of Schedule Eleven to the Act, whether natural or synthetic;
    - The derivatives and isomers of the drugs specified in Parts 1 and 3 of Schedule Eleven to the Act;
    - The salt of the abovementioned drugs, derivates and isomers;
    - Any substances that are included in the classes of drugs specified above; and
    - The fresh or dried parts of the plants specified in Part 2 of Schedule Eleven.

6. These substances fall within the definition of a "drug of dependence" even if they are contained in or mixed with another substance (except for the plants specified in Part 2 of Schedule Eleven).

7. Unusable portions of a drug (such as the stems, roots and stalks of the cannabis plant) are still considered to be drugs of dependence, so long as they fit within the definition specified by s 4 (R v Coviello (1995) 81 A Crim R 293 (Vic CCA)).

Proof of drug particulars by certificate

8. A certificate purporting to be signed by an analyst with respect to any analysis or examination he or she has made is sufficient evidence of the identity of the substance analysed, of the result of the analysis and of the matters relevant to the proceedings as stated in the certificate (Drugs Act s 120).

9. A certificate purporting to be signed by a botanist is sufficient evidence of the identity of the substance examined. There is no need to provide proof that the person who signed the certificate is an analyst or botanist, nor to provide proof of their signature (Drugs Act s 120).

10. The provisions in s 120 do not apply if the certificate was not served on the defence at least seven days before the hearing, or if the defence, at least three days before the hearing, gave notice in writing to the informant and the analyst or botanist that the analyst or botanist is required to attend as a witness (s 120(2)).

Possession

11. The second element the prosecution must prove is that the accused possessed the drug. There are three ways the prosecution can do this (each of which is discussed in turn below):

    i) By relying on the common law definition of possession, and proving that the accused intentionally had the drug in his or her custody, or under his or her control (DPP v Brooks [1974] AC 862; He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523; R v Maio [1989] VR 281; R v Mateiasevici [1999] 3 VR 185);

    ii) By relying on the deeming provision in Drugs Act s 5, and proving that the drug was on land or premises occupied by the accused; or

    iii) By relying on the deeming provision in Drugs Act s 5, and proving that the accused used, enjoyed or controlled the drug.

12. The prosecution can put common law possession and s 5 possession to the jury as alternatives (Marabito v R (1990) 50 A Crim R 412 (Vic CCA)).

13. If the prosecution relies on the deeming provision in Drugs Act s 5, the accused may seek to avoid conviction by proving that he or she did not possess the drug according to the common law definition of possession (see "Disputing Possession Under Section 5" below).

Common law possession

14. The first way in which the prosecution can prove that the accused "possessed" a drug of dependence is by relying on the common law definition of possession.

15. At common law the definition of "possession" contains a conduct element (exercising custody or control) and a mental element (intending to possess) (He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523; R v Maio [1989] VR 281). These elements are discussed in turn below.

The conduct element: custody or control

16. The conduct element of common law possession requires the prosecution to prove that a drug of dependence was physically in the accused's custody, or was under his or her control (DPP v Brooks [1974] AC 862; He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523; R v Maio [1989] VR 281; R v Mateiasevici [1999] 3 VR 185).

17. A person does not need to be carrying the drug, or to have it physically with him or her, to have custody or control over it (R v Maio [1989] VR 281; R v Mateiasevici [1999] 3 VR 185).

18. It is a question of fact whether an item is within a person's custody or control. A person may have custody or control of an item:

    - By having it on him or her or within reach (i.e. "in manual custody"); or
    - By having it in a location where he or she maintains the power to "place his (or her) hands on it and so have manual custody when he (or she) wishes" (Moors v Burke (1919) 26 CLR 265).

The mental element: intention to possess

19. The mental element of common law possession requires the prosecution to prove that the accused intended to possess a drug of dependence (Saad v R (1987) 70 ALR 667*; Bahri Kural v R* (1987) 162 CLR 502; He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523).

20. The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to possess the particular drug in question. They only need to prove that the accused intended to possess a drug of dependence (He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523).

21. Although the intention to possess may be proved by an admission by the accused that he or she intended to possess a drug of dependence, in most cases it will be necessary to infer the requisite intention (Bahri Kural v R (1987) 162 CLR 502; He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523; R v Page [2008] VSCA 54).

22. It will usually be possible to infer an intention to possess a drug of dependence from proof that the accused knew of the existence and nature of the substance at the time that it was possessed (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; Saad v R (1987) 70 ALR 667*; Bahri Kural v R* (1987) 162 CLR 502; He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523).

23. However, the prosecution does not need to prove that the accused knew of the existence and nature of the substance. It is possible for the requisite intent to be inferred from a lesser state of mind, such as:

    - A belief that it was a drug of dependence that was possessed (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; Saad v R (1987) 70 ALR 667*; Bahri Kural v R* (1987) 162 CLR 502);
    - An awareness of the likelihood that it was a drug of dependence that was possessed (i.e. an awareness that there was a significant or real chance that he or she possessed a prohibited drug) (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; Saad v R (1987) 70 ALR 667*; Bahri Kural v R* (1987) 162 CLR 502; R v Page [2008] VSCA 54).

24. In some cases, it may also be possible to infer an intention to possess a drug of dependence from the fact that:

- The circumstances were such that the accused's suspicions that he or she possessed a drug of dependence would have been aroused; and
- The accused deliberately failed to make inquiries about the substance possessed for fear of learning the truth (See, e.g. R v Garlick (No.2) (2007) 15 VR 388; He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523; Bahri Kural v R (1987) 162 CLR 502; R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464).

25. However, such cases of "wilful blindness" will be rare, and judges should be cautious before charging the jury about this possibility. There must be evidence that the accused realised there was a risk that he or she possessed a drug of dependence, and deliberately chose to close his or her eyes to that risk so that he or she could later deny knowledge and avoid liability. In the absence of such evidence, it will be a misdirection to direct the jury about wilful blindness (R v Garlick (No.2) (2007) 15 VR 388).

26. It should be noted that the analysis in this commentary of the way in which to approach the mental element (i.e., by drawing an inference of intention from the accused's knowledge or awareness), which is drawn from cases such as Saad, Nguyen and Bui, differs from the approach formerly taken in cases such as R v Maio [1989] VR 281. That approach, which allowed the prosecution to establish the mental element without reference to inferences (e.g. by proving that the accused was aware of the significant likelihood that he or she had a drug of dependence in his or her custody or control, and intended to have custody or exercise control over the drug), no longer seems correct in light of these cases.

Directing the jury about the mental element

27. Even though the issue of intent may not be a live issue in a trial, and may not have been raised by the defence, as it is an element of the offence a judge is required to direct the jury about it, unless the defence has conceded that a direction is not required (R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300).

28. While it will usually be possible to infer the requisite intention from the states of mind outlined above (other than wilful blindness), this will not always be the case. A judge should therefore not instruct the jury that they may convict simply because, for example, the prosecution established that the accused was aware that there was a significant or real chance that he or she possessed a prohibited drug (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; R v Reed [2008] VSCA 20; R v Page [2008] VSCA 54).

29. The jury should instead be directed that proof that the accused was aware of the likelihood that it was a drug of dependence that was possessed is capable of sustaining the inference that the accused intended to possess a drug of dependence. At the same time, the judge should make clear to the jury that it is for them to determine whether that inference should be drawn, based on all of the facts and circumstances (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; R v Reed [2008] VSCA 20; R v Page [2008] VSCA 54).

30. In charging the jury on this issue, judges should follow as nearly as possible the language used in R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299. In particular, care must be taken to ensure that the phrase "is capable of sustaining the inference" is used whenever reference is made in this context to proof of belief "in a significant or real chance" (R v Page [2008] VSCA 54).

31. The jury must be instructed that an inference is not to be drawn unless they are satisfied that it is the only inference that is reasonably open in the circumstances of the case (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; R v Page [2008] VSCA 54).

32. Where intention is to be proved by inference, the judge should direct the jury about the evidence that is capable of sustaining that inference (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299; R v Page [2008] VSCA 54).

33. A judge should not attempt to explain the meaning of the expression "significant or real chance", other than to tell the jury that the words have their ordinary meaning and that it is a question for them to decide (R v Nguyen; DPP Reference (No 1 of 2004) (Vic) (2005) 12 VR 299).

No need to prove exclusive possession

34. Despite authority to the contrary, it is not necessary for the prosecution to prove "exclusive possession" (i.e., the right of the accused to exclude everyone else, other than those with whom he or she was acting in concert, from interfering with the drug). The accused can "possess" a drug at common law even if there is a reasonable possibility that someone else also possessed that drug (R v Tran (2007) 16 VR 673. See also R v Dibb (1991) 52 A Crim R 64 (NSW CCA); R v Cumming (1995) 86 A Crim R 156 (WA CCA) but c.f. Moors v Burke (1919) 26 CLR 265; Williams v Douglas (1949) 78 CLR 521)).

Deemed possession: occupation of land or premises

35. The second way in which the prosecution can prove that the accused "possessed" a drug of dependence is by relying on the deeming provision in s 5 of the Drugs Act, and proving that a drug of dependence was on land or premises occupied by the accused (R v Clarke and Johnston [1986] VR 643).

36. It is not necessary for the prosecution to prove that the accused intended to possess the drug (cf. common law possession). Once the prosecution has proven that the accused was in occupation of the land or premises upon which the drug was found, the accused will be deemed to have been in possession of it (unless the court is satisfied to the contrary: see below) (R v Momcilovic (2010) 25 VR 436; R v Clarke and Johnston [1986] VR 643; Marabito v R (1990) 50 A Crim R 412 (Vic CCA); R v Tran [2007] VSCA 19).

When does a person "occupy" land or premises?

37. The meaning of "occupation" in relation to s 5 is not to be determined by reference to indicia of occupancy applicable in other contexts. Its meaning is to be determined by looking at the "mischief" against which the legislation is concerned – the possession of a drug of dependence (R v Phung [2003] VSCA 32).

38. In this context, occupation means more than merely being present at a location at the relevant time. An occupier must be in practical control of the land or premises (R v Phung [2003] VSCA 32; R v Tran [2007] VSCA 19).

39. The ability to control access to land or premises is crucial to determining whether a person is in occupation of that land or premises (R v Phung [2003] VSCA 32; R v Tran [2007] VSCA 19).

40. "Occupation" includes the right to possess premises. It is not necessary for an occupier to be always present at those premises. A person who is temporarily absent from premises they own or lease remains the occupier when absent on holidays, whilst working or living elsewhere, or whilst briefly separated from their spouse (R v Dang [2004] VSCA 38).

41. An owner who furnishes a house and keeps it ready for habitation whenever they want to go will be in occupation, even if they only reside there one day a year (R v Clarke and Johnston [1986] VR 643; Shire of Poowong and Jeetho v Gillen [1907] VLR 37).

42. However, merely attending premises at various times, or leaving property there with the owner's permission, is not "occupation" for the purposes of s 5 (see, e.g. R v Pisano [1997] 2 VR 342).

43. Section 5 can apply to joint possession. It is not necessary for the prosecution to prove that the accused was the sole occupier of the relevant land or premises (R v Doan (2001) 3 VR 349).

44. Whether the accused's connection with premises falls within the definition of occupation is a matter of fact for the jury to determine (R v Phung [2003] VSCA 32; R v Dang [2004] VSCA 38).

45. As the word "occupation" is capable of a number of meanings depending on the context in which it is used, it is unhelpful to direct the jury that the word is to be given its ordinary English meaning (R v Phung [2003] VSCA 32).

Deemed possession: use, enjoyment or control

46. The third way in which the prosecution can prove that the accused "possessed" a drug of dependence is by relying on the deeming provision in s 5 of the Drugs Act, and proving that the accused used, enjoyed or controlled a drug of dependence (R v Clarke and Johnston [1986] VR 643).

47. It is not necessary for the prosecution to prove that the accused intended to possess the drug (cf. common law possession). Once the prosecution has proven that the accused used, enjoyed or controlled a drug, he or she will be deemed to have been in possession of it (unless the court is satisfied to the contrary: see below) (R v Momcilovic (2010) 25 VR 436; R v Clarke and Johnston [1986] VR 643; Marabito v R (1990) 50 A Crim R 412 (Vic CCA); R v Tran [2007] VSCA 19).

When does a person "use, enjoy or control" a drug?

48. The word "use" is defined in s 70(1) of the Drugs Act to mean:

    - smoke a drug of dependence;
    - inhale the fumes caused by heating or burning a drug of dependence; or
    - introduce a drug of dependence into the body of a person.

49. In this context, the term "enjoy" does not have any separate meaning from the term "use" and should not be put forward as an independent basis for deeming possession.

50. A person has been held to "control" drugs for the purposes of s 5 where those drugs were concealed in their car (R v Burr 6/4/1989 Vic CCA).

51. It is not necessary for the purposes of s 5 for the prosecution to prove that the accused was "knowingly" in control of the drug. This means that the prosecution can prove that the accused "controlled" a drug without proving that the accused knew of the presence or nature of the drug (R v Burr 6/4/1989 Vic CCA).

52. Section 5 can apply to joint possession or direct control exercised jointly. It is not necessary for the prosecution to prove that the accused was the only person who used, enjoyed or controlled the drug (R v Doan (2001) 3 VR 349).

Disputing Possession Under Section 5

53. Once the prosecution has proved that a prohibited drug was used, enjoyed or controlled by the accused, or that the accused was in occupation of the land or premises upon which the drug was found, the accused will be deemed to be in possession of that drug unless he or she can "satisfy the court to the contrary" (Drugs Act s 5).

54. This requires the accused to prove that he or she did not possess the drug according to the common law definition of "possession" (Marabito v R (1990) 50 A Crim R 412 (Vic CCA); R v Clarke and Johnston [1986] VR 643; R v Tran [2007] VSCA 19).

55. The accused must prove this on the balance of probabilities. This is a legal burden rather than a mere evidentiary burden (R v Momcilovic (2010) 25 VR 436).

56. The accused can meet this burden by establishing, on the balance of probabilities, that despite the requirements of s 5 being satisfied:

    - The drug was not actually in his or her custody or control (i.e., by disproving the conduct element of possession) (see, e.g. R v Mateiasevici [1999] 3 VR 185); or
    - He or she did not intend to possess the drug (i.e., by disproving the mental element of possession) (see, e.g. R v Clarke and Johnstone [1986] VR 643; R v Tran [2007] VSCA 19).

57. Depending on the circumstances, the accused may be able to disprove the mental element by establishing, on the balance of probabilities, that he or she:

- Did not know, or was not aware of the likelihood, that the relevant substance was present (R v Clarke and Johnstone [1986] VR 643; Marabito v R (1990) 50 A Crim R 412 (Vic CCA; R v Mateiasevici [1999] 3 VR 185; R v Tran [2007] VSCA 19);
- Did not know, or was not aware of the likelihood, that the substance was a drug of dependence (R v Clarke and Johnstone [1986] VR 643; R v Tran [2007] VSCA 19); or
- Did not intend to exercise control over the drug or the place it was kept (R v Tran [2007] VSCA 19).

58. However, the precise nature of what the accused must prove will depend on all the circumstances of the case. For example, it will not be sufficient to establish that the accused did not know, or was not aware of the likelihood, that the substance was a drug of dependence, if it is possible to infer an intention to possess from the fact that the accused would have been suspicious about the nature of the substance possessed, but deliberately failed to make inquiries for fear of learning the truth (see, e.g. R v Garlick (No.2) (2007) 15 VR 388). In such cases, the accused will also need to prove that he or she did not deliberately choose to close his or her eyes to the risk that he or she possessed a drug of dependence.

59. The judge is only required to direct the jury about whichever issues (if any) arise on the evidence. For example, if the only issue which arises on the evidence is whether the accused knew of the drug's presence, there is no need to direct the jury about the accused's intention to exercise control over the drug (R v Tran [2007] VSCA 19; R v Clarke and Johnstone [1986] VR 643; R v Mateiasevici [1999] 3 VR 185; R v Momcilovic (2010) 25 VR 436).

60. The Court of Appeal has declared that s 5 of the Drugs Act cannot be interpreted consistently with the presumption of innocence under s 25(1) of the Charter of Human Rights and Responsibilities Act 2006. The declaration does not affect the validity or operation of s 5, or any trial which relies upon s 5.

Authorisation and Licensing

61. Section 73 specifies that a person will be guilty if they are in possession of a drug of dependence, "without being authorized by or licensed under this Act or the regulations to do so".

62. It has been held that the question of authorisation or licensing is a matter of "exception" or "qualification" for the purposes of s 104 of the Drugs Act. That section states that the burden of proving any "matter of exception qualification or defence" is on the accused.

63. It is therefore for the accused to prove, on the balance of probabilities, that he or she was appropriately authorised or licensed – rather than being for the prosecution to disprove beyond reasonable doubt (R v Ibrahim (1987) 27 A Crim R 460; Horman v Bingham [1972] VR 29).

64. Provisions concerning authorisation and licensing are contained in Divisions 2 and 4 of the Act respectively.

65. Sections 118 and 119 of the Act contain evidentiary provisions that may be of assistance in cases where there is a dispute about authorization or licensing.

Trafficking, Cultivation and Possession

66. If the accused is charged with trafficking or cultivation as well as possession, and the relevant acts of trafficking, cultivation and/or possession completely overlap, a conviction should only be recorded in relation to one of the offences (R v Langdon (2004) 11 VR 18; R v Mason [2006] VSCA 55; R v Nguyen [2006] VSCA 158; R v Nunno [2008] VSCA 31; R v Filipovic [2008] VSCA 14). See 7.6.1 Trafficking in a Drug of Dependence for further information.

Attempted Possession

67. Section 73 of the Drugs Act makes it an offence to have in possession or "attempt to have in possession" a drug of dependence. A person can therefore be charged with attempted possession directly under s 73, rather than having to rely on s 321M of the Crimes Act 1958.

68. A person charged with attempted possession under s 73 will be subject to the same penalties as a person charged with possession. In contrast, a person who is charged with attempted possession under s 321M of the Crimes Act 1958 will be subject to the lesser penalties set out in s 321P of that Act.

69. Section 321N of the Crimes Act 1958 sets out the conduct that will constitute an attempt. This section applies to a person charged with attempted possession under the provisions of the Drugs Act by virtue of s 321R of the Crimes Act 1958.

70. For more information about attempts see Attempt.

Mitigating Circumstances

71. Section 73 of the Drugs Act states that a person who possesses a drug of dependence will be subject to the penalty set out in s 73(1)(c), unless he or she can satisfy the court, on the balance of probabilities, of one of the following mitigating circumstances:

    - That he or she did not have more than a small quantity of cannabis or tetrahydrocannabinol (as defined in Schedule 11 to the Act), and did not have those drugs for any purpose related to trafficking (s 73(1)(a)); or
    - That he or she was not in possession of the relevant drugs for any purpose related to trafficking (s 73(1)(b)).

72. As these are mitigating circumstances, rather than elements of the offence, their existence is for the judge to determine when sentencing the accused, rather than for the jury to decide when determining the accused's guilt (R v Pantorno [1988] VR 195, overruling R v Bridges (1986) 20 A Crim R 271. See R v Wyllie [1989] VR 21 for guidance on sentencing in possession cases).

Last updated: 5 May 2010

7.6.3.1 Charge: Possession of a Drug of Dependence (Section 5 Possession Occupation)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used where it is alleged that the accused possessed a drug of dependence, the prosecution relied on the deeming provision in s 5 of the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act, and alleged that the accused occupied the land or premises on which the drug was found.

I must now direct you about the crime of possessing a drug of dependence. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 2 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that the substance in question was a drug of dependence; and

Two – that the accused possessed that substance.

I will now explain these matters in more detail.

Drug of Dependence

The first element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the substance in question was a drug of dependence.

The substance in question here was [identify relevant material, e.g "the substance in the three plastic bags tendered as Exhibit X and analysed in the certificate of analysis, Exhibit Y"].

In this case, [describe the evidence and arguments (or concession) about the identification of the substance as a particular drug].

The law says that [insert name of drug] is a drug of dependence. So if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the substance in question was or included [insert name of drug], then this element will be satisfied, and you should go on to consider the second element.

Possession

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused possessed the substance in question.

In this case the prosecution seeks to prove this element by relying on a law that says that a substance is deemed to be in the possession of a person if it is upon any land or premises occupied by him or her, unless the person satisfies the court to the contrary. This requires the prosecution to prove two things beyond reasonable doubt.

Occupation

First, the prosecution must prove that NOA occupied the [land/premises] in question – in this case the [insert precise details of what it is alleged the accused occupied, e.g. the house, the garage, the whole of a plot of land or a specific part of that land].

For a person to "occupy" a property, s/he must be in practical control of that property. It is not sufficient for him/her to have simply been present at that location when the drug was found, or to have gone there occasionally. S/he must, for example, be able to control access to the property.

This does not mean that a person always has to be present at a property to be in occupation. For example, a person will still occupy his/her house even when s/he is away on holidays. This is because s/he has the right to occupy that house, even if s/he is temporarily absent.

It is also not necessary for a person to own a property to be in occupation. For example, a person who rents the house where s/he lives occupies that house. In fact, the owner of a house that is leased out no longer occupies that house, because s/he is no longer in practical control of it. S/he is not, for example, able to come and go as s/he pleases. It is the tenant who is in occupation of that house during the period of the lease.

The evidence was [summarise evidence and arguments concerning occupation, addressing detail only if in issue].

Drug of dependence in that location

The second part of this element requires the prosecution to prove that the drug of dependence was [on that land/in those premises].

The evidence was [summarise evidence and arguments concerning the location and chain of custody in respect of the substance, addressing detail only if in issue].

Defences

[This section addresses three possible ways the defence may contest the offence: by establishing that the accused did not have custody or control of the drug; by establishing the accused did not intend to possess the drug; or by establishing that the accused was authorised or licensed to possess the drug. Judges will need to adapt these parts of the charge if the defence contests the offence on multiple grounds.]

The accused did not have custody or control of the drug

[If the defence argued that the accused did not have custody or control of the drug, add the following shaded section.]

Even if you are satisfied that NOA occupied [land/premises] where police located a drug of dependence, you must find him/her not guilty of this offence if the defence satisfies you that s/he did not have custody or control of that drug.

Unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – the defence must prove this matter on the balance of probabilities. That is, the defence must satisfy you that it is more likely than not that NOA did not have custody or control of the drug.

[If it is alleged that the accused maintained custody or control of a drug from a distance, add the following darker shaded section.]

The law says that a person can have custody or control of a substance even if he or she is not carrying or watching over it. A person can have custody or control of a substance if s/he has it in a place where s/he [has the power/asserts the right] to place his/her hands on it when s/he wishes.

This means that it is not sufficient for the defence to prove that the accused did not have the drug physically with or near him/her when it was found. To prove that the accused did not have custody or control of the substance in question here, the defence must prove that s/he did not have it in a place where s/he [had the power/asserted the right] to place his/her hands on it when s/he wished.

[If there is evidence that others had custody or control over the drug, add the darker shaded section.]

It is possible for more than one person to possess an item. This means that it is not enough for the accused to prove that someone else shared custody or control of the item in question here. The accused must prove that s/he did not also have custody or control of that item.

If the defence cannot prove this to you, and the prosecution has proven the two elements I have described, then you should find the accused guilty of possession of a drug of dependence.

The evidence was [summarise evidence and arguments concerning custody or control of the drug, addressing detail only if in issue].

The accused did not intend to possess the drug

[If the defence argued that the accused did not intend to possess the drug, add the following shaded section.]

Even if you are satisfied that NOA occupied [land/premises] where police located a drug of dependence, you must find the accused not guilty of this offence if the defence satisfies you that NOA did not intend to have a drug of dependence in his/her custody or under his/her control.

It is not enough for the accused to prove that s/he did not know that the substance in his/her custody or control was the specific drug named in the indictment – in this case [insert name of drug]. To prove this matter, the defence must prove that the accused did not intend to have custody or control of any drug of dependence.

Unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – the defence must prove this matter on the balance of probabilities. That is, the defence must satisfy you that it is more likely than not that NOA did not intend to have a drug of dependence in his/her custody or control.

This is a matter that must be proved by inferences. You will need to decide if you can infer from all of the evidence in the case that NOA did not intend to have custody or control of a drug of dependence.

In this case, the defence argued that [insert basis for the inference that NOA did not have the requisite intention, such as "NOA did not know, or was not aware of the likelihood, that the drug was in the house" or "NOA did not know, or was not aware of the likelihood, that the substance was a drug of dependence"]. They argued that you can infer from this fact that NOA did not intend to have a drug of dependence in his/her custody or control. [Summarise defence arguments and evidence.] By contrast, the prosecution argued [insert prosecution arguments and evidence].

It is for you to determine whether [repeat basis for the defence inference stated above, e.g. "NOA did not know, or was not aware of the likelihood, that the drug was in the house"], and whether to infer from that fact, and all of the circumstances of the case, that NOA did not intend to have custody or control of a drug of dependence.

Because this is not an inference that the prosecution is asking you to draw, it does not need to be proven beyond reasonable doubt. It only needs to be proven on the balance of probabilities. This means that you do not need to be satisfied that it is the only inference that is reasonably open in the circumstances. You can infer that the accused did not intend to have a drug of dependence in his/her custody or control if you are satisfied that that is more likely than not to have been the case.

If you find that, on the balance of probabilities, NOA did not intend to have custody or control of a drug of dependence, then you must find him/her not guilty of this offence. However, if the defence cannot prove this to you, and the prosecution has proven the two elements I have described, then you should find the accused guilty of possession of a drug of dependence.

The accused was authorised or licensed to possess the drug

[If it is alleged that the accused was authorised or licensed to possess a drug of dependence, add the following shaded section.]

Even if you are satisfied that NOA occupied [land/premises] where police located a drug of dependence, you must find the accused not guilty of this offence if the defence satisfies you that NOA was [authorised/licensed] to possess a drug of dependence.

In this case, the defence alleged that NOA was [authorised/licensed] to do so by virtue of [insert relevant evidence]. The prosecution disputed this, submitting that [insert relevant evidence].[1101]

Unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – this is a matter which the defence must prove on the balance of probabilities. That is, you must be satisfied by the defence that it is more likely than not that NOA was [authorised/licensed] to possess a drug of dependence.

If the defence cannot prove this to you, and the prosecution has proven the two elements I have described, then you should find the accused guilty of possession of a drug of dependence.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of possession of a drug of dependence, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that the substance in question was a drug of dependence; and

Two – that the accused possessed that substance. This will be the case if the substance was found on land or premises occupied by the accused.

If you find that the prosecution has not proved both of these matters beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of possession of a drug of dependence.

[1101] Provisions concerning authorisation and licensing are contained in Divisions 2 and 4 of the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981. See also ss 118 and 119 of that Act for evidentiary provisions that may be of assistance in relation to such matters.

Defences

[If the accused contested the offence, despite the elements being satisfied, add the following shaded section.]

However, even if you decide that these elements have been proven, NOA will not be guilty of this offence if the defence has proven, on the balance of probabilities, that s/he [did not have custody or control of a drug of dependence/did not intend to have a drug of dependence in his/her custody or under his/her control/was authorised or licensed by law to possess a drug of dependence].

Last updated: 27 March 2019

7.6.3.2 Checklist: Possession of a Drug of Dependence (Section 5 Occupation Simple)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used in possession cases in which:

i) The prosecution relied on the section 5 definition of possession; and

ii) The prosecution alleged that the accused occupied the land or premises on which the drug was found; and

iii) The defence did not submit that the accused did not have custody or control of the drug, did not intend to possess the drug, or was authorised or licensed to possess the drug.

The Elements

Two elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt :

1. The substance in question was a drug of dependence; and
2. The accused possessed that substance.

A Drug of Dependence

1. Was the substance in question a "drug of dependence"?

Consider – [Insert name of drug] is a "drug of dependence".

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the Accused is Not Guilty of Possession of a Drug of Dependence

Possession of a Drug

2. Did the accused possess the substance in question?

2.1 Did the accused occupy the [land/premises] in question?

Consider – Was the accused in practical control of that property?

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the Accused is Not Guilty of Possession of a Drug of Dependence

2.2 Was the substance in question found [on that land/in those premises]?

If Yes, then the Accused is Guilty of Possession of a Drug of Dependence (as long as you also answered Yes to questions 1 and 2.1)

If No, then the Accused is Not Guilty of Possession of a Drug of Dependence

Last updated: 11 May 2010

7.6.3.3 Checklist: Possession of a Drug of Dependence (Section 5 Occupation Disputed)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used in possession cases in which:

i) The prosecution relied on the section 5 definition of possession; and

ii) The prosecution alleged that the accused occupied the land or premises on which the drug was found; and

iii) The defence submitted that the accused did not have custody or control of the drug, did not intend to possess the drug, or was authorised or licensed to possess the drug.

The Elements

Two elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The substance in question was a drug of dependence; and
2. The accused possessed that substance.

A Drug of Dependence

1. Was the substance in question a "drug of dependence"?

Consider – [Insert name of drug] is a "drug of dependence".

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the Accused is Not Guilty of Possession of a Drug of Dependence

Possession of a Drug

2. Did the accused possess the substance in question?

2.1 Did the accused occupy the [land/premises] in question?

Consider – Was the accused in practical control of that property?

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the Accused is Not Guilty of Possession of a Drug of Dependence

2.2 Was the substance in question found [on that land/in those premises]?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the Accused is Not Guilty of Possession of a Drug of Dependence

Defences

[Judges should delete whichever of these defences is not relevant in the circumstances of the case. If multiple defences are in issue, the numbering will need to be modified.]

Even if you are satisfied that the prosecution has proven the two elements outlined above, you must find the accused not guilty if the defence has proven, on the balance of probabilities, that the accused [did not have custody or control of the substance/did not intend to possess a drug of dependence/was authorised or licensed to possess the drug].

Lack of Custody or Control

3. Was it more likely than not that the accused did not have custody or control of the substance?

If Yes, then the Accused is Not Guilty of Possession of a Drug of Dependence

If No, then the Accused is Guilty of Possession of a Drug of Dependence (as long as you also answered Yes to questions 1, 2.1 and 2.2)

No Intention to Possess

4. Was it more likely than not that the accused did not intend to possess a drug of dependence?

Consider – Can you infer from all of the evidence that the accused did not intend to have custody or control of a drug of dependence?

If Yes, then the Accused is Not Guilty of Possession of a Drug of Dependence

If No, then the Accused is Guilty of Possession of a Drug of Dependence (as long as you also answered Yes to questions 1, 2.1 and 2.2)

Authority or Licence

5. Was it more likely than not that the accused was authorised or licensed to possess the drug?

If Yes, then the Accused is Not Guilty of Possession of a Drug of Dependence

If No, then the Accused is Guilty of Possession of a Drug of Dependence (as long as you also answered Yes to questions 1, 2.1 and 2.2)

Last updated: 11 May 2010

7.6.3.4 Charge: Possession of a Drug of Dependence (Section 5 Possession Use, Enjoyment or Control)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge can be used where it is alleged that the accused possessed a drug of dependence, the prosecution relied on the deeming provision in s 5 of the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act, and alleged that the accused used, enjoyed or controlled the drug.

I must now direct you about the crime of possessing a drug of dependence. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 2 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that the substance in question was a drug of dependence; and

Two – that the accused possessed the substance.

I will now explain these matters in more detail.

Drug of Dependence

The first element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the substance in question was a drug of dependence.

The substance in question here was [identify relevant material, e.g "the substance in the three plastic bags tendered as Exhibit X and analysed in the certificate of analysis, Exhibit Y"].

In this case, [describe the evidence and arguments (or concession) about the identification of the substance as a particular drug].

The law says that [insert name of drug] is a drug of dependence. So if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the substance in question was or included [insert name of drug], then this element will be satisfied, and you should go on to consider the second element.

Possession

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused possessed the substance in question.

In this case the prosecution seeks to prove this element by relying on a law that says that a substance is deemed to be in the possession of a person if it is used, enjoyed or controlled by him or her, unless the person satisfies the court to the contrary.

The prosecution alleges here that the accused [used or enjoyed/controlled] the drug.

[If it is necessary to define the term "use", add the following shaded section.]

The phrase "used or enjoyed" is a legal phrase that, in the context of this case, simply means "used" You must determine whether the accused [describe the alleged basis for finding that the accused "used" the drug of dependence in question].

It is a question of fact for you whether the accused [used or enjoyed/controlled] the substance in question here. The evidence was [summarise evidence and arguments concerning use, enjoyment and control, addressing detail only if in issue].

Defences

[This section addresses three possible ways the defence may contest the offence, even if the elements outlined above have been proven: by establishing that the accused did not have custody or control of the drug; by establishing the accused did not intend to possess the drug; or by establishing that the accused was authorised or licensed to possess the drug. Judges will need to adapt these parts of the charge if the defence contests the offence on multiple grounds.]

The accused did not have custody or control of the drug

[If the defence argued that the accused did not have custody or control of the drug*, add the following shaded section.*]

Even if you are satisfied that NOA [used or enjoyed] a drug of dependence you must find him/her not guilty of this offence if the defence satisfies you that s/he did not have custody or control of that drug.

[If the prosecution sought to prove that the accused "controlled" the drug, add the darker shaded section.]

Clearly, the defence will not be able to do this if the prosecution has satisfied you beyond reasonable doubt that the accused had control of the drug in question. So you will only need to consider this defence if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused used or enjoyed that drug, but you are not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that s/he had control of it.

Unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – the defence must prove this matter on the balance of probabilities. That is, the defence must satisfy you that it is more likely than not that NOA did not have custody or control of the drug.[1102]

If the defence cannot prove this to you, and the prosecution has proven the two elements I have described, then you should find the accused guilty of possession of a drug of dependence.

To establish this defence, the accused says [summarise evidence and arguments concerning custody or control of the drug, addressing detail only if in issue].

The accused did not intend to possess the drug

[If the defence argued that the accused did not intend to possess the drug*, add the following shaded section.*]

Even if you are satisfied that NOA [used or enjoyed/controlled] a drug of dependence, you must find the accused not guilty of this offence if the defence satisfies you that NOA did not intend to have a drug of dependence in his/her custody or under his/her control.

Unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – the defence must prove this matter on the balance of probabilities. That is, the defence must satisfy you that it is more likely than not that NOA did not intend to have a drug of dependence in his/her custody or control.

It is not enough for the accused to prove that s/he did not know that the substance in his/her custody or control was the specific drug named in the indictment – in this case [insert name of drug]. To prove this matter, the defence must prove that the accused did not intend to have custody or control of any drug of dependence.

This will require you to decide if you can draw a conclusion from all of the evidence in the case that NOA did not intend to have custody or control of a drug of dependence.

In this case, the defence argued that [insert basis for the conclusion that NOA did not have the requisite intention, such as "NOA did not know, and was not aware of the likelihood, that the drug was in the car" or "NOA did not know, and was not aware of the likelihood, that the substance was a drug of dependence"]. They argued that you can conclude from this fact that NOA did not intend to have a drug of dependence in his/her custody or control. [Summarise defence arguments and evidence.] By contrast, the prosecution argued [insert prosecution arguments and evidence].

It is for you to determine whether [repeat basis for the defence inference stated above, e.g. "NOA did not know, or was not aware of the likelihood, that the drug was in the car"], and whether to conclude from that fact, and all of the circumstances of the case, that NOA did not intend to have custody or control of a drug of dependence.

Because this is a conclusion that the defence is asking you to draw, it does not need to be proven beyond reasonable doubt. It only needs to be proven on the balance of probabilities. This means that you do not need to be satisfied that it is the only conclusion that is reasonably open in the circumstances. You can conclude that the accused did not intend to have a drug of dependence in his/her custody or control if you are satisfied that that is more likely than not to have been the case.

[1102] If it is necessary in the circumstances of the case to direct the jury on non-manual or joint custody, see 7.6.3.1 Charge: Possession of a Drug of Dependence (Section 5 Possession Occupation).

If you find that, on the balance of probabilities, NOA did not intend to have custody or control of a drug of dependence, then you must find him/her not guilty of this offence. However, if the defence cannot prove this to you, and the prosecution has proven the two elements I have described, then you should find the accused guilty of possession of a drug of dependence.

The accused was authorised or licensed to possess the drug

[If it is alleged that the accused was authorised or licensed to possess a drug of dependence, add the following shaded section.]

Even if you are satisfied that NOA [was using or enjoying/had in his/her control] a drug of dependence, you must find the accused not guilty of this offence if the defence satisfies you that NOA was [authorised/licensed] to possess a drug of dependence.

In this case, the defence alleged that NOA was [authorised/licensed] to do so by virtue of [insert relevant evidence]. The prosecution disputed this, submitting that [insert relevant evidence].[1103]

Unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – this is a matter which the defence must prove on the balance of probabilities. That is, you must be satisfied by the defence that it is more likely than not that NOA was [authorised/licensed] to possess a drug of dependence.

If the defence cannot prove this to you, and the prosecution has proven the two elements I have described, then you should find the accused guilty of possession of a drug of dependence.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of possession of a drug of dependence, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

- One – that the substance in question was a drug of dependence; and
- Two – that the accused possessed that substance. This will be the case if the substance was [used or enjoyed by/in the control of] the accused.

If you find that the prosecution has not proven both of these matters beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of possession of a drug of dependence.

Defences

[If the accused contested the offence, despite the elements being satisfied, add the following shaded section.]

However, even if you decide that these elements have been proven, NOA will not be guilty of this offence if the defence has proven, on the balance of probabilities, that s/he [did not have custody or control of a drug of dependence/did not intend to have a drug of dependence in his/her custody or under his/her control/was authorised or licensed by law to possess a drug of dependence].

[1103] Provisions concerning authorisation and licensing are contained in Divisions 2 and 4 of the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981. See also ss 118 and 119 of that Act for evidentiary provisions that may be of assistance in relation to such matters.

Last updated: 27 March 2019

7.6.3.5 Charge: Possession of a Drug of Dependence (Common Law Possession)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used where it is alleged that the accused possessed a drug of dependence, and the prosecution relied on the common law definition of possession.

I must now direct you about the crime of possessing a drug of dependence. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 2 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the substance in question was a drug of dependence; and

Two – the accused possessed that substance.

I will now explain these elements in more detail.

Drug of Dependence

The first element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the substance in question was a drug of dependence.

The substance in question here was [identify relevant material, e.g "the substance in the three plastic bags tendered as Exhibit X and analysed in the certificate of analysis, Exhibit Y"].

In this case, [describe the evidence and arguments (or concession) about the identification of the substance as a particular drug].

The law says that [insert name of drug] is a drug of dependence. So if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the substance in question was or included [insert name of drug], then this element will be satisfied, and you should go on to consider the second element.

Possession

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused possessed this substance. This requires the prosecution to prove two things beyond reasonable doubt.

Custody or Control

First, the prosecution must prove that NOA had the substance physically in his or her custody or otherwise under his or her control.

The evidence was [summarise evidence and arguments concerning custody/control of the drug, addressing detail only if in issue].

[If it is alleged that the accused maintained custody or control of a drug from a distance, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that a person can have custody or control of a thing even if he or she is not carrying or watching over it. You may therefore find that the accused had custody or control of the substance in issue here if the prosecution satisfies you that it was in a place where the accused [had the power/had the right] to place his/her hands on it when s/he wished.

Intention to Possess

The second part of this element requires the prosecution to prove that the accused intended to possess a drug of dependence.

The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to possess the specific drug named in the indictment – in this case [insert name of drug]. This part of the second element will be satisfied as long as the prosecution proves that accused intended to possess any drug of dependence.

In determining whether or not the accused intended to possess a drug of dependence, you will need to decide if you can draw an inference from all of the evidence in the case that s/he had this intention.[1104] You will remember what I have told you about inferences.

You may be able to draw this inference if you find that the accused knew or believed that it was a prohibited drug, such as [insert name of drug], over which s/he had custody or control.

However, you do not need to find that the accused actually knew s/he had custody or control over a prohibited drug in order to draw this inference. Proof that the accused was aware that there was a significant and real chance that s/he had custody or control over a prohibited drug is also capable of sustaining the inference that s/he intended to possess a drug of dependence.

This means that, if you find that the accused was aware of the likelihood that the substance over which s/he had custody or control was a drug of dependence, you may draw the inference that s/he had an intention to possess such a drug. That is, you may infer that because the accused was aware that there was a significant and real chance that s/he had custody or control over a prohibited drug, s/he must have intended to possess that drug.

[If "wilful blindness" as to the nature of the substance arises as an issue, consider the shaded section.]

"Wilful blindness" may be relevant if there is evidence that the accused realised there was a risk that s/he possessed a drug of dependence, and deliberately chose to close his/her eyes to that risk so that s/he could later deny knowledge and avoid liability.

You could also draw an inference that NOA intended to possess a drug of dependence if you find that, given the circumstances, s/he would have suspected the nature of the substance s/he possessed, and deliberately failed to make further inquiries for fear of learning the truth. That is, s/he was aware that there was a risk that s/he possessed a drug of dependence, but deliberately closed his/her eyes to that risk to avoid possible liability. In such a situation, you may conclude that although NOA did not positively know that s/he possessed a drug of dependence, s/he nevertheless intended to do so.[1105]

It is for you to determine whether to infer, from all of the facts and circumstances of the case, that the accused intended to possess a drug of dependence. However, it is important that you do not draw such an inference unless you are satisfied that it is the only inference that is reasonably open in the circumstances. If any other reasonable explanation is available, then the prosecution will not have proved this part of the second element beyond reasonable doubt.

In this case [summarise evidence and arguments concerning the accused's intention to possess the drug. The jury must be directed about the evidence that is capable of sustaining the inference of intention].

[If the accused denied this intention due to ignorance of the drug's existence or nature, consider the following section.]

In this case the defence alleged that NOA did not know, or was not aware of the likelihood, that it was a drug of dependence that s/he possessed. [Insert relevant evidence and arguments.]

It is important to remember that it is the prosecution who must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused had the relevant intention. So if you are not satisfied that accused knew or believed or was

---

[1104] If it is alleged that the accused admitted having such an intention, this part of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[1105] Such cases of "wilful blindness" will be rare, and judges should be cautious before charging the jury about this possibility: R v Garlick (No.2) (2007) 15 VR 388; [2007] VSCA 23.

aware of the likelihood that it was a drug of dependence that s/he possessed, and there is no other basis from which you can infer that the accused intended to possess a drug of dependence, then this second element will not be met.

Joint Possession

[If there was evidence that others had custody or control over the drug, add the following shaded section.]

It is possible for more than one person to possess an item. This means that the prosecution does not have to prove that no one else shared custody or control of the substance in question here. They only need to prove that, regardless of any involvement that others such as [identify relevant alternative possessor] may have had with that substance, the accused also had custody or control of it, and intended to possess it.

Authorisation and licensing

[If it is alleged that the accused was authorised or licensed to possess a drug of dependence, insert the following shaded section.]

A person who is [authorised/licensed] to possess a drug of dependence will not be guilty of possession. In this case, the defence alleged that NOA was [authorised/licensed] to do so by virtue of [insert relevant evidence]. The prosecution disputed this, submitting that [insert relevant evidence].[1106]

Unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – this is a matter which the defence must prove on the balance of probabilities. That is, you must be satisfied by the defence that it is more likely than not that NOA was [authorised/licensed] to possess a drug of dependence. If the defence cannot prove this to you, and the prosecution has also proven all of the elements of the offence, then you should find the accused guilty of possession of a drug of dependence.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of possession of a drug of dependence, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that the substance in question was a drug of dependence; and

Two – that NOA possessed that drug; that is, s/he had custody or control of that drug, and intended to possess it.

If you find that either of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of possession of a drug of dependence.

[If it is alleged that the accused was authorised or licensed to possess a drug of dependence add the following shaded section.]

However, even if you decide that these elements have been proven, NOA will not be guilty if the defence has proven, on the balance of probabilities, that s/he was [authorised/licensed] by law to possess a drug of dependence.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

[1106] Provisions concerning authorisation and licensing are contained in Divisions 2 and 4 of the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981. See also ss 118 and 119 of that Act for evidentiary provisions that may be of assistance in relation to such matters.

7.6.3.6 Checklist: Possession of a Drug of Dependence (Common Law Possession)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used in possession cases in which the prosecution relied on the common law definition of possession.

It will need to be modified if it is alleged that the accused was authorised or licensed to possess the drug. See 7.6.3.3 Checklist: Possession of a Drug of Dependence (Section 5 – Occupation – Disputed) for guidance.

Two elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The substance in question was a drug of dependence; and
2. The accused possessed that substance.

A Drug of Dependence

1. Was the substance in question a "drug of dependence"?

Consider – [Insert name of drug] is a "drug of dependence".

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the Accused is Not Guilty of Possession of a Drug of Dependence

Possession of a Drug

2. Did the accused possess the substance in question?

2.1 Was the substance physically in the accused's custody, or otherwise under the accused's control?

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the Accused is Not Guilty of Possession of a Drug of Dependence

2.2 Did the accused intend to possess a drug of dependence?

Consider – Can you infer from all of the evidence that the accused intended to have custody or control of a drug of dependence?

If Yes, then then the Accused is Guilty of Possession of a Drug of Dependence (as long as you also answered Yes to questions 1 and 2.1)

If No, then the Accused is Not Guilty of Possession of a Drug of Dependence

Last updated: 11 May 2010

7.7 Occupational Health and Safety

7.7.1 Employer's Duty to Employees and Non-Employees

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview of OHS Offences

1. Division 2 of Part 3 of the Occupational Health and Safety Act 2004 ("OHS Act 2004") creates three offences that an employer may be charged with:
    - failing to provide and maintain a safe working environment for employees (s 21);
    - failing to monitor the health of employees or the conditions at a workplace, or to provide information to employees about health and safety (s 22);
    - failing to ensure that people other than employees are not exposed to risks to health and safety (s 23).
2. This topic concerns the first and third of these offences.

Authority to Prosecute

3. Proceedings for offences under the Act may only be brought by:
    - the Victorian Workcover Authority;
    - an inspector with the written authorisation of the Authority; or
    - in the case of indictable offences,[1107] the Director of Public Prosecutions (OHS Act 2004 s 130).
4. Authority to prosecute is not an element of an offence. Consequently, if the accused does not raise the issue, the presumption of regularity applies and the court may presume the prosecution was validly commenced (AB Oxford Cold Storage Co v Arnott (2005) 11 VR 298; AB Oxford Cold Storage Co v Arnott (2003) 8 VR 288).
5. Where the accused raises an issue regarding authorisation, the prosecution must prove that the prosecution was validly commenced on the balance of probabilities (AB Oxford Cold Storage Co v Arnott (2005) 11 VR 298; AB Oxford Cold Storage Co v Arnott (2003) 8 VR 288).
6. Difficulties may arise where the Victorian Workcover Authority only authorises an inspector to prosecute in a particular case (rather than providing an inspector with a general power to prosecute). Such an authorisation is not put in doubt simply because it does not, on its face, identify the specific prosecution commenced. There is a rebuttable presumption that an authorisation which is capable of applying to a proceeding does apply. To rebut the presumption, the accused must show that the apparent authorisation does not apply (AB Oxford Cold Storage Co v Arnott (2005) 11 VR 298; Berwin v Donohoe (1915) 21 CLR 1).
7. To determine whether an inspector had the necessary authority to prosecute, the court will need to examine the wording of the written authorisation, in conjunction with the charge–sheet or indictment (AB Oxford Cold Storage Co v Arnott (2005) 11 VR 298; Berwin v Donohoe (1915) 21 CLR 1).

[1107] The offences created by ss 21 and 23 are an indictable offence (OHS Act 2004 ss 21(4), 23(2)).

Overview of Elements and Circumstances

Elements

8. The offences under ss 21 and 23 both have the following 4 elements:

    i) the accused was an employer at the relevant time;

    ii) there was a risk to health and safety;

    iii) the accused failed to take an identified measure which would have eliminated or reduced the risk (as the case may be);

    iv) it was 'reasonably practicable' in the circumstances for the employer to have taken those measures (DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [6]; DPP v JCS Fabrications Pty Ltd & Anor [2019] VSCA 50, [25]).

9. There is no need to prove mens rea, and no defence of honest and reasonable mistake of fact or "due diligence" (R v Commercial Industrial Construction Group (2006) 14 VR 321; ABC Developmental Learning Centres Pty Ltd v Wallace (2007) 16 VR 409).

10. There is also no need to prove any of the elements of negligence, such as duty of care, loss or foreseeability (Dinko Tuna Farmers v Markos (2007) 98 SASR 96).[1108]

Circumstances in which s 21 may be breached

11. Without limiting the general obligation in s 21(1) to provide and maintain a safe working environment for employees, section 21(2) specifies five circumstances in which an employer breaches s 21:

    i) failing to provide or maintain plants or systems of work that are, so far as is reasonably practicable, safe and without risks to health;

    ii) failing to make arrangements for ensuring, so far as is reasonably practicable, safety and the absence of risks to health in connection with the use, handling, storage or transport of plant or substances;

    iii) failing to maintain, so far as is reasonably practicable, each workplace under the employer's management and control in a condition that is safe and without risks to health;

    iv) failing to provide, so far as is reasonably practicable, adequate facilities for the welfare of employees at any workplace under the employer's management and control; and

    v) failing to provide the information, instruction, training or supervision to employees that is necessary to enable them to perform their work in a way that is safe and without risks to health.

12. This list is not exhaustive of the ways in which s 21 may be breached (Kirk v Industrial Court of NSW (2010) 239 CLR 531).

[1108] However, foreseeability may be relevant to the fourth element.

13. While this list does not directly apply to charges under s 23, these circumstances inform the assessment of whether an employer has breached its duty to non-employees (DPP v JCS Fabrications Pty Ltd & Anor [2019] VSCA 50, [23]).

14. After setting out the general approach that employers must take to workplace safety, this commentary examines the elements of the offence and then the operation of the deemed breach circumstances.

Duty to eliminate or reduce

15. The duties in ss 21 and 23 require the employer to eliminate risks to health and safety, so far as is reasonably practicable. If it is not reasonably practicable to eliminate risks, then the employer must reduce the risks so far as is reasonably practicable (OHS Act 2004 s 20(1)).

Employers Must Take a Proactive Approach to Safety

16. Compliance with the obligations created by ss 21 and 23 requires employers to be proactive in identifying and responding to risks in a workplace (Holmes v RE Spence & Co Pty Ltd (1992) 5 VIR 119).

17. In providing a working environment that is safe and without risks to health, employers must account for employees who are hasty, careless, inattentive or who fail to take reasonable care for their own safety or who fail to comply with a prescribed safe system of work (R v Commercial Industrial Construction Group (2006) 14 VR 321, [49]. See also McLean v Tedman (1984) 155 CLR 306; Workcover Authority (NSW) (Inspector Mulder) v Arbor Products International (Aust) Pty Ltd [2001] NSWIRComm 50; Dunlop Rubber Australia Ltd v Buckley (1952) 87 CLR 313 (Dixon CJ); DPP v JCS Fabrications Pty Ltd & Anor [2019] VSCA 50, [51]).

18. The jury must not consider the accused's acts or omissions with the benefit of hindsight, but with an understanding that one of the chief responsibilities of an employer is the safety of their employees and non-employees. The Act requires employers to adopt an active, imaginative and flexible approach to potential dangers in the workplace, while recognising that human frailty is an ever-present reality (Holmes v RE Spence & Co Pty Ltd (1992) 5 VIR 119; WorkCover Authority of New South Wales (Inspector Egan) v Atco Controls Pty Ltd (1998) 82 IR 80; R v Commercial Industrial Construction Group (2006) 14 VR 321; R v Australian Char Pty Ltd [1999] 3 VR 834; Director of Public Prosecutions v Amcor Packaging Australia Pty Ltd (2005) 11 VR 557).

19. From time to time employers must search for and address hazards that may exist in the workplace. The degree of vigilance required in searching for hazards depends in part on the degree of harm that may result from those hazards. It is especially important that employers responsible for inherently dangerous workplaces search for and eliminate hazards (Rail Infrastructure Corporation v Page [2008] NSWIRComm 169).

Elements

The accused is an employer

20. The first element the prosecution must prove is that the accused is an employer (OHS Act 2004 s 21).

21. An employer is defined as a person who employs one or more people under contracts of employment or contracts of training (OHS Act 2004 s 5).

A risk to health and safety

22. The second element is that there is a risk to health and safety.

23. This element operates differently for the offences under ss 21 and 23.

24. For s 21, the prosecution must prove that there was a risk in the working environment to employee health and safety.

25. For s 23, the prosecution must prove that there was a risk from the conduct of the employer's undertaking to the health and safety of non-employees.

Section 21 – Duty to employees

26. The prosecution must prove that the accused's failure to take the identified measures led to their employees' health or safety being placed at risk (OHS Act 2004 s 21; Cahill v State of New South Wales [2008] NSWIRComm 123; WorkCover Authority of NSW v Kellogg (Aust) Pty Ltd (No 1) [1999] NSWIRComm 453).

27. There are three aspects to this requirement:

    i) there must be a risk;

    ii) it must have been a risk to the health or safety of employees; and

    iii) the risk must have arisen in the working environment.

Risk

28. The first part of this element requires the prosecution to identify a particular risk which is said to exist.

29. Proof of the existence of that risk provides the factual framework against which the third and fourth elements are assessed.

30. The prosecution does not need to show that the accused created the risk to their employees' health and safety, or that the risk was caused solely by the accused's failure to take the specified measures (O'Sullivan v The Crown in the Right of the State of New South Wales (Department of Education and Training) (2003) 125 IR 361; State of New South Wales (NSW Police) v Inspector Covi [2005] NSWIRComm 303; WorkCover Authority of NSW v Kellogg (Aust) Pty Ltd (No 1) [1999] NSWIRComm 453).

31. The risk may arise from a single act or omission, or a combination of acts or omissions (Diemould Tooling Services v Oaten (2008) 101 SASR 339).

32. The prosecution must identify the general class of risk that it is alleged existed (State of New South Wales (NSW Police) v Inspector Covi [2005] NSWIRComm 303; O'Sullivan v The Crown in the Right of the State of New South Wales (Department of Education and Training) (2003) 125 IR 361).

33. The court must not artificially confine the alleged class of risk. For example, it may not be appropriate to attempt to distinguish between a risk of harm resulting from deliberate conduct and a risk of harm arising from negligent conduct (State of New South Wales (NSW Police) v Inspector Covi [2005] NSWIRComm 303; Cahill v State of New South Wales [2008] NSWIRComm 123; O'Sullivan v The Crown in the Right of the State of New South Wales (Department of Education and Training) (2003) 125 IR 361).

34. When describing workplace risks, the judge should avoid the term "potential risk", as that may refer to a risk that does not yet exist. The Act does not require employers to address non-existent risks (Morrison v Powercoal Pty Ltd (2004) 137 IR 253; Newcastle Wallsend Coal Company v McMartin [2006] NSWIRComm 339).

35. In determining whether a risk exists (and whether a measure is necessary to reduce or eliminate that risk), the employer is not entitled to assume that employees are highly trained and experienced (DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [59]).

Employees

36. The prosecution must prove that it was the health and safety of the accused's employees that was placed at risk (OHS Act 2004 s 21; Linfox & Ors v The Queen (2010) 30 VR 507).

37. Section 21(3) defines "employee" to include independent contractors and sub-contractors. See "Independent Contractors" below.

38. Section 21 concerns the accused's failure to protect employees as a class. Consequently, the prosecution does not need to identify a particular employee that was put at risk by the accused's failure to take the specified measure (Diemould Tooling Services v Oaten (2008) 101 SASR 339).

39. However, it will sometimes be necessary to specify (in the particulars to the offence) which people it is alleged were exposed to the risk, in order to identify the relevant class of employees (Diemould Tooling Services v Oaten (2008) 101 SASR 339).

40. The jury must be satisfied that the accused's employees were placed at risk, rather than employees of some other entity (Linfox & Ors v the Queen (2010) 30 VR 507).

41. However, in the case of a work-site involving employees of several entities, each employer will have separate duties to their employees. This is especially relevant in relation to labour-hire companies, which are responsible for the safety of their employees even when the company does not control the employee's work site (DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [151]).

42. In particular, a labour-hire company will need to take steps to take positive steps to ensure the safety of their employees and provide appropriate supervision and monitoring to ensure a safe working environment (DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [151]).

Working environment

43. The risk to employees' health or safety must have arisen in the working environment (OHS Act 2004 s 21).

44. The concept of the "working environment" is not confined to permanent premises or environments with clear physical boundaries. It covers any environment where an employee may be expected to work, and may move with the employee based on the nature of the work (see, e.g. TTS Pty Ltd v Griffiths (1991) 105 FLR 255; Gough v National Coal Board [1959] AC 698; Whittaker v Delmina Pty Ltd [1998] VSC 175; DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676).

45. A "working environment" can include:

- a truck driver's truck;
- a construction site;
- the location of high voltage electrical lines;
- segments of road under construction; or
- the area in which a guided tour takes place (see TTS Pty Ltd v Griffiths (1991) 105 FLR 255; Gough v National Coal Board [1959] AC 698; Whittaker v Delmina Pty Ltd [1998] VSC 175).

Section 23 – Duty to non-employees

46. For a charge under s 23, the prosecution must prove that the conduct of the employer's undertaking created a risk to the health and safety of non-employees. There are the three aspects of this element:

i) The employer conducted an undertaking;

ii) The employer's undertaking created a risk;

iii) The risk was to the health or safety of non-employees.

Employer's undertaking

47. The employer's undertaking is the employer's enterprise or business (R v Associated Octel Co Ltd [1994] 4 All ER 1051; DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676; DPP v JCS Fabrications Pty Ltd & Anor [2019] VSCA 50).

48. The undertaking is not limited to the employer's normal place of work, or where the employer is in control of the workplace. It is assessed based on the nature of the employer's business (DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [175]–[177]; Whittaker v Delmina Pty Ltd [1998] VSC 175).

Non-employees

49. For the s 23 offence, the person placed at risk must have been a non-employee.

50. For the purpose of this offence, the deeming provision that extends the definition of employees to certain independent contractors (See "Independent Contractors" below) does not apply. As a result, where the case involves a risk to an independent contractor, the prosecution may choose to bring the charge either under s 21, and rely on the deeming provision, or under s 23 where there is no deeming provision (Muscat v Magistrates' Court of Victoria (2018) 59 VR 570, [45]).

Failure to take an identified measure which would have eliminated or reduced the risk

51. The Act requires that employers "provide and maintain … a working environment that is safe and without risks to health" or "ensure … that persons other than employees are not exposed to risks to their health or safety". This is an obligation to achieve a result (that is, the provision and maintenance of a safe environment) (ABC Development Learning Centres Pty Ltd v Wallace (2007) 16 VR 409; DPP v JCS Fabrications Pty Ltd & Anor [2019] VSCA 50, [24]).

52. However, as a matter of practice, the prosecution must identify, with sufficient precision, the particular measures that it says the accused should have taken to prevent the identified risk from eventuating (Kirk v Industrial Court of NSW (2010) 239 CLR 531; John Holland v Industrial Court of NSW [2010] NSWCA 338. See also Baiada Poultry Pty Ltd v The Queen [2011] VSCA 23).

53. The prosecution must identify, as part of the particulars of the offence, the measure or measures which it claims were necessary to eliminate or reduce the risk. These must be identified before the trial begins, as the adequacy of particulars does not depend on the evidence which is presented (DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [131]).

54. It is not sufficient to make generic allegations that the accused failed to "guarantee" or "ensure" that a workplace was safe, or failed to take "adequate" steps (Kirk v Industrial Court of NSW (2010) 239 CLR 531; John Holland v Industrial Court of NSW [2010] NSWCA 338).

55. The degree of specificity required will depend on the issues in the case, and whether the particulars identify the act or omission that constitutes the offence (Baida Poultry Pty Ltd v Glenister [2015] VSCA 344, [49]; DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [134]).

56. The prosecution does not, however, need to provide particulars that show the proposed actions were 'reasonably practicable' or, in the case of a charge involving s 21(2)(e), that the actions were 'necessary'. The question of 'reasonably practicable' or 'necessity' is a broad jury question that involves a consideration of all of the evidence (Baida Poultry v Inspector Glenister [2015] VSCA 344; Downer EDI Works Pty Ltd v The Queen (2017) 53 VR 1, [28]–[33]).

57. The measures necessary will depend on the circumstances prevailing at the workplace, the activities undertaken, the skills of the employees and the plant or substances in use (Kirk v Industrial Court of NSW (2010) 239 CLR 531; DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [51]; DPP v JCS Fabrications Pty Ltd & Anor [2019] VSCA 50, [40]).[1109]

58. In determining whether a measure is necessary, the employer is not entitled to assume that employees are highly trained and experienced (DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [59]).

59. It may be alleged that the accused failed to take one specific measure or a number of identified measures (Diemould Tooling Services v Oaten (2008) 101 SASR 339).

60. As ss 21 and 23 do not rely on principles of attribution or vicarious liability, it is not necessary to identify at what level within an organisation the alleged failure occurred. The focus instead is on whether the employer has failed to take all reasonably practicable measures, either by actively implemented an unsafe system of work, or allowing an unsafe system of work to continue (R v Commercial Industrial Construction Group (2006) 14 VR 321; State Rail Authority of New South Wales v Dawson (1990) 37 IR 110; ABC Developmental Learning Centres Pty Ltd v Wallace (2007) 16 VR 409; R v Gateway Foodmarkets Ltd [1997] 3 All ER 78; DPP v JCS Fabrications Pty Ltd & Anor [2019] VSCA 50, [39], [47]).

61. The section does not create a system of vicarious criminal liability where a failure by an employee on a single occasion to follow safe processes necessarily constitutes a failure to maintain a safe system of work (DPP v JCS Fabrications Pty Ltd & Anor [2019] VSCA 50, [45]).

62. While it is not necessary to identify the level at which the alleged failure occurred, failures by employees to follow safe systems of work may raise the question of precisely what the duty required in the circumstances. Where the prosecution alleges a failure to maintain a safe system, the jury will need to examine the whole system, including the experience, skill, knowledge and training of employees within that system. The prosecution will also need to show that there was a reasonably practicable step the employer failed to take to maintain its system (DPP v JCS Fabrications Pty Ltd & Anor [2019] VSCA 50, [41]–[43]).

63. The prosecution must prove that the proposed measure would have eliminated or reduced the risk. It is insufficient to establish that the measure might have improved workplace safety (Kirk v Industrial Court of NSW (2010) 239 CLR 531; Chugg v Pacific Dunlop Ltd (1990) 170 CLR 249; Baiada Poultry Pty Ltd v The Queen (2012) 246 CLR 92).

Measures and Accidents (Causation not required)

64. It is commonly the case that OH&S prosecutions occur after an incident has occurred that has demonstrated a system of work was unsafe. In such cases, the parties and the judge must maintain a clear understanding of how the accident may be relevant to proof of the offence.

65. The prosecution does not need to show that the accident was caused by the accused's failure to take the necessary steps. The occurrence of an accident is of evidentiary significance only (DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [10]; DPP v JCS Fabrications Pty Ltd & Anor [2019] VSCA 50, [24]).

66. As evidence, the occurrence of an accident may help the prosecution show:

    - that a risk existed;
    - the likelihood of the risk eventuating;
    - the gravity of consequences if the risk does eventuate;

[1109] A non-exhaustive list of ways in which an employer may breach the obligation to provide and maintain a safe working environment is contained in s 21(2): see "Circumstances in which section 21 may be breached" below.

- whether the accused took all reasonably practicable steps to eliminate or reduce that risk (DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [91]. See also R v Irvine (2009) 25 VR 75; R v Australian Char Pty Ltd [1999] 3 VR 834; Whittaker v Delmina Pty Ltd [1998] VSC 175; Orbit Drilling Pty Ltd v The Queen (2012) 35 VR 399).

67. In cases where the prosecution relies on an accident for evidentiary purposes:

    (a) the jury should be specifically directed that it is not necessary to show that the relevant measure would have prevented the accident. Further, that any exploration of the circumstances of the accident is only for the purpose of showing or rebutting its evidentiary significance (DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [89], [99]);

    (b) it is best to avoid the language of causation in directions to the jury. References to an act or omission causing or producing a risk is apt to mislead the jury to think that the prosecution must show that the act or omission caused an accident or injury (DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [83]);

    (c) an undue focus on the accident will also lead to an unnecessary narrowing of the relevant risk (DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [86]);

    (d) a judge must be careful to ensure that any directions on the permissible use of evidence of an accident does not mislead the jury into thinking that they need to determine whether the failure to take the prescribed steps caused the accident (DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [91]).

Reasonable practicability

68. The fourth element the prosecution must prove is that it was reasonably practicable for the accused to take the specified measures (OHSA 2004 s 21; DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [6]).

69. Employers are not required to ensure that accidents never happen. Their obligation is to provide and maintain, so far as is reasonably practicable, a working environment that is safe and without risks to health, or ensure, so far as is reasonably practicable, that persons other than employees are not exposed to risks to their health and safety (Holmes v RE Spence & Co Pty Ltd (1992) 5 VIR 119. See also R v Australian Char Pty Ltd [1999] 3 VR 834; R v Commercial Industrial Construction Group (2006) 14 VR 321; Western Power Corporation v Shepherd [2004] WASCA 233; Baiada Poultry Pty Ltd v The Queen (2012) 246 CLR 92; DPP v JCS Fabrications Pty Ltd & Anor [2019] VSCA 50, [24]).

70. The words "so far as is reasonably practicable" define the scope of the employer's duty. While liability for breaching the duty is absolute, the content of the obligation is not (ABC Developmental Learning Centres Pty Ltd v Wallace (2007) 16 VR 409; TTS Pty Ltd v Griffiths (1991) 105 FLR 255).

71. The content of the obligation to take reasonably practicable steps may vary over time, due to changes in knowledge about risks, the means available to address risks, and the availability, suitability and cost of remedial action (Western Power Corporation v Shepherd [2004] WASCA 233).

72. The question of what is reasonably practicable must be determined objectively, having regard to all sources of knowledge, including those in the particular trade or industry of the employer (DPP v JCS Fabrications Pty Ltd & Anor [2019] VSCA 50, [28]).

73. It is not appropriate to ask whether a particular measure was necessary. The statutory question is whether the particular measure was reasonably practicable. An argument that a particular measure was not necessary is better expressed as an argument that, in the circumstances, there was no subsisting risk (Keilor Melton Quarries v The Queen [2020] VSCA 169, [43]–[45]).

74. The burden is on the prosecution to prove that the specified measures were reasonably practicable. It is not sufficient to demonstrate that a measure could have been taken and that, if taken, it might have had some effect on the safety of a working environment (Baiada Poultry Pty Ltd v The Queen (2012) 246 CLR 92. But see Chugg v Pacific Dunlop Ltd (1990) 170 CLR 249).

75. An obligation to take "reasonably practicable" measures is less onerous than an obligation to take "practical", "physically possible" or "feasible" measures (Slivak v Lurgi (Australia) Pty Ltd (2001) 205 CLR 304 (Gaudron J); Kent v Gunns Ltd (2009) 18 Tas R 454).

76. The words "so far as is reasonably practicable" do not introduce an element of intention or negligence into the offence (ABC Developmental Learning Centres Pty Ltd v Wallace (2007) 16 VR 409; TTS Pty Ltd v Griffiths (1991) 105 FLR 255).

Factors relevant to "reasonably practicable"

77. Determining whether a measure is reasonably practicable involves a common sense assessment (Kirk v Industrial Court of NSW (2010) 239 CLR 531).

78. The jury must consider the following matters when determining what is reasonably practicable:

    i) the likelihood of the hazard or risk eventuating;

    ii) the degree of harm that would result if the hazard or risk eventuated;

    iii) what the accused knows or reasonably ought to know about the hazard or risk and any ways of eliminating or reducing the hazard or risk;

    iv) the availability and suitability of ways to eliminate or reduce the hazard or risk; and

    v) the cost of eliminating or reducing the hazard or risk (OHS Act 2004 s 20(2). See also Tenix Defence Pty Ltd v MacCarron [2003] WASCA 165; Holmes v RE Spence & Co Pty Ltd (1992) 5 VIR 119; R v Australian Char Pty Ltd [1999] 3 VR 834).

79. These considerations direct attention to the state of affairs at the accused's workplace at the relevant time (DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [51]).

80. For example, the fact that there is a formal system in place may not be sufficient if that system is not followed. Instead, it may be necessary and reasonably practicable to implement a system which is followed, including a requirement to read, understand and follow relevant instructions (see, e.g. DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [53]).

Level of risk

81. Two of the factors that are relevant to the jury's determination of reasonable practicability are the likelihood of the risk eventuating, and the degree of harm that would result if it did eventuate (OHS Act 2004 s 20(2)(a)–(b)).

82. As noted above under 'Measures and Accidents (Causation not required)', the prosecution does not need to prove that an accident occurred or that anyone was injured. However, the occurrence of an accident may provide evidence of the existence and seriousness of an existing risk (Theiss Pty Ltd v Industrial Court of NSW (2010) 78 NSWLR 94; Kirk v Industrial Court of NSW (2010) 239 CLR 531; R v Irvine (2009) 25 VR 75, [41]; R v Australian Char Pty Ltd [1999] 3 VR 834; Orbit Drilling Pty Ltd v The Queen (2012) 35 VR 399). See also Measures and Accidents (Causation not required), above.

83. In some cases minor and less obvious risks may pose a greater danger than major and obvious risks. Where relevant, the jury should be reminded of this fact (Holmes v RE Spence & Co Pty Ltd (1992) 5 VIR 119; R v Australian Char Pty Ltd [1999] 3 VR 834; Western Power Corporation v Shepherd [2004] WASCA 233).

Reasonable foreseeability

84. Another factor that is relevant to the jury's determination of reasonable practicability is whether the accused knew, or reasonably ought to have known, about the risk and ways of reducing that risk (OHS Act 2004 s 20(2)(c)).

85. Foreseeability of risk is related to reasonable practicability because it is not reasonably practicable to protect against unforeseeable risks (R v Powercor (Aust) [2005] VSCA 163; MacCarron v Coles Supermarkets Australia Pty Ltd & Ors (2001) 23 WAR 355 (Murray J); WorkCover v Fletcher Constructions [2002] NSWIRComm 316; Marshall v Gotham Co Ltd [1954] AC 360).

86. It is therefore not sufficient for the prosecution to simply identify a risk in hindsight. They must show that the accused either knew of the risk in advance, or ought to have known of that risk (and thus should have taken the specified measure) (R v Powercor (Aust) [2005] VSCA 163; MacCarron v Coles Supermarkets Australia Pty Ltd & Ors (2001) 23 WAR 355 (Murray J); WorkCover v Fletcher Constructions [2002] NSWIRComm 316; Marshall v Gotham Co Ltd [1954] AC 360).

87. A risk will have been reasonably foreseeable if a reasonable employer in the accused's position could have foreseen the risk (R v Powercor (Aust) [2005] VSCA 163).

88. The reasonable foreseeability test is objective. The fact that the accused did not foresee the risk in question may be relevant to whether or not the risk was foreseeable, but it will not be conclusive (R v Australian Char Pty Ltd [1999] 3 VR 834).

89. In considering whether a risk was reasonably foreseeable, the jury must take into account the general state of knowledge about that risk, as well as any specific knowledge that was available within a relevant industry (Chugg v Pacific Dunlop (No 2) [1999] 3 VR 934 (Ormiston JA); Yamasa Seafood Australia Pty Ltd v Watkins [2000] VSC 156; Silent Vector v Shepherd [2003] WASCA 315).

90. The jury must also consider the risk posed to employees who act inadvertently or carelessly in relation to their own safety.[1110] The range of behaviour that is reasonably foreseeable is not limited to behaviour that is reasonable (R v Australian Char Pty Ltd [1999] 3 VR 834; Smithwick v National Coal Board (1950) 2 KB 335; Dunlop Rubber Australia Ltd v Buckley (1952) 87 CLR 313; DPP v JCS Fabrications Pty Ltd & Anor [2019] VSCA 50, [51]).

91. The jury must weigh the chance of spontaneous carelessness against the practicality of taking measures to address the risk of human error (Holmes v RE Spence & Co Pty Ltd (1992) 5 VIR 119; R v Australian Char Pty Ltd [1999] 3 VR 834; Western Power Corporation v Shepherd [2004] WASCA 233).

92. Where an accident has occurred, the jury does not need to consider whether that precise accident was foreseeable. Instead, the question is whether the risk, which manifested in the accident, was reasonably foreseeable. However, the accident may provide evidence that informs whether the risk was reasonably foreseeable (Holmes v RE Spence & Co Pty Ltd (1992) 5 VIR 119; DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [56]).

93. While foreseeability of risk is relevant to the jury's determination of whether the accused took all reasonably practicable measures, it is not an element of the offence. It is therefore not appropriate to substitute a test of foreseeability for the statutory test of "reasonably practicable" (see Chugg v Pacific Dunlop (1990) 170 CLR 249; Chugg v Pacific Dunlop (No 2) [1999] 3 VR 934 (Ormiston JA); Kent v Gunns Ltd (2009) 18 Tas R 454).

Regulations, compliance codes and industry standards

94. In some cases, there will be a regulation or a compliance code that contains a provision regarding an employer's duty in certain circumstances. If the employer has complied with the regulation or code, no offence will have been committed (OHS Act 2004 s 152).

[1110] Although employees are obliged to take reasonable care for their own safety and the safety of others (OHS Act 2004 s 25), this does not limit the scope or nature of the duty placed on employers by s 21 (ABC Developmental Learning Centres Pty Ltd v Wallace (2007) 16 VR 409).

95. In other cases, there will be industry standards documents or former regulations that address the relevant area. As such documents are not legally binding,[1111] compliance does not constitute a defence. However, the court may consider such standards, in conjunction with expert evidence, when determining whether the accused took all reasonably practicable steps to provide a safe working environment (Yamasa Seafood Australia Pty Ltd v Watkins [2000] VSC 156; Kent v Gunns Ltd (2009) 18 Tas R 454; Hughes v Van Eyk [2008] NSWSC 525; Reed v Peridis [2005] SASC 136).

96. When standards or former regulations are used in this manner, they are not substituted for the elements of the offence. They merely provide a guide to whether the accused has taken all reasonably practicable steps (Yamasa Seafood Australia Pty Ltd v Watkins [2000] VSC 156; Kent v Gunns Ltd (2009) 18 Tas R 454; Hughes v Van Eyk [2008] NSWSC 525; Reed v Peridis [2005] SASC 136).

Foreseeability, experts and independent contractors

97. Where the employer engages a specialist contractor to perform a task, the employer is not expected to foresee dangers known only within the specialist contractor's field of expertise (Reilly v Devcon (2008) 36 WAR 492; Tobiassen v Reilly [2009] WASCA 26).

98. It is difficult to establish that an employer has breached the Act where it relies on a specialist contractor to perform a task outside the employer's expertise, and the contractor appears to perform its task carefully and safely (Reilly v Devcon (2008) 36 WAR 492; Hamersley Iron Pty Ltd v Robertson, WASC 2/10/1998; Tobiassen v Reilly [2009] WASCA 26; Complete Scaffolding Services v Adelaide Brighton Cement [2001] SASC 199).

Non-Delegable Duty

99. The duty that is placed on employers by ss 21 and 23 is non-delegable (Kirk v Industrial Court of NSW (2010) 239 CLR 531).

100. Consequently, where a worksite is shared by several employers, the fact that other employers have an obligation to take all reasonably practicable measures to protect the health and safety of their employees will be of little relevance to the case against the accused employer (Territory Commercial Roofing Pty Ltd v Steven Hart [2009] ACTSC 119).

101. However, evidence that other employers have undertaken various safety measures may be relevant to demonstrating whether the accused has taken all reasonably practicable steps to provide a safe working environment or to eliminate risks to health and safety (Territory Commercial Roofing Pty Ltd v Steven Hart [2009] ACTSC 119).

Circumstances in Which Section 21 may be Breached

102. Without limiting the general obligation in s 21(1) to provide and maintain a safe working environment for employees, section 21(2) specifies five circumstances in which an employer breaches s 21:

i) failing to provide or maintain plants or systems of work that are, so far as is reasonably practicable, safe and without risks to health;

ii) failing to make arrangements for ensuring, so far as is reasonably practicable, safety and the absence of risks to health in connection with the use, handling, storage or transport of plant or substances;

iii) failing to maintain, so far as is reasonably practicable, each workplace under the employer's

---

[1111] This includes standards published by the Standards Association of Australia.

management and control in a condition that is safe and without risks to health;

iv) failing to provide, so far as is reasonably practicable, adequate facilities for the welfare of employees at any workplace under the employer's management and control; and

v) failing to provide the information, instruction, training or supervision to employees that is necessary to enable them to perform their work in a way that is safe and without risks to health.

103. These subparagraphs are self-contained. Where the accused's conduct meets the description in any one paragraph, then that will, by itself, constitute a breach of s 21(1) (DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [106], [108]).

104. These subparagraphs do not apply to risks to non-employees which lead to a charge under s 23. However, the failures and measures described in the subparagraphs will inform the assessment of whether an employer has breached the s 23 duty (DPP v JCS Fabrications Pty Ltd & Anor [2019] VSCA 50, [23]).

105. To reflect the deeming and self-contained nature of s 21(2), the following sections provide modified statements of elements for use in cases where the prosecution relies on a deemed breach under s 21(2).

Failing to provide and maintain safe systems of work

106. Section 21(2)(a) imposes an obligation to provide and maintain systems of work that are, so far as is reasonably practicable, safe and without risks to health.

107. To meet the statutory obligation to provide and maintain a safe system of work, a system must be sufficiently systematic or comprehensive and contain appropriate detail. Employees must also be sufficiently trained to implement that system (Genner Constructions Pty Limited v WorkCover Authority of New South Wales (Insp Guillarte) [2001] NSWIRComm 267; WorkCover v Fletcher Constructions [2002] NSWIRComm 316).

108. The phrase "system of work" describes the regularly adopted method of carrying on the employer's business. Isolated day to day acts by an employee, in contravention of general practice or procedures, do not form part of a system of work (Andar Transport Pty Ltd v Brambles Ltd (2004) 217 CLR 424; English v Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co Ltd [1936] SC 883).

109. Not every procedure that forms part of a system of work needs to be documented. The need for documentation depends on the particular circumstances and the nature of the work environment (WorkCover v Fletcher Constructions [2002] NSWIRComm 316).

110. Because employers must actively manage risks in the workplace, they must monitor the implementation of systems of work. A "paper system" that is not implemented or enforced is not sufficient (Inspector Campbell v Hitchcock [2004] NSWIRComm 87; R v Commercial Industrial Construction Group (2006) 14 VR 321; WorkCover Authority of NSW (Inspector Penfold) v Fernz Construction Materials Ltd [No 2] [2000] NSWIRComm 99).

111. Consequently, in determining whether an employer has failed to provide or maintain safe systems of work, the jury should also look at the employer's methods for checking whether their procedures are complied with (WorkCover v Fletcher Constructions [2002] NSWIRComm 316).

112. A system of work may break down due to employees becoming lax through routine or over-familiarity. Employers may also need to take steps to protect against this danger (Rail Infrastructure Corporation v Page [2008] NSWIRComm 169; R v Commercial Industrial Construction Group (2006) 14 VR 321; R v Australian Char Pty Ltd [1999] 3 VR 834).

113. It will generally not be sufficient for an employer to simply assign responsibility for safety issues to a supervisor or manager. They must ensure that the supervisor or manager effectively implements the employer's safe system of work. This may require the employer to monitor the supervisor or manager (Rail Infrastructure Corporation v Page [2008] NSWIRComm 169; R v Commercial Industrial Construction Group (2006) 14 VR 321; WorkCover v Fletcher Constructions [2002] NSWIRComm 316).

114. Where an employer sets up and properly implements a safe system of work, the mere fact that the system is not complied with does not, of itself, establish that s 21(2)(a) has been breached. The prosecution must prove that it was reasonably practicable for the employer to have taken further steps to guard against the breach of an established and properly implemented system. This may depend on whether the breach of the existing system of work was reasonably foreseeable (WorkCover v Fletcher Constructions [2002] NSWIRComm 316. See also DPP v JCS Fabrications Pty Ltd & Anor [2019] VSCA 50).

115. In cases where the prosecution relies on s 21(2)(a), the judge should modify the charge to refer to the following four elements:

    i) the accused is an employer;

    ii) there was a risk in the working environment to employee health and safety;

    iii) the accused failed to provide or maintain plant or systems of work that would have eliminated or reduced the risk (as the case may be);

    iv) it was 'reasonably practicable' in the circumstances for the employer to have provided or maintained that plant or systems of work (DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [6], [106]).

Failing to maintain a workplace in a safe condition

116. Section 21(2)(c) requires employers, as far as is reasonably practicable, to maintain workplaces under their management and control in a condition that is safe and without risks to health.

117. A person may have control over a workplace without having control over every activity engaged in at the workplace (Tobiassen v Reilly [2009] WASCA 26).

118. Consequently, the fact that an employer generally cannot control the specific manner in which a specialist contractor performs a task does not mean that the employer does not have control over the workplace where the contractor performs that task (Tobiassen v Reilly [2009] WASCA 26).[1112]

119. Where a work site is shared by two or more employers, the fact that one employer has assumed control or authority over the workplace does not diminish the duty of the other employer to ensure the health and safety of its employees (Morrison v Waratah Engineering [2005] NSWIRComm 63).

120. An employer only has management and control of a site when it has the ability to address risks to health. The employer's absence from a site, such as a workplace that is shut down on a weekend, may mean that the employer does not have management or control of the site during that absence (Markos v Commercial and General Projects Pty Ltd [2009] SAIRC 45).

121. In cases where the prosecution relies on s 21(2)(c), the judge should modify the charge to refer to the following four elements:

    i) the accused is an employer;

[1112] See "Independent Contractors" below for further information concerning an employer's duty in relation to such contractors.

ii) there was a risk in the working environment to employee health and safety;

iii) the accused failed to maintain the condition of each workplace under the employer's management and control so as to eliminate or reduce the risk (as the case may be);

iv) it was 'reasonably practicable' in the circumstances for the employer to maintain each workplace in this manner (DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [6], [106]).

Failing to provide information, instruction or training or supervision

122. Under s 21(2)(e) employers must provide the information, instruction, training and supervision necessary to enable employees to work safely and without risks to health.

123. This may include appropriately disseminating safety alerts to employees who need such information (DPP v Coates Hire Operations Pty Ltd (2012) 36 VR 361).

124. Under this sub-paragraph, the question of fact for the jury is to consider what training (or information, instruction or supervision) is necessary to perform the work safely and without risks to health. This will be fact-dependent and involve consideration of the nature of the risks and the available options. It may, for instance, involve practical, hands-on, training (see, e.g. DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [119] and [124]).

125. However, as noted above under 'Measures and Accidents (Causation not required)', where the case involves an accident, it is not necessary to show that the lack of training caused the accident (DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [128]).

126. Unlike the other obligations set out in s 21(2), this obligation is not qualified by the words "so far as is reasonably practicable". The obligation is, under this subparagraph, absolute (R v Commercial Industrial Construction Group (2006) 14 VR 321, [44]; DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [104]; c.f. R v H Waterhouse & Son Pty Ltd [2009] VSCA 121, [59]–[65]).

127. In cases where the prosecution relies on s 21(2)(e), the judge should modify the charge to only refer to three elements:

(a) the accused is an employer;

(b) there was a risk in the working environment to employee health and safety;

(c) the accused failed to provide such information, instruction, training or supervision as is necessary to eliminate or reduce the risk (see DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [6], [104]).

128. Despite the absence of the requirement of 'so far as is reasonably practicable' for proof of the offence under this limb of s 21(2), the statement of the charge in the indictment may be drafted as follows:

> [The accused, at a named place and date] being an employer, failed so far as was reasonably practicable to provide and maintain for its employees a working environment that was safe and without risks to health in that it failed to provide such information, instruction, training or supervision to employees of the employer as is necessary to enable those persons to perform their work in a way that is safe and without risks to health (Downer EDI Works Pty Ltd v The Queen (2017) 53 VR 1, [12]).

129. This style of drafting reflects the fact that the offence provision is s 21(1) and complies with the requirement in Criminal Procedure Act 2009 Schedule 1, clause 1 to 'state the offence that the accused is alleged to have committed' (Downer EDI Works Pty Ltd v The Queen (2017) 53 VR 1, [19]. See also Criminal Procedure Act 2009 Schedule 1, clauses 1, 3).

Independent Contractors

130. As noted above, the offence in s 21 only addresses the duties an employer owes to its employees. An employer's duty to non-employees is primarily governed by s 23.

131. While the duty to independent contractors under s 21 depends on whether the employer controls the conduct of the contractor, the duty under s 23 does not. Section 23 can therefore apply to an independent contractor, whether or not that contractor is also treated as an employee for the purpose of section 21 (Muscat v Magistrates' Court of Victoria [2018] VSC 650, [45]).

132. The following discussion should not be transposed to a case involving s 23 (see DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [170]–[173]).

133. Independent contractors engaged by an employer are considered to be employees for the purpose of s 21, as are the employees of those independent contractors (OHS Act 2004 s 21(3); DPP v Coates Hire Operations Pty Ltd (2012) 36 VR 361).

134. To be included within the scope of s 21(3), an independent contractor must have been "engaged by" the employer. It is for the judge to determine the meaning of the word "engaged". He or she must instruct the jury on its meaning, as well as the facts necessary to establish engagement (R v ACR Roofing Pty Ltd (2004) 11 VR 187).

135. The term "engaged by" is complex and can be factually dependent. The judge should therefore invite the prosecution to identify at the start of the trial the particular matters that give rise to engagement.

136. Engagement of a contractor exists in relation to any matters over which the employer has control, whether by privity of contract or arising from a contract between the contractor and another person. This covers direct contracts, sub-contracts and any further layers of contractual relations (R v ACR Roofing Pty Ltd (2004) 11 VR 187).

Scope of the duty owed to independent contractors

137. While independent contractors engaged by an employer are considered to be employees for the purpose of s 21, the duties owed to independent contractors are more limited than the duties owed to other employees. An employer only owes a duty to an independent contractor "in relation to matters over which the employer has control or would have control if not for any agreement purporting to limit or remove that control" (s 21(3)(b)).

138. Consequently, where it is alleged that an employer breached his or her duty to an independent contractor, it is necessary for the jury to determine whether the employer had control over the matter in issue (see, e.g. Baiada Poultry Pty Ltd v The Queen [2011] VSCA 23).

139. An employer has control over the work of an independent contractor where:

- there is a legal right to direct the contractor; or
- where the employer considered that it had the right to direct the contractor and the contractor would accept and act on that direction (Stratton v Van Driel Ltd [1998] VSC 75).

140. While employers are unlikely to have control over certain matters (such as the way expert contractors performs the specific tasks they are engaged to perform), they may nonetheless retain control over other matters (such as where the work is to be undertaken or the safety measures that must be observed) (Baiada Poultry Pty Ltd v The Queen [2011] VSCA 23; Reilly v Devcon Australia Pty Ltd (2008) 36 WAR 492; R v Associated Octel Ltd [1994] 4 All ER 1051; R v ACR Roofing Pty Ltd (2004) 11 VR 187; [2004] VSCA 215).

141. To determine whether an employer has control over a matter, the court will look at the details of the contractual relationship between the employer and the contractor, as well as any other indications that the employer had the right to direct the contractor in the performance of its work (Stratton v Van Driel Ltd [1998] VSC 75; Baiada Poultry Pty Ltd v The Queen [2011] VSCA 23).

142. Contractual interpretation is a mixed question of fact and law that involves three stages:

i) the judge must determine, as a question of law, whether the words used in the contract have a legal meaning, a technical meaning or their ordinary meaning;

ii) if the words have a legal meaning, the judge must explain that meaning to the jury. If the words have their ordinary meaning or a technical meaning, the judge must instruct the jury to determine, as a question of fact, what that meaning is;

iii) the judge must direct the jury about the legal effect of the relevant contractual provisions, depending on the jury's findings of fact at the second stage (Baiada Poultry Pty Ltd v The Queen [2011] VSCA 23).

Sub-contractors

143. Employers do not only owe duties to those contractors they have directly engaged. They also owe duties to the employees of those contractors, in relation to matters over which the employer has control (or would have control if not for any agreement purporting to limit or remove that control) (OHS Act 2004 s 21(3); R v ACR Roofing Pty Ltd (2004) 11 VR 187).

144. Where the prosecution relies on principles of agency to establish that the accused had control over the sub-contractor, the judge must explain the relevant principles and relate them to the evidence (R v ACR Roofing Pty Ltd (2004) 11 VR 187).

Content of the duty owed to independent contractors

145. The prosecution must prove that the accused did not, so far as is reasonably practicable, provide and maintain a working environment that was safe and without risks to the health of those independent contractors or sub-contractors who fall within the scope of s 21(3).

146. As noted above (see "Use of experts and independent contractors"), an employer who lacks the expertise necessary to safely complete a task may fulfil its duties under s 21 by relying on an external expert. Consequently, the prosecution will need to prove that engaging the relevant contractor was not sufficient to discharge its obligations under the Act (Baiada Poultry Pty Ltd v The Queen [2011] VSCA 23).

147. This may depend on whether it was reasonably practicable for the employer to have directed the independent contractor to undertake their task in a certain way. This will be a matter of fact and degree (Baiada Poultry Pty Ltd v The Queen [2011] VSCA 23).

148. Determining what was reasonably practicable may depend on:

- the size of the employer;
- the employer's expertise in relation to the particular task and knowledge of the risks involved;
- the nature and gravity of the risk;
- the competence and expertise of the independent contractor and its employees; and
- the nature of the precautions the contractor was taking and whether the employer was aware of any defects in the contractor's safety practices (R v ACR Roofing Pty Ltd (2004) 11 VR 187; R v Associated Octel Pty Ltd [1994] 4 All ER 1051; Baiada Poultry Pty Ltd v The Queen [2011] VSCA 23).

Employee or independent contractor?

149. Because the scope and content of the duty owed to employees and independent contractors differs slightly, it may be important to determine whether a particular individual was an employee or an independent contractor.

150. Determining whether a person is an employee or an independent contractor is a matter of substance, not form. It depends on the rights and obligations under the relevant contract between the employer and the other party, and not on the labels used by the parties or their subjective views (Tobiassen v Reilly [2009] WASCA 26; Hollis v Vabu Pty Ltd (2001) 207 CLR 21; Stevens v Brodribb Sawmilling Co Pty Ltd (1986) 160 CLR 16).

151. One factor that is relevant to determining whether a person is an employee or an independent contractor is whether the employer has the right to control the performance of the person's work. Control of work is a characteristic of an employer-employee relationship (Zuijs v Wirth Brothers Pty Ltd (1955) 93 CLR 561; Tobiassen v Reilly [2009] WASCA 26).

Duplicity and Multiple Offences

152. While s 21(1) creates a single offence, the specific types of breaches identified in s 21(2) may each be charged as separate offences (Newcastle Wallsend Coal Company v Inspector McMartin [2006] NSWIRComm 339; DPP v Coates Hire Operations Pty Ltd (2012) 36 VR 361).

153. Alternatively, if the breaches arose out of the same factual circumstances, they may be charged as a single offence (subject to any contrary court order) (OHS Act 2004 s 33. See also John Holland v Industrial Court of NSW [2010] NSWCA 338, [66]; Diemould Tooling Services v Oaten (2008) 101 SASR 339).

154. Section 33 is a facilitative provision that overrides the common law prohibition on duplicity (See John Holland v Industrial Court of NSW [2010] NSWCA 338; Coombs v Patrick Stevedores [2002] NSWIRComm 215).[1113]

155. An aggregated charge under s 33 differs from a "rolled-up" charge at common law (DPP v Coates Hire Operations Pty Ltd (2012) 36 VR 361).

156. For s 33 to apply, the court must find that the alleged contraventions arose out of the same factual circumstances (See John Holland v Industrial Court of NSW [2010] NSWCA 338; Coombs v Patrick Stevedores [2002] NSWIRComm 215).

157. The same factual circumstances will only exist where the relevant act or omission constituting the offence is the same. Common factual circumstances do not exist merely because there is an accident caused by multiple breaches of workplace safety (DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [144]).

158. While s 33 alleviates the strictness of the rule against duplicity, there are risks associated with this provision and the prosecution should be selective in its use. First, a jury verdict to a s 33 charge will be inscrutable, and this may present problems for sentencing. Second, errors in relation to one part of a case under a s 33 charge may leave the charge vulnerable on appeal, even if there were other paths to conviction which were free of error (DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [137], [143]).

159. Because of these risks, the prosecution should not use s 33 where the allegations involve different factual or legal issues, or where the question of reasonable practicability may be different for different allegations (DPP v Vibro-Pile (2016) 49 VR 676, [141]).

160. The prosecution cannot lay separate charges for each employee who is exposed to a risk of harm from a single incident. However, where there are multiple acts or omissions giving rise to risks of harm to different employees, the prosecution may bring separate charges for each separate failure to provide a safe working environment (Diemould Tooling Services v Oaten (2008) 101 SASR 339).

[1113] The section reverses the position that existed under the OHS Act 1985, which held that each factual matter giving rise to a breach of the employer's duty to provide a safe working environment needed to be separately charged (See R v Australian Char Pty Ltd [1999] 3 VR 834; Chugg v Pacific Dunlop Ltd [1988] VR 411).

Overlap Between sections 21 and 23

161. In some cases, the accused's failure to take a certain measure may give rise to a risk to both employees and non-employees. A jury may return a verdict of guilty on charges under both s 21 and s 23 of the Act (Director of Public Prosecutions Reference (No 1 of 1992) [1992] 2 VR 405).

162. Where a risk is posed to an independent contractor in relation to matters over which the employer has control, a prosecutor can choose to bring charges under either section 21 or 23 (Muscat v Magistrates' Court of Victoria [2018] VSC 650, [52]–[54]).

Witness Warnings

163. Where an employee is called to give evidence against their employer, it may be necessary to give a criminally concerned witness warning or a Faure warning. However, this will usually not be necessary, as:

- any incentive to minimise the employee's involvement in the offending will usually be obvious to the jury; and
- a witnesses' guilt of an OH&S offence as an employee might not affect the guilt of the employer or another employee (R v Irvine (2009) 25 VR 75; R v Powercor (Aust) Pty Ltd [2005] VSCA 163).

Last updated: 21 July 2021

7.7.1.1 Charge: Employer's Duty to Employees

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

At the start of the trial, the judge should seek particulars from the prosecution regarding:

i) What the accused should have done to avoid creating a risk to the health and safety of employees; and

ii) If it is in issue, the basis for establishing the employee/employer relationship.

iii) If it is in issue, the facts necessary to support a finding that an employee or independent contractor relationship existed

These matters will inform the content of the charge.

If the prosecution relies on a breach of s 21(2) to establish the offence, this charge must be adapted accordingly. See Employer's Duty to Employees and non-Employees for guidance.

NOA has been charged with failing to provide and maintain a safe working environment. This crime consists of four elements:

One – The accused was an employer at the relevant time;

Two – There was a risk in the accused's working environment to the health and safety of employees;

Three – The accused failed to do something which would have eliminated or reduced that risk;

Four – It was reasonably practicable in the circumstances to have taken steps to eliminate or reduce that risk.

Before you can find NOA guilty of failing to provide and maintain a safe workplace you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proven all four of these elements beyond reasonable doubt.

I will now explain these elements in detail.[1114]

The Accused was an Employer

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that on [identify relevant date(s)], the accused was an employer.

An employer is someone who employs at least one person under a contract of employment or training.

[Summarise evidence and arguments concerning the accused's status as an employer.]

Risk in the working environment to employee health and safety

The second element is that there was a risk in the accused's working environment to the health and safety of employees.

There are three parts to this element.

First – Risk. The prosecution says that there was a risk of [identify relevant risk].

Second – Working environment. The prosecution says that [identify location] was part of NOA's working environment.

Third – Employees. The risk must be to the health and safety of the accused's employees. That is, people under a contract of employment with NOA.[1115]

[If the offence relates to an independent contractor*, add the following shaded section*.]

Because this case involves independent contractors, there are two additional matters that the prosecution must prove. First, they must prove that [identify relevant contractors] were hired by the accused to do some work.[1116]

[If this matter is not in issue, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case, it is not disputed that [identify relevant contractors] were hired by the accused. You will not have any difficulty with this matter.

[If this matter is in issue, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case, this matter is in dispute. [Summarising prosecution and defence evidence and arguments]. In order to find that [identify relevant contractors] were hired by the accused to do some work, you must be satisfied that [identify facts necessary to prove contractor relationship].

Second, they must prove that the accused had sufficient control over the contractors that s/he could

---

[1114] If an element or part of an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, it should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this [element/matter] proven."

[1115] Where the risk extends to independent contractors who are treated as employees under OHSA 2004 s 21(3), this direction should be modified accordingly and the shaded text added.

[1116] This statement should be modified if a different form of engagement is alleged.

have directed them to [identify suggested measure, e.g. 'use safety goggles while working'].[1117]

In relation to this second matter, it is useful to note that employers generally do not control the way in which competent independent contractors perform their work. However, they may have control over certain aspects of the contractors' work, such as where and when they undertake it. They may also have other rights to direct the contractor, based on their contract or the relationship between them.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments on any parts of this element in dispute.]

Failure to eliminate or reduce risk

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused failed to do something that would have eliminated or reduced the risk.

The law requires the prosecution to identify a particular measure which the accused should have done to address the risk.

In this case, the prosecution say that NOA was required to [identify relevant measures, e.g. "install an isolation switch on the mulcher"].

The prosecution must prove that if NOA had done so, then the risk of [identify relevant risk] would have been eliminated or reduced. It is not enough to say that the risk might have been reduced if the accused had taken that measure.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Reasonable Practicability

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that [describe specific measure] was a reasonably practicable means of addressing the risk of [identify relevant risk].

Practicable is a word that is not commonly used. It means that something is able to be done or put into practice. This element requires you to determine whether [describe specific measure] was reasonably feasible or reasonably capable of being done.

To determine whether the proposed measure was reasonably practicable, you must consider matters such as:

- How likely it was that [describe relevant risk] would occur;
- What harm was likely to be caused if [describe relevant risk];
- What could be done to eliminate or reduce the risk;
- How suitable those options were, and how much they would have cost; and
- What the accused knew about the risk and the ways of eliminating or reducing it, or reasonably should have known.

You must consider these matters by reference to the position of a reasonably prudent employer. It is no answer for the accused to say that s/he did not know about the risk, or thought that things were unlikely to go wrong, or could not afford to do what was suggested.

[1117] If the accused would have had sufficient control over the contractor, but there was an agreement to the contrary, this part of the charge will need to be modified to reflect the fact that the agreement is not operative for the purpose of this element.

You must also consider these matters without the benefit of hindsight. You must decide whether the proposed measure was reasonably practicable before [identify event which raised accused's awareness of risk].

If the risk was reasonably foreseeable by a reasonable employer, then the accused may have been required to take steps to prevent it, even if s/he had no personal knowledge of the risk.

However, employers do not need to guard against risks that are unforeseeable. This is because it is not reasonably practicable to protect against unforeseeable risks.

[If it is necessary to direct the jury that the duty is non-delegable, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the employer's duty to eliminate or reduce risks cannot be delegated to anyone else. This means that when you are deciding whether [identify relevant measure] is reasonably practicable, the accused cannot say [identify how the issue of delegation arose in the context of the case, e.g. "that they did not need to do anything further, because they had a health and safety officer and Mr Smith should have identified the risk"].

Employers must proactively search for and address risks in the workplace. They must adopt an active, imaginative and flexible approach to workplace safety. They may need to protect against risks that arise where an employee acts inadvertently or carelessly.

However, the law does not require an employer to eliminate all dangers that could conceivably arise. That would involve imposing an unrealistic standard of perfection. The test is whether the accused failed to do what was reasonably practicable.

[If multiple measures are identified, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution has identified [insert number of measures] things NOA should have done to eliminate or reduce the risk. These are alternatives. For each of them, you must ask "Would it have eliminated or reduced the risk" and "Was it reasonably practicable". If all of you answer yes to both questions for a particular measure, then you are satisfied of both the third and fourth elements of this offence. If half of you say [insert first measure] was not reasonably practicable, but [insert second measure] was and half of you say [insert second measure] was not reasonably practicable but [insert first measure] was, then you have not reached agreement on this fourth element.

[If evidence is led of an accident involving the workplace, add the following shaded section.]

You have heard evidence that [describe circumstances of accident]. NOA has not been charged with causing that accident, or causing NOV's [death/injury]. Instead, NOA has been charged with failing to address a risk.

You might wonder "how can I use the evidence of the accident then?"

The evidence that [identify relevant accident] may help you decide:

- Did a risk exist?
- How likely was this risk to occur?
- What would happen if this risk occurs?
- Did NOA taken all reasonably practicable steps to eliminate the risk?

But don't use the benefit of hindsight. Remember that just because an accident has happened it does not mean that this was due to a relevant failure on the part of the employer. Sometimes accidents happen and no one is to blame.

You do not need to decide whether [identify relevant measure] would have prevented [describe relevant accident]. There are two important questions. "Would [identify relevant measure] have eliminated or reduced the risk of [identify relevant risk]?" and "Was it reasonably practicable to [identify relevant measure]?" If you answer yes to both questions, then you are satisfied of both the third and fourth elements of this offence.

[If the case concerns a hidden risk, add the following shaded section.]

In making your determination, you must consider the fact that hidden risks are sometimes more dangerous than obvious risks. While people will often be aware of the need to avoid obvious risks, they may overlook the need to avoid hidden risks.

[If the offence relates to an independent contractor*, add the following shaded section.*]

In this case, the defence argued that NOA had met his/her obligations by hiring NOC, a specialist contractor, to [describe work]. It is for the prosecution to prove that this was not sufficient, and that it was reasonably practicable for NOA to have gone further and [identify measure].

When deciding whether it was reasonably practicable for NOA to have taken other measures in these circumstances, you must consider:

- The nature and seriousness of the risks involved;
- NOC's competence and expertise;
- NOA's expertise in relation to [describe the tasks engaged in by the contractor] and his/her knowledge of the risks involved;
- The nature of the precautions NOC was taking, and whether NOA was aware of any defects in NOC's safety practices; and
- The size of NOA's business.

Ultimately, determining what is reasonably practicable is a balancing exercise that requires you to use your common sense. Consider the danger posed by the risk and the difficulty of addressing the risk. Using that, decide whether the measure(s) posed by the prosecution were reasonably practicable.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of failing to provide and maintain a safe workplace, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – The accused was an employer at the relevant time;

Two – There was a risk in the accused's working environment to the health and safety of employees;

Three – The accused failed to do something which would have eliminated or reduced that risk;

Four – It was reasonably practicable in the circumstances to have taken steps to eliminate or reduce that risk.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of failing to provide and maintain a safe workplace.

Last updated: 27 March 2019

7.7.1.2 Checklist: Employer's Duty to Employees

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Note – If a breach of s 21(2) is alleged, these elements and questions must be adapted. See 7.7.1 Employer's Duty to Employees for guidance.

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused was an employer at the relevant time; and

2. There was a risk in the working environment to employee health and safety; and

3. The accused failed to take an identified measure which would have eliminated or reduced the risk; and

4. It was reasonably practicable in the circumstances to have taken that measure.

Accused as an Employer

1. Was the accused an employer at the relevant time?

If yes, then go to 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of breaching the duty to employees

Risk

2. Was there a risk in the working environment to employee health and safety?

Consider – The prosecution claims that there was a risk of [insert relevant risk]

If yes, then go to 3

If no, then the accused is not guilty of breaching the duty to employees

Failure to eliminate or reduce risk

3. Did the accused fail to take an identified measure which would have eliminated or reduced the risk?

Consider – The prosecution argues that the accused should have [insert relevant measure]?

Consider – Would [insert relevant measure] have eliminated or reduced the risk of [insert relevant risk]?

If yes, then go to 4

If no, then the accused is not guilty of breaching the duty to employees

Reasonably practicable

4. Was [insert relevant remedial act] a reasonably practicable way of addressing [insert relevant risk]?

Consider – How likely was [insert relevant risk] to occur?

Consider – What harm would follow if [insert relevant risk] occurred?

Consider – What could be done to eliminate or reduce the risk?

Consider – How suitable were those options and how much would these options have cost?

Consider – What did the accused know about the risk and ways of addressing it or what should the accused have reasonably known?

If yes, then the accused is guilty of breaching the duty to employees (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1, 2 and 3)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of breaching the duty to employees

Last updated: 15 April 2016

*7.7.1.3 Charge: Employer's Duty to Non-Employees

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

At the start of the trial, the judge should seek particulars from the prosecution regarding:

i) What the accused should have done to avoid creating a risk to the health and safety of non-employees; and

ii) The extent of the employer's business.

These matters will inform the content of the charge.

NOA has been charged with failing to eliminate risks to the health of safety of non-employees. This crime consists of four elements:

One – The accused was an employer at the relevant time;

Two – There was a risk from the conduct of the accused's undertaking to the health and safety of non-employees;

Three – The accused failed to do something which would have eliminated or reduced that risk;

Four – It was reasonably practicable in the circumstances to have taken steps to eliminate or reduce that risk.

Before you can find NOA guilty of failing to eliminate risks to the health of safety of non-employees you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proven all four of these elements beyond reasonable doubt.

I will now explain these elements in detail.[1118]

The Accused was an Employer

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that on [identify relevant date(s)], the accused was an employer.

An employer is someone who employs at least one person under a contract of employment or training.

[Summarise evidence and arguments concerning the accused's status as an employer.]

[1118] If an element or part of an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, it should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this [element/matter] proven."

Risk from the conduct of the employer's undertaking to the health and safety of non-employees

The second element is that the conduct of the employer's undertaking created a risk to the health and safety of non-employees.

There are three parts to this element.

First – Conduct of the employer's undertaking. This means the conduct of the employer's business or enterprise. The prosecution says that NOA's business or enterprise was [identify scope of enterprise].

Second – Risk to health and safety. The prosecution says that NOA's business or enterprise created a risk of [identify relevant risk].

Third – Non-Employees. The risk must be to the health and safety of non-employees. That is, people who are not under a contract of employment with NOA.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments on any parts of this element in dispute.]

Failure to eliminate or reduce risk

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused failed to do something that would have eliminated or reduced the risk.

The law requires the prosecution to identify a particular measure which the accused should have done to address the risk.

In this case, the prosecution say that NOA was required to [identify relevant measures, e.g. "install an isolation switch on the mulcher"].

The prosecution must prove that if NOA had done so, then the risk of [identify relevant risk] would have been eliminated or reduced. It is not enough to say that the risk might have been reduced if the accused had taken that measure.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Reasonable Practicability

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that [describe specific measure] was a reasonably practicable means of addressing the risk of [identify relevant risk].

Practicable is a word that is not commonly used. It means that something is able to be done or put into practice. This element requires you to determine whether [describe specific measure] was reasonably feasible or reasonably capable of being done.

To determine whether the proposed measure was reasonably practicable, you must consider matters such as:

- How likely it was that [describe relevant risk] would occur;
- What harm was likely to be caused if [describe relevant risk];
- What could be done to eliminate or reduce the risk;
- How suitable those options were, and how much they would have cost; and
- What the accused knew about the risk and the ways of eliminating or reducing it, or reasonably should have known.

You must consider these matters by reference to the position of a reasonably prudent employer. It is no answer for the accused to say that s/he did not know about the risk, or thought that things were unlikely to go wrong, or could not afford to do what was suggested.

You must also consider these matters without the benefit of hindsight. You must decide whether the proposed measure was reasonably practicable before [identify event which raised accused's awareness of risk].

If the risk was reasonably foreseeable by a reasonable employer, then the accused may have been required to take steps to prevent it, even if s/he had no personal knowledge of the risk.

However, employers do not need to guard against risks that are unforeseeable. This is because it is not reasonably practicable to protect against unforeseeable risks.

[If it is necessary to direct the jury that the duty is non-delegable, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the employer's duty to eliminate or reduce risks cannot be delegated to anyone else. This means that when you are deciding whether [identify relevant measure] is reasonably practicable, the accused cannot say [identify how the issue of delegation arose in the context of the case, e.g. "that they did not need to do anything further, because they had a health and safety officer and Mr Smith should have identified the risk"]. An employer also cannot say "NOV should have taken better care of him/herself". It is the accused's duty to eliminate or reduce risks to non-employees, as far as reasonably practicable.

Employers must proactively search for and address risks in the workplace. They must adopt an active, imaginative and flexible approach to workplace safety. They may need to protect against risks that arise where an employee acts inadvertently or carelessly.

However, the law does not require an employer to eliminate all dangers that could conceivably arise. That would involve imposing an unrealistic standard of perfection. The test is whether the accused failed to do what was reasonably practicable.

[If multiple measures are identified, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution has identified [insert number of measures] things NOA should have done to eliminate or reduce the risk. These are alternatives. For each of them, you must ask "Would it have eliminated or reduced the risk" and "Was it reasonably practicable". If all of you answer yes to both questions for a particular measure, then you are satisfied of both the third and fourth elements of this offence.

If half of you say [insert first measure] was not reasonably practicable, but [insert second measure] was and half of you say [insert second measure] was not reasonably practicable but [insert first measure] was, then you have not reached agreement on this fourth element.

[If evidence is led of an accident involving the workplace, add the following shaded section.]

You have heard evidence that [describe circumstances of accident]. NOA has not been charged with causing that accident, or causing NOV's [death/injury]. Instead, NOA has been charged with failing to address a risk.

You might wonder "how can I use the evidence of the accident then?"

The evidence that [identify relevant accident] may help you decide:

- Did a risk exist?
- How likely was this risk to occur?
- What would happen if this risk occurs?
- Did NOA take all reasonably practicable steps to eliminate the risk?

But don't use the benefit of hindsight. Remember that just because an accident has happened it does not mean that this was due to a relevant failure on the part of the employer. Sometimes accidents happen and no one is to blame.

You do not need to decide whether [identify relevant measure] would have prevented [describe relevant accident]. There are two important questions. "Would [identify relevant measure] have eliminated or reduced the risk of [identify relevant risk]?" and "Was it reasonably practicable to [identify relevant measure]?" If you answer yes to both questions, then you are satisfied of both the third and fourth elements of this offence.

[If the case concerns a hidden risk, add the following shaded section.]

In making your determination, you must consider the fact that hidden risks are sometimes more dangerous than obvious risks. While people will often be aware of the need to avoid obvious risks, they may overlook the need to avoid hidden risks.

[If the offence relates to an independent contractor*, add the following shaded section.*]

In this case, the defence argued that NOA had met his/her obligations by hiring NOC, a specialist contractor, to [describe work]. It is for the prosecution to prove that this was not sufficient, and that it was reasonably practicable for NOA to have gone further and [identify measure].

When deciding whether it was reasonably practicable for NOA to have taken other measures in these circumstances, you must consider:

- The nature and seriousness of the risks involved;
- NOC's competence and expertise;
- NOA's expertise in relation to [describe the tasks engaged in by the contractor] and his/her knowledge of the risks involved;
- The nature of the precautions NOC was taking, and whether NOA was aware of any defects in NOC's safety practices; and
- The size of NOA's business.

Ultimately, determining what is reasonably practicable is a balancing exercise that requires you to use your common sense. Consider the danger posed by the risk and the difficulty of addressing the risk. Using that, decide whether the measure(s) posed by the prosecution were reasonably practicable.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of failing to eliminate risks to the health of safety of non-employees, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – The accused was an employer at the relevant time;

Two – There was a risk from the conduct of the accused's undertaking to the health and safety of non-employees;

Three – The accused failed to do something which would have eliminated or reduced that risk;

Four – It was reasonably practicable in the circumstances to have taken steps to eliminate or reduce that risk.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of failing to eliminate risks to the health of safety of non-employees.

Last updated: 27 March 2019

7.7.1.4 Checklist: Employer's duty to Non-Employees

Click here for a Word version of this document for adaptation

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused was an employer at the relevant time; and

2. There was a risk from the conduct of the accused's undertaking to the health and safety of non-employees; and

3. The accused failed to do something which would have eliminated or reduced that risk; and

4. It was reasonably practicable in the circumstances to have taken steps to eliminate or reduce that risk.

Accused as an Employer

1. Was the accused an employer at the relevant time?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of breaching the duty to non-employees

Risk

2. Did the conduct of the accused's business create a risk to the health and safety of non-employees?

Consider – The prosecution claims that the scope of the accused's business included [insert relevant conduct]

Consider – The prosecution claims that the accused's business created a risk of [insert relevant risk]

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of breaching the duty to non-employees

Failure to eliminate or reduce risk

3. Did the accused fail to take an identified measure which would have eliminated or reduced the risk?

Consider – The prosecution argues that the accused should have [insert relevant measure]?

Consider – Would [insert relevant measure] have eliminated or reduced the risk of [insert relevant risk]?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of breaching the duty to non-employees

Reasonably practicable

4. Was [insert relevant remedial act] a reasonably practicable way of addressing [insert relevant risk]?

Consider – How likely was [insert relevant risk] to occur?

Consider – What harm would follow if [insert relevant risk] occurred?

Consider – What could be done to eliminate or reduce the risk?

Consider – How suitable were those options and how much would these options have cost?

Consider – What did the accused know about the risk and ways of addressing it or what should the accused have reasonably known?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of breaching the duty to non-employees (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of breaching the duty to non-employees

Last updated: 12 September 2019

7.7.2 Discrimination Offence

Click here for a Word version of this document

1. Section 76 of the Occupational Health and Safety Act 2004 is entitled 'Prohibition on discrimination'. The section creates an indictable offence that applies where an employer engages in adverse conduct as a result of a person's actions in relation to health and safety issues.
2. The offence consists of 5 elements:
   (a) the accused is an employer or prospective employer;
   (b) the complainant is employed by the accused or was a prospective employee of the accused;
   (c) the complainant engaged in protected action;
   (d) the accused engaged in adverse conduct against the complainant;
   (e) the dominant reason why the accused engaged in that conduct was because the complainant engaged in protected action (Occupational Health and Safety Act 2004 s 76).

Accused an employer or prospective employer

3. The first element is that the accused is an employer or prospective employer (Occupational Health and Safety Act 2004 s 76).
4. For information on this element, see 7.7.1 Employer's Duty to Employees.

Complainant an employee or prospective employee of accused

5. The second element is that the complainant was an employee or prospective employee of the accused (Occupational Health and Safety Act 2004 s 76).
6. For information on employment relationships and distinguishing employees from independent contractors, see 7.7.1 Employer's Duty to Employees.

Complainant engaged in protected action

7. The third element is that the complainant:
   (a) is or has been a health and safety representative or a member of a health and safety committee;
   (b) exercises or has exercised a power as a health and safety representative or as a member health and safety representative or as a member of a health and safety committee; or
   (c) assists or has assisted, or gives or has given any information to, an inspector, the Authority, an authorised representative of a registered employee organisation, a health and safety representative or a member of a health and safety committee; or

(d) raises or has raised an issue or concern about health or safety to the employer, an inspector, the Authority, an authorised representative of a registered employee organisation, a health and safety representative, a member of a health and safety committee or an employee of the employer (Occupational Health and Safety Act 2004 s 76(2)).

8. Proof for Occupational Health and Safety Act 2004 s 76(2)(d) that the employee raised an issue or concern about health or safety, is a question of fact for the jury to be assessed in the circumstances of the case (DPP v Acme Storage Pty Ltd [2017] VSCA 90, [26]).

9. While the jury may consider evidence that the employee acted disingenuously and did not genuinely seek to raise a health and safety issue, it is not necessary for the prosecution to affirmatively prove that the employee's actions were genuine (DPP v Acme Storage Pty Ltd [2017] VSCA 90, [27]).

10. In assessing whether an employee has raised a health and safety issue, it is not appropriate to draw a distinction between "genuine" concern about health and safety and an "industrial" objective. This is a false dichotomy, as there is no necessary inconsistency between health and safety objectives and industrial objectives (DPP v Acme Storage Pty Ltd [2017] VSCA 90, [33]).

Adverse conduct

11. The fourth element is that the accused engaged in one or more forms of proscribed adverse conduct (Occupational Health and Safety Act 2004 s 76).

12. The prohibited forms of adverse conduct are:

(a) dismiss or threaten to dismiss an employee;

(b) injure or threaten to injure an employee in the accused's employment;

(c) alter or threaten to alter the position of an employee to the employee's detriment;

(d) refuse or fail to offer employment to a prospective employee;

(e) treats a prospective employee less favourably than another prospective employee would be treated in offering terms of employment (Occupational Health and Safety Act 2004 s 76(1)).

13. The word "threat" carries its ordinary meaning. In DPP v Acme Storage Pty Ltd [2017] VSCA 90, [40], the Court of Appeal quoted with approval the following parts of the Macquarie Dictionary definition of threat:

> 1. a declaration of an intention or determination to inflict punishment, pain or loss on someone in retaliation for, or conditionally upon, some action or course; menace.
> 2. an indication of probable evil to come; something that gives indication of causing evil or harm.

14. There is no part of this element which requires the prosecution to prove that the accused intended to carry out the threat, intended that the employee believe the threat or that the accused was reckless as to whether the employee would believe that the threat would be carried out (DPP v Acme Storage Pty Ltd [2017] VSCA 90, [42]).

15. It is also not necessary to prove that the threat was communicated to the employee who was said to be the subject of the threat (DPP v Acme Storage Pty Ltd [2017] VSCA 90, [43]).

16. Terms such as "dismiss", "injure", "alter" and "detriment" are not used in a special legal sense. They are ordinary words and the judge does not need to give the jury a special legal definition. However, the judge can give the jury assistance on matters to consider when deciding whether the relevant form of conduct has been proved (DPP v Acme Storage Pty Ltd [2017] VSCA 90, [78]–[84]).

Reason for prohibited conduct

17. The fifth element involves showing that the protected action was the dominant reason for the prohibited (Occupational Health and Safety Act 2004 s 76(3))

18. The accused bears the onus of showing that the reason alleged in the charge was not the dominant reason for the conduct (Occupational Health and Safety Act 2004 s 77).

19. There is no basis for reading in a word like "genuine" into the language of section 77, or requiring the jury to consider whether the alleged dominant reason was genuinely held by the accused (DPP v Acme Storage Pty Ltd [2017] VSCA 90, [92]).

Last updated: 22 August 2018

7.7.2.1 Charge: Discrimination Offence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

NOA has been charged with discriminating against an employee because of health and safety. This crime consists of five elements:

One – The accused was an employer at the relevant time;

Two – NOC was an employee of the accused;

Three – NOC engaged in protected conduct;

Four – The accused took action against NOC;

Five – The accused took action against NOC because of NOC's protected conduct.

I will now explain these elements in detail.

Accused was an employer

The first element is that the accused was an employer. There is no dispute about this matter and so you should have no difficulty finding this element proved.[1119]

Employed by the accused

The second element is that NOC was an employee of the accused. There is also no dispute about this matter and so you should have no difficulty finding this element proved.[1120]

Protected actions

The third element is that the complainant engaged in protected conduct.

The law recognises many types of protected conduct. In this case, the prosecution must prove that NOC [identify relevant form of protected conduct, in accordance with Occupational Health and Safety Act 2004 s 76(2)].

[Refer to competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

[1119] If this element is disputed, this part of the charge will need to be modified. The judge should set out the matters the jury needs to consider to determine whether the accused was an employer and identify the competing arguments of the parties.

[1120] If this element is disputed, this part of the charge will need to be modified. The judge should set out the matters the jury needs to consider to determine whether the complainant was employed by the accused and identify the competing arguments of the parties.

Adverse conduct

The fourth element is that accused took action against NOC.

In this case, that means the prosecution must prove that NOA [*identify relevant form of adverse conduct as stated in the indictment, e.g. "dismissed NOC"*].

[Refer to competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Prohibited reason

The fifth element is that the accused took action against NOC because of [his/her] protected conduct.

The law has created a special rule for this element. For this element, the defence must prove that [his/her/its] dominant reason for taking action against NOC was not because [*identify relevant prohibited reason as stated in the indictment, e.g. "NOC was a health and safety representative"*]. This is an exception to the usual rule that the prosecution must prove all elements beyond reasonable doubt.

Unlike the other elements of the offence, the defence only needs to prove this matter on what is called the "balance of probabilities". This is a much lower standard than that required of the prosecution. It only requires the defence to prove that it is more likely than not that NOA's dominant reason for taking action against NOC was not because [*identify relevant prohibited reason as stated in the indictment, e.g. "NOC was a health and safety representative"*].

When you are considering this matter, you are looking at what NOA has proved about the dominant reason for the action against NOC. In other words, what was NOA's main or most influential reason? Another way of looking for the dominant reason is to ask: Would NOA have taken that action if [*identify the converse of the relevant prohibited reason as stated in the indictment, e.g. "NOC was not a health and safety representative"*]? If NOA would have engaged in the conduct anyway, then [*identify relevant prohibited reason as stated in the indictment, e.g. "NOC being a health and safety representative"*] was not the dominant purpose.

[Refer to competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of discriminating against an employee because of health and safety, the prosecution must prove three elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – NOA was an employer at the relevant time;

Two – NOC was an employee of NOA;

Three – NOC [identify relevant form of protected action];

Four – NOA [*identify relevant form of adverse conduct as stated in the indictment, e.g. "dismissed NOC"*].

If you find these four elements proved, then you may find NOA guilty unless NOA has proved, on the balance of probabilities, that [his/her/its] dominant reason for [*identify relevant form of adverse conduct as stated in the indictment, e.g. "dismissing NOC"*] was not that [*identify relevant prohibited reason as stated in the indictment, e.g. "NOC was a health and safety representative"*].

Last updated: 22 August 2018

7.7.2.2 Checklist: Discrimination Offence

Click here for a Word version of this document for adaptation

This offence consists of five elements:

1. The accused was an employer; and

2. The complainant was an employee of the accused; and

3. The complainant was engaged in protected conduct; and

4. The accused took action against the complainant; and

5. The dominant reason the accused took that action was because the complainant engaged in protected conduct.

Accused as an Employer

1. Has the prosecution proved that the accused was an employer?

If yes, then go to 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of discriminating against an employee

Complainant as an Employee

2. Has the prosecution proved that the complainant was an employee of the accused?

If yes, then go to 3

If no, then the accused is not guilty of discriminating against an employee

Protected conduct

3. Has the prosecution proved that the complainant engaged in protected conduct?

Consider – In this case, protected conduct is [identify relevant form of protected conduct].

If yes, then go to 4

If no, then the accused is not guilty of discriminating against an employee

Action against complainant

4. Has the prosecution proved that the accused took action against the complainant?

Consider – In this case, taking action against the complainant means [identify relevant form of adverse conduct]?

If yes, then go to 5

If no, then the accused is not guilty of discriminating against an employee

Dominant reason

5. Has the accused proved that the complainant's protected conduct was not the dominant reason for taking action against the complainant?

Consider – The standard of proof for this element is 'the balance of probabilities', which means 'more likely than not'.

Consider – The dominant reason is the main, or most influential, reason.

If yes, then the accused is not guilty of discriminating against an employee

If no, then the accused is guilty of discriminating against an employee (provided you have answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

Last updated: 22 August 2018

7.8 Offences against Justice

7.8.1 Statutory Perjury

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Introduction

1. Perjury is an offence under Crimes Act 1958 s 314, as well as at common law (see Crimes Act 1958 s 314(3)).
2. This topic addresses the statutory offence of perjury. See 7.8.2 Common Law Perjury for information concerning the common law offence.

Charging an accused who has made multiple false statements

3. As each false statement constitutes a separate crime, each false statement should usually be charged as a separate offence (Traino v R (1987) 45 SASR 473).
4. Consequently, where the accused has made multiple false statements, the prosecution should usually either:
    - Select one of the statements as the basis for a single charge of perjury; or
    - Charge the accused with multiple offences (one charge for each false statement) (Stanton v Abernathy (1990) 19 NSWLR 656).
5. However, where the accused has made a series of false statements about the same matter, it may be appropriate to lay only one charge of perjury, which consists of the cumulative effect of all of the statements (Traino v R (1987) 45 SASR 473; Stanton v Abernathy (1990) 19 NSWLR 656).
6. Courts should adopt a common sense approach when deciding whether the prosecution can lay one charge for multiple statements (Traino v R (1987) 45 SASR 473; Stanton v Abernathy (1990) 19 NSWLR 656).

Elements

7. Statutory perjury has the following three elements:

    i) The accused made a false statement;

    ii) That statement was made in prohibited circumstances; and

    iii) The accused made the false statement knowingly.

8. Unlike at common law, the prosecution does not need to prove that the statement was material to the proceeding. All evidence is deemed to be material (Crimes Act 1958 s 315).

The accused made a false statement

9. The accused must have made a false statement about a fact, matter or thing (Crimes Act 1958 s 314(3)).

10. The word "false" is to be given its ordinary English meaning: a statement is "false" if it is untrue (R v Davies (1974) 7 SASR 375).

11. Under s 314(3), there appear to be three ways in which an accused can make a "false" statement:

    i) By making an untrue assertion about a fact, matter or thing;

    ii) By purporting to verify the truth of a statement which is untrue wholly or in part; or

    iii) By omitting to mention information which the law requires him or her to mention.

12. The prosecution must specify the statement that is alleged to be false. It will usually not be sufficient for the prosecution to rely upon an entire transcript of testimony and allege that the witness gave false evidence (Stanton v Abernathy (1990) 19 NSWLR 656).

Proving the accused made the statement

13. The prosecution must be able to prove, on the basis of admissible evidence, that the accused made the relevant statement.

14. This may not be possible where:

    - There is a legislative provision limiting the subsequent admissibility of statements made in a certain kind of proceeding (see, e.g. Royal Commissions Act 1902 (Cth) s 6DD); and
    - The statement was only made in that kind of proceeding (see, e.g. Giannarelli v R (1983) 154 CLR 212).

Proving the statement was false

15. Although Evidence Act 2008 s 164 abolished the general requirement for corroboration, an exception is made with respect to the offence of perjury (s 164(2)).

16. Consequently, where the prosecution is relying on oral evidence to prove that the accused's statement was false, the prosecution's evidence must either come from two witnesses, or one witness with corroboration. Failure to comply with this requirement will entitle the accused to an acquittal (R v Linehan [1921] VLR 582; R v Hoser [1998] 2 VR 535).

17. The requirement for corroboration only applies to proving that the accused's statement was false. Corroboration is not required to prove that the accused made the statement or knew the statement was false (R v Linehan [1921] VLR 582; R v O'Connor [1980] Crim LR 43; R v Mondon [2003] 1 Qd R 200, [11]).

18. The requirement for corroboration only applies where the prosecution is relying on oral evidence to prove that the accused's statement was false. Corroboration is not required where the accused has clearly admitted that his or her statement was false (R v Townley (1986) 24 A Crim R 76; R v Sumner [1935] VLR 197. See also R v Mondon [2003] 1 Qd R 200, [14]).

19. However, corroboration is required where the accused has simply made contradictory statements (R v Townley (1986) 24 A Crim R 76; R v Sumner [1935] VLR 197).

What is Corroboration Evidence?

20. Corroboration can be found in both direct and circumstantial evidence (R v Baskerville (1916) 2 KB 658; R v Rayner [1998] 4 VR 818; R v Holmes [2008] VSCA 128).

21. To be capable of amounting to corroboration, evidence must:

    i) Come from a source independent of the witness to be corroborated; and

    ii) Be capable of confirming, in some material particular, that the accused made a statement that was false (R v Linehan [1921] VLR 582; R v Baskerville (1916) 2 KB 658; R v Rosemeyer [1985] VR 945).

22. Each of these requirements is discussed in turn below.

Independent Evidence

23. In most cases there will be little difficulty in determining whether corroborative evidence comes from a source independent of the witness to be corroborated. However, particular care should be exercised where it is suggested that the following types of evidence amount to corroboration:

    - Evidence of oral admissions made to the witness to be corroborated;
    - Post-offence conduct evidencing a consciousness of guilt;
    - Circumstantial evidence generally;
    - Evidence where there is a possibility of joint concoction.

24. Evidence given by a witness of oral admissions that the accused allegedly made to him or her is not evidence from a source independent of that witness, and cannot provide corroboration. If such evidence is led, the judge should give directions that ensure the jury does not misuse it as corroborative evidence (R v Robertson [1998] 4 VR 30).

25. If a "lie" evidencing a consciousness of guilt is to be used as corroboration, the falsity of the lie must be established by evidence that is independent of the witness to be corroborated (Edwards v R (1993) 178 CLR 193). See 4.6 Incriminating Conduct (Post Offence Lies and Conduct).

26. The true source of direct evidence will generally be clear, but this is often not the case with circumstantial evidence. As a result, care should always be taken to ensure that circumstantial evidence comes from a source independent of the witness concerned (R v Martin (2003) 142 A Crim R 153. See also R v Hoser [1998] 2 VR 535).

27. In relation to accomplices, it was accepted at common law that accomplices could not provide mutual corroboration, because there would be both an opportunity and a motive for joint fabrication (Pollitt v R (1991) 174 CLR 558).

28. It is unclear whether this principle has any potential application in relation to corroboration requirements for perjury. The original formulation of the corroboration rule for perjury states that the prosecution requires two witnesses, or one witness with corroboration. The potential for joint fabrication has not been explicitly identified as an exception to that 'two witness' rule.

29. However, in R v Hoser [1998] 2 VR 535, the accused was charged with perjury relating to a claim that he had been sent a letter from VicRoads. Two employees of VicRoads testified that the letter had not come from VicRoads. The trial judge treated those two witnesses as a single entity, as they came from different departments in VicRoads, rather than independent. On appeal, the Court described that position as favourable to the accused, but did not explore the matter further.

Confirming Evidence

30. The requirement that the corroborative evidence be capable of confirming or supporting the evidence in question has been stated in a number of different ways. For example, in R v Baskerville (1916) 2 KB 658 it was held that evidence may be corroborative if it:

    - Connects or tends to connect the accused with the crime; or
    - Implicates the accused by confirming, in some material particular, not only the evidence that the crime has been committed, but also that the accused committed it; or
    - Shows, or tends to show, that the witness's story that the accused committed the crime is true.

31. Most of the law about when evidence will provide corroboration was developed in the context of warnings about the dangers of acting on uncorroborated evidence. The following paragraphs, which describe when evidence provides corroboration, must be treated with some caution, as corroboration for perjury only required to prove that the statement was false and is not necessary for other elements of the offence (see R v Linehan [1921] VLR 582).

32. To be corroborative, the evidence does not need to be capable of establishing any proposition beyond reasonable doubt (Doney v R (1990) 171 CLR 207; R v Pisano [1997] 2 VR 342), nor does it need to be directly probative of guilt. It merely needs to be capable of "confirming", "supporting" or "strengthening" the evidence in question. It is evidence which "helps to determine the truth of the matter". In other words, it is evidence which renders the evidence in question more probable (DPP v Kilbourne [1973] AC 729; R v Taylor (2004) 8 VR 213; R v Holmes [2008] VSCA 128).

33. The mere fact that an accused can advance an innocent explanation for a potentially corroborative fact does not deprive that fact of its capacity to corroborate. The jury may well regard the proffered explanation as implausible in the circumstances, or for some other reason properly reject it out of hand (BRS v R (1997) 191 CLR 275; R v Challoner (2000) 110 A Crim R 102; R v Taylor (2004) 8 VR 213; R v Strawhorn [2008] VSCA 101; R v Holmes [2008] VSCA 128).

34. In such cases, as long as the evidence is reasonably capable of corroborating matters which require corroboration, it may be left to the jury (R v Holmes [2008] VSCA 128).

35. Corroborative evidence must bear upon the issue or issues joined at the trial. Evidence that merely confirms facts in the common ground between the parties will therefore not be corroborative (R v Pisano [1997] 2 VR 342; R v Nanette [1982] VR 81).

36. However, the law does not permit an accused to deprive facts of their corroborative quality by making a timely admission. An admitted fact may be corroborative if, when seen in the light of the prosecution case, that fact (or an inference drawn from it) is capable of implicating the accused (R v Lindsay (1977) 18 SASR 103; R v Arundell [1999] 2 VR 228; BRS v R (1997) 191 CLR 275).

Evidence Consistent with Guilt and Innocence

37. To be corroborative, evidence need not prove the offence, but it must be capable of confirming or tending to confirm the evidence of the witness requiring corroboration (R v Baskerville (1916) 2 KB 658; Doney v R (1990) 171 CLR 207; R v Kerim [1988] 1 Qd R 426; R v Pisano [1997] 2 VR 342).

38. Evidence will not have this capacity (and will not be corroborative) if it is "intractably neutral" (R v Pisano [1997] 2 VR 342; R v Kerim [1988] 1 Qd R 426).

39. So long as the evidence is more consistent with guilt than innocence, it is no bar that corroborative evidence has a certain consistency with both guilt and innocence (R v Pisano [1997] 2 VR 342; R v Kerim [1988] 1 Qd R 426).

Directions on corroboration

40. When identifying the relevant evidence, the judge should not explain that s/he has ruled that the identified evidence is capable of corroboration. Juries may mistake this for a direction that the evidence actually is corroborative (R v Zorad (1990) 19 NSWLR 91; R v Kendrick [1997] 2 VR 699; R v Jolly [1998] 4 VR 495; R v Williams [2007] VSCA 208).

41. It is preferable that the judge simply identify the relevant evidence as "evidence that the prosecution relies upon as amounting to corroboration". Alternately, the judge may tell the jury that they may consider whether the specific evidence which s/he identifies amounts to corroboration (R v Zorad (1990) 19 NSWLR 91, R v Kendrick [1997] 2 VR 699).

42. Where a combination of circumstantial facts (rather than individual facts standing alone) is relied upon as corroboration, the jury should be directed to consider those facts in combination rather than in isolation (R v Kendrick [1997] 2 VR 699; R v Tadic CCA Vic 31/8/1993).

The false statement was made in prohibited circumstances

43. The second element relates to the circumstances in which the false statement was made. It must have been made while on oath or affirmation, or in a declaration or affidavit (Crimes Act 1958 s 314(3)).[1121]

44. For this element to be met, the oath, affirmation, declaration or affidavit must have been lawfully made or administered (R v Charles (1866) 3 WW & A'B).

45. For an oath or affirmation to have been lawfully administered, the body that administered it must have:

    - Had the power to administer oaths or affirmations (R v Shuttleworth [1909] VLR 431. See also Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1958 s 111); and
    - Had the jurisdiction to hear the matter before it (R v Kilkenny (1890) 16 VLR 139; R v Charles (1866) 3 WW & A'B; R v Ashby (2010) 25 VR 107; R v Dobos (1984) 58 ACTR 10. See also Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1958 s 151).

46. An oath will be lawfully effective even if:

    - A religious text is not used;
    - The accused did not have a religious belief, or a religious belief of a particular kind; or
    - The accused did not understand the nature and consequences of the oath (Evidence Act 2008 s 24).

47. An affidavit must be sworn before an authorised person. See Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1958 s 123C for a list of authorised persons. See also Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1958 ss 112, 124, 125, 126, 126A and 165 and Evidence Act 2008 s 186.

48. A statutory declaration must be signed in the presence of an authorised person (Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1958 ss 107). See Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1958 s 107A for a list of authorised persons.

49. The accused must have been legally competent to take the oath or make the affirmation, declaration or affidavit (R v Kilkenny (1890) 16 VLR 139).

The false statement was made knowingly

50. Section 314 refers to the false statement having been made "knowingly wilfully and corruptly". However, it is unclear what the words "wilfully and corruptly" add to the word "knowingly".[1122] Consequently, for the sake of simplicity, this topic focuses solely on the requirement for knowledge. However, if in a case there appears to be a need to separately address the terms "wilful" or "corrupt", a trial judge should do so.

51. To have acted "knowingly", the accused must have:

    - Actually known that the statement was false; or [1121] This differs from the common law offence of perjury, which only applies to false statements made under oath in a judicial proceeding: see 7.8.2 Common Law Perjury.

[1122] In this context, the term wilfully has been defined to mean "intentionally" or "deliberately and not inadvertently or by mistake" (R v Ryan (1914) 10 Cr App R 4; R v Millward [1985] QB 519; R v Lowe [1917] VLR 155).

- Not believed that the statement made was true (R v Aylett (1785) 99 ER 973).

52. This element will not be met where:
    - The accused has an honest but mistaken belief in the truth of the statement; or
    - The statement is made with inadvertence, carelessness or misunderstanding (R v Mackenzie (1996) 190 CLR 348; R v Liristis [2004] NSWCCA 287, [121]).
53. There is no requirement that the accused's belief in the truth of the statement be reasonable (R v Mackenzie (1996) 190 CLR 348).
54. A trial judge must direct the jury on the distinction between "knowingly" making a false statement and honestly or innocently making a false statement. A failure to do so could deprive the accused of the possibility of an acquittal (R v Mackenzie (1996) 190 CLR 348; R v Liristis [2004] NSWCCA 287, [132]).
55. Such a direction must be given even if the accused does not believe that he or she was mistaken. It is important to distinguish between honesty and accuracy. An inaccurate statement is not the same as a dishonest statement (R v Mackenzie (1996) 190 CLR 348).

Last updated: 11 July 2018

7.8.1.1 Charge: Statutory Perjury

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of perjury. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following three elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused made a false statement.

Two – the accused made the false statement [under oath/on affirmation/in a declaration/in an affidavit].

Three – the accused knew that the statement was false, or did not believe that it was true.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

The Accused Made a False Statement

The first element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused made a statement which was false.

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA made the following false statement: [identify alleged false statement].[1123]

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments about whether the statement was false].

[Where a corroboration direction is required, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that you must not find this element to have been proven on the basis of the evidence of one witness alone. You must be satisfied that there is additional evidence in the case that supports the witness's allegation that the statement was false.

In this case, the prosecution relies on the following evidence to support NOW's allegation: [Identify [1123] This charge is designed for use in cases where the accused makes an untrue assertion, or purports to verify the truth of a statement which is untrue. It will need to be modified if it is alleged that the accused made a false statement by omitting to mention information which the law required him or her to mention.

evidence capable of providing corroboration]. This is the only evidence that can support NOW's evidence for this purpose.

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether NOA made a false statement. It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he did, that this first element will be met.

The False Statement was made in Prohibited Circumstances

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused made the false statement [under oath/on affirmation/in a declaration/in an affidavit].

In this case it is not disputed that the relevant statement was made [under oath/on affirmation/in a declaration/in an affidavit]. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.[1124]

The False Statement was made Knowingly

The third element relates to the state of mind the accused had when s/he made the statement. The prosecution must prove that the accused either knew that the statement was false, or did not believe that it was true.

This element will not be met if NOA honestly but mistakenly believed the statement was true. A person cannot be convicted of perjury simply because they made a mistake. For this element to be satisfied NOA must have actually known that it was untrue to state that [identify statement], or at least not believed that was true.

[Summarise evidence and/or arguments about the accused's state of mind.]

Relate Law to the Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of perjury the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that s/he made a false statement; and

Two – that the false statement was made [under oath/on affirmation/in a declaration/in an affidavit]; and

Three – that NOA knew that the statement was false, or did not believe that it was true.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of perjury.

Last updated: 11 July 2018

7.8.1.2 Checklist: Statutory Perjury

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

[1124] If there is a factual dispute over whether the accused was under a legal obligation to tell the truth, or whether the oath, affirmation, declaration or affidavit was lawfully made or administered, this section will need to be modified.

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused made a false statement; and

2. The accused made the false statement under oath or on affirmation; and

3. The accused knew the statement was false or did not believe it was true.

False Statement

1. Did the accused make a false statement?

*Consider – There must be evidence supporting the primary witness' evidence that the statement is false.

If yes, then go to 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of perjury

Oath or affirmation

2. Did the accused make the false statement on oath or under affirmation?

If yes, then go to 3.1

If no, then the accused is not guilty of perjury

Knowledge that the statement was false

3.1 Did the accused know the statement was false?

If yes, then the accused is guilty of perjury (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1 and 2)

If no, then go to 3.2

3.2 Did the accused believe the statement was true?

Consider – The accused is not guilty of perjury if he or she honestly but mistakenly believed that the statement was true

If no, then the accused is guilty of perjury (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1 and 2)

If yes, then the accused is not guilty of perjury

Last updated: 11 July 2018

7.8.2 Common Law Perjury

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Introduction

1. Perjury is an indictable common law offence (R v Aylett (1785) 99 ER 973), as well as statutory offence (see 7.8.1 Statutory Perjury).

2. The operation of common law perjury has been specifically preserved by Crimes Act 1958 s 314(3).

Charging an accused who has made multiple false statements

3. As each false statement constitutes a separate crime, each false statement should usually be charged as a separate offence (Traino v R (1987) 45 SASR 473).
4. See 7.8.1 Statutory Perjury for further information concerning this issue.

Elements

5. Common law perjury has the following five elements:

    i) The accused made a false statement;

    ii) The false statement was made on oath or affirmation

    iii) The false statement was made in a judicial proceeding;

    iv) The false statement was material to the judicial proceeding; and

    v) The accused made the false statement knowingly.

The accused made a false statement

6. The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused made a false statement.
7. The word "false" is to be given its ordinary English meaning: a statement is "false" if it is untrue (R v Davies (1974) 7 SASR 375).[1125]
8. The prosecution must specify the statement that is alleged to be false. It will usually not be sufficient for the prosecution to rely upon an entire transcript of testimony and allege that the witness gave false evidence (Stanton v Abernathy (1990) 19 NSWLR 656).
9. Where the prosecution relies on oral evidence to prove the statement was false, the prosecution must either call two witnesses, or one witness who is corroborated (R v Linehan [1921] VLR 582). See 'Proving the statement was false' in 7.8.1 Statutory perjury for information on the requirement of corroboration.

The false statement was made on oath or affirmation

10. The second element relates to the circumstances in which the false statement was made. It must have been made on oath or affirmation.
11. For this element to be met, the oath or affirmation must have been lawfully administered (R v Charles (1866) 3 WW & A'B).
12. For an oath or affirmation to have been lawfully administered, the body that administered it must have:

    - Had the power to administer oaths or affirmations (R v Shuttleworth [1909] VLR 431. See also Evid*ence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1958* s 111); and

---

[1125] There is some early authority (Ockley and Whitlebye's Case (1622); Allen v Westley (1629)) which suggests that an accused who has made a true statement believing it to be false (or being reckless as to whether it was true or false) could be convicted of perjury. However, modern authorities (e.g. R v Davies (1974) 7 SASR 375) seem to require that the statement actually be false.

- Had the jurisdiction to hear the matter before it (R v Kilkenny (1890) 16 VLR 139; R v Charles (1866) 3 WW & A'B; R v Ashby (2010) 25 VR 107; R v Dobos (1984) 58 ACTR 10.

13. See also Evidence (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1958 s 151).
14. An oath will be lawfully effective even if:
    - A religious text is not used;
    - The accused did not have a religious belief, or a religious belief of a particular kind; or
    - The accused did not understand the nature and consequences of the oath (Evidence Act 2008 s 24).
15. The accused must have been legally competent to take the oath or make the affirmation, declaration or affidavit (R v Kilkenny (1890) 16 VLR 139).

The false statement was made in a judicial proceeding

16. The third element requires the oath or affirmation to have been sworn or made in a judicial proceeding (R v Aylett (1785) 99 ER 973).
17. A judicial proceeding is a 'proceeding which takes place in or under the authority of any court of justice, or which relates to the administration of justice, or which legally ascertains any right or liability' (Stephan, A Digest of the Criminal Law (5th ed, 1894), 107).
18. Judicial proceedings include the civil and criminal processes and judgments of the courts (Lipohar v R (1999) 200 CLR 485).
19. The internal arrangements of a court (e.g. its internal administrative procedures) are not a 'judicial proceeding' (R v Fingleton (2005) 227 CLR 166).

The statement must be 'material' to the judicial proceeding

20. The fourth element requires the statement to have been material to the relevant judicial proceeding (R v Davies (1974) 7 SASR 375).
21. A statement will have been material if it was significant enough to have been capable of affecting a decision concerning a fact in issue. This includes statements about the defendant's credit or a witness' credit. The effect may be direct or indirect (R v Davies (1974) 7 SASR 375; R v Lewis (1914) 10 TASLR 48).
22. To be 'material', the statement must have been practically relevant to the proceeding. Statements which are too remote, or which are only theoretically relevant, are not 'material' (R v Davies (1974) 7 SASR 375).
23. The standard by which materiality is measured is an objective one (R v Millward [1985] 1 All ER 859).
24. Materiality turns on the significance of the false statement actually made, and not on the significance a true statement would have had (R v Millward [1985] 1 All ER 859).
25. It is for the judge to determine, as a matter of law, whether a statement is capable of constituting a material statement. It is for the jury to determine, as a matter of fact, whether the statement actually was material (R v Davies (1974) 7 SASR 375).

The false statement was made knowingly

26. The fifth element requires the false statement to have been made 'knowingly'.
27. See 7.8.1 Statutory Perjury for further information concerning this element.

Last updated: 11 July 2018

7.8.2.1 Charge: Common Law Perjury

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of perjury. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following five elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused made a false statement.

Two – the accused made the false statement [under oath/on affirmation].

Three – the accused made the false statement in a judicial proceeding.

Four – the statement was material to the judicial proceeding.

Five – the accused knew that the statement was false, or did not believe that it was true.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

The Accused Made a False Statement

The first element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused made a statement which was false.

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA made the following false statement: [identify alleged false statement].[1126]

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments about whether the statement was false.]

[Where a corroboration direction is required, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that you must not find this element to have been proven on the basis of the evidence of one witness alone. You must be satisfied that there is additional evidence in the case that supports the witness's allegation that the statement was false.

In this case, the prosecution relies on the following evidence to support NOW's allegation: [Identify evidence capable of providing corroboration]. This is the only evidence that can support NOW's evidence for this purpose.

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether NOA made a false statement. It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he did, that this first element will be met.

The False Statement was made in Prohibited Circumstances

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused made the false statement [under oath/on affirmation].

[1126] This charge is designed for use in cases where the accused makes an untrue assertion, or purports to verify the truth of a statement which is untrue. It will need to be modified if it is alleged that the accused made a false statement by omitting to mention information which the law required him or her to mention.

In this case it is not disputed that the relevant statement was made [under oath/on affirmation]. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.[1127]

The Statement was made in a Judicial Proceeding

The third element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused made the statement in a judicial proceeding.

In this case, it is not disputed that the statement was made [identify relevant proceeding], and that [identify relevant proceeding] is a "judicial proceeding". You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.[1128]

The Statement was Material to the Judicial Proceeding

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the statement was material to the judicial proceeding. This will only be the case if the statement could have affected the court's decision, or whether the accused or another witness was believable.

To find that this element is proved, you do not need to be satisfied that the statement actually did affect the outcome in some way. It is sufficient if it was capable of having such an effect.

In this case the prosecution alleged that the statement was capable of affecting [identify relevant determination of fact/credibility of accused/credibility of witness].

[Summarise evidence and/or arguments about materiality.]

The False Statement was made Knowingly

The fifth element relates to the state of mind the accused had when s/he made the statement. The prosecution must prove that the accused either knew that the statement was false, or did not believe that it was true.

This element will not be met if NOA honestly but mistakenly believed the statement was true. A person cannot be convicted of perjury simply because they made a mistake. For this element to be satisfied NOA must have actually known that it was untrue to state that [identify statement], or at least not believed that was true.

[Summarise evidence and/or arguments about the accused's state of mind.]

Relate Law to the Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of perjury the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that s/he made a false statement; and

[1127] If there is a factual dispute over whether the accused was under a legal obligation to tell the truth, or whether the oath or affirmation was lawfully made or administered, this section will need to be modified.

[1128] If there is a dispute over whether the relevant proceeding was a "judicial proceeding", this section will need to be modified.

Two – that the false statement was made [under oath/on affirmation]; and Three – the statement was made in a judicial proceeding; and Four – the statement was material to the judicial proceeding; and

Five – that NOA knew that the statement was false, or did not believe that it was true.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of perjury.

Last updated: 11 July 2018

7.8.2.2 Checklist: Common Law perjury

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused made a false statement; and

2. The accused made the false statement on oath or under affirmation; and

3. The accused made the false statement in a judicial proceeding; and

4. The statement was material to the proceeding; and

5. The accused knew the statement was false or did not believe it was true.

False Statement

1. Did the accused make a false statement?

*Consider – There must be evidence supporting the primary witness' evidence that the statement is false.

If yes, then go to 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of perjury

Oath or affirmation

2. Did the accused make the false statement on oath or under affirmation?

If yes, then go to 3

If no, then the accused is not guilty of perjury

Judicial Proceedings

3. Was the false statement made in a judicial proceeding?

If yes, then go to 4

If no, then the accused is not guilty of perjury

Statement was material

4. Was the false statement material to the proceeding?

*Consider – A statement is material if it could have affected the court's decision, or the credibility of a witness.

If yes, then go to 5.1

If no, then the accused is not guilty of perjury

Knowledge that the statement was false

5.1 Did the accused know the statement was false?

If yes, then the accused is guilty of perjury (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If no, then go to 5.2

5.2 Has the prosecution proved that the accused did not believe the statement was true?

Consider – The accused is not guilty of perjury if he or she honestly but mistakenly believed that the statement was true

If yes, then the accused is guilty of perjury (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of perjury

Last updated: 11 July 2018

7.8.3 Perverting and Attempting to Pervert the Course of Justice

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. The offences of attempting to pervert the course of justice and perverting the course of justice are common law offences in Victoria (R v Vreones [1891] 1 QB 360; R v Murphy (1985) 158 CLR 596).
2. The existence of these offences is recognised in s 320 Crimes Act 1958.
3. At common law, both the offences of attempting to pervert the course of justice and perverting the course of justice are substantive and not inchoate (R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268 at 279; R v Beckett (2015) 256 CLR 305, [37]).

Elements of the offences

4. The offence of attempting to pervert the course of justice has the following elements:
   (a) The accused engaged in conduct that had the tendency to pervert the course of justice.
   (b) The accused intended for that conduct to pervert the course of justice.
5. The offence of perverting the course of justice has the following elements:
   (a) The accused engaged in conduct that did pervert the course of justice.
   (b) The accused intended for that conduct to pervert the course of justice.
6. Due to the overlap between these two offences, this commentary will describe both offences.

The accused engaged in conduct that tends to pervert or did pervert the course of justice

What is a course of justice?

7. Police investigations of an actual or suspected offence are not part of the course of justice because the police do not administer justice (R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268, 276 (Mason CJ) and 283 (Brennan and Toohey JJ)).

8. Historically, the offences of perverting and attempting to pervert the course of justice existed to protect the processes and procedures of the Sovereign's courts and through this protect the administration of justice (R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268, 303).

9. The course of justice begins when the jurisdiction of a court or competent judicial body has been invoked (R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268, 276 (Mason CJ), 283 (Brennan and Toohey JJ) and 303 (McHugh J)).

10. In criminal proceedings, it was said "the course of justice [commences with]… the laying of information against or the arrest of an accused person" (R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268, 303).

11. However, in light of the s 5 of the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Vic) a criminal proceeding (or the invocation of the court's jurisdiction) does not commence until the

    (a) the filing of a charge sheet in accordance with s 6;

    (b) direct indictment under s 159 or

    (c) a direction under s 415 to be tried for perjury.

12. This suggests that the notion that a course of justice begins when a person is arrested is not correct in Victoria.

13. For conduct to amount to the actus reus of the offence of perverting the course of justice, the conduct must have been engaged in after the jurisdiction of a court or competent judicial body has been invoked. Conduct frustrating a police investigation, before the invocation of a court's jurisdiction, therefore does not amount to the actus reus of the offence of perverting the course of justice.

14. In contrast, the offence of attempting to pervert the course of justice can be committed by engaging in the relevant conduct before the institution of judicial proceedings (R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268, 277 (Mason CJ), 283 (Brennan and Toohey JJ), 293–4 (Deane J) and 304–5 (McHugh J); R v Beckett (2015) 256 CLR 305, [34]).

15. Therefore, it is possible for the frustration of a police investigation, before judicial proceedings have been instituted, to amount to the actus reus of attempting to pervert the course of justice. This is because frustrating a police investigation, in the circumstances of the case, could have the tendency to pervert the course of justice by hindering the ability of the police to invoke a court's jurisdiction or ascertain the truth of facts presented to a court.

16. The course of justice ends when the rights and liabilities of the parties are finally determined and declared by the court or other competent judicial body (R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268, 304).

17. The course of justice includes sentencing hearings (see, e.g. Saleem v The Queen [2014] VSCA 190) and appeals (see, e.g. Zotos v The Queen [2014] VSCA 324).

Defining perversion of the course of justice

18. The course of justice involves the exercise by a court, or competent judicial authority, of its jurisdiction to enforce, adjust or declare the rights and liabilities of the parties to a proceeding (R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268 at 280 (Brennan and Toohey JJ)).

19. The perversion of the course of justice therefore, occurs when the conduct of an accused impairs, obstructs, adversely interferes or prevents the court from administering justice (R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268, 280 (Brennan and Toohey JJ); Meissner v R (1995) 184 CLR 132, 148 (Deane J)).

20. This definition captures all judicial proceedings, including civil and criminal proceedings.

21. The following are recognised ways in which the proper administration of justice can be interfered with and thus the course of justice perverted:

    (a) Erosion of the integrity of the court or competent judicial authority; or

    (b) Hindering access to the court or competent judicial authority; or

    (c) Deflecting applications that would be made to the court or competent judicial authority; or

    (d) Denying the court or competent judicial authority knowledge of relevant law; or

    (e) Denying the court or competent judicial authority knowledge of the true circumstances and facts of the case; or

    (f) Impeding the free exercise of the jurisdiction and power of the court or competent judicial authority including the power to execute its decisions (R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268, 280 (Brennan and Toohey JJ)).

22. This list is not exhaustive, but merely illustrative.

23. For the offence of perverting the course of justice, the conduct of the accused must result in the perversion of the course of justice. Therefore, the prosecution must prove there has been an adverse interference with the course of justice, for example in one of the ways listed in paragraph 21. The tendency to pervert the course of justice (e.g. in one of the ways listed in paragraph 21) is sufficient for the attempt offence [see below on 'Defining tendency'].

Defining tendency

24. For the attempt offence, conduct must objectively tend to pervert the course of justice. This will be satisfied, for example, when conduct has the objective capacity to result in one of the things listed in paragraph 21 (R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268 at 280; Meissner v R (1995) 184 CLR 132 at 148 (Deane J)).

25. The tendency of conduct to pervert the course of justice will be proved by showing that without further action by the accused, there is a real possibility or risk that what he or she said or did had the capacity to interfere with the proper administration of justice (R v Murray [1982] 1 WLR 475; Healy v The Queen (1995) 15 WAR 104 at 107 (Malcolm CJ)).

26. "Without further action" does not mean the accused cannot be guilty of the attempt offence unless it is shown that the conduct of the accused "without more" risks perverting the course of justice (R v Allan [1995] 2 VR 468, 472). Rather, the first act committed that has the tendency to pervert the course of justice is sufficient.

27. The tendency of the conduct is not to be judged on the particular circumstances of the case but by the risk it poses to the course of justice in the ordinary course. This is so even if, in the particular circumstances of the case, there was no actual risk of perverting the course of justice (R v Aydin (2005) 11 VR 544 at 546; see also Smith v R (2013) 39 VR 336, [46]–[47]).

28. Therefore, impossibility is no defence to attempting to pervert the course of justice (R v Aydin (2005) 11 VR 544 at 546).

29. For example, in R v Aydin, the alleged threats and bribes were made to a police officer who was part of a controlled operation. Therefore, there was no actual risk of the officer being induced to act on the threats or bribes. The defendant was still convicted of attempting to pervert the course of justice because in the ordinary course bribing or threatening a police officer does pose a real risk (or have the tendency to) interfere the course of justice (R v Aydin (2005) 11 VR 544, at 546).

Proof of a specific offence in relation to possible criminal proceedings

30. Where the conduct is engaged in before the commencement of judicial proceedings, the conduct must still tend to pervert "imminent, probable or even possible judicial proceedings" (R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268 at 277).

31. The prosecution does not need to prove the commission of an identifiable or specific offence committed by the accused or third party, in order to satisfy the requirement that a future prosecution was "imminent, probable or possible". It is sufficient if the conduct had the tendency to deflect the police from bringing a prosecution for some offence (see R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268, 278 (Mason CJ), 288 (Brennan and Toohey JJ) and 294 (Deane J), c.f. 307 (McHugh J in dissent)).

32. If the prosecution case is that the accused's conduct perverted a future prosecution for some offence, this will generally require proof that the conduct deflected an inevitable police inquiry and consequently deflected the police from instituting an "imminent, probable or possible" prosecution for the subject matter of the inquiry (R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268 at 285 (Brennan and Toohey JJ)).

33. However, in the absence of proof of an identifiable offence, it is likely to be more difficult to prove that the conduct of the accused had the tendency to pervert an "imminent, probable or possible" course of justice (and that it was intended to bring about that result) (R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268 at 279 (Mason CJ), 286 (Brennan and Toohey JJ) and 294 (Deane J)).

34. The case of R v Rogerson provides an example of how this principle applies in a case where there is no proof of an identifiable offence. There was evidence that the accused had received bags of white powder in exchange for cash at an airport, raising the suspicion of criminal conduct. The prosecution did not seek to prove this was a drug related transaction, but did prove after the swap the accused then conspired with others to concoct a false story about the origins of the money. At the time the false story was formulated, no police investigation or prosecution had commenced. It was held to be open to the jury to find the accused had fabricated a story to deceive police about the true origins of the money, and this deception had the tendency to deflect a probable prosecution (i.e. the course of justice), even though the offence could not be identified with precision (R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268 at 279 (Mason CJ) and 288 (Brennan and Toohey JJ)).

35. See also the section below titled 'Penalty notices and warning about prosecution' in respect the impact of warnings about future prosecution and how it relates to the possibility of future proceedings.

Inducing a person to alter evidence or plea

36. Conduct that involves threatening or bribing a person to alter their evidence (see Librizzi v Western Australia (2006) 33 WAR 104) or plead guilty when that person would not have otherwise done so (see Meissner v R (1995) 184 CLR 132) has the tendency to pervert the course of justice.

37. If the conduct of the accused is merely lawful persuasion aimed at securing a legitimate end, namely an end consistent with the administration of justice, then the course of justice will not tend to or be perverted (Meissner v R (1995) 184 CLR 132 at 142 (Brennan, Toohey and McHugh JJ), see also 149 (Deane J) and 157 (Dawson J)).

38. For example, it is lawful to give reasoned argument or advice, no matter how strongly that advice or argument is put, to persuade someone to plead guilty (Meissner v R (1995) 184 CLR 132 at 142 (Brennan, Toohey and McHugh JJ)). This is because deciding to plead guilty is an end compatible with the proper administration of justice. Furthermore, merely giving advice to a person recommending they plead guilty (e.g. by their lawyer) generally maintains their free choice in the matter.

39. However, a plea resulting from intimidation is not made freely. This would amount to the actus reus of the attempt offence. This is because when the court acts on this plea it has been misled or denied the true circumstances of the case (Meissner v R (1995) 184 CLR 132, 142 (Brennan, Toohey and McHugh JJ)).

40. It is recognised that the line between lawful persuasion and improper means is difficult to draw. This difficulty is resolved by assessing whether in all the circumstances of the case the inducement, argument or advice could reasonably be regarded as compatible with the maintenance of free choice by that person (Meissner v R (1995) 184 CLR 132, 143 (Brennan, Toohey and McHugh JJ)).

41. Evidence of:

    (a) The existence of an ulterior or improper motive;

    (b) The nature of the relationship between the accused and other person;

    (c) The nature of the persuasion (e.g. was the conduct aimed at advancing a legitimate interest of the person entering the plea?); and are all relevant to determining whether the conduct of the accused amounted to improper or unlawful pressure and therefore tended to pervert the course of justice (Meissner v R (1995) 184 CLR 132, 143 (Brennan, Toohey and McHugh JJ), 149 (Deane J)).

    (d) Harassment or intimidation;

42. Where the means employed by the accused extend beyond lawful persuasion into improper or unlawful pressure, the actus reus of the attempt offence will be satisfied, even if the purpose for engaging in the conduct was compatible with the administration of justice (i.e. preventing a person from committing perjury). In contrast, if the aim of the conduct is not compatible with the administration of justice then the actus reus will be met even if the conduct of the accused only amounts lawful persuasion (Meissner v R (1995) 184 CLR 132 at 142 (Brennan, Toohey and McHugh JJ), 149 (Deane J) and 159 (Dawson J); see also R v Kellett [1976] QB 372, 388).

Intention to pervert the course of justice

43. The second element of both offences is that the accused intended to pervert the course of justice (R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268 at 277 (Mason CJ) and 282 (Brennan and Toohey JJ)).

44. However, a person can be guilty of either offence even if s/he does not have the concepts of 'course of justice' or 'pervert' in mind when they engage in the relevant conduct (Meissner v R (1995) 184 CLR 132 at 159 (Dawson J); see also Librizzi v R (2006) 33 WAR 104, [48]).

45. It is sufficient to prove the person engaged in conduct for a purpose that would result in the perversion of the course of justice, if that purpose was carried out successfully (Meissner v R (1995) 184 CLR 132 at 144 (Brennan, Toohey and McHugh JJ) and 159 (Dawson J); see also Librizzi v R (2006) 33 WAR 104, [48]; cf Hatty v Pilkinton (No 2) (1992) 35 FCR 433 at 439).

46. For example in Meissner v R, the relevant mens rea was the intention to induce the entry of a guilty plea when the person induced would not, or might not, have entered that plea when exercising free choice (Meissner v R (1995) 184 CLR 132 at 144–147).

47. Another example is Tognolini v R, where the accused attempted to prevent a prosecution for offences for which he believed he was innocent. The defence argued the accused did not have the requisite intention to pervert the course of justice because of the belief in his innocence. The court held the accused did intend to induce and threaten witnesses to alter their evidence and this conduct, if successful, result in the perversion of the course of justice (Tognolini v R (2011) 32 VR 104, [44]).

Proving intention before a course of justice has commenced

48. For the offence of attempting to pervert the course of justice, the prosecution must prove the accused's intention related to a "course of justice". Therefore, the conduct must be directed towards perverting "imminent, probable or even possible judicial proceedings" (R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268, 277 (Mason CJ)).

49. It is not sufficient to prove a mere intention to deceive a police investigation without a connection to future judicial proceedings (R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268 at 284 (Brennan and Toohey JJ)).

50. The evidence must be capable of showing that:

    - The accused believed, or contemplated, a court's jurisdiction might be invoked in the future unless s/he deflected certain investigations (e.g. police investigations); and
    - The accused knew that the act would have the manifest tendency to pervert that course of justice or intended that the act would have that effect (R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268, 277, 282 (Mason CJ); 284 (Brennan and Toohey JJ); see also Reg v Spezzano (1977) 76 DLR (3d) 160 at 163).

51. It is only necessary for the prosecution to prove the accused contemplated "imminent, probable or possible" judicial proceedings (R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268, 277 (Mason CJ) and 284 (Brennan and Toohey JJ)).

52. Therefore, the prosecution does not need to prove the possibility of proceedings in fact and as such it is not necessary for any other party, agency or person (including the police) to have contemplated proceedings before the accused engaged in the alleged conduct (R v Rogerson (1992) 174 CLR 268, 277 (Mason CJ) and 284 (Brennan and Toohey JJ)).

Penalty notices and warning about prosecution

53. If the prospect of judicial proceedings are distant or hypothetical, and there is no indication that the accused contemplated such proceedings, this will not be sufficient to amount to an intention to pervert the course of justice (R v Einfeld (2008) 71 NSWLR 31, [134]).

54. For example, making false statements in respect of penalty notices issued under an administrative system, will not in the ordinary course amount to the attempt offence.

55. Typically, under an administrative system, judicial proceedings are only instituted if the person who had received the notice wished to appeal it. Where there is no indication that the accused had contemplated such an appeal, there is no "imminent, probable or possible" judicial proceeding to be perverted (Police v Zammitt [2007] SASC 37, [54]–[56]; R v Einfeld (2008) 71 NSWLR 31).

56. Conversely if at the time the accused engaged in the relevant conduct, the accused had previously been warned of a probable prosecution, or had otherwise contemplated one (i.e. considering an appeal of a penalty notice), then it is likely to be open to find the accused engaged in the alleged conduct intending to deflect the contemplated proceedings (see, e.g. R v Beckett (2015) 256 CLR 305).

Differences between the two offences

57. The two offences both involve conduct with an intention to pervert the course of justice, but are distinguished by result (R v Beckett (2015) 256 CLR 305, [37]).

58. There are two key differences between the two offences:

    (a) First, to prosecute the offence of perverting the course of justice, a judicial proceeding must be on foot at the time the relevant conduct was undertaken and thus a course of justice commenced [see the section above on the commencement of the course of justice].

(b) Second, for the offence of attempting to pervert the course of justice, the prosecution must only prove the conduct had the tendency to pervert the course of justice. In contrast, for the offence of perverting the course of justice it must be proved that the conduct actually did effect such a perversion.

59. Under s 320 of the Crimes Act 1958 both offences have the same maximum sentence of 25 years imprisonment.

Last Updated: 27 April 2016

7.8.3.1 Charge: Perverting the Course of Justice

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge should only be used for the offence of perverting the course of justice.

The elements

I must now direct you about the offence of perverting the course of justice. To convict the accused of this offence, the prosecution must prove the following 2 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused engaged in conduct that perverted the course of justice.

Two – the accused intended for that conduct to pervert the course of justice.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Perversion of the course of justice

The first element requires you to be satisfied the accused engaged in conduct that perverted the course of justice.

The 'course of justice' is the administration of the law by a court. Perversion of the course of justice means NOA's conduct interfered with the administration of justice by a court.

The prosecution say [describe NOA's alleged conduct] interfered with the administration of justice because [describe how NOA's conduct is alleged to have interfered with the administration of justice].

[If the defence dispute that the accused engaged in the alleged conduct, add the following shaded section.]

The defence argue the prosecution has not proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA [describe alleged conduct].

[Refer to competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

[If the defence dispute that the conduct perverted the course of justice, add the following shaded section.]

The defence argues NOA's conduct did not interfere with the administration of justice because [refer to relevant defence and prosecution evidence and arguments].

If you are satisfied NOA [describe conduct and how it is alleged to have interfered with the administration of justice], the first element of this offence be met.

Intention to pervert the course of justice

The second element the prosecution must prove is at the time the accused engaged in the relevant conduct, s/he intended to pervert the course of justice.

In this case, the prosecution argues when NOA [describe alleged conduct], s/he intended that [describe basis for alleged perversion of the course of justice].[1129]

I direct you as a matter of law, this element does not require the prosecution to prove NOA realised or understood the conduct would result in a perversion of the course of justice.

[Summarise relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments]

If you are satisfied, at the time the NOA [describe alleged conduct], s/he intended to pervert the course of justice in [describe relevant proceeding], then this element will be met.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of perverting the course of justice the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – NOA engaged in conduct that perverted the course of justice; and

Two – NOA intended to pervert the course of justice.

If you find that either of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of perverting the course of justice.

Last Updated: 27 April 2016

7.8.3.2 Checklist: Perverting the Course of Justice

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Two elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused engaged in conduct that perverted the course of justice; and

2. The accused intended for that conduct to pervert the course of justice.

Perversion of the course of justice

1. Did the accused's conduct interfere with the administration of justice by a court?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of perverting the course of justice

---

Intention to pervert the course of justice

2. Did the accused intend to pervert the course of justice?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of perverting the course of justice (as long as you have answered yes to question 1)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of perverting the course of justice

Last updated: 12 September 2019

[1129] For example, when NOA threatened NOW to alter NOW's evidence, NOA intended that NOW would give false evidence to the court in favour of NOA's innocence.

7.8.3.3 Charge: Attempting to Pervert the Course of Justice (Course of Justice Commenced)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge should only be used for the offence of attempting to pervert the course of justice where it is not in dispute the accused engaged in the relevant conduct after a course of justice had commenced.

The elements

I must now direct you about the offence of attempting to pervert the course of justice. To convict the accused of this offence, the prosecution must prove the following 2 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused engaged in conduct that had the tendency to pervert the course of justice.

Two – the accused intended for that conduct to pervert the course of justice.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Tendency to pervert the course of justice

The first element requires you to be satisfied the accused engaged in conduct that tended to pervert the course of justice.

The 'course of justice' is the administration of the law and justice in a court proceeding. The phrase 'tendency to pervert the course of justice' means NOA's conduct posed a real risk or possibility of interfering with the administration of justice by a court.

The prosecution say [describe NOA's alleged conduct] posed a real risk or possibility of interfering with the administration of justice because [describe how this is alleged to have potentially interfered with the administration of justice].[1130]

[If the defence dispute that the accused engaged in the alleged conduct, add the following shaded section.]

The defence argues that the prosecution has not proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA [describe alleged conduct].

[Refer to competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

[If the defence dispute that the conduct had a tendency to pervert the course of justice, add the following shaded section.]

The defence argues that NOA's conduct did not pose a real risk or possibility of interfering with the administration of justice because [refer to relevant defence evidence and arguments].

[If the issue of impossibility arises, add the following shaded section.]

In deciding whether NOA's conduct had a tendency to pervert the course of justice, I direct you as a matter of law it is not relevant that [describe basis of impossibility]. Instead, you must look at NOA's conduct objectively and decide whether [describe alleged conduct without reference to basis of impossibility, e.g. "offering a bribe to a police officer"] in general poses a real risk or possibility of interfering with the administration of justice by a court.

If you are satisfied NOA engaged in conduct that tended to interfere with the administration of justice in the [describe relevant court proceeding], this first element will be met.

[1130] If required, see 7.8.3 Perverting and attempting to pervert the course of justice for guidance on when conduct may tend to pervert the course of justice.

Intention to pervert the course of justice

The second element the prosecution must prove is at the time the accused engaged in the relevant conduct, s/he intended to pervert the course of justice.

In this case, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that when NOA [describe alleged conduct], s/he intended that [describe basis for alleged perversion of the course of justice].[1131]

I direct you as a matter of law, this element does not require the prosecution to prove NOA realised or understood the conduct would result in a perversion of the course of justice.

[Summarise relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments]

If you are satisfied, at the time the NOA [describe alleged conduct], s/he intended to pervert the course of justice in [describe relevant proceeding], then this element will be met.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of attempting to pervert the course of justice the prosecution must have proved to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – NOA engaged in conduct that tended to pervert the course of justice; and

Two – NOA intended to pervert the course of justice.

If you find that either of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of attempting to pervert the course of justice.

Last Updated: 27 April 2016

7.8.3.4 Checklist: Attempting to Pervert the Course of Justice (Course of Justice Commenced)

Click here for a Word version of this document for adaptation

Two elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused engaged in conduct that had the tendency to pervert the course of justice; and

2. The accused intended for that conduct to pervert the course of justice.

Attempting to pervert the course of justice

1. Did the accused engage in conduct that posed a real risk or possibility of interfering with a court proceeding?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of attempting to pervert the course of justice

---

Intention to pervert the course of justice

2. Did the accused intend to pervert the course of justice?

[1131] For example, when NOA threatened NOW, she intended that NOW would give false information to police which would prevent them from charging NOA with assaulting NO3P.

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of attempting to pervert the course of justice (as long as you have answered yes to Question 1)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of attempting to pervert the course of justice

Last updated: 13 September 2019

7.8.3.5 Charge: Attempting to Pervert the Course of Justice (No Course of Justice Commenced)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge should only be used for the offence of attempting to pervert the course of justice where it is not in dispute the accused engaged in the relevant conduct before a course of justice had commenced.

The elements

I must now direct you about the offence of attempting to pervert the course of justice. To convict the accused of this offence, the prosecution must prove the following 2 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused engaged in conduct that had the tendency to pervert the course of justice.

Two – the accused intended for that conduct to pervert the course of justice.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Tendency to pervert the course of justice

The first element requires you to be satisfied the accused engaged in conduct that tended to pervert the course of justice. This involves two questions.

One – Was there a course of justice?

Two – Did the conduct create a real risk or possibility of interfering with that course of justice?

Connection to a future proceeding

For the purpose of this offence, a 'course of justice' is the administration of the law in a court proceeding.

At the time NOA [describe alleged conduct] a court proceeding had not yet commenced. The prosecution must therefore prove that a court proceeding was "imminent, probable or possible" at the time NOA [describe alleged conduct].

[Where the prosecution identifies a specific offence/cause of action for which proceedings would have been instituted add the following.]

The prosecution says [describe alleged conduct of NOA or any other person likely to lead to a future court proceeding] was likely to lead to [describe future prosecution/court proceeding] because [summarise relevant prosecution arguments and evidence].

You must decide if the prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt the commencement of a court proceeding was likely. In other words, were future proceedings for [describe conduct of NOA or any other person likely to lead to a future court proceeding] "imminent, probable or possible"?

[Where the prosecution does not identify a specific offence/cause of action add the following.]

The prosecution does not need to identify a specific [offence/cause of action] to satisfy this requirement. However, the prosecution must prove future proceedings were not 'distant or hypothetical' but were likely to result from [summarise relevant inquiries, e.g. "police investigations into the alleged criminal conduct of NOA"].

[If the defence dispute the likelihood of a future proceeding add the following shaded section.]

The defence argues that proceedings for [describe future prosecution/court proceeding] were not "imminent, probable or possible" because [summarise relevant defence arguments and evidence].

[Refer to competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Defining tendency

The second question is whether NOA's conduct created a real risk or possibility of interfering with that proceeding.

The prosecution say [describe NOA's alleged conduct] posed a real risk or possibility of interfering with the administration of justice because [describe how this is alleged to have potentially interfered with the administration of justice].[1132]

[If the defence dispute that the accused engaged in the alleged conduct, add the following shaded section.]

The defence argues that the prosecution has not proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA [describe alleged conduct].

[Refer to competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

[If the defence dispute that the alleged conduct had a tendency to pervert the course of justice, add the following shaded section.]

The defence argues that NOA's conduct did not pose a real risk or possibility of interfering with the administration of justice because [refer to relevant defence and prosecution evidence and arguments].

[Refer to competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

[If the issue of impossibility arises, add the following shaded section.]

In deciding whether NOA's conduct had a tendency to pervert the course of justice, I direct you as a matter of law it is not relevant that [describe basis of impossibility]. Instead, you must look at NOA's conduct objectively and decide whether [describe alleged conduct without reference to basis of impossibility, e.g. "offering a bribe to a police officer"] in general poses a real risk or possibility of interfering with the administration of justice by a court.

If you are satisfied the prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt there was an "imminent, probable or possible" court proceeding and NOA's conduct posed a real risk or possibility of interfering with that proceeding, then this first element will be met.

Intention to pervert the course of justice

The second element the prosecution must prove is that at the time the accused engaged in the relevant conduct, s/he intended to pervert the course of justice.

[1132] If required, see 7.8.3 Perverting and attempting to pervert the course of justice for guidance on when conduct may tend to pervert the course of justice.

In this case, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that when NOA [describe alleged conduct], s/he intended that [describe basis for alleged perversion of the course of justice].[1133]

I direct you as a matter of law, this element does not require the prosecution to prove NOA realised or understood the conduct would result in a perversion of the course of justice.

[Summarise relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

[If the defence argues that the accused did not have any future proceedings in contemplation at the time of the alleged conduct, add the following shaded section.]

The defence argues NOA did not intend to interfere with the administration of justice because at the time s/he [describe alleged conduct] it cannot be proved NOA thought future proceedings were "imminent, probable or possible".

[Identify relevant defence evidence and arguments.]

In response, the prosecution argues that [identify relevant prosecution evidence and arguments].

If you are satisfied, at the time the NOA [describe alleged conduct], s/he intended to pervert the course of justice, then this element will be met.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of attempting to pervert the course of justice the prosecution must have proved to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – NOA engaged in conduct that tended to pervert the course of justice; and

Two – NOA intended to pervert the course of justice.

If you find that either of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of attempting to pervert the course of justice.

Last updated: 27 April 2016

7.8.3.6 Checklist: Attempting to Pervert the Course of Justice (No Course of Justice Commenced)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Two elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused engaged in conduct that had the tendency to pervert the course of justice; and

2. The accused intended for that conduct to pervert the course of justice.

Attempting to pervert the course of justice

1. Did the accused engage in conduct that had a tendency to pervert the course of justice?

    1.1 Was there a court proceeding imminent, probable or possible?

[1133] For example, when NOA threatened NOW, she intended that NOW would give false information to police which would prevent them from charging NOA with assaulting NO3P.

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of attempting to pervert the course of justice

1.2 Did the accused's conduct create a real risk or possibility of interfering with that court proceeding?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of attempting to pervert the course of justice

---

Intention to pervert the course of justice

2. Did the accused intend to pervert the course of justice?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of attempting to pervert the course of justice (as long as you have answered yes to Question 1)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of attempting to pervert the course of justice

Last updated: 12 September 2019

7.9 Prohibited Person Possess, Carry or Use a Firearm

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. Section 5(1) of the Firearms Act 1996 creates the offence of a prohibited person possessing, carrying or using a firearm.
2. The offence consists of three elements:
    - The item was a firearm
    - The accused possessed, carried or used the firearm
    - The accused is a prohibited person.

Firearm

3. Firearm is defined in Firearms Act 1996 s 3 as follows:

firearm means any device, whether or not assembled or in parts—

(a) which is designed or adapted, or is capable of being modified, to discharge shot or a bullet or other missile by the expansion of gases produced in the device by the ignition of strongly combustible materials or by compressed air or other gases, whether stored in the device in pressurised containers or produced in the device by mechanical means; and

(b) whether or not operable or complete or temporarily or permanently inoperable or incomplete—

and which is not—

(c) an industrial tool powered by cartridges containing gunpowder or compressed air or other gases which is designed and intended for use for fixing fasteners or plugs or for similar purposes; or

(d) a captive bolt humane killer; or

(e) a spear gun designed for underwater use; or

(f) a device designed for the discharge of signal flares; or

(h) a device commonly known as a kiln gun or ringblaster, designed specifically for knocking out or down solid material in kilns, furnaces or cement silos; or

(i) a device commonly known as a line thrower designed for establishing lines between structures or natural features and powered by compressed air or other compressed gases and used for rescue purposes, rescue training or rescue demonstration; or

(j) a device of a prescribed class;

4. One effect of this definition is that a device continues to be a firearm even if it is rendered inoperable, such as through disassembly, or modifications to the barrel or firing pin (see, e.g. Keys v Kitto (1996) 90 A Crim R 288; Carlson v Karlovsky [1988] WAR 59; Ali v The Queen [2019] NSWCCA 207, [44]–[50]; Beaton v Wray-Watts [2003] WASCA 314, [35]).
5. Similarly, an object may be a firearm even if it has never been operable or complete. An object may be a firearm even if critical parts are missing (see DPP v Morgan (2013) 235 A Crim R 491, [40], [47]–[52], but c.f. Jacob v The Queen (2014) 240 A Crim R 239, [147]–[148] (Hulme J).
6. While it has not been the subject of consideration in Victoria, the equivalent provision in New South Wales has been the source of divergent judicial views on the extent to which disassembled parts can be treated as the whole item, or whether there must be some limitation on the capacity of a provision like paragraph (b) of the definition to transform unassembled or incomplete items into the whole item (compare DPP v Morgan (2013) 235 A Crim R 491, [40], [47]–[52] and Jacob v The Queen (2014) 240 A Crim R 239, [12]–[17] (Ward JA)[147]–[148] (Hulme AJ). See also Ali v The Queen [2019] NSWCCA 207, [45]–[50]). It is suggested that whether parts of a firearm should be treated as a disassembled firearm is a question of fact and degree.
7. In Beaton v Wray-Watts, the Western Australian Court of Appeal drew a distinction between whether the changes required to make an item into an operable firearm should be characterised as alterations (in which case the device would remain a firearm, even if inoperable) or manufacture (in which case the device would not be a firearm). The Court noted that it would be a matter of fact and degree whether the required changes amount to alteration or manufacture (Beaton v Wray-Watts [2003] WASCA 314, [35]–[39]).

Possession, carrying or use

8. The second element is that the accused possessed, carried or used the firearm.

9. Firearms Act 1996 s 3(1) states that possession, in relation to a firearm, includes:

    i) Actual physical possession of the firearm;

    ii) Custody or control of the firearm;

    iii) Having and exercising access to the firearm, either solely or in common with others.

10. In each case, the directions required on the element of possession will depend on the issues which the evidence raises for consideration. The jury only needs to be directed about so much of possession as is in issue (R v Bandiera [1999] 3 VR 103, [20]; R v Henderson & Warwick (2009) 22 VR 662, [114]).

11. This definition, in substance, matches the definition of possession from s 3(1) of the Firearms Act 1958.

12. In the context of the Firearms Act 1958 definition of possession, possession was held to cover:

    - Actual possession, in the sense explained in Moors v Burke (1919) 26 CLR 265 at 275 – 'in actual fact and without the necessity of taking any further step, the complete present personal physical control of the property to the exclusion of others not act in concert' whether by having 'present manual custody, or by having it where he alone has the exclusive right of power to place his hands on it, and so have manual custody when he wishes'; and

    - Physical custody or control, or having and exercising access to a weapon, whether alone or with others, regardless of any propriety or exclusive possessory rights. For this purpose, custody has its ordinary meaning of safe keeping, protection, charge or care, and control refers to actual power to deal with the firearm by restraint or direction. When dealing with the words custody, control and access, there is no "need for some physical act in connection with the weapon consistent with ownership or dominion" (Yeates v Hoare [1981] VR 1034, 1038. See also Keys v Kitto (1996) 90 A Crim R 288, 293).

13. Under the common law meaning of possession, the prosecution must prove that the accused:

    - Had physical custody or control of the firearm;
    - Intended to have or exercise physical custody or control of the firearm
    - Knew of the existence and nature of the firearm (R v Maio [1989] VR 281, 285; He Kaw Teh v The Queen (1985) 157 CLR 523, 537-539, 546, 585-587, 599-600; Momcilovic v The Queen (2011) 245 CLR 1, [16]; R v Henderson & Warwick (2009) 22 VR 662, [82], [86], [106], [107]; Yeates v Hoare [1981] VR 1034, 1039; Seifeddine v The Queen [2021] NSWCCA 214, [8]).

14. "Physical custody or control" is not limited to the accused having the firearm on their person. It also is apt to describe the situation where the person has placed the firearm somewhere that they have the exclusive right or power to take it into their hands. This may include where the accused has hidden the firearm somewhere, even if the hiding place is in a public location (Moors v Burke (1919) 26 CLR 265, 274; Williams v Douglas (1949) 78 CLR 521, 527; Musa v The Queen [2019] NSWCCA 279).

15. However, in R v Dib (1991) 52 A Crim R 64, Hunt J spoke of the requirement that the goods must be in a place where the accused and any others acting in concert with the accused may go without physical bar to obtain manual possession of the goods (at 66-67).

16. The form of knowledge required to prove possession is often an issue of some complexity. In the context of drug offences, it is recognised that the accused must know that the goods in question are drugs, as distinct from being some other item or prohibited import, but does not need to know the precise identity of the drug in question (see, e.g. He Kaw Teh v The Queen (1985) 157 CLR 523; Weng v The Queen (2013) 279 FLR 119). It is likely that the same principle applies in the case of firearms – the prosecution must prove as part of possession that the accused intended to possess a firearm[1134] and a belief that the item is a firearm of a different type would not be exculpatory. Similarly, if the jury is satisfied that the item meets the definition of firearms, the fact that the accused did not realise that the definition includes incomplete or inoperable firearms would not be exculpatory, provided the accused was aware that they had an incomplete or inoperable firearm.

17. A lack of knowledge that the definition of firearms includes incomplete or inoperable firearms would not be exculpatory, if the accused knew they had an incomplete firearm.

18. Mere knowledge that the firearm is present is not sufficient to prove possession under Firearms Act 1996 s 3 (but see the discussion of deemed possession under Firearms Act 1996 s 145, below). Where firearms are located in a place where the accused has access, the prosecution must also prove that the accused intended to control the firearms (see, e.g. R v Henderson & Warwick (2009) 22 VR 662, [178]–[180]). However, where the accused gives someone permission to leave a firearm on the accused's premises, the accused may then have custody or control of the firearm (see, e.g. Yeates v Hoare [1981] VR 1034, 1039; Keys v Kitto (1996) 90 A Crim R 288 and compare R v Hussain [1969] 2 QB 567).

19. Where the accused leaves the firearm with another person who will return the firearm on request, the accused might retain possession in the form of control even while separated from the firearm (see, e.g. R v Cottrell [1983] 1 VR 143; R v Sleep (1861) 169 ER 1296).

20. Conventionally, the prosecution must prove that the accused exercised possession to the exclusion of others not acting in concert ('exclusive possession'). This has been said to require proof of a legal right to exclude all persons from the premises in which the property is located (Moors v Burke (1919) 26 CLR 265, 271, 274; R v Dib (1991) 52 A Crim R 64, 66-67; R v Flippetti (1984) 13 A Crim R 335).

21. The need to prove exclusive possession means that two people cannot be in possession of the same item unless they have joint possession of that item (Lee v The Queen [2013] NSWCCA 68, [281]). This can be relevant for consistency of verdicts, and for the availability of factual alternative charges, where several people are accused of being in possession of a single item at a given time.

22. However, in some cases, the requirement that the accused have exclusive possession is better treated as a requirement (where the matter arises on the facts) that the jury exclude any reasonable possibility that a specific person could take possession or control of the firearms, or interfere with the accused's possession or control (see, e.g. Audsley v The Queen [2013] VSCA 41, [81], [98]–[99], noting though that this was a case concerning handling stolen goods, rather than possession of firearms, and that the meaning of possession can vary depending on its statutory context).

[1134] Note that while Whelan v Kallane [2021] WASC 74 and R v Fuller & Zazzaro [2012] SASCFC 101, [71]-[75], [81] both considered that a belief that the object was not a firearm engaged the relevant mistake of fact defences (provided the accused knew of the existence of the object), it is suggested that under the Victorian legislation, a belief that the object is not a firearm would be treated as raising a doubt about whether the accused had possession of the item, in accordance with the principles discussed in He Kaw Teh v The Queen (1985) 157 CLR 523 and R v Maio [1989] VR 281.

23. The need to prove exclusive possession must be treated with caution where items are found in a location where several people have access (such as items in a house, or a storage shed). In such cases, the question will be who is actually responsible for the item, rather than finding that no one is in possession because co-tenants were not excluded (see R v Henderson & Warwick (2009) 22 VR 662, [113]).

24. While it is common for courts to speak of the need to prove that the accused possessed the goods to the exclusion of anyone not acting in concert with them, some courts have disapproved of the idea that joint possession requires proof of concert. Instead, it may be sufficient for the prosecution to prove that several people, between them, intended to exercise control to the exclusion of any other person. This does not require proof of a joint enterprise as to the future use or disposal of the goods (R v Nguyen (2010) 108 SASR 66, [66]; R v Becirovic [2017] SASCFC 156. See also R v Colenso [2016] SASCFC 128, [39]–[44]. See also R v Wan [2003] NSWCCA 225, [14]).

25. Carry is defined to include "the carriage of that firearm either as a whole or in parts and either by one person or more than one person" (Firearms Act 1996 s 3(1)).

26. Use is not defined in the Act and so is presumed to carry its ordinary meaning.

27. Section 145 of the Firearms Act 1996 is a deeming provision which supports proof of possession. The section states:

> (1) A firearm is taken to be in the possession of a person if the firearm is found—
>
> (a) on land or premises occupied by, in the care of or under the control or management of the person; or
>
> (b) in a vehicle of which the person is in charge.
>
> (2) Subsection (1) does not apply if, at the time the firearm was found—
>
> (a) the firearm was in the possession of another person who was lawfully authorised under this Act to possess the firearm; or
>
> (b) the person believed on reasonable grounds that the firearm was in the possession of another person who was lawfully authorised under this Act to possess the firearm; or
>
> (c) the person did not know, and could not reasonably be expected to know, that the firearm was on the premises or in the vehicle.

28. In relation to a similarly worded South Australian provision, Kourakis CJ observed that the provision should be construed widely, that forms of control or relationship less than ownership are sufficient, and that care or management of premises will generally be significantly less than control of premises (R v Marafioti (2014) 118 SASR 511, [23]–[25]).

29. When interpreting the similar South Australian provisions, Lovell and Hinton JJ held that:

- Care is synonymous with 'safe-keeping'
- Control supposes physical possession of the property, and uses the conventional meaning of possession
- Management means effective control of the premises (R v Becirovic [2017] SASCFC 156, [226]–[227]).

30. When the prosecution relies on s 145(1)(a), it must show that the accused was in practical control of the premises, bearing in mind that the consequence of this conclusion is that the accused would be deemed to be in possession of firearms unless s 145(2) applies. One important consideration will be whether the accused was able to control who had access to the premises, and hence control access to the firearm (R v Phung [2003] VSCA 32, [28]; R v Henderson & Warwick (2009) 22 VR 662, [87]; R v Tran [2007] VSCA 19, [20]–[21]; Conant v The Queen (2021) 138 SASR 239, [41]).

31. A person may be the occupier of premises without living at those premises, such as by keeping the premises ready for habitation whenever they wish (R v Clarke & Johnstone [1986] VR 643, 651, citing Shire of Poowong and Jeetho v Gillen [1907] VLR 37, 40), or where the person considers themselves as having power to grant or deny others access to the premises (R v Clarke & Johnstone [1986] VR 643, 652).

32. A person does not cease to be an occupier merely because they are away from the premises for a period of time. However, the reason for the departure, and whether it is of indefinite duration, may be significant (Conant v The Queen (2021) 138 SASR 239, [40]).

33. A person may be the occupier of more than one location, such as where a person lives at several houses over the course of a week, or where the person has a holiday home that they use infrequently (see, e.g. Conant v The Queen (2021) 138 SASR 239).

34. When the prosecution relies on s 145(1)(b), it must prove that the accused had "a degree of practical control over the vehicle that is suggestive of some knowledge of, or connection with, items located in the vehicle" (R v Gjergji (2016) 126 SASR 106, [43]).

35. The most natural and obvious way for a person to be in charge of a vehicle is to be the driver of the vehicle (R v Marafioti (2014) 118 SASR 511, [26]).

36. Another common way to be "in charge of" a vehicle is through ownership, though that may not be enough if it does not provide practical control. For example, when a vehicle is lent to another person, the owner may cease having the degree of practical control required to engage s 145(1)(b) (see R v Gjergji (2016) 126 SASR 106, [44], [55]).

37. Whether a person other the driver can be in charge of the vehicle is a question of fact and degree. A person who has legal or de facto authority to dictate how the driver manages the vehicle (R v Marafioti (2014) 118 SASR 511, [27]), or the vehicle owner who travels in the vehicle as a passenger (R v Gjergji (2016) 126 SASR 106, [46]) may be in charge of the vehicle. More than one person can be "in charge of" a vehicle at the same time (R v Marafioti (2014) 118 SASR 511, [28]; R v Gjergji (2016) 126 SASR 106, [46]).

38. The result of s 145(1)(b) is that a person who voluntarily drives a vehicle will have a practical responsibility to take steps to ascertain whether the vehicle carries a firearm (R v Marafioti (2014) 118 SASR 511, [29]).

39. In the context of drug offences, deemed possession due to occupation can be rebutted by the accused proving, on the balance of probabilities, that they were unaware that the drug was on the premises or they had no intention to exercise control over the drug or the place where it was kept. This reflects the fact that the onus is on the accused to rebut possession as it is defined at common law (R v Clarke & Johnstone [1986] VR 643, 647-648; R v Tran [2007] VSCA 19, [24]). However, Firearms Act 1996 provides a more narrow set of circumstances in which deemed possession due to occupation can be rebutted:

    - Lack of knowledge of the firearm is not enough by itself. The accused must not reasonably be expected to know of the firearm;
    - Knowledge of the firearm accompanied by a lack of intention to possess is not enough. The firearm must be in the possession of someone lawfully authorised to possess it, or the accused must believe on reasonable grounds that the other person was lawfully authorised to possess it (see Firearms Act 1996 s 145(2)).

40. The Firearms Act 1996 is silent on whether the accused bears the onus of establishing the exceptions to deemed possession in s 145. While there are two decisions which held that the section imposes a legal onus on the accused, these decisions do not appear to have been the product of considered submissions on the question of onus and do not appear to have engaged closely with the terms of the Act (see R v Henderson & Warwick (2009) 22 VR 662, [64]; R v Lowe [2014] VSC 543, [24]).[1135]

41. Out of an abundance of caution, the approach taken in this Charge Book is that, where there is sufficient evidence to raise the exceptions, the onus is on the prosecution to exclude the exceptions.

42. Firearms Act 1996 s 145(2) may be compared to Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981 s 5, both of which extend the concept of possession to the situation in which goods are found on premises occupied by the accused. However, Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981 s 5 states that the deemed possession applies "unless the person satisfies the court to the contrary". The express statement that the accused must satisfy the court to the contrary has been influential in the interpretation of Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981 s 5 (see, e.g, R v Clarke & Johnstone [1986] VR 643; R v Tragear (2003) 9 VR 107; Momcilovic v The Queen (2011) 245 CLR 1, [56] (French CJ), [191] (Gummow J), [464]–[468] (Heydon J), [510]–[511] (Crennan and Kiefel J) [670] (Bell J)).

43. Similarly, the South Australian equivalent provisions, Firearms Act 1977 (SA) s 5(15) provides that the accused must 'establish[]' the defence, which has led to the conclusion that the accused bears a legal onus (R v Fuller & Zazzaro [2012] SASCFC 101, [45]–[50]). The New South Wales equivalent states that the deemed possession operates "unless the court is satisfied", which has also been held to put the onus on the accused (May v The Queen [2012] NSWCCA 250, [32]; Strachan v The Queen [2017] NSWCCA 322, [33]). These may be contrasted with s 145(2), which states that the deeming provision "does not apply if" one of the exceptions applies.

44. Without equivalent language, interpretative principles which presume that the prosecution bears the onus of proving all elements (see, e.g. He Kaw Teh v The Queen (1985) 157 CLR 523, 582 (Brennan J)) and s 25 of the Charter of Human Rights and Responsibilities Act 2006 weigh in favour of the onus resting on the prosecution.

45. Contrary indications, such as the potential for inconsistent directions in a prosecution where there are both drugs and firearms charges, the distinction between provisos and exceptions explained in Vines v Djordjevitch (1995) 91 CLR 512, the fact that the provision is designed to extend liability and that several of the matters in s 145(2) may be peculiarly within the accused's knowledge are suggested not to be of sufficient weight to produce a different conclusion in the absence of explicit wording putting the onus on the accused.

46. While knowledge of the firearms is a requirement of possession under the definition in s 3, it is not a requirement when the prosecution relies on deemed possession due to occupation (R v Henderson & Warwick (2009) 22 VR 662, [112]). A person therefore cannot rely on any of the grounds of exception in s 145(2) on the basis that they knew an object was on the premises, but they did not realise it was a firearm (see, in relation to similar South Australian provisions, R v Fuller & Zazzaro [2012] SASCFC 101, [72]).

[1135] French CJ in Momcilovic v The Queen (2011) 245 CLR 1, footnote 38 observed that s 145 of the Firearms Act 1996 is a "similar provision" to Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981 s 5, and that neither were amended as part of changes introduced by the Statute Law Amendment (Charter of Human Rights and Responsibilities) Act 2009 to replace legal burdens of proof with either evidentiary burdens or to remove the burdens entirely.

Prohibited person

47. "Prohibited person" is defined in Firearms Act 1996 s 3(1). The Act contains four and a half pages of conditions which will lead to a person being a prohibited person. Many of the conditions involve the accused serving, or having recently served, a sentence of imprisonment for certain specified offences, or being the subject of certain orders.

48. As a practical matter, the accused's status as a prohibited person will rarely be in issue in a trial. If it were in issue, then it would likely be one of the rare cases where the probative value of proof of prior convictions outweighs the prejudicial effect of such evidence (compare Mokbel v The Queen [2010] VSCA 354, [33]).

49. In most cases, it is expected that the parties will tender a statement of agreed facts under Evidence Act 2008 s 191 on whether the accused was a prohibited person at the relevant time (see, e.g. Farrugia v The King [2023] VSCA 248, [17]).

50. It may also be necessary for the judge to give strong anti-speculation directions in relation to this element, to minimise the risk of prejudice which might arise if the jury were to speculate about why the accused was a prohibited person. These directions may also need to inform the jury that there are a wide range of circumstances in which a person can be prohibited from possessing a firearm, and they must not use the fact of prohibition in any way adverse to the accused (see, e.g. Huynh v The Queen [2020] VSCA 222, [26]).

51. In Huynh v The Queen, Priest JA (Maxwell P and Weinberg JA agreeing) called for legislative reform so that the question of the accused being a prohibited person could be determined by the trial judge and the jury would only need to determine the elements of possession and that the object is a firearm, without the 'prohibited person' element being mentioned in the trial (Huynh v The Queen [2020] VSCA 222, [55]–[58]). This has not yet occurred.

Legislative history

52. Firearms Act 1996 s 5 was significantly amended by the Control of Weapons and Firearms Acts Amendment Act 2012 s 8 on 16 May 2012. Before the amendment, the section contains separate offence provisions depending on whether the accused possessed a registered or unregistered firearm, with different maximum penalties. The effect of the 2012 amendments was to remove this distinction, and adopt the single lower maximum penalty. The result was that for offences alleged to be committed after 16 May 2012, the prosecution no longer needed to lead evidence about the registration status of the firearm in question.

53. For offences alleged to have been committed before the amendments, the offence contains an additional element, requiring the prosecution to prove either that the firearm was registered (in the case of offences against s 5(1)) or was not registered (in the case of offences against s 5(2)).

Last updated: 4 March 2024

7.9.1 Charge: Prohibited Person Possess, Carry or Use a Firearm

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Note: This direction is designed for a case where the accused is alleged to have possessed the firearm. The direction must be modified if the prosecution relies on proof of carrying or use of the firearm.

I must now direct you about the crime of being a prohibited person in possession of a firearm. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – The item in question is a firearm.

Two – The accused had possession of the firearm.

Three – The accused is prohibited from possessing firearms.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Firearm

The first element is that the item in question is a firearm. For the purpose of this charge, the item is the [describe relevant item].[1136]

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

There is no dispute that the [describe relevant item] is a firearm. The only issue in this case is whether NOA had possession of it.

[If this element is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

The law states that a firearm is a device which is designed to fire shot, a bullet or other projectile by the expansion of gases produced in the device by the ignition of strongly combustible material or by compressed air or other gases, whether stored in the device in pressurised containers or produced in the device by mechanical means.[1137]

The law also says that it does not matter whether the device is assembled or in parts, or whether it functions or does not function. A firearm remains a firearm even if it is temporarily or permanently inoperable or incomplete.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments about this element.]

Possession

The second element is that the accused had possession of the firearm.

[If the prosecution relies on actual physical possession, add the following shaded section.]

One way the prosecution can prove the accused had possession of the firearm is to show that NOA had personal and physical control of the firearm to the exclusion of anyone else [who did not jointly possess the firearm].

This requires proof that the accused either had the firearm on his/her/their body, or by having it in a place where the accused had the exclusive right to take it, and so able to take it when he/she/they wish.

As part of this, the prosecution must also prove that the accused intended to have the firearm, and knew that it was a firearm.

The prosecution does not need to prove the accused knew the legal definition of a firearm. Instead, they must prove the accused knew the facts which make the item, in law, a firearm. To give you two examples which are not related to this case, a person will not intend to possess a firearm if it has been put into their bag without their knowledge. A person will not know something is a firearm if they think it is an imitation firearm which never has and never will be able to fire bullets.

[1136] If there are multiple charges of this offence, the judge should identify each of the relevant alleged firearms.

[1137] This charge is written on the assumption that the dispute is about whether the device is capable of firing (either in its current form, or if assembled). If the dispute relates to one of the exceptions to the definition of a firearm in paragraphs (c) to (j), then the jury will need to be directed about those exceptions.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments.]

[If the prosecution relies on custody and control, add the following shaded section.]

One way the prosecution can prove the accused had possession of the firearm is to show that NOA had custody or control of the firearm.

This requires proof that the accused has the firearm somewhere they can take it back, whenever they wish.

There are many situations in which a person has something in their custody or control. It includes when a person leaves something with someone else, who will return it on request.

It also includes where the person leaves something in a place where they have access, and intend to retain control over, provided the prosecution also proves the accused either had a right to exclude others from the place, or the place is somewhere others are unlikely to discover the firearm, except by accident. For example, a person might have custody and control over something they have left at their home, or have hidden at their workplace.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments.]

[If the prosecution relies on access, add the following shaded section.]

One way the prosecution can prove the accused had possession of the firearm is to show that NOA had and exercised access to the firearm, whether alone or in common with others.

This requires proof that the accused could access the firearm and did access the firearm.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments.]

[If the prosecution relies on deemed possession from the firearm being on land, add the following shaded section.]

One way the prosecution can prove the accused had possession of the firearm is to show that the firearm was found on land or premises occupied by, in the care of, or under the control or management of the accused. This is because the law says that a person is responsible for firearms that are on their land or in their premises.

The prosecution says that you can find the accused had possession of the firearm on this basis because the firearm was found at [identify location] and the accused [identify accused's relationship with the relevant premises]. You must consider whether the accused had practical control over [identify location]. This requires you to consider whether the accused could control who had access to the premises.

[If there is evidence that the accused was the occupier of multiple premises, add the following darker shaded section.]

When you are considering this issue, you should know that a person can be the occupier of more than one location at the same time. For example, if you own a holiday house and a primary residence, you could be the occupier of both houses, even if you only went to the holiday house a few times a year. Whether you are the occupier of the holiday house while living at your primary residence depends on what you do with the holiday house while you are not there.

Here, you have heard evidence that NOA [identify relevant evidence, e.g. "moved between two different houses"]. For this element, the question is whether the prosecution has proved that NOA occupied, or had the care, control or management of [identify relevant location]. Deciding that NOA occupied [identify location 1] does not answer whether NOA occupied [identify location 2].

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments.]

[If the prosecution relies on deemed possession from the firearm being in a vehicle, add the following shaded section.]

One way the prosecution can prove the accused had possession of the firearm is to show that the firearm was found in a vehicle in which the accused was in charge. This is because the law says that a person is responsible for firearms that are in their car, or in other vehicles which they are in charge of. The law treats the driver as a person who is in charge of a vehicle. Someone other than the driver may also be in charge of the vehicle, if they have practical control of the vehicle and that control suggests they know or are connected to what is in the vehicle. It is a matter of fact and degree for you to decide whether a person is in charge of a vehicle.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments.]

[If the prosecution relies on deemed possession and there is evidence that someone else lawfully possessed the firearm, add the following shaded section.]

Even if you are satisfied that the firearm was found [on the accused's land or premises/in their vehicle], the prosecution must also prove that the firearm was not in the possession of someone else who was lawfully authorised to possess it.

In this case, there is some evidence that [identify third person] lawfully possessed the firearm. The prosecution must therefore prove one of three matters to establish that the accused possessed the firearm and not [identify third person]. First, the prosecution can prove that [identify third person] was not lawfully authorised to possess firearms. Second, the prosecution can prove that [identify third person] did not have the firearm on his/her/their person, or in a place where he/she/they had exclusive right to take it. Third, the prosecution can prove that [identify third person] did not know of the firearm or intend to possess it.

If the prosecution proves any of these three matters beyond reasonable doubt, and proves that the firearm was [on the accused's land or premises/in their vehicle], then the prosecution has proved the second element.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments.]

[If the prosecution relies on deemed possession and there is evidence that the accused reasonably believed that someone else lawfully possessed the firearm, add the following shaded section.]

Even if you are satisfied that the firearm was found [on the accused's land or premises/in their vehicle], the prosecution must also prove that the accused did not believe on reasonable grounds that the firearm was in the possession of someone else who was lawfully authorised to possess it.

In this case, there is some evidence that NOA believed on reasonable grounds that [identify third person] lawfully possessed the firearm. The prosecution must therefore prove one of three matters to establish that the accused possessed the firearm and not [identify third person]. First, the prosecution can prove that NOA did not believe on reasonable grounds that [identify third person] was lawfully authorised to possess firearms. Second, the prosecution can prove that NOA did not believe on reasonable grounds that [identify third person] had the firearm on his/her/their person, or in a place where he/she/they had exclusive right to take it. Third, the prosecution can prove that NOA did not believe on reasonable grounds that [identify third person] knew of the firearm and intended to possess it. For each of these three matters, must prove either that the accused did not personally believe the matter, or the accused did not have reasonable grounds to believe that matter. A person has reasonable grounds to believe something if they have information which could lead a reasonable person to also hold that belief.

If the prosecution proves any of these three matters beyond reasonable doubt, and proves that the firearm was [on the accused's land or premises/in their vehicle], then the prosecution has proved the second element.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments.]

[If the prosecution relies on deemed possession and there is evidence that the accused did not know and could not reasonably be expected to know that the firearm was there, add the following shaded section.]

Even if you are satisfied that the firearm was found [on the accused's land or premises/in their vehicle], the prosecution must also prove that the accused either knew or could reasonably be expected to know that the firearm was [on the premises/in the vehicle]. When deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the accused knew the firearm was there, you must look at NOA's state of mind and state of knowledge. When deciding whether the accused could reasonably be expected to know the firearm was there, you must look at whether a reasonable person could have known of the firearm. You should consider what steps the accused took to be familiar with the [house/car]. Was there anything which should have raised the accused's suspicions? Was the firearm concealed from the accused? You must look at this evidence and make a value judgment about whether you are satisfied that the accused could reasonably be expected to know that the firearm was [on the premises/in the car].

If the prosecution proves that the accused either knew or could reasonably be expected to know that the firearm was [on the premises/in the vehicle], then the prosecution has proved the second element.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments.]

Prohibited Person[1138]

The third element is that the accused is prohibited from possessing firearms. I mention this only as a formality. I told you at the start of the trial that it is an agreed fact that the accused is prohibited from possessing firearms. There are many reasons why a person might be prohibited from possessing firearms, and you must not speculate why the accused is prohibited from possessing firearms.

You must not treat this agreed fact as relevant to your assessment of the evidence in this case, or your assessment of the accused.

While I must tell you this is an element of the offence, there is no dispute about it. As you have heard, the real issue is whether [identify element(s) in dispute].

Summary

To summarise, before you can find the accused guilty of being a prohibited person in possession of a firearm, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that there was a firearm;

Two – that NOA possessed that firearm;

Three – that NOA was prohibited from possessing that firearm.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Last updated: 4 March 2024

[1138] This direction is written on the assumption that the judge will have instructed the jury, at an early point in the trial, that the accused's status as a prohibited person is not in issue.

8 Victorian Defences

8.1 Statutory Self-Defence (From 1/11/14)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Commencement Information

1. Prior to 2005, self-defence in Victoria was governed solely by the common law. This situation was first altered by the passage of the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005, which introduced two statutory self-defence provisions into the Crimes Act 1958: one for use in murder cases (s 9AC) and the other for use in manslaughter cases (s 9AE).
2. The provisions of the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005 commenced operation on 23 November 2005, and applied to offences committed on or after that date (Crimes Act 1958 s 603).
3. The situation was again altered by the passage of the Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014, which introduced a new Part IC into the Crimes Act 1958. Part IC abolishes common law self-defence (s 322N) and sets out a single statutory self-defence provision for all offences (s 322K). It replaces the previous Subdivision (1AA) of Division 1 of Part I of the Act (ss 9AB–9AJ) 'Exceptions to homicide offences'.
4. The provisions of the Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014 commenced operation on 1 November 2014 and apply to all offences alleged to have been committed on or after that date (Crimes Act 1958 s 623).
5. This topic outlines the statutory defence of self-defence introduced by the Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014. For information concerning the statutory provisions relevant to homicide offences alleged to have been committed on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014, see 8.2 Statutory Self-defence (Pre-1/11/14) and Defensive Homicide.

Abolition of Common Law Self-defence

6. Statutory self-defence has replaced the common law defence for all offences (Crimes Act 1958 s 322N). Consequently, common law self-defence is not available when:
    - The accused is charged with any offence alleged to have been committed on or after 1 November 2014.
7. However, common law self-defence will apply when:
    - The accused is charged with an offence other than a homicide offence and which is alleged to have been committed on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014; or
    - The accused is charged with any offence alleged to have been committed before 23 November 2005.
8. See 8.3 Common Law Self-defence for information concerning the common law defence.

Repeal of Murder Self-defence, Defensive Homicide and Manslaughter Self-defence

9. The statutory defences for murder self-defence and manslaughter self-defence, as well as the offence of defensive homicide, were repealed by the Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014.

10. However, these defences (and the alternative offence of defensive homicide) remain relevant when:

    - The accused is charged with a homicide offence alleged to have been committed on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014.

11. See 8.2 Statutory Self-defence (Pre-1/11/14) and Defensive Homicide for more information.

12. The new statutory self-defence provision, along with the abolition of common law self-defence and the repeal of the various homicide self-defence provisions, was implemented to simplify the law. The result is that for all offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1 November 2014 only one test for self-defence will apply, making it easier to explain self-defence to juries and assisting the jury in understanding and applying self-defence (Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Bill 2014, Explanatory Memorandum).

When to Charge the Jury about Self-defence

13. The judge must direct the jury about self-defence if the accused indicates that self-defence is in issue or if the judge considers that there are substantial and compelling reasons to direct the jury about self-defence despite the absence of a request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16). See Directions under Jury Directions Act 2015.

14. In criminal proceedings where self-defence in the context of family violence is in issue, Part 6 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 specifies certain directions that may be given early in the trial. See "Family Violence and Self-defence: Jury Directions" below and Directions under Jury Directions Act 2015.

15. At common law, the judge was required to instruct the jury about self-defence if there was evidence on which a reasonable jury could decide the issue favourably to the accused (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Kear [1997] 2 VR 555; R v Kell & Dey (Ruling No. 1) [2008] VSC 518).

16. The issue of self-defence could be held to arise if there was any evidence from which the jury might infer that the accused acted in self-defence (R v Kear [1997] 2 VR 555; R v Imadonmwonyi [2004] VSC 361).

17. To see if there was any such evidence, a judge could look not only to the direct evidence, but also to whether a circumstantial case could fairly be made out to support the defence (R v Kear [1997] 2 VR 555; R v Imadonmwonyi [2004] VSC 361).

18. At common law, if there was sufficient evidence to raise the possibility of self-defence, the trial judge was required to leave the issue to the jury even if the judge considered the defence to be "weak or tenuous" (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Kear [1997] 2 VR 555; R v Muratovic [1967] Qd R 15; R v Kell & Dey (Ruling No. 1) [2008] VSC 518).

19. If there was sufficient evidence to raise the possibility of self-defence, the judge was required at common law to instruct the jury about it, whether or not the defence was raised by the accused (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Kear [1997] 2 VR 555; R v Kell & Dey (Ruling No. 1) [2008] VSC 518).

20. Where there was sufficient evidence to raise the possibility of self-defence, the judge was required to instruct the jury about it even if the factual basis for the defence was inconsistent with the accused's version of events at trial (R v Kear [1997] 2 VR 555; R v Kell & Dey (Ruling No. 1) [2008] VSC 518).

21. These common law principles may be relevant to the operation of the residual obligation to give directions under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 16, but must be read in light of the whole of Part 3 of the Act (or Part 6 of the Act, for self-defence in the context of family violence).

Onus of Proof

22. Once the question of self-defence is raised by the defence (that is, once the 'evidential onus' is satisfied), the legal onus is on the prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused did not act in self-defence (Crimes Act 1958 s 322I).

23. This is consistent with general common law principles, and the application of the previous statutory self-defence provisions for homicide offences (Babic v R (2010) 28 VR 297; Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; Viro v R (1978) 141 CLR 88; Dziduch v R (1990) 47 A Crim R 378).

Elements of Statutory Self-defence

24. Sections 322K(1)–(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 state:

> (1) A person is not guilty of an offence if the person carries out the conduct constituting the offence in self-defence.
>
> (2) A person carries out conduct in self-defence if-
>
> (a) the person believes that the conduct is necessary in self-defence; and
>
> (b) the conduct is a reasonable response in the circumstances as the person perceives them.

25. It is not for the accused to establish that he or she held the relevant belief and that his or her conduct was a reasonable response in the perceived circumstances. The onus is on the prosecution to disprove this defence (Crimes Act 1958 s 322I).

26. This means that where self-defence arises on the evidence, the accused will be not guilty unless the prosecution proves either:

- That the accused did not believe that the conduct was necessary in self-defence; or
- That the conduct was not a reasonable response in the circumstances as the accused perceived them.

27. Incorporating the onus and standard of proof, this issue may be put to the jury as two questions:

(a) Is there a reasonable possibility that the accused believed that his/her conduct was necessary to defend him/herself?

(b) Is there a reasonable possibility that what the accused did was a reasonable response to the circumstances as s/he perceived them? (R v Katarzynski [2002] NSWSC 613).

28. The accused will be found not guilty unless the jury answer "no" to one of those two questions.

29. Some cases have suggested that there is a separate requirement that the accused carried out his conduct for the purpose of self-defence (see Douglas v R [2005] NSWCCA 419). In most cases, it is not necessary to address this separate requirement. It is suggested that this third requirement should only be raised where it would be open to the jury to find that the accused believed the conduct was necessary in self-defence, but that his/her conduct was not committed as a result of this belief.

30. Circumstances of "family violence" can affect both limbs of the test for self-defence. See "Family Violence" below for further information.

Belief in Necessity

31. The first limb of the test is based on the language used by Wilson, Dawson and Toohey JJ in Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645 and can be treated as equivalent to the first limb of common law self-defence.

32. The first limb is a subjective test. The test is whether the accused believed that the conduct was necessary in self-defence. It does not involve a consideration of what a reasonable or ordinary person would have believed in the circumstances (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; Viro v R (1978) 141 CLR 88; R v Conlon (1993) 69 A Crim R 92 (SC NSW)).

33. For this element to be satisfied, it does not matter if the accused's belief was mistaken, as long as it was genuinely held (R v McKay [1957] VR 560; R v Katarzynski [2002] NSWSC 613; R v Trevenna [2004] NSWCCA 43).

34. If the accused was intoxicated (by alcohol, drugs or any other substances) at the time he or she committed the relevant acts, this can be taken into account when determining whether he or she believed his or her actions to be necessary (R v Conlon (1993) 69 A Crim R 92 (NSWSC); R v Katarzynski [2002] NSWSC 613. See "Intoxication" below for further information).

35. The determination of whether the accused believed that his or her actions were necessary in self-defence incorporates two questions: first, whether the accused believed it was necessary to defend himself or herself at all and, secondly, whether the accused believed it was necessary to respond as he or she did given the threat as s/he perceived it (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645).

36. In determining whether the accused believed that the force used was necessary, consideration should be given to the fact that a person who has reacted instantly to imminent danger cannot be expected to weigh precisely the exact measure of self-defensive action which is required (R v Palmer [1971] AC 814; Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Conlon (1993) 69 A Crim R 92).

37. The proportionality of the accused's response to the harm threatened is just one factor to take into account in determining whether the accused believed that his or her actions were necessary (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259.

38. There is no rule requiring the accused to retreat from an actual or perceived attack rather than defend himself or herself. However, a failure to retreat is a factor to be taken into account in determining whether the accused believed his or her conduct was necessary (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Howe (1958) 100 CLR 448) as well as in determining whether the response to the threat was reasonable – see below 'Reasonable Response'.

39. If the accused acted under the pretence of defending himself or herself to attack another or retaliate for a past attack, then this limb of the test for self-defence will not be met. Factors such as a failure to retreat when possible or a highly disproportionate response might indicate an intention to use the circumstances for aggression or retaliation rather than for self-defence.

40. A person is not entitled to rely on self-defence only if s/he acts while an attack is in progress or immediately threatened. The key issue is whether the accused's perception of danger led him or her to believe that the use of defensive force was necessary (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316).

41. However, what is believed to be necessary in the circumstances may be affected by the lack of immediacy of the threat (R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259).

42. Where a person responds pre-emptively to what he or she perceives to be a threat from a violent partner, expert evidence of "battered woman syndrome" may be admitted. Such evidence can assist the jury to understand that an act committed even when there is no attack underway may be a self-defensive response to a genuinely apprehended threat of imminent danger, sufficient to warrant a pre-emptive strike (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316).

43. More generally, evidence of "family violence" can affect the determination of the accused's belief in necessity in situations where:

- he or she is responding to a harm that is not immediate; and/or
- his or her response involved force in excess of the force involved in the perceived threat. See "Family Violence" below for further information.

44. Unlike common law self-defence, s 322K does not require the accused's belief in necessity to be based on reasonable grounds.

Statutory Self-defence: Murder

45. Section 322K(3) of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that in the case of murder, a person will only be carrying out conduct in self-defence if he or she believes that the conduct is necessary to defend himself or herself or another person from the infliction of death or really serious injury.

46. The statutory defence will fail if the accused did not believe that his or her actions were necessary to defend him or herself or another person from the infliction of death or really serious injury. This provision is similar to the statutory defence of murder self-defence introduced in 2005 by the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005 (see 8.2 Statutory Self-defence (Pre-1/11/14) and Defensive Homicide).

47. However, it differs from common law self-defence, which does not specify the type of harm that must be threatened before a person can raise self-defence. At common law, even if a person defends himself or herself against less serious harm, or acts to protect property or prevent crime, s/he may successfully raise self-defence if the jury finds s/he believed upon reasonable grounds that his or her actions were necessary (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v McKay [1957] VR 560. See also Babic v R (2010) 28 VR 297).

48. The Crimes Act 1958 s 322H defines "really serious injury" as including serious sexual assault for the purposes of Part IC, but otherwise does not define the term.

49. Although it has not yet been determined, it seems likely that "really serious injury" can include psychological injuries as well as physical injuries. It will be for the jury to decide whether the accused was threatened with an "injury", as well as whether that threatened injury was "really serious".

Reasonable Response

50. The prosecution must prove that the conduct was not a reasonable response in the circumstances as the accused perceived them to be (Crimes Act 1958 s 322K(2)(b)).

51. This part of the statutory test is based on laws in other Australian jurisdictions (e.g. s 418(2) of the Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) and s 10.4(2) of the Commonwealth Criminal Code). These provisions have been interpreted by the courts as discussed below.

52. The question of whether the conduct was a 'reasonable response' is an objective test. Although it is an objective test, the reasonableness of the response must be considered in light of the circumstances as subjectively perceived by the accused. The relevant determination is whether there is a reasonable possibility that the accused's conduct was a reasonable response in the circumstances as he or she perceived them (Presidential Security Services of Australia Pty Ltd v Brilley (2008) 73 NSWLR 241; R v Katarzynski [2002] NSWSC 613; R v Trevenna [2004] NSWCCA 43; Oblach v R (2005) 65 NSWLR 75; Crawford v R [2008] NSWCCA 166).

53. This second limb is where the test for self-defence differs from the position at common law, because the accused is not required to have reasonable grounds for his or her belief that it was necessary to act in self-defence. Rather, it is sufficient that the accused genuinely held the belief and that, objectively, his or her response to that belief is reasonable (R v Katarzynski [2002] NSWSC 613; Oblach v R (2005) 65 NSWLR 75).

54. It is up to the jury to decide what to take into account in determining the reasonableness of the accused's response in the circumstances. The jury is assessing the response of the accused (not of a reasonable person), so personal attributes including, for example, the accused's age, gender and state of health as well as the surrounding physical circumstances will be relevant (R v Katarzynski [2002] NSWSC 613. See also R v Forbes [2005] NSWCCA 377; Ward v R [2006] NSWCCA 321).

55. The reasonableness of the response should also be assessed in terms of the objective proportionality of the conduct to the perceived situation (Flanagan v R [2013] NSWCCA 320; see also the report of the Criminal Law Officers' Committee of the Standing Committee of Attorneys-General entitled Model Criminal Code Ch 2: General principles of criminal responsibility: final report (Canberra, AGPS, 1993); Oblach v R (2005) 65 NSWLR 75).

56. Again, while objective proportionality is a consideration under the second limb of the statutory self-defence test, it must be determined, in light of the threat that the accused genuinely believed to exist; that is, against the circumstances as the accused perceived them.

57. More generally, evidence of "family violence" can affect the determination of whether the accused's conduct was a reasonable response in the perceived circumstances where:

    - he or she is responding to a harm that is not immediate; and/or
    - his or her response involved force in excess of the force involved in the perceived threat. See "Family Violence" below for further information.

Defence against Lawful Force

58. Unlike at common law, the statutory defence of self-defence does not apply if the accused is responding to lawful conduct, and knows at the time of his or her response that the conduct is lawful (Crimes Act 1958 s 322L). This provision replicates the previous s 9AF of the Crimes Act 1958 (see 8.2 Statutory Self-defence (Pre-1/11/14) and Defensive Homicide).

59. In applying s 322L, the relevant question is whether a jury could find or consider that there was a reasonable possibility that the other party's conduct was unlawful. This may require the court to consider whether the other party was engaged in self-defence, which may include a pre-emptive strike (DPP v McDowall [2019] VSC 341, [9], [13]–[16]).

Accused as the Initial Aggressor

60. At common law, one of the factors to be taken into account in determining whether the accused was acting in self-defence was whether he or she had been the initial aggressor. However, there was no rule to prevent lawful self-defence when the accused originated the attack, as long as the original aggression had ceased to create a continuing situation of emergency that provoked a lawful counter attack on the accused. Initial aggression by the accused was part of the surrounding circumstances the jury was required to take into account in determining whether the accused was acting in self-defence (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645).

61. Where it is alleged that the accused was the initial aggressor, the jury must consider all the circumstances as perceived by the accused, including, for example, the extent to which the accused declined further conflict, stopped using force, was defeated, faced a disproportionately escalated level of force in response, or attempted to retreat (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259; Ruben Anandan v R [2011] VSCA 413; see also R v Lawson and Forsythe [1986] VR 515 (Ormiston J)).

Defence of Others and Protection of Property

62. Other than for the offence of murder (see "Statutory Self-defence: Murder" above), the statutory test does not set out specific categories of circumstances in which self-defence may be raised. Section 322K includes notes to the effect that a person may be acting in self-defence in the following circumstances:

- The defence of himself/herself or another person;
- The prevention or termination of the unlawful deprivation of the liberty of the person or another person; or
- The protection of property.

63. At common law, 'self-defence' was a general description that could include conduct to defend another person from harm, to prevent the unlawful deprivation of liberty or to protect property (R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259, R v McKay [1957] VR 560).

64. At common law, the defence may also have been available in cases of apprehending a fleeing suspect or to prevent crime (R v McKay [1957] VR 560; R v Turner [1962] VR 30). It remains to be seen whether or how this aspect of self-defence might fit within the statutory test for self-defence in s 322K.

Intoxication

65. At common law, it was possible to take into account the accused's state of intoxication in determining both aspects of the test for common law self-defence (R v Conlon (1993) 69 A Crim R 92 (NSWSC); R v Katarzynski [2002] NSWSC 613).

66. However, s 322T(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 states that:

> If any part of a defence to an offence relies on reasonable response, in determining whether that response was reasonable, regard must be had to the standard of a reasonable person who is not intoxicated.

67. This provision prevents intoxication being taken into account when determining whether the accused's conduct was a reasonable response to the circumstances as he or she perceived them. However, it does not prevent intoxication being taken into account in determining whether the accused believed his or her actions were necessary in self-defence.

68. Section 322T(4) provides an exception for cases in which the intoxication is not self-induced. In such cases regard must be had to the standard of a reasonable person intoxicated to the same extent as the person concerned. See ss 322T(5)–(6) for the definition of "self-induced intoxication".

69. The effect of s 322T is similar to that of the now repealed s 9AJ of the Crimes Act 1958 (see 8.5 Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14)).

Family Violence

70. The Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014 included in the Crimes Act 1958 provisions concerning "family violence". These provisions substantially replicate those introduced into the Crimes Act 1958 by the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005, but are applicable to all offences rather than limited to homicide offences.

71. Section 322J(2) defines family violence "in relation to a person" as "violence against that person by a family member".

72. A person's "family member" is defined broadly in s 322J(2) and includes:

- a person who is or has been married to the person;
- a person who has or has had an intimate personal relationship with the person;
- a person who is or has been the father, mother, step-father or step-mother of the person;
- a child who normally or regularly resides with the person;
- a guardian of the person; and
- another person who is or has been ordinarily a member of the household of the person.

73. "Violence" is also defined broadly in s 322J(2) to mean:

    - physical abuse;
    - sexual abuse;
    - psychological abuse (which need not involve actual or threatened physical or sexual abuse), including but not limited to:
        - intimidation;
        - harassment;
        - damage to property;
        - threats of physical abuse, sexual abuse or psychological abuse;
        - in relation to a child:
            - causing or allowing the child to see or hear the physical, sexual or psychological abuse of a person by a family member; or
            - putting the child, or allowing the child to be put, at real risk of seeing or hearing that abuse occurring.

74. A single act may amount to "abuse" for the purpose of the definition of violence (s 322J(3)). A number of acts that form part of a pattern of behaviour may also amount to "abuse" for that purpose, even though some or all of those acts, when viewed in isolation, may appear to be minor or trivial (s 322J(3)).

75. Section 322M(1) provides that, for the purposes of an offence in circumstances where self-defence in the context of family violence is alleged, a person may believe that their conduct is necessary, and their conduct may be a reasonable response in the circumstances, even if:

    - They are responding to a harm that is not immediate; or
    - Their response involves the use of force in excess of the force involved in the harm or threatened harm.

76. The provisions in s 322M(1) replicate the now repealed s 9AH(1), which clarified existing law in relation to self-defence. As noted above (see "Belief in Necessity"), a person is not required to wait until an attack is in progress or immediately threatened before using defensive force. S/he is entitled to take steps to forestall a threatened attack before it has begun (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316). Similarly, the force used is not required to be precisely proportionate, as long as the accused believed it was necessary (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645) and the conduct was a reasonable response in the circumstances.

77. Sections 322J and 322M(2) state that, in cases involving allegations of family violence, then the following evidence may be relevant in determining whether the accused believed his or her conduct was necessary, or whether the conduct was a reasonable response in the circumstances:

(a) the history of the relationship between the person and a family member, including violence by the family member towards the person or by the person towards the family member or by the family member or the person in relation to any other family member;

(b) the cumulative effect, including psychological effect, on the person or a family member of that violence;

(c) social, cultural or economic factors that impact on the person or a family member who has been affected by family violence;

(d) the general nature and dynamics of relationships affected by family violence, including the possible consequences of separation from the abuser;

(e) the psychological effect of violence on people who are or have been in a relationship affected by family violence;

(f) social or economic factors that impact on people who are or have been in a relationship affected by family violence.

78. See 'Chapter 4: Evidence of Relationship and Family Violence' in the Victorian Law Reform Commission's Defences to Homicide: Final Report for a more detailed discussion of the relationship between self-defence and family violence, and the use which can be made of the evidence outlined above.

Family Violence and Self-defence: Jury Directions

79. The Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014 introduced a new Part 7 into the Jury Directions Act 2013. On 29 June 2015, these provisions were revised and relocated to Part 6 of the Jury Directions Act 2015.

80. Part 3 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 does not apply to Part 6 of the Act.

81. Part 6 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 applies to any trial commencing on or after 29 June 2015, regardless of the date of any alleged offence.

82. For the purposes of Part 6, "family violence" has the same meaning as in s 322J(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 (see "Family Violence" above).

83. The trial judge must give the jury preliminary directions on family violence, in accordance with s 59 of the Jury Directions Act 2015, if the defence counsel or the accused requests such directions, unless there are good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 58). The judge may give the statutory directions if the accused is unrepresented and the judge considers it in the interests of justice to do so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 58(3)).

84. The judge must give the statutory directions on family violence as soon as practicable after the request is made and the judge may give the direction before any evidence is adduced in the trial. The directions may be repeated at any time during the trial (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 58(4)–(5)).

85. The directions must include all of the following (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 59):

(a) self-defence or duress (as the case requires) is, or is likely to be, in issue in the trial; and

(b) as a matter of law, evidence of family violence may be relevant to determining whether the accused acted in self-defence or under duress (as the case requires); and

(c) [...] evidence in the trial is likely to include evidence of family violence committed by the victim against the accused or another person whom the accused was defending [...].

86. The following directions under s 60 may also be sought and, if sought, must be given unless there are good reasons for not doing so:

(a) that family violence–

(i) is not limited to physical abuse and may include sexual abuse and psychological abuse;

(ii) may involve intimidation, harassment and threats of abuse;

(iii) may consist of a single act;

(iv) may consist of separate acts that form part of a pattern of behaviour which can amount to abuse even though some or all of those acts may, when viewed in isolation, appear to be minor or trivial;

(b) if relevant, that experience shows that–

(i) people may react differently to family violence and there is no typical, proper or normal response to family violence;

(ii) it is not uncommon for a person who has been subjected to family violence–

(A) to stay with an abusive partner after the onset of family violence, or to leave and then return to the partner;

(B) not to report family violence to police or seek assistance to stop family violence;

(iii) decisions made by a person subjected to family violence about how to address, respond to or avoid family violence may be influenced by-

(A) family violence itself;

(B) cultural, social, economic and personal factors;

(c) that, as a matter of law, evidence that the accused assaulted the victim on a previous occasion does not mean that the accused could not have been acting in self-defence [...] in relation to the offence charged.

Content of the Charge

87. When directing the jury about self-defence there is no set formula to be used (Collingburn v R (1985) 18 A Crim R 294; Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259).

88. The burden of proof should be made very clear to the jury. They should be told that the accused should only be convicted if the prosecution has proved that he or she did not act in self-defence (Crimes Act 1958 s 322I).

89. One way the judge can do this is by explaining to the jury that they must acquit the accused if the prosecution has not proved that there is:

(a) No reasonable possibility that the accused believed that his/her conduct was necessary to defend him/herself; or

(b) No reasonable possibility that what the accused did was a reasonable response to the circumstances as s/he perceived them (R v Katarzynski [2002] NSWSC 613).

90. The question of self-defence should be placed in its factual setting, and considerations which may assist the jury to reach its conclusion should be identified (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Dziduch (1990) 47 A Crim R 378; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259).

91. The jury should be told to consider all of the circumstances of the case, and that any one factor should be considered within that broader context. This helps ensure that matters of evidence, such as the proportionality of the conduct, are not elevated to rules of law (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Alpagut 27/7/1989 NSWCCA; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259).

92. The judge should offer such assistance by way of comment as is appropriate to the particular case. It will often be desirable to tell the jury to approach the task in a practical manner, giving proper weight to the predicament of the accused, which may have afforded little, if any, opportunity for calm deliberation or detached reflection (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Dziduch (1990) 47 A Crim R 378; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259).

93. The issue of self-defence should be listed with all of the other issues which the prosecution must establish, rather than being dealt with separately (R v Alpagut 27/7/1989 NSWCCA).

Last updated: 27 October 2022

8.1.1 Preliminary Directions: Self-Defence in the Context of Family Violence (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 59, 60)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be given, unless there are good reasons for not doing so, when:

i) the trial commences on or after 29 June 2015, irrespective of the date of any alleged offence, and self-defence in the context of family violence is in issue; and

ii) defence counsel (or the accused, if unrepresented) has requested that the jury be directed on family violence in accordance with s 58 of the Jury Directions Act 2015.

If the accused is unrepresented and does not request a direction on family violence, this charge can be given if it in the interests of justice to do so.

This charge must be given as soon as practicable after a request has been made in terms of s 58 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 and may be given before any evidence is adduced in the trial.

Introduction

In this case, self-defence in the context of family violence [is/is likely to be] in issue. I therefore need to give you some directions about "self-defence" and "family violence".

The law recognises the right of a person to defend himself or herself from attacks or threatened attacks. The law says that a person may act in self-defence if that person:

- believes that their conduct is necessary in self-defence, and
- the conduct is a reasonable response in the circumstances as the person perceives them.

The law recognises that evidence of "family violence" may be relevant in deciding whether the accused acted in self-defence. "Family violence" includes all kinds of physical, sexual and psychological abuse by one family member towards another.

Examples of evidence of family violence include:

- The history of the relationship between family members, including violence by one family member towards any other family member.
- The overall effect of that violence, including any psychological effect, on the person who has been affected by family violence or the other family members.
- Social, cultural or economic factors that impact on the person who has been affected by family violence or the other family members.
- The general nature and dynamics of relationships affected by family violence, including the possible consequences of separation from the abuser.

Evidence in this case is likely to include evidence of family violence committed by the victim against [the accused/another person whom the accused was defending].

Considerations

[All or specified parts of the following shaded section must be included:]

Family violence is not limited to physical abuse and can include sexual abuse and psychological abuse.

Family violence can involve intimidation, harassment and threats of abuse.

Family violence can consist of a single act.

Family violence can also consist of separate acts that form part of a pattern of behaviour. Those separate acts can, when looked at together, amount to abuse even though some or all of those acts may, when looked at separately, appear to be minor or trivial.

Experience shows that people may react differently to family violence and there is no typical, proper or normal response to family violence.

Experience also shows that it is not uncommon for a person who has been subjected to family violence to stay with an abusive partner after the family violence starts, or to leave and then return to the partner, or not to report family violence to police or seek assistance to stop family violence.

Experience also shows that family violence itself and cultural, social, economic and personal factors can influence decisions made by a person who is subjected to family violence about how to address the family violence or how to respond to or avoid it.

The law recognises that if the accused assaulted the victim on a previous occasion that does not mean that the accused could not have been acting in self-defence when he/she [insert relevant conduct].

Last updated: 29 June 2015

8.1.2 Charge: Statutory Self-Defence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be given if there is evidence from which a jury might infer that the accused was acting in self-defence when s/he committed any offence on or after 1 November 2014.

This charge should be given as part of the instruction that the jury must exclude any lawful justification or excuse.

This charge is drafted for use in cases in which the defence has alleged self-defence. It will need to be modified if used in cases where the possibility of self-defence arises on the evidence, but is not alleged by the defence. It will also need to be modified if there is evidence that the accused was acting in defence of another, in defence of property, or to prevent or terminate the unlawful deprivation of liberty.

Introduction

In this case the defence has alleged that NOA was acting in self-defence when s/he [insert relevant act]. I therefore need to give you some directions about "self-defence".

The law recognises the right of a person to defend himself or herself from attacks or threatened attacks. The law says that a person may act in self-defence if the person:

- believes that his or her conduct is necessary in self-defence, and
- the conduct is a reasonable response in the circumstances as the person perceives them.

As long as it is a reasonable response in the circumstances as the person perceives them, a person may do whatever they believe is necessary to defend themselves even if this involves committing what would otherwise be a criminal act.

So, in this case, even if you are satisfied that the prosecution has proven all of the other elements of an offence beyond reasonable doubt, NOA will not be guilty of that offence if s/he acted in self-defence.

The prosecution must therefore prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NAO was not acting in self-defence. It is not for NOA to prove that s/he did act in self-defence.

Elements of Self-defence

There are two possible ways for the prosecution to prove that the accused was not acting in self-defence. I will explain them to you, and then examine some factors you should take into account in making your decision.

No Belief in Necessity

The first way in which the prosecution can prove that NOA was not acting in self-defence is to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that when s/he [insert relevant act], s/he did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself.

This involves assessing the accused's state of mind at the time s/he [insert relevant act]. What threat did s/he believe s/he faced? Did s/he believe it was necessary to react to the threat with force, and to do what s/he did in order to defend him/herself – or was s/he acting for some other purpose, such as [insert relevant example from the evidence and/or arguments, e.g. "to attack another" or "in retaliation for a past attack"]?

In making this assessment, you must consider the circumstances as NOA perceived them to be at the time s/he committed the acts. It does not matter if you think s/he was mistaken about the danger s/he faced, or you believe that s/he overreacted to the threat. The question here is whether the prosecution has proved that NOA did not believe it was necessary to act in the way s/he did, to defend him/herself against the danger s/he thought s/he faced at the time.

In deciding whether NOA believed that his/her conduct was necessary to defend him/herself, you can consider whether it would have been reasonable for him/her to hold that belief in all the circumstances. This is not because the law requires that the belief be reasonable. It does not. The reasonableness of the accused's alleged belief is only a guide to help you decide whether or not the accused really believed that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself.

[If it is alleged that the accused committed murder and the harm the accused allegedly believed s/he faced did not amount to death or really serious injury, add the following shaded section.]

According to the law, a person may only commit what would otherwise be considered murder if s/he believes s/he is responding to a threat of death or really serious injury. If s/he intentionally kills someone in response to what s/he believes is a less serious threat, s/he will be guilty of murder. You must therefore determine whether NOA believed s/he was responding to a threat of death or really serious injury when s/he killed NOV. If the prosecution can prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he did not believe this, then NOA will not be acting in self-defence.

Not a Reasonable Response in the Circumstances

The second way in which the prosecution can prove that NOA was not acting in self-defence is by proving, beyond reasonable doubt, that his/her conduct was not a reasonable response in the circumstances as NOA perceived them to be at the time s/he [insert relevant act].

Again, it does not matter if NOA was mistaken in his/her perception of the circumstances. The prosecution will only succeed if it satisfies you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA's conduct was not a reasonable response in the circumstances, as s/he perceived them to be at the time of the conduct in question.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you either that NOA did not believe it was necessary to act in the way s/he did to defend him/herself, or that that conduct was not a reasonable response, in the circumstances as perceived by NOA, then you must find him/her not guilty of [insert offence].

Considerations

In determining whether NOA acted in self-defence, you must take into account all of the circumstances in which the act occurred. This includes [insert any relevant factors, such as the nature of the perceived threat*, any previous* relationship between the parties, any prior conduct of the victim, or any personal characteristics of the accused that may have affected his or her behaviour, and relate to the facts in issue].

You should also consider the defence's claim that NOA was reacting to a threat. In such circumstances, a person cannot be expected to weigh precisely the exact amount of self-defensive action required. You should not look at the situation with the benefit of hindsight, but instead take into account the fact that calm reflection cannot always be expected in such a situation.

[If it is alleged that the force used was disproportionate to the threat, add the following shaded section. However, if there is evidence of self-defence in the context of family violence, see the shaded section on family violence instead.]

It is for this reason that the law does not require that the force used in self-defence be exactly proportionate to the harm threatened.

However, if you consider that NOA's actions were out of all proportion to the harm threatened, that is one of the factors you can take into account in determining whether s/he believed his/her actions to be necessary in the circumstances. You can also consider this factor in deciding whether the accused's response was reasonable in the circumstances as s/he perceived them.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA's acts were plainly disproportionate to the threat s/he perceived. [Insert evidence and/or arguments.] The defence responded [insert evidence and/or arguments].

[If it is alleged that the accused failed to retreat, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, you have heard evidence that NOA had the opportunity to retreat from the [insert relevant act], but failed to do so.

Although the law does not require a person to retreat from an attack before defending himself or herself, you can take into account a failure to do so when determining whether NOA believed that what s/he was doing was necessary in self-defence.

A failure to retreat is also one of the factors that you can take into account in deciding whether the accused's response was reasonable in the circumstances as s/he perceived them.

[If it is alleged that the accused engaged in a pre-emptive strike, add the following shaded section. However, if there is evidence of self-defence in the context of family violence, see the shaded section on family violence instead.]

In this case, the defence claimed that NOA was acting in self-defence, even though s/he was not being physically attacked at the time s/he [insert relevant act]. The defence claimed that his/her actions were necessary despite the lack of an immediate threat, to defend against [insert relevant evidence].

The law says that a person is not required to wait until an attack is actually in progress before defending himself or herself. S/he is entitled to use whatever force s/he believes is necessary to defend himself or herself against threatened harm, as long as the use of that force was a reasonable response in the circumstances as s/he perceived them.

However, the lack of immediacy of a threat is one of the factors you can take into account in determining what the accused believed to be necessary in the circumstances. You can also consider this factor in deciding whether the accused's response was reasonable in the circumstances as s/he perceived them.

[If it is alleged that the accused was the original aggressor, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, you have heard evidence that it was NOA who started the confrontation with NOV, by [insert relevant evidence]. This may be a significant matter in deciding whether NOA acted in self-defence. A person cannot start an attack, and simply claim that s/he was then defending him/herself from the victim's response to his/her original aggression.

However, when deciding whether NOA believed that his/her actions were necessary, and whether those actions were a reasonable response, you should take into account matters such as [insert relevant factors, such as the extent to which the accused declined further conflict, stopped using force, faced a disproportionately escalated level of force in response, was defeated by the victim, was subjected to a new attack or attempted to retreat].

[If it is alleged that the accused was intoxicated, add the following shaded section.]

In this case you have heard evidence that NOA was intoxicated at the time that s/he [insert relevant act]. If you find that s/he was intoxicated, you may take this into account when assessing whether s/he believed it was necessary to act in the way s/he did and in assessing the circumstances as NOA perceived them. This is because these issues include an assessment of NOA's state of mind, including his/her state of intoxication.

However, if you find that s/he was intoxicated, you must not take this into account when assessing whether his/her conduct was a reasonable response in the circumstances as NOA perceived them. The law requires you to consider what the reasonable response of a person who was not intoxicated would have been, in the circumstances as perceived by the accused.[1139]

[If there is evidence of family violence involving the accused and the victim, add the following shaded section. If the existence or extent of family violence is in issue, this direction will need to be modified to account for the prosecution's onus of disproving the reasonable possibility that the accused had been subject to family violence.[1140]]

In this case you have heard evidence of what is called "family violence" between NOA and NOV. [Insert

[1139] This direction will need to be modified if the intoxication is not self–induced. Model charges are available from 8.5.1 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (Self–induced) or 8.5.2 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (self–induced contested), as relevant.

[1140] For criminal proceedings where self-defence in the context of family violence is in issue, s 59 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 applies and certain preliminary directions may need to be given to the jury. See 8.1.1 Preliminary Directions: Self-defence in the Context of Family Violence (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 59, 60).

evidence and/or arguments.]

The law says that where the accused has [insert relevant act] in circumstances where family violence is alleged, the accused may believe that his/her conduct was necessary to defend him/herself, and the conduct may be a reasonable response in the circumstances, even if:

- [If relevant] s/he is responding to a harm that is not immediate;
- [If relevant] his/her response involves the use of force in excess of the force involved in the harm or threatened harm.

This does not mean that a person who has suffered family violence may use any level of force in any circumstances. A person who has suffered family violence will still be guilty of [insert the offence charged] if s/he did not believe that it was necessary to act in the way s/he did, or if the conduct was not a reasonable response in the circumstances as s/he perceived them to be.

However, the law recognises that in determining whether a person was defending him/herself from "family violence", it is not a simple matter of determining whether [an attack was in progress at the time the accused acted/the accused's response was proportionate to the threatened harm]. Such cases are complicated, and require you to consider all of the evidence, including evidence of:

[Where there is evidence of one or more of the following matters (listed in Crimes Act 1958 s 322J(1), the judge should identify the evidence and relate it to the facts in issue:

(a) The history of the relationship between the person and a family member, including violence by the family member towards the person or by the person towards the family member or by the family member or the person in relation to any other family member;

(b) The cumulative effect, including psychological effect, on the person or a family member of that violence;

(c) Social, cultural or economic factors that impact on the person or a family member who has been affected by family violence*;*

(d) The general nature and dynamics of relationships affected by family violence, including the possible consequences of separation from the abuser;

(e) The psychological effect of violence on people who are or have been in a relationship affected by family violence;

(f) Social or economic factors that impact on people who are or have been in a relationship affected by family violence.]

In this case, the defence has submitted that NOA was acting defensively when s/he [insert relevant act and arguments]. The prosecution denied this was the case, alleging [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Summary

To summarise this element, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA either:

- Did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself; or
- The conduct was not a reasonable response in the circumstances as perceived by NOA.

Last updated: 1 November 2014

8.1.3 Checklist: Statutory Self-Defence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used if there is evidence from which a jury might infer that the accused was acting in self-defence when s/he committed any offence on or after 1 November 2014.

The checklist is designed for use where it is alleged that the accused believed it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself. It will need to be modified if it is alleged that the accused was acting in defence of another, in defence of property, or to prevent or terminate the unlawful deprivation of liberty.

It is designed to be used together with a checklist outlining the elements of the relevant offence. Details of that offence will need to be inserted in the appropriate places.

In addition to proving all of the elements of [insert offence], the prosecution must also prove that the accused did not act in self-defence. This requires the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that when the acts said to constitute the offence were committed, either:

1. The accused did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself; or
2. The accused's conduct was not a reasonable response in the circumstances as s/he perceived them.

Belief in Necessity

1. Has the prosecution proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself, at the time s/he committed the relevant acts?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of [insert offence] (as long as you are satisfied that the prosecution has also proven all of the elements of that offence beyond reasonable doubt)

If No, then go to Question 2

Reasonable Response in the Circumstances

2. Has the prosecution proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused's conduct was not a reasonable response in the circumstances as NOA perceived them?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of [insert offence] (as long as you are satisfied that the prosecution has also proven all of the elements of that offence beyond reasonable doubt)

If No, then the accused acted in self-defence and is not guilty of [insert offence] (as long as you also answered No to Question 1)

Last updated: 1 November 2014

8.2 Statutory Self-Defence (Pre-1/11/14) and Defensive Homicide

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Commencement and Repeal Information

1. Prior to 2005, self-defence in Victoria was governed solely by the common law. This situation was altered by the passage of the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005, which introduced two statutory self-defence provisions into the Crimes Act 1958: one for use in murder cases (s 9AC) and the other for use in manslaughter cases (s 9AE). The Act also introduced a new offence of "Defensive Homicide" (s 9AD).
2. The provisions of the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005 commenced operation on 23 November 2005, and apply to offences committed on or after that date (Crimes Act 1958 s 603).
3. If the date of the victim's death differs from the date on which the actus reus was committed, the relevant date for determining whether the provisions of the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005 apply is the date of death (R v Gould (2007) 17 VR 393; [2007] VSC 420).
4. Subdivision (1AA) of Division 1 of Part I of the Crimes Act 1958 (which includes ss 9AC, 9AD and 9AE) was repealed by the Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014 on 1 November 2014.
5. This topic therefore applies only to offences committed between 23 November 2005 and 1 November 2014. For self-defence cases in which the offence is alleged to have been committed on or after 1 November 2014, see 8.1 Statutory Self-defence (From 1/11/14).

Application of Statutory Provisions

6. Although Crimes Act 1958 s 9AB states that the statutory self-defence provisions only apply to the "relevant offences" of murder, manslaughter or defensive homicide, it has been held that they also apply to attempted murder (R v Pepper (2007) 16 VR 637; [2007] VSC 234; DPP v McAllister [2007] VSC 315).

Replacement of Common Law Self-defence

7. Where it applies, this statutory defence has replaced the common law defence (Babic v R (2010) 28 VR 297; [2010] VSCA 198). Consequently, common law self-defence is not available when:
    - The accused is charged with murder, manslaughter, defensive homicide, attempted murder or attempted defensive homicide; and
    - It is alleged that the death occurred on or after 23 November 2005.
8. However, common law self-defence may be raised when:
    - The accused is charged with an offence other than the homicide offences listed above, and such offence was alleged to have been committed before 1 November 2014; or
    - The accused is charged with one of those homicide offences listed above, and such offence, was alleged to have been committed before 23 November 2005.
9. See 8.3 Common Law Self-defence for information concerning the common law defence.

When to Charge the Jury about Self-defence

10. The judge must direct the jury about self-defence if the accused indicates that self-defence is in issue or if the judge considers that there are substantial and compelling reasons to direct the jury about self-defence in the absence of a request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16). See Directions under Jury Directions Act 2015.
11. At common law, the judge was required to instruct the jury about self-defence if there was evidence on which a reasonable jury could decide the issue favourably to the accused (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Kear [1997] 2 VR 555; R v Kell & Dey (Ruling No. 1) [2008] VSC 518).

12. The issue of self-defence could be held to arise if there was any evidence from which the jury might infer that the accused acted in self-defence (R v Kear [1997] 2 VR 555; R v Imadonmwonyi [2004] VSC 361).

13. To see if there was any such evidence, a judge could look not only to the direct evidence, but also to whether a circumstantial case could fairly be made out to support the defence (R v Kear [1997] 2 VR 555; R v Imadonmwonyi [2004] VSC 361).

14. At common law, if there was sufficient evidence to raise the possibility of self-defence, the trial judge was required to leave the issue to the jury even if the judge considered the defence to be "weak or tenuous" (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Kear [1997] 2 VR 555; R v Muratovic [1967] Qd R 15; R v Kell & Dey (Ruling No. 1) [2008] VSC 518).

15. If there was sufficient evidence to raise the possibility of self-defence, the judge was required at common law to instruct the jury about it, whether or not the defence is raised by the accused (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Kear [1997] 2 VR 555; R v Kell & Dey (Ruling No. 1) [2008] VSC 518).

16. Where there was sufficient evidence to raise the possibility of self-defence, the judge was required to instruct the jury about it even if the factual basis for the defence was inconsistent with the accused's version of events at trial (R v Kear [1997] 2 VR 555; R v Kell & Dey (Ruling No. 1) [2008] VSC 518).

17. These common law principles may be relevant to the operation of the residual obligation to give directions under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 16, but must be read in light of the whole of Part 3 of the Act.

Onus of Proof

18. Once the question of self-defence is put in issue, the onus is on the prosecution to prove that the accused did not act in self-defence (Babic v R (2010) 28 VR 297; [2010] VSCA 198; Zecevicv Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; Virov R (1978) 141 CLR 88; Dziduch v R (1990) 47 A Crim R 378).

Murder Self-defence

19. Section 9AC provides that a person is not guilty of murder if he or she carries out conduct that would otherwise constitute murder "while believing the conduct to be necessary to defend himself or herself or another person from the infliction of death or really serious injury."

20. Although this provision appears to suggest that it is for the accused to establish that he or she held the relevant belief, this is not the case. The onus is on the prosecution to prove that the accused did not hold such a belief (Babic v R (2010) 28 VR 297; [2010] VSCA 198).

21. The accused will therefore not be guilty of murder if the jury:

    - Finds that the accused believed that it was necessary to do what he or she did to defend him or herself or another person from death or really serious injury; or
    - Is not satisfied that the prosecution has proven beyond reasonable doubt that the accused did not have such a belief (Babic v R (2010) 28 VR 297; [2010] VSCA 198).

22. Unlike common law self-defence (see 8.3 Common Law Self-defence), section 9AC does not require the accused's belief to have been based on reasonable grounds. It is a purely subjective test that focuses on the belief of the accused (Babic v R (2010) 28 VR 297; [2010] VSCA 198; R v Carrington (2007) 16 VR 694; [2007] VSC 422).

23. This means that even if the prosecution can prove that the accused's belief in the necessity of his or her action was unreasonable in the circumstances, if the accused genuinely held that belief he or she must not be convicted of murder. However, he or she may be convicted of defensive homicide (see "Defensive Homicide" below).

24. The statutory defence will fail if the accused did not believe that his or her actions were necessary to defend him or herself or another person from the infliction of death or really serious injury. This also differs from common law self-defence, which does not specify the type of harm that must be threatened before a person can raise self-defence. At common law, even if people defend themselves against less serious harm, or act to protect property or prevent crime, they may successfully raise self-defence if the jury finds they believed upon reasonable grounds that their actions were necessary (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v McKay [1957] VR 560. See also Babic v R (2010) 28 VR 297; [2010] VSCA 198).

25. The Crimes Act does not define "really serious injury" for the purposes of s 9AC. Although it has not been determined, it seems likely that it can include psychological injuries as well as physical injuries. It will be for the jury to decide whether what the accused was threatened with was an "injury", as well as whether that threatened injury was "really serious".

26. As s 9AC involves a purely subjective test, the jury should not consider what a reasonable or ordinary person would have believed in the circumstances, but what the accused believed (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; Virov R (1978) 141 CLR 88; R v Conlon (1993) 69 A Crim R 92 (SC NSW)).

27. It does not matter if the accused's belief was mistaken, as long as it was genuinely held (R v McKay [1957] VR 560).

28. If the accused was intoxicated at the time he or she committed the relevant acts, this can be taken into account when determining whether he or she believed his or her actions to be necessary (R v Conlon (1993) 69 A Crim R 92 (NSWSC); R v Katarzynski [2002] NSWSC 613. See "Intoxication" below for further information).

29. The determination of whether the accused believed that his or her actions were necessary incorporates two questions: first, whether the accused believed it was necessary to defend himself or herself at all and, secondly, whether the accused believed it was necessary to respond as he or she did given the threat as s/he perceived it (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645).

30. In determining whether the accused believed that the force used was necessary, consideration should be given to the fact that a person who has reacted instantly to imminent danger cannot be expected to weigh precisely the exact measure of self-defensive action which is required (R v Palmer [1971] AC 814; Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Conlon (1993) 69 A Crim R 92).

31. The proportionality of the accused's response to the harm threatened is just one factor to take into account in determining whether the accused believed that his or her actions were necessary (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259; [2004] VSCA 178; R v Carrington (2007) 16 VR 694; [2007] VSC 422).

32. There is no rule requiring the accused to retreat from an attack rather than defend himself or herself. However, a failure to retreat is a factor to be taken into account in determining whether the accused believed that what was done was necessary (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Howe (1958) 100 CLR 448).

33. If the accused acted under the pretence of defending himself or herself to attack another or retaliate for a past attack, then the test for self-defence will not be met. Factors such as a failure to retreat when possible or a highly disproportionate response might indicate an intention to use the circumstances for aggression or retaliation rather than for self-defence.

34. Circumstances of "family violence" can affect the accused's determination of what is necessary (s 9AH). See "Family Violence" below for further information.

Defensive Homicide

Warning: The offence of defensive homicide is only available for conduct that occurred between 20 November 2005 and 1 November 2014. The offence of defensive homicide is not available outside that period.

35. As noted above, the "reasonableness" of the accused's belief in the necessity of his or her actions is not taken into account when determining whether he or she acted in self-defence. The focus is solely on whether the accused believed his or her actions were necessary (s 9AC).

36. However, Crimes Act 1958 s 9AD states that a person who kills in circumstances that, but for s 9AC, would constitute murder will be guilty of the indictable offence of "defensive homicide" if he or she did not have reasonable grounds for his or her belief.

37. Sections 9AC and 9AD therefore create a scheme whereby people who kill in circumstances that would ordinarily constitute murder will not be convicted of murder if they genuinely, but unreasonably, believed their actions were necessary (or if the prosecution cannot disprove such a belief). However, they remain criminally responsible (though to a lesser extent) if the jury finds that the accused's belief was not based on reasonable grounds.

38. Although s 9AD refers to the accused's "belief" in the necessity of his or her actions, that section does not only apply to cases where the jury positively finds that the accused believed that his or her actions were necessary. It also applies to cases where the prosecution fails to persuade the jury beyond reasonable doubt that the accused did not have such a belief (Babic v R (2010) 28 VR 297; [2010] VSCA 198).

39. In such cases, the jury must focus on the accused's asserted belief. To convict the accused of defensive homicide, they must find that, if the accused believed his or her actions were necessary to defend himself or herself or another person from the infliction of death or really serious injury, that belief was not held on reasonable grounds (Babic v R (2010) 28 VR 297; [2010] VSCA 198).

40. This element does not require the jury to determine whether the accused acted unreasonably in the circumstances. It requires the jury to determine whether there were no reasonable grounds for the accused's belief that it was necessary to do what he or she did (R v Hendy [2008] VSCA 231).

41. This is not a test about what the hypothetical "reasonable person" might have believed in the circumstances, but about whether the accused had no reasonable grounds for his or her belief, in the circumstances as he or she perceived them to be (R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259; [2004] VSCA 178; Virov R (1978) 141 CLR 88).

42. The accused's belief will not have been based on reasonable grounds if it was not a belief which the accused might reasonably have held in all the circumstances (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Wills [1983] 2 VR 201).

43. In determining whether the accused's belief was not based on reasonable grounds, the jury may take into account the following matters:

    - The surrounding circumstances (R v Wills [1983] 2 VR 201);
    - All of the facts within the accused's knowledge (R v Wills [1983] 2 VR 201);
    - The relationship between the parties involved (R v Hector [1953] VLR 543);
    - The prior conduct of the victim (R v Besim [2004] VSC 169);
    - Circumstances of family violence (s 9AH – see "Family Violence" below);
    - The personal characteristics of the accused, such as:

- Any deluded beliefs he or she held (Grosser v R (1999) 73 SASR 584; R v Walsh (1991) 60 A Crim R 419 (Tas SC));
- Any excitement, affront or distress he or she was experiencing (R v Wills [1983] 2 VR 201);

- The proportionality of the accused's response (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259; [2004] VSCA 178);
- The accused's failure to retreat (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Howe (1958) 100 CLR 448).

44. The accused's intoxication should not be taken into account in determining whether his or her belief was based on reasonable grounds, unless it was not self-induced (s 9AJ. See "Intoxication" below for further information).

Manslaughter Self-defence

45. Section 9AE provides that a person is not guilty of manslaughter if:

> he or she carries out the conduct that would otherwise constitute manslaughter while believing the conduct to be necessary –
>
> (a) to defend himself or herself or another person; or
>
> (b) to prevent or terminate the unlawful deprivation of his or her liberty or the liberty of another person –
>
> and he or she had reasonable grounds for that belief.

46. This provision substantially replicates the common law of self-defence, in that it involves both a subjective element (a belief by the accused that what he or she was doing was necessary) and an objective element (that the belief was based on reasonable grounds). See "Murder Self-defence" above for a discussion of the subjective element, and "Defensive Homicide" above for a discussion of the objective element.

47. However, unlike at common law, s 9AE restricts self-defence in the case of manslaughter to situations where people act to defend themselves or other people, or to prevent or terminate the unlawful deprivation of their liberty or the liberty of other people. It does not allow defensive force to be used for the protection of property or the prevention of other crimes (cf. R v McKay [1957] VR 560).

48. As the test for manslaughter self-defence differs from the test for murder self-defence, in murder cases that raise the possibility of a manslaughter verdict, it will be necessary to charge the jury separately about the requirements of each. See "Procedure for Charging the Jury about Statutory Self-defence" below.

Attempts

49. Where the offence of attempted murder is alleged to have been committed on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014, the statutory self-defence provisions in Subdivision (1AA) of Division 1 of Part I apply (R v Pepper (2007) 16 VR 637; [2007] VSC 234; DPP v McAllister [2007] VSC 315; R v Carrington (2007) 16 VR 694; [2007] VSC 422).

50. Where the charge is attempted murder, and the issue of self-defence arises, the alternative verdict of attempted defensive homicide can be left to the jury (R v Pepper (2007) 16 VR 637; [2007] VSC 234; DPP v McAllister [2007] VSC 315; R v Carrington (2007) 16 VR 694; [2007] VSC 422; but compare DPP v Ayyad (2014) 44 VR 346; [2014] VSC 629).

51. If the accused is charged with another offence, such as intentionally causing serious injury, in addition to attempted murder or attempted defensive homicide, it will be necessary to give multiple directions about self-defence. The jury will need to be charged about statutory self-defence in relation to the attempted murder or attempted defensive homicide charges, and common law self-defence in relation to any other charges (R v Pepper (2007) 16 VR 637; [2007] VSC 234; DPP v McAllister [2007] VSC 315).

52. In such cases, a judge should consider how to accommodate the fact that the jury will be required to consider the less serious charge of attempted defensive homicide (maximum penalty level 4 imprisonment) before the more serious charge of intentionally causing serious injury (maximum penalty level 3 imprisonment) (R v Pepper (2007) 16 VR 637; [2007] VSC 234. See R v Carrington (2007) 16 VR 694; [2007] VSC 422 for an example of how the jury may be directed).

Defence against Lawful Force

53. Unlike at common law, the statutory defences of murder self-defence (s 9AC) and manslaughter self-defence (s 9AE) do not apply if the accused is responding to lawful conduct, and knows at the time of his or her response that the conduct is lawful (s 9AF).

54. In applying s 9AF, the relevant question is whether a jury could find or consider that there was a reasonable possibility that the other party's conduct was unlawful. This may require the court to consider whether the other party was engaged in self-defence, which may include a pre-emptive strike (DPP v McDowall [2019] VSC 341, [9], [13]–[16]).

Accused as the Initial Aggressor

55. At common law, one of the factors to be taken into account in determining whether the accused was acting in self-defence was whether he or she had been the initial aggressor. However, there was no rule to prevent lawful self-defence when the accused originated the attack, as long as the original aggression had ceased to create a continuing situation of emergency that provoked a lawful counter attack on the accused. Initial aggression by the accused was part of the surrounding circumstances the jury was required to take into account in determining whether the accused believed it was necessary to act in self-defence or whether there were reasonable grounds for that belief (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645).

56. Where it is alleged that the accused was the initial aggressor, the jury must consider all the circumstances as perceived by the accused, including, for example, the extent to which the accused declined further conflict, stopped using force, was defeated, faced a disproportionately escalated level of force in response, or attempted to retreat (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259; [2004] VSCA 178; Ruben Anandan v R [2011] VSCA 413; see also R v Lawson and Forsythe [1986] VR 515 (Ormiston J))

Intoxication

57. At common law, it is possible to take into account the accused's state of intoxication in determining whether the accused believed his or her actions were necessary, as well as in determining whether that belief was based on reasonable grounds (R v Conlon (1993) 69 A Crim R 92 (NSWSC); R v Katarzynski [2002] NSWSC 613).

58. However, s 9AJ(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 states that:

> If any part of an element of a relevant offence, or of a defence to a relevant offence, relies on a person having reasonable grounds for a belief, in determining whether those reasonable grounds existed, regard must be had to the standard of a reasonable person who is not intoxicated.

59. A "relevant offence" for the purpose of this provision is defined as murder, manslaughter or defensive homicide (s 9AB).

60. The effect of this provision is to prevent intoxication being taken into account in homicide cases when determining whether the accused had reasonable grounds for believing in the necessity of his or her actions. It does not, however, prevent intoxication being taken into account in determining whether the accused believed his or her actions were necessary in self-defence.

61. Section 9AJ(4) provides an exception for cases in which the intoxication is not self-induced. In such cases regard must be had to the standard of a reasonable person intoxicated to the same extent as the person concerned. See ss 9AJ(5) and (6) for the definition of "self-induced intoxication".

62. For more information, see 8.5 Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14) (23/11/05–31/10/14).

Use of Pre-emptive Force

63. People are not only entitled to rely on self-defence if they act whilst an attack is in progress or immediately threatened. They are entitled to take steps to forestall a threatened attack before it has begun (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316; Virov R (1978) 141 CLR 88; R v Lane [1983] 2 VR 449; R v Conlon (1993) 69 A Crim R 92).

64. The key issue is not whether an attack was imminent or immediately threatened, but whether the accused's perception of danger led him or her to believe that the use of defensive force was necessary, and (in the case of manslaughter or defensive homicide) whether there were reasonable grounds for such a belief (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316).

65. However, what is believed to be necessary in the circumstances, and whether there were reasonable grounds for such a belief, may be affected by the lack of immediacy of the threat, although this will not necessarily be the case (R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259; [2004] VSCA 178).

66. Where a person responds pre-emptively to what he or she perceives to be a threat from a violent partner, expert evidence of "battered woman syndrome" may be admitted. Such evidence can assist the jury to understand that an act committed when there is no actual attack underway may be a self-defensive response to a genuinely apprehended threat of imminent danger, sufficient to warrant a pre-emptive strike (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316. See also "Family Violence" below).

Family Violence

67. The Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005 introduced into the Crimes Act 1958 a new provision concerning homicide cases involving allegations of "family violence" (s 9AH). This is defined in s 9AH(4) to mean "violence" against a person by a "family member".

68. "Family member" is defined broadly in s 9AH(4), and includes:

- a person who is or has been married to the person;
- a person who has or has had an intimate personal relationship with the person;
- a person who is or has been the father, mother, step-father or step-mother of the person;
- a child who normally or regularly resides with the person;
- a guardian of the person; and
- another person who is or has been ordinarily a member of the household of the person.

69. "Violence" is also defined broadly in s 9AH(4) to mean:

- physical abuse;
- sexual abuse;
- psychological abuse (which need not involve actual or threatened physical or sexual abuse), including but not limited to:

- intimidation;
- harassment;
- damage to property;
- threats of physical abuse, sexual abuse or psychological abuse;
- in relation to a child:
    - causing or allowing the child to see or hear the physical, sexual or psychological abuse of a person by a family member; or
    - putting the child, or allowing the child to be put, at real risk of seeing or hearing that abuse occurring.

70. A single act may amount to "abuse" for the purpose of the definition of violence (s 9AH(5)(a)). A number of acts that form part of a pattern of behaviour may also amount to "abuse", even though some or all of those acts, when viewed in isolation, may appear to be minor or trivial (s 9AH(5)(b)).

71. Section 9AH(1) provides that, for cases of murder, defensive homicide or manslaughter committed in circumstances where family violence is alleged, people may believe, and may have reasonable grounds for believing, that their conduct is necessary, even if:
    - They are responding to a harm that is not immediate; or
    - Their response involves the use of force in excess of the force involved in the harm or threatened harm.

72. The provisions in s 9AH(1) clarify what is already the law in relation to self-defence. As noted above (see "Use of Pre-emptive Force"), people are not required to wait until an attack is in progress or immediately threatened before using defensive force. They are entitled to take steps to forestall a threatened attack before it has begun (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316). Similarly, disproportionate force may be used, as long as the accused believed it was necessary, and (in the case of defensive homicide or manslaughter) there were reasonable grounds for such a belief (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645).

73. Sections 9AH(2) and (3) state that, in cases involving allegations of family violence, the following evidence may be relevant in determining whether the accused believed his or her conduct to be necessary, or had reasonable grounds for believing his or her conduct to be necessary:

    (a) the history of the relationship between the person and a family member, including violence by the family member towards the person or by the person towards the family member or by the family member or the person in relation to any other family member;

    (b) the cumulative effect, including psychological effect, on the person or a family member of that violence;

    (c) social, cultural or economic factors that impact on the person or a family member who has been affected by family violence;

    (d) the general nature and dynamics of relationships affected by family violence, including the possible consequences of separation from the abuser;

    (e) the psychological effect of violence on people who are or have been in a relationship affected by family violence;

    (f) social or economic factors that impact on people who are or have been in a relationship affected by family violence.

74. If such evidence is given, the judge will need to explain to the jury its relevance to the facts in issue. This will differ, depending on the area under consideration:

- In cases of murder self-defence (s 9AC), the judge will need to explain the way in which family violence may affect the accused's belief about what actions were necessary to defend himself or herself.
- In cases of defensive homicide (s 9AD), the judge will need to explain the way in which family violence may affect the reasonableness of the accused's belief.
- In cases of manslaughter self-defence (s 9AE), the judge will need to explain the way in which family violence may affect the accused's belief about what actions were necessary to defend himself or herself, as well as the way in which it may affect the reasonableness of the grounds for that belief.

75. See 'Chapter 4: Evidence of Relationship and Family Violence' in the Victorian Law Reform Commission's Defences to Homicide: Final Report for a more detailed discussion of the relationship between self-defence and family violence, and the use which can be made of the evidence outlined above.

Family Violence and Self-defence

76. The Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014 introduced a new Part 7 into the Jury Directions Act 2013. On 29 June 2015, these provisions were revised and relocated to Part 6 of the Jury Directions Act 2015.

77. Part 3 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 does not apply to Part 6 of the Act.

78. Part 6 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 applies to any trial commencing on or after 29 June 2015, regardless of the date of any alleged offence.

79. For the purposes of Part 6, "family violence" has the same meaning as in s 322J(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 (which replicates the previous definition in s 9AH, see "Family Violence" above).

80. The trial judge must give the jury preliminary directions on family violence, in accordance with s 59 of the Jury Directions Act 2015, if the defence counsel or the accused requests such directions, unless there are good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 58). And the judge may give them if the accused is unrepresented and the judge considers it in the interests of justice to do so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 58(3)).

81. The judge must give the statutory directions on family violence as soon as practicable after the request is made and the judge may give the direction before any evidence is adduced in the trial. The directions may be repeated at any time during the trial (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 58(4)–(5)).

82. The directions must include all of the following (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 59):

> (a) self-defence or duress (as the case requires) is, or is likely to be, in issue in the trial; and
>
> (b) as a matter of law, evidence of family violence may be relevant to determining whether the accused acted in self-defence or under duress (as the case requires); and
>
> (c) [...] evidence in the trial is likely to include evidence of family violence committed by the victim against the accused or another person whom the accused was defending [...].

83. The following directions under s 60 may also be sought and, if sought, must be given unless there are good reasons for not doing so:

(a) that family violence–

(i) is not limited to physical abuse and may include sexual abuse and psychological abuse;

(ii) may involve intimidation, harassment and threats of abuse;

(iii) may consist of a single act;

(iv) may consist of separate acts that form part of a pattern of behaviour which can amount to abuse even though some or all of those acts may, when viewed in isolation, appear to be minor or trivial;

(b) if relevant, that experience shows that–

(i) people may react differently to family violence and there is no typical, proper or normal response to family violence;

(ii) it is not uncommon for a person who has been subjected to family violence–

(A) to stay with an abusive partner after the onset of family violence, or to leave and then return to the partner;

(B) not to report family violence to police or seek assistance to stop family violence;

(iii) decisions made by a person subjected to family violence about how to address, respond to or avoid family violence may be influenced by-

(A) family violence itself;

(B) cultural, social, economic and personal factors;

(c) that, as a matter of law, evidence that the accused assaulted the victim on a previous occasion does not mean that the accused could not have been acting in self-defence [...] in relation to the offence charged.

Content of the Charge

84. When directing the jury about self-defence there is no set formula to be used (Collingburn v R (1985) 18 A Crim R 294; Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259; [2004] VSCA 178).

85. The burden of proof should be made very clear to the jury. They should be told that the accused should only be convicted of murder if the prosecution has proved that he or she did not act in self-defence (R v Alpagut 27/7/1989 NSWCCA; R v Dziduch (1990) 47 A Crim R 378; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259; [2004] VSCA 178; Babic v R (2010) 28 VR 297; [2010] VSCA 198).

86. One way the judge can do this is by explaining to the jury that they must acquit the accused of murder (and go on to consider whether he or she is guilty of defensive homicide), if they find either:

(a) That the accused believed it was necessary to do what he or she did to defend him or herself or another person from death or really serious injury; or

(b) That the prosecution has not proven beyond reasonable doubt that the accused did not have such a belief (Babic v R (2010) 28 VR 297; [2010] VSCA 198).

87. The judge may explain to the jury that even if they are not sure that the accused held the requisite belief, they may still convict him or her of defensive homicide. In such a case they must assume that the accused held the belief that he or she said that he or she held. They may only convict him or her of defensive homicide if they are satisfied that the accused had no reasonable grounds for that asserted belief (Babic v R (2010) 28 VR 297; [2010] VSCA 198).

88. When addressing defensive homicide, judges should be careful not to direct the jury that the accused's conduct must have been unreasonable. The focus of the charge must be on the grounds for the accused's belief (see, e.g. R v Hendy [2008] VSCA 231).

89. The question of self-defence should be placed in its factual setting, and considerations which may assist the jury to reach its conclusion should be identified (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Dziduch (1990) 47 A Crim R 378; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259; [2004] VSCA 178).

90. The jury should be told to consider all of the circumstances of the case, and that any one factor should be considered within that broader context. This helps ensure that matters of evidence, such as the proportionality of the force, are not elevated to rules of law (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Alpagut 27/7/1989 NSWCCA; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259; [2004] VSCA 178).

91. The judge should offer such assistance by way of comment as is appropriate to the particular case. It will often be desirable to tell the jury to approach the task in a practical manner, giving proper weight to the predicament of the accused, which may have afforded little, if any, opportunity for calm deliberation or detached reflection (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Dziduch (1990) 47 A Crim R 378; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259; [2004] VSCA 178).

92. The issue of self defence should be listed with all of the other issues which the prosecution must establish, rather than being dealt with separately (R v Alpagut 27/7/1989 NSWCCA).

Procedure for Charging the Jury about Statutory Self-defence

93. In most murder cases alleged to be committed on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014 in which there is evidence that the accused acted in self-defence, it will be necessary to charge the jury about each of the following matters:

    - The other elements of murder;
    - Murder self-defence (s 9AC);
    - Defensive homicide (s 9AD);
    - The elements of manslaughter; and
    - Manslaughter self-defence (s 9AE).

94. To assist the jury to understand the way in which these offences and defences interact, and the fact that there are different tests for self-defence in relation to murder and manslaughter, it is recommended that these matters be addressed in the order outlined above.

Last updated: 27 October 2022

8.2.1 Charge: Murder Self-Defence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be given if it is alleged that the accused committed murder on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014, and there is evidence from which a jury might infer that he or she was acting in self-defence. It should be inserted where indicated in the murder charge.

Murder Self-defence

In this case the defence has alleged that NOA was acting to defend him/herself when s/he killed NOV.[1141] I therefore need to give you some directions about "self-defence".

The law recognises the right of people to defend themselves from attacks or threatened attacks. The law says that people may even commit acts that would otherwise be classified as "murder" if they believe those acts are necessary to defend themselves from being killed or really seriously injured. So in this case, even if you are satisfied that the prosecution has proven all of the other elements of murder beyond reasonable doubt, NOA will not be guilty of that offence if s/he acted in self-defence.

Because the prosecution must prove the accused's guilt, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was not acting in self-defence when s/he killed NOV.It is not for NOA to prove that s/he did act in self-defence.

To prove that the accused was not acting in self-defence, the prosecution must satisfy you, beyond reasonable doubt, that when s/he killed NOV, s/he did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself from the infliction of death or really serious injury.

This involves assessing the accused's state of mind at the time s/he [insert relevant act]. What threat did s/he believe s/he faced? Did s/he believe s/he was defending him/herself from the infliction of death or really serious injury? If so, did s/he believe it was necessary to react to that threat with force, and to react with the level of force used in order to defend him/herself from that harm – or was s/he acting for some other purpose, such as [insert relevant example from the evidence and/or arguments, e.g. "in retaliation for a past attack"]?

[If the harm the accused allegedly believed s/he faced may not amount to death or really serious injury, add the following shaded section.]

According to the law, a person may only commit what would otherwise be considered murder if s/he believes s/he is responding to a threat of death or really serious injury. If s/he intentionally kills someone in response to what s/he believes is a less serious threat, s/he will be guilty of murder. You must therefore determine whether NOA believed s/he was responding to a threat of death or really serious injury when s/he killed NOV. If the prosecution can prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he did not, then this element will be met.

In making this assessment, you must consider the circumstances as NOA perceived them to be at the time s/he killed NOV. It does not matter if you think s/he was mistaken about the danger s/he faced, or if you believe that s/he overreacted to the threat or acted unreasonably. The question here is what NOA believed was necessary in the circumstances. You must determine whether the prosecution has proven that NOA did not believe it was necessary to act in the way s/he did, to defend him/herself against the threat of death or really serious injury that s/he thought s/he faced at the time.

[1141] This charge is drafted for use in cases in which the defence does not deny that the accused killed the victim, but contends that it was done in self-defence. It will need to be modified if used in the following circumstances:

– If self-defence arises on the evidence, but is not alleged by the defence;

– If the defence denies that the accused killed the victim; or – If there is evidence that the accused was acting in defence of another.

It is only if you are satisfied that NOA did not believe s/he was threatened with death or really serious injury, or did not act in the belief that what s/he did was necessary to defend him/herself from that threat, that this element will be satisfied.

Considerations

You must take into account all of the circumstances in which the killing occurred when determining whether NOA believed that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself from the infliction of death or really serious injury. This includes [insert any relevant factors, such as the nature of the perceived threat*, any previous* relationship between the parties, any prior conduct of the victim, or any personal characteristics of the accused that may have affected his or her behaviour, and relate to the facts in issue].

You should also consider the defence's claim that NOA was reacting to an imminent threat. In such circumstances, a person cannot be expected to weigh precisely the exact amount of defensive action required. You should not look at the situation with the benefit of hindsight, but instead take into account the fact that calm reflection cannot always be expected in such a situation.

[If it is alleged that the force used was disproportionate to the threat, add the following shaded section. However, if there is evidence of self-defence in the context of family violence, see the shaded section on family violence instead.]

It is for this reason the law does not require that any defensive force used be exactly proportionate to the harm threatened.

However, if you consider that the accused's actions were out of all proportion to the harm threatened, that is one of the factors you can take into account in determining whether s/he believed his/her actions to be necessary in the circumstances.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA's acts were plainly disproportionate to the threat s/he believed s/he faced. [Insert evidence and/or arguments.] The defence responded [insert evidence and/or arguments].

[If it is alleged that the accused failed to retreat, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, you have heard evidence that NOA had the opportunity to retreat from the [insert relevant act], but failed to do so.

Although the law does not require people to retreat from an attack before defending themselves, you can take into account a failure to do so when determining whether NOA believed that what s/he was doing was necessary in self-defence.

[If it is alleged that the accused engaged in a pre-emptive strike, add the following shaded section. However, if there is evidence of family violence between the accused and the victim, see the shaded section on family violence instead.]

In this case, the defence claimed that NOA was acting in self defence, even though s/he was not being physically attacked at the time s/he [insert relevant act]. The defence claimed that his/her actions were necessary despite the lack of an immediate threat, to defend against [insert relevant evidence].

The law says that people are not required to wait until an attack is actually in progress before defending themselves. They are entitled to use whatever force they believe is necessary to defend themselves from being killed or really seriously injured.

However, the lack of immediacy of a threat is one of the factors you can take into account in determining what the accused believed to be necessary in the circumstances.

[If it is alleged that the accused was intoxicated, add the following shaded section.]

In this case you have heard evidence that NOA was intoxicated at the time that s/he [insert relevant act]. If you find that s/he was intoxicated, you should take this into account when assessing whether s/he believed it was necessary to act in the way s/he did. This is because the issue to be decided is what the accused believed was necessary in all of the circumstances, including his/her state of intoxication.

[If there is evidence of family violence involving the accused and the victim, add the following shaded section if relevant.[1142]]

In this case you have heard evidence of what is called "family violence" between NOA and NOV. [Insert evidence and/or arguments.]

The law says that where a person is killed in circumstances where family violence is alleged, the accused may believe that his/her conduct was necessary to defend him/herself even if:

- [If relevant] s/he is responding to a harm that is not immediate;
- [If relevant] his/her response involves the use of force in excess of the force involved in the harm or threatened harm.

This does not mean that a person who has suffered family violence may use any level of force in any circumstances. A person who has suffered family violence will still be guilty of murder if s/he did not believe that it was necessary to act in the way s/he did.

However, the law recognises that in determining whether a person was defending him/herself from "family violence", it is not a simple matter of determining whether [an attack was in progress at the time the accused acted/the accused's response was proportionate to the threatened harm]. Such cases are complicated, and require you to consider all of the evidence, including evidence of:

[Where there is evidence of one or more of the following matters (listed in Crimes Act 1958 s 9AH(3)), the judge should identify the evidence and relate it to the facts in issue:

(a) The history of the relationship between the person and a family member, including violence by the family member towards the person or by the person towards the family member or by the family member or the person in relation to any other family member;

(b) The cumulative effect, including psychological effect, on the person or a family member of that violence;

(c) Social, cultural or economic factors that impact on the person or a family member who has been affected by family violence;

(d) The general nature and dynamics of relationships affected by family violence, including the possible consequences of separation from the abuser;

(e) The psychological effect of violence on people who are or have been in a relationship affected by family violence;

(f) Social or economic factors that impact on people who are or have been in a relationship affected by family violence.]

In this case, the defence has submitted that NOA was acting defensively when s/he [insert relevant act and arguments]. The prosecution denied this was the case, alleging [insert relevant evidence and/or [1142] If the trial commenced after 1 November 2014, irrespective of the date of the alleged offence, certain preliminary directions may need to be given to the jury. See 8.1.1 Preliminary Directions: Self-defence in the Context of Family Violence (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 59, 60).

arguments].

If, in light of all of the circumstances, you are satisfied that NOA did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself from the infliction of death or really serious injury, then this fourth element will be met.

Summary

[This section should replace point four onwards in the summary to the murder charge.]

- Four – that NOA did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself from the infliction of death or really serious injury.

If you find that these matters have not been proven, then you must find NOA not guilty of murder.

However, a finding that NOA is not guilty of murder is not the end of the matter. If you decide that NOA is not guilty of murder because s/he was acting in self-defence, you must then consider whether s/he is guilty of "defensive homicide". I will now explain that offence to you.

[Insert defensive homicide charge.]

Last updated: 29 June 2015

8.2.2 Charge: Defensive Homicide

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be given if it is alleged that the accused committed murder on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014, and there is evidence from which a jury might infer that he or she was acting in self-defence. It should be given after the charge on murder self-defence.

The charge may be modified for use in cases where the accused has been charged with the offence of defensive homicide.

Introduction

According to the law, people who kill in the belief that what they are doing is necessary to defend themselves from death or really serious injury do not commit murder, even if their belief is unreasonable. However, if they do not have reasonable grounds for believing that what they are doing is necessary in self-defence, they will be guilty of the offence of defensive homicide.

To find the accused guilty of this offence, you must be satisfied that:

- The prosecution have proven the first three elements of murder beyond reasonable doubt, but have failed to prove the fourth. That is, they have failed to prove that NOA did not act in self defence; and
- The prosecution have proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA did not have reasonable grounds for believing that what s/he did was necessary in self-defence.

Reasonable Grounds

In determining whether NOA is guilty of this offence, you must focus on the belief that NOA said s/he had.[1143] That is, you must ask whether or not s/he had reasonable grounds for believing it was necessary to act in the way s/he did, to defend him/herself from death or really serious injury.

In making your determination, you must consider the circumstances as NOA perceived them to be at the time s/he killed NOV. You must determine whether the prosecution has proven that, in those circumstances, there was no reasonable basis for the accused to have believed that it was necessary to act in the way s/he did, in response to the perceived threat.

It does not matter if NOA was mistaken about that threat. The question is whether or not there were reasonable grounds for NOA to believe in the need to respond to the threat in the way s/he did, in the circumstances as s/he perceived them to be.

Considerations

When determining whether the prosecution has proven that NOA had no reasonable grounds for believing his/her actions were necessary, you must again take into account all of the circumstances in which the killing occurred. This includes [insert any relevant factors, such as the nature of the perceived threat*, any previous* relationship between the parties, any prior conduct of the victim, or any personal characteristics of the accused that may have affected his or her behaviour, and relate to the facts in issue].

As was the case in relation to self-defence, you must consider the defence's claim that NOA was reacting to an imminent threat, and could not be expected to weigh precisely the exact amount of defensive action required.

[If it is alleged that the force used was disproportionate to the threat, add the following shaded section. However, if there is evidence of self-defence in the context of family violence, see the shaded section on family violence instead.]

Once again, the law does not require that any defensive force used be exactly proportionate to the harm threatened.

However, if you consider that the accused's actions were out of all proportion to the harm threatened, that is one of the factors you can take into account in determining whether s/he had reasonable grounds for believing his/her actions were necessary to defend him/herself from the threat of death or really serious injury.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA's acts were plainly disproportionate to the threat s/he perceived. [Insert evidence and/or arguments.] The defence responded [insert evidence and/or arguments].

[If it is alleged that the accused failed to retreat, add the following shaded section.]

The evidence that NOA had the opportunity to retreat from the [insert relevant act], but failed to do so, is also relevant to this issue. Although the law does not require people to retreat from an attack before defending themselves, a failure to retreat is one of the factors that you can take into account in deciding whether NOA had reasonable grounds for believing that his/her actions were necessary.

[If it is alleged that the accused engaged in a pre-emptive strike, add the following shaded section. However, if there is evidence of family violence between the accused and the victim, see the shaded section on family violence instead.]

[1143] This charge has been drafted for use in cases where the accused has personally asserted that s/he acted in self-defence. If the issue of self-defence has arisen in another way, it will need to be modified accordingly.

In this case, the defence claimed that NOA was acting in self defence, even though s/he was not being physically attacked at the time s/he [insert relevant act]. The defence said [insert evidence and/or arguments].

As I told you in relation to self defence for murder, people are not required to wait until an attack is actually in progress before defending themselves. They are entitled to use whatever force they believe is necessary to defend themselves from being killed or really seriously injured.

However, the lack of immediacy of a threat is one of the factors you can take into account in determining whether NOA had reasonable grounds for believing that his/her actions were necessary.

[If it is alleged that the accused was intoxicated, add the following shaded section.]

While evidence that NOA was intoxicated at the time that s/he [insert relevant act] was relevant to your determination of whether s/he believed it was necessary to act in the way s/he did, you must not take any intoxication into account in determining whether the accused had reasonable grounds for believing in the necessity of his/her actions.[1144] The law requires you to consider whether a person who was not intoxicated would have had reasonable grounds for believing those actions were necessary, in the circumstances as perceived by the accused.

[If there is evidence of family violence involving the accused and the victim, add the following shaded section if relevant.[1145]]

The evidence of "family violence" between NOA and NOV that I mentioned earlier is also relevant in this context. The law says that where a person is killed in circumstances where family violence is alleged, the accused may have reasonable grounds for believing, that his/her conduct was necessary to defend him/herself even if:

- [If relevant] s/he is responding to a harm that is not immediate;
- [If relevant] his/her response involves the use of force in excess of the force involved in the harm or threatened harm.

I note again that this does not mean that a person who has suffered family violence may use any level of force in any circumstances. A person who has suffered family violence will be guilty of defensive homicide if s/he did not have reasonable grounds for believing that it was necessary to act in the way s/he did.

However, as I mentioned earlier, the law recognises that in determining whether a person was defending him/herself from "family violence", it is not a simple matter of determining whether [an attack was in progress at the time the accused acted/the accused's response was proportionate to the threatened harm]. Such cases are complicated, and require you to consider all of the evidence, including evidence of:

[Where there is evidence of one or more of the following matters (listed in Crimes Act 1958 s 9AH(3)), the judge should identify the evidence and relate it to the facts in issue:

[1144] If it is alleged that the intoxication was not self–induced, this section will need to be modified (see s 9AJ(4)). See Crimes Act 1958 ss 9AJ(5) and (6) for the definition of "self–induced" intoxication. Model charges are available from 8.6.1 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (23/11/05–31/10/14) (Self–induced) or 8.6.2 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (23/11/05–31/10/14) (Self–induced contested), as relevant.

[1145] If the trial commenced after 1 November 2014, irrespective of the date of the alleged offence, certain preliminary directions may need to be given to the jury. See 8.1.1 Preliminary Directions: Self-defence in the Context of Family Violence (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 59, 60).

(a) The history of the relationship between the person and a family member, including violence by the family member towards the person or by the person towards the family member or by the family member or the person in relation to any other family member;

(b) The cumulative effect, including psychological effect, on the person or a family member of that violence;

(c) Social, cultural or economic factors that impact on the person or a family member who has been affected by family violence;

(d) The general nature and dynamics of relationships affected by family violence, including the possible consequences of separation from the abuser;

(e) The psychological effect of violence on people who are or have been in a relationship affected by family violence;

(f) Social or economic factors that impact on people who are or have been in a relationship affected by family violence.]

In this case, the defence has submitted that NOA was acting defensively when s/he [insert relevant act and arguments]. The prosecution denied this was the case, alleging [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Summary

To summarise, to find NOA guilty of defensive homicide:

One – you must be satisfied that the prosecution have proven the first three elements of murder beyond reasonable doubt; and

Two – you must find that the prosecution have failed to prove the fourth element of murder. That is, you must conclude that NOA is not guilty of murder because s/he was acting in self-defence; and

Three – you must be satisfied that the prosecution have proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA did not have reasonable grounds for believing that what s/he did was necessary in self-defence.

If you are not satisfied that this is the case, then you must find NOA not guilty of defensive homicide.

Last updated: 29 June 2015

8.2.3 Checklist: Murder Self-Defence with Manslaughter

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used if it is alleged that the accused committed murder on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014, there is evidence from which a jury might infer that he or she was acting in self-defence, and both criminal negligence and unlawful and dangerous act manslaughter are available as alternative verdicts.[1146]

[1146] This checklist will need to be adapted if reckless murder has been left to the jury – see 7.2.1.2 Checklist: International and Reckless Murder (without Self-defence).

The checklist is designed for use where it is alleged that the accused believed it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself. It will need to be modified if it is alleged that the accused acted to defend another person or to terminate the unlawful deprivation of liberty.

Before you can convict the accused of murder, there are four elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused caused the victim's death; and
2. The accused's acts were conscious, voluntary and deliberate; and
3. The accused intended to kill or cause really serious injury; and
4. The accused did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself from being killed or really seriously injured.

Cause of Death

1. Has the prosecution proved that the accused caused the victim's death?

Consider – Were the accused's actions a substantial or significant cause of the victim's death?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Murder

Conscious, Voluntary and Deliberate Acts

2. Has the prosecution proved that the accused's actions which caused the death were conscious, voluntary and deliberate?

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Murder

Intention

3. Has the prosecution proved that at the time the accused did the acts that caused the victim's death, s/he intended to kill or to cause really serious injury?

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Murder (but may be guilty of Manslaughter – Go to 6)

Self-defence

4. Has the prosecution proved that the accused did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself from being killed or really seriously injured?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Murder (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Murder (but may be guilty of Defensive Homicide – Go to 5)

Defensive Homicide

The offence of defensive homicide should only be considered if you answered "Yes" to Questions 1, 2 and 3 above, and "No" to Question 4.

Before you can convict the accused of defensive homicide, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that:

5. There were no reasonable grounds for the accused to believe that what s/he did was necessary to defend him/herself from being killed or really seriously injured.

Defensive Homicide

5. Has the prosecution proved that there were no reasonable grounds for the accused to believe that what s/he did was necessary to defend him/herself from being killed or really seriously injured?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Defensive Homicide (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3 and No to Question 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Defensive Homicide

Manslaughter

The offence of manslaughter should only be considered if you answered "Yes" to Questions 1 and 2 above, and "No" to Question 3.

Before you can convict the accused of manslaughter, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, either that:

6. The accused committed a criminally negligent act; or

7. The accused committed an unlawful and dangerous act.

The prosecution must also prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that:

8. The accused's act was not committed in self-defence.

Criminal Negligence

6. Has the prosecution proved that the act which caused the victim's death was committed in circumstances which involved such a great falling short of the standard of care that a reasonable person would have exercised, and involved such a high risk of causing death or really serious injury, that it deserves to be criminally punished?

If Yes, then go to 8a

If No, then go 7a

Unlawful and Dangerous Act

7a. Has the prosecution proved that the accused intended to commit the act that caused the victim's death?

If Yes, then go to 7b

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

7b. Has the prosecution proved that the accused's act that caused the victim's death was unlawful?

If Yes, then go to 7c

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

7c. Has the prosecution proved that the accused's act that caused the victim's death was dangerous?

Consider – Would a reasonable person consider that an act of that kind would expose another person or other people to an appreciable risk of serious injury?

If Yes, then go to 8a

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

Self-defence

8a. Has the prosecution proved that the accused did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Manslaughter (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2 and either 6 or 7(a, b and c))

If No, then go to 8b

8b. Has the prosecution proved that there were no reasonable grounds for the accused to believe that what s/he did was necessary to defend him/herself?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Manslaughter (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2 and either 6 or 7(a, b and c))

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

Last updated: 1 November 2014

8.2.4 Checklist: Murder Self-Defence with Criminal Negligence Manslaughter

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used if it is alleged that the accused committed murder on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014, there is evidence from which a jury might infer that he or she was acting in self-defence, and criminal negligence manslaughter is available as an alternative verdict.[1147]

The checklist is designed for use where it is alleged that the accused believed it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself. It will need to be modified if it is alleged that the accused acted to defend another person or to terminate the unlawful deprivation of liberty.

Before you can convict the accused of murder, there are four elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused caused the victim's death; and
2. The accused's acts were conscious, voluntary and deliberate; and
3. The accused intended to kill or cause really serious injury; and
4. The accused did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself from being killed or really seriously injured.

Cause of Death

1. Has the prosecution proved that the accused caused the victim's death?

Consider – Were the accused's actions a substantial or significant cause of the victim's death?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Murder

Conscious, Voluntary and Deliberate Acts

2. Has the prosecution proved that the accused's actions which caused the death were conscious, voluntary and deliberate?

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Murder

Intention

3. Has the prosecution proved that at the time the accused did the acts that caused the victim's death, s/he intended to kill or to cause really serious injury?

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Murder (but may be guilty of Manslaughter – Go to 6)

Self-defence

[1147] This checklist will need to be adapted if reckless murder has been left to the jury – see 7.2.1.2 Checklist: Intentional and Reckless Murder (without Self-defence).

4. Has the prosecution proved that the accused did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself from being killed or really seriously injured?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Murder (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Murder (but may be guilty of Defensive Homicide – Go to 5)

Defensive Homicide

The offence of defensive homicide should only be considered if you answered "Yes" to Questions 1, 2 and 3 above, and "No" to Question 4.

Before you can convict the accused of defensive homicide, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that:

5. There were no reasonable grounds for the accused to believe that what s/he did was necessary to defend him/herself from being killed or really seriously injured.

Defensive Homicide

5. Has the prosecution proved that there were no reasonable grounds for the accused to believe that what s/he did was necessary to defend him/herself from being killed or really seriously injured?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Defensive Homicide (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3 and No to Question 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Defensive Homicide

Manslaughter

The offence of manslaughter should only be considered if you answered "Yes" to Questions 1 and 2 above, and "No" to Question 3.

Before you can convict the accused of manslaughter, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that:

6. The accused committed a criminally negligent act; and

7. The accused's act was not committed in self-defence.

Criminal Negligence

6. Has the prosecution proved that the act which caused the victim's death was committed in circumstances which involved such a great falling short of the standard of care that a reasonable person would have exercised, and involved such a high risk of causing death or really serious injury, that it deserves to be criminally punished?

If Yes, then go to 7a

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

Self-defence

7a. Has the prosecution proved that the accused did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Manslaughter (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2 and 6)

If No, then go to 7b

7b. Has the prosecution proved that there were no reasonable grounds for the accused to believe that what s/he did was necessary to defend him/herself?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Manslaughter (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2 and 6)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

Last updated: 1 November 2014

8.2.5 Checklist: Murder Self-Defence with Unlawful and Dangerous Act Manslaughter

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used if it is alleged that the accused committed murder on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014, there is evidence from which a jury might infer that he or she was acting in self-defence, and unlawful and dangerous act manslaughter is available as an alternative verdict.[1148]

The checklist is designed for use where it is alleged that the accused believed it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself. It will need to be modified if it is alleged that the accused acted to defend another person or to terminate the unlawful deprivation of liberty.

Before you can convict the accused of murder, there are four elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused caused the victim's death; and
2. The accused's acts were conscious, voluntary and deliberate; and
3. The accused intended to kill or cause really serious injury; and
4. The accused did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself from being killed or really seriously injured.

Cause of Death

[1148] This checklist will need to be adapted if reckless murder has been left to the jury – see 7.2.1.2 Checklist: International and Reckless Murder (without Self-defence).

1. Has the prosecution proved that the accused caused the victim's death?

*Consider – Were the accused's actions a substantial or significant cause of the victim's death?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Murder

Conscious, Voluntary and Deliberate Acts

2. Has the prosecution proved that the accused's actions which caused the death were conscious, voluntary and deliberate?

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Murder

Intention

3. Has the prosecution proved that at the time the accused did the acts that caused the victim's death, s/he intended to kill or to cause really serious injury?

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Murder (but may be guilty of Manslaughter – Go to 6)

Self-defence

4. Has the prosecution proved that the accused did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself from being killed or really seriously injured?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Murder (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Murder (but may be guilty of Defensive Homicide – Go to 5)

Defensive Homicide

The offence of defensive homicide should only be considered if you answered "Yes" to Questions 1, 2 and 3 above, and "No" to Question 4.

Before you can convict the accused of defensive homicide, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that:

5. There were no reasonable grounds for the accused to believe that what s/he did was necessary to defend him/herself from being killed or really seriously injured.

Defensive Homicide

5. Has the prosecution proved that there were no reasonable grounds for the accused to believe that what s/he did was necessary to defend him/herself from being killed or really seriously injured?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Defensive Homicide (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3 and No to Question 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Defensive Homicide

Manslaughter

The offence of manslaughter should only be considered if you answered "Yes" to Questions 1 and 2 above, and "No" to Question 3.

Before you can convict the accused of manslaughter, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that:

6. The accused intended to commit the act that caused the victim's death; and

7. The accused's act was unlawful; and

8. The accused's act was dangerous; and

9. The accused's act was not committed in self-defence.

Intention

6. Has the prosecution proved that the accused intended to commit the act that caused the victim's death?

If Yes, then go to 7

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

Unlawful Act

7. Has the prosecution proved that the accused's act that caused the victim's death was unlawful?

If Yes, then go to 8

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

Dangerous Act

8. Has the prosecution proved that the accused's act that caused the victim's death was dangerous?

Consider – Would a reasonable person consider that an act of that kind would expose another person or other people to an appreciable risk of serious injury?

If Yes, then go to 9a

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

Self-defence

9a. Has the prosecution proved that the accused did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Manslaughter (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2, 6, 7 and 8)

If No, then go to 9b

9b. Has the prosecution proved that there were no reasonable grounds for the accused to believe that what s/he did was necessary to defend him/herself?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Manslaughter (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2, 6, 7 and 8)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

Last updated: 1 November 2014

8.2.6 Checklist: Murder Self-Defence with No Manslaughter

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used if it is alleged that the accused committed murder on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014, there is evidence from which a jury might infer that he or she was acting in self-defence, and manslaughter is not available as an alternative verdict.[1149]

Before you can convict the accused of murder, there are four elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused caused the victim's death; and
2. The accused's acts were conscious, voluntary and deliberate; and
3. The accused intended to kill or cause really serious injury; and
4. The accused did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself from being killed or really seriously injured.

Cause of Death

1. Has the prosecution proved that the accused caused the victim's death?

Consider – Were the accused's actions a substantial cause of the victim's death?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Murder

Conscious, Voluntary and Deliberate Acts

2. Has the prosecution proved that the accused's actions which caused the death were conscious, voluntary and deliberate?

[1149] This checklist will need to be adapted if reckless murder has been left to the jury – see 7.2.1.2 Checklist: International and Reckless Murder (without Self-defence).

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Murder

Intention

3. Has the prosecution proved that at the time the accused did the acts that caused the victim's death, s/he intended to kill or to cause really serious injury?

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Murder

Self-defence

4. Has the prosecution proved that the accused did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself from being killed or really seriously injured?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Murder (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Murder (but may be guilty of Defensive Homicide – Go to 5)

Defensive Homicide

The offence of defensive homicide should only be considered if you answered "Yes" to Questions 1, 2 and 3 above, and "No" to Question 4.

Before you can convict the accused of defensive homicide, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that:

5. There were no reasonable grounds for the accused to believe that what s/he did was necessary to defend him/herself from being killed or really seriously injured.

Defensive Homicide

5. Has the prosecution proved that there were no reasonable grounds for the accused to believe that what s/he did was necessary to defend him/herself from being killed or really seriously injured?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Defensive Homicide (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3 and No to Question 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Defensive Homicide

Last updated: 1 November 2014

8.2.7 Charge: Manslaughter Self-Defence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Warning: This charge relates to the defence of "manslaughter – self-defence" (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AE). As this defence has so far been the subject of only limited judicial interpretation, the charge should be treated with caution.

This charge should be given if manslaughter is available as a verdict in relation to a homicide committed on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014, and there is evidence from which a jury might infer that the accused was acting in self-defence. It is recommended that the charge be given immediately after directing the jury about the elements of manslaughter.

Introduction

As I have already mentioned, in this case the defence has alleged that NOA was acting defensively when s/he killed NOV.[1150] I have already explained the law of self-defence in relation to murder, as well as directing you about the offence of defensive homicide. I now need to tell you about the law of self-defence in relation to manslaughter.

The law says that people may commit acts that would otherwise be classified as "manslaughter" if they believe, on reasonable grounds, that it is necessary to commit those act to defend themselves. So even if you are satisfied that the prosecution has proven all of the elements of manslaughter beyond reasonable doubt, NOA will not be guilty of that offence if s/he acted in self-defence.

As is the case for self-defence in relation to murder, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was not acting in self-defence when s/he committed the acts that would otherwise be considered "manslaughter".[1151] It is not for NOA to prove that s/he did act in self-defence.

So before you can find the accused guilty of manslaughter, you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt:

[1150] This charge is drafted for use in cases in which the principal charge is murder, manslaughter is raised as an alternative verdict, and the defence does not deny that the accused killed the victim, but contends that it was done in self-defence. It assumes that the jury has already been charged in relation to murder self-defence and defensive homicide (see Charge: Murder Self-defence and Charge: Defensive Homicide).

The charge will need to be modified if used in the following circumstances:

– If manslaughter is the principal charge;

– If the jury has not been instructed about murder self-defence;

– If self-defence arises on the evidence, but is not alleged by the defence;

– If the defence denies that the accused killed the victim; or – If there is evidence that the accused was acting in defence of another or to prevent or terminate the unlawful deprivation of liberty.

[1151] This charge assumes that the defence does not deny that the accused killed the victim, but contends it was done in self-defence. If the defence does deny that the accused killed the victim, parts of the charge will need to be modified.

- All of the elements of the offence, and
- That NOA did not act in self-defence.

Elements of Manslaughter Self-defence

In relation to manslaughter, there are two possible ways for the prosecution to prove that the accused was not acting in self-defence.

First, the prosecution can prove that when NOA killed NOV, s/he did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself.

As with self-defence in relation to murder, this involves assessing the accused's state of mind at the time s/he killed NOV. What threat did s/he believe s/he faced? Did s/he believe it was necessary to react to the threat with force, and to do what s/he did in order to defend him/herself – or was s/he acting for some other purpose, such as [insert relevant example from the evidence and/or arguments, e.g. "to attack another" or "in retaliation for a past attack"]?

Secondly, the prosecution can prove that even if NOA believed his/her acts were necessary, that belief was not based on reasonable grounds.

This again requires you to consider the circumstances as NOA perceived them to be at the time s/he killed NOV, as is the case in relation to defensive homicide. You must determine whether the prosecution has proven that there was no reasonable basis for the accused to have believed that it was necessary to act in the way s/he did, in response to the threat s/he believed s/he faced.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt either that NOA did not believe it was necessary to act in the way s/he did to defend him/herself, or that that belief was not based on reasonable grounds, then you must find him/her not guilty of manslaughter. It is only if you are satisfied that the prosecution has proven one or other of these matters that you may convict him/her of manslaughter – as long as you are also satisfied that all of the elements of the offence have been proven.

Considerations

In making your determination, you must again take into account all of the circumstances in which the killing took place, including the fact that a person cannot be expected to weigh precisely the exact amount of self-defensive action required to respond to an imminent threat.

You should also take into account the same factors that I mentioned in relation to murder self-defence and defensive homicide, such as [insert relevant factors from the following list:

- The nature of the threat;
- Any previous relationship between the parties;
- Any prior conduct of the victim;
- Any personal characteristics of the accused that may have affected his or her behaviour;
- The proportionality of the of the accused's response to the harm threatened;
- Any failure to take obvious evasive action;
- The lack of immediacy of the threatened harm;
- Any circumstances of family violence.]

[If it is alleged that the accused was intoxicated, add the following shaded section.]

As is the case in relation to murder self-defence and defensive homicide, you can also take into account the accused's intoxication when assessing whether s/he believed it was necessary to act in the way s/he did. However, you must not take any intoxication into account in determining whether the accused's belief in the necessity of his/her actions was based on reasonable grounds.[1152] The law requires you to consider whether a person who was not intoxicated would have had reasonable grounds for believing those actions were necessary, in the circumstances as perceived by the accused.

Summary

To summarise, even if you decide that all of the elements of manslaughter have been proven beyond reasonable doubt, you may find that NOA was not guilty of that offence because s/he was acting in self-defence.

Before you can find NOA guilty of manslaughter, you must therefore be satisfied not only that all of the elements of the offence have been met, but also that the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA either:

- Did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself; or
- Did not have reasonable grounds for holding that belief.

If the prosecution cannot prove one or other of these matters beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of manslaughter.

Last updated: 1 November 2014

8.2.8 Checklist: Manslaughter Self-Defence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used instead of the Manslaughter Checklist if it is alleged that the accused committed either criminal negligence manslaughter or unlawful and dangerous act manslaughter on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014 and there is evidence from which a jury might infer that he or she was acting in self-defence.

The checklist is designed for use where it is alleged that the accused believed it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself. It will need to be modified if it is alleged that the accused acted to defend another person or to terminate the unlawful deprivation of liberty.

Before you can convict the accused of manslaughter, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, either that:

1. The accused committed a criminally negligent act; or
2. The accused committed an unlawful and dangerous act.

The prosecution must also prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that:

3. The accused's act was not committed in self-defence.

Criminal Negligence

1. Has the prosecution proved that the act which caused the victim's death was committed in circumstances which involved such a great falling short of the standard of care that a reasonable person would have exercised, and involved such a high risk of causing death or really serious injury, that it deserves to be criminally punished?

[1152] If it is alleged that the intoxication was not self–induced, this section will need to be modified (see s 9AJ(4)). See Crimes Act 1958 ss 9AJ(5) and (6) for the definition of "self–induced" intoxication. Model charges are available from 8.6.1 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (23/11/05–31/10/14) (Self–induced) or 8.6.2 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (23/11/05–31/10/14) (Self–induced contested), as relevant.

If Yes, then go to 3a

If No, then go 2a

Unlawful and Dangerous Act

2a. Has the prosecution proved that the accused intended to commit the act that caused the victim's death?

If Yes, then go to 2b

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

2b. Has the prosecution proved that the accused's act that caused the victim's death was unlawful?

If Yes, then go to 2c

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

2c. Has the prosecution proved that the accused's act that caused the victim's death was dangerous?

Consider – Would a reasonable person consider that an act of that kind would expose another person or other people to an appreciable risk of serious injury?

If Yes, then go to 3a

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

Self-defence

3a. Has the prosecution proved that the accused did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Manslaughter (as long as you also answered Yes to either Question 1 or 2(a, b and c))

If No, then go to 3b

3b. Has the prosecution proved that the accused did not have reasonable grounds for his/her belief that what s/he did was necessary to defend him/herself?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Manslaughter (as long as you also answered Yes to either Question 1 or 2(a, b and c))

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

Last updated: 1 November 2014

8.2.9 Checklist: Unlawful and Dangerous Act Manslaughter

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used instead of 7.2.2.3 Checklist: Manslaughter by Unlawful and Dangerous Act if it is alleged that the accused committed unlawful and dangerous act manslaughter on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014, and there is evidence from which a jury might infer that he or she was acting in self-defence.

The checklist is designed for use where it is alleged that the accused believed it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself. It will need to be modified if it is alleged that the accused acted to defend another person or to terminate the unlawful deprivation of liberty.

Before you can convict the accused of manslaughter, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that:

1. The accused intended to commit the act that caused the victim's death; and
2. The accused's act was unlawful; and
3. The accused's act was dangerous; and
4. The accused's act was not committed in self-defence.

Intention

1. Has the prosecution proved that the accused intended to commit the act that caused the victim's death?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

Unlawful Act

2. Has the prosecution proved that the accused's act that caused the victim's death was unlawful?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

Dangerous Act

3. Has the prosecution proved that the accused's act that caused the victim's death was dangerous?

Consider – Would a reasonable person consider that an act of that kind would expose another person or other people to an appreciable risk of serious injury?

If Yes, then go to 4a

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

Self-defence

4a. Has the prosecution proved that the accused did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Manslaughter (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then go to 4b

4b. Has the prosecution proved that the accused did not have reasonable grounds for his/her belief that what s/he did was necessary to defend him/herself?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Manslaughter (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

Last updated: 1 November 2014

8.2.10 Checklist: Criminal Negligence Manslaughter

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used instead of 7.2.3.2 Checklist: Negligent Manslaughter if it is alleged that the accused committed criminal negligence manslaughter on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014 and there is evidence from which a jury might infer that he or she was acting in self-defence.

The checklist is designed for use where it is alleged that the accused believed it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself. It will need to be modified if it is alleged that the accused acted to defend another person or to terminate the unlawful deprivation of liberty.

Before you can convict the accused of manslaughter, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that:

1. The accused committed a criminally negligent act; and
2. The accused's act was not committed in self-defence.

Criminal Negligence

1. Has the prosecution proved that the act which caused the victim's death was committed in circumstances which involved such a great falling short of the standard of care that a reasonable person would have exercised, and involved such a high risk of causing death or really serious injury, that it deserves to be criminally punished?

If Yes, then go to 2a

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

Self-defence

2a. Has the prosecution proved that the accused did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Manslaughter (as long as you also answered Yes to Question 1)

If No, then go to 2b

2b. Has the prosecution proved that the accused did not have reasonable grounds for his/her belief that what s/he did was necessary to defend him/herself?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Manslaughter (as long as you also answered Yes to Question 1)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

Last updated: 1 November 2014

8.3 Common Law Self-Defence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Introduction

1. Prior to 2005, self-defence in Victoria was governed solely by the common law. This situation was first altered by the passage of the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005, which introduced two statutory self-defence provisions into the Crimes Act 1958: one for use in murder cases (s 9AC) and the other for use in manslaughter cases (s 9AE).
2. The provisions of the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005 commenced operation on 23 November 2005, and applied to offences committed on or after that date (Crimes Act 1958 s 603).
3. The provisions replaced the common law in the relevant areas (Babic v R (2010) 28 VR 297), so that common law self-defence is not available for charges of murder, manslaughter, defensive homicide, attempted murder or attempted defensive homicide where such are alleged to have been committed on or after 23 November 2005:
4. The situation was again altered by the passage of the Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014, which introduced provisions into the Crimes Act 1958 abolishing common law self-defence (s 322N) and setting out a single statutory self-defence for all offences (s 322K).
5. The provisions of the Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014 commenced operation on 1 November 2014 and apply to offences alleged to have been committed on or after that date (Crimes Act 1958 s 623).
6. As a result of these legislative changes, common law self-defence may be raised only when:
    - The accused is charged with an offence other than the homicide offences listed above, and such offence was alleged to have been committed before 1 November 2014; or
    - The accused is charged with one of those homicide offences listed above, and such offence was alleged to have been committed before 23 November 2005.
7. This topic outlines the common law defence of self-defence. For information concerning the statutory provisions, see 8.1 Statutory Self-defence (From 1/11/14) and 8.2 Statutory Self-defence (Pre-1/11/14) and Defensive Homicide.

When to Charge the Jury about Self-defence

8. The judge must direct the jury about self-defence if the accused indicates that self-defence is in issue or if there are substantial and compelling reasons to direct on self-defence in the absence of any request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16). See Directions under Jury Directions Act 2015.

9. At common law, the judge was required to instruct the jury about self-defence if there was evidence on which a reasonable jury could decide the issue favourably to the accused (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Kear [1997] 2 VR 555; R v Kell & Dey (Ruling No. 1) [2008] VSC 518).

10. The issue of self-defence could be held to arise if there was any evidence from which the jury might infer that the accused acted in self-defence (R v Kear [1997] 2 VR 555; R v Imadonmwonyi [2004] VSC 361).

11. To see if there was any such evidence, a judge could look not only to the direct evidence, but also to whether a circumstantial case could fairly be made out to support the claimed defence (R v Kear [1997] 2 VR 555; R v Imadonmwonyi [2004] VSC 361).

12. At common law, if there was evidence on which self-defence could be found, the trial judge was required to leave the issue to the jury even if the judge considered the plea to be "weak or tenuous" (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Kear [1997] 2 VR 555; R v Muratovic [1967] Qd R 15; R v Kell & Dey (Ruling No. 1) [2008] VSC 518).

13. If there was sufficient evidence to raise the possibility of self-defence, the judge was required at common law to instruct the jury about it, whether or not the plea was raised by the accused (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Kear [1997] 2 VR 555; R v Kell & Dey (Ruling No. 1) [2008] VSC 518).

14. Where there was sufficient evidence to raise the possibility of self-defence, the judge was required to instruct the jury about it even if the factual basis for the defence was inconsistent with the accused's version of events at trial (R v Kear [1997] 2 VR 555; R v Kell & Dey (Ruling No. 1) [2008] VSC 518).

15. These common law principles may be relevant to the operation of the residual obligation to give directions under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 16, but must be read in light of the whole of Part 3 of the Act.

Elements of Common Law Self-defence

16. The High Court has defined the test for self-defence, for both homicide and non-homicide cases, as follows:

> The question to be asked in the end is quite simple. It is whether the accused believed upon reasonable grounds that it was necessary in self-defence to do what he [or she] did (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645 at 661 (Wilson, Dawson and Toohey JJ)).

17. There are two elements to this test:

    i) The accused must have believed at the time that s/he committed the relevant act that what s/he was doing was necessary (known as the "subjective element"); and

    ii) That belief must have been based on reasonable grounds (known as the "objective element").

18. Once the question of self-defence is put in issue, the onus is on the prosecution to disprove at least one of these elements beyond reasonable doubt. If the prosecution fail to disprove at least one of these elements the accused will be entitled to an acquittal (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; Viro v R (1978) 141 CLR 88; Dziduch v R (1990) 47 A Crim R 378; R v Alpagut 27 July 1989 (NSWCCA)).

Belief in Necessity (The Subjective Element)

19. At the time the accused committed the relevant act, s/he must have believed that what s/he was doing was necessary (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Wills [1983] 2 VR 201).

20. This is a subjective test. It does not involve a consideration of what a reasonable or ordinary person would have believed in the circumstances, but rather what the accused believed (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; Viro v R (1978) 141 CLR 88; R v Conlon (1993) 69 A Crim R 92 (SC NSW)).

21. For this element to be satisfied, it does not matter if the accused's belief was mistaken, as long as it was genuinely held (R v McKay [1957] VR 560).

22. If the accused was intoxicated at the time he or she committed the relevant acts, this can be taken into account when determining whether he or she believed his or her actions to be necessary (R v Conlon (1993) 69 A Crim R 92 (NSWSC); R v Katarzynski [2002] NSWSC 613. See "Intoxication" below for further information).

23. The determination of whether the accused believed that his or her actions were necessary incorporates two questions: first, whether the accused believed it was necessary to defend himself or herself at all and, secondly, whether the accused believed it was necessary to respond as he or she did given the threat as s/he perceived it (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645).

24. In determining whether the accused believed that the force used was necessary, consideration should be given to the fact that a person who has reacted instantly to imminent danger cannot be expected to weigh precisely the exact measure of self-defensive action which is required (R v Palmer [1971] AC 814; Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Conlon (1993) 69 A Crim R 92).

25. The proportionality of the accused's response to the harm threatened is just one factor to take into account in determining whether the accused believed that his or her actions were necessary (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259. See "Proportionality" below).

26. There is no rule requiring the accused to retreat from an attack rather than defend himself or herself. However, a failure to retreat is a factor to be taken into account in determining whether the accused believed that what was done was necessary (as well as in determining whether that belief was based on reasonable grounds – see below) (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Howe (1958) 100 CLR 448).

27. If the accused acted under the pretence of defending himself or herself to attack another or retaliate for a past attack, then this element will not be met. Factors such as a failure to retreat when possible or a highly disproportionate response might indicate an intention to use the circumstances for aggression or retaliation rather than for self-defence.

Belief on Reasonable Grounds (The Objective Element)

28. The accused's belief that what he or she was doing was necessary must have been based on reasonable grounds. That is, it must have been a belief which the accused might reasonably have held in all the circumstances (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Wills [1983] 2 VR 201).

29. This element does not require the jury to determine whether the accused acted reasonably in the circumstances. It requires the jury to determine whether there were reasonable grounds for the accused's belief that it was necessary to do what he or she did (R v Hendy [2008] VSCA 231).

30. This is not a test about what the hypothetical "reasonable person" might have believed in the circumstances, but about whether the accused had reasonable grounds for his or her belief, in the circumstances as he or she perceived them to be (R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259; Virov R (1978) 141 CLR 88).

31. In determining whether the accused's belief was based on reasonable grounds, the jury may take into account the following matters:

    - The surrounding circumstances (R v Wills [1983] 2 VR 201);
    - All of the facts within the accused's knowledge (R v Wills [1983] 2 VR 201);

- The relationship between the parties involved (R v Hector [1953] VLR 543);
- The prior conduct of the victim (R v Besim (2004) 148 A Crim R 28);
- The personal characteristics of the accused, such as:
    - Any deluded beliefs he or she held (Grosser v R (1999) 73 SASR 584; R v Walsh (1991) 60 A Crim R 419 (Tas SC));
    - Any excitement, affront or distress he or she was experiencing (R v Wills [1983] 2 VR 201);
- The proportionality of the accused's response (Zecevicv Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259. See "Proportionality" below);
- The accused's failure to retreat (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Howe (1958) 100 CLR 448).

Other Relevant Considerations

Intoxication

32. Evidence of intoxication may be relevant to the subjective element of self-defence (belief in necessity). If the accused was intoxicated at the time he or she committed the relevant acts, the jury can take this into account when determining whether he or she believed:
    - That an occasion for the use of force had arisen; or
    - That the use of force was necessary (R v Conlon (1993) 69 A Crim R 92 (NSWSC); Bedi v R (1993) 61 SASR 269; Ninness v Walker (1998) 143 FLR 239; R v Katarzynski [2002] NSWSC 613).
33. It is unclear whether evidence of intoxication is also relevant to the objective element (in the absence of any statutory modifications).[1153] This issue has not yet been addressed in Victoria, and courts in other jurisdictions have divided on the issue of whether the jury, in determining whether the accused's belief was based on "reasonable grounds", must take into account any personal characteristics of the accused (including his or her state of intoxication) which might have affected:
    - His or her appreciation of the gravity of the threat faced; and
    - The reasonableness of his or her response to that threat (compare R v Conlon (1993) 69 A Crim R 92; R v Katarzynski [2002] NSWSC 613 with Ninness v Walker (1998) 143 FLR 239; R v McCullough [1982] Tas R 43).

Where the Accused Initiated the Aggression

34. A person who originates an attack cannot then claim that s/he acted to defend himself or herself against a counter attack, unless his or her original aggression had ceased at the time of the counter attack so as to have enabled the accused to form a belief that his or her actions were necessary in self-defence. (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Kell & Dey (Ruling No. 1) [2008] VSC 518).

[1153] Crimes Act 1958 ss 9AJ and 322T both modify the common law position and, where either provision applies, requires the jury to ignore evidence of self–induced intoxication when determining whether the accused's belief was based on reasonable grounds. See 8.5 Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14) and 8.6 Statutory Intoxication (23/11/05–31/10/14).

35. However, there is no rule to prevent self-defence being raised when the accused originated the attack, as long as the original aggression had ceased to create a continuing situation of emergency that provoked a lawful attack on the accused. Any initial aggression by the accused will form part of the whole of the surrounding circumstances to be taken into account in determining whether accused had a belief, on reasonable grounds, in the necessity of his or her actions. (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645).

36. Where it is alleged that the accused was the initial aggressor, the jury will need to consider all the circumstances as perceived by the accused, including, for example, the extent to which the accused declined further conflict, stopped using force, was defeated, faced a disproportionately escalated level of force in response, or attempted to retreat (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259; Ruben Anandan v R [2011] VSCA 413; see also R v Lawson and Forsythe [1986] VR 515 (Ormiston J)).

Defence Against Lawful Force

37. Common law self-defence is not limited to defending against unlawful attacks (cf. statutory self-defence). It is possible to raise the defence even if the accused was responding to the lawful use of force (such as a lawful arrest) (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645).

38. However, it will only be in an unusual situation that a lawful attack will provide reasonable grounds for acting in self-defence. This is because where an accused creates a situation in which force might lawfully be applied to apprehend him or her (e.g. where s/he is engaged in criminal behaviour of a violent kind), then the only reasonable view of his or her resistance to that force will usually be that s/he was acting as an aggressor in pursuit of his or her original design, rather than in self-defence (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; Fry v Queen (1992) 58 SASR 424).

Proportionality

39. Although in the past there was a separate requirement that the accused's actions be proportionate to the harm threatened, this is no longer the case. The proportionality of the accused's response to the harm threatened is simply one factor to take into account in determining whether the accused believed that his or her actions were necessary, and whether that belief was based on reasonable grounds (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259; R v Hendy [2008] VSCA 231; R v Said [2009] VSCA 244).

Use of Pre-emptive Force

40. A person is not only entitled to rely on self-defence only if s/he acts whilst an attack is in progress or immediately threatened. S/he is entitled to take steps to forestall a threatened attack before it has begun (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316; Virov R (1978) 141 CLR 88; R v Lane [1983] 2 VR 449; R v Conlon (1993) 69 A Crim R 92).

41. The key issue is not whether an attack was imminent or immediately threatened, but whether the accused's perception of danger led him or her to believe that the use of defensive force was necessary, and that that belief was based on reasonable grounds (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316).

42. However, what is believed to be necessary in the circumstances, and the reasonableness of the grounds for that belief, may be affected by the lack of immediacy of the threat, although this will not necessarily be the case (R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259).

43. Where a person responds pre-emptively to what he or she perceives to be a threat from a violent partner, expert evidence of "battered woman syndrome" may be admitted. Such evidence can assist the jury to understand that an act committed when there is no actual attack underway may be a self-defensive response to a genuinely apprehended threat of imminent danger, sufficient to warrant a pre-emptive strike (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316).

Defence of Others and Protection of Property

44. Although the principles in Zecevic were stated to apply to cases of self-defence, it has been held that they apply equally to cases in which a person acts in defence of another (R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259).

45. There is no longer a requirement for there to be a particular relationship between the accused and the person they were defending. An accused will have a defence if s/he was protecting any other person, as long as s/he believed on reasonable grounds that it was necessary to act in that way given all of the circumstances (R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259).

46. Although there is little Victorian case law on the issue, the same principles may also apply if force is used to protect personal property, or to prevent crime (see, e.g. R v McKay [1957] VR 560).

Content of the Charge

47. When directing the jury about self-defence there is no set formula to be used (Collingburn v R (1985) 18 A Crim R 294; Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259).

48. The burden of proof should be made very clear to the jury. They should be told that the offence is proved only if the prosecution has established either that the accused had no belief that it was necessary to act in the way he or she did, or that there were no reasonable grounds for such a belief (R v Alpagut 27/7/1989 NSWCCA; R v Dziduch (1990) 47 A Crim R 378; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259).

49. Judges should be careful not to direct the jury that the accused's conduct must have been reasonable. The focus of the second element must be on the grounds for the accused's belief (R v Hendy [2008] VSCA 231).

50. The question of self-defence should be placed in its factual setting, and considerations which may assist the jury to reach its conclusion should be identified (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Dziduch (1990) 47 A Crim R 378; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259).

51. The jury should be told to consider all of the circumstances of the case, and that any one factor should be considered within that broader context. This helps ensure that matters of evidence, such as the proportionality of the force, are not elevated to rules of law (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Alpagut 27/7/1989 NSWCCA; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259; R v Said [2009] VSCA 244).

52. The judge should offer such assistance by way of comment as is appropriate to the particular case. It will often be desirable to tell the jury to approach the task in a practical manner, giving proper weight to the predicament of the accused, which may have afforded little, if any, opportunity for calm deliberation or detached reflection (Zecevic v Director of Public Prosecutions (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Dziduch (1990) 47 A Crim R 378; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259).

53. The judge must not give the jury the impression that proportionality is a necessary part of the legal conception of self-defence, or give proportionality undue prominence as a factual consideration (R v Said [2009] VSCA 244).

54. If an issue arises as to whether the force used by the accused was proportionate to the threat offered, the jury should be directed that the prosecution must establish that the force used by the accused was "out of all proportion" or "plainly disproportionate" to any attack which the accused could reasonably have believed was threatened by the victim. This will make it clear that the accused does not have to have acted in a precisely proportionate way, and makes allowance for any difficulty an accused may have found him or herself in in weighing the precise action which should have been taken to avoid the threat (R v Dziduch (1990) 47 A Crim R 378; R v Portelli (2004) 10 VR 259; R v Said [2009] VSCA 244).

55. The issue of self defence should be listed with all of the other issues which the prosecution must establish, rather than being dealt with separately (R v Alpagut 27/7/1989 NSWCCA).

Last updated: 29 June 2015

8.3.1 Charge: Common Law Self-Defence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be given if there is evidence from which a jury might infer that the accused was acting in self-defence when s/he:

i) committed an offence other than murder, manslaughter, defensive homicide, attempted murder or attempted defensive homicide prior to 1 November 2014; or

ii) committed one of the offences listed above prior to 23 November 2005.

Introduction

In this case the defence has alleged that NOA was acting in self-defence when s/he [insert relevant act].[1154] I therefore need to give you some directions about "self-defence".

The law recognises the right of people to defend themselves from attacks or threatened attacks. The law says that they may act to defend themselves if they believe, on reasonable grounds, that it is necessary to do what they did in self-defence.

They may do whatever they believe is necessary to defend themselves, even if this involves committing what would otherwise be a criminal act. So in this case, the prosecution must prove that NOA did not act in self-defence. Because the prosecution must prove the accused's guilt, it is not for NOA to prove that s/he did act in self-defence.

Elements of Self-defence

There are two possible ways for the prosecution to prove that the accused was not acting in self-defence. I will explain them to you, and then examine some factors you should take into account in making your decision.

No Belief in Necessity

The first way in which the prosecution can prove that NOA was not acting in self-defence is to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that when s/he [insert relevant act], s/he did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself.

This involves assessing the accused's state of mind at the time s/he [insert relevant act]. What threat did s/he believe s/he faced? Did s/he believe it was necessary to react to the threat with force, and to do what s/he did in order to defend him/herself – or was s/he acting for some other purpose, such as [insert relevant example from the evidence and/or arguments, e.g. "to attack another or in retaliation for a past attack"]?

In making this assessment, you must consider the circumstances as NOA perceived them to be at the time s/he committed the acts. It does not matter if you think s/he was mistaken about the danger s/he faced, or you believe that s/he overreacted to the threat. The question here is whether the prosecution can prove that NOA did not believe it was necessary to act in the way s/he did, to defend him/herself against the danger s/he thought s/he faced at the time.

[1154] This charge is drafted for use in cases in which the defence has alleged self-defence. It will need to be modified if used in cases where the possibility of self-defence arises on the evidence, but is not alleged by the defence. It will also need to be modified if there is evidence that the accused was acting in defence of another, in defence of property, or to prevent a crime.

Not Based on Reasonable Grounds

The second way in which the prosecution can prove that NOA was not acting in self-defence is by proving that even if s/he believed his/her acts were necessary, that belief was not based on reasonable grounds.

In determining whether this belief was based on reasonable grounds, you must again consider the circumstances as NOA perceived them to be at the time s/he [insert relevant act]. You must determine whether the prosecution has proven that the accused had no reasonable basis to believe it was necessary to act in the way s/he did, in response to the threat s/he believed s/he faced. It does not matter if NOA was mistaken about that threat, so long as his/her response to the threat, in all of the circumstances as s/he perceived them to be, was based on reasonable grounds.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt either that NOA did not believe it was necessary to act in the way s/he did to defend him/herself, or that that belief was not based on reasonable grounds, then you must find him/her not guilty of [insert offence].

Considerations

In determining whether NOA acted in self-defence, you must take into account all of the circumstances in which the act occurred. This includes [insert any relevant factors, such as the nature of the perceived threat*, any previous* relationship between the parties, any prior conduct of the victim, or any personal characteristics of the accused that may have affected his or her behaviour, and relate to the facts in issue].

You should also consider the defence's claim that NOA was reacting to an imminent threat. In such circumstances, a person cannot be expected to weigh precisely the exact amount of self-defensive action required. You should not look at the situation with the benefit of hindsight, but instead take into account the fact that calm reflection cannot always be expected in such a situation.

[If it is alleged that the force used was disproportionate to the threat, add the following shaded section.]

It is for this reason that the law does not require that the force used in self-defence be exactly proportionate to the harm threatened. However, if you consider that the accused's actions were out of all proportion to the harm threatened, that is one of the factors you can take into account in determining whether s/he believed his/her actions to be necessary in the circumstances. You can also take it into account in deciding whether the accused's belief was based on reasonable grounds.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA's acts were plainly disproportionate to the threat s/he faced. [Insert evidence and/or arguments.] The defence responded [insert evidence and/or arguments].

[If it is alleged that the accused failed to retreat, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, you have heard evidence that NOA had the opportunity to retreat from the [insert relevant act], but failed to do so.

Although the law does not require a person to retreat from an attack before defending himself or herself, you can take into account a failure to do so when determining whether NOA believed that what s/he was doing was necessary in self-defence.

A failure to retreat is also one of the factors that you can take into account in deciding whether the accused's belief in the necessity of his/her actions was based on reasonable grounds.

[If it is alleged that the accused engaged in a pre-emptive strike, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the defence claimed that NOA was acting in self defence, even though s/he was not being physically attacked at the time s/he [insert relevant act]. The defence claimed that his/her actions were necessary despite the lack of an immediate threat, to defend against [insert relevant evidence].

The law says that people are not required to wait until an attack is actually in progress before defending themselves. They are entitled to use whatever force they believe is necessary to defend themselves against threatened harm, as long as that belief is based on reasonable grounds.

However, the lack of immediacy of a threat may affect your determination of what the accused believed to be necessary in the circumstances. It may also affect your decision about whether that belief was based on reasonable grounds. It is, however, just one factor to be considered in deciding whether the prosecution has proved that NOA did not believe, on reasonable grounds, that what s/he was doing was necessary in self-defence.

[If it is alleged that the accused was the original aggressor, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, you have heard evidence that it was NOA who started the confrontation with NOV, by [insert relevant evidence]. This may be a significant matter in deciding whether NOA acted in self-defence. A person cannot start an attack, and simply claim that s/he was then defending him/herself from the victim's response to his/her original aggression.

However, when deciding whether NOA believed that his/her actions were necessary, and in deciding whether there were reasonable grounds for that belief, you should take into account matters such as [insert any relevant factors, such as the extent to which the accused declined further conflict, stopped using force, faced a disproportionately escalated level of force in response, was defeated by the victim, was subjected to a new attack, or attempted to retreat].

[If it is alleged that the accused was intoxicated, add the following shaded section.]

Warning: As noted in 8.3 Common Law Self-defence, Victorian courts have not yet addressed the question of whether intoxication is relevant to the objective element of self-defence. This part of the charge is based on the assumption that intoxication is relevant to that element, as was held by the NSW Supreme Court in R v Conlon (1993) 69 A Crim R 92 and R v Katarzynski [2002] NSWSC 613. However, as it is possible that Victorian courts will adopt the approach taken in R v McCullough [1982] Tas R 43 and Ninness v Walker (1998) 143 FLR 239, holding that intoxication is not relevant to the objective element, judges should give consideration to this issue before charging the jury.

In this case you have heard evidence that NOA was intoxicated at the time that s/he [insert relevant act]. If you find that s/he was intoxicated, you should take this into account when assessing whether s/he believed it was necessary to act in the way s/he did. This is because the issue to be decided is what the accused believed was necessary in all of the circumstances, including his/her state of intoxication.

You should also take any intoxication into account in determining whether the accused's belief was based on reasonable grounds.

Summary

To summarise this element, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA either:

- Did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself; or
- Did not have reasonable grounds for holding that belief.

Last updated: 1 November 2014

8.3.2 Checklist: Common Law Self-Defence

Click here to obtain a Word version of the document for adaptation

This checklist can be used if there is evidence from which a jury might infer that the accused was acting in self-defence when s/he:

Committed an offence other than murder, manslaughter, defensive homicide, attempted murder or attempted defensive homicide prior to 1 November 2014; or Committed one of the offences listed above prior to 23 November 2005.

It is designed to be used together with a checklist outlining the elements of the relevant offence. Details of that offence will need to be inserted in the appropriate places.

In addition to proving all of the elements of [insert offence], the prosecution must also prove that the accused did not act in self-defence. This requires the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that when the acts said to constitute the offence were committed, either:

1. The accused did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself; or
2. The accused's belief that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself was not based on reasonable grounds.

Belief in Necessity

1. Has the prosecution proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused did not believe that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself, at the time s/he committed the relevant acts?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of [insert offence] (as long as you are satisfied that the prosecution has also proven all of the elements of that offence beyond reasonable doubt)

If No, then go to Question 2

Reasonable grounds

2. Has the prosecution proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused's belief that it was necessary to do what s/he did to defend him/herself was not based on reasonable grounds?

Consider – What were the circumstances as perceived by the accused?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of [insert offence] (as long as you are satisfied that the prosecution has also proven all of the elements of that offence beyond reasonable doubt)

If No, then the accused acted in self-defence and is not guilty of [insert offence] (as long as you also answered No to Question 1)

Last updated: 1 November 2014

8.4 Mental Impairment

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Commencement Information

1. The defence of mental impairment was created by s 20 of the Crimes (Mental Impairment and Unfitness to be Tried) Act 1997 (the Act).
2. Section 20 commenced operation on 18 April 1998, and applies to any offences that it is alleged were committed on or after that date.

3. The common law defence of insanity was abrogated by s 25 of the Act, but continues to apply to any offences it is alleged were committed before 18 April 1998 (Schedule 3 clause 7(1)). However, a verdict of not guilty on account of insanity is to be taken for all purposes to be a finding of not guilty by reason of mental impairment under Part 4 of the Act (Schedule 3 clause 7(2)).

When can the Defence of Mental Impairment be Raised?

4. The question of mental impairment may be raised at any time during the trial by the defence or the prosecution (s 22(1). See, e.g. R v Hassan [2004] VSC 85).

5. If the prosecution wishes to raise the issue of mental impairment, they require the leave of the trial judge (s 22(1)). As long as there is admissible evidence on the issue, the trial judge has a very broad discretion to grant leave (R v Alford (No.2) [2005] VSC 405).

Pre-empanelment Consent Hearings

6. Depending on the circumstances, it may be possible to deal with the issue of mental impairment without empanelling or charging a jury (s 21(4). See, e.g. R v Whelan [2006] VSC 319).

7. According to s 21(4), if prior to the jury's empanelment the prosecution and the defence agree that the proposed evidence demonstrates that the accused committed the conduct constituting the offence,[1155] and will also establish the defence of mental impairment, the trial judge may hear the evidence and:

    - If satisfied that the evidence establishes the defence of mental impairment, may direct that a verdict of not guilty because of mental impairment be recorded without empanelling a jury; or
    - If not satisfied that the evidence establishes the defence of mental impairment, direct that the matter be heard by a jury.

8. The judge must be satisfied that the evidence establishes the defence of mental impairment on the balance of probabilities (R v Whelan [2006] VSC 319).

Establishing Mental Impairment

9. A person is presumed not to be suffering from a mental impairment until the contrary is proved (s 21(1)). This provision reflects the common law presumption of sanity (Sodeman v R (1936) 55 CLR 192; R v Porter (1933) 55 CLR 182).

10. The onus of rebutting the presumption of sanity rests on the party raising the question of mental impairment (s 21(3)). In most cases it will be the defence that raise the issue, and who will be required to prove that the accused was mentally impaired. However, the burden will rest on the prosecution if they raise the issue under s 22 (with the judge's leave).

11. The defence of mental impairment must be proved on the balance of probabilities (s 21(2)(b)). This reflects the standard of proof that existed under the common law (Sodeman v R (1936) 55 CLR 192; R v Porter (1933) 55 CLR 182).

12. Apart from some limited circumstances in which a judge may determine the issue (see "Consent Hearings" above), determining whether or not an accused suffered from a mental impairment is a question of fact for the jury (s 21(2)(a)).

[1155] It is unclear whether the defence and prosecution simply need to agree that the accused committed the relevant acts, or whether they also need to agree that the accused had the requisite mental state: see "Mental Impairment and Proof of Elements" below.

13. When mental impairment is in issue, if a jury finds the accused not guilty they must specify in their verdict whether they have done so on the basis of mental impairment (s 22(2)(b)).[1156]

What is the Defence of Mental Impairment?

14. People will have a defence to what would otherwise be a criminal act if, at the time they committed the act, they were suffering from a mental impairment that had the effect that they either:

    (a) did not know the nature and quality of what they were doing; or

    (b) did not know that their conduct was wrong (s 20(1)).

15. If the defence of mental impairment is established, the appropriate verdict is "not guilty because of mental impairment" (s 20(2)). The effects of such a verdict are specified in s 23 of the Act.

16. Unlike most other Australian jurisdictions (i.e. Queensland, Western Australia, Tasmania, South Australia and the Northern Territory), the Victorian defence does not include a mental impairment which has the effect of removing a person's capacity to control his or her actions.

17. The defence applies to people who were suffering from a mental impairment at the time they committed the criminal act. Part 2 of the Act establishes processes to be used if the accused suffers from a mental impairment at the time of the trial, and is unable to understand the charge, the trial or the evidence, or is unable to enter a plea or give instructions to his or her lawyer (see 10.1 Investigations into Unfitness to Stand Trial).

"Mental Impairment"

18. The Act does not define the term "mental impairment". It has been held to have the same meaning as "disease of the mind", which formed the basis of the common law insanity defence (R v Sebalj [2003] 2003 VSC 181; R v Gemmill (2004) 8 VR 242; DPP v Taleski [2007] VSC 183; R v Martin [2005] VSC 518).

19. "Disease of the mind" has been held to be synonymous with "mental illness". It connotes an unhealthy or "infirm" mind, as opposed to a healthy mind affected by a transient, non-recurrent mental malfunction caused by external forces (R v Falconer [1990] 171 CLR 30; R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266).

20. See "What is a 'disease of the mind'?" in 8.8 Automatism for further information concerning the meaning of this phrase, and examples of conditions which have been held to be "diseases of the mind".

Nature and Quality of the Act

21. People will have a defence to what would otherwise be a criminal act if, at the time they committed the act, they were suffering from a mental impairment that had the effect that that they did not know the nature and quality of their conduct (s 20(1)(a)).

22. This provision restates one of the limbs of the common law defence of insanity. In that context, the phrase "nature and quality" has been held to refer to the physical character and significance of a person's actions, and the consequences of those acts. It does not refer to the moral quality of his or her conduct (Sodeman v R (1936) 55 CLR 192).

[1156] It is unclear whether the jury must return this verdict in relation to the offence charged, or whether they may return a qualified acquittal to a lesser included offence. See "Lesser Included Offences" below for further information.

23. To satisfy this limb of the defence, the accused must have been unable to appreciate the physical nature of what he or she was doing, and the consequences of his or her behaviour. In the case of murder, for example, the accused must have had so little capacity for understanding the nature of life and the destruction of life, that to him or her it was like breaking a twig or destroying an inanimate object (R v Porter (1933) 55 CLR 182).

Knowledge of wrongfulness

24. People will have a defence to what would otherwise be a criminal act if, at the time they committed the act, they were suffering from a mental impairment that had the effect that they did not know that their conduct was wrong (s 20(1)(b)).

25. Section 20(1)(b) defines this to mean that the person "could not reason with a moderate degree of sense and composure about whether the conduct, as perceived by reasonable people, was wrong".

26. This provision, including the definition of "wrong" as meaning contrary to the ordinary principles of reasonable people, rather than contrary to the law or morality, also restates one of the limbs of the common law defence of insanity (R v White and Piggin (2003) 7 VR 442; R v Porter (1933) 55 CLR 182; Sodeman v R (1936) 55 CLR 192; Stapleton v R (1952) 86 CLR 358).

Mental Impairment and Proof of Elements

27. The defence of mental impairment is not established simply by proving that the accused suffered from a mental impairment that had one of the requisite effects. The jury must also be satisfied that the accused engaged in the "conduct constituting the offence" (s 20(1)).

28. Section 3(1) states that "conduct includes doing an act and making an omission". It is clear from this definition that the prosecution must at least prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused committed the act or omission which constitutes the offence charged.

29. It is unclear whether the prosecution must also prove any of the other elements of the charged offence, such as the requisite mens rea. While the use of the term "conduct constituting the offence" may indicate that the prosecution is not required to prove that the accused had a specific mental state, this issue has not yet been addressed in Victoria.[1157]

30. A number of different approaches have been taken to the issue of which elements the prosecution is required to prove, as outlined below. As the law in this area is unclear, judges who are required to charge a jury in a case that raises the defence of mental impairment will need to consider which of these approaches (if any) to apply.

The Original High Court Approach

31. Originally, it appears to have been assumed (without discussion) by the High Court that the prosecution was required to prove all of the elements of the offence charged (see, e.g. R v Porter (1933) 55 CLR 182; R v Sodeman (1936) 55 CLR 192; R v Stapleton (1952) 86 CLR 358).

32. This approach does not address the difficulties that arise if the presence of a mental illness prevents the prosecution from proving that the accused had the requisite mental state. It is possible that the accused would be entitled to a complete acquittal in such circumstances.

[1157] Where a similar phrase was interpreted in the United Kingdom, the courts originally held that the prosecution had to prove all of the elements of the charged offence (R v Egan [1998] 1 Cr App R 121). This approach was later overruled, with the courts holding that the prosecution only had to prove the actus reus of the charged offence (Attorney-General's Reference (No. 3 of 1998) [2000] QB 401; R v Antoine [2001] 1 AC 340).

33. This approach appears to have been adopted in the trial of Donna Fitchett. In R v Fitchett (2009) 23 VR 91, Nettle JA is reported as having told the jury that they needed to find all of the elements of murder proven (at para 26). However, the issue did not form a ground of appeal, and appears not to have been directly addressed.

The Stiles Approach

34. In the only Victorian case to directly address this issue, the Court of Appeal also held that the prosecution had to prove all of the elements. However, they stated that when deciding whether the prosecution has proved its case, the jury must assume that the accused was of sound mind (R v Stiles (1990) 50 A Crim R 13. See also R v Perkins [1983] WAR 184).

35. Under this approach the jury should not consider any evidence of mental illness when determining whether the elements of the offence have been proven. Consequently, if evidence of mental illness provides the only reason for doubting that the accused had the requisite mental state, he or she should either be convicted or found not guilty because of mental impairment, depending on whether the requirements of the defence are established on the balance of probabilities.

36. This approach has been used in a number of recent NSW single judge decisions (see, e.g. R v Grant [2009] NSWSC 833; R v Tarantello [2011] NSWSC 383).

The Hawkins Approach

37. In Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500, the High Court held, in the context of the Tasmanian Criminal Code, that the prosecution only needs to prove that the accused voluntarily committed the 'incriminated act'. They do not need to be satisfied that the accused acted with the requisite specific intention.

38. Under this approach, where the accused is charged with an offence that requires proof of a specific intention:

    - The jury must first determine whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused voluntarily committed the relevant act. Evidence of mental illness should not be taken into account when making this determination;
    - If the jury is satisfied that the accused committed the relevant act, they must next determine whether the requirements of the mental impairment defence have been proven on the balance of probabilities. If so, they should return a qualified acquittal.
    - If the jury is not satisfied that the mental impairment defence has been established, the jury must next determine whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused had the necessary specific intention. Evidence of mental illness may be taken into account when making this determination (Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500).

39. This approach has been followed in a number of cases in other jurisdictions (see, e.g. R v Toki [2003] NSWCCA 125; R v Minani (2005) 63 NSWLR 490; Garrett v R [1999] WASCA 169; Ward v R (2000) 118 A Crim R 78 (Kennedy, Wallwork and Scott JJ)).

40. However, other judgments have highlighted a number of difficulties with the Hawkins approach, and have sought to limit its application (see, e.g. Ward v R (2000) 118 A Crim R 78 (Wheeler J); R v Nolan WA CCA 22/5/97; Stanton v R (2001) 24 WAR 233; [2001] WASCA 189).

Other Approaches

41. A number of other approaches have been taken to this issue, both in Australia and in other common law jurisdictions. These include:

- Requiring the prosecution to prove all of the elements of the charged offence, but directing the jury to return a qualified acquittal if the accused's illness provided the reason for them failing to be satisfied about those elements (R v Pantelic (1973) 1 ACTR 1; Taylor v R (1978) 22 ALR 599 (Smithers J));
- Requiring the prosecution to only prove the actus reus of the charged offence (Attorney-General's Reference (No. 3 of 1998) [2000] QB 401; R v Antoine [2001] 1 AC 340);
- Requiring the prosecution to prove the actus reus and, if there is objective evidence raising the issue, any specific knowledge or intention necessary to constitute the offence (R v Ardler (2004) 144 A Crim R 552; R v King (2005) 155 ACTR 55; R v Clements [2006] ACTSC 44);

Other Matters for Consideration

42. When determining which approach to take to this issue, judges may wish to consider the following matters:
    - At what point should other defences, such as self-defence or consent, be considered by the jury;
    - If the prosecution is not required to prove mens rea, what verdict should the jury return where the same conduct forms the actus reus of a number of different offences (e.g. murder and manslaughter);
    - What is the prosecution required to prove in cases involving negligence, complicity or inchoate offence.

When to Give a Charge on Mental Impairment

43. Once a jury has been empanelled, if there is admissible evidence that raises the question of mental impairment, the judge must direct the jury to consider the question (s 22(2)). This reflects the position at common law (R v McMahon (2004) 8 VR 101; R v Shields [1967] VR 706; R v Meddings [1966] VR 306; Bratty v Attorney-General for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386).
44. A charge concerning mental impairment will therefore always need to be given if there is admissible evidence that raises the issue (unless the prosecution and the defence agree, prior to empanelment, that the proposed evidence will establish the defence, and the trial judge is satisfied that that is the case. See "Consent Hearings" above).
45. It may therefore be necessary to charge the jury about mental impairment even if neither the prosecution nor the defence seek to raise the question, or actively oppose it being left to the jury, if there is admissible evidence on the issue (see, e.g. Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500).
46. The time at which the charge should be given will depend on the resolution of the issues outlined in "Mental Impairment and Proof of Elements" above. For example:
    - If the Stiles approach is adopted, the charge should be given after directing the jury about all of the elements of the offence.
    - If the Hawkins approach is adopted, the judge may wish to give the charge before directing the jury about the prosecution's need to prove specific intention.

Content of the Charge

47. The term "mental impairment" is a legal term, not a medical term. It is therefore for the trial judge to determine what is meant by the term and to explain its meaning to the jury (R v Falconer [1990] 171 CLR 30; R v Tonkin [1975] Qd R 1; R v Kemp [1957] 1 QB 399).
48. The judge should clearly explain what the prosecution must prove before the jury considers the defence of mental impairment. This will depend on the resolution of the issues outlined in "Mental Impairment and Proof of Elements" above.

49. The judge must explain to the jury the findings which may be made in a case where mental impairment is in issue (i.e. guilty, not guilty or not guilty because of mental impairment (s 22(2)).

50. The judge must also explain to the jury the legal consequences of those findings (s 22(2); R v Fitchett (2009) 23 VR 91).[1158]

51. This requirement was introduced to address the concern that, in the absence of any information about the processes that would follow a finding of not guilty because of mental impairment, some jury members might be reluctant to hand down an exculpatory verdict, due to the perception that it could result in the immediate release of a disturbed and dangerous person. In most cases, that would almost certainly not be the case (R v Fitchett (2009) 23 VR 91. See also R v Weise [1969] VR 953).

52. This part of the charge must therefore:

    - Inform the jury about the nature of the decisions that will have to be made following a finding of not guilty because of mental impairment; and
    - Explain to the jury that there is a process to be followed which will focus upon the question of the appropriate disposition of the person in the particular circumstances of the case (R v Fitchett (2009) 23 VR 91).

53. The judge is not empowered to prognosticate upon or pre-empt the decisions to be made with respect to the accused's disposition (R v Fitchett (2009) 23 VR 91).

54. The judge must not convey any impression concerning the desirability, punitive features or public safety aspects of arriving at a particular verdict (R v Fitchett (2009) 23 VR 91).

55. While there is no set formulation for what must be said, the Court of Appeal in R v Fitchett (2009) 23 VR 91 approved the following charge given by Osborn J in R v Gemmill (12/11/03 Vic SC):

> If you find the accused guilty, then there will be a further hearing before me and I will have to determine how he should be sentenced. If you find him not guilty, that is completely not guilty, he will be discharged and be free to walk away from the court. If you find him not guilty because of mental impairment, then there are two options open to me. The first is to declare that he is liable to a supervision order under the Crimes (Mental Impairment and Unfitness to be Tried) Act (1997) and the second is to order that he be released unconditionally. I would have to form a view on evidence as to what was the appropriate course to be followed.
> A Supervision order, which is the first option that would be open to me, may commit the person to custody, or release the person on conditions decided by the court and specified in the Order. So you can see that those are the different legal consequences that follow from the different verdicts available to you. And you can see, as I have told you, that a verdict of not guilty because of mental impairment, has quite different consequences from a verdict of not guilty, ...

Last updated: 23 November 2011

8.4.1 Charge: Mental Impairment

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Warning! The law is currently unclear on when this direction should be given within a charge. See 8.4 Mental Impairment for guidance on that issue.

[1158] This differs from the law in most other areas, where it is generally considered undesirable to direct a jury about the consequences of their verdict (see, e.g. Lucas v R (1970) 120 CLR 171).

Introduction

In this case, defence counsel[1159] has raised what is called the "defence of mental impairment", submitting that NOA should be found not guilty of [insert name of offence] because s/he was mentally impaired when s/he [insert relevant acts]. I therefore need to give you some directions about this defence.

Onus and Standard of Proof

According to the law, people should not be held criminally responsible for acts they do while suffering particular effects of a mental impairment. So even if the prosecution can prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA [identify matters the prosecution must prove],[1160] s/he will not be guilty of [identify offence] if s/he committed those acts while suffering certain mental conditions.

However, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the law presumes that people are not mentally impaired. So if you are to find that NOA was not guilty because of a mental impairment, it is the defence who must prove that s/he was mentally impaired at the time s/he [did the acts/made the omissions] said to constitute the crime.

You can see that this is one of those rare situations in which a matter must be proved by the defence. The prosecution must still prove [identify matters the prosecution must prove] before you need to consider the issue of mental impairment. However, if you are satisfied that those matters have all been proven, it is defence counsel who must prove the requirements of this defence if you are to find the accused not guilty because of mental impairment.

Unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – the defence only needs to prove these requirements on what is called the "balance of probabilities". This is a much lower standard than that required of the prosecution when proving an offence. It only requires the defence to prove that it is more probable than not that NOA was mentally impaired to the necessary degree.

Overview of Requirements

There are two requirements that the defence must prove, on the balance of probabilities, if you are to find the accused not guilty because of mental impairment. I will list them for you, and then explain each one in more detail.

First, the defence must prove that the accused was suffering from a mental impairment at the time that s/he did the acts said to constitute the relevant crime.

Second, the defence must prove that the mental impairment affected the accused in one of two ways. It must have affected the accused in such a way that s/he either did not know the nature and quality of what s/he was doing, or s/he did not know that what s/he was doing was wrong.

If you find that the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that [identify matters the prosecution must prove], and you are also satisfied that both of these requirements have been proven by the defence on the balance of probabilities, then this defence will be successful and you must find NOA not guilty of that offence because of mental impairment.

[1159] This charge is based on the assumption that the defence has raised the issue of mental impairment. If it is the prosecution that has raised the issue, the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[1160] It is unclear precisely which matters the prosecution must prove (see "Mental Impairment and Proof of Elements" in 8.4 Mental Impairment). The content of this part of the charge, as well as similar sections below, will depend on how the judge resolves these issues.

However, if the defence cannot prove, on the balance of probabilities, both that NOA had a mental impairment at the relevant time, and that the mental impairment affected him/her in one of the two ways I have just mentioned, then this defence will fail. If you are also satisfied that all of the elements of the offence have been proven by the prosecution, beyond reasonable doubt, you should find NOA guilty of [insert offence].

I will now explain each of these requirements in more detail.

Mental Impairment

The first requirement that the defence must prove is that the accused was suffering from a mental impairment at the time that s/he did the acts said to constitute the crime of [insert offence].

The law does not define what "mental impairment" means. It is not a psychiatric term with a specific medical definition. It is a term which simply means a disease or illness of the mind. This includes [insert relevant mental impairments].

[If there is evidence that the accused may have been suffering from a temporary state of mind rather than a mental impairment, add the following shaded section.]

To satisfy this requirement, the accused must have been suffering from some kind of mental illness or disorder, and not just from a temporary state of mind such as impulsiveness or passion. This is not to suggest that the mental impairment needs to be permanent – but it must be something more than just a passing mental malfunction.

[If there is evidence that the accused's mental impairment was caused by an external factor, add the following shaded section.]

To satisfy this requirement, the mental impairment must have been caused by something "internal" to the accused, as distinct from being the result of an external physical factor, such as [insert relevant example].

In this case, the defence alleged that NOA was suffering from a mental impairment when s/he [insert relevant acts and summary of evidence and/or arguments]. The prosecution denied this, submitting [insert summary of relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to decide, based on all of the evidence, if NOA was suffering from a mental impairment at the relevant time. It is only if the defence has proved that this was more likely than not that this first requirement will be met.

Effect of the Mental Impairment

The second requirement that the defence must prove relates to the effect of the mental impairment on the accused. The defence must prove that the mental impairment affected him/her to such an extent that when s/he committed the acts said to constitute the crime s/he either:

- Did not know the nature and quality of what s/he was doing; or
- Did not know that what s/he was doing was wrong.

The defence only needs to prove one of these effects, although in some cases there may be evidence of both. I will look at each of them in turn.

Nature and Quality of the Act

The first way in which the defence can satisfy this requirement is by proving, on the balance of probabilities, that the accused's mental impairment affected him/her to such an extent that s/he did not know the nature and quality of what s/he was doing.

This means that because of his/her mental impairment, the accused was unable to appreciate the physical nature and significance of what s/he was doing when s/he committed the acts said to constitute the crime. The accused was affected by his/her mental impairment in a way which led him/her to believe s/he was doing one thing, when in reality s/he was doing something completely different.

An example of this would be where a person thinks she is entering her own house, when she is in fact breaking into Parliament House. Another example would be a person who thinks that he is killing a rabbit, when in reality he is killing one of his friends.

[If this limb is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case the defence argued that NOA did not know the nature and quality of what s/he was doing when [insert relevant acts and summary of relevant evidence and/or arguments]. The prosecution responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

[If this limb is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

The defence has not sought to rely on this part of the second requirement, instead alleging that NOA did not know that his/her actions were wrong.

Knowledge that NOA's actions were wrong

The second way in which the defence can satisfy this requirement is by proving, on the balance of probabilities, that when the accused committed the acts said to constitute the crime, the mental impairment affected him/her to such an extent that s/he did not know that what s/he was doing was wrong.

The law defines this to mean that the accused could not reason with a moderate degree of sense and composure about whether his/her conduct, as perceived by reasonable people, was wrong.

You can see from this definition that the test is not whether the accused's acts were in fact wrong, or that accused knew that his/her actions were wrong according to the law or morality. It is that the accused was not able to reason in such a way that s/he would have known that reasonable people would consider his/her conduct to be wrong. That is, there was something so wrong with the accused's mind due to his/her mental impairment that s/he was incapable of realising that reasonable people would think his/her behaviour was wrong.

[If this limb is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case the defence argued that NOA did not know that what s/he was doing was wrong when [insert relevant acts and summary of relevant evidence and/or arguments]. The prosecution responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

[If this limb is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

The defence has not sought to rely on this part of the second requirement, instead alleging that NOA did not know the nature and quality of what s/he was doing.

Summary, Possible Verdicts and Consequences

To summarise, you must first determine whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, [identify matters the prosecution must prove]. If you are not satisfied that the prosecution has proven all of these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of that offence, regardless of your views about his/her possible mental impairment. As s/he will not have been convicted of that offence, that will be the end of the legal process. S/he will be discharged and free to walk away from the court.

If you decide that the prosecution has proven all of those matters beyond reasonable doubt, you must then look at the defence of mental impairment. You must determine whether the defence has proven, on the balance of probabilities, that:

- One – NOA had a mental impairment at the time s/he did the acts said to constitute that offence; and
- Two – that the mental impairment affected NOA in such a way that when s/he committed the acts said to constitute the offence, s/he did not know the nature and quality of what s/he was doing or s/he did not know that what s/he was doing was wrong.

It is only if the accused has established both of these requirements on the balance of probabilities that you may return a verdict of "not guilty because of mental impairment".

If that is your verdict, then there will be two options open to me. The first is to declare that the accused is liable to a Supervision Order, and the second is to order that s/he be released unconditionally. I would have to form a view, based on the evidence, as to what was the appropriate course to be followed.

A Supervision Order, which is the first option that would be open to me, may commit the person to custody, or release the person on conditions decided by the court and specified in the Order.

So you can see that there are different legal consequences that follow from the different verdicts available to you. And you can see, as I have told you, that a verdict of not guilty because of mental impairment has quite different consequences from a verdict of not guilty.

Because of these different consequences, it is necessary for you to tell me, if you reach a verdict of not guilty, whether you have reached that verdict because of mental impairment or not.

Although I have just explained to you the possible consequences of the different verdicts available in this case, it is important that you do not take these consequences into account in making your determination. As I told you earlier, you have an obligation to make your decision based on the evidence in the case, not on irrelevant factors such as the consequences of your decision.

Last updated: 23 November 2011

8.4.2 Checklist: Mental Impairment

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used where mental impairment has been raised by the defence. It is designed to be used along with a checklist outlining the elements of the offence in issue. Details of the specific offence will need to be inserted in the appropriate places.

Where mental impairment has been raised following a finding that the accused is not fit to be tried, references to finding the accused "guilty of [insert offence]" must be changed to "committed the offence of [insert offence]"

Two matters the defence must prove on the balance of probabilities:

1. That the accused was suffering from a mental impairment at the time s/he did the acts said to constitute the offence; and

2. That when the accused did those acts, the mental impairment affected him/her to such an extent that s/he either:

i) Did not know the nature and quality of what s/he was doing; or

ii) Did not know that what s/he was doing was wrong.

Mental Impairment

1. Has the defence proven, on the balance of probabilities, that the accused was suffering from a mental impairment at the time s/he did the acts said to constitute the offence of [insert offence]?

If Yes, then go to 2.1

If No, then the Accused is guilty of [insert offence] (as long as you are satisfied that the prosecution has proved all of the elements of that offence beyond reasonable doubt)

Effect of Mental Impairment

2.1 When the accused did the acts said to constitute the offence, did the mental impairment affect him/her to such an extent that s/he did not know the nature and quality of what s/he was doing?

If Yes, then the Accused is not guilty of [insert offence] because of mental impairment (as long as you also answered yes to question 1, and are satisfied that the prosecution has proved all of the elements of that offence beyond reasonable doubt)

If No, then go to 2.2

2.2 When the accused did the acts said to constitute the offence, did the mental impairment affect him/her to such an extent that s/he did not know that what s/he was doing was wrong?

Consider: Could the accused not reason, with a moderate degree of sense and composure, about whether his/her conduct, as perceived by reasonable people, was wrong?

If Yes, then the Accused is not guilty of [insert offence] because of mental impairment (as long as you also answered yes to question 1, and are satisfied that the prosecution has proved all of the elements of that offence beyond reasonable doubt)

If No, then the Accused is guilty of [insert offence] (as long as you also answered No to question 2.1, and are satisfied that the prosecution has proved all of the elements of that offence beyond reasonable doubt.)

Last updated: 11 December 2012

8.5 Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14)

Click here for a Word version of this document

Introduction

1. Prior to 2005, the issue of intoxication in Victoria was governed solely by the common law. This situation has been altered by the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005 and the Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014, which introduced s 9AJ (now repealed) and s 322T respectively into the Crimes Act 1958.
2. This topic covers the issue of intoxication under s 322T of the Crimes Act 1958 and applies to all offences committed on or after 1 November 2014.
3. Section 322T applies to defences, which is defined to include self-defence, duress and sudden or extraordinary emergency.
4. Section 9AJ of the Crimes Act 1958 applies to homicide offences committed on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014 and the defences to those offences. See 8.5 Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14) (23/11/05–31/10/14).
5. The common law on intoxication remains relevant in respect of non-homicide offences committed before 1 November 2014 and the defences to those offences, and to all offences committed before 23 November 2005 and the defences to those offences. See 8.7 Common Law Intoxication.

6. As s 322T of the Crimes Act 1958 applies only to defences, the common law in relation to intoxication also continues to apply to all offences, committed on or after 1 November 2014, for the purposes of negating an element of the offence (e.g. voluntariness or intention), or to prove that the accused committed the offence (e.g. by explaining the accused's behaviour). See 8.7 Common Law Intoxication.

Relevant Defences

7. The intoxication provision in s 322T defines defences to include self-defence (s 322K), duress (s 322O) and sudden and extraordinary emergency (s 322R).
8. In particular, it applies to the elements of those defences that refer to either a 'reasonable belief' or a 'reasonable response' of the accused (Crimes Act 1958 ss 322T(2)–(4)).
9. Courts have not yet identified whether s 322T applies to any common law defences, or to statutory defences which contain elements of reasonable belief or reasonable response. One defence which s 322T might apply to is the belief in consent defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 45(4) (as in force before 1 July 2016), under which the accused must first prove that he or she had reasonable grounds for believing that the complainant was aged 16 or older at the time of the alleged offence. As a matter of prudence, for the purpose of this Charge Book, we have assumed that s 322T does not apply to this defence.

Onus of Proof

10. The onus of proof regarding whether the accused's intoxication was self-induced is not clear on the wording of s 322T, and Victorian courts have not considered the issue.
11. On one hand, s 322T(5) states that intoxication 'is self-induced unless' one of a number of circumstances set out in s 322T(5)(a)–(d) exists. This may indicate a presumption that the intoxication is self-induced unless the accused proves that at least one of those circumstances exists.
12. On the other hand, it seems unlikely that s 322T would be interpreted as requiring the accused to prove an aspect of his/her defence, inconsistently with the presumption of innocence, without clear language to that effect (see, e.g. Slaveski v Smith (2012) 34 VR 206 [24], [45]; WBM v Chief Commissioner of Police (2012) 43 VR 446 [97] (Warren CJ); Nigro v Secretary to the Department of Justice (2013) 41 VR 359 [73]; Victoria Police Toll Enforcement v Taha (2013) 49 VR 1 [192] (Tate JA); Carolan v The Queen (2015) 48 VR 87 [46]).
13. Section 322I of the Crimes Act 1958 states that an accused has only an evidential onus to raise the defence of self-defence, duress or sudden and extraordinary emergency, while the prosecution has the legal onus of negating the defence raised beyond reasonable doubt. Section 322I falls within Part IC of the Crimes Act, which includes the statutory defences of self-defence, duress and sudden and extraordinary emergency as well as s 322T on intoxication in the context of those defences.
14. Even though the fact that the accused's intoxication was not self-induced does not, on its own, constitute one of these defences, it is an aspect of each of them. Therefore s 322I provides additional support for the view that the prosecution has the onus of proof in respect of whether the intoxication was self-induced.
15. As a matter of prudence, this charge book adopts the approach that the accused is required only to introduce evidence to the effect that his/her intoxication was not self-induced and that, once such evidence is raised by the defence, the onus is on the prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused's intoxication was not self-induced.

Meaning of intoxication

16. Intoxication for the purposes of s 322T is not defined, but expressly includes 'intoxication because of the influence of alcohol, a drug or any other substance' (Crimes Act 1958 s 322T(1)). Other substances causing intoxication might include, for example, glue or petrol.

Self-Induced Intoxication

17. The intoxication provision in s 322T operates differently depending on whether the accused's intoxication was self-induced. If there is evidence that the accused's intoxication was not self-induced, it will be important for the jury to determine this question.

18. Intoxication will not be self-induced if it came about involuntarily or because of 'fraud, sudden or extraordinary emergency, accident, reasonable mistake, duress or force' (Crimes Act 1958 ss 322T(5)(a)–(b)).

19. Intoxication will also not be self-induced if it came about from using a prescription drug in accordance with the directions of the person who prescribed it, from using a non-prescription drug for a purpose and at the dosage level recommended by the manufacturer or from using a medicinal cannabis product in accordance with a patient medicinal cannabis access authorisation. However, if a person using the prescription or non-prescription drug knew or had reason to believe, when taking the drug, that it would significantly impair his/her judgment or control, then the resultant intoxication will be self-induced (Crimes Act 1958 ss 322T(5)(c), (5)(ca), (5)(d),(6)).

'Reasonable belief' elements of a defence

20. In determining whether a person had a reasonable belief, as an element of the defence of self-defence, duress or sudden and extraordinary emergency, the relevant standard is generally that of reasonable person who is not intoxicated (Crimes Act 1958 s 322T(2)).

21. The operation of s 322T(2) can be illustrated using an example. In determining whether an accused's belief was reasonable under the duress provisions of the Crimes Act 1958, the jury ordinarily uses the standard of 'a reasonable person possessing the personal characteristics of the accused that might have affect the accused's appreciation of the circumstances' (DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [8]).

22. However, s 322T means that where the accused was under the effect of self-induced intoxication at the time of his or her offending, that particular characteristic of the accused – his or her level of intoxication – must not be taken into account (see DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [46]). The jury should consider what a reasonable sober person (with the other relevant characteristics of the accused) might have believed.

23. The exception to the general rule in s 322T(2) is where the accused's intoxication at the time he or she committed the offence was not self-induced. Then the relevant standard is a reasonable person intoxicated to the same extent as the accused (Crimes Act 1958 s 322T(4)).

24. Section 322T does not affect the determination of the accused's subjective beliefs. For example, in determining whether an accused believed his or her actions were necessary in self-defence, his or level of intoxication must be taken into account. Section 322T is relevant only in determining whether an accused's beliefs were reasonable.

'Reasonable response' elements of a defence

25. In determining whether a person's response was reasonable, as an element of the defence of self-defence, duress or sudden and extraordinary emergency, the relevant standard is generally that of reasonable person who is not intoxicated (Crimes Act 1958 s 322T(3)).

26. The operation of s 322T(3) can be illustrated using an example. In determining the reasonableness of an accused's response to the circumstances under the self-defence provisions, the jury may take into account personal characteristics of the accused such his or her age, gender or health. However, s 322T(3) means that the jury must not take into account any self-induced intoxication of the accused. The jury should consider how a reasonable sober person (with the other relevant characteristics of the accused) might have responded to the threat.

27. The exception to the general rule in s 322T(2) is where the accused's intoxication at the time he or she committed the offence was not self-induced. Then the relevant standard is a reasonable person intoxicated to the same extent as the accused (Crimes Act 1958 s 322T(4)).

Last updated: 19 March 2018

8.5.1 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (Self-Induced)

Click here for a Word version of this document

This charge should be given where:

i) there is evidence the accused was intoxicated when s/he committed any offence on or after 1 November 2014;

ii) a defence of self-defence, duress, or sudden and extraordinary emergency is in issue; and

iii) it is not contested that the accused's intoxication was self-induced.

The relevant aspects of this charge should be inserted into directions on the defence in issue: self-defence, duress, or sudden and extraordinary emergency.

'Reasonable belief' element of a defence

[If any element of the defence relates to whether the accused had a reasonable belief*, add the following shaded section to the directions on that element:*]

In this case you have heard evidence that NOA was intoxicated at the time that s/he [insert relevant act]. If you find that s/he was intoxicated, you must not take this into account when assessing whether his/her belief about [insert relevant reasonable belief element] was reasonable. The law requires you to consider what the beliefs of a reasonable person who was sober might have been.

'Reasonable response' element of a defence

[If any element of the defence relates to whether the accused's response was reasonable*, add the following shaded section to the directions on that element:*]

In this case you have heard evidence that NOA was intoxicated at the time that s/he [insert relevant act]. If you find that s/he was intoxicated, you must not take this into account when assessing whether his/her response to [insert relevant reasonable response element] was reasonable. The law requires you to consider what the response of a reasonable person who was sober might have been.

Last updated: 27 September 2016

8.5.2 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (Self-Induced Contested)

Click here for a Word version of this document

When to use this charge

This charge should be given where:

i) there is evidence the accused was intoxicated when s/he committed any offence on or after 1 November 2014;

ii) a defence of self-defence, duress, or sudden and extraordinary emergency is in issue; and

iii) the defence raises evidence to the effect that the accused's intoxication was not self-induced.

Caution should be exercised in giving this direction. Victorian courts have not considered which party has the onus of proof when self-induced intoxication is in issue. See 'Onus of Proof' in 8.5 Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14).

The relevant aspects of this charge should be inserted into directions on the defence in issue: self-defence, duress, or sudden and extraordinary emergency.

Intoxication – whether self-induced

[If any elements of the defence relate to whether the accused had a reasonable belief OR to whether the accused's response was reasonable*, add the following shaded section to the directions on that element. If more than one such element is relevant to a particular defence, you need only add the following shaded section to the first of those elements:*]

In this case you have heard evidence that NOA was intoxicated at the time that s/he [insert relevant act]. If you find that NOA was intoxicated, you must decide whether the intoxication was self-induced, which means whether NOA was responsible for the intoxication himself/herself.

How do you decide whether NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication? The law says that a person is responsible for his/her intoxication unless it:

[Insert relevant direction]

(a) Occurred involuntarily;

(b) Occurred because of fraud, such as trickery or deception;

(c) Occurred because of a sudden or extraordinary emergency;

(d) Occurred because of an accident;

(e) Occurred because of a reasonable mistake;

(f) Occurred because s/he became intoxicated under duress or force, for example, by threats or coercion;

(g) Occurred because s/he took a prescription drug while following the prescribed directions and did not know or have reason to believe that it would significantly impair his/her judgment or control;

(h) Occurred because s/he took a non-prescription drug for its recommended purpose and at its recommended dosage and did not know or have reason to believe that it would significantly impair his/her judgment or control.

The defence argued that [summarise defence argument and evidence]. The prosecution ask you to reject this [summarise prosecution argument and evidence].

'Reasonable belief' element of a defence

[If any element of the defence relates to whether the accused had a reasonable belief*, add the following shaded section to the directions on that element:*]

As part of deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the accused's belief was not reasonable, you must consider the evidence that NOA was intoxicated.

The first question you must consider is whether NOA's intoxication was self-induced, which means whether NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication.

If you find NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication, then you must not take his/her intoxication into account when assessing whether his/her belief about [insert relevant reasonable belief element] was reasonable. In other words, you must consider what the beliefs of a reasonable person who was sober might have been.

If you do not find NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication, then you must take his/her intoxication into account when assessing whether his/her belief about [insert relevant reasonable belief element] was reasonable. In other words, you must consider what the beliefs of a reasonable person might have been if he/she was intoxicated to the same extent as NOA.

Remember, the defence does not have to prove anything. Therefore, you must take intoxication into account for this element unless the prosecution proves that NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication.

'Reasonable response' element of a defence

[If any element of the defence relates to whether the accused's response was reasonable*, add the following shaded section to the directions on that element:*]

As part of deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the accused's response was not reasonable, you must consider the evidence that NOA was intoxicated.

The first question you must consider is whether NOA's intoxication was self-induced, which means whether NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication.

If you find NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication, then you must not take his/her intoxication into account when assessing whether his/her response to [insert relevant reasonable response element] was reasonable. In other words, you must consider what the response of a reasonable person who was sober might have been.

If you do not find NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication, then you must take his/her intoxication into account when assessing whether his/her response to [insert relevant reasonable response element] was reasonable. In other words, you must consider what the response of a reasonable person might have been if he/she was intoxicated to the same extent as NOA.

Remember, the defence does not have to prove anything. Therefore, you must take intoxication into account for this element unless the prosecution proves that NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication.

Last updated: 27 September 2016

8.6 Statutory Intoxication (23/11/05–31/10/14)

Click here for a Word version of this document

Introduction

1. Prior to 2005, the issue of intoxication in Victoria was governed solely by the common law. This situation has been altered by the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005 and the Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014, which introduced s 9AJ (now repealed) and s 322T respectively into the Crimes Act 1958.

2. This topic covers the issue of intoxication under s 9AJ of the Crimes Act 1958, which applies to the statutory defences of self-defence, duress, and sudden and extraordinary emergency in respect of homicide offences committed on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014, and to the offence of defensive homicide committed in that period.

3. Section 322T of the Crimes Act 1958 applies to the defences of self-defence, duress and sudden or extraordinary emergency for all offences committed on or after 1 November 2014. See 8.5 Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14).

4. The common law on intoxication remains relevant in respect of non-homicide offences committed before 1 November 2014 and the defences to those offences, and to all offences committed before 23 November 2005 and the defences to those offences. See 8.7 Common Law Intoxication.

5. As both s 9AJ and s 322T of the Crimes Act 1958 apply only to certain statutory defences, the common law in relation to intoxication also continues to apply to all offences, whenever committed, for the purposes of negating an element of the offence (e.g. voluntariness or intention), or to prove that the accused committed the offence (e.g. by explaining the accused's behaviour). See 8.7 Common Law Intoxication.

Relevant Offences and Defences

6. The intoxication provision in s 9AJ apply to the defences of murder self-defence (s 9AC), manslaughter self-defence (s 9AE), and duress (s 9AG) and sudden and extraordinary emergency (s 9AI) in the context of a homicide offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AB).

7. Section 9AJ also applies to the offence of defensive homicide, an alternative to murder applicable where the accused believed he was acting in self-defence but without reasonable grounds for that belief (Crimes Act 1958 ss 9AB, 9AD).

8. In particular, it applies to the elements of those defences, or that offence, that refer to either a 'reasonable belief', 'reasonable grounds for a belief' or a 'reasonable response' on the part of the accused (Crimes Act 1958 ss 9AJ(1)–(3)).

Onus of Proof

9. The onus of proof regarding whether the accused's intoxication was self-induced is not clear on the wording of s 9AJ, and Victorian courts have not considered the issue.

10. On one hand, s 9AJ(5) states that intoxication 'is self-induced unless' one of a number of circumstances set out in s 9AJ(5)(a)–(d) exists. This may indicate a presumption that the intoxication is self-induced unless the accused proves that at least one of those circumstances exists.

11. On the other hand, it seems unlikely that s 9AJ would be interpreted as requiring the accused to prove an aspect of his/her defence, inconsistently with the presumption of innocence, without clear language to that effect (see, e.g. Slaveski v Smith (2012) 34 VR 206 [24], [45]; WBM v Chief Commissioner of Police (2012) 43 VR 446 [97] (Warren CJ); Nigro v Secretary to the Department of Justice (2013) 41 VR 359 [73]; Victoria Police Toll Enforcement v Taha (2013) 49 VR 1 [192] (Tate JA); Carolan v The Queen (2015) 48 VR 87 [46]).

12. As a matter of prudence, this charge book adopts the approach that the accused is required only to introduce evidence to the effect that his/her intoxication was not self-induced and that, once such evidence is raised by the defence, the onus is on the prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused's intoxication was not self-induced.

Meaning of intoxication

13. Intoxication for the purposes of s 9AJ is not defined, but expressly includes 'intoxication because of the influence of alcohol, a drug or any other substance' (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AB(1)). Other substances causing intoxication might include, for example, glue or petrol.

Self-Induced Intoxication

14. The intoxication provision in s 9AJ operates differently depending on whether the accused's intoxication was self-induced or not. If there is evidence that the accused's intoxication was not self-induced, it will be important for the jury to determine this question.

15. Intoxication will not be self-induced if it came about involuntarily or because of 'fraud, sudden or extraordinary emergency, accident, reasonable mistake, duress or force' (Crimes Act 1958 ss 9AJ(5)(a)–(b)).

16. Intoxication will also not be self-induced if it came about from using a prescription drug in accordance with the directions of the person who prescribed it, or from using a non-prescription drug for a purpose and at the dosage level recommended by the manufacturer. However, if a person using the prescription or non-prescription drug knew or had reason to believe, when taking the drug, that it would significantly impair his/her judgment or control, then the resultant intoxication will be self-induced (Crimes Act 1958 ss 9AJ(5)(c)–(d),(6)).

'Reasonable belief' elements of a defence

17. In determining whether a person had a reasonable belief, as an element of the defence of duress or sudden and extraordinary emergency, the relevant standard is generally that of reasonable person who is not intoxicated (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AJ(1)).

18. The operation of s 9AJ(1) can be illustrated using an example. In determining whether an accused's belief was reasonable under the duress provisions of the Crimes Act 1958, the jury ordinarily uses the standard of 'a reasonable person possessing the personal characteristics of the accused that might have affect the accused's appreciation of the circumstances' (DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [8]).

19. However, s 9AJ(1) means that where the accused was under the effect of self-induced intoxication at the time of his or her offending, that particular characteristic of the accused – his or her level of intoxication – must not be taken into account (see DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [46]). The jury should consider what a reasonable sober person (with the other relevant characteristics of the accused) might have believed.

20. The exception to the general rule in s 9AJ(1) is where the accused's intoxication at the time he or she committed the offence was not self-induced. Then the relevant standard is a reasonable person intoxicated to the same extent as the accused (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AJ(4)).

21. Section 9AJ(1) does not affect the determination of the accused's subjective beliefs. For example, in determining whether an accused believed his or her actions were necessary in self-defence, his or level of intoxication must be taken into account. Section 9AJ(1) is relevant only in determining whether an accused's beliefs were reasonable.

'Reasonable grounds for a belief' elements of an offence or defence

22. In determining whether a person had reasonable grounds for a belief, as an element of the offence of defensive homicide or the defences of murder self-defence or manslaughter self-defence, the relevant standard is generally that of reasonable person who is not intoxicated (Crimes Act 1958 9AJ(2)).

23. The operation of s 9AJ(2) can be illustrated using an example. In determining whether the accused had reasonable grounds for believing that his/her conduct was necessary in self-defence, the jury may take into account personal characteristics of the accused. However, s 9AJ(2) means that the jury must not take into account any self-induced intoxication of the accused. The jury should consider whether there were reasonable grounds for a sober person (with the other relevant characteristics of the accused) to have held that belief.

24. The exception to the general rule in s 9AJ(2) is where the accused's intoxication at the time he or she committed the offence was not self-induced. Then the relevant standard is a reasonable person intoxicated to the same extent as the accused (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AJ(2)).

'Reasonable response' elements of a defence

25. In determining whether a person's response was reasonable, as an element of the defence of duress or sudden and extraordinary emergency, the relevant standard is generally that of reasonable person who is not intoxicated (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AJ(4)).

26. The exception to the general rule in s 9AJ(4) is where the accused's intoxication at the time he or she committed the offence was not self-induced. Then the relevant standard is a reasonable person intoxicated to the same extent as the accused (Crimes Act 1958 s 322T(4)).

Last updated: 27 September 2016

8.6.1 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (23/11/05–31/10/14) (Self-Induced)

Click here to download a Word version of this document

This charge should be given where:

i) the accused is charged with murder, manslaughter or defensive homicide alleged to have been committed between 23 November 2005 and 31 October 2014;

ii) there is evidence the accused was intoxicated when s/he committed the offence;

iii) it is not contested that the accused's intoxication was self-induced; and

iv) a defence of self-defence, duress, or sudden and extraordinary emergency is in issue, or the offence of defensive homicide is raised as an alternative to murder.

The relevant aspects of this charge should be inserted into directions on the offence or defence in issue.

'Reasonable belief' element

[If any element of the defence relates to whether the accused had a reasonable belief*, add the following shaded section to the directions on that element.*]

In this case you have heard evidence that NOA was intoxicated at the time that s/he [insert relevant act]. If you find that s/he was intoxicated, you must not take this into account when assessing whether his/her belief about [insert relevant reasonable belief element] was reasonable. The law requires you to consider what the beliefs of a reasonable person who was sober might have been.

'Reasonable grounds for a belief' element

[If any element of the offence or defence relates to whether the accused had reasonable grounds for a belief*, add the following shaded section to the directions on that element*.]

In this case you have heard evidence that NOA was intoxicated at the time that s/he [insert relevant act]. If you find that s/he was intoxicated, you must not take this into account when assessing whether s/he had reasonable grounds for his/her belief about [insert relevant reasonable grounds element].

'Reasonable response' element

[If any element of the defence relates to whether the accused's response was reasonable*, add the following shaded section to the directions on that element.*]

In this case you have heard evidence that NOA was intoxicated at the time that s/he [insert relevant act].

If you find that s/he was intoxicated, you must not take this into account when assessing whether his/her response to [insert relevant reasonable response element] was reasonable. The law requires you to consider what the response of a reasonable person who was sober might have been.

Last updated: 27 September 2016

8.6.2 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (23/11/05–31/10/14) (Self-Induced Contested)

Click here to download a Word version of this document

This charge should be given where:

i) the accused is charged with murder, manslaughter or defensive homicide alleged to have been committed between 23 November 2005 and 31 October 2014;

ii) there is evidence the accused was intoxicated when s/he committed the offence;

iii) the defence raises evidence to the effect that the accused's intoxication was not self-induced; and

iv) a defence of self-defence, duress, or sudden and extraordinary emergency is in issue, or the offence of defensive homicide is raised as an alternative to murder.

Caution should be exercised in giving this direction. Victorian courts have not considered which party has the onus of proof when self-induced intoxication is in issue. See 'Onus of Proof' in 8.5 Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14) (23/11/05–31/10/14).

Intoxication – whether self-induced

[If any elements of the defence relate to whether the accused had a reasonable belief, reasonable grounds for a belief OR to whether the accused's response was reasonable*, add the following shaded section to the directions on that element. If more than one such element is relevant to a particular defence, you need only add the following shaded section to the first of those elements*.]

In this case you have heard evidence that NOA was intoxicated at the time that s/he [insert relevant act]. If you find that NOA was intoxicated, you must decide whether the intoxication was self-induced, which means whether NOA s/he was responsible for the intoxication himself/herself.

How do you decide whether NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication? The law says that a person is responsible for his/her intoxication unless it:

[Insert relevant direction]

(a) Occurred involuntarily;

(b) Occurred because of fraud, such as trickery or deception;

(c) Occurred because of a sudden or extraordinary emergency;

(d) Occurred because of an accident;

(e) Occurred because of a reasonable mistake;

(f) Occurred because s/he became intoxicated under duress or force, for example, by threats or coercion;

(g) Occurred because s/he took a prescription drug while following the prescribed directions and did not know or have reason to believe that it would significantly impair his/her judgment or control;

(h) Occurred because s/he took a non-prescription drug for its recommended purpose and at its recommended dosage and did not know or have reason to believe that it would significantly impair his/her judgment or control.

The defence argued that [summarise defence argument and evidence]. The prosecution ask you to reject this [summarise prosecution argument and evidence].

'Reasonable belief' element

[If any element of the defence relates to whether the accused had a reasonable belief*, add the following shaded section to the directions on that element*.]

As part of deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the accused's belief was not reasonable, you must consider the evidence that NOA was intoxicated.

The first question you must consider is whether NOA's intoxication was self-induced, which means whether NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication.

If you find NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication, then you must not take his/her intoxication into account when assessing whether his/her belief about [insert relevant reasonable belief element] was reasonable. In other words, you must consider what the beliefs of a reasonable person who was sober might have been.

If you do not find NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication, then you must take his/her intoxication into account when assessing whether his/her belief about [insert relevant reasonable belief element] was reasonable. In other words, you must consider what the beliefs of a reasonable person might have been if he/she was intoxicated to the same extent as NOA.

Remember, the defence does not have to prove anything. Therefore, you must take intoxication into account for this element unless the prosecution proves that NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication.

'Reasonable grounds for a belief' element

[If any element of the offence or defence relates to whether the accused had reasonable grounds for a belief*, add the following shaded section to the directions on that element*.]

As part of deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the accused's belief was not reasonable, you must consider the evidence that NOA was intoxicated.

The first question you must consider is whether NOA's intoxication was self-induced, which means whether NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication.

If you find NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication, then you must not take his/her intoxication into account when assessing whether he/she had reasonable grounds for the belief about [insert relevant reasonable grounds element].

If you do not find NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication, then you must take his/her intoxication into account when assessing whether he/she had reasonable grounds for the belief about [insert relevant reasonable grounds element].

Remember, the defence does not have to prove anything. Therefore, you must take intoxication into account for this element unless the prosecution proves that NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication.

'Reasonable response' element

[If any element of the defence relates to whether the accused's response was reasonable*, add the following shaded section to the directions on that element.*]

As part of deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the accused's response was not reasonable, you must consider the evidence that NOA was intoxicated.

The first question you must consider is whether NOA's intoxication was self-induced, which means whether NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication.

If you find NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication, then you must not take his/her intoxication into account when assessing whether his/her response to [insert relevant reasonable response element] was reasonable. In other words, you must consider what the response of a reasonable person who was sober might have been.

If you do not find NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication, then you must take his/her intoxication into account when assessing whether his/her response to [insert relevant reasonable response element] was reasonable. In other words, you must consider what the response of a reasonable person might have been if he/she was intoxicated to the same extent as NOA.

Remember, the defence does not have to prove anything. Therefore, you must take intoxication into account for this element unless the prosecution proves that NOA was responsible for his/her intoxication.

Last updated: 27 September 2016

8.7 Common Law Intoxication

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Scope

1. Prior to 2005, in Victoria the issue of intoxication was governed solely by the common law. This situation has been altered by the passage of the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005 and the Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014, which introduced s 9AJ (now repealed) and s 322T respectively into the Crimes Act 1958.
2. Section 9AJ applies to cases in which:
    - The accused is charged with murder, manslaughter, defensive homicide, attempted murder or attempted defensive homicide (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AB; R v Pepper (2007) 16 VR 637*; DPP v McAllister* [2007] VSC 315); and
    - It is alleged that the offence was committed on or after 23 November 2005 (Crimes Act 1958 s 603) and before 1 November 2014.
3. Section 322T applies to cases in which:
    - The accused is charged with any offence alleged to have been committed on or after 1 November 2014.
4. Consequently, the common law concerning intoxication continues to apply when:
    - The accused is charged with an offence other than those homicide offences listed above and the offence was alleged to have been committed before 1 November 2014; or
    - The accused is charged with one of the listed homicide offences, and it is alleged that the offence was committed before 23 November 2005.

5. Both sections 9AJ and 322T address the effect of intoxication on the question of "reasonableness".[1161] Thus, even where they apply, the common law concerning intoxication remains relevant to other issues (e.g. the effect of intoxication on the voluntariness of the accused's behaviour, or on his or her mental state).

6. This topic solely addresses the common law concerning intoxication. For information concerning the statutory provisions, see 8.5 Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14) (From 1/11/14) and 8.5 Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14) (23/11/05–31/10/14).

Overview: Relevance of Intoxication

7. The fact that a person acted under the influence of drugs or alcohol does not give rise to any specific defence or excuse (Viro v R (1978) 141 CLR 88; R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64).

8. This is the case even if the accused's intoxication was involuntary (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; R v Kingston [1995] 2 AC 355).[1162]

9. However, evidence that the accused was intoxicated at the time the offence was committed may be used for the following purposes:

    - To negate an element of the offence (e.g. voluntariness);
    - To prove an element of a defence (e.g. self-defence); or
    - To prove that the accused committed the offence (e.g. by providing an explanation for the accused's behaviour).

10. Other matters that may be affected by intoxication (but which are not addressed here) include:

    - The admissibility of a confession or admission made by a person who was intoxicated (see, e.g. Sinclair v R (1946) 73 CLR 316; R v Buchanan [1966] VR 9; R v Garth (1994) 73 A Crim R 215; R v Green [1999] VSC 419; R v Nelson [2004] NSWCCA 231);
    - The capacity of an intoxicated person to consent to a sexual act (see, e.g. R v Francis [1993] 2 Qd R 300; R v Bonora (1994) 35 NSWLR 74; R v Lambert [1919] VLR 205);
    - The jury's assessment of the reliability of evidence given by a witness who was intoxicated at the time of the event in question (see, e.g. O'Leary v Daire (1984) 13 A Crim R 404; Bedi v R (1993) 61 SASR 269; R v Mathe [2003] VSCA 165; R v Baltensberger (2004) 90 SASR 129; R v MC [2009] VSCA 122). See Charge: Assessing Witnesses and Charge: Review of the Assessment of Witnesses;
    - The jury's understanding of the way in which people other than the accused behaved before, during and after the event in question (see, e.g. R v Egan (1985) 15 A Crim R 20; R v Wilson (1986) 42 SASR 203; Aidid v R (2010) 25 VR 593).

Using Evidence of Intoxication to Negate an Element

11. Evidence of intoxication is part of the totality of evidence which may raise a reasonable doubt about the existence of one or more of the elements of an offence (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64).

[1161] For example, whether a belief was reasonable, whether there were reasonable grounds for a belief, or whether a response to a situation was reasonable.

[1162] The fact that the accused's intoxication was involuntary may be relevant to whether or not he or she acted negligently: see "Negligence" below.

12. If the prosecution cannot eliminate that doubt, the accused should be acquitted – not because he or she was intoxicated, but because the charge has not been proved beyond reasonable doubt (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64).

13. No distinction is drawn between intoxication that is induced by alcohol, drugs or a combination of both (R v Haywood [1971] VR 755; Viro v R (1978) 141 CLR 88; R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64).

Voluntariness

14. The existence of a voluntary act is an essential element of every offence. The accused must not be convicted for an act which was independent of his or her will (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64*; R v Marijancevic* (2009) 22 VR 576).

15. Consequently, if the accused did not commit the relevant act voluntarily due to intoxication, he or she must be acquitted (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; R v Martin (1983) 32 SASR 419; R v Faure [1999] 2 VR 537; R v Kumar [2006] VSCA 182).[1163]

16. In Victoria, this applies to all offences, not just offences of specific intent (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; R v Martin (1984) 51 ALR 540. Cf DPP v Majewski [1977] AC 443).

17. It is for the prosecution to prove that the accused acted voluntarily despite his or her level of intoxication (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; R v Coleman (1990) 19 NSWLR 467).

18. The issue is whether the accused in fact acted voluntarily, not whether he or she was capable of acting voluntarily (Viro v R (1978) 141 CLR 88; R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; R v Martin (1983) 32 SASR 419; R v Costa Vic CCA 2/4/96).

19. It will be rare that a person's state of intoxication will have been so extreme that his or her acts were involuntary. Intoxication is more likely to be relevant to the issue of intention (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64 (Barwick CJ)).

20. See 7.1.1 Voluntariness for information concerning the meaning of "voluntariness", and guidance about which act the accused must have committed voluntarily.

Intention

21. The accused must be acquitted if, due to intoxication, he or she:

    - Did not intend to do the physical act charged ("basic intent");[1164] or
    - Did not intend to attain the result required by the offence ("specific intent") (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; R v Martin (1983) 32 SASR 419; R v Coleman (1990) 19 NSWLR 467; R v Faure [1999] 2 VR 537; R v Kumar [2006] VSCA 182).

22. It is for the prosecution to prove that the accused acted with the requisite intention, despite his or her level of intoxication (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; R v Coleman (1990) 19 NSWLR 467).

23. The issue is whether the accused in fact formed the requisite intention, not whether he or she was capable of doing so (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; R v Haywood [1971] VR 755; Viro v R (1978) 141 CLR 88).

[1163] In many jurisdictions there are now statutory provisions specifying that self–induced intoxication cannot be taken into account in determining whether the accused's acts were voluntary. That is not the case in Victoria.

[1164] Australian law differs from the law in the United Kingdom, which holds that self–induced intoxication is irrelevant to crimes of basic intent (DPP v Majewski [1977] AC 443).

24. The mere fact that the accused acted differently than he or she would have behaved when sober is irrelevant. A drunken intent is, nevertheless, an intent (R v Sheehan [1975] 2 All ER 960; R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64 (Barwick CJ, Aickin J)).

25. The accused does not need to have appreciated the wrongfulness of his or her conduct to have acted with the requisite intention (R v Morrison (2007) 171 A Crim R 361).

26. It does not matter that the accused was unable to reason with a sufficient degree of composure, as long as he or she acted voluntarily and with the requisite intent (R v Collins [2004] ACTSC 48).

Knowledge or awareness of circumstances

27. Evidence of intoxication may be used to show that the accused had no knowledge or awareness of a particular circumstance (R v Coleman (1990) 19 NSWLR 467; Bedi v R (1993) 61 SASR 269; R v Costa Vic CCA 2/4/96; R v MC [2009] VSCA 122).

28. For example, evidence of intoxication may be used:

    - In a sexual offence case, to cast doubt on the prosecution's claim that the accused was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting (R v Costa Vic CCA 2/4/96; R v Egan (1985) 15 A Crim R 20; R v Wilson (1986) 42 SASR 203);[1165]
    - In an endangerment case, to cast doubt on the prosecution's claim that the accused knew that his or her actions were likely to endanger a person's life (Bedi v R (1993) 61 SASR 269).

Foresight of consequences ("recklessness")

29. Evidence of intoxication may be used to show that the accused did not foresee the consequences of his or her actions (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; R v Coleman (1990) 19 NSWLR 467; Bedi v R (1993) 61 SASR 269; R v Grant (2002) 55 NSWLR 80).

30. Consequently, where the accused is charged with an offence of recklessness,[1166] the prosecution will be required to prove that the accused knew that a particular consequence would probably result from his or her conduct, despite his or her level of intoxication (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; R v Coleman (1990) 19 NSWLR 467; Bedi v R (1993) 61 SASR 269; R v Grant (2002) 55 NSWLR 80).

Negligence

31. Offences of gross negligence (e.g. manslaughter) require proof:

    i) That the accused acted with criminal negligence; and

    ii) That the relevant act was committed voluntarily.

[1165] Even if this argument is accepted by the jury, it may not be sufficient to secure an acquittal on a charge of rape, as that offence can now also be established by proving that the accused did not give any thought to whether the complainant was not or might not be consenting (see 7.3.2 Rape (From 1/1/92)).

[1166] See 7.1.3 Recklessness.

32. Evidence of intoxication will generally not be relevant to the first issue, as the test for criminal negligence is objective (see, e.g. R v Richards & Gregory [1998] 2 VR 1; R v Lavender (2005) 222 CLR 67; R v Sam [2009] NSWSC 803. See also AG's Reference (No 1 of 1996) (1998) 7 Tas R 293).[1167]

33. However, evidence of intoxication may cast doubt on the prosecution's contention that the relevant act was committed voluntarily (R v Martin (1983) 9 A Crim R 376; R v Tajber (1986) 13 FCR 524).

Relevance of the level of intoxication

34. Different levels of intoxication affect the mind in different ways (He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523 (Brennan J)).

35. Intoxication to a particular degree may be relevant to the existence of one mental state but not the existence of another. For example, the level of intoxication required to negate voluntariness is far greater than the level of intoxication required to negate specific intention (He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523 (Brennan J)).

36. It does not matter that the accused was intoxicated to a substantial degree, or acted in a way he or she would not have acted had he or she not been intoxicated, so long as he or she acted voluntarily and with the requisite mental state (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; South Tweed Heads Rugby Football Club Ltd v Cole (2002) 55 NSWLR 113; Russell v Edwards (2006) 65 NSWLR 373).

37. Thus, even if the intoxication led to a change in personality, a warping of will, an alteration in disposition and a weakening in self-control, the accused will be criminally responsible for his or her acts unless the intoxication was so great that he or she had no will to act or did not form the necessary intention (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; South Tweed Heads Rugby Football Club Ltd v Cole (2002) 55 NSWLR 113; Russell v Edwards (2006) 65 NSWLR 373).

38. The accused may have acted voluntarily and intentionally despite the fact that the intoxication rendered him or her less aware of what he or she was doing, or of the quality, significance or consequence of his or her actions (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64 (Barwick CJ)).

39. However, the level of the accused's awareness and understanding of his or her actions at the relevant time will be a factor to be taken into account in determining whether he or she acted voluntarily and with the requisite intent (R v Morrison (2007) 171 A Crim R 361).

Prior criminal intent ("Dutch courage")

40. A difficulty can arise where the accused became intoxicated specifically for the purpose of gaining sufficient courage to commit the offence in question ("Dutch courage"), but at the time he or she committed the offence acted involuntarily or without the requisite mental state due to being intoxicated:

    - On the one hand, it would seem that the accused should not be convicted, as the basic requirements of criminal responsibility (voluntariness and mens rea) were not present at the time the offence was committed;
    - On the other hand, it would seem that the accused should be convicted, as he or she set out to commit the offence in question and actually did so.

[1167] If the accused's intoxication was involuntary, it is possible that it will be relevant to this issue: see, e.g. Flyger v Auckland City Council [1979] 1 NZLR 161; Rooke v Auckland City Council [1980] 1 NZLR 680; O'Neill v Ministry of Transport [1985] 2 NZLR 513.

41. Although this issue has not been directly addressed in Australia,[1168] the High Court has indicated that an accused may still be convicted for such offences, not because of any exception to the requirement of voluntariness and intention, but by virtue of those requirements being met (by the accused having voluntarily becoming intoxicated in order to commit the crime) (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64).[1169]

42. One problem with this approach is that the elements of voluntariness and intention (which existed at the time of becoming intoxicated) do not seem to be contemporaneous with the commission of the physical acts constituting the offence (which occurred at a later time) (see R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64 (Aickin J)).

43. This problem may be overcome by viewing the accused's conduct in becoming intoxicated and committing the physical act that constitutes the offence as part of the same transaction (see, e.g. Meli v R [1954] 1 WLR 228; R v Church [1966] 1 QB 59; Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378 (Mason CJ)).

Intoxication may affect the inferences that can be drawn

44. In most cases, the accused's mental state at the time of the offence will need to be inferred from his or her actions (R v Foster [2001] SASC 20).

45. The fact that the accused was intoxicated at that time may make it more difficult than it would otherwise be to infer from his or her actions that he or she had the requisite mental state (R v Perks (1986) 41 SASR 335; R v Wingfield [2001] SASC 20; R v Foster [2001] SASC 20; Spencer v R (2003) 137 A Crim R 444).[1170]

46. For example, while a jury might readily infer from the serious nature of injuries caused by a sober person that he or she had an intention to cause serious injury, such an inference might not be as readily drawn if the person was drunk or drugged at the relevant time (R v Wingfield [2001] SASC 20; R v Foster [2001] SASC 20; Spencer v R (2003) 137 A Crim R 444).[1171]

Loss of memory

47. The fact that the accused cannot remember the relevant events due to his or her state of intoxication does not mean that he or she acted involuntarily or without the requisite intention (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64 (Barwick CJ); R v Stockdale [2002] VSCA 202).

48. See "Loss of Memory" in 8.8 Automatism for further information about this issue.

[1168] The issue has been addressed in the United Kingdom, where it was held that an accused who chooses to become intoxicated in order to commit an offence is precluded from denying that he or she acted involuntarily or lacked the requisite mental state (AG for Northern Ireland v Gallagher [1963] AC 349). This appears to be an exception to the general principles of criminal responsibility, rather than an application of those principles.

[1169] Similarly, it is possible that a person who becomes intoxicated with an awareness that he or she will probably commit an offence (e.g. because he or she is prone to violence when intoxicated) may be held responsible for that offence on the grounds of recklessness (see R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64 per Stephen, Murphy and Aickin JJ, Barwick CJ dissenting).

[1170] In this regard, evidence of intoxication is no different from any other evidence that may affect the inferences that can be drawn from the proved facts (R v Foster [2001] SASC 20; R v Wingfield [2001] SASC 20).

[1171] See "Direct the jury about intoxication and inferences" below for further information about this issue.

Using Evidence of Intoxication to Prove a Defence

49. Evidence of intoxication may be relevant to the defences raised by the evidence (Bedi v R (1993) 61 SASR 269; R v Baltensperger (2004) 90 SASR 129).

50. This section provides a brief overview of how evidence of intoxication may be relevant to self-defence, provocation and mental impairment. However, this list is not exhaustive. For example, evidence of intoxication may also be relevant to the following defences:

    - Claim of right (e.g. if the accused believed, due to intoxication, that he or she had a right to possession or ownership of the property in question: see R v Williams [1988] 1 Qd R 289);
    - Duress (e.g. if the accused feared, due to intoxication, that the threat would be carried out);
    - Mistaken belief (e.g. if the accused believed, due to intoxication, that he or she had consent to enter a property: see Jaggard v Dickinson [1981] QB 527).

Self-defence

51. Self-defence contains a subjective and an objective element:

    - The subjective element requires the accused to have believed that what he or she was doing was necessary; and
    - The objective element requires that belief to have been based on reasonable grounds (see 8.3 Common Law Self-defence).[1172]

52. It is clear that evidence of intoxication may be relevant to the subjective element. If the accused was intoxicated at the time he or she committed the relevant acts, the jury can take this into account when determining whether he or she believed:

    - That an occasion for the use of force had arisen; or
    - That the use of force was necessary (R v Conlon (1993) 69 A Crim R 92 (NSWSC); Bedi v R (1993) 61 SASR 269; Ninness v Walker (1998) 143 FLR 239; R v Katarzynski [2002] NSWSC 613).

53. It is unclear whether evidence of intoxication is also relevant to the objective element (in the absence of any statutory modifications).[1173] Courts in other Australian jurisdictions have divided on the issue of whether the jury, in determining whether the accused's belief was based on "reasonable grounds", must take into account any personal characteristics of the accused (including his or her state of intoxication) which might have affected:

    - His or her appreciation of the gravity of the threat faced; and
    - The reasonableness of his or her response to that threat (compare R v Conlon (1993) 69 A Crim R 92; R v Katarzynski [2002] NSWSC 613 with Ninness v Walker (1998) 143 FLR 239; R v McCullough [1982] Tas R 43).

[1172] The onus is on the prosecution to disprove at least one of these elements beyond reasonable doubt.

[1173] Crimes Act 1958 s 9AJ modifies the common law position and, where it applies, requires the jury to ignore evidence of self–induced intoxication when determining whether the accused's belief was based on reasonable grounds. See 8.5 Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14) and 8.6 Statutory Intoxication (23/11/05–31/10/14).

Provocation

54. The partial defence of provocation (repealed for offences committed on or after 23 November 2005) also contains a subjective and an objective element. See 8.12 Provocation for information on those elements.

55. Evidence of intoxication may be relevant to the subjective element:

    - It may affect the jury's determination of whether the accused acted without self-control (R v McCullagh (No 3) (2007) 179 A Crim R 334; R v Perks (1986) 41 SASR 335; R v Copeland (1997) 194 LSJS 1);
    - It may affect the jury's determination of whether the accused's loss of self-control was caused by the provocative conduct (rather than by the effects of alcohol or drugs) (R v McCullagh (No 3) (2007) 179 A Crim R 334; R v Cooke (1985) 16 A Crim R 304; Censori v R [1983] WAR 89).

56. In most cases, evidence of intoxication will not be relevant to the objective element:

    - It must not be taken into account in determining whether the provocation could have caused an "ordinary person" to lose self-control and act in the way the accused did (Stingel v R (1990) 171 CLR 312; R v O'Neill [1982] VR 150; R v Curzon (2000) 1 VR 416; R v Gojanovic (No 2) [2007] VSCA 153; R v McCullagh (No 3) (2007) 179 A Crim R 334); and
    - It only affects the jury's assessment of the gravity of the provocation if the provocative conduct related to the accused's intoxication (e.g. being called a "drunk") (R v McCullagh (No 3) (2007) 179 A Crim R 334; R v Perks (1986) 41 SASR 335; R v Georgatsoulis (1994) 62 SASR 351).

Mental impairment

57. The defence of mental impairment requires the accused to have been suffering from a mental impairment (or "disease of the mind") that had the effect that he or she either:

    - Did not know the nature and quality of what her or she was doing; or
    - Did not know that his or her conduct was wrong (Crimes (Mental Impairment and Unfitness to be Tried) Act 1997 s 20(1)) (see Mental Impairment).

58. A temporary state of intoxication does not constitute a "disease of the mind". Consequently, even if the effects of intoxication were so strong that the accused did not know the nature and quality of what he or she was doing, or did not know that his or her conduct was wrong, the requirements of this defence will not be met (R v Davis (1881) 14 Cox CC 563; Dearnley v R [1947] St R Qd 51; R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30).[1174]

59. However, the requirements of the defence may be met if:

    - The consumption of drugs or alcohol caused the accused to suffer from a condition which is considered to be a "disease of the mind" (e.g. permanent brain damage) (see, e.g. R v Stones (1955) 56 SR (NSW) 25; R v Shields [1967] VR 706);
    - The consumption of drugs or alcohol triggered or exacerbated a pre-existing condition which is considered to be a "disease of the mind" (e.g. schizophrenia) (see, e.g. R v Connolly (1958) 76 WN (NSW) 184; R v Meddings [1966] VR 306); or
    - The accused's mental impairment caused him or her to become intoxicated (see, e.g. R v Weeks (1993) 66 A Crim R 466).

[1174] This degree of intoxication may, however, be relevant to whether the accused acted voluntarily and formed the necessary mental state. See Using Evidence of Intoxication to Negate an Element (above).

60. If the accused intentionally became intoxicated in order to trigger a pre-existing mental illness, knowing that he or she was likely to commit an offence when ill, he or she may be guilty of that offence (AG for Northern Ireland v Gallagher [1963] AC 349). See "Prior Criminal Intent ('Dutch Courage')" above for further information.

61. See 8.8 Automatism for further information concerning the meaning of "disease of the mind".

Using Evidence of Intoxication to Prove an Offence

Intoxication as an element of an offence

62. In some cases, one of the elements of the offence in question will require proof that the accused was intoxicated to a certain extent (see, e.g. Road Safety Act 1986 (Vic) s 49).

63. Care must be taken when directing the jury about intoxication in such cases, as there may be a statutory definition of "intoxication" that varies from the definition at common law (see, e.g. Liquor Control Reform Act 1998 (Vic) s 3AB).

Negligence, recklessness and dangerousness

64. Evidence of intoxication may be used to prove that the accused acted negligently, recklessly or dangerously. For example:

    - In relation to negligence, the prosecution may use evidence of intoxication to prove that the accused acted unreasonably (e.g. by driving whilst drunk) (R v Guthrie (1981) 40 ACTR 27);
    - On a charge of dangerous driving, the prosecution may use evidence of intoxication to prove that the accused's driving was "dangerous" (R v McBride [1962] 2 QB 167; R v Owens (1987) 30 A Crim R 59).

Using evidence of intoxication to explain behaviour

65. The prosecution may use evidence of intoxication to explain the accused's behaviour (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; R v Perks (1986) 41 SASR 335; R v Leaf-Milham (1987) 47 SASR 499; R v Stokes (1990) 51 A Crim R 25; R v Costa Vic CCA 2/4/96).

66. For example, as alcohol tends to remove inhibitions and self-restraints, and may induce a sense of self-confidence and aggressiveness, the prosecution might use the fact that the accused was drunk to explain how he or she came to commit the offence in question, when ordinarily he or she is a person of good character (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64 (Barwick CJ). See also R v Leaf-Milham (1987) 47 SASR 499; R v Stokes (1990) 51 A Crim R 25; R v Coleman (1990) 19 NSWLR 467; R v Le Broc (2000) 2 VR 43).

67. In relation to sexual offences, evidence of intoxication may be used to explain why the accused pressed on with the act, despite the absence of consent (R v Egan (1985) 15 A Crim R 20; R v Costa Vic CCA 2/4/96).

68. In some cases the fact that the accused was intoxicated may provide a motive for committing the offence in question (see, e.g. O'Leary v Daire (1984) 13 A Crim R 404; R v Perks (1986) 41 SASR 335).[1175]

[1175] For example, in O'Leary v Daire (1984) 13 A Crim R 404 it was held that the accused's intoxication may have provided a motive for refusing to take a breath test or give the police his address.

When to Direct the Jury About Intoxication

When to direct about intoxication negating an element

69. A direction about intoxication is not required simply because there is evidence showing that the accused was affected by alcohol or drugs at the relevant time. A direction only needs to be given if a direction is requested under Part 3 of the Jury Directions Act 2015, or if there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving a direction in the absence of a request. The judge must give a requested direction unless there are good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16). See Directions under Jury Directions Act 2015.

70. At common law, judges only needed to give directions on intoxication if there was evidence is capable of raising a reasonable doubt that the accused acted voluntarily, with the requisite intention, or with any required knowledge or foresight (Viro v R (1978) 141 CLR 88; R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; R v Le Broc (2000) 2 VR 43).

71. The accused bore an evidentiary burden to point to or to produce evidence which, taken at its highest, is capable of raising a reasonable doubt that the relevant elements have been met (Braysich v R (2011) 243 CLR 434. See also R v Youssef (1990) 50 A Crim R 1; R v Stokes (1990) 51 A Crim R 25).[1176]

72. At common law, it was for the judge to determine whether the evidence was capable of raising a doubt about any of the elements. If he or she was unsure whether there is sufficient evidence to raise a particular issue, the common law stated that the issue should be left to the jury (Viro v R (1978) 141 CLR 88; R v Stokes (1990) 51 A Crim R 25; R v Rose (1996) 87 A Crim R 109).

73. Each case turns on the actual evidence of intoxication and the identity of the element to which that evidence may relate (R v Le Broc (2000) 2 VR 43).

74. The mere fact that the accused has made a credible assertion of a lack of memory is not sufficient. Evidence of the accused's state of intoxication is required (R v O'Connor (1980) 146 CLR 64 (Barwick CJ)).

75. A direction may be required where witnesses have described the accused as being "affected by alcohol", and there is evidence that the accused was acting strangely (e.g. he or she was seen abusively yelling at a non-existent person) (R v Rose (1996) 87 A Crim R 109).

76. Where there was sufficient evidence of intoxication, the judge was required at common law to direct the jury about its relevance to the case, even if such a direction was not sought by either party or defence counsel requested that no direction be given. The nature of obligation must now be read in light of Jury Directions Act 2015 sections 14 and 16 (compare Pemble v R (1971) 124 CLR 109; R v Stokes (1990) 51 A Crim R 25; R v Rose (1996) 87 A Crim R 107; R v Khouzame (1999) 108 A Crim R 170; R v Challoner [2000] VSCA 32; R v Costa Vic CCA 2/4/96; R v TC (2008) 21 VR 596).

77. At common law, the judge was required to give the direction even if it gave an air of unreality to the case sought to be made by the accused in relation to some other issue (R v Stokes (1990) 51 A Crim R 25). Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, this may be a factor that provides 'good reasons' for not giving a requested direction (see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 14).

78. Where there is no evidence that the consumption of alcohol or drugs was capable of affecting the accused's volition or powers of reasoning, a direction should not be given. Giving a direction in such a case would confuse and mislead the jury, and invite a verdict which is contrary to the evidence (R v Sullivan (1981) 6 A Crim R 259; R v Wilson (1986) 42 SASR 203; R v Challoner (1993) 115 ALR 654).

[1176] See "The Evidentiary Presumption of Voluntariness" in 7.1.1 Voluntariness for information concerning the nature of this evidentiary burden in the context of voluntariness.

79. If the evidence of intoxication is imprecise, vague and uncertain, the judge may decline to direct the jury about the matter, even if the defence requests a direction (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 14; R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; R v Le Broc (2000) 2 VR 43).

When to direct about other issues (e.g. defences, reliability)

80. If evidence of intoxication is capable of having a bearing on any other issues in the case, such as the accused's defence or the reliability of a witness, the judge may need to identify the relevant evidence and relate it to the pertinent issue (Bedi v R (1993) 61 SASR 269; R v Baltensperger (2004) 90 SASR 129).

81. At common law, the fact that defence counsel did not wish to rely on the evidence of intoxication did not relieve the judge of the duty to give appropriate directions (Bedi v R (1993) 61 SASR 269; R v Baltensperger (2004) 90 SASR 129). Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, the position of defence counsel is a significant factor that the trial judge must consider (see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 16).

Content of the Charge

Charging about intoxication negating an element

Give a specific legal direction about intoxication

82. Where evidence of intoxication is capable of raising a doubt as to voluntariness, intention, recklessness or knowledge, the jury must be specifically directed about the relevant issue. It is not sufficient to simply tell the jury that they must be satisfied that the accused acted voluntarily, with the requisite mental state (Viro v R (1978) 141 CLR 88; R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64 (Barwick CJ); R v Rose (1996) 87 A Crim R 109; R v McCullagh [2002] VSCA 163).

83. The direction should be framed as a direction on the law, rather than a reminder of counsel's arguments (Williams v DPP [1999] SASC 531).

Direct about any issues that "truly arise" on the facts

84. The judge must direct the jury about whichever issues "truly arise on the facts", and refrain from giving a direction which introduces an issue that does not arise (R v TC (2008) 21 VR 596).

85. At common law, it was held that this could require a judge to direct the jury about the relevance of intoxication to both voluntariness and intention. A failure to direct the jury about voluntariness when it was in issue could, at common law, give rise to a miscarriage of justice (even if the jury has been directed about intoxication and intention) (see, e.g. R v TC (2008) 21 VR 596. C.f. R v Tucker (1984) 36 SASR 135; R v Williamson (1996) 67 SASR 428).[1177]

86. Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, the judge will need to determine whether a direction is requested on each issue or whether there are substantial and compelling reasons for directing on each issue in the absence of a request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16).

Explain relevant elements and the effects of intoxication

87. Where voluntariness is in issue, the jury must be directed about the meaning of that term (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64). See 7.1.1 Voluntariness for assistance.

[1177] In South Australia, it has been held that as the existence of intent implies the existence of volition, it is only necessary to direct about both voluntariness and intention in the rare case where there can be criminal liability for an unintended act, and the evidence of intoxication could raise a doubt about whether the act was accompanied by the will (R v Tucker (1984) 36 SASR 135). This does not appear to be the law in Victoria.

88. Where both voluntariness and intention are in issue, judges must make sure to clearly differentiate them (R v TC (2008) 21 VR 596).

89. Where recklessness is in issue, the jury may be directed that the intoxication may have affected the accused's foresight of the probable consequences of his or her actions (R v Williamson (1996) 67 SASR 428).

90. Where intoxication is relevant to the accused's awareness of a certain fact (e.g. that he had a knife in his hand) as well as his or her intention to commit an act or cause a result (e.g. to kill or cause really serious injury), the jury must be separately directed about each matter (R v Williamson (1996) 67 SASR 428).

91. In a sexual offence case, where intoxication may have affected the accused's belief in consent, a specific direction about that issue must be given (R v MC [2009] VSCA 122; R v Tappe Vic CCA 18/11/86).

Explain the onus of proof

92. Judges should direct the jury that it is for the prosecution to remove any reasonable doubt raised by the evidence of intoxication. The jury may only convict the accused if they are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that he or she:

    - Voluntarily did the act with which he or she is charged; and
    - Did so with the intent, knowledge or foresight required to prove the offence charged (Viro v R (1978) 141 CLR 88; R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; R v Coleman (1990) 19 NSWLR 467; R v McCullagh [2002] VSCA 163; R v Kumar [2006] VSCA 182).

93. The jury should be told that it therefore is not for the accused to prove that he or she was too intoxicated to act voluntarily or with the relevant mental state. The onus is on the prosecution to prove that, notwithstanding the ingestion of drugs or alcohol, the accused acted voluntarily and with the requisite mental state (R v Coleman (1990) 19 NSWLR 467).

94. Judges may tell the jury that if the evidence of intoxication does not raise a doubt about the relevant elements, they may put it out of their minds when considering the accused's guilt or innocence (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64 (Barwick CJ)).[1178]

Direct the jury about intoxication and inferences

95. The jury may be directed to take into account the accused's intoxication when determining what inferences to draw from all of the evidence in the case (R v Sheehan and Moore [1975] 2 All ER 960; Cutter v R (1997) 143 ALR 498; R v Stockdale [2002] VSCA 202).

96. In some cases, the prosecution will have argued that the accused's intention can be inferred from the nature of the injuries he or she caused to the victim. In such cases, the jury may need to be told that inferences about intention which might readily be drawn from the nature of injuries inflicted by a sober person might not be inferred as readily where the perpetrator is intoxicated (R v Wingfield [2001] SASC 20; Williams v DPP [1999] SASC 531; Spencer v R (2003) 137 A Crim R 444. See also R v Hill [2007] VSCA 261).

[1178] Such a direction will only be appropriate if the evidence is not relevant to any other matters, such as the accused's defence.

97. For example, if a sober person stabs someone in the heart, the jury may infer that the person intended to kill or cause really serious injury. In such a case, a significant part of the jury's reasoning process would depend upon acceptance of the inference that the accused intended to stab the victim in what is known to be a vital organ. By contrast, if the accused is intoxicated, there might be a doubt about whether or not the knife was aimed at the heart, or whether the accused intended to wound in a vital area of the body. In such circumstances, the jury should be told that it may not be as easy to infer that the accused intended to kill or cause really serious injury as it might have been had the accused been sober (Spencer v R (2003) 137 A Crim R 444).

98. The critical issue for the jury's consideration in such cases is whether, by reason of his or her intoxication, the accused might have inflicted the injuries without the requisite intention (R v Wingfield [2001] SASC 20; Williams v DPP [1999] SASC 531; Spencer v R (2003) 137 A Crim R 444. See also R v Hill [2007] VSCA 261).

99. It has been suggested that a judicial direction on this issue may not always be necessary, given that the effects of the consumption of alcohol are well appreciated and easily recognised by virtually every adult member of our society. It is thus reasonable to assume that, even without such a direction, the members of a jury would recognise that individuals, under the influence of alcohol, may:

- Form intentions and act in fashions that would be foreign to their ordinary conduct; or
- Act thoughtlessly through an alcohol induced loss of inhibition, without intending to achieve a particular result (R v Hill [2007] VSCA 261).

Identify relevant evidence

100. Judges should highlight the evidence and factual circumstances which bear on the extent of the accused's intoxication (Bedi v R (1993) 61 SASR 269; R v Williamson (1996) 67 SASR 428; Spencer v R (2003) 137 A Crim R 444; R v TC (2008) 21 VR 596).

101. For example, judges should highlight evidence about the amount of alcohol or drugs consumed, the general behaviour of the accused, the specific nature of the conduct constituting the offence, and any other evidence going to the degree of intoxication (R v TC (2008) 21 VR 596).

Other directions

102. Depending on the circumstances and the nature of any request from the parties, it may also be appropriate to:

- Direct the jury that intoxication does not amount to a defence (i.e., that the mere fact that a person is affected by an intoxicating substance at the time of committing a criminal act does not itself require an acquittal);
- Explain the various effects the relevant substance may have on a person (e.g. that it may affect the voluntariness of a person's acts or his or her intention, or it may simply remove a person's inhibitions or restraints and induce a sense of self confidence or aggressiveness);
- Tell the jury that intoxication may provide a motive or explanation for what happened;
- Tell the jury that the issue is not whether the accused did something which he or she would not have done in a sober state, but whether he or she acted voluntarily and with the requisite mental state;
- Tell the jury that merely because alcohol has caused a person to lose his or her inhibitions to an extreme extent does not usually mean that his or her actions have ceased to be voluntary;
- Tell the jury that a person can form an intention to commit an act or cause a result notwithstanding the consumption of alcohol or drugs;

- Direct the jury that the fact the accused cannot remember what happened does not necessarily mean that he or she acted involuntarily or without the requisite intent (see, e.g. Viro v R (1978) 141 CLR 88; R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; R v Coleman (1990) 19 NSWLR 467; R v McLeod (1991) 56 A Crim R 320; R v Kumar [2006] VSCA 182; R v Stokes (1990) 51 A Crim R 25).

103. The jury should be directed that it is for them to determine the extent to which the accused was intoxicated, and the effects the intoxication had on him or her, based on their own experience and judgment (R v Gill (2005) 159 A Crim R 243).

104. Where it is alleged that the accused's conduct was affected by both intoxication and another factor (e.g. concussion), the jury should be directed to consider all of the factors collectively. The intoxication should not be viewed in isolation (see, e.g. R v Martin (1983) 32 SASR 419).

105. If the evidence of intoxication is insignificant, the judge may tell the jury to ignore it (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64).

Do not tell the jury the issue is one of capacity

106. The judge must not tell the jury that the issue is whether the accused was capable of acting voluntarily or forming the required mental state. While the jury can consider the question of whether or not the accused had the relevant capacity, the ultimate question is whether he or she in fact acted voluntarily with the requisite mental state (Viro v R (1978) 141 CLR 88; Herbert v R (1982) 42 ALR 631; R v Coleman (1990) 19 NSWLR 467; R v McLeod (1991) 56 A Crim R 320; R v Makisi (2004) 151 A Crim R 245).

107. Where the issue of capacity is raised, the jury must be directed that it is not sufficient for them to find that the accused was capable of acting voluntarily or forming the requisite mental state. They must also be satisfied that the accused did in fact act voluntarily with that mental state (Viro v R (1978) 141 CLR 88; Herbert v R (1982) 42 ALR 631).

Charging about other matters (e.g. defences, reliability)

108. If evidence of intoxication is capable of having a bearing on any other issues in the case, such as the accused's defence or the reliability of a witness, the judge must identify the relevant evidence and relate it to the pertinent issue (Bedi v R (1993) 61 SASR 269; R v Baltensperger (2004) 90 SASR 129).

Last updated: 29 June 2015

8.7.1 Charge: Intoxication and Voluntariness

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

When to use this charge

This charge may be used where the evidence is capable of raising a reasonable doubt that the accused acted involuntarily due to intoxication.

If the accused may have acted unintentionally or recklessly due to intoxication, use 8.7.2 Charge: Intoxication and Intention.

If intoxication may have affected both the voluntariness of the accused's actions and the issue of intention/recklessness, both charges should be given. In such circumstances, the charge on intention/recklessness will need be modified to avoid repetition.

How to use this charge

The charge has been designed to be given as part of the judge's charge on voluntariness. If Charge: 7.1.1 Voluntariness is used, it should be inserted where indicated.

Intoxication and Voluntariness

In this case, the defence has argued that NOA was so intoxicated that his/her act of [describe act, e.g. "driving"] was not voluntary. I must therefore give you some directions about intoxication.

The fact that a person acted under the influence of alcohol[1179] does not give rise to any specific defence or excuse. This means that a person cannot avoid responsibility for his/her acts simply by providing evidence that s/he was intoxicated at the time s/he committed those acts.

However, as I have just mentioned, a person must not be convicted for acts which were committed involuntarily. You may take evidence of intoxication into account in determining whether the accused acted voluntarily.

You will appreciate that alcohol can affect people to different extents. Sometimes it simply diminishes a person's inhibitions, or creates a sense of self-confidence or aggressiveness. In more extreme cases it can affect the voluntariness of a person's actions. However, the mere fact that, due to intoxication, a person does something which s/he would not have done when sober does not mean that act was done involuntarily. As I have explained, an act is only involuntary if it is not subject to the control or direction of the person's will.

It is important to note that it is not for the defence to prove that NOA was so intoxicated that s/he acted involuntarily. It is for the prosecution to prove that NOA acted voluntarily, despite his/her level of intoxication. If you are not satisfied that this was the case, then you must find him/her not guilty of [identify offence].

If you are satisfied that the accused acted voluntarily, you may take the effects of alcohol into account when determining whether the accused committed the offence s/he is charged with. For example, you might find that his/her behaviour can be explained by the fact that his/her inhibitions were diminished by the influence of alcohol, or by the extra sense of self-confidence that alcohol sometimes gives people.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments. Judges should highlight evidence about the amount of alcohol consumed, the general behaviour of the accused, the specific nature of the conduct constituting the offence, and any other evidence going to the degree of intoxication.]

[If it is alleged that the accused has no memory of events due to intoxication, add the following shaded section.]

In this case you have heard evidence that NOA has no memory of [identify act]. While you may take this evidence into account in determining the extent of his/her intoxication, you should keep in mind the fact that the issue is not whether NOA remembers the relevant events, but whether s/he acted voluntarily when s/he [describe relevant act].

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence in the case, the extent to which the accused was intoxicated, and the effects the intoxication had on him/her. If you are not satisfied that the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA [identify act] voluntarily despite being intoxicated, then you must find him/her not guilty of [identify offence].

Last updated: 26 September 2011

8.7.2 Charge: Intoxication and Intention

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge may be used where the evidence is capable of raising a reasonable doubt that the accused acted intentionally due to intoxication. It may be adapted for use in cases where evidence of intoxication may affect the issue of recklessness.

If the accused may have acted involuntarily due to intoxication, use 8.7.1 Charge: Intoxication and 7.1.1 Voluntariness.

[1179] This charge has been designed for cases involving alcohol intoxication. It will need to be modified for cases involving drugs.

If intoxication may have affected both the voluntariness of the accused's actions and the issue of intention, both charges should be given. However, this charge should be modified to avoid repetition.

How to use this charge

The charge has been designed to be given as part of the judge's charge on the element relating to intention. It should be given after the judge has explained the requirements of that element.

Intoxication and Intention

In this case, you have heard evidence that NOA was intoxicated when s/he [identify act, e.g. "hit NOV"]. I must therefore give you some directions about intoxication.

The fact that a person acted under the influence of alcohol[1180] does not give rise to any specific defence or excuse. This means that a person cannot avoid responsibility for his/her acts simply by providing evidence that s/he was intoxicated at the time s/he committed those acts.

However, evidence of intoxication may be taken into account when considering what a person intended when s/he committed a particular act.

On the one hand, the fact that a person was intoxicated when he or she committed an act may make it more likely that he or she acted with a certain intention, by providing an explanation or motive for his or her behaviour. This may be the case, for example, where the intoxication diminishes a person's ordinary inhibitions, or creates a sense of self-confidence or aggressiveness.

On the other hand, the fact that a person was intoxicated may make it less likely that he or she acted with a particular intent. This may be the case, for example, where because of the effects of alcohol, a person doesn't realise that his or her actions will produce a certain result. Consequently, it may not be as easy to draw inferences from the actions of an intoxicated person as it is to draw inferences from the actions of a sober person. You will recall what I have told you about inferences.

You can see from these examples that the relevance of intoxication may vary, depending on the extent of the intoxication and the circumstances. While in some cases it may affect a person's intentions, in others it will simply reduce his or her inhibitions. The mere fact that, due to intoxication, a person does something which s/he would not have done when sober does not mean it was done unintentionally.

It is important to note that it is not for the defence to prove that NOA was so intoxicated that s/he acted without the necessary intention. It is for the prosecution to prove that NOA acted intentionally, despite his/her level of intoxication.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments. Judges should highlight evidence about the amount of alcohol consumed, the general behaviour of the accused, the specific nature of the conduct constituting the offence, and any other evidence going to the degree of intoxication.]

[If it is alleged that the accused has no memory of events due to intoxication, add the following shaded section.]

In this case you have heard evidence that NOA has no memory of [identify act]. While you may take this evidence into account in determining the extent of his/her intoxication, you should keep in mind the fact that the issue is not whether NOA remembers the relevant events, but whether s/he acted with the necessary intention.

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence in the case, the extent to which the accused was intoxicated, and the effects the intoxication had on him/her. If you are not satisfied that the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that despite being intoxicated NOA [identify act] intentionally, then you must find him/her not guilty of [identify offence].

[1180] This charge has been designed for cases involving alcohol intoxication. It will need to be modified for cases involving drugs.

Last updated: 26 September 2011

8.8 Automatism

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. In some cases, it may be alleged that the accused committed an offence involuntarily, in a state of "automatism" (see, e.g. R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500).
2. The consequences of successfully raising the defence[1181] of automatism depend on the cause of the automatism:
    - Where it was caused by a "disease of the mind" it is considered to be "insane automatism", and the appropriate verdict is not guilty because of mental impairment;[1182]
    - Where it was caused by something other than a "disease of the mind" it is considered to be "sane automatism",[1183] and the appropriate verdict is an acquittal (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500).
3. Due to these different consequences, where it is alleged that the accused acted in a state of automatism, the judge must determine which type of automatism (if any) to charge the jury about. This will largely depend on an assessment of what the evidence supports as being the possible cause of the state of automatism (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500).
4. In most cases, the evidence will solely point to one particular type of automatism, and charging the jury will be relatively straightforward. For example:
    - Where the only possible cause of the state of automatism is a "disease of the mind", the judge should direct the jury about the defence of mental impairment,[1184] relating the evidence of automatism to the requirements of that defence.
    - Where the only possible cause of the state of automatism is something other than a "disease of the mind", the judge should direct the jury about the requirement for a voluntary act,[1185] relating the evidence of automatism to that requirement.

[1181] While automatism is not technically a defence – it is a claim that the prosecution has not proven one of the elements of the offence (voluntariness) – for the sake of simplicity it will be referred to as a defence.

[1182] This verdict will only be appropriate if the requirements of the defence of mental impairment have also been met: see below.

[1183] While historically the term "non-insane automatism" was used, the term "sane automatism" is now preferred (R v Milloy [1993] 1 Qd R 298).

[1184] See 8.4 Mental Impairment.

[1185] See 7.1.1 Voluntariness.

5. However, in rare cases there will be competing explanations of the cause of the state of automatism, with some evidence suggesting that it was caused by a "disease of the mind", and other evidence suggesting it was caused by something else.[1186] In such cases the judge may need to explain the concept of a "disease of the mind" to the jury, and direct them that it is for them to decide:
    - Whether the accused acted in a state of automatism; and
    - Whether that state of automatism was caused by a "disease of the mind" (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30*; R v Youssef* (1990) 50 A Crim R 1).
6. In some cases the jury will also need to be directed that evidence of automatism may also be relevant to the issue of intention (Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500; Cvetkovic v R [2010] NSWCCA 329).
7. It is unclear what effect the Crimes (Mental Impairment) Act 1997 has had on the law in this area. In particular, it is unclear whether that Act has altered:
    - The burden of proof that applies in cases where both 'sane' and 'insane' automatism are in issue; or
    - The judge's duty to direct the jury about 'insane automatism'.

Structure

8. This topic proceeds in the following order:
    - An overview of the meaning of the term "automatism", and the difference between "sane" and "insane" automatism;
    - The interaction between automatism and intention;
    - The judge's role in cases where the defence is raised; and
    - The ways in which the jury should be charged.
9. As the law concerning automatism is a subset of the law concerning voluntariness, this topic should be read in conjunction with 7.1.1 Voluntariness.

What is "Automatism"?

10. Automatism is not a medical term. It is a legal concept that refers to acts that are committed without volition (i.e., where the accused's will does not govern the movement of his or her body) (R v Cottle [1958] NZLR 999; Bratty v AG for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386; R v King (2004) 155 ACTR 55).
11. The term "automatism" implies the total absence of control and direction by the accused's will. Impaired, reduced or partial control is not sufficient (Williams v R [1978] Tas SR 98; R v Milloy [1993] 1 Qd R 298; Edwards v Macrae (1991) 25 NSWLR 89; Re AG's Reference (No.2 of 1992) [1994] QB 91; Maher v Russell Tas SC 22/11/93).[1187]

[1186] For example, a dissociative state may be caused by a psychological blow ("sane automatism") or by an underlying mental illness ("insane automatism"). See "Dissociation" below.

[1187] Evidence that the accused's control was impaired or reduced may be relevant to the issue of intention. See "Automatism and Intention".

12. A person who is not conscious or aware of what he or she is doing acts as an automaton. However, the key issue is the lack of the exercise of will, not the lack of consciousness or knowledge (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205 (Barwick CJ); R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266; R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30).

13. Consequently, a degree of awareness or cognition is not necessarily fatal to the defence of automatism. The issue is whether or not there was an absence of all the deliberative functions of the mind so that the accused acted automatically (R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266; R v Burr [1969] NZLR 736 (Turner J)).

14. People who are aware of events occurring as if they are in a dream, but who cannot control their conduct (e.g. because they are in a state of dissociation), may therefore be in a state of automatism (see, e.g. R v Mansfield Vic SC 5/5/94; R v Rabey (1981) 54 CCC (2d) 1; R v Parks (1992) 75 CCC (3d) 287).

15. There is a distinction between automatism and irresistible impulse. The mere fact that a person could not control his or her impulses does not mean that he or she acted involuntarily (Bratty v AG for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386; R v Harm (1975) 13 SASR 84; Nolan v R WA CCA 22/5/97; R v King (2005) 155 ACTR 55).

16. There is also a distinction between automatism and dissociation. It is possible to act voluntarily while in a dissociative state (Nolan v R WA CCA 22/5/97; R v Joyce [2005] NSWDC 13).[1188]

17. The fact that the accused did not know that his or her actions were wrong is not relevant to the defence of automatism (R v Isitt (1978) 67 Cr App R 44; R v Hennessy [1989] 1 WLR 287).

18. Acting involuntarily due to the consumption of drugs or alcohol may be considered to be a type of automatism (see, e.g. R v Keogh [1964] VR 400). However, due to the specific issues raised by intoxication, the topic is addressed separately in 8.7 Common Law Intoxication.

Loss of Memory

19. Amnesia is one of the main symptoms of having acted in a state of automatism. Where the defence is raised the accused will therefore usually claim to have no memory of the relevant events (R v King (2005) 155 ACTR 55).

20. While amnesia may indicate that the accused acted in a state of automatism, the fact that amnesia exists does not inevitably lead to that conclusion. There may be other explanations for amnesia, such as trauma resulting from the commission of the offence which caused the memory of it to be blocked (R v King (2005) 155 ACTR 55).

21. Thus, even if the jury are satisfied that the accused has no memory of the events in issue, they do not need to acquit on the basis of automatism. The question is not what the accused remembers, but what his or her state of mind was at the relevant time (Broadhurst v R [1964] AC 441; R v Stockdale [2002] VSCA 202; R v King (2005) 155 ACTR 55).

22. Conversely, the absence of amnesia does not necessarily mean that the accused acted voluntarily. For example, people who act in a state of dissociation may have some memory of the relevant events, even though they could not control their conduct at the time (R v King (2005) 155 ACTR 55. See also Donyadideh v R [1995] FCA 1425).

"Sane" and "Insane" Automatism

23. The consequences of successfully raising the defence of automatism depend on the cause of the automatism:

[1188] See "Dissociation".

- Where it was caused by a "disease of the mind" it is considered to be "insane automatism", and the appropriate verdict is not guilty because of mental impairment;[1189]
- Where it was caused by something other than a "disease of the mind" it is considered to be "sane automatism", and the appropriate verdict is an acquittal (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500).

What is a "disease of the mind"?

24. The expression "disease of the mind" is synonymous with "mental illness" (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266).

25. To fit within the definition of a "disease of the mind", the accused must have been suffering from some kind of mental disease, disorder or disturbance, rather than "mere excitability, passion…stupidity, obtuseness, lack of self-control and impulsiveness". A "disease of the mind" exists where a person's ability to understand is thrown into "derangement or disorder" (R v Porter (1933) 55 CLR 182).

26. Historically, the courts used two different tests to determine what mental conditions should be considered to be "diseases of the mind":

    i) The recurrence/continuing danger test: A mental condition is a "disease of the mind" if it is prone to recur (see, e.g. R v Carter [1959] VR 105; Bratty v AG for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386 (Lord Denning); R v Meddings [1966] VR 306; R v Burgess [1991] 2 QB 92);

    ii) The internal/external test: A mental condition is a "disease of the mind" if it is "internal" to the accused (as opposed to arising from an external cause) (see, e.g. R v Quick [1973] QB 910*; R v Sullivan* [1984] AC 156; R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266; R v Hennessy [1989] 2 All ER 9).

27. These have now been replaced by the sound/unsound mind test, which holds that a mental condition is a "disease of the mind" if it is the reaction of an unsound mind to its own delusions or external stimuli (as opposed to the reaction of a sound mind to external stimuli) (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266; R v Youssef (1990) 50 A Crim R 1; Woodbridge v R [2010] NSWCCA 185).

28. The fundamental distinction is between those mental states which, although resulting in abnormal behaviour, are or may be experienced by normal people (e.g. a state of mind resulting from a blow to the head), and those which are never experienced by or encountered in normal people (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30 (Gaudron J)).

29. The sound/unsound mind test incorporates aspects of both of the previous tests, but differs slightly:

    - It is similar to the internal/external test in that a condition that is solely caused by an external stimuli will not be a "disease of the mind". However, it differs in that it classifies an underlying infirmity that is triggered by an external stimuli as a "disease of the mind".
    - It is similar to the recurrence test insofar as a mental state that is prone to recur will normally be classified as a "disease of the mind" (as the likelihood of recurrence will generally indicate a mind that is diseased or infirm). However, the fact that a condition is prone to recur is not conclusive (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30 (Toohey, Gaudron, Deane and Dawson JJ, Mason CJ, Brennan and McHugh JJ dissenting). See also R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266; R v Youssef (1990) 50 A Crim R 1; Woodbridge v R [2010] NSWCCA 185).

[1189] This verdict will only be appropriate if the requirements of the defence of mental impairment have also been met.

30. There need not have been a physical deterioration in the cells of the brain, or an actual change in the constitution of the brain, for a condition to be a "disease of the mind" (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v Porter (1933) 55 CLR 182; R v Kemp [1957] 1 QB 399; R v Hennessy [1989] 1 WLR 287).

31. A "disease of the mind" may be permanent or temporary, organic or functional, curable or incurable (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266; R v Youssef (1990) 50 A Crim R 1).

32. The expression "disease of the mind" is not to be narrowly construed. The dichotomy is not between a mind affected by psychotic disturbances and a mind affected by less serious ailments. The distinction is between those minds which are healthy and those suffering from an underlying pathological infirmity (Woodbridge v R [2010] NSWCCA 185).

33. Where drugs or alcohol are involved, the classification of the resulting state will depend on the role played by those substances:

    - Where the accused suffers from an underlying condition (e.g. epilepsy) which was triggered by the drugs or alcohol, the resulting state of automatism will be classified as "insane" (see, e.g. R v Meddings [1966] VR 306).
    - Where the accused's mind is simply not working properly due to the effects of the drugs or alcohol, the resulting state of automatism will be classified as "sane" (R v Carter [1959] VR 105; R v Quick [1973] QB 910; R v Sullivan (1984) AC 156).[1190]

34. Cases of sane automatism will be quite rare, as there are not many conditions which cause a state of automatism that will not be considered to be "diseases of the mind" (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; DPP v Olcer [2003] VSC 457; Edwards v Macrae (1991) 25 NSWLR 89).

35. However, the categories of sane automatism are not limited to those which have been mentioned in the cases to date (R v Pantelic (1973) 1 ACTR 1).

Examples of "diseases of the mind"

36. Examples of conditions which have been stated to be diseases of the mind include:

    - Major mental illnesses such as schizophrenia (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266);
    - Brain injuries, tumours or disorders (R v Hughes (1989) 42 A Crim R 270; Nolan v R WA CCA 22/5/97);
    - Hyperglycaemia (caused by excessive blood sugar levels) (R v Hennessy [1989] 1 WLR 287).
    - Physical diseases which affect the soundness of mental faculties, such as cerebral arteriosclerosis (R v Kemp [1957] 1 QB 399; R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266);
    - Some cases of dissociation and epilepsy (see below) (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30 (Deane and Dawson JJ)).

37. Examples of conditions which have been stated not to be diseases of the mind include:

    - Concussion from a blow to the head (R v Scott [1967] VR 276; R v Wogandt (1988) 33 A Crim R 31);
    - Hypoglycaemia (caused by excessive insulin intake) (R v Quick [1973] QB 910; August v Fingleton [1964] SASR 22);
    - Drug-induced psychosis (R v Sebalj [2006] VSCA 106*; R v Whelan* [2006] VSC 319);

[1190] See 8.7 Common Law Intoxication for further information concerning involuntary behaviour caused by drugs or alcohol.

- Some cases of dissociation and epilepsy (see below) (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30 (Deane and Dawson JJ)).

38. Sleepwalking is usually considered to be a form of sane automatism (see, e.g. R v Parks [1992] 2 SCR 871; R v Carter [1959] VR 105; R v Youssef (1990) 50 A Crim R 1). However, this view has been disputed in England (see R v Burgess [1991] 2 QB 92).

Dissociation

39. Automatism resulting from a dissociative state may be classified as either sane automatism (see, e.g. R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266; R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30) or insane automatism (see, e.g. R v Milloy [1993] 1 Qd R 298; Woodbridge v R [2010] NSWCCA 185).[1191]

40. For automatism resulting from dissociation to be considered to be sane automatism, there must be a shock precipitating the state of automatism. Dissociation caused by a low stress threshold and surrender to anxiety is not sufficient (and is thus considered to be insane automatism) (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v Rabey (1981) 54 CCC 1 (Dickson J); R v Milloy [1993] 1 Qd R 298).

41. The shock can be the product of a physical or emotional blow (a "psychological trauma") (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30 (Toohey J); R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266).

42. If the shock acted upon some underlying infirmity of mind to produce the automatism, it will be a case of insane automatism. If the shock produces a transient malfunction of an otherwise sound mind it will be sane automatism (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v Milloy [1993] 1 Qd R 298).

43. The key question is whether the accused's actions were caused by the shock (sane automatism), or whether they were caused by the susceptibility of the accused's mind to being affected by shock (insane automatism) (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30 (Mason CJ, Brennan and McHugh JJ)).

Epilepsy

44. Epilepsy may have a number of different causes, such as brain damage due to birth trauma, head injuries or brain tumours that occur at any stage of life, or cerebral infections from various diseases (R v Youssef (1990) 50 A Crim R 1).

45. Automatism resulting from an epileptic seizure may be classified as sane or insane automatism, depending on its cause (R v Youssef (1990) 50 A Crim R 1. See also R v Foy [1960] Qd R 225; R v Meddings [1966] VR 306; R v Sullivan [1984] AC 156; Bratty v AG for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386).

46. The appropriate classification depends on whether the epileptic seizure in issue falls within the definition of "disease of the mind":

    - If the seizure is the reaction of an unsound mind to its own delusions or external stimuli (e.g. where it is caused by brain damage due to birth trauma), any resulting automatism will be classified as "insane";

    - If the seizure is the reaction of a sound mind to external stimuli (e.g. where it is directly and immediately caused by a blow to the head), any resulting automatism will be classified as "sane" (see, e.g. R v Youssef (1990) 50 A Crim R 1; R v Meddings [1966] VR 306).

47. Where the accused's pre-existing epileptic condition is triggered by an external stimuli (such as a blow to the head), any resulting state of automatism should be classified as "insane" (as it is the reaction of an unsound mind to external stimuli). It is only where an epileptic seizure is solely caused by an external stimuli that it may result in a state of sane automatism (see, e.g. R v Meddings [1966] VR 306).

[1191] While a person who acts in a dissociative state will ordinarily act involuntarily, it appears that it is possible to act voluntarily while in a dissociative state (see, e.g. Nolan v R WA CCA 22/5/97; R v Joyce [2005] NSWDC 13). The issue is thus not simply whether or not the accused was in a state of dissociation, but whether he or she acted involuntarily as a result of the dissociation.

48. If it is unclear what the cause of the epilepsy is, the question of whether or not it is a "disease of the mind" (and thus whether any resulting state of automatism is sane or insane) should be left to the jury to determine (R v Youssef (1990) 50 A Crim R 1).

Consequences of acting in a state of sane automatism

49. If the accused committed the relevant act in a state of "sane automatism" he or she must be acquitted (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500).

50. This is because the accused cannot be convicted for an act which was independent of his or her will. The existence of a voluntary, willed act is an essential element of a crime (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500).[1192]

51. It is important to keep in mind that the issue is not simply whether there was "automatism", but whether the acts of the accused were voluntary, in the sense that they were the result of his or her conscious volition (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30 (Toohey J); R v Pantelic (1973) 1 ACTR 1).

Consequences of acting in a state of insane automatism

52. Where the accused committed the relevant act in a state of "insane automatism", the defence of automatism is subsumed by the defence of mental impairment (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; Bratty v AG for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386; R v S [1979] 2 NSWLR 1).

53. This means that unlike cases of "sane automatism" (see above), the accused must not be acquitted on the grounds of having acted involuntarily. Instead, the jury must consider whether the requirements of the defence of mental impairment have been met:[1193]

    - If they have been met, then the accused must be found not guilty on the basis of mental impairment;
    - If they have not been met, then the accused must be convicted[1194] despite the fact that he or she acted involuntarily (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v S [1979] 2 NSWLR 1; R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266; Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500).[1195]

54. Evidence of insane automatism must not be considered in relation to the issue of voluntariness (Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500).[1196]

[1192] See 7.1.1 Voluntariness.

[1193] See 8.4 Mental Impairment for information concerning the requirements of the defence.

[1194] As long as all the elements of the offence (other than voluntariness) have been proven.

[1195] While theoretically possible, such cases are unlikely to arise in practice, as in most cases where the accused acted involuntarily due to insane automatism he or she will not have known the nature and quality of what he or she was doing, or will not have known that his or her conduct was wrong (R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266; R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30 per Mason CJ, Brennan and McHugh JJ).

[1196] Such evidence may, however, be relevant to the issue of intention.

Onus of proof

55. In cases where only sane automatism is in issue, the onus of proof is clear. It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused acted voluntarily. If it is reasonably possible that the accused acted involuntarily due to a state of sane automatism, he or she must be acquitted (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30).

56. The onus of proof is also clear in cases where only insane automatism is in issue.The onus of proving the defence of mental impairment rests on the party who raises the issue. It must be proved on the balance of probabilities (Crimes (Mental Impairment and Unfitness to be Tried) Act 1997 s 21).

57. However, difficulties arise in cases where it is possible that the state of automatism was either sane or insane. In particular, it is unclear what the verdict should be in a case where:

    - The jury finds that it is likely that the accused acted involuntary due to a "disease of the mind" (and, if asked, would be satisfied that the requirements of the defence of mental impairment have been proven on the balance of probabilities); but
    - Cannot exclude beyond reasonable doubt the possibility that the state of automatism was caused by something other than a "disease of the mind".

58. This issue was addressed in R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30, in the context of the Western Australian Criminal Code. The majority (Toohey, Gaudron, Deane and Dawson JJ) held that the accused should be acquitted in such circumstances, as the prosecution will have failed to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that his or her acts were voluntary.

59. It is not clear, however, whether this is currently the law in Victoria, due to section 20 of the Crimes (Mental Impairment) Act 1997, which states:

> (1) The defence of mental impairment is established for a person charged with an offence if, at the time of engaging in conduct constituting the offence, the person was suffering from a mental impairment that had the effect that–
>
> (a) he or she did not know the nature and quality of the conduct; or
>
> (b) he or she did not know that the conduct was wrong (that is, he or she could not reason with a moderate degree of sense and composure about whether the conduct, as perceived by reasonable people, was wrong).
>
> (2) If the defence of mental impairment is established, the person must be found not guilty because of mental impairment.

60. It is arguable that s 20(2) requires a person to be found not guilty by reason of mental impairment whenever the requirements in s 20(1) have been proven on the balance of probabilities (see s 21), even if it is possible that he or she acted involuntary due to another cause.

61. However, it should be noted that the Crimes (Mental Impairment) Act 1997 was enacted after Falconer was decided, and does not explicitly address the issue of voluntariness. It is therefore also arguable that the Act was not intended to change the general principles outlined in Falconer, and that even if the requirements of s 20(1) have been proven on the balance of probabilities, the accused must be acquitted if it is reasonably possible that the accused acted involuntarily due to sane automatism.

Automatism and Intention

62. Evidence that is led to prove that the accused acted involuntarily due to automatism may also be relevant to the issue of intention (Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500; R v Hall (1988) 36 A Crim R 369; R v Arnold [2002] QCA 3; Cvetkovic v R [2010] NSWCCA 329).

63. For example, where the accused is charged with murder, and claims that he or she was acting in a state of sane automatism due to suffering a blow to the head, the jury may:

- Reject the defence of automatism, if they are satisfied that, despite his or her injury, the accused was still acting voluntarily;
- Acquit the accused of murder on the grounds that he or she lacked the specific intention required for murder (to kill or cause really serious injury) due to the "mental confusion" caused by the head injury (R v Hall (1988) 36 A Crim R 369).

64. The accused should not be acquitted merely because his or her mind was not functioning properly. Even when people's minds are not working as they ordinarily do (e.g. where, due to stress, their minds block out the moral inhibitions which ordinarily control their lives), they can act intentionally (R v Isitt (1978) 67 Cr App R 44).

Judge's Role

65. Where automatism is in issue, the judge must resolve two issues before charging the jury:

    i) Whether a proper evidential foundation for the defence has been laid; and

    ii) Whether the evidence shows the case to be one of sane or insane automatism (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v Youssef (1990) 50 A Crim R 1; R v Burgess [1991] 2 QB 92).

Is there a proper evidential foundation for the defence?

66. The issue of automatism must not be left to the jury unless the judge has determined that a proper foundation has been laid (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30*; R v Youssef* (1990) 50 A Crim R 1; Cvetkovic v R [2010] NSWCCA 329).

67. The accused bears an evidentiary burden[1197] to point to or to produce evidence which, taken at its highest, is capable of raising a reasonable doubt that the act was committed in a state of automatism (Braysich v R (2011) 243 CLR 434. See also R v Youssef (1990) 50 A Crim R 1; R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; Cvetkovic v R [2010] NSWCCA 329; Woodbridge v R [2010] NSWCCA 185).

68. For this burden to be satisfied, there must be credible evidence which supports the claim that the accused acted in a state of automatism (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; [1990] HCA 49; Bratty v AG for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386 (Lord Denning); DPP v Olcer [2003] VSC 457; R v Gibson [2006] ACTSC 114; Cvetkovic v R [2010] NSWCCA 329).

69. The evidence of the accused him or herself will rarely be sufficient to meet this burden, unless it is supported by medical evidence which points to the cause of the automatism (Bratty v AG for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386 (Lord Denning). See also R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; DPP v Olcer [2003] VSC 457; R v Gibson [2006] ACTSC 114; Cvetkovic v R [2010] NSWCCA 329).

70. A claim of involuntariness which is not based on mental illness is almost certain to be treated as frivolous unless supported by medical evidence that identifies a mental state in which acts can occur independently of the will, assigns a causative explanation for that state and postulates that the accused did or may have experienced that state (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30 (Gaudron J)).

71. Sane automatism is, by its nature, extraordinary and so the evidence must be very persuasive before involuntariness will be a reasonable possibility (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30 (Gaudron J)).

72. Medical evidence is especially important where the relevant act is said to have been caused by a "medical or pharmacological condition". In such cases, there must be evidence from an expert in the relevant field supporting that proposition (DPP v Olcer [2003] VSC 457).

[1197] See "The Evidentiary Presumption of Voluntariness" in 7.1.1 Voluntariness for information concerning the nature of this evidentiary burden.

73. Evidence that the accused could have been in a state of automatism at the relevant time is sufficient. There does not need to be evidence showing that the accused was in fact acting in a state of automatism (R v Youssef (1990) 50 A Crim R 1).

74. Even if the judge is sceptical about whether the accused acted involuntarily, if there is sufficient evidence to raise the issue of automatism it must be left to the jury to decide (R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266; R v Scott [1967] VR 276).

75. However, it is not appropriate to invite the jury to engage in fanciful supposition (R v Clarke (1995) 78 A Crim R 226; R v Boyle (2009) 26 VR 219; Woodbridge v R [2010] NSWCCA 185).

76. It will generally not be sufficient for the accused to simply say "I had a black-out" or "I can't remember what happened", even if that evidence is credible (R v Cottle [1958] NZLR 999; Bratty v AG for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386 (Lord Denning); Cook v Atchison [1968] Crim LR 266).

Is the case one of sane or insane automatism?

77. Where there is sufficient evidence of automatism to leave the issue to the jury, the judge must determine which type of automatism (sane, insane or both) is supported by that evidence (Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500; R v Hennessy [1989] 1 WLR 287; R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30).

Evidence of sane automatism

78. If it is reasonably possible that the state of automatism was caused by something other than a "disease of the mind", the jury must be directed about sane automatism (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266; R v Youssef (1990) 50 A Crim R 1; Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500).

79. Where there is sufficient evidence to raise the issue of sane automatism the jury must be directed about it, even if a direction is not raised or sought by defence counsel (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v Milloy [1993] 1 Qd R 298).

80. The fact that the automatism may have resulted from a "disease of the mind" does not relieve the judge of the obligation of leaving sane automatism to the jury where there is sufficient evidence to raise the issue (R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266; Bedelph v R (1980) 1 A Crim R 445).

81. However, the judge must not direct the jury about sane automatism if the only possible cause of the automatism was a "disease of the mind" (Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500; R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266; R v Milloy [1993] 1 Qd R 298; R v Arnold [2002] QCA 3).

Evidence of insane automatism

82. In a number of cases it has been held that, where it is reasonably possible that the state of automatism was caused by a "disease of the mind", the judge must give a direction about insane automatism, regardless of whether such a direction is sought by either party (See, e.g. Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500; R v Starecki [1960] VR 141; R v Meddings [1966] VR 306; R v Joyce [1970] SASR 184; R v Ayoub [1984] 2 NSWLR 511; Nolan v R WA CCA 22/5/97).

83. It is not clear, however, whether this is currently the law in Victoria. Section 22 of the Crimes (Mental Impairment) Act 1997 states:

> (1) The question of mental impairment may be raised at any time during a trial by the defence or, with the leave of the trial judge, by the prosecution.
>
> (2) If there is admissible evidence that raises the question of mental impairment and a jury has been empanelled-
>
> (a) the judge must direct the jury to consider the question and explain to the jury the findings which may be made and the legal consequences of those findings; and
>
> (b) if the jury finds the accused not guilty, it must specify in its verdict whether or not it so finds because of mental impairment.

84. It seems clear from this provision that a direction about insane automatism must be given if there is sufficient evidence to raise the issue, and a direction is sought by defence counsel.

85. It also seems clear that a direction about insane automatism may be given, at the judge's discretion, if there is sufficient evidence to raise the issue, and a direction is sought by the prosecution.

86. However, it is unclear whether the judge may refuse a prosecution request to direct the jury about insane automatism, where there is sufficient evidence to raise the issue.

    - On the one hand, the approach adopted in cases such as Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500 would suggest that the judge has a duty to direct the jury about the issue in such circumstances;
    - On the other hand, the wording of s 22(1) would suggest that the judge has a discretion to refuse to give such a direction.

87. Similarly, it is also unclear whether the judge must direct the jury about insane automatism where there is sufficient evidence to raise the issue, but a direction is not sought by either party:

    - The approach adopted in cases such as Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500 would suggest that the judge has a duty to direct the jury about the issue in such circumstances;
    - However, it is not clear from the wording of s 22 that the judge has the power to give a direction about insane automatism on his or her own motion. It is possible that a direction may only be given if raised by the defence or the prosecution.

Evidence of sane and insane automatism

88. If it is reasonably possible that the state of automatism was caused either by a "disease of the mind" or by something else, the jury may need to be directed about both sane and insane automatism (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266; R v Youssef (1990) 50 A Crim R 1; Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500).

Content of the Charge

89. The charge will differ depending on whether the evidence supports the issue of sane automatism, insane automatism or both forms of automatism. These possibilities are addressed in turn below.

Charging the jury about sane automatism alone

90. There are no special rules of law relating to sane automatism. It is simply an issue of voluntariness (Hall v R (1988) 36 A Crim R 368; R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; Cvetkovic v R [2010] NSWCCA 329).

91. The jury should therefore be directed in accordance with the principles outlined in 7.1.1 Voluntariness.

92. The judge should direct the jury that the issue is not whether the accused suffered from the alleged condition (e.g. psychological blow dissociation), but whether he or she acted involuntarily as a result of that condition (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30 (Toohey J)).

93. Similarly, the judge should direct the jury that the issue is not whether or not the accused was conscious or aware of what he or she was doing. It is whether he or she was acting involuntarily. A person can act involuntarily even if he or she is conscious of what he or she is doing (see, e.g. Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30).

94. Care must be taken not to suggest that it is for the accused to prove that he or she suffered from the alleged condition, or for the accused to prove that that condition caused him or her to act involuntarily. It is for the prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused was not acting involuntarily due to a state of automatism (R v Manly SA CCA 22/8/95. See also R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30).

Charging the jury about insane automatism alone

95. Where the evidence solely supports insane automatism, the judge should direct the jury using 8.4.1 Charge: Mental Impairment, relating the evidence of automatism to the requirements of that defence.

96. The judge must take care not to lead the jury to believe that the defence of mental illness will only be proven if they find that the accused acted involuntarily due to a disease of the mind. The defence of mental impairment may be proven even if the accused acted voluntarily (e.g. if the accused did not know that what he or she was doing was wrong, despite acting voluntarily) (R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266; Taylor v R (1978) 22 ALR 599).

Charging the jury about both sane and insane automatism

97. In some cases it will be for the jury to decide whether, upon the evidence they accept, the automatism was sane or insane in nature (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v Youssef (1990) 50 A Crim R 1).

98. Due to the uncertainties surrounding the onus of proof in this area (see above), it is not possible to provide firm guidance about the best way to charge the jury in such cases. Consequently, the Charge Book does not contain a charge on this issue.

99. It is recommended that a judge who is required to address both sane and insane automatism in the one charge carefully consider the issues outlined in the 'Onus of proof' section above, the provisions of the Crimes (Mental Impairment) Act 1997 and the judgments in R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30 and Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500.

100. In drafting a charge on this issue, it is essential that the judge carefully explain the legal meanings of "voluntariness" and "disease of the mind" to the jury (R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266; R v King (2005) 155 ACTR 55).

Charging the jury about automatism and intention

101. Where the evidence that is led to prove that the accused acted involuntarily due to automatism is also relevant to the issue of intention, the jury should be directed about that issue (Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500; R v Hall (1988) 36 A Crim R 369; R v Arnold [2002] QCA 3; Cvetkovic v R [2010] NSWCCA 329).[1198]

102. In determining whether this direction is required, the judge must consider whether a direction is requested or whether there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving a direction in the absence of any request (see Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16).

103. For example, where the defence of automatism is raised in relation to a crime of specific intent, and it is possible the accused acted in a state of "mental confusion" rather than automatism, the judge must:

- Explain the difference between automatism and mental confusion;
- Direct the jury that they must acquit the accused if it is reasonably possible that he or she acted involuntarily due to automatism;
- Tell the jury that if they reject the possibility that the accused acted involuntarily due to automatism, they must next determine whether or not the accused lacked the requisite intention due to mental confusion;

[1198] See "Automatism and Intention".

- Direct the jury that they must acquit the accused if it is reasonably possible that he or she did not form the requisite intention due to mental confusion (R v Hall (1988) 36 A Crim R 369. See also Cvetkovic v R [2010] NSWCCA 329).

104. The jury must not be left with the impression that an accused person is deemed to lack specific intention only where there is a total absence of control or knowledge of what is being done. A reasonable doubt about specific intention can be raised by evidence of other forms of mental abnormality (R v Hall (1988) 36 A Crim R 369; Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500).

105. The jury must not consider the issue of intention until any issues of voluntariness or mental impairment have been resolved (Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500).

Charging the jury about loss of memory

106. Where the accused claims to be unable to answer the charge due to a loss of memory, a direction about that issue may be warranted (Russell v HM Advocate [1946] SLT 93; R v Podola [1960] 1 QB 325; Broadhurst v R [1964] AC 441).

107. In such circumstances, it may be appropriate to:

- Remind the jury of the accused's claim that he or she could not recall the events in question;
- Summarise any evidence that supports the accused's claim;
- Tell the jury that, even if they accept that the accused had lost his or her memory, that does not mean he or she acted involuntarily or without the requisite intention. The question is not what the accused remembered or did not remember, subsequent to the event in issue, but what his or her state of mind was at the relevant time; and
- Tell the jury that, if they accept that the accused had lost his or her memory, they must bear in mind the possibility that there might be some explanation for the relevant events which the accused might have offered, had he or she had a recollection (see, e.g. Russell v HM Advocate [1946] SLT 93*; R v Podola* [1960] 1 QB 325; Broadhurst v R [1964] AC 441).

Charging the jury about expert evidence

108. In most cases where automatism is in issue, an expert witness will have given evidence about the matter. It will therefore generally be appropriate to give either Charge: Contested Expert Evidence or Charge: Uncontested Expert Evidence. See General Principles of Opinion Evidence for further information.

109. Depending on the circumstances, it may be appropriate to tell the jury that it is not for an expert witness such as a psychiatrist, to determine whether the accused suffered from a "disease of the mind". That is a question of fact for the jury to determine, based on the judge's definition of the term (Woodbridge v R [2010] NSWCCA 185; R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30).

Last updated: 29 June 2015

8.9 Statutory Duress (From 1/11/14)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Introduction

1. Prior to 2005, duress in Victoria was governed solely by the common law. This situation has been altered by the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005 and the Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014, which introduced duress provisions into the Crimes Act 1958. These provisions were s 9AG, now repealed, and s 322O respectively.

2. This topic covers the defence of duress in s 322O of the Crimes Act 1958, which applies to all offences committed on or after 1 November 2014.[1199]

3. Section 9AG of the Crimes Act 1958 applies to homicide offences committed on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014. See 8.10 Statutory Duress (23/11/05–31/10/14).

4. The common law defence of duress applies to non-homicide cases committed before 1 November 2014, and to all offences committed before 23 November 2005. See 8.11 Common Law Duress.

Section 322O of the Crimes Act 1958

5. Section 322O of the Crimes Act 1958 states:

> Duress
>
> (1) A person is not guilty of an offence in respect of conduct carried out by the person under duress.
>
> (2) A person carries out conduct under duress if-
>
> (a) the person reasonably believes that–
>
> (i) subject to subsection (3), a threat of harm has been made that will be carried out unless an offence is committed; and
>
> (ii) carrying out the conduct is the only reasonable way that the threatened harm can be avoided; and
>
> (b) the conduct is a reasonable response to the threat.
>
> (3) A person does not carry out conduct under duress if the threat is made by or on behalf of a person with whom the person is voluntarily associating for the purpose of carrying out violent conduct.
>
> (4) This section only applies in the case of murder if the person believes that the threat is to inflict death or really serious injury.

Abolition of Common Law Duress

6. Statutory duress has replaced the common law defence for all offences committed on or after 1 November 2014 (Crimes Act 1958 s 322Q).

7. However, the common law defence of duress applies to non-homicide cases committed before 1 November 2014 and to all offences committed before 23 November 2005. See 8.11 Common Law Duress.

Duress: Voluntariness and Intent

8. Under s 322O, conduct is carried out under duress if it is committed in response to a perceived threat of harm that the accused reasonably believes will be carried out if the offence is not committed (Crimes Act 1958 s 322O).

[1199] For homicide offences, if the date of the victim's death differs from the date on which the actus reus was committed, the relevant date for determining which provisions apply is the date of death (see R v Gould (2007) 17 VR 393; [2007] VSC 420).

9. As duress implies a deliberate choice to break the law (although under constrained circumstances), it is incorrect to treat duress as related to voluntariness or intention (see R v Palazoff (1986) 43 SASR 99, 105; R v Harding [1976] VR 129, 141, 169).

10. However, where duress is available as a defence, the accused will have a complete defence to the offence charged (Crimes Act 1958 s 322O(1)).

11. The defence of duress therefore operates to excuse a person who acts voluntarily and deliberately, but under compulsion (see DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [54]).

Relevant Offences

12. Duress under s 322O is a defence to all criminal offences (Crimes Act 1958 s 322O(1)).

13. In the case of murder, the defence only applies if the accused 'believes that the threat is to inflict death or really serious injury' (Crimes Act 1958 s 322O(4)). In contrast, at common law, duress was not available as a defence to murder or to some forms of treason. For more information, see 8.11 Common Law Duress.

Onus of Proof

14. The accused has the evidential onus to raise duress by 'presenting or pointing to evidence that suggests a reasonable possibility of the existence of facts that, if they existed, would establish' that defence (Crimes Act 1958 s 322I(1)).

15. Once the accused satisfies that evidential onus, the legal onus is on the prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused did not carry out the conduct under duress (Crimes Act 1958 s 322I(2)).

Elements of Statutory Duress

16. To prove the accused did not act under duress, the prosecution must disprove one or more of the following five elements:

    i. The accused reasonably believes that a threat of harm has been made;

    ii. The accused reasonably believes that the threat will be carried out unless an offence is committed;

    iii. The accused reasonably believes that carrying out the conduct is the only reasonable way the threatened harm can be avoided;

    iv. The conduct is a reasonable response to the threat;

    v. The threat was not made by or on behalf of a person with whom the accused is voluntary associating for the purpose of carrying out violent conduct.

17. The meaning of 'reasonably believes' and each of these five elements is discussed below.

The meaning of 'reasonably believes' under s 322O

Subjective and objective aspects

18. The predecessor to s 322O, Crimes Act 1958 s 9AG (now repealed), required the accused to reasonably believe that: 'a threat has been made that will be carried out unless an offence is committed; and carrying out the conduct is the only reasonable way that the threatened harm can be avoided; …' (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AG(2)(a)–(b)).

19. Under s 9AG (and by analogy under s 322O), reasonable belief means that:

    - The accused in fact has the belief (a subjective aspect); and

- The belief is reasonable, determined by reference to whether 'a reasonable person possessing the personal characteristics of the accused that might have affected the accused's appreciation of the circumstances might have held that belief' (a subjective and objective aspect) (DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [8]; see also [44], [47]–[49], [52], [59]).

20. The Court of Appeal has held that:

> The phrase 'the person reasonably believes' in its natural meaning requires regard be had to the characteristics of the accused. The words connote what an accused might reasonably believe in the circumstances in which the accused found himself or herself having regard to the personal characteristics of the accused. They encompass the subjective belief of the accused, informed by the personal characteristics of the accused with an objective overlay in the form of reasonableness which allows community standards to be taken into account when assessing the culpability of an accused (DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [58]).

Assessing reasonableness – Characteristics of the accused

21. As noted above, when determining whether a belief is reasonable, the court must take into account any characteristics of the accused that might have affected his or her appreciation of the circumstances (DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [8]).

22. Evidence of family violence, where duress in the context of family violence is in issue, is expressly allowed to be taken into account for this purpose (Crimes Act 1958 s 322P). That means that the effects of family violence may bear on a person's belief and its reasonableness (DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [44], [53]). See 'Duress and Family Violence' below for more information.

23. Other relevant characteristics of the accused that may have affected his or her perception of circumstances include his or her sex and maturity, as was the position at common law (see DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [27]), along with the history of the relationship between the accused and the threatener (Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [180]).

24. At common law, features such as history of sexual abuse of the accused by someone other than the threatener, or intellectual disability of the accused, are not imputed to the ordinary person for the purpose of assessing whether a person of ordinary firmness would have been likely to yield to the threats (Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [180]).

25. However, self-induced intoxication is expressly excluded as a characteristic of the accused that may be taken into account in determining the reasonableness of a belief under the duress provision in s 322O. In determining whether a reasonable belief existed, the relevant standard is a person who is not intoxicated (Crimes Act 1958 ss 322T(2), 322T(4)). See 'Duress and Intoxication' below for more information.

Assessing reasonableness – Circumstances of the accused

26. Under the previous duress provision, s 9AG(2) of the Crimes Act 1958, the jury was required to assess the elements of duress (all of which were 'reasonable belief' elements) 'by reference to the circumstances as a reasonable person, possessing the personal characteristics of the accused, would have perceived them to be' (DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [8]).

27. This indicates that the 'reasonable belief' elements of s 322O should be assessed in the same way.

(i) Reasonable belief that a threat of harm has been made

28. The first matter the jury should consider is whether the prosecution has shown that the accused did not reasonably believe that a threat of harm was made (Crimes Act 1958 s 322O(2)(a)(i)).

29. As noted above, this requires considering whether the accused subjectively believed a threat was made and whether this belief was objectively reasonable. See 'The meaning of "reasonably believes" under s 322O' above.

30. The common law requirements for duress included that a threat was made. In contrast, s 322O(2)(a)(i) of the Crimes Act 1958 requires the accused to reasonably believe that a threat of harm has been made.

31. This threat may be unstated or inferred from the whole the circumstances facing the accused, including the words and actions of the allegedly threatening party, along with the history of the relationship between the parties, and the reputation of the third party (see, e.g., R v Rowan [2024] HCA 9, [42]-[62]; DPP v Lynch [19775] AC 653, 704-705; R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49, 51; R v Harding [1976] VR 129, 161).

32. In R v Rowan [2024] HCA 9, the High Court held that "evidence of pervasive violence, intimidation, control and sexual abuse … raised a reasonable possibility that any express or implicit demand … carried with it the implication that serious violence and more severe sexual abuse would be inflicted … if [the accused] refused" (at [62]).

33. Such a process of inferring a threat does not involve recognition of a principle of 'duress of circumstances', where a person commits an offence to escape or avoid dangerous conditions (see R v Rowan [2024] HCA 9).

34. This part of duress does not consider the level of harm threatened. That is a matter considered as part of the fourth element: whether the conduct was a reasonable response to the threat (Crimes Act 1958 s 322O(2)(a)(ii)).

35. In addition, in cases of murder, the accused must believe the threat is of death or really serious injury (Crimes Act 1958 s 322O(4)).

36. Under the common law, the relevant threat was not limited to threats made against the accused but to 'a human being' (see, eg, R v Hurley [1967] VR 526, 543 (Smith J); R v Harding [1976] VR 129, 169 (Murphy J); R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49, 55-56; R v Dawson [1978] VR 536, 538, 541; R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531, 537). There is no reason to assume that the Crimes Act 1958 has narrowed the class of people who may be threatened for the purpose of this defence.

(ii) Reasonable belief that the threat will be carried out unless an offence is committed

37. The second matter the jury should consider is whether the prosecution has shown that the accused did not reasonably believe that the threat of harm would be carried out unless an offence was committed (Crimes Act 1958 s 322O (2)(a)(i)).

38. This is equivalent to the common law element that the accused must have reasonably apprehended that the threat would be carried out (see R v Hurley [1967] VR 526, 543 (Smith J); R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49, 55, 57).

39. As noted above, this requires considering whether the accused subjectively believed that the threat would be carried out unless an offence is committed and whether this belief was objectively reasonable. See 'The meaning of "reasonably believes" under s 322O', above.

40. At common law, the person posing the threat of harm must have demanded that the accused committed the particular offence with which he or she is charged (R v Dawson [1978] VR 536, 538; R v Lorenz (1998) 146 FLR 369, 376-7; see also R v Martin (2010) 28 VR 579 [10]-[12]). For this purpose, a demand may be made expressly, or by implication, such as where the accused reasonably believes that the threatener will inflict some harm whenever the accused fails to comply with the threatener's demands (see Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [169], [174] per Kyrou and Niall JJA; R v Rowan [2024] HCA 9, [52]-[62]).

41. While Crimes Act 1958 s 322O(2)(a)(i) refers to 'an offence' rather than 'the offence', it is suggested that this is not intended to depart from the common law requirement of duress that the threatener demanded the accused commit a particular offence, on pain of a threat. There is no indication in any of the secondary material surrounding the introduction of s 322O or its predecessor in s 9AG that such a radical change was intended.

42. As explained in 8.11 Common Law Duress, at common law duress was not available to an accused who had escaped from prison following a threat on his life by another inmate. The accused had chosen to escape contrary to the wishes of the threatener, rather than on their instruction, so the escape was not the 'particular offence nominated by the person making the threats' (R v Dawson [1978] VR 536, 538; c.f. R v Rowan [2024] HCA 9 at [102]-[104] per Edelman J). However, in R v Rowan [2024] HCA 9, Edelman J held at [97]-[111] that there the defence of duress (whether at common law or under s 322O) does not require the threatener to issue a demand or direction. Instead, any demand or direction is only relevant to the question whether the offending is a reasonable response to the threat. This conceptual approach to the issue of demand or direction was not adopted by the plurality, who resolved the case on the basis that a threat need not be express.

(iii) Reasonable belief that carrying out the conduct is the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm

43. Section 322O(2)(a)(ii) states that conduct will be carried out under duress only if the accused reasonably believes that carrying out the conduct is the only reasonable way that the threatened harm can be avoided.

44. As noted above, this requires considering whether the accused subjectively believed that carrying out the conduct was the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm and whether this belief was objectively reasonable. See 'The meaning of "reasonably believes" under s 322O', above.

45. When considering this issue, the jury should consider whether the accused knowingly passed up a reasonable opportunity to negate or nullify the threat.

46. For example, an opportunity to escape may be a reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm in some circumstances, but would not necessarily make the threat ineffective in others. If the threat involved harm to be inflicted in the future, for example, or to someone other than the accused, failing to take an opportunity to escape would not necessarily prevent the accused from relying on the defence (see R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531, 538).

47. Similarly, an opportunity to report the threat to the police may be a reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm, unless the accused reasonably believed police protection to be ineffective against the person making the threats or that the police protection may be initially effective but would not save the accused from threatened violence at a later stage. This may be the case where family violence is in issue, for example (see R v Runjanjic (1991) 56 SASR 114, 120–122; R v Lorenz (1998) 146 FLR 369, 376).

48. In considering whether the accused reasonably believed that carrying out the conduct was the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm, the jury should consider the accused's knowledge of the character and reputation of the person perceived to have made the threat, as well as the nature of the perceived threat (see, e.g. R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531, 534–535). This may be relevant in the context of family violence, see 'Duress and Family Violence' below for more information.

49. Family violence may influence the accused's belief in the availability of opportunities to escape, report, or otherwise avoid the harm, and the reasonableness of that belief (R v Runjanjic (1991) 56 SASR 114; Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [187] (Kyrou and Niall JJA)). See 'Duress and Family Violence' below for more information.

50. Under the common law, the threat must have been 'present, continuing, imminent and impending'. It was the threat rather than the harm threatened that must have been present, continuing and imminent; that is, the compulsion of the threat must have been active at the time the offence was committed (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526, 543 (Smith J); R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49, 55–57; R v Dawson [1978] VR 536, 537–538, 541).

51. Under the Crimes Act 1958, this is no longer a discrete requirement. However, where the accused knows that a threat has expired, he or she is unlikely to be able to reasonably believe that carrying out the conduct is the only reasonable way that the threatened harm can be avoided.

52. Under the common law, the threat must have induced the accused to commit the offence (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526, 543 (Smith J); R v Dawson [1978] VR 536, 538, 541). If the accused had an alternative motive to commit the offence, it was less likely that the threat induced the accused to commit it (see R v Zaharias (2001) 122 A Crim R 586 [42]–[44]).

53. It seems unlikely that the accused could reasonably have believed that the conduct was the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm if the threat did not directly provoke the commission of the offence. However, s 322O(2)(a)(i) does not use the language of the threat 'inducing' the accused to act, and the courts have not considered whether the section retains this common law element.

(iv) Reasonable response to the threat

Objective test

54. Section 322O(2)(b) requires that the accused's conduct 'is a reasonable response to the threat'.

55. Under the previous duress provision in s 9AG (which only applied to homicide offences), this element considered whether the accused reasonably believed that the conduct was a reasonable response to the threat.

56. In obiter comments when considering s 9AG, the Court of Appeal remarked that, in comparison to that earlier provision, the current reasonable response requirement under s 322O(2)(b) is an 'entirely objective assessment' (DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [49]).

57. The Explanatory Memorandum says the following in respect of s 322O(2)(b) (at 9):

> However, in contrast to section 9AG, new section 322O makes clear that the third element of duress (whether the accused's conduct is a reasonable response to the threat) is objective. Requiring an accused's conduct to have been an objectively reasonable response in the circumstances is designed to ensure that the defence only applies in appropriate cases (i.e. where there are objectively appropriate reasons to excuse such conduct).

58. Section 322O(2)(b) therefore requires the jury to ask whether the accused's response to the threat, viewed objectively, was reasonable.

59. The statutory defence of self-defence under s 322K also requires that the accused's conduct was a 'reasonable response'. This is an objective test in which the reasonableness of the accused's response (not that of a reasonable person) is assessed (see R v Katarzynski [2002] NSWSC 613; R v Forbes [2005] NSWCCA 377; Ward v R [2006] NSWCCA 321).

60. The test under the common law defence of duress was whether a person of ordinary firmness would have been likely to yield to the threat in the way the accused did or, in other words, whether the accused could not reasonably have been expected to resist in the circumstances. As part of this test, the 'person of ordinary firmness' is taken to have the accused's characteristics, such as age, gender, history and relationship with the threatener, and was placed in the same objective circumstances as the accused, including any circumstances of family violence (Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [73], [180] (Kyrou and Niall JJA)).

61. However, given the wording of s 322O(2)(b), and by analogy with the self-defence provision in s 322K, the jury should consider the reasonableness of the accused's response, not that of a hypothetical reasonable person assumed to possess the accused's characteristics.

Reasonable response to which threat?

62. There are two possible interpretations available for the term 'the threat' in s 322O(2)(b):

- It refers to the threat as perceived by the accused (the subjectively perceived threat);
- It refers to the threat which the jury considers objectively existed (the objective threat).

63. There are indicia in the Act pointing in each direction.

64. In favour of the subjectively perceived threat approach, the reference to 'the threat' and the position of those words in the section suggest that it is pointing back to the threat referenced in s 322O(2)(i), which the accused reasonably believed would be carried out unless an offence was committed. Otherwise, the jury would be asked to consider the reasonableness of the response in relation to a different threat than the one which the accused reasonably believed he or she faced.

65. In favour of the objective threat approach, it is relevant to note that in contrast to s 322O, the self-defence provision in s 322K (introduced at the same time as s 322O) states that the accused's conduct must be 'a reasonable response in the circumstances as the person perceives them'. The omission of those words in s 322O (and also in s 322R for sudden and extraordinary emergency) suggest that a different approach must be taken for duress and emergency than for self-defence.

66. In addition, as noted above, the Court of Appeal in DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101, [49] described the new test as 'entirely objective'. However, the Court also suggested 'a symmetry between the duress and the self-defence provisions' in s 322O and s 322K, both of which separate the belief-based requirements of those defences from an 'objective' element that the response be reasonable (see [50]).

67. As a matter of prudence, the model charge adopts the subjectively perceived threat approach, as this presents the lower risk of injustice to an accused.

68. The subjectively perceived threat approach means that the jury should ask whether the accused's conduct in committing the offence was a 'reasonable response' to the threat as perceived by the accused.

Proportionality of the response to the threat

69. Under the other objective statutory tests mentioned above (e.g. s 322K(2)(b) of the Crimes Act 1958, s 418(2) of the Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) and s 10.4(2) of the Commonwealth Criminal Code), the reasonableness of the response should also be assessed in terms of the objective proportionality of the conduct to the perceived situation (Flanagan v R [2013] NSWCCA 320 [78]–[79]; Oblach v R (2005) 65 NSWLR 75 [51]–[54]; R v Katarzynski [2002] NSWSC 613 [23]).

70. It is likely that the reasonable response element in s 322O(2)(b) also includes a requirement that the accused's response is objectively proportionate to the perceived threat.

71. As under the common law test for duress, the jury should consider the nature and magnitude of the threats made, the accused's knowledge of the character and reputation of the person making them (see R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531, 534–535), and the history and the relationship between the accused and the threatener (Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [73], [180] (Kyrou and Niall JJA)).

72. Under the common law, where the threat is not against the accused personally but, for example, the accused's family is threatened instead, the jury must determine whether a threat of that nature would be likely to compel a person of ordinary firmness to commit the crime (R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531, 537). The jury could take into account factors such as the strength of the accused's attachment to the third party (see, e.g. R v Hurley [1967] VR 526, 542–543 (Smith J)). These factors are likely to remain relevant to assessing the reasonableness of the accused's response under s 322O(2)(b).

Family violence

73. Under the common law, expert evidence on 'battered women's syndrome' was admissible in deciding whether a woman of reasonable firmness in the domestic situation of the accused women would have acted the way she did (R v Runjanjic (1991) 56 SASR 114, 120–122; see also R v Lorenz (1998) 146 FLR 369, 376).

74. Along with the first legislative version of duress introduced by the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005, and the replacement version introduced by the Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014, family violence provisions were introduced that specifically stated that evidence of family violence may be relevant in deciding whether conduct was carried out under duress. See 'Duress and Family Violence' below for more information.

75. Discussing the 2005 provision, the Court of Appeal noted that evidence of family violence 'may go to … objective reasonableness and so be used in determining whether or not the actions taken by an accused were a reasonable response to the threat' (DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [40]).

76. However, the Court also said that since the 2014 provision (s 322O) introduced a purely objective test for the 'reasonable response' element, evidence of family violence 'will not bear on whether the response was reasonable' (DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [53]).

77. These two statements in Parker are difficult to reconcile.

78. The approach taken in this charge book is that the fourth element of duress must be assessed against the threat as perceived by the accused. Therefore evidence of family violence that bears on the accused's perception of the threat will be relevant. As at common law, this presumably includes the accused's knowledge of the character and reputation of the person making the threat (see R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531, 534–535).

79. However, the effects of family violence that may have affected the particular accused's response, such as any reduction in capacity to resist the threat due to the long term psychological impact of coercive and controlling violence will not be relevant when assessing the reasonableness of the accused's response to the perceived threat.

(v) Voluntary association with the maker of the threat

80. The accused's conduct is not carried out under duress if the threat compelling the conduct is made by or on behalf of a person with whom the accused is 'voluntarily associating for the purpose of carrying out violent conduct' (Crimes Act 1958 s 322O(3)).

81. Section 322O(3) applies to voluntary association, which in this context means where the accused freely chose to associate, without being subject to threats or other coercion, into associating with the person making the threat.

82. Section 322O(3) is similar to the common law condition: 'the accused did not, by fault on his part when free from the duress, expose himself to its application' (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526, 543; R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49, 55–56; R v Dawson [1978] VR 536, 538, 541). Under the common law the accused could not rely on the defence if he or she freely chose to associate with any criminal organisation or became a party to a criminal enterprise (see R v Palazoff (1986) 43 SASR 99, 101 (Zelling ACJ)).

83. Under s 322O(3), however, there is the additional requirement that the organisation or enterprise was intended to carry out violent conduct. It will not apply when the accused has associated with others for the purposes of committing non-violent conduct or offences.

84. Section 322O(3) does not state clearly whether duress is excluded following association for the purpose of any violent conduct. As a matter of prudence, this charge book adopts the approach that s 322O(3) is not engaged where the accused is compelled under duress to commit violent conduct which is different from that which formed the purpose of the voluntary association with the other person.

85. This is an approach similar to that taken under the Commonwealth Criminal Code s 10.2(3)), which states: '[duress] does not apply if the threat is made by or on behalf of a person with whom the person under duress is voluntarily associating for the purpose of carrying out conduct of the kind actually carried out.'

86. However, caution should be exercised in relation to this issue as Victorian courts have not considered s 322O(3).

Duress and Murder

87. Where the accused is charged with murder, the defence of duress under s 322O will only apply where the accused 'believes that the threat is to inflict death or really serious injury' (s 322O(4)).

88. This requirement exists separately from the requirement that the accused must reasonably believe that a threat of harm has been made. Unlike the first element of duress, this threshold requirement is purely subjective.

89. A judge will only need to direct a jury about this threshold requirement in cases of murder.

90. Under the common law, duress was not available on a charge of murder (although it may have been available where the accused did not do the actual killing). However, the statutory defence of duress introduced by s 9AG of the Crimes Act 1958 related to homicide offences, including murder, committed on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014. The current provision, s 322O, applies to all offences committed on or after 1 November 2014.

Duress and Intoxication

91. Section 322T(2)–(3) of the Crimes Act 1958 states that:

> (2) If any part of a defence to an offence relies on reasonable belief, in determining whether that reasonable belief existed, regard must be had to the standard of a reasonable person who is not intoxicated.
>
> (3) If any part of a defence to an offence relies on reasonable response, in determining whether that response was reasonable, regard must be had to the standard of a reasonable person who is not intoxicated.

92. Section 322T(2) means that any self-induced intoxication by the accused cannot be taken into account in deciding whether he or she holds a reasonable belief in a threat of harm that will be carried out unless an offence is committed, or that carrying out the conduct is the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm.

93. Section 322T(3) means that any self-induced intoxication by the accused cannot be taken into account in deciding whether the accused's conduct was a reasonable response to the threat.

94. Section 322T(4) provides that where the intoxication is not self-induced, regard must be had to the standard of a reasonable person intoxicated to the same extent as the person concerned. See ss 322T(5)–(6) for the definition of 'self-induced intoxication'.

95. For more information, see 8.5 Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14).

Duress and Family Violence

96. The Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014 added provisions concerning 'family violence'. These provisions substantially replicate those introduced into the Crimes Act 1958 by the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005, but are applicable to all offences rather than limited to homicide offences.

97. Sections 322J and 322P of the Crimes Act 1958 and Part 6 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 explain how evidence of family violence may be relevant to whether conduct was carried out under duress.

98. Section 322J(2) defines family violence "in relation to a person" as "violence against that person by a family member".

99. A person's "family member" is defined broadly in s 322J(2) and includes:

- a person who is or has been married to the person;
- a person who has or has had an intimate personal relationship with the person;
- a person who is or has been the father, mother, step-father or step-mother of the person;
- a child who normally or regularly resides with the person;
- a guardian of the person; and
- another person who is or has been ordinarily a member of the household of the person.

100. "Violence" is also defined broadly in s 322J(2) to mean:

- physical abuse;
- sexual abuse;
- psychological abuse (which need not involve actual or threatened physical or sexual abuse), including but not limited to:
    - intimidation;
    - harassment;
    - damage to property;
    - threats of physical abuse, sexual abuse or psychological abuse;
    - in relation to a child:
        - causing or allowing the child to see or hear the physical, sexual or psychological abuse of a person by a family member; or
        - putting the child, or allowing the child to be put, at real risk of seeing or hearing that abuse occurring.

101. A single act may amount to 'abuse' for the purpose of the definition of violence (s 322J(3)). A number of acts that form part of a pattern of behaviour may also amount to "abuse" for that purpose, even though some or all of those acts, when viewed in isolation, may appear to be minor or trivial (s 322J(3)).

102. Section 322P provides that evidence of family violence may be relevant in determining whether a person has carried out conduct under duress, in circumstances where duress in the context of family violence is in issue (Crimes Act 1958 s 322P).

103. Section 322J states that 'Evidence of family violence, in relation to a person,' includes evidence of:

(a) the history of the relationship between the person and a family member, including violence by the family member towards the person or by the person towards the family member or by the family member or the person in relation to any other family member;

(b) the cumulative effect, including psychological effect, on the person or a family member of that violence;

(c) social, cultural or economic factors that impact on the person or a family member who has been affected by family violence;

(d) the general nature and dynamics of relationships affected by family violence, including the possible consequences of separation from the abuser;

(e) the psychological effect of violence on people who are or have been in a relationship affected by family violence;

(f) social or economic factors that impact on people who are or have been in a relationship affected by family violence.

104. See 'Chapter 4: Evidence of Relationship and Family Violence' in the Victorian Law Reform Commission's Defences to Homicide: Final Report for a more detailed discussion of the relationship between duress and family violence, and the use which can be made of the evidence outlined above.[1200]

Family Violence and Duress: Jury Directions

105. The Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014 introduced a new Part 7 into the Jury Directions Act 2013. On 29 June 2015, these provisions were revised and relocated to Part 6 of the Jury Directions Act 2015.

106. Part 3 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 does not apply to Part 6 of the Act.

107. Part 6 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 applies to any trial commencing on or after 29 June 2015, regardless of the date of any alleged offence.

108. For the purposes of Part 6, "family violence" has the same meaning as in s 322J(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 (see 'Duress and Family Violence' above)

109. The trial judge must give the jury preliminary directions on family violence, in accordance with s 59 of the Jury Directions Act 2015, if the defence counsel requests such directions, unless there are good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 58). The judge may give the statutory directions if the accused is unrepresented and the judge considers it in the interests of justice to do so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 58(3)).

110. The judge must give the statutory directions on family violence as soon as practicable after the request is made and the judge may give the direction before any evidence is adduced in the trial. The directions may be repeated at any time during the trial (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 58(4)–(5)).

111. The directions must include all of the following (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 59):

(a) self-defence or duress (as the case requires) is, or is likely to be, in issue in the trial; and

(b) as a matter of law, evidence of family violence may be relevant to determining whether the accused acted in self-defence or under duress (as the case requires); and

[…]

[1200] The Report can be downloaded here.

(d) in the case of duress, evidence in the trial is likely to include evidence of family violence committed by another person against the accused or a third person.

112. The following directions under s 60 may also be sought and, if sought, must be given unless there are good reasons for not doing so:

(a) that family violence–

(i) is not limited to physical abuse and may include sexual abuse and psychological abuse;

(ii) may involve intimidation, harassment and threats of abuse;

(iii) may consist of a single act;

(iv) may consist of separate acts that form part of a pattern of behaviour which can amount to abuse even though some or all of those acts may, when viewed in isolation, appear to be minor or trivial;

(b) if relevant, that experience shows that–

(i) people may react differently to family violence and there is no typical, proper or normal response to family violence;

(ii) it is not uncommon for a person who has been subjected to family violence–

(A) to stay with an abusive partner after the onset of family violence, or to leave and then return to the partner;

(B) not to report family violence to police or seek assistance to stop family violence;

(iii) decisions made by a person subjected to family violence about how to address, respond to or avoid family violence may be influenced by-

(A) family violence itself;

(B) cultural, social, economic and personal factors;

(c) that, as a matter of law, evidence that the accused assaulted the victim on a previous occasion does not mean that the accused could not have been acting [...] under duress [...] in relation to the offence charged.

Duress and Marital Coercion

113. Section 336 of the Crimes Act 1958 provides for the defence of marital coercion. While similar to duress, marital coercion is a distinct defence that applies in limited circumstances.

114. Marital coercion allows a women to be acquitted of a criminal offence that she committed because her husband coerced her to do so through pressure or threats, if the coercion is 'sufficient to cause a woman of ordinary good character and normal firmness of mind, placed in the circumstances in which the woman was placed, to conduct herself in the manner charged' (Crimes Act 1958 s 336(3)).

115. Unlike duress, which is available as a defence to all offences and to any accused person, marital coercion is not available for the offences of treason or murder and is available only to married women.

116. The Victoria Law Reform recommended retaining the defence of marital coercion in acknowledgment of the high rate of violence by men against their female partners, and the difficulties which women experience in seeking protection against it. In murder cases, however, the more rigorous requirements of the duress defence apply (Victoria Law Reform Commission, Defences to Homicide: Final Report, 2004, 122).

When to Charge the Jury about Duress

117. The judge must direct the jury about duress if the accused indicates that duress is in issue or if the judge considers that there are substantial and compelling reasons to direct the jury about duress despite the absence of a request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 11, 16). See Directions under Jury Directions Act 2015.

118. If a duress direction is requested, it is only if the judge is satisfied that there is no evidence that raises a reasonable possibility that the elements of duress exist that the judge would have good reason to decline to give the requested direction (R v Rowan [2024] HCA 9, [33]).

119. Duress may be left to the jury even if the accused's primary defence is that he or she did not commit the relevant conduct. The inconsistency between duress and denial of offending is a matter for the jury to assess (Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [79], [157] per Kyrou and Niall JJA).

120. In criminal proceedings where duress in the context of family violence is in issue, Part 6 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 specifies certain directions that may be given early in the trial. See 'Family Violence and Duress: Jury Directions' above and Directions under Jury Directions Act 2015.

121. At common law, the judge was required to direct the jury about duress if the evidence was such that it might lead a reasonable jury to decide that the accused committed the relevant act under duress (R v Evans (No 1) [1976] VR 517; Taiapa v R (2009) 240 CLR 95 [5]; R v Harding [1976] VR 129).

122. The question was whether, on the version of events most favourable to the accused that is suggested by the evidence, a jury acting reasonably might fail to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused was not acting under duress (Taiapa v R (2009) 240 CLR 95 [5]. See also Martin v R (2010) 28 VR 579 [14]-[15]; Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [84] per Kyrou and Niall JJA).

123. Under the common law, the issue of duress could be raised at any time during the trial (R v Zaharias (2001) 122 A Crim R 586).

Content of the Charge

124. There is no single formulation that must be followed when charging a jury about duress (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 6). What is required is instructions expressed with sufficient clarity that the jury could be left in no doubt with respect to the principles that they must apply to the task before them (R v Zaharias (2001) 122 A Crim R 586 [56]).

125. The burden of proof should be made very clear to the jury. They should be told that the accused can only be convicted if the prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that he or she did not carry out the conduct under duress (Crimes Act 1958 s 322I).

126. In most cases it is neither necessary nor desirable to explain every element of the defence in a charge (R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49, 56).

127. Judges should take care to instruct the jury in the context of the evidence and issues raised in the trial (R v Zaharias (2001) 122 A Crim R 586 [56]). The question of duress should be placed in its factual setting, and considerations that may assist the jury to reach its conclusion should be identified (see R v Goldman (No 5) [2004] VSC 292 [6]; R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49, 56–57).

128. While not a misdirection, the jury should not be told to examine the evidence relating to duress with great care and scrutiny (due to the ease with which it can be invented). The question whether an accused's claim that he or she was acting under duress is plausible enough to raise a reasonable doubt is exactly the kind of matter which juries are well-equipped to deal with, without the need for any special direction (R v Goldman [2007] VSCA 25 [30]).

Last updated: 17 April 2024

8.9.1 Preliminary Directions: Duress in the Context of Family Violence (Jury Directions Act 2015)

Click here for a Word version of this document

This charge should be given, unless there are good reasons for not doing so, when:

i) the trial commences on or after 29 June 2015, and duress in the context of family violence is in issue;

ii) the offence was committed on or after 1 November 2014; and

iii) defence counsel (or the accused, if unrepresented) has requested that the jury be directed on family violence in accordance with s 58 of the Jury Directions Act 2015.

If the accused is unrepresented and does not request a direction on family violence, this charge can be given if it in the interests of justice to do so.

This charge must be given as soon as practicable after a request has been made in terms of s 58 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 and may be given before any evidence is adduced in the trial.

Introduction

In this case, duress in the context of family violence [is/is likely to be] in issue. I therefore need to give you some directions about "duress" and "family violence".

The law recognises that sometimes people will be compelled to commit crimes to avoid threatened harm. The law says that a person may act under duress if:

- the person reasonably believes that a threat of harm has been made that will be carried out unless an offence is committed, and

[If the accused is charged with murder, add the following shaded item]

- the person believes that the threat was to inflict death or serious injury, and
- the person reasonably believes that their conduct is the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm, and
- the conduct is a reasonable response to the threat as the person perceives it, and
- the person did not voluntarily associate with the person making the threat for the purposes of carrying out violent conduct.

The law recognises that evidence of "family violence" may be relevant in deciding whether the accused acted under duress. "Family violence" includes all kinds of physical, sexual and psychological abuse by one family member towards another.

Examples of evidence of family violence include:

- The history of the relationship between family members, including violence by one family member towards any other family member.
- The overall effect of that violence, including any psychological effect, on the person who has been affected by family violence or the other family members.
- Social, cultural or economic factors that impact on the person who has been affected by family violence or the other family members.
- The general nature and dynamics of relationships affected by family violence, including the possible consequences of separation from the abuser.

Evidence in this case is likely to include evidence of family violence committed by another person against [the accused/a third person].

Considerations

[All or specified parts of the following shaded section must be included:]

Family violence is not limited to physical abuse and can include sexual abuse and psychological abuse.

Family violence can involve intimidation, harassment and threats of abuse.

Family violence can consist of a single act.

Family violence can also consist of separate acts that form part of a pattern of behaviour. Those separate acts can, when looked at together, amount to abuse even though some or all of those acts may, when looked at separately, appear to be minor or trivial.

Experience shows that people may react differently to family violence and there is no typical, proper or normal response to family violence.

Experience also shows that it is not uncommon for a person who has been subjected to family violence to stay with an abusive partner after the family violence starts, or to leave and then return to the partner, or not to report family violence to police or seek assistance to stop family violence.

Experience also shows that family violence itself and cultural, social, economic and personal factors can influence decisions made by a person who is subjected to family violence about how to address the family violence or how to respond to or avoid it.

The law recognises that if the accused assaulted the victim on a previous occasion that does not mean that the accused could not have been acting under duress when [he/she] [i*nsert relevant conduct*].

Last updated: 23 September 2016

8.9.2 Charge: Statutory Duress (From 1/11/14)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be given if there is evidence from which a jury might infer that the accused was acting under duress when s/he committed any offence on or after 1 November 2014.

The charge should be given immediately after directing the jury about the relevant offence.

Introduction

In this case the defence alleged that NOA was acting under duress when s/he [insert relevant act]. I therefore need to give you some directions about "duress".[1201]

The defence of duress was introduced into the law a long time ago to allow for human frailty. It recognises that sometimes ordinary people will be compelled to commit crimes to avoid threatened harm. When the defence of duress applies, the law excuses them from responsibility given the circumstances.

[1201] This charge only addresses the defence of duress. It is possible that the evidence in question may also have relevance to the determination of the elements (see, e.g. R v Darrington [1980] VR 353, 369–370; R v Harding [1976] VR 129).

This means that, even if you are satisfied that the prosecution has proven all of the elements of [insert offence] beyond reasonable doubt, NOA will not be guilty of that offence if s/he acted under duress.

Because the prosecution must prove the accused's guilt, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was not acting under duress. It is not for NOA to prove that s/he did act under duress.

Unfortunately, it is always difficult to give directions about duress in a way which completely avoids any suggestion that it is a matter for the accused to prove. However, it is important to remember that the accused does not have to prove anything. You must keep in mind at all times that it is the prosecution who must remove any reasonable possibility that the accused acted under duress.

So before you can find the accused guilty of [insert offence], you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the prosecution has proven all of the elements of the offence and has negated the defence of duress.

Elements of duress

There are five [for murder: six] ways in which the prosecution can negate the defence of duress. I will list them for you, and then examine each one in detail.[1202]

The prosecution must satisfy you beyond reasonable doubt of at least one of the following:

One, the accused did not reasonably believe that a threat of harm had been made.

[If the accused is charged with murder, add the following shaded item]

Two, the accused did not believe that the threat was to inflict death or serious injury.

[Two/Three], the accused did not reasonably believe that the threat would be carried out unless the offence was committed.

[Three/Four], the accused did not reasonably believe that his/her conduct in committing the offence was the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm.

[Four/Five], the accused's conduct in committing the offence was not a reasonable response to the threat.

[Five/Six], the accused voluntarily associated with the maker of the threat for the purposes of carrying out the violent conduct.

If the prosecution can prove any of these matters beyond reasonable doubt, then they will have negated the defence of duress. In such circumstances, if you are also satisfied that the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, all of the elements of [describe offence], then s/he will be guilty of that offence.

I will now examine each of these matters in more detail.

Reasonable belief in a threat of harm

The first way the prosecution can negate the defence of duress is by proving that the accused did not reasonably believe that a threat of harm had been made.

The prosecution can prove this in one of two ways.

One – Has the prosecution proved that NOA did not believe that a threat of harm had been made?

[1202] If any of these methods of negating duress are not relevant in the circumstances of the case, they should be deleted and the charge modified accordingly.

For the purpose of this question, you must consider all NOA's personal characteristics and all the circumstances as he/she perceived them.

OR Two – If you decide that the accused might have believed that a threat of harm was made, has the prosecution proved that such a belief would not be reasonable?

When you are deciding whether NOA's belief was reasonable, you must consider whether a reasonable person, with such personal characteristics of the accused as might have affected his/her understanding of the circumstances, might have believed that a threat of harm had been made.

In doing this, you must consider the circumstances as a reasonable person, with the personal characteristics of the accused, would have perceived them to be.

[If it is alleged that the accused was intoxicated, insert the direction relating to a 'reasonable belief' of the accused from either 8.5.1 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14) (Self-induced) or 8.5.2 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14) (self-induced contested), as relevant.]

[Summarise arguments and evidence on NOA's relevant characteristics].

[If the threat was made against someone other than the accused, add the following shaded section.]

The threat does not have to be a threat of harm to the accused [himself/herself]. Here, NOA says that the threat was [describe threat].

The prosecution alleged that the accused did not reasonably believe that a threat of harm had been made. [Summarise prosecution arguments and evidence. The charge should clearly identify whether the argument is (i) that the accused did not believe that a threat was made; and/or (ii) that the accused's belief that a threat was made was not reasonable.]

The defence denied this, arguing [summarise defence evidence and/or arguments].

Threat to inflict death or serious injury

[If the accused is charged with murder, add the following shaded section.]

The second way the prosecution can negate the defence of duress is by proving that that the accused did not believe that the threat was to inflict death or serious injury.

The prosecution alleged that that was the case here. [Summarise prosecution arguments and evidence.]

The defence denied this, arguing [summarise defence evidence and/or arguments].

Reasonable belief that the threat will be carried out unless the offence is committed

The [second/third] way the prosecution can negate the defence of duress is by proving that the accused did not reasonably believe that the threat would be carried out unless the offence was committed.

This requires the prosecution to prove that NOA did not reasonably believe that [identify threatener] would actually [identify threat] if s/he did not [describe offence].

Again, the prosecution can prove this in one of two ways.

One – Has the prosecution proved that NOA did not believe that the threat would be carried out unless the offence was committed?

Again, for this question, you must consider all NOA's personal characteristics and all the circumstances as he/she perceived them.

OR Two – If you decide that the accused might have believed that the threat would be carried out unless the offence was committed, has the prosecution proved that such a belief would not be reasonable?

When you are deciding whether NOA's belief was reasonable, you must consider whether a reasonable person, with such personal characteristics of the accused as might have affected his/her understanding of the circumstances, might have believed that the threat would be carried out unless the offence was committed.

When you are deciding whether NOA's belief was reasonable, you must consider the circumstances as a reasonable person with all the personal characteristics of the accused would have perceived them to be.

[If it is alleged that the accused was intoxicated, insert the direction relating to a 'reasonable belief' of the accused from either 8.5.1 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14) (Self-induced) or 8.5.2 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14) (self-induced contested), as relevant.]

Remember, [summarise arguments and evidence on NOA's relevant characteristics].

One matter to consider is whether the perceived threat was still active at the time the accused committed the offence. If the prosecution can prove that the accused did not reasonably believe that the threat was still active at the time the offence was committed, the defence of duress will fail.

[If the alleged threat was to commit harm in the future, add the following shaded section.]

This does not mean that the threat must have been to harm [identify threatened party] immediately if NOA did not commit the offence. The defence of duress does not fail simply because the threat was to harm [him/her/someone else] in the future. The issue here is whether the accused reasonable believed that the threat – whatever its nature – was still active at the time the crime was committed.

[If the threatener may not have been present at the time the offence was committed, add the following shaded section.]

This does not mean that the person who made the threat must have been present when the offence was committed. The issue is whether the accused reasonably believed that the threat was still present and continuing at that time. Threats can still be active, even if the person who made them is not physically present.

[Summarise prosecution arguments and evidence. The charge should clearly identify whether the argument is (i) that the accused did not actually believe that the threat would be carried out; and/or (ii) that the accused's belief was not reasonable.]

The defence denied this, arguing [summarise defence evidence and/or arguments].

Reasonable belief that committing offence was the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm

The [third/fourth] way the prosecution can negate the defence of duress is by proving that the accused did not reasonably believe that his/her conduct in committing the offence was the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm.

Again, the prosecution can prove this in one of two ways.

One – Has the prosecution proved that NOA did not believe that committing the offence was the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm?

Again, for this question, you must consider all NOA's personal characteristics and all the circumstances as he/she perceived them.

OR Two – If you decide that the accused might have believed that committing the offence was the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm, has the prosecution proved that such a belief would not be reasonable?

When you are deciding whether NOA's belief was reasonable, you must consider whether a reasonable person, with such personal characteristics of the accused as might have affected his/her understanding of the circumstances, might have believed that the threat would be carried out unless the offence was committed.

When you are deciding whether NOA's belief was reasonable, you must consider the circumstances as a reasonable person with all the personal characteristics of the accused would have perceived them to be.

[If it is alleged that the accused was intoxicated, insert the direction relating to a 'reasonable belief' of the accused from either 8.5.1 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14) (Self-induced) or 8.5.2 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14) (self-induced contested), as relevant.]

Remember, [summarise arguments and evidence on NOA's relevant characteristics].

The prosecution argue that NOA could have [describe the actions the accused could have taken to prevent the threat, e.g. "escaping when…" or "reporting the matter to the police"].

For the prosecution to succeed on this basis, it is not enough to prove that NOA could have [describe action]. The prosecution must prove that no reasonable person, with those characteristics of the accused might have affected his/her understanding of the circumstances, could think that committing the offence was the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm.

You should take into account the fact that there may not have been time for calm and measured consideration in the circumstances.

[Where the accused's knowledge of the threatener's reputation may have influenced his or her response, add the following shaded section.]

In determining this issue, you should consider the nature of the threats made, as well as NOA's knowledge of the character and reputation of [identify threatener].

[Summarise prosecution arguments and evidence.] The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence arguments and evidence].

Reasonable response to the threat

Warning! There is little to no Victorian jurisprudence on this element. Please refer to 8.9 Statutory Duress (From 1/11/14).

The [fourth/fifth] way the prosecution can negate the defence of duress is by proving that the accused's conduct in committing the offence was not a reasonable response to the threat.

In deciding this issue, it does not matter if NOA was mistaken in his/her perception of the threat. You must look at the threat which NOA believed s/he faced. You must then consider whether NOA's conduct was a reasonable response to that perceived threat.

In determining this issue, you should consider the nature and seriousness of the threat as NOA perceived it and the proportionality of the crime committed to that threat. You should also take into account anything that NOA knew about [identify threatener], which may have affected how s/he perceived the threat.

In this case the prosecution alleged that, in the circumstances, it was not reasonable to respond to the perceived threat in the way NOA did. [Summarise prosecution arguments and evidence]. The defence denied this, arguing [summarise defence argument and evidence].

Again, you should take into account the fact that there may not have been time for calm and measured consideration in the circumstances.

[If it is alleged that the accused was intoxicated, insert the direction relating to a 'reasonable response' of the accused from either 8.5.1 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14) (Self-induced) or 8.5.2 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14) (self-induced contested), as relevant.]

Voluntary association with the maker of the threat

Warning! There is no Victorian jurisprudence on this element yet. Judges should seek submissions from counsel when directing the jury about this element.

The [fifth/sixth] way the prosecution can negate the defence of duress is by proving that that the accused voluntarily associated with the maker of the threat for the purposes of carrying out the violent conduct involved in [insert the accused's alleged offence].[1203]

This will be the case if, for example, the accused voluntarily joined or associated with an organisation, or became party to an enterprise knowing of its purpose to carry out [specify the violent conduct allegedly carried out]. In such circumstances, the accused cannot rely on duress as a defence to any offences s/he commits in response to threats arising out of his/her association with the organisation, or his/her participation in the enterprise. Because s/he voluntarily put him/herself in a position where such threats could be made, s/he is held responsible for the consequences.

[If the accused may have been coerced into joining the relevant organisation or enterprise, or may not have known of its violent purpose, or if the association may have been for a different purpose than to carry out the conduct allegedly committed, add the following shaded section.]

It is important to note that the prosecution can only negate the defence of duress this way if it proves that the accused voluntarily exposed himself/herself to the duress. This will not be the case if s/he [was coerced into joining the organisation or enterprise in the first place/did not know that the organisation or enterprise s/he was joining had a violent purpose/joined the organisation or enterprise for a different purpose than to carry out] [specify the violent conduct allegedly carried out].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA voluntarily exposed himself/herself to duress by [summarise prosecution arguments and evidence.] The defence denied this, arguing [summarise defence arguments and evidence].

Family Violence

[If there is evidence of family violence involving the accused and the person making the threat, add the following shaded section. If the existence or extent of family violence is in issue, this direction will need to be modified to account for the prosecution's onus of disproving the reasonable possibility that the accused had been subject to family violence.[1204]]

In this case you have heard evidence of family violence between NOA and [identify the person making the threat]. [Insert evidence and/or arguments.]

The law says that where the accused has allegedly [insert relevant act] in circumstances where family violence is alleged, the following matters may be relevant to deciding whether the prosecution has negated the defence of duress:

[1203] See 8.9 Statutory Duress (From 1/11/14), it is currently unclear whether the purpose of the association must be to carry out the violent conduct allegedly committed, or whether association for the purposes of carrying out any kind of violent conduct will negate the defence.

[1204] For criminal proceedings where duress in the context of family violence is in issue, Part 6 the Jury Directions Act 2015 applies and certain preliminary directions may need to be given to the jury (see Jury Directions Act 2013, ss 58–60). See 8.9.1 Preliminary Directions: Duress in the Context of Family Violence (Jury Directions Act 2015).

[Where there is evidence of one or more of the following matters (listed in Crimes Act 1958 s 322J(1), the judge should identify the evidence and relate it to the facts in issue:

(a) The history of the relationship between the person and a family member, including violence by the family member towards the person or by the person towards the family member or by the family member or the person in relation to any other family member;

(b) The cumulative effect, including psychological effect, on the person or a family member of that violence;

(c) Social, cultural or economic factors that impact on the person or a family member who has been affected by family violence;

(d) The general nature and dynamics of relationships affected by family violence, including the possible consequences of separation from the abuser;

(e) The psychological effect of violence on people who are or have been in a relationship affected by family violence;

(f) Social or economic factors that impact on people who are or have been in a relationship affected by family violence.]

In this case, the defence has submitted that this evidence shows that NOA was acting under duress when s/he [insert relevant act and arguments]. The prosecution denied this was the case, alleging [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Summary

To summarise, even if you decide that all of the elements of [insert offence] have been proven beyond reasonable doubt, you may find that NOA was not guilty of that offence because s/he was acting under duress.

Before you can find NOA guilty of [insert offence], you must therefore be satisfied not only that all of the elements have been proved, but also that the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, at least one of the following five [for murder: six] matters:

One – that the accused did not reasonably believe that a threat of harm had been made;

[If the accused is charged with murder]

Two – that the accused did not believe that the threat was to inflict death or serious injury;

[Two/Three] – that the accused did not reasonably believe that the threat would be carried out unless the offence was committed;

[Three/Four] – that the accused did not reasonably believe that his/her conduct in committing the offence was the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm;

[Four/Five] – that the accused's conduct in committing the offence was not a reasonable response to the threat; or [Five/Six] – that the accused voluntarily associated with the maker of the threat for the purposes of carrying out the violent conduct.

If the prosecution cannot prove at least one of these matters beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of [insert offence].

Last updated: 4 August 2016

8.10 Statutory Duress (23/11/05–31/10/14)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Introduction

1. Prior to 2005, duress in Victoria was governed solely by the common law. This situation has been altered by the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005 and the Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014, which introduced duress provisions into the Crimes Act 1958. These provisions were s 9AG, now repealed, and s 322O respectively.
2. This topic covers the defence of duress in s 9AG of the Crimes Act 1958, which applies to homicide offences committed on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014.[1205]
3. Section 322O of the Crimes Act 1958 applies to all offences committed on or after 1 November 2014. See 8.9 Statutory Duress (From 1/11/14).
4. The common law defence of duress applies to non-homicide cases committed before 1 November 2014, and to all offences committed before 23 November 2005. See 8.11 Common Law Duress and 'Common Law Duress' below.

Section 9AG of the Crimes Act 1958

5. Section 9AG of the Crimes Act 1958 states:

[1205] If the date of the victim's death differs from the date on which the actus reus was committed, the relevant date for determining whether the provisions of the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005 apply is the date of death (R v Gould (2007) 17 VR 393; [2007] VSC 420).

Duress

(1) A person is not guilty of a relevant offence in respect of conduct carried out by him or her under duress.

(2) A person carries out conduct under duress if and only if the person reasonably believes that–

(a) subject to sub-section (3), a threat has been made that will be carried out unless an offence is committed; and

(b) carrying out the conduct is the only reasonable way that the threatened harm can be avoided; and

(c) the conduct is a reasonable response to the threat.

(3) However, a person does not carry out conduct under duress if the threat is made by or on behalf of a person with whom the person is voluntarily associating for the purpose of carrying out violent conduct.

(4) This section only applies in the case of murder if the threat is to inflict death or really serious injury.

Note: See section 9AH for evidentiary provisions where family violence is alleged.

Common Law Duress

6. Section 9AG of the Crimes Act 1958 applies only to homicide offences committed on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014.
7. Subdivision 1AAA of the Crimes Act 1958, including section 9AG, was introduced by the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005. It had the effect of abrogating common law defences, including duress, to homicide offences and replacing them with statutory versions (Babic v The Queen (2010) 28 VR 297 [52]).
8. The common law defence of duress applies to non-homicide cases committed before 1 November 2014, and to all offences committed before 23 November 2005.
9. If the accused is charged with both homicide and non-homicide offences committed before 1 November 2014, it will be necessary to give multiple directions about duress. The jury will need to be charged about statutory duress in relation to the homicide charges, and common law duress in relation to any other charges (see R v Parr (2009) 21 VR 590; R v Pepper (2007) 16 VR 637; DPP v McAllister [2007] VSC 315 for similar issues that arise in the context of self-defence).
10. Statutory duress has replaced the common law defence for all offences committed on or after 1 November 2014 (Crimes Act 1958 s 322Q). See 8.9 Statutory Duress (From 1/11/14).

Duress: Voluntariness and Intent

11. Under s 9AG, a person carries out conduct under duress if he/she reasonably believes that the conduct is a reasonable response to a perceived threat of harm that will be carried out if the offence is not committed (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AG).
12. As duress implies a deliberate choice to break the law (although under constrained circumstances), it is incorrect to treat duress as related to voluntariness or intention (see R v Palazoff (1986) 43 SASR 99, 105; R v Harding [1976] VR 129, 141, 169).
13. However, where duress is available as a defence, the accused will have a complete defence to the relevant homicide offence charged (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AG(1)).

14. The defence of duress therefore operates to excuse a person who acts voluntarily and deliberately, but under compulsion (see DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [54]).

Relevant Offences

15. Duress under s 9AG is a defence to murder, manslaughter or defensive homicide (Crimes Act 1958 ss 9AG(1), 9AB).

16. In the case of murder, the defence only applies if 'the threat is to inflict death or really serious injury' (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AG(4)).

17. In contrast, at common law, duress is not available as a defence to murder or to some forms of treason. For more information, see 8.11 Common Law Duress.

Onus of Proof

18. Under the common law, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused was not acting under duress (R v Smyth [1963] VR 737; R v Harding [1976] VR 129; R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49; R v Zaharias (2001) 122 A Crim R 586; R v Garde–Wilson [2005] VSC 441 [32], [37]).

19. This is sometimes expressed as requiring the prosecution to eliminate any reasonable possibility that the accused acted under duress (R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531).

20. Nothing in the duress and related provisions of the Crimes Act 1958 (Division 1, Part (1AA) 'Exceptions to Homicide Offences') indicates that the common law approach to the onus of proof was changed with respect to homicide offences committed from 23 November 2005 and 31 October 2014.

Elements of Statutory Duress

21. To prove the accused did not act under duress, the prosecution must disprove one or more of the following five elements:

    i) The accused reasonably believes that a threat of harm has been made;

    ii) The accused reasonably believes that the threat will be carried out unless an offence is committed;

    iii) The accused reasonably believes that carrying out the conduct is the only reasonable way the threatened harm can be avoided;

    iv) The accused reasonably believes that the conduct is a reasonable response to the threat;

    v) The threat was not made by or on behalf of a person with whom the accused is voluntary associating for the purpose of carrying out violent conduct.

22. The meaning of 'reasonably believes' and each of these five elements is discussed below.

The meaning of 'reasonably believes' under s 9AG

Subjective and objective aspects

23. Under s 9AG, reasonable belief means that:

    - The accused in fact has the belief (a subjective aspect); and

- The belief is reasonable, determined by reference to whether 'a reasonable person possessing the personal characteristics of the accused that might have affected the accused's appreciation of the circumstances might have held that belief' (a subjective and objective aspect) (DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [8]; see also [44], [47]–[49], [52], [59]).

24. The Court of Appeal has held that:

> The phrase 'the person reasonably believes' in its natural meaning requires regard be had to the characteristics of the accused. The words connote what an accused might reasonably believe in the circumstances in which the accused found himself or herself having regard to the personal characteristics of the accused. They encompass the subjective belief of the accused, informed by the personal characteristics of the accused with an objective overlay in the form of reasonableness which allows community standards to be taken into account when assessing the culpability of an accused (DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [58]).

Assessing reasonableness – Characteristics of the accused

25. As noted above, when determining whether a belief is reasonable, the court must take into account any characteristics of the accused that might have affected his or her appreciation of the circumstances (DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [8]).

26. Evidence of family violence, where duress in the context of family violence is in issue, is expressly allowed to be taken into account for this purpose (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AH(2)(c)). That means that the effects of family violence may bear on a person's belief and its reasonableness (DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [44], [53]). See 'Duress and Family Violence' below for more information.

27. Other relevant characteristics of the accused that may have affected his or her perception of circumstances include his or her sex and maturity, as was the position at common law (see DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [27]), along with the history of the relationship between the accused and the threatener (Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [180]).

28. At common law, features such as history of sexual abuse of the accused by someone other than the threatener, or intellectual disability of the accused, are not imputed to the ordinary person for the purpose of assessing whether a person of ordinary firmness would have been likely to yield to the threats (Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [180]).

29. However, self-induced intoxication is expressly excluded as a characteristic of the accused that may be taken into account in determining the reasonableness of a belief under the duress provision in s 9AG. In determining whether a reasonable belief existed, the relevant standard is a person who is not intoxicated (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AJ). See 'Duress and Intoxication' below for more information.

Assessing reasonableness – Circumstances of the accused

30. The jury is required to assess the reasonable belief elements of duress under s 9AG(2) 'by reference to the circumstances as a reasonable person, possessing the personal characteristics of the accused, would have perceived them to be' (DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [8]).

(i) Reasonable belief that a threat of harm has been made

31. The first matter the jury should consider is whether the prosecution has shown that the accused did not reasonably believe that a threat of harm was made (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AG(2)(a)).

32. As noted above, this requires considering whether the accused subjectively believed a threat was made and whether this belief was objectively reasonable. See 'The meaning of "reasonably believes" under s 9AG' above.

33. The common law requirements for duress included that a threat was made. In contrast, s 9AG(2)(a) of the Crimes Act 1958 requires the accused to reasonably believe that a threat of harm has been made.

34. This threat may be unstated or inferred from the whole the circumstances facing the accused, including the words and actions of the allegedly threatening party, along with the history of the relationship between the parties, and the reputation of the third party (see, e.g., R v Rowan [2024] HCA 9, [42]-[62]; DPP v Lynch [19775] AC 653, 704-705; R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49, 51; R v Harding [1976] VR 129, 161).

35. In R v Rowan [2024] HCA 9, the High Court held that "evidence of pervasive violence, intimidation, control and sexual abuse … raised a reasonable possibility that any express or implicit demand … carried with it the implication that serious violence and more severe sexual abuse would be inflicted … if [the accused] refused" (at [62]).

36. Such a process of inferring a threat does not involve recognition of a principle of 'duress of circumstances', where a person commits an offence to escape or avoid dangerous conditions (see R v Rowan [2024] HCA 9).

37. This part of duress does not consider the level of harm threatened. That is a matter considered as part of the fourth element: whether the accused reasonably believed that the conduct was a reasonable response to the threat (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AG(2)(c)).

38. In addition, in cases of murder, the accused must believe the threat is of death or really serious injury (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AG(4)).

39. Under the common law, the relevant threat was not limited to threats made against the accused but to 'a human being' (see, eg, R v Hurley [1967] VR 526, 543 (Smith J); R v Harding [1976] VR 129, 169 (Murphy J); R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49, 55-56; R v Dawson [1978] VR 536, 538, 541; R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531, 537). There is no reason to assume that s 9AG of the Crimes Act 1958 has narrowed the class of people who may be threatened for the purpose of this defence.

(ii) Reasonable belief that the threat will be carried out unless an offence is committed

40. The second matter the jury should consider is whether the prosecution has shown that the accused did not reasonably believe that the threat of harm would be carried out unless an offence was committed (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AG(2)(a)).

41. This is equivalent to the common law element that the accused must have reasonably apprehended that the threat would be carried out (see R v Hurley [1967] VR 526, 543 (Smith J); R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49, 55, 57).

42. As noted above, this requires considering whether the accused subjectively believed that the threat would be carried out unless an offence is committed and whether this belief was objectively reasonable. See 'The meaning of "reasonably believes" under s 9AG', above.

43. At common law, the person posing the threat of harm must have demanded that the accused committed the particular offence with which he or she is charged (R v Dawson [1978] VR 536, 538; R v Lorenz (1998) 146 FLR 369, 376-7; see also R v Martin (2010) 28 VR 579 [10]-[12]). For this purpose, a demand may be made expressly, or by implication, such as where the accused reasonably believes that the threatener will inflict some harm whenever the accused fails to comply with the threatener's demands (see Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [169], [174] per Kyrou and Niall JJA; R v Rowan [2024] HCA 9, [52]-[62]).

44. As explained in 8.11 Common Law Duress, at common law duress was not available to an accused who had escaped from prison following a threat on his life by another inmate. The accused had chosen to escape contrary to the wishes of the threatener, rather than on their instruction, so the escape was not the 'particular offence nominated by the person making the threats' (R v Dawson [1978] VR 536, 538; c.f. R v Rowan [2024] HCA 9 at [102]-[104] per Edelman J).

45. However, in R v Rowan [2024] HCA 9, Edelman J held at [97]-[111] that there the defence of duress (whether at common law or under s 322O) does not require the threatener to issue a demand or direction. Instead, any demand or direction is only relevant to the question whether the offending is a reasonable response to the threat. This conceptual approach to the issue of demand or direction was not adopted by the plurality, who resolved the case on the basis that a threat need not be express.

(iii) Reasonable belief that carrying out the conduct is the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm

46. Section s 9AG(2)(b) states that conduct will be carried out under duress only if the accused reasonably believes that carrying out the conduct is the only reasonable way that the threatened harm can be avoided.

47. As noted above, this requires considering whether the accused subjectively believed that carrying out the conduct was the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm and whether this belief was objectively reasonable. See 'The meaning of "reasonably believes" under s 9AG', above.

48. When considering this issue, the jury should consider whether the accused knowingly passed up a reasonable opportunity to negate or nullify the threat.

49. For example, an opportunity to escape may be a reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm in some circumstances, but would not necessarily make the threat ineffective in others. If the threat involved harm to be inflicted in the future, for example, or to someone other than the accused, failing to take an opportunity to escape would not necessarily prevent the accused from relying on the defence (see R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531, 538).

50. Similarly, an opportunity to report the threat to the police may be a reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm, unless the accused reasonably believed police protection to be ineffective against the person making the threats or that the police protection may be initially effective but would not save the accused from threatened violence at a later stage. This may be the case where family violence is in issue, for example (see R v Runjanjic (1991) 56 SASR 114, 120–122; R v Lorenz (1998) 146 FLR 369, 376).

51. In considering whether the accused reasonably believed that carrying out the conduct was the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm, the jury should consider the accused's knowledge of the character and reputation of the person perceived to have made the threat, as well as the nature of the perceived threat (see, e.g. R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531, 534–535). This may be relevant in the context of family violence, see 'Duress and Family Violence' below for more information.

52. Family violence may influence the accused's belief in the availability of opportunities to escape, report, or otherwise avoid the harm, and the reasonableness of that belief (R v Runjanjic (1991) 56 SASR 114; Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [187] (Kyrou and Niall JJA)). See 'Duress and Family Violence' below for more information.

53. Under the common law, the threat must have been 'present, continuing, imminent and impending'. It was the threat rather than the harm threatened that must have been present, continuing and imminent; that is, the compulsion of the threat must have been active at the time the offence was committed (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526, 543 (Smith J); R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49, 55–57; R v Dawson [1978] VR 536, 537–538, 541).

54. Under the Crimes Act 1958, this is no longer a discrete requirement. However, where the accused knows that a threat has expired, he or she is unlikely to be able to reasonably believe that carrying out the conduct is the only reasonable way that the threatened harm can be avoided.

55. Under the common law, the threat must have induced the accused to commit the offence (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526, 543 (Smith J); R v Dawson [1978] VR 536, 538, 541). If the accused had an alternative motive to commit the offence, it was less likely that the threat induced the accused to commit it (see R v Zaharias (2001) 122 A Crim R 586 [42]–[44]).

56. It seems unlikely that the accused could reasonably have believed that the conduct was the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm if the threat did not directly provoke the commission of the offence. However, s 9AG(2)(b) does not use the language of the threat 'inducing' the accused to act, and the courts have not considered whether the section retains this common law element.

(iv) Reasonable belief that the conduct is a reasonable response to the threat

57. Section s 9AG(2)(c) states that conduct will be carried out under duress if and only if the accused reasonably believes the conduct is a reasonable response to the threat.

58. As noted above, this requires considering whether the accused subjectively believed that the conduct was a reasonable response to the threat and whether this belief was objectively reasonable. See 'The meaning of "reasonably believes" under s 9AG', above.

Response to which threat?

59. Section 9AG(2)(c) refers to 'the threat'.

60. For the purpose of deciding whether the accused subjectively believed that his/her conduct was a reasonable response to the threat, the relevant threat will be the threat as perceived by the accused.

61. However, for the purposes of deciding whether the accused's belief was reasonable, the relevant circumstances are those a reasonable person, possessing the personal characteristics of the accused, would have perceived them to be (DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [8], [58]).

62. Therefore, for the purposes of determining the reasonableness of the accused's belief, the threat in question is the one a reasonable person, possessing the personal characteristics of the accused, would have perceived it to be.

Proportionality of the response to the threat

63. Under other statutory tests requiring a response to be reasonable (e.g. the self-defence provisions in s 322K(2)(b) of the Crimes Act 1958, s 418(2) of the Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) and s 10.4(2) of the Commonwealth Criminal Code), the reasonableness of the response should also be assessed in terms of the proportionality of the conduct to the perceived situation (Flanagan v R [2013] NSWCCA 320 [78]–[79]; Oblach v R (2005) 65 NSWLR 75 [51]–[54]; R v Katarzynski [2002] NSWSC 613 [23]).

64. These tests differ from s 9AG(2)(c), as they do not consider the reasonableness of the response in terms of the accused's beliefs. However, it is likely that the proportionality of the conduct to the perceived threat will be relevant in determining the reasonableness of the accused's belief that his/her conduct was a reasonable response to the threat under s 9AG(2)(c).

65. Under the common law, the relevant question is whether a person of ordinary firmness would have been likely to yield to the threat in the way the accused did (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526; R v Zaharias (2001) 122 A Crim R 586; R v Dawson [1978] VR 536; R v Garde–Wilson [2005] VSC 441 [32]).

66. This question may also be relevant in determining the reasonableness of the accused's belief that his/her conduct was a reasonable response to the threat.

67. As part of this test, the 'person of ordinary firmness' is taken to have the accused's characteristics, such as age, gender, history and relationship with the threatener, and was placed in the same objective circumstances as the accused, including any circumstances of family violence (Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [73], [180] (Kyrou and Niall JJA)).

68. Under the common law, the same test (whether a threat of that nature would be likely to compel a person of ordinary firmness to commit the crime) applies where the threat is not against the accused personally but, for example, the accused's family is threatened instead (R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531, 537). The jury can take into account factors such as the strength of the accused's attachment to the third party (see, e.g. R v Hurley [1967] VR 526, 542–543 (Smith J)). These factors are likely to remain relevant to assessing the reasonableness of the accused's response under s 9AG(2)(c).

Family violence

69. Under the common law, expert evidence on 'battered women's syndrome' is admissible in deciding whether a woman of reasonable firmness in the domestic situation of the accused women would have acted the way she did, or to explain why a women of reasonable firmness in the accused's position would not escape the situation rather than participate in criminal activity (R v Runjanjic (1991) 56 SASR 114, 120–122; see also R v Lorenz (1998) 146 FLR 369, 376).

70. The Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005 that introduced the duress provision, s 9AG, into the Crimes Act 1958 also introduced family violence provisions that specifically stated that evidence of family violence may be relevant in deciding whether conduct was carried out under duress. See 'Duress and Family Violence' below for more information.

71. The Court of Appeal has noted that evidence of family violence 'may go to subjective belief or objective reasonableness and so be used in determining whether or not the actions taken by an accused were a reasonable response to the threat' (DPP v Parker [2016] VSCA 101 [40]).

72. Therefore evidence of family violence that bears on the accused's perception of the threat will be relevant. As at common law, this presumably includes the accused's knowledge of the character and reputation of the person making the threat (see R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531, 534–535).

73. Additionally, personal characteristics of the accused that might have affected his or her appreciation of the circumstances must be taken into account (see 'The meaning of 'reasonably believes' under s 9AG' above). Therefore, the effects of family violence that may have affected the particular accused's response, such as the long term psychological impact of coercive and controlling violence will also be relevant when assessing the reasonableness of that response to the perceived threat.

(v) Voluntary association with the maker of the threat

74. The accused's conduct is not carried out under duress if the threat compelling the conduct is made by or on behalf of a person with whom the accused is 'voluntarily associating for the purpose of carrying out violent conduct' (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AG(3)).

75. Section 9AG (3) applies to voluntary association, which in this context means where the accused freely chose to associate, without being subject to threats or other coercion, into associating with the person making the threat.

76. Section 9AG (3) is similar to the common law condition: 'the accused did not, by fault on his part when free from the duress, expose himself to its application' (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526, 543; R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49, 55–56; R v Dawson [1978] VR 536, 538, 541). Under the common law the accused cannot rely on the defence if he or she freely chose to associate with any criminal organisation or became a party to a criminal enterprise (see R v Palazoff (1986) 43 SASR 99, 101 (Zelling ACJ)).

77. Under s 9AG(3), however, there is the additional requirement that the organisation or enterprise was intended to carry out violent conduct. It will not apply when the accused has associated with others for the purposes of committing non-violent conduct or offences.

78. Section 9AG(3) does not state clearly whether duress is excluded following association for the purpose of any violent conduct. As a matter of prudence, this charge book adopts the approach that s 9AG (3) is not engaged where the accused is compelled under duress to commit violent conduct which is different from that which formed the purpose of the voluntary association with the other person.

79. This is an approach similar to that taken under the Commonwealth Criminal Code s 10.2(3)), which states: '[duress] does not apply if the threat is made by or on behalf of a person with whom the person under duress is voluntarily associating for the purpose of carrying out conduct of the kind actually carried out.'

80. However, caution should be exercised in relation to this issue as Victorian courts have not considered s 9AG(3).

Duress and Murder

81. Where the accused is charged with murder, the defence of duress under s 9AG will only apply if 'the threat is to inflict death or really serious injury' (s 9AG(4)).

82. Section 9AG(4) refers to 'the threat' and is separated from the elements relating to the accused's beliefs in s 9AG(2). There are two possible interpretations available for the term 'the threat' in s 9AG(4):

    - It refers to the threat as perceived by the accused (the subjectively perceived threat);
    - It refers to the threat which the jury considers objectively existed (the objective threat).

83. In favour of the subjectively perceived threat approach, the reference to 'the threat' and the position of those words in the section suggest that it is pointing back to the threat referenced in s 9AG(2)(a), which the accused reasonably believed would be carried out unless an offence was committed.

84. In favour of the objective threat approach, it is relevant to note that s 9AG(4) differs in wording from its replacement provision s 322O(4) (s 322O is the duress provision that applies to offences committed on or after 1 November 2014). Section 9AG(4) states that duress applies to murder only 'if the threat is to inflict death or really serious injury', while s 322O(4) states that duress applies to murder only 'if the person believes that the threat is to inflict death or really serious injury.'

85. As a matter of prudence, the model charge adopts the subjectively perceived threat approach, as this presents the lower risk of injustice to an accused.

86. The subjectively perceived threat approach means that the jury should ask whether the threat as perceived by the accused was to inflict death or really serious injury.

87. However, the wording of s 9AG(4) does not indicate that the accused belief about the nature of the threat must reasonable. This threshold requirement in the case of a murder charge therefore appears to be purely subjective.

88. A judge will only need to direct a jury about this threshold requirement in cases of murder.

89. Under the common law, duress was not available on a charge of murder (although it may have been available where the accused did not do the actual killing). However, s 9AG of the Crimes Act 1958 relates to homicide offences, including murder, committed on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014.

Duress and Intoxication

90. Sections 9AJ(1) and (3) of the Crimes Act 1958 state that:

> (1) If any part of an element of a relevant offence, or of a defence to a relevant offence, relies on reasonable belief, in determining whether that reasonable belief existed, regard must be had to the standard of a reasonable person who is not intoxicated. …
>
> (3) If any part of an element of a relevant offence, or of a defence to a relevant offence, relies on reasonable response, in determining whether that response was reasonable, regard must be had to the standard of a reasonable person who is not intoxicated.

91. Section 9AJ(1) means that any self-induced intoxication by the accused cannot be taken into account in deciding whether he/she holds a reasonable belief. For the purposes of the duress provision in s 9AG, this means that self-induced intoxication cannot be taken into account in deciding the reasonableness of the accused's beliefs that:

    - a threat has been made;
    - the threat will be carried out unless an offence is committed;

- carrying out the conduct is the only reasonable way that the threatened harm can be avoided, and
- the conduct is a reasonable response to the threat.

92. Additionally, s 9AJ(3) means that any self-induced intoxication by the accused cannot be taken into account in deciding whether his/her conduct was a reasonable response to the threat.

93. Section 9AJ(4) provides that where the intoxication is not self-induced, regard must be had to the standard of a reasonable person intoxicated to the same extent as the person concerned. See ss 9AJ(5)–(6) for the definition of 'self-induced intoxication'.

94. For more information, see 8.5 Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14) (23/11/05–31/10/14).

Duress and Family Violence

95. The Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014 introduced provisions concerning 'family violence' into the Crimes Act 1958 (Division 1, Part (1AA) 'Exceptions to Homicide Offences').

96. Section 9AH of the Crimes Act 1958 and Part 6 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 explain how evidence of family violence may be relevant to whether conduct was carried out under duress.

97. Section 9AH(4) defines family violence "in relation to a person" as "violence against that person by a family member".

98. A person's "family member" is defined broadly in s 9AH(4) and includes:

- a person who is or has been married to the person;
- a person who has or has had an intimate personal relationship with the person;
- a person who is or has been the father, mother, step-father or step-mother of the person;
- a child who normally or regularly resides with the person;
- a guardian of the person; and
- another person who is or has been ordinarily a member of the household of the person.

99. "Violence" is also defined broadly in s 9AH(4) to mean:

- physical abuse;
- sexual abuse;
- psychological abuse (which need not involve actual or threatened physical or sexual abuse), including but not limited to:
    - intimidation;
    - harassment;
    - damage to property;
    - threats of physical abuse, sexual abuse or psychological abuse;
    - in relation to a child:
        - causing or allowing the child to see or hear the physical, sexual or psychological abuse of a person by a family member; or
        - putting the child, or allowing the child to be put, at real risk of seeing or hearing that abuse occurring.

100. A single act may amount to 'abuse' for the purpose of the definition of violence (s 9AH(5)). A number of acts that form part of a pattern of behaviour may also amount to "abuse" for that purpose, even though some or all of those acts, when viewed in isolation, may appear to be minor or trivial (s 9AH(5)).

101. Section 9AH(2) provides that evidence of family violence may be relevant in determining whether a person has carried out conduct under duress, in circumstances where duress in the context of family violence is in issue (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AH2).

102. Section 9AH(3) sets out evidence of family violence, including evidence of:

> (a) the history of the relationship between the person and a family member, including violence by the family member towards the person or by the person towards the family member or by the family member or the person in relation to any other family member;
>
> (b) the cumulative effect, including psychological effect, on the person or a family member of that violence;
>
> (c) social, cultural or economic factors that impact on the person or a family member who has been affected by family violence;
>
> (d) the general nature and dynamics of relationships affected by family violence, including the possible consequences of separation from the abuser;
>
> (e) the psychological effect of violence on people who are or have been in a relationship affected by family violence;
>
> (f) social or economic factors that impact on people who are or have been in a relationship affected by family violence.

103. See 'Chapter 4: Evidence of Relationship and Family Violence' in the Victorian Law Reform Commission's Defences to Homicide: Final Report for a more detailed discussion of the relationship between duress and family violence, and the use which can be made of the evidence outlined above.[1206]

Family Violence and Duress: Jury Directions

104. The Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014 introduced a new Part 7 into the Jury Directions Act 2013. On 29 June 2015, these provisions were revised and relocated to Part 6 of the Jury Directions Act 2015.

105. Part 3 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 does not apply to Part 6 of the Act.

106. Part 6 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 applies to any trial commencing on or after 29 June 2015, regardless of the date of any alleged offence.

107. For the purposes of Part 6, "family violence" has the same meaning as in s 9AH(4) of the Crimes Act 1958 (see 'Duress and Family Violence' above).

108. The trial judge must give the jury preliminary directions on family violence, in accordance with s 59 of the Jury Directions Act 2015, if the defence counsel requests such directions, unless there are good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 58). The judge may give the statutory directions if the accused is unrepresented and the judge considers it in the interests of justice to do so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 58(3)).

109. The judge must give the statutory directions on family violence as soon as practicable after the request is made and the judge may give the direction before any evidence is adduced in the trial. The directions may be repeated at any time during the trial (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 58(4)–(5)).

110. The directions must include all of the following (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 59):

[1206] The Report can be downloaded here.

(a) self-defence or duress (as the case requires) is, or is likely to be, in issue in the trial; and

(b) as a matter of law, evidence of family violence may be relevant to determining whether the accused acted in self-defence or under duress (as the case requires); and

[...]

(d) in the case of duress, evidence in the trial is likely to include evidence of family violence committed by another person against the accused or a third person.

111. The following directions under s 60 may also be sought and, if sought, must be given unless there are good reasons for not doing so:

(a) that family violence–

(i) is not limited to physical abuse and may include sexual abuse and psychological abuse;

(ii) may involve intimidation, harassment and threats of abuse;

(iii) may consist of a single act;

(iv) may consist of separate acts that form part of a pattern of behaviour which can amount to abuse even though some or all of those acts may, when viewed in isolation, appear to be minor or trivial;

(b) if relevant, that experience shows that–

(i) people may react differently to family violence and there is no typical, proper or normal response to family violence;

(ii) it is not uncommon for a person who has been subjected to family violence–

(A) to stay with an abusive partner after the onset of family violence, or to leave and then return to the partner;

(B) not to report family violence to police or seek assistance to stop family violence;

(iii) decisions made by a person subjected to family violence about how to address, respond to or avoid family violence may be influenced by-

(A) family violence itself;

(B) cultural, social, economic and personal factors;

(c) that, as a matter of law, evidence that the accused assaulted the victim on a previous occasion does not mean that the accused could not have been acting [...] under duress [...] in relation to the offence charged.

Duress and Marital Coercion

112. Section 336 of the Crimes Act 1958 provides for the defence of marital coercion. While similar to duress, marital coercion is a distinct defence that applies in limited circumstances.

113. Marital coercion allows a women to be acquitted of a criminal offence that she committed because her husband coerced her to do so through pressure or threats, if the coercion is 'sufficient to cause a woman of ordinary good character and normal firmness of mind, placed in the circumstances in which the woman was placed, to conduct herself in the manner charged' (Crimes Act 1958 s 336(3)).

114. Unlike duress, which is available as a defence to any accused person, marital coercion is available only to married women. Additionally, duress under s 9AG is available to as defence to murder, but marital coercion is not.

115. The Victoria Law Reform recommended retaining the defence of marital coercion in acknowledgment of the high rate of violence by men against their female partners, and the difficulties which women experience in seeking protection against it. In murder cases, however, the more rigorous requirements of the duress defence apply (Victoria Law Reform Commission, Defences to Homicide: Final Report, 2004, 122).

When to Charge the Jury about Duress

116. The judge must direct the jury about duress if the accused indicates that duress is in issue or if the judge considers that there are substantial and compelling reasons to direct the jury about duress despite the absence of a request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 11, 16). See Directions under Jury Directions Act 2015.

117. If a duress direction is requested, it is only if the judge is satisfied that there is no evidence that raises a reasonable possibility that the elements of duress exist that the judge would have good reason to decline to give the requested direction (R v Rowan [2024] HCA 9, [33]).

118. Duress may be left to the jury even if the accused's primary defence is that he or she did not commit the relevant conduct. The inconsistency between duress and denial of offending is a matter for the jury to assess (Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [79], [157] per Kyrou and Niall JJA).

119. In criminal proceedings where duress in the context of family violence is in issue, Part 6 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 specifies certain directions that may be given early in the trial. See 'Family Violence and Duress: Jury Directions' above and Directions under Jury Directions Act 2015.

120. At common law, the judge is required to direct the jury about duress if the evidence was such that it might lead a reasonable jury to decide that the accused committed the relevant act under duress (R v Evans (No 1) [1976] VR 517; Taiapa v R (2009) 240 CLR 95 [5]; R v Harding [1976] VR 129).

121. The question is whether, on the version of events most favourable to the accused that is suggested by the evidence, a jury acting reasonably might fail to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused was not acting under duress (Taiapa v R (2009) 240 CLR 95 [5]. See also Martin v R (2010) 28 VR 579 [14]-[15]; Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [84] per Kyrou and Niall JJA).

122. Under the common law, the issue of duress can be raised at any time during the trial (R v Zaharias (2001) 122 A Crim R 586).

Content of the Charge

123. There is no single formulation that must be followed when charging a jury about duress (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 6). What is required is instructions expressed with sufficient clarity that the jury could be left in no doubt with respect to the principles that they must apply to the task before them (R v Zaharias (2001) 122 A Crim R 586 [56]).

124. The burden of proof should be made very clear to the jury. They should be told that the accused can only be convicted if the prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that he or she did not carry out the conduct under duress. See 'Onus of Proof' above.

125. In most cases it is neither necessary nor desirable to explain every element of the defence in a charge (R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49, 56).

126. Judges should take care to instruct the jury in the context of the evidence and issues raised in the trial (R v Zaharias (2001) 122 A Crim R 586 [56]). The question of duress should be placed in its factual setting, and considerations that may assist the jury to reach its conclusion should be identified (see R v Goldman (No 5) [2004] VSC 292 [6]; R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49, 56–57).

127. While not a misdirection, the jury should not be told to examine the evidence relating to duress with great care and scrutiny (due to the ease with which it can be invented). The question whether an accused's claim that he or she was acting under duress is plausible enough to raise a reasonable doubt is exactly the kind of matter which juries are well-equipped to deal with, without the need for any special direction (R v Goldman [2007] VSCA 25 [30]).

Last updated: 17 April 2024

8.10.1 Preliminary Directions: Duress in the Context of Family Violence (Jury Directions Act 2015) (23/11/05–31/10/14)

Click here for a Word version of this document

This charge should be given, unless there are good reasons for not doing so, when:

- the trial commences on or after 29 June 2015, and duress in the context of family violence is in issue;
- the offence was committed between 23 November 2005 and 31 October 2014; and
- defence counsel (or the accused, if unrepresented) has requested that the jury be directed on family violence in accordance with s 58 of the Jury Directions Act 2015.

If the accused is unrepresented and does not request a direction on family violence, this charge can be given if it in the interests of justice to do so.

This charge must be given as soon as practicable after a request has been made in terms of s 58 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 and may be given before any evidence is adduced in the trial.

Introduction

In this case, duress in the context of family violence [is/is likely to be] in issue. I therefore need to give you some directions about "duress" and "family violence".

The law recognises that sometimes people will be compelled to commit crimes to avoid threatened harm. The law says that a person may act under duress if:

- the person reasonably believes that a threat of harm has been made that will be carried out unless an offence is committed, and

[If the accused is charged with murder, add the following shaded item]

- the threat was to inflict death or serious injury, and
- the person reasonably believes that their conduct is the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm, and
- the person reasonably believes that their conduct is a reasonable response to the threat, and
- the person did not voluntarily associate with the person making the threat for the purposes of carrying out violent conduct.

The law recognises that evidence of "family violence" may be relevant in deciding whether the accused acted under duress. "Family violence" includes all kinds of physical, sexual and psychological abuse by one family member towards another.

Examples of evidence of family violence include:

- The history of the relationship between family members, including violence by one family member towards any other family member.
- The overall effect of that violence, including any psychological effect, on the person who has been affected by family violence or the other family members.

- Social, cultural or economic factors that impact on the person who has been affected by family violence or the other family members.
- The general nature and dynamics of relationships affected by family violence, including the possible consequences of separation from the abuser.

Evidence in this case is likely to include evidence of family violence committed by another person against [the accused/a third person].

Considerations

[All or specified parts of the following shaded section must be included:]

Family violence is not limited to physical abuse and can include sexual abuse and psychological abuse.

Family violence can involve intimidation, harassment and threats of abuse.

Family violence can consist of a single act.

Family violence can also consist of separate acts that form part of a pattern of behaviour. Those separate acts can, when looked at together, amount to abuse even though some or all of those acts may, when looked at separately, appear to be minor or trivial.

Experience shows that people may react differently to family violence and there is no typical, proper or normal response to family violence.

Experience also shows that it is not uncommon for a person who has been subjected to family violence to stay with an abusive partner after the family violence starts, or to leave and then return to the partner, or not to report family violence to police or seek assistance to stop family violence.

Experience also shows that family violence itself and cultural, social, economic and personal factors can influence decisions made by a person who is subjected to family violence about how to address the family violence or how to respond to or avoid it.

The law recognises that if the accused assaulted the victim on a previous occasion that does not mean that the accused could not have been acting under duress when [he/she] [insert relevant conduct].

Last updated: 23 September 2016

8.10.2 Charge: Statutory Duress (23/11/05–31/10/14)

Click here for a Word version of this document

[This charge should be given if there is evidence from which a jury might infer that the accused was acting under duress when s/he committed a homicide offence from 23 November 2005 to 31 October 2014*.*

- For any offence committed on or after 1 November 2014, see 8.9.2 Charge: Statutory Duress (From 1/11/14).
- For non-homicide cases committed before 1 November 2014, and all offences committed before 23 November 2005, see 8.11.1 Charge: Common Law Duress*.*

The charge should be given immediately after directing the jury about the relevant offence.]

Introduction

In this case the defence alleged that NOA was acting under duress when s/he [insert relevant act]. I therefore need to give you some directions about "duress".[1207]

The defence of duress was introduced into the law a long time ago to allow for human frailty. It recognises that sometimes ordinary people will be compelled to commit crimes to avoid threatened harm. When the defence of duress applies, the law excuses them from responsibility given the circumstances.

This means that, even if you are satisfied that the prosecution has proven all of the elements of [insert offence] beyond reasonable doubt, NOA will not be guilty of that offence if s/he acted under duress.

Because the prosecution must prove the accused's guilt, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was not acting under duress. It is not for NOA to prove that s/he did act under duress.

Unfortunately, it is always difficult to give directions about duress in a way which completely avoids any suggestion that it is a matter for the accused to prove. However, it is important to remember that the accused does not have to prove anything. You must keep in mind at all times that it is the prosecution who must remove any reasonable possibility that the accused acted under duress.

So before you can find the accused guilty of [insert offence], you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the prosecution has proven all of the elements of the offence and has negated the defence of duress.

Elements of duress

There are five [for murder: six] ways in which the prosecution can negate the defence of duress. I will list them for you, and then examine each one in detail.[1208]

The prosecution must satisfy you beyond reasonable doubt of at least one of the following:

One, the accused did not reasonably believe that a threat of harm had been made.

[If the accused is charged with murder, add the following shaded item]

Two, the threat was not to inflict death or serious injury.

[Two/Three], the accused did not reasonably believe that the threat would be carried out unless the offence was committed.

[Three/Four], the accused did not reasonably believe that his/her conduct in committing the offence was the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm.

[Four/Five], the accused did not reasonably believe that his/her conduct in committing the offence was a reasonable response to the threat.

[Five/Six], the accused voluntarily associated with the maker of the threat for the purposes of carrying out the violent conduct.

[1207] This charge only addresses the defence of duress. It is possible that the evidence in question may also have relevance to the determination of the elements (see, e.g. R v Darrington [1980] VR 353, 369–370; R v Harding [1976] VR 129).

[1208] If any of these methods of negating duress are not relevant in the circumstances of the case, they should be deleted and the charge modified accordingly.

If the prosecution can prove any of these matters beyond reasonable doubt, then they will have negated the defence of duress. In such circumstances, if you are also satisfied that the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, all of the elements of [describe offence], then s/he will be guilty of that offence.

I will now examine each of these matters in more detail.

Reasonable belief in a threat of harm

The first way the prosecution can negate the defence of duress is by proving that the accused did not reasonably believe that a threat of harm had been made.

The prosecution can prove this in one of two ways.

One – Has the prosecution proved that NOA did not believe that a threat of harm had been made?

For the purpose of this question, you must consider all NOA's personal characteristics and all the circumstances as he/she perceived them.

OR Two – If you decide that the accused might have believed that a threat of harm was made, has the prosecution proved that such a belief would not be reasonable?

When you are deciding whether NOA's belief was reasonable, you must consider whether a reasonable person, with such personal characteristics of the accused as might have affected his/her understanding of the circumstances, might have believed that a threat of harm had been made.

In doing this, you must consider the circumstances as a reasonable person, with the personal characteristics of the accused, would have perceived them to be.

[If it is alleged that the accused was intoxicated, insert the direction relating to a 'reasonable belief' of the accused from either 8.6.1 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (23/11/05–31/10/14) (Self-induced) or 8.6.2 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (23/11/05–31/10/14) (Self-induced contested), as relevant.]

[Summarise arguments and evidence on NOA's relevant characteristics].

[If the threat was made against someone other than the accused, add the following shaded section.]

The threat does not have to be a threat of harm to the accused [himself/herself]. Here, NOA says that the threat was [describe threat].

The prosecution alleged that the accused did not reasonably believe that a threat of harm had been made. [Summarise prosecution arguments and evidence. The charge should clearly identify whether the argument is (i) that the accused did not believe that a threat was made; and/or (ii) that the accused's belief that a threat was made was not reasonable.]

The defence denied this, arguing [summarise defence evidence and/or arguments].

Threat to inflict death or serious injury

[If the accused is charged with murder, add the following shaded section.]

The second way the prosecution can negate the defence of duress is by proving that that the threat perceived by the accused was not a threat to inflict death or serious injury.

The prosecution alleged that that was the case here. [Summarise prosecution arguments and evidence.]

The defence denied this, arguing [summarise defence evidence and/or arguments].

Reasonable belief that the threat will be carried out unless the offence is committed

The [second/third] way the prosecution can negate the defence of duress is by proving that the accused did not reasonably believe that the threat would be carried out unless the offence was committed.

This requires the prosecution to prove that NOA did not reasonably believe that [identify threatener] would actually [identify threat] if s/he did not [describe offence].

Again, the prosecution can prove this in one of two ways.

One – Has the prosecution proved that NOA did not believe that the threat would be carried out unless the offence was committed?

Again, for this question, you must consider all NOA's personal characteristics and all the circumstances as he/she perceived them.

OR Two – If you decide that the accused might have believed that the threat would be carried out unless the offence was committed, has the prosecution proved that such a belief would not be reasonable?

When you are deciding whether NOA's belief was reasonable, you must consider whether a reasonable person, with such personal characteristics of the accused as might have affected his/her understanding of the circumstances, might have believed that the threat would be carried out unless the offence was committed.

When you are deciding whether NOA's belief was reasonable, you must consider the circumstances as a reasonable person with all the personal characteristics of the accused would have perceived them to be.

[If it is alleged that the accused was intoxicated, insert the direction relating to a 'reasonable belief' of the accused from either 8.6.1 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (23/11/05–31/10/14) (Self-induced) or 8.6.2 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (23/11/05–31/10/14) (Self-induced contested), as relevant.]

Remember, [summarise arguments and evidence on NOA's relevant characteristics].

One matter to consider is whether the perceived threat was still active at the time the accused committed the offence. If the prosecution can prove that the accused did not reasonably believe that the threat was still active at the time the offence was committed, the defence of duress will fail.

[If the alleged threat was to commit harm in the future, add the following shaded section.]

This does not mean that the threat must have been to harm [identify threatened party] immediately if NOA did not commit the offence. The defence of duress does not fail simply because the threat was to harm [him/her/someone else] in the future. The issue here is whether the accused reasonable believed that the threat – whatever its nature – was still active at the time the crime was committed.

[If the threatener may not have been present at the time the offence was committed, add the following shaded section.]

This does not mean that the person who made the threat must have been present when the offence was committed. The issue is whether the accused reasonably believed that the threat was still present and continuing at that time. Threats can still be active, even if the person who made them is not physically present.

[Summarise prosecution arguments and evidence. The charge should clearly identify whether the argument is (i) that the accused did not actually believe that the threat would be carried out; and/or (ii) that the accused's belief was not reasonable.]

The defence denied this, arguing [summarise defence evidence and/or arguments].

Reasonable belief that committing offence was the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm

The [third/fourth] way the prosecution can negate the defence of duress is by proving that the accused did not reasonably believe that his/her conduct in committing the offence was the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm.

Again, the prosecution can prove this in one of two ways.

One – Has the prosecution proved that NOA did not believe that committing the offence was the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm?

Again, for this question, you must consider all NOA's personal characteristics and all the circumstances as he/she perceived them.

OR Two – If you decide that the accused might have believed that committing the offence was the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm, has the prosecution proved that such a belief would not be reasonable?

When you are deciding whether NOA's belief was reasonable, you must consider whether a reasonable person, with such personal characteristics of the accused as might have affected his/her understanding of the circumstances, might have believed that his/her conduct in committing the offence was the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm.

When you are deciding whether NOA's belief was reasonable, you must consider the circumstances as a reasonable person with all the personal characteristics of the accused would have perceived them to be.

[If it is alleged that the accused was intoxicated, insert the direction relating to a 'reasonable belief' of the accused from either 8.6.1 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (23/11/05–31/10/14) (Self-induced) or 8.6.2 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (23/11/05–31/10/14) (Self-induced contested), as relevant.]

Remember, [summarise arguments and evidence on NOA's relevant characteristics].

The prosecution argue that NOA could have [describe the actions the accused could have taken to prevent the threat, e.g. "escaping when…" or "reporting the matter to the police"].

For the prosecution to succeed on this basis, it is not enough to prove that NOA could have [describe action]. The prosecution must prove that no reasonable person, with those characteristics of the accused as might have affected his/her understanding of the circumstances, might have believed that committing the offence was the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm.

You should take into account the fact that there may not have been time for calm and measured consideration in the circumstances.

[Where the accused's knowledge of the threatener's reputation may have influenced his or her response, add the following shaded section.]

In determining this issue, you should consider the nature of the threats made, as well as NOA's knowledge of the character and reputation of [identify threatener].

[Summarise prosecution arguments and evidence.] The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence arguments and evidence].

Reasonable belief that committing offence was a reasonable response to the threat

The [fourth/fifth] way the prosecution can negate the defence of duress is by proving that the accused did not reasonably believe that his/her conduct in committing the offence was a reasonable response to the threat.

Again, the prosecution can prove this in one of two ways.

One – Has the prosecution proved that NOA did not believe his/her response to the threat was reasonable?

For the purpose of this question, you must consider all NOA's personal characteristics and all the circumstances as he/she perceived them.

OR Two – If you decide that the accused might have believed that his/her response to the threat was reasonable, has the prosecution proved that such a belief would not be reasonable?

When you are deciding whether NOA's belief was reasonable, you must consider whether a reasonable person, with such personal characteristics of the accused as might have affected his/her understanding of the circumstances, might have believed that that his/her conduct in committing the offence was a reasonable response to the threat.

When you are deciding whether NOA's belief was reasonable, you must consider the circumstances as a reasonable person with all the personal characteristics of the accused would have perceived them to be.

Remember, [summarise arguments and evidence on NOA's relevant characteristics].

In determining this issue, you should consider the nature and seriousness of the threat and the proportionality of the crime committed to that threat. You should also take into account anything that NOA knew about [identify threatener], which may have affected how he/she perceived the threat, or how a reasonable person, with the personal characteristics of the accused, would have perceived the threat.

Again, you should take into account the fact that there may not have been time for calm and measured consideration in the circumstances.

[If it is alleged that the accused was intoxicated, insert the direction relating to a 'reasonable response' of the accused from either 8.6.1 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (23/11/05–31/10/14) (Self-induced) or 8.6.2 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (23/11/05–31/10/14) (Self-induced contested), as relevant.]

The prosecution alleged that the accused did not reasonably believe that his/her conduct was a reasonable response to the threat. [Summarise prosecution arguments and evidence. The charge should clearly identify whether the argument is (i) that the accused did not believe that his/her conduct was a reasonable response to the threat; and/or (ii) that the accused's belief that his/her conduct was a reasonable response to the threat was not reasonable.]

The defence denied this, arguing [summarise defence evidence and/or arguments].

Voluntary association with the maker of the threat

Warning! There is no Victorian jurisprudence on this element yet. Judges should seek submissions from counsel when directing the jury about this element.

The [fifth/sixth] way the prosecution can negate the defence of duress is by proving that that the accused voluntarily associated with the maker of the threat for the purposes of carrying out the violent conduct involved in [insert the accused's alleged offence].[1209]

[1209] See 8.6 Statutory Duress (23/11/05–31/10/14), it is currently unclear whether the purpose of the association must be to carry out the violent conduct allegedly committed, or whether association for the purposes of carrying out any kind of violent conduct will negate the defence.

This will be the case if, for example, the accused voluntarily joined or associated with an organisation, or became party to an enterprise knowing of its purpose to carry out [specify the violent conduct allegedly carried out]. In such circumstances, the accused cannot rely on duress as a defence to any offences s/he commits in response to threats arising out of his/her association with the organisation, or his/her participation in the enterprise. Because s/he voluntarily put him/herself in a position where such threats could be made, s/he is held responsible for the consequences.

[If the accused may have been coerced into joining the relevant organisation or enterprise, or may not have known of its violent purpose, or if the association may have been for a different purpose than to carry out the conduct allegedly committed, add the following shaded section.]

It is important to note that the prosecution can only negate the defence of duress this way if it proves that the accused voluntarily exposed himself/herself to the duress. This will not be the case if s/he [was coerced into joining the organisation or enterprise in the first place/did not know that the organisation or enterprise s/he was joining had a violent purpose/joined the organisation or enterprise for a different purpose than to carry out] [specify the violent conduct allegedly carried out].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA voluntarily exposed himself/herself to duress by [summarise prosecution arguments and evidence.] The defence denied this, arguing [summarise defence arguments and evidence].

Family Violence

[If there is evidence of family violence involving the accused and the person making the threat, add the following shaded section. If the existence or extent of family violence is in issue, this direction will need to be modified to account for the prosecution's onus of disproving the reasonable possibility that the accused had been subject to family violence.[1210]]

In this case you have heard evidence of family violence between NOA and [identify the person making the threat]. [Insert evidence and/or arguments.]

The law says that where the accused has allegedly [insert relevant act] in circumstances where family violence is alleged, the following matters may be relevant to deciding whether the prosecution has negated the defence of duress:

[Where there is evidence of one or more of the following matters (listed in Crimes Act 1958 s 9AH(3), the judge should identify the evidence and relate it to the facts in issue:

(a) The history of the relationship between the person and a family member, including violence by the family member towards the person or by the person towards the family member or by the family member or the person in relation to any other family member;

(b) The cumulative effect, including psychological effect, on the person or a family member of that violence;

(c) Social, cultural or economic factors that impact on the person or a family member who has been affected by family violence;

(d) The general nature and dynamics of relationships affected by family violence, including the possible

[1210] For criminal proceedings where duress in the context of family violence is in issue, Part 6 the Jury Directions Act 2015 applies and certain preliminary directions may need to be given to the jury (see Jury Directions Act 2013, ss 58–60). See 8.10.1 Preliminary Directions: Duress in the Context of Family Violence (Jury Directions Act 2015) (23/11/05–31/10/14).

consequences of separation from the abuser;

(e) The psychological effect of violence on people who are or have been in a relationship affected by family violence;

(f) Social or economic factors that impact on people who are or have been in a relationship affected by family violence.]

In this case, the defence has submitted that this evidence shows that NOA was acting under duress when s/he [insert relevant act and arguments]. The prosecution denied this was the case, alleging [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Summary

To summarise, even if you decide that all of the elements of [insert offence] have been proven beyond reasonable doubt, you may find that NOA was not guilty of that offence because s/he was acting under duress.

Before you can find NOA guilty of [insert offence], you must therefore be satisfied not only that all of the elements have been proved, but also that the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, at least one of the following five [for murder: six] matters:

One – that the accused did not reasonably believe that a threat of harm had been made;

[If the accused is charged with murder]

Two – that the threat was not to inflict death or serious injury;

[Two/Three] – that the accused did not reasonably believe that the threat would be carried out unless the offence was committed;

[Three/Four] – that the accused did not reasonably believe that his/her conduct in committing the offence was the only reasonable way to avoid the threatened harm;

[Four/Five] – that the accused did not reasonably believe that his/her conduct in committing the offence was a reasonable response to the threat; or [Five/Six] – that the accused voluntarily associated with the maker of the threat for the purposes of carrying out the violent conduct.

If the prosecution cannot prove at least one of these matters beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of [insert offence].

Last updated: 23 September 2016

8.11 Common Law Duress

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Introduction

1. Prior to 2005, duress in Victoria was governed solely by the common law. This situation has been altered by the passage of the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005 and the Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014, which introduced duress provisions into the Crimes Act 1958 (s 9AG, now repealed, and s 322O respectively).

2. Section 9AG of the Crimes Act 1958 applies to homicide offences committed on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014.[1211]

3. Section 322O of the Crimes Act 1958 applies to all offences committed on or after 1 November 2014.

4. It is still necessary to apply the common law when there is evidence of duress in non-homicide cases committed before 1 November 2014. It is also necessary to rely on the common law in relation to homicides committed before 23 November 2005.

5. Subdivision 1AAA of the Crimes Act 1958, including section 9AG, was introduced by the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005. It had the effect of abrogating common law defences, including duress, to homicide offences and replacing them with statutory versions (Babic v The Queen (2010) 28 VR 297 [52]).

6. The Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014 abolished the common law defence of duress with respect to all offences committed on or after 1 November 2014 (Crimes Act 1958 s 322Q).

7. If the accused is charged with both homicide and non-homicide offences, committed before 1 November 2014, it will be necessary to give multiple directions about duress. The jury will need to be charged about statutory duress in relation to the homicide charges, and common law duress in relation to any other charges (see R v Pepper (2007) 16 VR 637; [2007] VSC 234; DPP v McAllister [2007] VSC 315 for similar issues that arise in the context of self-defence).

8. This topic outlines the common law defence of duress. For information concerning the statutory provisions, see 8.9 Statutory Duress (From 1/11/14) and 8.10 Statutory Duress (23/11/05–31/10/14).

What is Duress?

9. An act is said to be committed under duress if it is committed due to a threat of physical harm if the act is not done (R v Dawson [1978] VR 536).

10. To have acted under duress, the circumstances must have been such that the accused's will was really and absolutely so constrained that he or she became a mere innocent instrument of the crime (R v Dawson [1978] VR 536; R v Darrington [1980] VR 353).

11. Where duress is available as a defence, and the prosecution cannot prove that the accused did not act under duress, he or she will have a complete defence to the offence charged (R v Japaljarri (2002) 134 A Crim R 261).

Duress and Voluntariness

12. As duress implies a deliberate choice to break the law (although under constrained circumstances), it is incorrect to treat duress as related to the voluntariness requirement (R v Palazoff (1986) 43 SASR 99).

13. People who act under duress are therefore not excused because they acted involuntarily. They are excused because of the wrongfulness of the threat (R v Palazoff (1986) 43 SASR 99).

Duress and Intent

14. In a true duress case, the accused will have had the necessary intent to commit the crime, but will be found not guilty due to the fact that he or she formed that intent due to a threat (R v Harding [1976] VR 129 (Murphy J); R v Palazoff (1986) 43 SASR 99).

[1211] If the date of the victim's death differs from the date on which the actus reus was committed, the relevant date for determining whether the provisions of the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005 apply is the date of death (R v Gould (2007) 17 VR 393; [2007] VSC 420).

To Which Crimes is Duress Available as a Defence?

15. Duress is a defence to all criminal acts except for murder and some forms of treason (R v Harding [1976] VR 129; R v Goldman (No 4) (2004) 147 A Crim R 472; Attorney-General v Whelan [1934] IR 518; R v Hurley [1967] VR 526; R v Tawill [1974] VR 84).

16. In Australia the defence has been applied to:

    - Manslaughter (R v Evans (No 1) [1976] VR 517);
    - Drug offences (R v Lawrence [1980] 1 NSWLR 122; R v Brown (1986) 43 SASR 33; R v Palazoff (1986) 43 SASR 99);
    - Prison escape (R v Smyth [1963] VR 737; R v Dawson [1978] VR 536);
    - Contempt of court (R v Garde–Wilson (2005) 158 A Crim R 20).

Duress and Murder

17. It is clear that duress is not available on a charge of murder where the accused did the actual killing (R v Japaljarri (2002) 134 A Crim R 261; R v Evans (No 1) [1976] VR 517; R v Darrington [1980] VR 353).[1212]

18. However, it is unclear whether duress is available to a person who was present at the killing and aided or abetted the crime (a "principal in the second degree"), or who was not present but counselled or procured the killing (an "accessory before the fact"):

    - Initially, it was held that in Victoria duress was not available to principals in the second degree (R v Harding [1976] VR 129).
    - The House of Lords subsequently held that duress was a defence to a person charged with murder as a principal in the second degree (Director of Public Prosecutions (Northern Ireland) v Lynch [1975] AC 653).
    - Although somewhat disapproving of the decision in Lynch, the Victorian Supreme Court felt obliged at the time to follow the House of Lords decision, and overruled Harding (holding that duress is denied only to the actual killer) (R v Darrington [1980] VR 353).
    - Subsequently, the House of Lords overruled its own decision in Lynch, holding that duress is not a defence to principals in the second degree, nor is it a defence to an accessory before the fact (R v Howe [1987] AC 417. See also R v Brown [1968] SASR 467).

19. While the matter has not been authoritatively settled by a Victorian court, the issue has been the subject of judicial discussion in the following two cases:

    - In R v Japaljarri (2002) 134 A Crim R 261 the court stated that, due to Darrington, duress may be available on a charge of murder where the accused is a principal in the second degree. However, they also noted that the House of Lords had overruled its own decision in Lynch.
    - In R v Goldman (No 4) (2004) 147 A Crim R 472 Redlich J noted that, had the Court in Darrington had the benefit of the High Court's guidance about when it was acceptable to depart from House of Lords decisions (that was subsequently given in Cook v Cook (1986) 162 CLR 376), it would have followed Harding instead (as Lynch was not perceived to be based upon established principles of common law).

[1212] For murders committed on or after 23 November 2005, duress is a defence. See 8.9 Statutory Duress (From 1/11/14) and 8.10 Statutory Duress (23/11/05–31/10/14).

20. Even if duress is not available as a defence to people who aid, abet, counsel or procure murder, it may be available to accessories after the fact (as they have committed an offence against justice, rather than an offence against the person or the State) (Fairall and Yeo, 2005, p 141).

Attempted Murder

21. The question whether duress is a defence to attempted murder has not been authoritatively resolved in Australia (R v Japaljarri (2002) 134 A Crim R 261; R v Goldman (No 4) (2004) 147 A Crim R 472).

22. In R v Gotts [1992] 2 AC 412 a majority of the House of Lords held that duress is not a defence to attempted murder.

23. However, in R v Goldman (No 4) (2004) 147 A Crim R 472 Redlich J followed the decision of the minority in Gotts (and the Canadian judgments of R v Hibbert [1995] 2 SCR 973 and Paquette v R (1976) 30 CCC (2d) 417), holding that duress is a defence to attempted murder.

Manslaughter

24. Duress is available as a defence to a charge of manslaughter (R v Evans (No 1) [1976] VR 517; R v Harding [1976] VR 129).

25. This means that a judge will need to charge the jury about duress in a case where the accused is charged with murder, but manslaughter is available as an alternative verdict (R v Evans (No 1) [1976] VR 517; R v Harding [1976] VR 129).

Other Heinous Crimes

26. It has traditionally been held that duress is a defence to all crimes other than murder and "any other crime so heinous as to be excepted from the doctrine" (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526; R v Darrington [1980] VR 353; R v Dawson [1978] VR 536; R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49; R v Zaharias (2001) 122 A Crim R 586; R v Japaljarri (2002) 134 A Crim R 261).

27. The other "heinous" crimes to which duress is denied as a defence seems to have been limited to some serious forms of treason (R v Goldman (No 4) (2004) 147 A Crim R 472).

Onus of Proof

28. It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused was not acting under duress (R v Smyth [1963] VR 737; R v Harding [1976] VR 129; R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49; R v Zaharias (2001) 122 A Crim R 586).

29. This is sometimes expressed as requiring the prosecution to eliminate any reasonable possibility that the accused acted under duress (R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531).

30. In some cases the fact that the accused was acting under duress may be raised as a "reasonable excuse" to a statutory offence, rather than as a defence in its own right (see e.g. R v Tawill [1974] VR 84; R v Daher [1981] 2 NSWLR 669). Depending on the terms of the relevant provision, in such cases the onus may be on the accused to prove that he or she was acting under duress (and therefore had a reasonable excuse).

Elements of Duress

31. The prosecution can prove that the accused was not acting under duress by proving any of the following matters (each of which are discussed below):

    i) That no-one was threatened with serious harm if the accused failed to commit the crime charged;

ii) That the threat was not present and continuing, imminent and impending;

iii) That the accused did not reasonably apprehend that the threat would be carried out;

iv) That it was not the threat that induced the accused to commit the crime charged;

v) That, when free from the duress, the accused voluntarily exposed himself or herself to its application;

vi) That the accused could safely have prevented the execution of the threat; or

vii) That the circumstances were such that a person of ordinary firmness would not have been likely to yield to the threat in the way the accused did (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526. See also R v Darrington [1980] VR 353; R v Dawson [1978] VR 536; R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49; R v Zaharias (2001) 122 A Crim R 586; R v Japaljarri (2002) 134 A Crim R 261).

Someone was Threatened with Harm if Crime Was Not Committed

32. The first way the prosecution can prove that the accused was not acting under duress is by establishing that no-one was threatened with serious harm if the accused failed to commit the crime charged (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526).

33. This can be done by proving either:

- That no threat was made (R v Zaharias (2001) 122 A Crim R 586; R v Dawson [1978] VR 536);
- That the threats made were not of a sufficient magnitude (R v Gibb [1983] 2 VR 155; R v Hurley [1967] VR 526; R v Harding [1976] VR 129); or
- That the demand made was not to commit the offence charged (R v Dawson [1978] VR 536; R v Lorenz (1998) 146 FLR 369).

A Threat Must Have Been Made

34. It is not sufficient that the accused felt fear. A threat must have been made (see, e.g., R v Darrington [1980] VR 353; R v Japaljarri (2002) 134 A Crim R 261).

35. The threat may have been made by words or actions (including actual violence) (see, e.g., R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49; R v Harding [1976] VR 129 per Murphy J).

36. A threat may also be implied from the threatener's behaviour, conduct and character. For example, in DPP v Lynch, the third party was known to be a "ruthless gunman … whom it would be perilous to defy or disobey and who … gave his instructions in a manner which indicated … that he would tolerate no disobedience". This was held to be sufficient to raise the issue of duress for the jury on the basis of an implied threat, without any need for the third party to make a threat explicit (Director of Public Prosecutions (Northern Ireland) v Lynch [1975] AC 653, 704-705).

37. Similarly, in R v Rowan [2024] HCA 9, the High Court held that "evidence of pervasive violence, intimidation, control and sexual abuse … raised a reasonable possibility that any express or implicit demand … carried with it the implication that serious violence and more severe sexual abuse would be inflicted … if [the accused] refused" (at [62]).

The Threat Must Have Been of Sufficient Magnitude

38. In some cases it seems to have been suggested that the threat must have been of death or serious personal violence (see, e.g. R v Smyth [1963] VR 737; R v Hurley [1967] VR 526; R v Darrington [1980] VR 353; R v Japaljarri (2002) 134 A Crim R 261; Martin v The Queen (2010) 202 A Crim R 97, 104).

39. Alternatively, other cases have referred only to 'physical harm' or 'domestic violence' without any further quantification (see R v Dawson [1978] VR 536; R v Runjanjic (1991) 56 SASR 114).

40. In assessing the magnitude of the threat, the court must take into account the whole of the circumstances giving rise to the threat. Where the threat arises from a continuing relationship of violence and control, the threat should not be minimised by reference to the least serious past acts of violence (see Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [159]–[160] (Kyrou and Niall JJA)).

41. However, it has also been suggested that a threat of imprisonment may be sufficient (R v Harding [1976] VR 129 (Murphy J)).

42. While it is not clear whether duress can be constituted by threats of damage to property (R v Harding [1976] VR 129 (Murphy J)), such threats are unlikely to be of suitable severity (Director of Public Prosecutions (Northern Ireland) v Lynch [1975] AC 653). There are no known Victorian cases in which it has been suggested that the accused acted under duress due to a threat to property.

43. The defence is not limited to threats made against the accused him or herself. The defence may be made out if the accused acted to avoid threatened death or harm to another person (see, e.g. R v Hurley [1967] VR 526; R v Harding [1976] VR 129 (Murphy J); Attorney-General v Whelan [1934] IR 518; R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531).

The Demand Must Have Been to Commit the Offence Charged

44. The demand must have been to commit the offence charged. Duress will not be a defence if the accused committed a different offence due to his or her fear of the threatener (R v Dawson [1978] VR 536; R v Lorenz (1998) 146 FLR 369; c.f. R v Rowan [2024] HCA 9, [102]-[104] per Edelman J).

45. Where there is an ever-present threat, this part of the duress test may be satisfied where the nature of the threat coerces the accused to perform whatever offences the threatener demands from time to time. This might also be framed as a conclusion that the ever-present threat gave rise to an unstated implied demand that the accused perform the relevant offence, otherwise the accused would be subject to the threatened harm. This kind of analysis is particularly relevant in circumstances of family violence (see Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [169], [174]. See also R v Rowan [2024] HCA 9, [62]).

46. However, in R v Rowan [2024] HCA 9, Edelman J held at [97]-[111] that the defence of duress does not require the threatener to issue a demand or direction. Instead, any demand or direction is only relevant to the question whether a reasonable person in the accused's position would have had no reasonable alternative other than to commit the offence charged. This conceptual approach to the issue of demand or direction was not adopted by the plurality, who resolved the case on the basis that a threat need not be express.

Threat Must Be Present and Continuing, Imminent and Impending

47. The second way the prosecution can prove that the accused was not acting under duress is by establishing that the threat was not present and continuing, imminent and impending (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526).

48. While the coercion must be immediate, the threat need not be of immediate harm (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526; R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49).

49. This component of duress does not require that the threat be made immediately before the crime is committed. Instead, the requirement is that the threat remain operative and effective at the time of the offending (R v Rowan [2024] HCA 9, [40]).

50. Thus, while the threat must be effective at the moment the crime is committed, the carrying out of the threat may be delayed because of particular circumstances (R v Dawson [1978] VR 536).

51. While the threat need not be of immediate harm, it is not clear whether it must at least be of imminent harm – or whether threats to be carried out in the future will suffice so long as the accused's will is overborne by the threats at the time that he or she commits the criminal act (R v Harding [1976] VR 129 per Murphy J).

52. An ongoing threat, such as may arise in circumstances of family violence, may be present, continuing, imminent and impending (see Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [176]-[177]).

53. Where the offences were alleged to have been committed over a period spanning months or years, it is not realistic to expect the defence to identify a threat made at any particular time during that period (Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [176]).

54. The threatener need not be present when the offence is committed, as long as the threat remains present and continuing, imminent and impending (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526; R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49).

55. Thus, where the threat is to take a hostage's life if the accused does not commit the offence, the defence of duress may be raised even if the kidnappers were not present when the offence was committed (see, e.g., R v Hurley [1967] VR 526).

Accused Reasonably Feared the Threat Would Be Carried Out

56. The third way the prosecution can prove that the accused was not acting under duress is by establishing that the accused did not reasonably apprehend that the threat would be carried out (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526; R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49).

57. This can be done by proving that:

    - The accused did not fear that the threat would be carried out; or
    - That the accused did not have reasonable grounds for that fear (see, e.g. R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49).

The Threat Induced the Accused to Commit the Crime

58. The fourth way the prosecution can prove that the accused was not acting under duress is by establishing that it was not the threat that induced the accused to commit the crime charged (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526).

59. While the threat must have directly provoked the commission of the crime with which the accused is charged, it need not have completely overborne the accused's will (R v Dawson [1978] VR 536).

60. The crime must only have been committed because of the duress. The defence will not be available if the crime was committed for other reasons as well (R v Zaharias (2001) 122 A Crim R 586; R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531; R v Hurley [1967] VR 526; R v Dawson [1978] VR 536. See also Warren v The Queen (1996) 88 A Crim R 78).

61. In considering whether the threat induced the accused to commit the crime, the jury should consider the nature of the threats made, and the accused's knowledge of the character and reputation of the person making them (see, e.g. R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531).

62. Where it is alleged that the accused was acting to protect a third party, it will be for the jury to determine whether he or she was acting under duress. In making this determination, the jury may take into account factors such as the strength of the accused's attachment to the third party (see, e.g. R v Hurley [1967] VR 526).

Voluntary Exposure to Duress

63. The fifth way the prosecution can prove that the accused was not acting under duress is by establishing that, when free from the duress, the accused voluntarily exposed himself or herself to its application (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526).

64. This will be the case if the accused voluntarily joined or associated with a criminal organisation, or became a party to a criminal enterprise knowing of its criminal purpose. In such circumstances the accused cannot rely upon the defence of duress in respect of any offence committed in response to coercion arising out of his or her association with the organisation, or his or her participation in the criminal enterprise (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526).

65. The accused must have joined the enterprise or organisation voluntarily. The defence will remain available if he or she was coerced into joining the enterprise or organisation (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526. See also R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49).

Safe Escape

66. The sixth way the prosecution can prove that the accused was not acting under duress is by establishing that the accused could safely have prevented the execution of the threat (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526).

67. This will be the case if the accused did not avail him or herself of any reasonable opportunity to escape or avoid the threatened conduct being performed (R v Dawson [1978] VR 536; R v Goldman (No 5) [2004] VSC 292; R v Hurley [1967] VR 526; R v Darrington [1980] VR 353).

68. For the defence to be precluded on this ground, the opportunity to escape must have been capable of being performed with reasonable safety. The accused need not avail him or herself of the opportunity to escape if it was not reasonable in light of the threats made (R v Dawson [1978] VR 536; R v Hudson [1971] 2 QB 202; R v Smyth [1963] VR 737).

69. If escaping from the immediate presence of the person making the threat would not have rendered the threat ineffective, reliance on the defence will not be precluded because the accused failed to escape. For example, if the threat was to cause death or serious injury at some time in the near future, failing to take advantage of an opportunity to escape would not preclude reliance on the defence (R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531).

70. The question of whether or not a safe means of escape was available to the accused is to be determined according to an objective standard, using the perspective of the reasonable person (R v Goldman (No 5) [2004] VSC 292; R v Besim [2004] VSC 168).

71. When considering the perspective of the reasonable person, the circumstances in which the accused found him or herself are relevant and should be taken into account (R v Goldman (No 5) [2004] VSC 292).

72. Where the carrying out of the threat can be prevented by reporting the matter to the authorities, a failure to do so may preclude the accused from relying upon the defence (see, e.g. R v Dawson [1978] VR 536).

73. However, if the accused failed to report the situation to the police on the grounds that he or she reasonably believed police protection to be ineffective against the threatener, the defence of duress might still succeed.

74. Evidence of battered woman syndrome may be relied upon to explain why a woman of ordinary firmness did not escape the threatening situation by seeking police protection, including why the accused did not consider it was possible to escape the effect of the threat (R v Runjanjic (1991) 56 SASR 114; Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [187] (Kyrou and Niall JJA)). See "Duress and Battered Woman Syndrome" below.

Person of Ordinary Firmness Would Have Been Likely to Yield

75. The seventh way the prosecution can prove that the accused was not acting under duress is by establishing that the circumstances were such that a person of ordinary firmness would not have been likely to yield to the threat in the way the accused did (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526; R v Zahariás (2001) 122 A Crim R 586; R v Dawson [1978] VR 536).

76. This "objective test" restricts the defence of duress to circumstances in which the accused can be viewed objectively as having acted to avoid serious harm (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526).

77. What is involved in the objective test is an evaluation of the behaviour of the accused by reference to a standard of reasonableness, not a prediction as to the way in which particular individuals may behave. The law requires the accused to have the self-control reasonably expected of the ordinary citizen in his or her situation (R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531).

78. The question is whether the accused could not reasonably have been expected to resist in the circumstances (R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531).

79. For the purpose of this limb of duress, the ordinary person is taken to have some of the accused's characteristics, including age, gender, history and relationship with the threatener and placed in the same objective circumstances as the accused, including any circumstances of family violence. It includes the accused's knowledge of the threatener's personality and behaviour. It is not clear, however, what other characteristics are attributed to the ordinary person (Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [73], [180] (Kyrou and Niall JJA)).

80. In Rowan v The King, Kyrou and Niall JJA rejected an argument that the ordinary person should have the accused's 'maturity', in the broad sense of including aspects of the accused's personality. Any consideration of 'maturity' is limited to the accused's age. Further, it is not appropriate to attribute all of the accused's personal characteristics, as this would unacceptably dilute the objective test (Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [73], [179]).

81. Similarly, features such as a history of sexual abuse of the accused by someone other than the threatener, or intellectual disability of the accused, are not imputed to the ordinary person (Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [180]).

82. In considering the objective test, the jury should consider the nature of the threats made, and the accused's knowledge of the character and reputation of the person making them (see R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531; Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [72] (Kyrou and Niall JJA)).

83. Where the threat is not against the accused personally (e.g. where the accused's family is threatened), the jury must determine whether a threat of that nature would be likely to coerce or compel a person of ordinary firmness of character to yield by committing the crime in question (R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531).

84. While traditionally the test was framed as whether or not the person of ordinary firmness "would" have been likely to yield (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526), in Victoria it is permissible to use "could" or "might" instead (R v Zaharias (2001) 122 A Crim R 586; R v Lanciana (1996) 84 A Crim R 268).

Duress and Battered Woman Syndrome

85. Battered woman syndrome is not a defence in its own right (R v Lorenz (1998) 146 FLR 369).

86. However, evidence that an accused suffered from the psychological condition of battered woman syndrome may be relevant to the defence of duress (R v Lorenz (1998) 146 FLR 369).

87. Specifically, evidence of the existence of this syndrome may be used:

- To explain why the accused's will was overborne; and
- To argue that a woman of ordinary firmness, if placed in the same position as that of the accused, would have committed the acts constituting the offence with which the accused was charged (R v Runjanjic (1991) 56 SASR 114; Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [74] (Kyrou and Niall JJA). See also Rice v McDonald (2000) 113 A Crim R 75).

When to Charge the Jury about Duress

88. The need for a direction on duress will depend on whether the defence has indicated that duress is in issue or whether there are substantial and compelling reasons for directing on duress in the absence of any request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14 - 16).

89. If a duress direction is requested, it is only if the judge is satisfied that there is no evidence that raises a reasonable possibility that the elements of duress exist that the judge would have good reason to decline to give the requested direction (R v Rowan [2024] HCA 9, [33]).

90. Duress may be left to the jury even if the accused's primary defence is that he or she did not commit the relevant conduct. The inconsistency between duress and denial of offending is a matter for the jury to assess (Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [79], [157]).

91. At common law, the judge was required to direct the jury about duress if the evidence is such that it might lead a reasonable jury to decide that the accused committed the relevant act under duress (R v Evans (No 1) [1976] VR 517; R v Harding [1976] VR 129).

92. The question was whether, on the version of events most favourable to the accused that is suggested by the evidence, a jury acting reasonably might fail to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused was not acting under duress (Taiapa v R (2009) 240 CLR 95. See also Martin v R (2010) 28 VR 579; Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [84]).

93. The issue of duress may be raised at any time during the trial (R v Zaharias (2001) 122 A Crim R 586).

94. While duress is not a defence to murder at common law, the judge must instruct the jury about duress in a murder trial if manslaughter is available as an alternative verdict, and the evidence is such that it might lead a reasonable jury to decide that the accused committed the relevant act under duress (R v Evans (No 1) [1976] VR 517; R v Harding [1976] VR 129).

Content of the Charge

95. There is no single formulation that must be followed when charging a jury about duress. What is required is instructions expressed with sufficient clarity that the jury could be left in no doubt with respect to the principles that they must apply to the task before them (R v Zaharias (2001) 122 A Crim R 586).

96. While the elements of duress were identified in R v Hurley [1967] VR 526, the case does not prescribe any particular form of jury direction, or require the judge to direct the jury by reference to 8 elements (R v Rowan [2024] HCA 9, [36]. See also R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49)

97. For example, where the crime charged is not murder or any other excepted crime, no reference to the exclusion of such crimes should ordinarily be made (R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49).

98. It is essential that the facts are related to the relevant issues (R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49).

99. Judges should take care to instruct the jury in the context of the evidence and issues raised in the trial (R v Zaharias (2001) 122 A Crim R 586). The question of duress should be placed in its factual setting, and considerations that may assist the jury to reach its conclusion should be identified (R v Goldman (No 5) [2004] VSC 292; R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49).

100. While not a misdirection, the jury should not be told to examine the evidence relating to duress with great care and scrutiny (due to the ease with which it can be invented). The question whether an accused's claim that he or she was acting under duress is plausible enough to raise a reasonable doubt is exactly the kind of matter which juries are well-equipped to deal with, without the need for any special direction (R v Goldman [2007] VSCA 25).

Charging About the Onus of Proof

101. It should be made clear that the accused does not have to establish that he or she acted under duress. It is for the prosecution to negate duress beyond reasonable doubt (R v Zaharias (2001) 122 A Crim R 586; R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49; R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531; Rowan v The King [2022] VSCA 236, [81] (Kyrou and Niall JJA)).

102. The jury may be directed about the onus of proof in any of the following ways:

- The prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused did not act under duress;
- The prosecution must establish that there is no reasonable possibility that the accused acted under duress; or
- The prosecution must eliminate any reasonable possibility that the accused acted under duress (R v Lanciana (1996) 84 A Crim R 268; R v Zaharias (2001) 122 A Crim R 586).

103. It is desirable to tell the jury that it is always difficult to give directions upon the issue of duress in a way which completely avoids any suggestion that the accused must prove the defence. However, the jury must always keep it in mind that it is the prosecution which must eliminate any reasonable possibility that the accused acted under duress (R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531).

104. Judges may refer to duress as a "defence", so long as the true incidence of the burden of proof is made clear (R v Lanciana (1996) 84 A Crim R 268).

105. A judge should not use the wording of Smith J's judgment in R v Hurley [1967] VR 526 when directing the jury, as it may cause the jury to incorrectly believe that the onus of proving the relevant matters is on the accused (R v Emery (1978) 18 A Crim R 49).

106. The judge should not say that the prosecution has "merely" to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused did not act under duress. The use of the word "merely" is unnecessary and misplaced (R v Williams [1998] 4 VR 301).

Charging About the Objective Test

107. The judge should clearly explain to the jury that for duress to fail due to the objective test, the prosecution must establish that there is no reasonable possibility that a person of ordinary firmness of mind and will could have been compelled by the threat in the way the accused was (R v Lanciana (1996) 84 A Crim R 268),

108. The judge should explain that, when determining this issue, the jury should have regard not only to the nature of the threat and its proportion to the crime committed, but also to any circumstances known to the accused concerning the person making the threat, which may reasonably have affected the ordinary person's reaction to it (R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531; R v Goldman (No 5) [2004] VSC 292).

109. It is important that the directions in relation to the objective test are consistent. For example, if the charge refers to threats which "could" compel a person of ordinary firmness to act in a certain way, subsequent references should be stated in the same terms to avoid confusion (R v Lanciana (1996) 84 A Crim R 268)

110. Judges should avoid use of the term "the average person". The usual formulation is "the person of ordinary firmness of mind and will". That is a much wider concept than the "average person", and includes a greater range of differing temperaments (R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531).

111. Where the threat is directed to another person, the judge should explain that duress may operate if such a threat would be likely to compel the person of ordinary firmness of character to yield by committing the crime in question (R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531).

Charging About Opportunities to Escape

112. The question for the jury to determine in relation to the issue of escape is whether a person in the accused's circumstances, and acting reasonably, would have taken one of the opportunities available to render the threat ineffective (R v Goldman (No 5) [2004] VSC 292).

113. When directing the jury about this issue, they should be told to have regard to all of the circumstances and any risks associated with any course of action which would have rendered the threat ineffective (R v Goldman (No 5) [2004] VSC 292).

114. The jury must consider whether such a course of action was reasonably safe, or whether it was likely to expose the accused to the very danger from which he or she was seeking to escape (R v Goldman (No 5) [2004] VSC 292).

115. In deciding whether a reasonable person in the accused's position would have availed themselves of the opportunity to escape, the jury should also take into account the fact that the circumstances may not have provided the accused with time to give calm and measured consideration to the course of conduct that was open to him or her (R v Goldman (No 5) [2004] VSC 292).

116. As there is no legal "obligation" on the accused to escape, it would be preferable for the judge to avoid use of the term "obligation" in the charge (R v Abusafiah (1991) 24 NSWLR 531).

Charging About the Use of the Evidence for Other Purposes

117. In some cases it may be necessary to direct the jury that evidence raised to support the defence of duress may also be used when determining whether or not the elements of the offence have been met (R v Darrington [1980] VR 353; R v Harding [1976] VR 129; R v Evans (No 1) [1976] VR 517).

118. A direction on the use of evidence of coercion for this purpose may be required even where a direction on duress is not (R v Darrington [1980] VR 353).

119. Where evidence of coercion can be used both for the purposes of proving duress, as well as due to its evidentiary significance for proving another matter, it is important that clear instructions be given so that the jury does not confuse the two issues (R v Darrington [1980] VR 353).

Duress and Marital Coercion

120. In cases where a married woman is charged with an offence other than treason or murder, and she raises evidence that her actions (or inaction) were the result of coercion by her husband, the judge may also need to instruct the jury about the statutory defence of marital coercion (Crimes Act 1958 s 336(2)).

Use of Evidence of Duress to Disprove Elements of the Offence

121. Evidence which is relevant to the issue of duress may also be relevant to the determination of the elements. For example, the fact that the accused was threatened may help to explain the acts that he or she performed, and thus may influence the inferences the jury are willing to draw on the issue of mens rea (see, e.g. R v Darrington [1980] VR 353; R v Harding [1976] VR 129; R v Goldman (No 4) (2004) 147 A Crim R 472).

122. In such cases the judge should:

- Direct the jury about the relevance the evidence has to any of the elements of the offence; and
- Direct the jury that, if they accept that one of the elements of the offence has not been proven because of that evidence, they must acquit the accused, even if all of the elements of the defence of duress have not be met (R v Hurley [1967] VR 526).

Last updated: 17 April 2024

8.11.1 Charge: Common Law Duress

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be given if there is evidence from which a jury might infer that the accused was acting under duress when s/he:

Committed an offence other than homicide before 1 November 2014; or Committed a homicide offence other than murder[1213] before 23 November 2005.

[1213] While it is clear that duress cannot be a defence to the actual killer, it is unclear whether duress is available as a defence to people who aid, abet, counsel or procure murder. See 8.11 Common Law Duress for a discussion of this issue.

The charge should be given immediately after directing the jury about the relevant offence.

Introduction

In this case the defence alleged that NOA was acting under duress when s/he [insert relevant act]. I therefore need to give you some directions about "duress".[1214]

The defence of duress was introduced into the law a long time ago as a concession to human frailty. It is based on the recognition that sometimes people of ordinary firmness of character will commit crimes to avoid a threatened harm. While their actions may not be justified, the law excuses them from responsibility given the circumstances.

This means that, even if you are satisfied that the prosecution has proven all of the elements of [insert offence] beyond reasonable doubt, NOA will not be guilty of that offence if s/he acted under duress.

Because the prosecution must prove the accused's guilt, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was not acting under duress. It is not for NOA to prove that s/he did act under duress.

Unfortunately, it is always difficult to give directions about duress in a way which completely avoids any suggestion that it is a matter for the accused to prove. However, that is not the case. It is very important that you keep in mind at all times that it is the prosecution who must eliminate any reasonable possibility that the accused acted under duress.

So before you can find the accused guilty of [insert offence], you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the prosecution has proven all of the elements of the offence and has negated the defence of duress.

Elements of Duress

There are seven ways in which the prosecution can negate the defence of duress. I will list them for you, and then examine each one in detail.[1215]

First, the prosecution can prove that no-one was threatened with death or serious injury if the accused failed to [describe relevant offence].

Second, the prosecution can prove that any threat that had been made was not present and continuing, imminent and impending when the offence was committed.

Third, the prosecution can prove that the accused did not reasonably apprehend that the threat would be carried out.

Fourth, the prosecution can prove that it was not the threat that induced the accused to commit the offence charged.

Fifth, the prosecution can prove that, when free from the duress, the accused voluntarily exposed himself/herself to its application.

Sixth, the prosecution can prove that the accused could safely have prevented the execution of the threat.

[1214] This charge only addresses the defence of duress. It is possible that the evidence in question may also have relevance to the determination of the elements (see, e.g. R v Darrington [1980] VR 353; R v Harding [1976] VR 129).

[1215] If any of these methods of negating duress are not relevant in the circumstances of the case, they should be deleted and the charge modified accordingly.

Seventh, the prosecution can prove that the circumstances were such that a person of ordinary firmness of character would not have been likely to yield to the threat in the way the accused did.

If the prosecution can prove any of these matters beyond reasonable doubt, then they will have negated the defence of duress. In such circumstances, if you are also satisfied that the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, all of the elements of [describe offence], then s/he will be guilty of that offence.

I will now examine each of these matters in more detail.

Threat of Serious Harm

The first way the prosecution can negate the defence of duress is by proving that no-one was threatened with death or serious injury if NOA failed to [describe relevant offence].[1216]

The prosecution alleged that that was the case here. [Summarise prosecution arguments and evidence. The charge should clearly identify whether the argument is (i) that no threat was made; (ii) that the threat was not of death or serious injury*; and/or (iii) that the demand was not to commit the* offence charged.]

The defence denied this, arguing [summarise defence evidence and/or arguments].

Present, Continuing, Imminent and Impending Threat

The second way the prosecution can negate the defence of duress is by proving that any threat that had been made was not present and continuing, imminent and impending when NOA committed the offence.

In other words, if the prosecution can prove that the threat had ended by the time the offence was committed, or that nobody was in imminent danger at that time, the defence of duress will fail.

[If the alleged threat was to commit harm in the future, add the following shaded section.]

This does not mean that the threat must have been to harm [identify threatened party] immediately if NOA did not commit the offence. The defence of duress does not fail simply because the threat was to harm [him/her/someone else] in the near future. The issue here is whether the threat – whatever its nature – was still effective at the time the crime was committed.

[If the threatener may not have been present at the time the offence was committed, add the following shaded section.]

This does not mean that the person who made the threat must have been present when the offence was committed. The issue is whether the threat was still present and continuing at that time. Threats can still be present and continuing, even if the person who made them is not physically present.

The prosecution alleged that in this case, even if a threat had been made, it was not present and continuing, imminent and impending at the time the offence was committed. [Summarise prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [summarise defence evidence and/or arguments].

Reasonable Apprehension

The third way the prosecution can negate the defence of duress is by proving that NOA did not reasonably apprehend that the threat would be carried out.

[1216] While not clear, it is possible that threats of lesser harm (e.g. imprisonment) may also be sufficient (see 8.11 Common Law Duress). If the alleged threat was of such a nature, the charge should be modified accordingly.

This requires the prosecution to prove that NOA did not reasonably fear that [identify threatener] would actually [identify threat] if s/he did not [describe offence].

The prosecution alleged that that was the case here. [Summarise prosecution arguments and evidence. The charge should clearly identify whether the argument is (i) that the accused did not actually fear that the threat would be carried out; and/or (ii) that the accused did not have reasonable grounds for that fear.]

The defence denied this, arguing [summarise defence evidence and/or arguments].

Threat Induced the Crime

The fourth way the prosecution can negate the defence of duress is by proving that it was not the threat that induced the accused to commit the offence charged.

This will be the case if the prosecution can prove that NOA committed that offence for any reason other than to avoid the threat being carried out. To have acted under duress, NOA must only have committed the crime because of the threat.

In this case the prosecution alleged that it was not any threats made by [identify threatener] that caused NOA to [describe offence]. They argued that s/he committed that offence because [summarise prosecution arguments and evidence]. The defence denied this, arguing [summarise defence arguments and evidence].

[Where the accused's knowledge of the threatener's reputation may have influenced his or her response, add the following shaded section.]

In determining whether NOA's actions were induced by the alleged threat, you should consider the nature of the threats made, as well as NOA's knowledge of the character and reputation of [identify threatener].

Voluntary Exposure to Duress

The fifth way the prosecution can negate the defence of duress is by proving that, when free from the duress, NOA voluntarily exposed himself/herself to its application.

This will be the case if, for example, the accused voluntarily joined or associated with a criminal organisation, or became party to a criminal enterprise knowing of its criminal purpose. In such circumstances, the accused cannot rely on duress as a defence to any offences s/he commits in response to threats arising out of his/her association with the organisation, or his/her participation in the criminal enterprise. Because s/he voluntarily put him/herself in a position where such threats could be made, s/he is held responsible for the consequences.

[If the accused may have been coerced into joining the relevant organisation or enterprise, or may not have known of its criminal purpose, add the following shaded section.]

It is important to note that the accused must have voluntarily exposed himself/herself to the duress for the defence to be negated on this basis. This will not be the case if s/he [was coerced into joining the criminal organisation or enterprise in the first place/did not know that the organisation or enterprise s/he was joining had a criminal purpose].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA voluntarily exposed himself/herself to duress by [summarise prosecution arguments and evidence]. The defence denied this, arguing [summarise defence arguments and evidence].

Safe Escape

The sixth way the prosecution can negate the defence of duress is by proving that NOA could safely have prevented the execution of the threat.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA could have done so by [describe the actions the accused could have taken to prevent the threat, e.g. "escaping when…" or "reporting the matter to the police"].

For the prosecution to succeed on this basis, it is not enough to prove that NOA could have [describe action]. The prosecution must prove that if NOA had done so, the threat would not have been carried out.

They alleged that that was the case here. [Summarise prosecution arguments and evidence.] The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence arguments and evidence].

In determining whether NOA could safely have prevented the execution of the threat, you should consider what the reasonable person would have done in those circumstances. If you find that a person in those circumstances, and acting reasonably, would have [describe action], and by doing so would have prevented the threat being carried out, then the defence of duress will fail.

In making this determination, you should have regard to all of the circumstances, including any risks associated with the proposed course of action. A person is only required to pursue an opportunity if s/he can do so with reasonable safety.

You should also take into account the fact that the circumstances may not have provided the accused time to give calm and measured consideration to the course of conduct that was open to him/her.

Person of Ordinary Firmness Would Not Have Yielded

The seventh way the prosecution can negate the defence of duress is by proving that the circumstances were such that a person of ordinary firmness of character would not have been likely to yield to the threat in the way the accused did.

For this to be the case, the prosecution must prove that a person with the ordinary powers of self-control of an [describe accused's age and sex, e.g. "adult male"], who was placed in the same situation as NOA, would not have been likely to give in to the threats by committing [describe offence].

In determining this issue, you should consider the nature of the threats and the proportionality of those threats to the crime committed. You should also take into account anything that NOA knew about [identify threatener], which may have affected the ordinary person's reactions to the threat.

In this case the prosecution alleged that, in the circumstances, a person of ordinary firmness of character would not have been likely to yield to the threat in the way NOA did. [Summarise prosecution arguments and evidence]. The defence denied this, arguing [summarise defence argument and evidence].

Summary

To summarise, even if you decide that all of the elements of [insert offence] have been proven beyond reasonable doubt, you may find that NOA was not guilty of that offence because s/he was acting under duress.

Before you can find NOA guilty of [insert offence], you must therefore be satisfied not only that all of the elements have been met, but also that the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, at least one of the following seven matters:

One – that no-one was threatened with death or serious injury if NOA failed to [describe relevant offence].

Two – that when that offence was committed, any threat that had been made was not present and continuing, imminent and impending.

Three – that NOA did not reasonably apprehend that the threat would be carried out.

Four – that it was not the threat that induced NOA to commit the offence charged.

Five – that, when free from the duress, NOA voluntarily exposed himself/herself to its application.

Six – that NOA could safely have prevented the execution of the threat; or Seven – that the circumstances were such that a person of ordinary firmness of character would not have been likely to yield to the threat in the way NOA did.

If the prosecution cannot prove at least one of these matters beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of [insert offence].

Last updated: 1 November 2014

8.12 Provocation

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Introduction

1. Prior to 23 November 2005, provocation was a partial defence to murder in Victoria. According to the common law, if the prosecution could prove that the accused had committed all the other elements of murder, but could not disprove the reasonable possibility that s/he had acted while "provoked", s/he should be convicted of manslaughter rather than murder (see, e.g. Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58).
2. On 23 November 2005, provocation was abolished as a partial defence to murder for offences alleged to have been committed on or after that date. However, it remains available as a partial defence to offences alleged to have been committed prior to that date (Crimes Act 1958 s 3B, s 603).
3. Where an offence is alleged to have been committed between two dates, one before and one on or after 23 November 2005, the offence is to be treated as if it was alleged to have been committed prior to that date. Provocation will therefore be available as a partial defence in such cases (Crimes Act 1958 s 603(2)).

Elements of Provocation

4. There are three ways the prosecution can disprove provocation. They can prove that:

    i) The deceased did not act provocatively;

    ii) The accused did not kill the deceased while deprived of self-control by his/her provocative conduct (the "subjective test"); or

    iii) The deceased's conduct was not capable of causing an ordinary person to lose self-control and to act in the way in which the accused did (the "objective test").

Provocative Conduct of the Deceased

5. The first way for the prosecution to disprove provocation is to prove that the deceased did not act in a way that was capable of provoking the accused's response.
6. The jury does not have to be satisfied of what the deceased actually said or did, and so there is no requirement for "proof" of that conduct. If it is reasonably possible that conduct capable of constituting provocation might have occurred, then the prosecution will have failed to disprove this aspect of provocation (see R v Thorpe (No 2) [1999] 2 VR 719).

Conduct Capable of Constituting Provocation

7. Conduct that may be "provocative" at law is defined by reference to its possible impact on the accused. Conduct is only provocative if it is capable of causing the accused to lose control, and as a result form and act upon an intention to kill or really seriously injure the deceased (Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58).
8. Issues have arisen in relation to the following types of conduct:

    - Third party conduct;

- Conduct mistakenly attributed to the deceased;
- Conduct committed in the absence of the accused;
- "Mere words";
- Self-induced provocation;
- Historic conduct.

Third-party conduct

9. Ordinarily, the accused's loss of self-control must have resulted from the provocative conduct of the deceased (Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58).

10. The defence will fail if the provocative conduct emanated from a third-party rather than the deceased – unless the deceased in some way adopted, assented to, participated in, or otherwise associated himself or herself with that conduct (R v Abebe (2000) 1 VR 429).

11. Where the jury needs to determine if the deceased somehow associated him or herself with the conduct of a third-party, they should generally not be directed by reference to the principles of concert or aiding and abetting. The introduction of those concepts in this context will add unnecessarily to the complexity of the direction (R v Abebe (2000) 1 VR 429).

Conduct mistakenly attributed to the deceased

12. There is one situation in which provocation can be raised even though the provocative conduct did not emanate from the deceased – where the accused mistakenly believed the deceased to have committed that conduct (R v Abebe (2000) 1 VR 429; R v Kenny [1983] 2 VR 470; R v Voukelatos [1990] VR 1).

13. It remains unsettled whether that belief needs to have been reasonable. In the absence of appellate consideration, it has been held that such a qualification should not be added (R v Abebe (2000) 1 VR 429).

Conduct in the absence of the accused

14. Historically, the partial defence of provocation was not available if the provocative conduct was not committed in the presence of the accused (R v Arden [1975] VR 449; R v Quartly (1986) 11 NSWLR 332).

15. The correctness of this requirement was doubted by Hayne and McHugh JJ in the special leave application Davis v R (1998) 73 ALJR 139. However, as the matter has not since been reconsidered, it is unclear whether conduct committed in the accused's absence is now capable of sustaining the partial defence of provocation.

16. While it may be necessary for the provocative conduct to have been committed in the accused's presence, there is no requirement that the conduct be primarily directed at the accused (R v Terry [1964] VR 248).

Mere words

17. While originally it was thought that provocation would not be available if the provocative conduct consisted of "mere words", it has been held that there is no absolute rule against words alone founding a case of provocation. The existence of such an absolute rule would draw an arbitrary distinction between words and conduct which is insupportable in logic (Moffa v R (1977) 138 CLR 601).

18. Whether or not a judge should leave provocation to the jury when the provocative conduct consisted of words alone will depend upon the nature of the words. For example, it has been held that provocation need not be left to the jury where the words are "merely insulting, hurtful and offensive", as the objective test could never be established in such a case (R v Kumar (2002) 5 VR 193; R v Leonboyer [2001] VSCA 149).

19. By contrast, where the words can be characterised as "violently provocative", they will be capable in law of establishing provocation, and the defence may be left to the jury (Holmes v DPP [1946] AC 588; Moffa v R (1977) 138 CLR 601).

20. The reference in this phrase to "violently" is an indicator of degree rather than content. There is no requirement that the provocative words threaten violence (R v Kumar (2002) 5 VR 193 [Eames at 59]).

Self-induced provocation

21. Provocation will not be available as a partial defence if:

    - The deceased's provocative conduct was provoked by the accused's words or conduct; and
    - The deceased's provocative conduct did not go beyond the reasonably predictable response of a person in his or her position (R v Hartwick & Ors (2005) 14 VR 125; R v Allwood (1975) 18 A Crim R 120; R v Borthwick CCA Vic 18/3/1991).[1217]

22. Where the accused deliberately incites the provocation, acting with premeditation or actual foresight, the accused cannot be said to act as a result of a loss of self-control. In such circumstances the accused had the necessary pre-existing mental state for murder, at a time before the victim's allegedly provocative actions occurred (R v Yasso (No.2) (2004) 10 VR 466).

Historic conduct

23. The partial defence of provocation cannot be raised solely on the basis of the victim's historic conduct. If the provocation is not alleged to be found in conduct that is to some degree proximate to the response, then there must be some "triggering event" that is proximate to the loss of self-control (Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58; R v Osland [1998] 2 VR 636; Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316).

24. The law does not identify any specific period within which the response must occur (Parker v R (1962) 111 CLR 610. See also Pollock v R (2010) 242 CLR 233).

25. While purely historic conduct cannot be relied upon as the ultimate provocative event, it remains relevant to the assessment of the "triggering event", and to both the subjective and objective elements of the defence.

Subjective Test

26. The second way for the prosecution to disprove provocation is to prove that the accused did not kill the deceased while deprived of self-control by the deceased's provocative conduct. There are two parts to this "subjective test":

    i) The accused must have killed the deceased while deprived of self-control; and

    ii) The accused's loss of self-control must have been caused by the deceased's provocative conduct.

Killing While Deprived of Self-Control

Loss of self control

27. The "central idea" of the law of provocation is that of a sudden and temporary loss of self-control, resulting from the provocative conduct of the deceased (Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58. See also Pollock v R (2010) 242 CLR 233).

[1217] Note, however, in R v Thorpe [1999] 1 VR 326 and R v Yasso (No.2)(2004) 10 VR 466, Charles JA considered that it was not settled that provocation is excluded where the provocative conduct is "self–induced," in the sense considered above.

28. The loss of self-control should not have been so extreme that the accused acted involuntary, or was incapable of forming an intention to kill or really seriously injure the victim. In such cases the accused should be acquitted, rather than being convicted of manslaughter (Parker v R (1962) 111 CLR 610; Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58. See also 8.8 Automatism).

29. Instead, the loss of self-control must have been a loss of control over the accused's desire for retribution against the deceased (Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58). The accused's "reason" should have been negated or suspended (Parker v R (1962) 111 CLR 610).

30. While this will usually occur due to the effects of anger or resentment, the defence may equally be raised where the loss of self-control is the consequence of fear or panic (Van Den Hoek v R (1986) 161 CLR 158; R v Ivanovic [2005] VSCA 238; R v Osland [1998] 2 VR 636).

31. The requirement that the provocative conduct cause the accused to lose self-control excludes from the scope of the defence an accused who seizes upon such conduct as a convenient excuse for carrying out a previously existing purpose, or who acts upon an old grudge (Parker v R (1964) 111 CLR 665. See also Pollock v R (2010) 242 CLR 233).

32. A person who kills in order to give effect to a prior understanding or arrangement with respect to the victim's death therefore cannot rely upon provocation (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316).

"Heat of passion"

33. The defence of provocation is only available where the "loss of control" is associated with an altered (generally heightened) emotional state, which has historically been referred to as the "heat of passion" (Johnson v R (1976) 136 CLR 619).

Acting while deprived of self control

34. The accused must have killed the deceased while deprived of self control by the provocative conduct. The defence will fail if the accused had regained control by the time s/he killed the deceased (Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58. See also Pollock v R (2010) 242 CLR 233).

35. If the accused was intoxicated at the time of the killing, this may be relevant to the question of whether s/he acted without self-control in response to the provocative conduct (R v McCullagh (No 3) [2007] VSCA 293).

Delayed response

36. There is no independent requirement that there be no "cooling-off period". The existence of an opportunity to "cool-off" between the provocative conduct and the accused's response does not mean that the defence will fail (Moffa v R (1977) 138 CLR 601, R v Kumar (2002) 5 VR 193; Pollock v R (2010) 242 CLR 233).

37. However, a delay between provocation and response can be an important consideration in determining whether the act was:

    - Caused by the provocative conduct, rather than caused by motives of revenge or punishment; and
    - Done at a time when the accused was in a state of temporary loss of self-control (Pollock v R (2010) 242 CLR 233. See also Johnson v R (1976) 136 CLR 619).

38. This issue will generally not turn on a precise counting of the time over which the relevant episode extended. The jury should consider the entire incident, including any events which took place during the interval between the provocative conduct and the response (Parker v R (1962) 111 CLR 610. See also Pollock v R (2010) 242 CLR 233).

39. A person who kills his or her violent partner in response to long-term abuse is not prevented from raising the partial defence of provocation simply because his or her reaction may be considered to be "delayed" or "slow-burning" (R v Osland [1998] 2 VR 636; R v Thornton (No.2) [1996] 1 WLR 1174).

40. However, for the defence to be successful there must be a "triggering event" that caused a sudden and temporary loss of self-control at the time of the killing. The mere fact of long-term abuse is not sufficient (R v Osland [1998] 2 VR 636, Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316).

41. The "triggering" incident may be a relatively minor act of abuse, but it cannot be a trivial incident. A history of abuse does not create a blank cheque to plan and execute homicide, protected by the law of provocation (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316).

42. In cases of long-term abuse, evidence of the abuse, and of "battered-woman syndrome", may be relevant to the jury's consideration of the effect that otherwise apparently minor incidents may have had on the accused (R v Osland [1998] 2 VR 636; R v Thornton (No.2) [1996] 1 WLR 1174).

43. Such evidence may also be relevant when determining the gravity of the provocative conduct (see below) (R v Osland [1998] 2 VR 636; Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316).

Objective test

44. The third way for the prosecution to disprove provocation is to prove that the deceased's conduct was not capable of causing an ordinary person to lose self-control and to act in the way in which the accused did.

45. In considering this "objective test", there are two questions the jury must determine:

    i) What was the gravity of the provocation?

    ii) Was the provocation of such gravity that it could cause an ordinary person to lose self-control and act like the accused?

What was the gravity of the provocation?

46. The first part of the objective test requires the jury to assess the gravity of the provocative conduct. In making this assessment, the jury must take into account any relevant personal characteristics of the accused, as well as his or her circumstances (Stingel v R (1990) 171 CLR 312; Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58; R v Kuster (2008) 21 VR 407).

47. Depending on the case, the relevant circumstances and characteristics of the accused may include his or her age, sex, race, ethnicity, physical features, personal attributes, personal relationships or past history (Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58; R v Abebe (2000) 1 VR 429; R v Curzon (2000) 1 VR 416; R v Thorpe (No 2) [1999] 2 VR 719; R v Leonboyer [2001] VSCA 149; R v Kumar (2002) 5 VR 193; R v McCullagh (No 3) [2007] VSCA 293).

48. The jury may also take into account any mental instability or weakness of the accused (Stingel v R (1990) 171 CLR 312), but should not take into account his or her "exceptional excitability or pugnacity or ill-temper" (DPP v Camplin [1978] AC 705).

49. The relevant circumstances may include the history between the accused and the deceased (R v Kumar (2002) 5 VR 193; Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316), or between the accused and third-parties (Green v R (1997) 191 CLR 334).

50. The characteristics or attributes of an accused that may be taken into account when assessing the gravity of the provocation reflect features which are of a permanent, rather than a temporary or transient, nature (R v McCullagh (No 3) [2007] VSCA 293).

51. However, such permanent characteristics or attributes will not always be relevant to an assessment of the gravity of the provocative conduct. To be relevant, those characteristics or attributes must bear upon an objective assessment of the gravity of the particular provocative conduct. For example, the accused's mental instability would be relevant if the provocative conduct consisted of insults that the accused was mad, but would probably not be relevant if the provocation was completely unrelated to his or her mental condition (Stingel v R (1990) 171 CLR 312; R v McCullagh (No 3) [2007] VSCA 293).

52. Where the accused is temporarily intoxicated, and the provocative conduct does not relate to that intoxication, his/her intoxication will not be relevant to an assessment of the gravity of the provocation (R v McCullagh (No 3) [2007] VSCA 293).

53. The judge should identify all of the accused's characteristics and circumstances relevant to the jury's assessment of the gravity of the provocation, and describe any relevant background evidence, such as evidence of the relationship and history between the accused and the deceased, relationships with third parties and cultural matters (R v Kuster (2008) 21 VR 407).

54. In assessing the gravity of provocative conduct, the judge (and jury) should take care not to unduly narrow the circumstances that should be taken into account (See R v Conway (2004) 149 A Crim R 206; R v Kumar (2002) 5 VR 193).

55. As the jury are required to take the accused's personal circumstances into account in assessing the gravity of the provocative conduct, it will be a misdirection to suggest that the jury is "entitled" to consider those circumstances (R v Curzon (2000) 1 VR 416).

Could the ordinary person have lost control?

56. Having assessed the gravity of the provocation, the jury must then determine whether provocation of that level of gravity could have caused an "ordinary person" to lose self-control and act in the way the accused did (Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58).

57. The "ordinary person" is not the "reasonable man" of the law of negligence (and of earlier provocation cases). He or she is a person capable of losing his or her self-control to the extent of intentionally wounding or killing another, when there is no need to do so for his or her own protection (Stingel v R (1990) 171 CLR 312. See also Johnson v R (1976) 136 CLR 619; Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58; R v Abebe (2000) 1 VR 429).

58. While all of the accused's relevant characteristics and circumstances must be taken into account in assessing the gravity of the provocation (see above), the only factor that may be relevant when determining how the ordinary person could have reacted to provocation of that gravity is the accused's age (in the sense of immaturity) (Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58; Stingel v R (1990) 171 CLR 312).

59. Thus, for an adult accused, the standard the jury must apply is simply the "power of self-control of the ordinary person". When the accused is a youth, the standard will be "the power of self control of an ordinary person of the accused's age" (Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58; Stingel v R (1990) 171 CLR 312; R v Thorpe (No 2) [1999] 2 VR 719).

60. The law does not fix a point at which youth ceases to be relevant to the determination of the objective standard. The age of the accused should be incorporated into the test wherever it is open to the jury to consider that the accused is immature by reason of youthfulness (Stingel v R (1990) 171 CLR 312).

61. Gender, senility, intoxication, medical condition and ethnic background have all been expressly identified as factors that should not be brought into consideration in the determination of this standard. This reflects the principle of equality before the law (Stingel v R (1990) 171 CLR 312; R v Curzon (2000) 1 VR 416; R v O'Neill [1982] VR 150; R v Gojanovic (No 2) [2007] VSCA 153; R v McCullagh (No 3) [2007] VSCA 293).

62. Equally, the reduction of an offender's capacity for self control by mental illness, or by any other considerations, will not be relevant to this aspect of the test (R v Conway (2004) 149 A Crim R 206).

63. It should be made clear to the jury that the critical feature or attribute of the ordinary person against which the accused's conduct is to be compared is his or her normal or ordinary powers of self-control (Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58; R v Margach [2007] VSCA 110; R v McCullagh (No 3) [2007] VSCA 293).

64. Jurors should not be directed to place themselves in "the accused's shoes as the embodiment of the ordinary person" to determine the possible effect of the provocation upon the ordinary person's power of self-control. Such an instruction risks jurors substituting their own subjective standards for the objective standard of the test (Stingel v R (1990) 171 CLR 312).

65. The judge should also not refer to whether an "ordinary person of the accused's characteristics" could have lost control, as most of the accused's characteristics are only relevant to determining the gravity of the provocation (R v Kuster (2008) 21 VR 407).

The Ordinary Person "Could" Have Lost Control

66. The objective test is whether the provocative conduct could have caused an ordinary person to lose self-control to the extent that the accused did. The jury need not be satisfied that this result would necessarily, or even probably, have followed (Stingel v R (1990) 171 CLR 312; Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58).

67. In this context "could" and "might" are synonymous. In directing a jury, it is acceptable to use "might" rather than "could" (preferably saying that "might" in this context means the same thing as "could") (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316; Stingel v R (1990) 171 CLR 312; R v Thorpe (No 2) [1999] 2 VR 719).

68. It may, in fact, be preferable to use "might" rather than "could", as there is less chance of a judge accidentally transposing the words "would" and "might" than there is in relation to the similar-sounding words "would" and "could". In addition, there is less chance that the jury will mishear what the judge says (see, e.g. R v Thorpe (No 2) [1999] 2 VR 719).

69. The onus of proof is on the prosecution to disprove this element (see below). As the corollary of "could" is "would not" (rather than "could not"), this means that the prosecution must prove that an ordinary person would not have lost self-control and acted in the way the accused did (Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58*, R v Thorpe (No 2)* [1999] 2 VR 719).

70. Given the risk of confusion between the terms "could", "might" and "would", and the difficulties with the onus of proof in this area (see below), it can be helpful for a judge to explicitly direct the jury that for the prosecution to disprove that something "might" or "could" have happened, it must prove that it "would not" have happened (see, e.g. R v Abebe (2000) 1 VR 429).

Could the Ordinary Person have "Done What the Accused Did"

71. The objective test requires the jury to determine whether the provocative conduct could have caused an ordinary person to lose self-control and "act in the way in which the accused did" (Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58; R v McCullagh (No 3) [2007] VSCA 293; Pollock v R (2010) 242 CLR 233).

72. The phrase "act in the way in which the accused did" refers to the nature and extent – the kind and degree – of the reaction which the provocative conduct could have caused in an ordinary person. It does not refer to the precise physical form which that reaction might take, or the duration of the reaction (Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58; R v Barrett (2007) 16 VR 240; R v McCullagh (No 3) [2007] VSCA 293; Pollock v R (2010) 242 CLR 233).

73. Where it is alleged that the accused intentionally murdered the deceased, the jury will therefore need to determine whether the ordinary person could have formed an intention to kill or really seriously injure the victim in response to provocation of that gravity, and whether he or she could have acted upon that intention (Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58).

74. Where it is alleged that the accused recklessly murdered the deceased, the jury will need to determine whether the ordinary person could have acted with knowledge that someone would probably die or be really seriously injured.[1218]

[1218] While provocation is generally discussed in the context of intentional killings, the defence may be raised where reckless murder is in issue (R v Cufley (1983) 10 A Crim R 39).

75. The jury does not need to focus on matters such as whether the ordinary person could have adopted the means used by the accused to carry out his or her intention, or whether the ordinary person would have regained composure earlier than the accused did, or would have inflicted a lesser number of wounds (Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58; R v Barrett (2007) 16 VR 240. See also Pollock v R (2010) 242 CLR 233).

76. Care should be taken to avoid leading the jury to consider that the test involves assessing whether the ordinary person might have responded exactly as the accused did (R v McKeown [2006] VSCA 74; R v Gojanovic (No 2) [2007] VSCA 153).

Proportionality

77. There is no independent requirement that the retaliation should be proportionate to the provocation. Rather, that question is absorbed into the test directed to the effect of the provocation upon the ordinary person (Johnson v R (1976) 136 CLR 619; Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58; R v McCullagh (No 3) [2007] VSCA 293; R v Kuster (2008) 21 VR 407).

78. It is the function of the ordinary person test to determine the degree of provocation necessary to provide a defence to murder. It is accepted that there must be a high degree of provocation (Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58).

79. Thus, while the jury can be instructed to take into account the mode and extent of retaliation in applying the ordinary person test, it will be wrong to identify proportionality as a specific matter for defence counsel to establish, or for the prosecution to negative (Johnson v R (1976) 136 CLR 619; R v Ivanovic [2005] VSCA 238; R v McKeown [2006] VSCA 74*; R v Margach* [2007] VSCA 110*; R v Barrett* (2007) 16 VR 240; R v Gojanovic (No 2)[2007] VSCA 153; R v Hill [2007] VSCA 261; R v McCullagh (No 3) [2007] VSCA 293).

80. Although it will not be a misdirection to refer to proportionality if it is made clear that it is not an essential or additional part of the test for provocation, it is generally undesirable to make a separate reference to proportionality when describing the elements of provocation (R v McCullagh (No 3) [2007] VSCA 293).

Onus of Proof

81. Once provocation is put in issue, the onus is on the prosecution to disprove at least one of its elements beyond reasonable doubt. If they fail to do so, the accused will be entitled to be acquitted of murder but convicted of manslaughter (as long as all the elements of murder have been satisfied) (Johnson v R (1976) 136 CLR 619; Moffa v R (1977) 138 CLR 601; R v Thorpe (No 2) [1999] 2 VR 719; R v Anderson (1997) 94 A Crim R 335).

82. There are a number of ways in which a judge can express the onus of proof:

    - S/he can direct the jury that they may only convict the accused of murder if the prosecution can disprove one of the elements of provocation beyond reasonable doubt; or
    - S/he can direct the jury that they must acquit the accused of murder if they find that there is a reasonable possibility that the killing was provoked (i.e. that both of the elements of provocation have been established); or
    - S/he can direct the jury that they must acquit the accused of murder if they find that the conclusion that the killing was provoked (i.e. that both of the elements of provocation have been established) is reasonably open on the evidence (see, e.g. Moffa v R (1977) 138 CLR 601; R v Thorpe (No 2) [1999] 2 VR 719; R v Anderson (1997) 94 A Crim R 335).

83. The courts have acknowledged the notorious difficulty of explaining the law of provocation to the jury, and relating it to the facts, without inadvertently suggesting that an onus, however limited, lies on the accused (Moffa v R (1977) 138 CLR 601; R v Thorpe (No 2) [1999] 2 VR 719).

84. It has therefore been suggested that it may be wise to tell the jury that:

- It is always difficult to give directions about provocation in a way which completely avoids any suggestion that the accused has to prove something;
- Any such suggestion is completely wrong; and
- Provocation is something which the prosecution must exclude beyond reasonable doubt (R v Thorpe (No 2) [1999] 2 VR 719).

Judge Must Relate the Law to the Facts

85. The judge must explain to the jury how the issue of provocation has arisen on the facts, and how it might be excluded (Pollock v R (2010) 242 CLR 233).
86. Where different versions of the facts have been alleged, the judge must explain how provocation arises on each version, and how it might be excluded on each (Pollock v R (2010) 242 CLR 233).
87. Care must be taken to identify the real issues in the case, and to relate the directions of law to those issues (Pollock v R (2010) 242 CLR 233).

When to Charge the Jury about Provocation

88. The judge must direct the jury about provocation if the defence identify that provocation is in issue or if there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving a direction on provocation in the absence of any request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 11 – 16). See Directions under Jury Directions Act 2015.
89. At common law, the judge was required to leave provocation to the jury if there was material in the evidence which was "capable of constituting provocation" (Stingel v R (1990) 171 CLR 312; Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58).
90. More precisely, the trial judge was required to leave provocation to the jury if:
    - On the version of events most favourable to the accused on the evidence
    - A jury acting reasonably might fail to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the killing was unprovoked in the relevant sense (Stingel v R (1990) 171 CLR 312; Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58).
91. These requirements took into account the fact that:
    - The ultimate burden of disproving provocation lies on the prosecution; and
    - It is the jury, not the judge, who must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt of the absence of provocation (Stingel v R (1990) 171 CLR 312).
92. At common law, it was acknowledged that there were no clear objective criteria for the judge to apply when determining this issue (R v Kumar (2002) 5 VR 193).
93. However, it is clear that in deciding whether provocation should be left to the jury, the trial judge was applying a legal test. S/he was not passing judgment on the morality of the conduct (R v Conway (2004) 149 A Crim R 206).
94. The judge's assessment was made by reference to the full legal test for provocation (see above). This is the meaning of the phrase "unprovoked in the relevant sense" (R v Parsons (2000) 1 VR 161).
95. At common law, judges needed to be alive to the danger, in considering the objective test, that s/he would substitute his/her own assessment of the facts for the view of the facts most favourable to the accused (R v Kumar (2002) 5 VR 193).

Obligation to leave provocation to jury

96. The common law stated that trial judges should lean towards leaving provocation to the jury if s/he could. S/he should be reluctant to withdraw from the jury any issue that should properly be left to them (Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58; R v Tuncay [1998] 2 VR 19; R v Kuster (2008) 21 VR 407).

97. This tendency to leave provocation to the jury also reflects:

    - An appreciation of the undesirable consequences of the erroneous exclusion of provocation (i.e. the necessity for a retrial); and
    - Respect for the capacity of juries to evaluate the issues raised by the partial defence (R v Conway (2004) 149 A Crim R 206; R v Kumar (2002) 5 VR 193).[1219]

98. A trial judge was encouraged to be particularly cautious about withdrawing provocation from the jury where there was evidence of provocative conduct and loss of self control, and the objective test was the only real issue (Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58; R v Kumar (2002) 5 VR 193. See also the application of the test in R v Yasso (No 2) (2004) 10 VR 466).

99. These principles must be examined in light of Jury Directions Act 2015 Part 3, and the increased focus on the importance of forensic decision making of counsel.

The judge's duty was independent of defence counsel's attitude

100. At common law, if provocation was open on the evidence, the trial judge was required to leave it to the jury, no matter what course is followed by defence counsel, and regardless of whether it was actually raised during the trial (Pollock v R (2010) 242 CLR 233; R v Thorpe [1999] 1 VR 326; Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58; Pemble v R (1971) 124 CLR 107; R v Hopper [1915] 2 KB 431).

101. It did not matter if the judge or defence counsel perceived that the accused would suffer a forensic disadvantage if provocation was left to the jury. If the partial defence is open on the evidence, the judge was required to charge the jury (R v Thorpe [1999] 1 VR 326).

102. This principle is heavily qualified by Part 3 of the Jury Directions Act 2015. Under the Act, judges must not give a direction that has not been sought unless there are substantial and compelling reasons to do so. This test raised the bar compared to the common law position on when directions on defences not sought are required. See Directions under Jury Directions Act 2015.

Last updated: 29 June 2015

8.12.1 Charge: Provocation

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should only be given if:

i) It is alleged that the accused committed murder prior to 23 November 2005; and

ii) Provocation is open on the evidence (see 8.12 Provocation for guidance).

The charge should be given immediately after directing the jury about the other elements of murder, or where self defence is in issue, after directing the jury on self defence.

[1219] It has been stated that a judge who takes the issue away from the jury assumes a "grave responsibility" (Masciantonio v R (1994) 183 CLR 58 per McHugh J; R v Conway (2004) 149 A Crim R 206; R v Kumar (2002) 5 VR 193).

Introduction

In this case there is evidence that raises the issue of provocation. I must therefore give you some directions about this form of lawful excuse.

The concept of provocation was introduced into the law a long time ago as a concession to human frailty. It is based on the recognition that in certain provocative situations, a person of ordinary self-control can lose control over their emotions and commit the extraordinary act of intentionally killing the person responsible for the provocation.

You only need to consider provocation if you are satisfied that the prosecution has proven all of the other elements of murder beyond reasonable doubt [and you are satisfied that NOA was not acting in self defence].

According to the law, even if the prosecution has proven all of these matters, the accused will be guilty of manslaughter, and not murder, unless the prosecution can prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused was not acting under provocation.

There are three ways in which the prosecution can do this. I will list them for you, and then explain each one in more detail.

First, the prosecution can prove that the deceased did not act provocatively.[1220]

Secondly, the prosecution can prove that the accused did not kill the deceased while deprived of self-control by the deceased's provocative conduct.

Thirdly, the prosecution can prove that the deceased's conduct would not have caused an ordinary person to lose self-control and act in the way the accused did.

The prosecution does not have to prove all of these matters. The prosecution will disprove provocation if it proves any one of them beyond reasonable doubt. In such a case, if you have also found that all the other elements of murder have been proven, you should convict the accused of murder.

However, if the prosecution cannot prove at least one of these matters, then you must not convict the accused of murder. You should instead convict him/her of manslaughter.

Onus of Proof

I want to emphasise that it is not for the accused to prove that s/he was provoked, but for the prosecution to prove that s/he was not.

Unfortunately, it is sometimes difficult to give directions about provocation in a way which completely avoids any suggestion that the accused has to prove something. If anything I say suggests to you that the accused must prove some aspect of this defence, disregard that suggestion. It is for the prosecution to prove that the accused was not provoked.

I will now explain the ways in which the prosecution can prove this in more detail.

Provocative Conduct

The first way in which the prosecution can prove that the accused was not provoked in law is by proving that the deceased did not act provocatively.

[1220] If the provocative conduct did not emanate from the deceased, but it is alleged that the accused mistakenly believed that it did, this charge will need to be modified accordingly.

While this aspect of provocation relates to what the deceased did and said, you must determine whether his/her conduct was provocative by considering its possible impact on the accused. The deceased's conduct will have been provocative if it was capable of causing the accused to lose self-control, and as a result to form an intention to kill or really seriously injure the deceased, and to act upon that intention.

If the prosecution can prove that NOV did not say or do anything that could have caused NOA to lose self-control in this way, and to this extent, then they will have proven that NOA was not provoked in law.[1221]

[If the deceased may be implicated in the provocative conduct of a third-party, add the following shaded section.]

In determining whether NOV acted provocatively, you must of course focus on NOV's own conduct. However, in this case you may also need to take into consideration the evidence you have heard of NO3P's[1222] conduct.

NO3P's conduct will be relevant if you find that it is reasonably possible that NOV [adopted/assented to/participated in/associated himself/herself with] that conduct. In such circumstances, for the purpose of this issue you can treat NO3P's conduct as if it was NOV's own conduct.

In determining whether NOV acted provocatively in the sense I have described, you must consider all the evidence of what NOV said and did [at the time of his/her final encounter with NOA].[1223]

You must also take into account any evidence which shows what this conduct might have meant to NOA. Such evidence places the incident in the context necessary for you to determine the effect that conduct was capable of having on NOA.

In this case there was evidence [describe evidence of any words or conduct by NOV (or a relevant third party) which may be relied upon as provocation].[1224]

The evidence relevant to the possible impact of NOV's conduct on NOA was [describe relevant background evidence and/or arguments, including evidence of the relationship and history between the accused and the deceased, relationships with third-parties and cultural matters].

[If "self-induced" provocation is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

You have heard evidence of NOA's conduct prior to NOV saying and doing the things that I have described. [Identify evidence relating to the accused's provocative conduct.] This evidence is relevant because the law says that NOV will not have acted provocatively if his/her conduct was itself provoked by the accused's conduct, and the deceased's response did not go beyond the reasonably predictable response of a person in his/her position.

[1221] If it is possible that the deceased did not commit the provocative conduct, but the accused mistakenly believed that s/he did, this section will need to be modified. See 8.12 Provocation for further information.

[1222] Name of Third Party.

[1223] If relevant, refer also to third parties whose conduct was "adopted" etc. by the deceased.

[1224] Strictly, only evidence capable of constituting provocation should be summarised here. Evidence of "historic conduct", or conduct in the absence of the accused, should be summarised as background evidence. Where relevant, describe any evidence that NOV "adopted" etc. a third party's conduct.

Remember, it is for the prosecution to prove that NOA was not provoked. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that NOV did not say or do anything that could have provoked NOA to lose self control, and as a result to form and act upon an intention to kill or seriously injure NOV, then NOA will not have been provoked in law. If you are also satisfied that all the other elements of murder have been proven, you should convict NOA of murder.

However, if you consider there is a reasonable possibility that NOV did act provocatively in the sense I have described, then provocation will remain an issue, and you will need to consider the next matter.

Killing While Deprived of Self Control

The second way in which the prosecution can prove that the accused was not provoked is by proving that s/he did not kill the deceased while deprived of self-control by the deceased's provocative conduct.[1225] This aspect of provocation relates to the accused's state of mind.

The prosecution can disprove this element of provocation by proving beyond reasonable doubt that the accused did not lose self control at all. That is, s/he retained full control over his/her emotions when s/he formed and acted upon the intention to kill or seriously injure the deceased.

[If there is evidence suggesting a "cooling off period", add the following shaded section.]

Even if you find that the deceased's conduct might have caused the accused to lose self-control, the prosecution can disprove this element of provocation by proving that, at the time s/he killed the deceased, the accused had regained self-control.

In this case, it is possible that this happened in the alleged period between NOV [describe provocative conduct] and his/her death. [Describe evidence of delay between provocation and killing.]

However, the mere fact that there may have been a delay between the deceased's provocative conduct and the accused's response does not mean that provocation will have been disproved. The accused may still have been out of control despite such a delay.

Such a delay will, however, clearly be relevant to your determination of whether NOA was out of control when s/he killed NOV. It is possible that you will find that s/he had "cooled off" during that period of time, and was no longer deprived of self-control. Alternatively, you may find that s/he remained out of control for the entire period. This is a question of fact for you to determine.

In considering whether NOA might have killed NOV while deprived of self-control by NOV's provocative conduct, you must take into account all of the evidence you considered when determining whether or not NOV had acted provocatively. This includes the evidence of NOV's conduct, and the evidence concerning the possible impact of that conduct on NOA. The evidence of particular significance to NOA's loss of self-control was [identify evidence of particular relevance to this issue, including any direct evidence of loss of control at the time of the killing].

If, upon consideration of all of the evidence, you are satisfied that NOA did not kill NOV while deprived of self-control by NOV's provocative conduct, then the prosecution will have disproven provocation. If you are also satisfied that all the elements of murder have been proven, you should convict NOA of that offence.

[1225] If there is an issue about the accused's mistaken belief about the victim's conduct, this aspect of the charge will require further elaboration.

Objective Element

The third way in which the prosecution can prove that the accused was not provoked is by proving that the deceased's conduct would not have caused an ordinary person to lose self-control and act in the way the accused did. This reflects the minimum standard of self-control the law requires of us all.

There are two stages to determining whether the ordinary person would not have lost self-control and acted in the way the accused did. First, you must assess the gravity or seriousness of the deceased's conduct. Then you need to determine whether provocation of that gravity would not have caused an ordinary person to lose self-control and act like the accused.

Gravity of the Provocation

The law says that you must assess the gravity of the deceased's conduct from the viewpoint of the accused. That is, you have to take into account NOA's personal characteristics and circumstances, such as his/her age, sex and race, when determining how grave that conduct was. This is because conduct which might not be insulting or hurtful to one person might be extremely insulting or hurtful to another because of such matters.

In this case, the characteristics and circumstances that you must take into account when assessing the gravity of NOV's conduct include [insert details of the accused's relevant characteristics and circumstances, such as his/her age, sex, race, ethnicity, physical features, personal attributes, personal relationships or past history].

Ordinary Person

Having assessed the gravity of the deceased's conduct, you must then determine whether provocation of that gravity might have caused an ordinary person to lose self-control and act in the way the accused did.

By "act in the way the accused did", I mean form an intention to kill or really seriously injure the deceased, and act on that intention.[1226] You do not need to be concerned with whether or not the ordinary person might have responded in precisely the way that you find the accused did.

The prosecution will therefore disprove provocation if it proves that provocation of that gravity would not have caused an ordinary person to lose self-control and act in the way the accused did. It is important to note that what the prosecution must prove here is that the ordinary person "would not" have lost self-control and acted in that way. They will not have proven this if you find that the ordinary person "could" or "might" have acted like the accused.

Person with ordinary powers of self control

In deciding whether this has been proven, you need to consider how the ordinary person, with ordinary powers of self-control, might have responded to NOV's conduct. You must determine whether provocation of that gravity could have led such a person to form an intention to kill or really seriously injure NOV, and to act upon that intention.

It is for you to determine how the ordinary person, with "ordinary powers of self control", might have acted in such circumstances. You must determine how a hypothetical ordinary, sober person, who represents a standard that applies to the whole community, might have reacted to provocation of that gravity.

[If the case involves an adult accused, add the following shaded section.]

[1226] This aspect of the charge will need to be amended if provocation is used in relation to reckless murder rather than intentional murder.

Unlike your assessment of the gravity of the deceased's conduct, in making this determination you must not take the accused's personal characteristics or circumstances into account. You must simply determine how the ordinary person, with a normal adult's powers of self-control, might have acted.

[If the case involves a youthful accused, add the following shaded section.]

Unlike your assessment of the gravity of the deceased's conduct, in making this determination the only one of the accused's characteristics or circumstances you may take into account is his/her age. You must determine how the ordinary [insert the accused's age at the time of the offence] year-old, with the powers of self-control of a person with the maturity or immaturity that you consider goes with that age, might have acted.

In this case [insert relevant arguments and/or evidence].

If the prosecution can prove that the ordinary person would not have responded to provocation that was as grave as that committed by NOV, by losing self control and forming and acting upon the intention I have described, then the prosecution will have disproven provocation.

Summary

To summarise, if you decide that all the other elements of murder have been proven beyond reasonable doubt, you must find NOA not guilty of murder and guilty of manslaughter instead, unless the prosecution prove that s/he was not acting under provocation.

There are three ways in which the prosecution can prove this:

- One – by proving that NOV did not act provocatively;
- Two – by proving that NOA did not kill NOV while deprived of self-control by NOV's provocative conduct; or
- Three – by proving that NOV's conduct would not have caused an ordinary person to lose self-control and act in the way NOA did.

If you find that the prosecution has proven any of these matters beyond reasonable doubt, and has also proven all the other elements of murder, then you must convict the accused of murder.

However, if you find that all the other elements of murder have been proven, but you are not satisfied that the prosecution has proven at least one of these three matters beyond reasonable doubt, then you must convict the accused of manslaughter.

Last updated: 12 December 2007

8.12.2 Checklist: Provocation

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used in a Murder trial if provocation has been left to the jury. See 8.12 Provocation for guidance on when provocation should be left to the jury.

In addition to proving all of the other elements of murder, the prosecution must also prove that the accused did not act under provocation.

This requires the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that when the accused killed the deceased, either:

1. The deceased did not act provocatively; or
2. The accused did not kill the deceased while deprived of self-control by the deceased's provocative conduct; or
3. The deceased's conduct would not have caused an ordinary person to lose self-control and act in the way the accused did.

Provocative Conduct

1. Has the prosecution proven that the deceased did not say or do anything that could have caused the accused to lose self control, and as a result to form an intention to kill or really seriously injure the deceased, and to act upon that intention?

Consider – Taking into account all of the circumstances, is there no reasonable possibility that the deceased said or did anything capable of provoking the accused in the way and to the degree described?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Murder (as long as you are satisfied that the prosecution has also proven all of the other elements of Murder beyond reasonable doubt)

If No, then go to Question 2

Killing While Deprived of Self Control

2. Has the prosecution proven that the accused did not kill the deceased while deprived of self-control by the deceased's conduct?

*Consider – What was the accused's state of mind when s/he killed the deceased?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Murder (as long as you are satisfied that the prosecution has also proven all of the elements of that offence beyond reasonable doubt)

If No, then go to Question 3

Conduct Would Have Caused an Ordinary Person to Lose Self-Control

3. Has the prosecution proven that the deceased's conduct would not have caused an ordinary person to lose self-control and act in the way the accused did?

Consider – How grave was the provocation from the viewpoint of the accused? How might a person with ordinary powers of self control have reacted to provocation of this gravity?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Murder (as long as you are satisfied that the prosecution has also proven all of the elements of that offence beyond reasonable doubt)

If No, then the accused acted under provocation and is not guilty of Murder, but is guilty of Manslaughter (as long as you are satisfied that the prosecution has proven all the other elements of Murder beyond reasonable doubt)

Last updated: 12 December 2007

8.13 Suicide Pact

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Partial Defence to Murder

1. When the accused is charged with murder, the jury may return a verdict of manslaughter by suicide pact where they are satisfied that:
    - The prosecution has proven all of the elements of murder beyond reasonable doubt; and

- The defence has proven, on the balance of probabilities, that the accused caused the death pursuant to a suicide pact (Crimes Act 1958 s 6B(1)).

2. Unlike other forms of manslaughter, the maximum penalty for manslaughter by suicide pact is 10 years' imprisonment (Crimes Act 1958 s 6B(1A)).

Elements

3. There are three matters the defence must prove on the balance of probabilities to establish this partial defence:

   i) There was an agreement between the accused and the deceased to seek the death of all parties to the agreement (a "suicide pact");

   ii) The accused's acts that caused the death of the deceased were committed in pursuance of the suicide pact; and

   iii) At the time he or she caused the death, the accused had the settled intention of dying pursuant to the agreement (Crimes Act 1958 s 6B(4)).

4. An agreement which has as its object the death of all of the parties to it will be a suicide pact, regardless of whether each party to the agreement is to take his or her own life (Crimes Act 1958 s 6B(4)).

5. The accused must prove the existence of an actual suicide pact. It is not sufficient to prove that the accused held an honest and reasonable belief in the existence of a suicide pact (R v Iannazzone [1983] 1 VR 649).

6. Passively allowing another person to commit suicide or hasten his or her own death does not give rise to a suicide pact (H Ltd v J (2010) 107 SASR 352).

Onus of Proof

7. The accused bears the onus of establishing, on the balance of probabilities, that he or she killed the deceased pursuant to the suicide pact. If the accused fails to establish this matter, then the appropriate verdict will be guilty of murder (Crimes Act 1958 s 6B(1). See also R v Sciretta [1977] VR 139).

Liability of Third Parties

8. The existence of a suicide pact does not affect the criminal liability of a person who is a party to the homicide, but is not a party to the suicide pact (Crimes Act 1958 s 6B(3)).

Related Offences

9. Suicide itself is no longer a crime (Crimes Act 1958 s 6A).

10. Crimes Act 1958 s 6B(2) creates three specialised suicide–related offences, which may be relevant where the accused's actions did not directly cause the death of the deceased:

    - Inciting another person to commit suicide where the other person does so, or attempts to do so;
    - Aiding and abetting another person to commit suicide where the other person does so, or attempts to do so; and
    - Committing either of the above offences pursuant to a suicide pact ('being a party to a suicide pact').

Last updated: 14 December 2010

8.13.1 Charge: Suicide Pact

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This direction is designed to be given after charging the jury on murder.

In this case, the defence has argued that NOA killed NOV under a suicide pact. I must therefore give you some directions about this partial defence.

The law states that a person who kills another person as part of a suicide pact should not be convicted of murder. He or she should be convicted of manslaughter instead.

You only need to consider the question of whether or not NOA killed NOV as part of a suicide pact if you are satisfied that the prosecution has proven all the elements of murder beyond reasonable doubt. If you are not satisfied that is the case, then you must not convict him/her of either murder or manslaughter.

Reverse Onus Direction

This is one of those rare situations in which a matter must be proved by the defence. It is defence counsel who must establish that NOA killed NOV as part of a suicide pact. If they cannot prove that was the case, then as long as you are satisfied that the prosecution has proven all the elements of murder, you should convict NOA of murder.

However, unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – the defence only needs to prove this matter on what is called the "balance of probabilities". This is a much lower standard than that required of the prosecution when proving an offence. It only requires the defence to prove that it is more probable than not that NOA killed NOV as part of a suicide pact.

Elements of A Suicide Pact

In order to prove that NOA killed NOV as part of a suicide pact, there are three matters that the defence must establish on the balance of probabilities.

First, they must establish that there was a "suicide pact" between NOA and NOV. The law defines a "suicide pact" as an agreement between two or more people to seek the death of all parties to the agreement.

[Summarise any evidence and/or arguments relating to the existence of a suicide pact.]

Second, the defence must establish that [identify act alleged to have caused NOV's death] was done in the course of carrying out the suicide pact.

[Summarise any relevant evidence and/or arguments relating to whether the relevant act was committed pursuant to the suicide pact.]

Third, the defence must establish that at the time s/he caused NOV's death, NOA had the settled intention of dying in accordance with the agreement.

[Summarise any evidence and/or arguments relating to the accused's mental state.]

If the defence establishes all three of those matters on the balance of probabilities, then the accused must be acquitted of murder and convicted of manslaughter.

Last updated: 14 December 2010

8.14 Powers of Arrest

Click here for a Word version of this document

Introduction

1. A person is arrested when police make it plain to him or her that he or she is not free to leave (R v Lavery (1978) 19 SASR 515).
2. The Crimes Act 1958 contains several provisions empowering police officers to make arrests in various circumstances.
3. In addition, other legislation provides additional bases for arrests without warrant (see, e.g. Bail Act 1977 s 24). These other bases for arrest without warrant are beyond the scope of this commentary.
4. While powers of arrest are now governed by statute in Victoria, the common law still dictates the requirements of a lawful arrest (Slaveski v State of Victoria & Ors [2010] VSC 441; Crimes (Powers of Arrest) Act 1972).
5. Unless stated otherwise, all statutory references are to sections of the Crimes Act 1958.

To Which Crimes are Police powers of Arrest Available as a Defence?

6. Police powers of arrest provide a lawful excuse for what would otherwise be an unlawful application of force. The defence is therefore most likely to arise in relation to offences such as:
   (a) assault (Slaveski v State of Victoria & Ors [2010] VSC 441); and
   (b) false Imprisonment (Biddle v State of Victoria & Ors [2015] VSC 275).

General powers of arrest without warrant (s 458)

7. Section 458 provides three situations in which any person (including a police officer) may arrest a person without a warrant.

Accused finds a person committing an offence (s 458(1)(a))

8. The first situation applies where:
   (a) a person (including a police officer) found the other person committing an indictable or summary offence; and
   (b) a person (including a police officer) believed on reasonable grounds that apprehension was necessary for one or more of the prescribed reasons (s 458(1)(a)).
9. A person (including a police officer) finds a person committing an offence including when a person (including a police officer) finds a person:

   > doing any act or so behaving or conducting himself or in such circumstances that the person finding him believes on reasonable grounds that the person so found is guilty of an offence (s 462).

10. "Finds committing" is intended to be given an extended meaning to encompass circumstances beyond actually finding an offender engaged in the relevant act (De Moor v Davies [1999] VSC 416).
11. Section 462 extends the point of discovery of the commission of the offence to encompass:
    (a) the actual perpetration of the offence;
    (b) finding a person behaving or conducting him or herself so as to create a reasonable belief of guilt; or
    (c) finding a person in such circumstances so as to create a reasonable belief of guilt (De Moor v Davies [1999] VSC 416; Lynch v Hargrave [1971] VR 99; Lunt v Bramley [1959] VR 313).
12. The prescribed reasons are:

    > (i) to ensure the attendance of the offender before a court of competent jurisdiction;
    > (ii) to preserve public order;

(iii) to prevent the continuation or repetition of the offence or the commission of a further offence; or
(iv) for the safety or welfare of members of the public or of the offender (s 458(1)(a).

Accused instructed by an authorised police officer (s 458(1)(b))

13. The second situation under s 458 applies where a person (including a police officer) was instructed to apprehend a person by a police officer who had the power to apprehend that person.

Arrested escaping from custody or evading arrest (s 458(1)(c))

14. The third situation under s 458 applies where a person (including a police officer) believed on reasonable grounds that the other person was:

    (a) escaping from legal custody; or

    (b) aiding and abetting another person to escape from legal custody; or

    (c) avoiding apprehension by some person with authority to apprehend the person.

Duration of arrest under s 458

15. A person who has been apprehended under s 458 may only be held as long as the reason for their apprehension continues. If the reason ceases to exist, the arrested person must be released (s 458(3)).

Police–specific powers of arrest without warrant (s 459)

16. Section 459 provides powers that only apply to police or protective services officers. Under section 459 a person is lawfully arrested if a person (including a police officer):

    (a) is a police or protective services officer; and

    (b) believed on reasonable grounds that the other person has committed:

        i) an indictable offence in Victoria; or

        ii) an offence elsewhere which would be an indictable offence in Victoria.

17. A protective services officer exercising this power must hand the person into the custody of a police officer as soon as practicable (s 459(2)).

18. A protective services officer can only exercise this power in relation to a person who is at or in the vicinity of a "designated place" as defined in the Victoria Police Act 2013 (s 459(3)).

19. Where an arrest is made under a belief held on reasonable grounds, the apprehension does not cease to be lawful if it later turns out the person arrested did not commit the offence alleged against him (s 461).

Reasonable grounds

20. "Reasonable grounds" requires the existence of facts which are sufficient to induce that state of mind (e.g. belief, suspicion) in a reasonable person (George v Rockett (1990) 170 CLR 104; Walsh v Loughnan [1991] 2 VR 351).

21. The person (including a police officer) must believe that the person being arrested has committed an indictable offence and this belief must be based on facts that would induce that state of mind in a reasonable person (Slaveski v State of Victoria & Ors [2010] VSC 441).

Belief

22. Belief has been distinguished from suspicion (George v Rockett (1990) 170 CLR 104). The facts grounding a suspicion may be insufficient to ground a belief (Walsh v Loughnan [1991] 2 VR 351).

23. Belief is a more certain state of mind than suspicion and involves an inclination of the mind towards assenting to, rather than rejecting, a proposition (George v Rockett (1990) 170 CLR 104).

24. Suspicion is a positive feeling of actual apprehension of mistrust, amounting to a slight opinion, but without sufficient evidence. Suspicion is not enough to justify an arrest without warrant (Slaveski v State of Victoria & Ors [2010] VSC 441).

25. The information upon which the arrester forms their belief depends on all of the circumstances that prevailed at the relevant time, including what the arrester saw, heard or did.

26. The person (including a police officer) must have believed that a particular indictable offence occurred, and not simply any indictable offence generally (R v Vollmer [1996] 1 VR 95).

Use of Force

27. Section 462A authorises a person to use force to effect or assist in effecting the lawful arrest of a person committing or suspected of committing an offence (s 462A).

28. The force used must not be disproportionate to the objective as the person believed on reasonable grounds to be necessary (s 462A).

29. Section 462A of the Crimes Act does not confer a power of arrest, it merely provides that proportionate force may be used to effect an arrest. The lawful power of arrest must be derived from either section 458 or section 459 (Slaveski v State of Victoria & Ors [2010] VSC 441).

30. The right to use force is a corollary of the right to effect an arrest, as without such a right, a power of arrest would be ineffective (R v Turner [1962] VR 30).

31. The right to use force only authorises using the amount of force reasonably necessary to carry out the arrest. The force must not be disproportionate to the "evil to be prevented" (R v Turner [1962] VR 30).

32. The level of force that is reasonable is to be determined objectively.

Arrest with Warrant

33. In addition to the various bases for arrest without warrant, Victorian law provides a range of bases for a court to issue a warrant to arrest (see, e.g. Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 12; Evidence Act 2008 s 194).

34. Where there is an arrest with warrant, the person must comply with any conditions on the warrant, along with the common law elements of lawful arrest described below.

Common Law Elements of Lawful Arrest

35. While the powers of arrest are largely governed by statute, the common law still dictates the process of a lawful arrest (Slaveski v State of Victoria & Ors [2010] VSC 441).

36. These procedural requirements are:

    (a) The other person was deprived of his or her liberty;

    (b) The accused informed the other person that he or she was under arrest; and

    (c) The accused informed the other person of the reason for the arrest.

Deprivation of Liberty

37. There is no requirement that the other person be seized or subjected to physical force. There may be an arrest by mere words (Alderson v Booth [1969] 2 QB 216).

38. There will be a sufficient deprivation of liberty if the other person submits to the arrester's control after the arrester has indicated his or her intention to effect the arrest (Slaveski v State of Victoria & Ors [2010] VSC 441).

39. If the other person does not comply, the deprivation of liberty must be formalised by the accused touching the other person (Sandon v Jervis (1859) 120 ER 760).

Communication of arrest

40. A person (including a police officer) must do everything that a reasonable person in the circumstances would do to inform the person being arrested that they are under arrest (R v Stafford (1976) 13 SASR 392; Hull v Nuske (1974) 8 SASR 587).

41. The person being arrested must comprehend that they are acting under compulsion and not voluntarily (Alderson v Booth [1969] 2 QB 216; R v O'Donoghue (1988) 34 A Crim R 397).

42. The question of whether it was clear to the person being arrested that they were under compulsion is a question of fact dependant on the circumstances of the case (R v Inwood [1973] 2 All ER 645).

Communication of reason for arrest

43. A person (including a police officer) must inform the person being arrested, at the time of the arrest, of the offence or facts constituting an offence, for which they are being arrested (Christie v Leachinsky [1947] AC 573; Adams v Kennedy (2000) 49 NSWLR 78; R v Tipping [2019] SASCFC 41).

44. The reason given must be the true reason. A person cannot keep the reason for arrest to himself or herself, or give a reason which is not the true reason (Christie v Leachinsky [1947] AC 573).

45. An arrest for the mere purpose of questioning is unlawful (Bales v Parmenter (1935) SR (NSW) 182).

46. The reason for arrest does not need to be communicated using technical or precise language (Christie v Leachinsky [1947] AC 573).

47. In certain circumstances, the accused will be excused from immediately informing the person being arrested, for example:

    - if the other person resists arrest or absconds (Christie v Leachinsky [1947] AC 573);
    - if the circumstances of the arrest are such that the offence or reason for arrest is apparent to the other person (Christie v Leachinsky [1947] AC 573); or
    - if the other person is unable to understand the reason because of disability, intoxication or lack of English language skills, as long as the accused does all that a reasonable person would do in such circumstances (Tims v John Lewis & Co Ltd [1952] AC 676).

48. In these circumstances, a person (including a police officer) must inform the person being arrested of the reason for the arrest at the earliest reasonable opportunity (Christie v Leachinsky [1947] AC 573).

49. In assessing the second exception described above, the focus must be on the circumstances of the arrest itself, rather than the subjective knowledge of the arrested person. The prosecution must show that, in the circumstance, the other person must have known the reason for the arrest (State of NSW v Delly (2007) 70 NSWLR 125).

Last updated: 17 May 2019

8.14.1 Charge: Arrest when Person Found Committing an Offence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

[This charge is designed to be given as part of the "without lawful excuse" element in 7.4.17.1 Charge: False Imprisonment or 7.4.8.1 Charge: Assault – Application of Force where there is evidence from which a jury might infer that the accused was acting in accordance with Crimes Act 1958 s 458(1)(a) to perform a lawful arrest. Where lawful arrest is raised in relation to other offences, it should be adapted as required.

If the basis for the lawful arrest relates to Crimes Act 1958 s 459, see 8.14.2 Charge: Police arrest due to an indictable offence or 8.14.3 Charge: Protective Services Officer arrest due to an indictable offence.

If the basis for the lawful arrest relates to Crimes Act 1958 s 458(1)(b) or (c), this charge must be modified accordingly.]

Lawful excuse

This element relates to the argument that NOA was performing a lawful arrest when s/he [insert relevant act].

To explain this element, I'm first going to give you some background on the power of police to arrest a person, and then explain the legal components of a lawful arrest.

Background

As a free and democratic society, all people are protected from arbitrary arrest and detention. The law gives all people, police and non-police alike, certain powers to arrest a person in order to prevent crime, these powers can only be exercised in limited and defined circumstances.

An arrest occurs when a person has made it plain to another person that the other person is no longer a free person. As part of this, the first person must inform the other person that the other person is arrested and the reason for the arrest. This is often done by saying something like "Mr Smith, I am arresting you because you are committing" and then identifying the crime in question.

It is not always necessary to spell this out. In some cases, it may be obvious from the circumstances why the person is being arrested. It is also not necessary to immediately inform the other person if that other person makes it impractical to do so, such as by running away. When informing the other person, a person does not need to use technical or precise language. The focus is on whether the other person has been adequately informed of the reason for the arrest.

As I said, an arrest involves making it plain that the other person is not free to go. If someone gives the impression that the other person is free to refuse a request, or free to leave, then there is no arrest. In other words, whether there is an arrest may depend on the words and actions of those involved, and the surrounding circumstances.

One limit on the power to arrest a person is that there must be a valid reason for the arrest. A desire to question a person is not a valid reason.

Components of lawful arrest

I'm now going to explain the components of a lawful arrest.

The accused will have lawfully arrested NOC if:

- NOA found NOC committing an offence; and
- NOA believed on reasonable grounds that arrest was necessary for a lawful reason; and
- NOA, where possible, informed NOC that [he/she] was under arrest; and
- NOA, where possible, informed NOC of the reason for the arrest; and
- any force the accused used was proportionate.

To prove that NOA was acting without lawful excuse, the prosecution must disprove at least one of these five components of a lawful arrest.

The prosecution argues that the [identify component numbers, e.g. "first and third"] components of a lawful excuse did not exist. I will now explain those components in more detail.

Note: The judge should only direct on those parts of a lawful arrest which are in issue.

Found committing an offence

The [insert number] way in which the prosecution can prove that NOA was not performing a lawful arrest is to prove, beyond reasonable doubt that NOA did not find NOC committing an offence.

The law gives a wide meaning to the idea of finding a person committing an offence. It covers the situation where the accused sees a person committing an offence. It also covers the situation where the accused finds a person [acting/behaving/in circumstances] so as to create a reasonable belief that the person committed an offence.

The prosecution argues that NOA did not find NOC committing an offence. The defence dispute this and say that NOA did find NOC committing [identify relevant offence].

[Summarise evidence and arguments relating to circumstances in which NOC was found when NOA effected the arrest.]

Belief on reasonable grounds that arrest was necessary

The [insert number] way in which the prosecution can prove that the accused was not performing a lawful arrest is to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused did not believe on reasonable grounds that arrest was necessary for a lawful reason.

This component looks at the basis for the arrest. The basis must be lawful and the accused must have believed on reasonable grounds that it was necessary to arrest NOC on that basis.

For this purpose, an arrest is lawful if it is necessary:

- to ensure the person attends before a court; or
- to preserve public order; or
- to prevent the continuation or repetition of the offence or the commission of a further offence; or
- for the safety or welfare of members of the public or of the other person.

There is an important difference between a belief and a suspicion. The accused must have actually believed that NOC had committed an indictable offence. A state of mind such as "I think s/he might have committed an offence" or "I suspect s/he has committed an offence" is not sufficient. A belief means thinking something is true, even if there is still some uncertainty. A belief is a more certain state of mind than a suspicion, but does not depend on concrete proof.

There must also be reasonable grounds for that belief. This means that the accused must have known facts which would be sufficient to cause a reasonable person to also believe that the other person had committed an offence.

This means you are looking both at what NOA believed, and whether there was a reasonable basis for NOA to believe arrest was necessary for this purpose.

The prosecution argues that [identify relevant prosecution evidence and arguments]. The defence respond by saying [identify relevant defence evidence and arguments].

If you are satisfied NOA did not believe it was necessary to arrest NOC to [identify relevant lawful purposes of arrest] or that NOA did not have a reasonable basis for that belief, then you must find that NOA was not performing a lawful arrest.

Communication of arrest

The [insert number] way in which the prosecution can prove that NOA was not performing a lawful arrest is to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA did not communicate to NOC that [he/she] was being arrested.

NOA must have done everything a reasonable person in the circumstances would have done to inform NOC that [he/she] was under arrest. NOC must have understood that the [he/she] was acting under compulsion and not voluntarily.

[If there is evidence to suggest that the accused was prevented in any way from communicating to the other person that they were under arrest, add the following shaded section.]

In certain circumstances, a person will be excused from immediately informing the other person that they are under arrest. These circumstances include:

- if the other person resists arrest or runs away;
- if the circumstances of the arrest are such that it is apparent to the other person that they are under arrest;
- if the other person is unable to understand that they are under arrest because of disability, intoxication or lack of English language skills, as long as the accused does all that a reasonable person would do in such circumstances

In these circumstances, the other person must be informed that they are under arrest at the earliest reasonable opportunity.

[Summarise evidence and arguments about whether NOA communicated that the arrestee was under arrest.]

Communication of reason for arrest

The [insert number] way in which the prosecution can prove that NOA was not performing a lawful arrest is to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA did not communicate the reason for the arrest.

The accused did not need to use precise or technical language. It is sufficient if NOA informed NOC of the facts constituting the alleged offence.

[If there is evidence to suggest that the accused was prevented in any way from communicating the reason for the arrest, add the following shaded section.]

In certain circumstances, a person will be excused from immediately informing the other person that they are under arrest. These circumstances include:

- if the other person resists arrest or runs away;
- if the circumstances of the arrest are such that it is apparent to the other person that they are under arrest;
- if the other person is unable to understand that they are under arrest because of disability, intoxication or lack of English language skills, as long as the accused does all that a reasonable person would do in such circumstances

In these circumstances, the other person must be informed that they are under arrest at the earliest reasonable opportunity.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Use of force not disproportionate to objective of arrest

The [insert number] way in which the prosecution can prove that NOA was not performing a lawful arrest is to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA used excessive force.

The right to use force for the purpose of an arrest only authorises using the amount of force reasonably necessary to carry out the arrest. The force must not be disproportionate to the objective of the arrest.

For this component, you must look at whether the force used was disproportionate objectively. That is, you decide whether the force used was proportionate. You are not deciding whether NOA thought the force used was proportionate.

[Summarise evidence and arguments about force used to effect arrest.]

Relate law to the evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, for this element, the prosecution must prove that NOA was not exercising a lawful power of arrest. Based on the evidence, this means the prosecution must prove that NOA did not:

[Identify only those matters that are in issue:

- find NOC committing an offence;
- believe on reasonable grounds that arrest was necessary for a lawful reason;
- inform NOC that he or she was under arrest;
- inform NOC of the reason for the arrest; or
- only use force that was proportionate to the objective of the arrest.]

Unless you find that the prosecution has disproved one or more of these matters beyond reasonable doubt, you must find NOA not guilty of [insert offence].

Remember, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused acted without lawful excuse by showing that he/she was not performing a lawful arrest. NOA does not need to prove that [he/she] was performing a lawful arrest.

Last updated: 17 May 2019

8.14.2 Charge: Police Arrest Due to an Indictable Offence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

[This charge is designed to be given as part of the "without lawful excuse" element in 7.4.17.1 Charge: False Imprisonment or 7.4.8.1 Charge: Assault – Application of Force where there is evidence from which a jury might infer that the accused was acting in accordance with Crimes Act 1958 s 459 to perform a lawful arrest. Where lawful arrest is raised in relation to other offences, it should be adapted as required.

If the case involves a protective services officer, see 8.14.3 Charge: Protective services officer arrest due to an indictable offence.

If the basis for the lawful arrest relates to Crimes Act 1958 s 458, see 8.14.1 Charge: Arrest when person found committing an offence.]

Lawful excuse

This element relates to the argument that NOA was performing a lawful arrest when s/he [insert relevant act].

To explain this element, I'm first going to give you some background on the power of police to arrest a person, and then explain the legal components of a lawful arrest.

Background

As a free and democratic society, all people are protected from arbitrary arrest and detention. While the law gives police certain powers as part of their role, including the power to arrest a person, that power can only be exercised in limited and defined circumstances.

An arrest occurs when a police officer has made it plain to another person that the other person is no longer a free person. As part of this, the police officer must inform the other person that the person is arrested and the reason for the arrest. This is often done by saying something like "Mr Smith, I am arresting you on suspicion of committing" and then identifying the crime in question.

It is not always necessary to spell this out. In some cases, it may be obvious from the circumstances why the person is being arrested, such as if the person is in the process of committing an offence. It is also not necessary to immediately inform the other person if that other person makes it impractical to do so, such as by running away. When informing the other person, the police officer does not need to use technical or precise language. The focus is on whether the other person has been adequately informed of the reason for the arrest.

As I said, an arrest involves making it plain that the other person is not free to go. If a police officer gives the impression that the other person is free to refuse a request, or free to leave, then there is no arrest. In other words, whether there is an arrest may depend on the words and actions of those involved, and the surrounding circumstances.

One limit on the power to arrest a person is that there must be a valid reason for the arrest. A desire to question a person is not a valid reason.

Components of lawful arrest

I'm now going to explain the components of a lawful arrest.

The accused will have lawfully arrested NOC if:

- NOA was a police officer;
- NOA believed on reasonable grounds that the other person has committed an [indictable offence in Victoria/offence elsewhere which would be an indictable offence in Victoria;
- NOA, where possible, informed NOC that [he/she] was under arrest;
- NOA, where possible, informed NOC of the reason for the arrest; and
- any force the accused used was proportionate.

To prove that NOA was acting without lawful excuse, the prosecution must disprove at least one of these five components of a lawful arrest.

The prosecution argues that the [*identify component numbers, e.g. "*first and third"] components of a lawful excuse did not exist. I will now explain those components in more detail.

Note: The judge should only direct on those parts of a lawful arrest which are in issue.

Police Officer

The [insert number] way in which the prosecution can prove that NOA was not performing a lawful arrest is to prove, beyond reasonable doubt that NOA is not a police officer.

[Summarise evidence and arguments relating to whether NOA was a police officer].

Belief on reasonable grounds that complainant has committed an indictable offence

The [insert number] way in which the prosecution can prove that NOA was not performing a lawful arrest is to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA did not believe on reasonable grounds that NOC committed an [indictable offence in Victoria/offence elsewhere which would be an indictable offence in Victoria].

This component looks at the reason for the arrest. You are looking both at what NOA believed, and whether he/she had a reasonable basis for that belief.

There is an important difference between a belief and a suspicion. The accused must have actually believed that NOC had committed an indictable offence. A state of mind such as "I think s/he might have committed an offence" or "I suspect s/he has committed an offence" is not sufficient. A belief means thinking something is true, even if there is still some uncertainty. A belief is a more certain state of mind than a suspicion, but does not depend on concrete proof.

There must also be reasonable grounds for that belief. This means that the accused must have known facts which would be sufficient to cause a reasonable person to also believe that the other person had committed an offence.

Finally, the accused must have believed that the other person had committed an [indictable offence in Victoria/offence elsewhere which would be an indictable offence in Victoria]. A general belief that the other person had done something wrong is not enough. The accused must have believed on reasonable grounds that the other person had committed a specific offence, such as [identify relevant offences]. I direct you as a matter of law that [identify relevant offences] are [Victorian indictable offences/offences that would be indictable offences if committed in Victoria].

[If relevant, add the following shaded section on arrest for a collateral purpose.]

When you are considering this issue, you must look at NOA's real reason for the arrest. You have heard the prosecutor argue that [refer to prosecution case on collateral reason for arrest]. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that NOA only arrested NOC because [insert collateral reason], and later invented the explanation that NOC was [identify relevant offence], then the prosecution have proved that NOA did not believe, at the time of the arrest, that NOC had committed an [indictable offence in Victoria/offence elsewhere which would be an indictable offence in Victoria].

[Summarise evidence and arguments about whether NOA believed on reasonable grounds that NOC committed an indictable offence in Victoria/an offence elsewhere that would be an indictable offence in Victoria].

If you are satisfied NOA did not believe NOC had committed an [indictable offence in Victoria/offence elsewhere which would be an indictable offence in Victoria] or that NOA did not have a reasonable basis for that belief, then you must find that NOA was not performing a lawful arrest.

Communication of arrest

The [insert number] way in which the prosecution can prove that NOA was not performing a lawful arrest is to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA did not communicate to NOC that [he/she] was being arrested.

NOA must have done everything a reasonable person in the circumstances would have done to inform NOC that [he/she] was under arrest. NOC must have understood that the [he/she] was acting under compulsion and not voluntarily.

[If there is evidence to suggest that the accused was prevented in any way from communicating to the other person that they were under arrest, add the following shaded section.]

In certain circumstances, a police officer will be excused from immediately informing the other person that they are under arrest. These circumstances include:

- if the other person resists arrest or runs away;
- if the circumstances of the arrest are such that it is apparent to the other person that they are under arrest;
- if the other person is unable to understand that they are under arrest because of disability, intoxication or lack of English language skills, as long as the police officer does all that a reasonable person would do in such circumstances.

In these circumstances, the other person must be informed that they are under arrest at the earliest reasonable opportunity.

[Summarise evidence and arguments about whether NOA communicated that the arrestee was under arrest.]

Communication of reason for arrest

The [insert number] way in which the prosecution can prove that NOA was not performing a lawful arrest is to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA did not communicate the reason for the arrest.

The accused did not need to use precise or technical language. It is sufficient if NOA informed NOC of the facts constituting the alleged offence.

[If there is evidence to suggest that the accused was prevented in any way from communicating the reason for the arrest, add the following shaded section.]

In certain circumstances, a police officer will be excused from immediately informing the other person of the reason for the arrest. These circumstances include:

- if the other person resists arrest or runs away
- if the circumstances of the arrest are such that the offence or reason for arrest is apparent to the other person;
- if the other person is unable to understand the reason because of disability, intoxication or lack of English language skills, as long as the police officer does all that a reasonable person would do in such circumstances.

In these circumstances, the other person must be informed of the reason for the arrest at the earliest reasonable opportunity.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Use of force not disproportionate to objective of arrest

The [insert number] way in which the prosecution can prove that NOA was not performing a lawful arrest is to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA used excessive force.

The right to use force for the purpose of an arrest only authorises using the amount of force reasonably necessary to carry out the arrest. The force must not be disproportionate to the objective of the arrest.

For this component, you must look at whether the force used was disproportionate objectively. That is, you decide whether the force used was proportionate. You are not deciding whether NOA thought the force used was proportionate.

[Summarise evidence and arguments about force used to effect arrest.]

Relate law to the evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, for this element, the prosecution must prove that NOA was not exercising a lawful power of arrest. Based on the evidence, this means the prosecution must prove that NOA:

[Identify only those matters that are in issue:

- was not a police officer;
- did not believe on reasonable grounds that NOC had committed an [indictable offence in Victoria/offence elsewhere which would be an indictable offence in Victoria];
- did not inform NOC that he or she was under arrest;
- did not inform NOC of the reason for the arrest; or
- did not only use force that was proportionate to the objective of the arrest.]

Unless you find that the prosecution has disproved one or more of these matters beyond reasonable doubt, you must find NOA not guilty of [insert offence].

Remember, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused acted without lawful excuse by showing that he/she was not performing a lawful arrest. NOA does not need to prove that [he/she] was performing a lawful arrest.

Last updated: 17 May 2019

8.14.3 Charge: Protective Services Officer Arrest Due to an Indictable Offence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

[This charge is designed to be given as part of the "without lawful excuse" element in 7.4.17.1 Charge: False Imprisonment or 7.4.8.1 Charge: Assault – Application of Force where there is evidence from which a jury might infer that the accused was acting in accordance with Crimes Act 1958 s 459 to perform a lawful arrest. Where lawful arrest is raised in relation to other offences, it should be adapted as required.

If the case involves a police officer, see 8.14.1 Charge: Police arrest due to an indictable offence*.*

If the basis for the lawful arrest relates to Crimes Act 1958 s 458, see 8.14.2 Charge: Arrest when person found committing an offence.]

Lawful excuse

This element relates to the argument that NOA was performing a lawful arrest when s/he [insert relevant act].

To explain this element, I'm first going to give you some background on the power of protective services officers to arrest a person, and then explain the legal components of a lawful arrest.

Background

As a free and democratic society, all people are protected from arbitrary arrest and detention. While the law gives protective services officers certain powers as part of their role, including the power to arrest a person, that power can only be exercised in limited and defined circumstances.

An arrest occurs when a protective services officer has made it plain to another person that the other person is no longer a free person. As part of this, the protective services officer must inform the other person that the person is arrested and the reason for the arrest. This is often done by saying something like "Mr Smith, I am arresting you on suspicion of committing" and then identifying the crime in question.

It is not always necessary to spell this out. In some cases, it may be obvious from the circumstances why the person is being arrested, such as if the person is in the process of committing an offence. It is also not necessary to immediately inform the other person if that other person makes it impractical to do so, such as by running away. When informing the other person, the protective services officer does not need to use technical or precise language. The focus is on whether the other person has been adequately informed of the reason for the arrest.

As I said, an arrest involves making it plain that the other person is not free to go. If a protective services officer gives the impression that the other person is free to refuse a request, or free to leave, then there is no arrest. In other words, whether there is an arrest may depend on the words and actions of those involved, and the surrounding circumstances.

One limit on the power to arrest a person is that there must be a valid reason for the arrest. A desire to question a person is not a valid reason.

Components of lawful arrest

I'm now going to explain the components of a lawful arrest.

The accused will have lawfully arrested NOC if:

- NOA was a protective services officer;
- NOA delivered NOC to the custody of a police officer as soon as practicable;
- NOC was at or in the vicinity of a designated place;
- NOA believed on reasonable grounds that the other person has committed an [indictable offence in Victoria/offence elsewhere which would be an indictable offence in Victoria];
- NOA, where possible, informed NOC that [he/she] was under arrest;
- NOA, where possible, informed NOC of the reason for the arrest; and
- any force the accused used was proportionate.

To prove that NOA was acting without lawful excuse, the prosecution must disprove at least one of these seven components of a lawful arrest.

The prosecution argues that the [identify component numbers, e.g. "first and third"] components of a lawful excuse did not exist. I will now explain those components in more detail.

Note: The judge should only direct on those parts of a lawful arrest which are in issue.

Protective Services Officer

The [insert number] way in which the prosecution can prove that NOA was not performing a lawful arrest is to prove, beyond reasonable doubt that NOA is not a protective services officer.

[Summarise evidence and arguments relating to whether NOA was a protective services officer.]

Delivery to police officer

The [insert number] way in which the prosecution can prove that NOA was not performing a lawful arrest is to prove that NOA did not deliver NOC to the custody of a police officer as soon as practicable.

[Summarise evidence and arguments about whether NOC was delivered to the custody of a police officer as soon as practicable.]

Designated place

The [insert number] way in which the prosecution can prove that NOA was not performing a lawful arrest is to prove that NOC was not at or in the vicinity of a "designated place".

The law states that protective services officers can only exercise powers of arrest at certain designated places. In this case, the relevant designated place is [identify relevant evidence concerning a designated place].

The prosecution argues that NOC was not at or in the vicinity of [identify designated place].

[Summarise evidence and arguments about whether NOC was at or in the vicinity of a designated place.]

Belief on reasonable grounds that complainant has committed an indictable offence

The [insert number] way in which the prosecution can prove that NOA was not performing a lawful arrest is to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA did not believe on reasonable grounds that NOC committed an [indictable offence in Victoria/offence elsewhere which would be an indictable offence in Victoria].

This component looks at the reason for the arrest. You are looking both at what NOA believed, and whether he/she had a reasonable basis for that belief.

There is an important difference between a belief and a suspicion. The accused must have actually believed that NOC had committed an indictable offence. A state of mind such as "I think s/he might have committed an offence" or "I suspect s/he has committed an offence" is not sufficient. A belief means thinking something is true, even if there is still some uncertainty. A belief is a more certain state of mind than a suspicion, but does not depend on concrete proof.

There must also be reasonable grounds for that belief. This means that the accused must have known facts which would be sufficient to cause a reasonable person to also believe that the other person had committed an offence.

Finally, the accused must have believed that the other person had committed an [indictable offence in Victoria/offence elsewhere which would be an indictable offence in Victoria]. A general belief that the other person had done something wrong is not enough. The accused must have believed on reasonable grounds that the other person had committed a specific offence, such as [identify relevant offences]. I direct you as a matter of law that [identify relevant offences] are [Victorian indictable offences/offences that would be indictable offences if committed in Victoria].

[If relevant, add the following shaded section on arrest for a collateral purpose.]

When you are considering this issue, you must look at NOA's real reason for the arrest. You have heard the prosecutor argue that [refer to prosecution case on collateral reason for arrest]. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that NOA only arrested NOC because [insert collateral reason], and later invented the explanation that NOC was [identify relevant offence], then the prosecution have proved that NOA did not believe, at the time of the arrest, that NOC had committed an [indictable offence in Victoria/offence elsewhere which would be an indictable offence in Victoria].

[Summarise evidence and arguments about whether NOA believed on reasonable grounds that NOC committed an indictable offence in Victoria/an offence elsewhere that would be an indictable offence in Victoria.]

If you are satisfied NOA did not believe NOC had committed an [indictable offence in Victoria/offence elsewhere which would be an indictable offence in Victoria] or that NOA did not have a reasonable basis for that belief, then you must find that NOA was not performing a lawful arrest.

Communication of arrest

The [insert number] way in which the prosecution can prove that NOA was not performing a lawful arrest is to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA did not communicate to NOC that [he/she] was being arrested.

NOA must have done everything a reasonable person in the circumstances would have done to inform NOC that [he/she] was under arrest. NOC must have understood that the [he/she] was acting under compulsion and not voluntarily.

[If there is evidence to suggest that the accused was prevented in any way from communicating to the other person that they were under arrest, add the following shaded section.]

In certain circumstances, a protective services officer will be excused from immediately informing the NOC that they are under arrest. These circumstances include:

- if the other person resists arrest or runs away;
- if the circumstances of the arrest are such that it is apparent to the other person that they are under arrest;
- if the other person is unable to understand that they are under arrest because of disability, intoxication or lack of English language skills, as long as the protective services officer does all that a reasonable person would do in such circumstances

In these circumstances, the other person must be informed that they are under arrest at the earliest reasonable opportunity.

[Summarise evidence and arguments about whether NOA communicated that the arrestee was under arrest.]

Communication of reason for arrest

The [insert number] way in which the prosecution can prove that NOA was not performing a lawful arrest is to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA did not communicate the reason for the arrest.

The accused did not need to use precise or technical language. It is sufficient if NOA informed NOC of the facts constituting the alleged offence.

[If there is evidence to suggest that the accused was prevented in any way from communicating the reason for the arrest, add the following shaded section.]

In certain circumstances, a protective services officer will be excused from immediately informing the other person of the reason for the arrest. These circumstances include:

- if the other person resists arrest or runs away;
- if the circumstances of the arrest are such that the offence or reason for arrest is apparent to the other person;
- if the other person is unable to understand the reason because of disability, intoxication or lack of English language skills, as long as the protective services officer does all that a reasonable person would do in such circumstances

In these circumstances, the other person must be informed of the reason for the arrest at the earliest reasonable opportunity.

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Use of force not disproportionate to objective of arrest

The [insert number] way in which the prosecution can prove that NOA was not performing a lawful arrest is to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA used excessive force.

The right to use force for the purpose of an arrest only authorises using the amount of force reasonably necessary to carry out the arrest. The force must not be disproportionate to the objective of the arrest.

For this component, you must look at whether the force used was disproportionate objectively. That is, you decide whether the force used was proportionate. You are not deciding whether NOA thought the force used was proportionate.

[Summarise evidence and arguments about force used to effect arrest.]

Relate law to the evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, for this element, the prosecution must prove that NOA was not exercising a lawful power of arrest. Based on the evidence, this means the prosecution must prove that NOA:

[Identify only those matters that are in issue:

- was not a protective services officer;
- did not deliver NOC to the custody of a police officer as soon as practicable;
- did not arrest NOC at or in the vicinity of a designated place;
- did not believe on reasonable grounds that NOC had committed an [indictable offence in Victoria/offence elsewhere which would be an indictable offence in Victoria];
- did not inform NOC that he or she was under arrest;
- did not inform NOC of the reason for the arrest; or
- did not only use force that was proportionate to the objective of the arrest.]

Unless you find that the prosecution has disproved one or more of these matters beyond reasonable doubt, you must find NOA not guilty of [insert offence].

Remember, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused acted without lawful excuse by showing that he/she was not performing a lawful arrest. NOA does not need to prove that [he/she] was performing a lawful arrest.

Last updated: 17 May 2019

8.15 Police Search and Seizure Powers without a Warrant

Click here for a word version of this document

Introduction

1. Police officers' powers of search and seizure in relation to persons, goods and land are circumscribed in the absence of an authorising warrant.

2. Interferences with one's person or possessions are presumed to be a grave infringement of elementary common law rights and may engage the doctrine of trespass to person or goods. The mere fact that a person is a police officer does not justify such an interference (Trobrudge v Hardy [1955] 94 CLR 147, 152).
3. Similarly, police officers are subject to the law regarding trespass to land and require authority or consent to enter private premises (Mackay v Abrahams [1916] VLR 681, 684; Plenty v Dillon (1991) 171 CLR 635, [4]).
4. One statutory exception to this principle is found in s 459A of the Crimes Act 1958, which authorises entry onto private premises for the purpose of arresting a person in accordance with ss 458 or 459 of the Crimes Act 1958, where the police officer believes on reasonable grounds the person has committed a serious indictable offence or has escaped from legal custody. See 8.14 Powers of arrest, for information on these provisions.
5. Police search and seizure powers generally arise in three circumstances:
    - Search incidental to an arrest;
    - Search and seizure of stolen goods;
    - Specific statutory powers.
6. Recent cases have also considered whether there is a broader power to conduct investigative searches in relation to serious offences.
7. Where it arises as an issue, the lawfulness of a search will need to be determined before the possible exclusion of the evidence under Evidence Act 2008 s 138 is considered. It is only if the court decides that the search was unlawful that s 138 may be engaged (McElroy & Wallace v The Queen [2018] 55 VR 450, [116]).

Search and seizure incidental to an arrest

8. Police officers are authorised to search persons and premises when executing an arrest and to seize material for evidentiary purposes (Field v Sullivan [1923] VLR 12; Reeves (a Pseudonym) v The Queen [2017] VSCA 291).
9. Articles may only be seized for evidentiary purposes (Reeves (a Pseudonym) v The Queen [2017] VSCA 291, [30]). The officer must believe that the item constitutes material evidence relevant to the same crime for which the arrest is being carried out (McElroy & Wallace v The Queen [2018] 55 VR 450, [110]).
10. If an officer enters premises for the purposes of arresting someone and subsequently arrests a different person, goods may only be seized from those premises that will be used for evidence regarding the crime for which the second person is arrested (McElroy & Wallace v The Queen [2018] 55 VR 450, [110]).
11. The arrest and seizure of goods must be sufficiently close in time so as to be regarded as 'incidental to, and part of, the same operation as the arrest' (Field v Sullivan [1923] VLR 70, 81). This may permit seizures that occur later on the same day as the arrest (Reeves (a Pseudonym) v The Queen [2017] VSCA 291, [30]).
12. This temporal relationship does not require that the arrest and seizure occur simultaneously. The law recognises the 'physical exigencies' of police operations (Field v Sullivan [1923] VLR 70, 81).

What is permitted when searching a person under arrest?

13. A police officer has a common law duty to take reasonable measures to prevent a person in custody from harming themselves or others or destroying or disposing of evidence. This often involves a search of the person's clothes and body. Such a search is called a 'safety and evidence search' (Botton v Winn (Supreme Court of Victoria, J H Phillips J, 18 December 1987); Director of Public Prosecutions v Tupper (2018) 55 VR 720, [35]).

14. What amounts to a reasonable method of discharging this duty will turn on the circumstances of the case and should ordinarily involve the person being informed of the reasons for the search (Botton v Winn (Supreme Court of Victoria, J H Phillips J, 18 December 1987)).

15. In certain circumstances, this common law power may involve requiring the person to remove some or all of their clothes (Botton v Winn (Supreme Court of Victoria, J H Phillips J, 18 December 1987)).

16. Officers conducting such searches must weigh the affront to a person's dignity against the desirability of preserving and protecting evidence and persons (Director of Public Prosecutions v Tupper (2018) 55 VR 720, [37]).

17. The common law power to conduct a safety and evidence search does not permit forensic procedures. Police officers who wish to take a sample from a person, conduct a procedure on the person or make a physical examination of the person must comply with the requirements imposed by Crimes Act 1958 ss 464R, 464U and 464Y.

Seizure of stolen goods

18. Police officers are entitled to seize stolen goods from a person provided the seizure occurs without force, violence or otherwise unlawful conduct (Dalton v McNaughton (1903) 29 VLR 144, 151).

19. This does not include a power to search a person or premises for stolen goods. The police officers must be able to identify and reach the goods without trespass to land or individuals (Laurens & Anor v Willers [2002] WASCA 183, [45]).

Statutory powers independent of an arrest

20. Police officers are empowered under s 82 of the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981 to search a person or vehicle in a public space provided the police officer has reasonable grounds for suspecting that the person possesses a drug of dependence or psychoactive substance or that any such substance are in the vehicle.

21. The test for establishing that the suspicion is based on reasonable grounds has two elements. First, the suspicion must have actually been held. The second element is objective – The circumstances must have been of a kind that would raise a suspicion in the mind of a reasonable person. A suspicion is a 'positive or actual apprehension or mistrust' that requires more than a 'mere idle wondering' (Murray, Hale and Olsen (Pseudonyms) v The Queen [2017] VSCA 236, [62] citing Queensland Bacon Pty Ltd v Rees (1966) 115 CLR 266, [4]).

22. Section 82 should be construed as balancing the need for an effective criminal justice system against the desirability of protecting individuals from arbitrary interferences with their person and property (Murray, Hale and Olsen (Pseudonyms) v The Queen [2017] VSCA 236, [62]).

23. Section 82 is not restricted to circumstances in which a warrant cannot be acquired under s 81. Section 81(7) expressly provides that the section has no bearing on the powers conferred by s 82.

24. There is authority, though obiter, to suggest that s 82 powers could possibly extend to confiscating a person's vehicle for the purposes of a later search to be conducted at a police station. Whether this obiter will be confirmed is a question for future determination (GA, MM and PJ v The Queen [2012] VSCA 44, [13]).

25. Police officers have a broad power to enter premises if they believe on reasonable grounds that a person has assaulted or threatened to assault a family member or is in contravention of a family violence intervention order, family violence safety notice or a personal safety intervention order (Family Violence Protection Act 2008 s 157; Personal Safety Intervention Orders Act 2010 s 114).

26. There is also a limited power for a police officer, authorised by another officer of inspector rank or higher, to enter private premises and search for stolen goods. This power can only be exercised if the person occupying the premises has been convicted in the last five years of handling stolen goods or has been sentenced to imprisonment for another dishonesty offence, or if a person has been convicted in the last five years of handling stolen goods has been in occupation of the premises within the past 12 months (Crimes Act 1958 s 92(2)).
27. Other statutory powers include:
    - A power to search where there are reasonable grounds to suspect the person has weapons in their possession (Control of Weapons Act 1990 s 10);
    - A power to search for firearms where there are reasonable grounds to suspect the person is committing or about to commit a Firearms Act offence and that he or she has a firearm or ammunition in their possession (Firearms Act 1996 s 149);
    - A power to search any person on court premises (Court Security Act 1980 s 3).[1227]

The chance discovery principle

28. Search warrants authorise police officers to enter and search private premises in order to seize goods listed in the warrant.
29. The common law extends these powers to the seizure of goods unlisted in the warrant that serve as evidence of serious offences (Siddique v Martin (2016) 51 VR 564 577, [32]; McElroy & Wallace v The Queen [2018] 55 VR 450, [114]).
30. This is known as the 'chance discovery' rule (Siddique v Martin (2016) 51 VR 564 577, [24]).
31. Goods seized under the chance discovery rule must be 'adventitiously found' in the execution of a search warrant. The rule does not confer independent rights of entry or search (R v Applebee (1995) 79 A Crim R 554, 8; Siddique v Martin (2016) 51 VR 564 577, [24]).
32. Goods may only be seized in this manner if a police officer holds a reasonable belief that the goods constitute evidence of a serious offence (Siddique v Martin (2016) 51 VR 564 577, [22])
33. Once all items listed in a warrant have been seized, the powers conferred by that warrant expire and no further goods may be seized, even if officers believe they are evidence of a serious offence (Siddique v Martin (2016) 51 VR 564 577, [24]).
34. Goods seized in this manner are said to have been seized under the warrant that authorised the relevant entry and search (Siddique v Martin (2016) 51 VR 564 577, [34]).
35. The scope of this common law power is situational and is to be characterised and delimited with reference to the relevant warrant (Siddique v Martin (2016) 51 VR 564 577, [32]).

General common law powers of search and seizure

36. Historically, Victorian cases stated that there were no common law powers of search and seizure beyond those conferred incidental to an arrest, a search warrant or in instances of seizing stolen goods (Levine v O'Keefe [1930] VLR 70, 72).
37. Investigating breaches of the peace or threats to breach the peace did not suffice to justify police interference with persons, goods or land in the absence of statutory authority (Kuru v New South Wales (2008) 236 CLR 1, [47]).

[1227] For other statutory search powers, see Gambling Regulation Act 2003 s 2.5.38; Graffiti Prevention Act 2007 s 13; Radiation Act 2005 s 74.

38. Similarly, there was no power for seizure solely on the basis of a reasonable belief that goods could form material evidence of a crime (Ozzie Discount Software (Aust) Pty Ltd v Muling (1996) 86 A Crim R 387, 395).

39. However, recent Victorian judgments have entertained discussions that suggest that the law may be straying from this approach.

40. Osborn J in obiter in Goldberg v Brown suggested that the UK decision of Ghani v Jones [1970] 1 QB 693 was applicable in Victoria (Goldberg v Brown [2003] VSC 104, [4]).

41. In Ghani v Jones, Lord Denning MR found that an assessment of the lawfulness of a seizure disconnected from an arrest requires the weighing up of the freedom and privacy of an individual against the public interest in repressing crime. His Honour identified five requirements that govern a lawful seizure of goods in these circumstances:

    i) Officers must believe on reasonable grounds that an offence has occurred that is of such gravity that it is of first importance that the offenders be brought to justice.

    ii) Officers must believe on reasonable grounds that the articles to be seized constitute material evidence to prove the commission of the serious offence.

    iii) The person in possession of the article being seized must be someone whom the officers believe on reasonable grounds is implicated in the crime.

    iv) The police are not permitted to retain the seized articles for longer than is reasonably necessary to complete their investigations or to create a copy of it.

    v) These requirements must be assessed at the time of the seizure and are unaffected by any subsequent events (Ghani v Jones [1970] 1 QB 693, 708–709).

42. These principles represent the outer limits of police powers of seizure considered in the United Kingdom and do not permit police offers to interfere with one's person or property simply to see if they have committed a crime (Ghani v Jones [1970] 1 QB 693, 707).

43. In Siddique v Martin (2016) 51 VR 564, the Crown argued that Ghani v Jones [1970] 1 QB 693 was good law in Victoria. While the Supreme Court noted that it was 'prepared to assume' in favour of the Crown, it was not necessary to decide the point as the case concerned the operation of the chance discovery rule when exercising a search warrant (at 574).

44. The most recent consideration of the principles can be found McElroy & Wallace v The Queen [2018] 55 VR 450. The Court acknowledged that the factual matrix before it mirrored the circumstances in which the Ghani v Jones principles might apply. However, as the Crown did not offer evidence for the proposition that the Court should follow Ghani v Jones [1970] 1 QB 693, the Court declined to rule on the matter (at [111]). Instead, the seizure was presumed to be unlawful given the lack of warrant or arrest connected to the evidentiary purpose of the seized goods (at [117]).

Ghani v Jones outside of Victoria

45. Outside Victoria there have been conflicting decisions on whether courts should adopt the Ghani v Jones approach (Laurens v Willers [2002] WASCA 183; Challenge Plastics Pty Ltd v Collector of Customs (1993) 42 FCR 397 (at [44]); c.f. GH Photography Pty Ltd v McGarrigle [1974] 2 NSWLR 635; Rowell v Larter (1986) 6 NSWLR 21; Tye v Commissioner of Police (1995) 84 A Crim R 147; Island Way Pty Ltd v Redmond [1990] 1 Qd R 431).

Last updated: 28 August 2019

9 Commonwealth Offences

9.1 Commonwealth Drug Offences

9.1.1 Trafficking Controlled Drugs

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Trafficking Offence Provisions

1. Division 302 of the Criminal Code (Cth) establishes three trafficking offences:
    - Section 302.2: trafficking commercial quantities of controlled drugs
    - Section 302.3: trafficking marketable quantities of controlled drugs
    - Section 302.4: trafficking controlled drugs
2. For information on importation or exportation of controlled drugs, see 9.1.2 Importing/Exporting Border Controlled Drugs and Plants.
3. Unless stated otherwise, all references in this topic are to sections of the Criminal Code.

Relationship with State Legislation

4. Trafficking offences also exist under the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981 (Vic) ('Drugs Act'). For detail on these offences see 7.6.1 Trafficking in a Drug of Dependence.
5. State and Territory law operates concurrently with Division 302 (s 300.4; Buckman v R [2013] NSWCCA 258; see generally Momcilovic v R (2011) 245 CLR 1).

Commencement Information and Amendments

6. These three trafficking offences were inserted into the Criminal Code by the Law and Justice Legislation Amendment (Serious Drug Offences and Other Measures) Act 2005 (Cth). Each of the provisions commenced operation 6 December 2005.
7. Commencing 20 February 2010, s 302.6(a) was amended to provide that a purchaser of a serious drug is not liable as a joint offender under s 11.2A (Crimes Legislation Amendment (Serious and Organised Crime) Act 2010 (Cth) s 3 sch 4 item 12).
8. Commencing 28 May 2013, the following amendments relating to Division 302 came into force:
    - The list of controlled drugs was removed from Division 314 and proscribed under the Criminal Code Regulations 2002 (Cth) sch 3 (Crimes Legislation Amendment (Serious Drugs, Identity Crime and Other Measures) Act 2012 (Cth) s 3 sch 1 item 19; Criminal Code Amendment Regulation 2013 (No. 1) 2013 (Cth) r 4 sch 1 item 3).
    - The inclusion of a 'drug analogue' as a controlled drug was removed from Division 314 and is now proscribed under s 301.9 (Crimes Legislation Amendment (Serious Drugs, Identity Crime and Other Measures) Act 2012 (Cth) s 3 sch 1 item 16). In conjunction with this move, the new category of 'primary analogue' was created.

Overview of Elements

9. For all offences under Division 302, the following elements must be proved beyond reasonable doubt:
    - The person intentionally traffics in a substance;

- The substance is a controlled drug; and
- The persons is reckless as to the substance being a controlled drug (ss 302.2(1)–(2), 302.3(1)–(2) and s 302.4(1)–(2)).

10. Where the accused has been charged with trafficking a commercial or marketable quantity, the prosecution must also prove that:
    - The person trafficked a 'commercial quantity' (s 302.2(1)(c)); or
    - The person trafficked a 'marketable quantity' (s 302.3(1)(c)).
11. Absolute liability applies to these quantity requirements (ss 302.2(3), 302.3(3)). However, there is a partial defence where the accused makes a mistake as to the quantity of controlled drug they are trafficking (see below [92]–[97]).

The person 'traffics' in a substance and does so 'intentionally'

12. A person 'traffics' a substance if they do any of the following:
    (a) Sell the substance;
    (b) Prepare the substance for supply with the intention of selling any of it or believing that another person intends to sell any of it;
    (c) Transport the substance with the intention of selling any of it or believing that another person intends to sell any of it;
    (d) Guard or conceal the substance with the intention of selling any of it or assisting another person to sell any of it; or
    (e) Possess the substance with the intention of selling any of it (s 302.1(1)(a)–(e)).
13. This definition is exhaustive and excludes the common law meaning of 'trafficks' (Pantazis v The Queen (2012) 268 FLR 121).
14. Giretti trafficking cannot be used to establish trafficking under Division 302. This is because the conceptual basis of Giretti trafficking is that the definition of 'traffick' in the Drugs Act is inclusive (Pantazis v The Queen (2012) 268 FLR 121). The definition of 'traffics' under the Criminal Code focuses on 'specific finite acts' whereas 'trafficks' in the ordinary sense and in the Drugs Act encompasses continuous activity (Pantazis v The Queen (2012) 268 FLR 121; see also 7.6.1 Trafficking in a Drug of Dependence).

A. Sells the substance

15. 'Sell' includes:
    - Barter or exchange
    - Agreeing to sell (s 300.2).
16. In contrast to the definition of 'trafficks' under the Drugs Act, the Criminal Code definition of 'sell' does not include 'offer for sale' (Pantazis v The Queen (2012) 268 FLR 121).
17. As the terms 'barter' and 'exchange' suggest an element of trade for value, 'traffics' does not include 'gratuitous supply'. The Criminal Code treats gratuitous supply, and possession with intent to gratuitously supply, as an offence of possession (Buckman v the Queen (2013) 280 FLR 219).
18. In addition to the physical act of selling a substance, an accused must 'intend' to sell the substance (s 5.6). A person intends to engage in conduct if he or she means to engage in that conduct (s 5.2). Therefore the accused must have 'meant' to sell the substance.
19. Under the common law, agreeing to sell requires the prosecution to prove the defendant:
    (a) Made a genuine agreement to sell a controlled drug to another person;

(b) Intended to make the agreement; and

(c) Intended the agreement or offer to be regarded as genuine by the person to whom it is made (see R v Peirce [1996] 2 VR 215; Gauci v Driscoll [1985] VR 428; R v Addison (1993) 70 A Crim R 213 (NSW CCA); see also 7.6.1 Trafficking in a Drug of Dependence).

B. Prepare the substance for supply with the intention of selling any of it or believing that another person intends to sell any of it

20. 'Preparing a substance for supply' includes:

    (a) Packaging the substance; or

    (b) Separating the substance into discrete units (s 302.1(2)).

21. 'Supply' includes:

    (a) Supply, whether or not by way of sale;

    (b) Agreeing to supply (s 300.2).

22. Two fault elements are required to make out this form of trafficking.

23. First, the accused must 'intend' to prepare the substance for supply. Therefore, the prosecution must prove accused 'meant' to prepare the substance and 'meant' the preparation be for supply (ss 5.2, 5.6).

24. Second, the accused must have had the intention of selling, or belief that another person intends to sell the substance prepared for supply (s 302.1(1)(b)).

25. If the accused has prepared a 'trafficable quantity' of the substance for supply, then they are taken to have the necessary intention or belief concerning the sale of the substance (s 302.5(1)(a)).

26. Schedule 3 of the Criminal Code Regulations 2002 (Cth) specifies the 'trafficable quantity' of each listed drug (s 301.12 item(1)(a)).

27. For drug analogues of listed controlled drug, a trafficable quantity is the smallest trafficable quantity listed in Criminal Code Regulations 2005 (Cth) Schedule 3 for the drugs for which it is an analogue (s 301.12 item 2). In addition, where a drug is made a controlled drug by an Emergency Determination, the Minister may specify the trafficable quantity in the determination (s 301.12 item 1(b)).

28. If a trafficable quantity is involved, then the legal onus is on the accused to prove, on the balance of probabilities, that he or she did not have the necessary intention or belief concerning the sale of the substance (ss 13.5, 302.5(2)).

29. If a trafficable quantity is not involved, the onus is on the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused did have the necessary intention or belief concerning the sale of the substance (ss 13.1(1), 13.2(1)).

30. The prosecution need only prove the accused had a general intention to sell the drug in the future. It is not necessary to prove the accused had a specific buyer in mind (see Reardon v Baker [1987] VR 887).

C. Transport the substance with the intention of selling any of it or believing that another person intends to sell any of it

31. 'Transports' is defined as including delivery (s 300.2). Otherwise, 'transports' has its ordinary meaning.

32. Two fault elements are required to make out this form of trafficking.

33. First, the accused must 'intend' to transport the substance. Therefore, the prosecution must prove accused 'meant' to transport the substance (ss 5.2, 5.6).

34. Second, the accused must have had the intention of selling any of the substance or belief that another person intended to sell any of it (s 302.1(1)(c)).

35. If the accused has transported a 'trafficable quantity' of a substance, then the person is presumed to have the necessary intention or belief concerning the sale of the substance (s 302.5(1)(a)). See above [26]–[30] for details on the operation of this presumption.

D. Guards or conceals the substance with the intention of selling any of it or assisting another person to sell any of it

36. To 'conceal' a substance includes to conceal or disguise:

    (a) the nature, source or location of the substance;

    (b) any movement of the substance;

    (c) the rights of any person with respect to the substance;

    (d) the identity of any owner of the substance (s 300.2).

37. Two fault elements are required to make out this form of trafficking.

38. First, the accused must 'intend' to guard or conceal the substance. Therefore, the prosecution must prove the accused 'meant' to guard or conceal the substance (ss 5.2, 5.6).

39. Second, the accused must have had the intention of selling any of the substance or assisting another person to sell any of it (s 302.1(1)(d)).

40. If the accused has guarded or concealed a 'trafficable quantity' of a substance, then they are presumed to have the necessary intention or belief concerning the sale of the substance (s 302.5(1)(a)). See above [26]–[30] for details on the operation of this presumption.

E. Possesses the substance with the intention of selling any of it

41. 'Possession' is defined in the Criminal Code to include the following:

    (a) Receiving or obtaining possession of the substance;

    (b) Having control over the disposition of the substance (whether or not the thing is in the custody of the person);

    (c) Having joint possession of the substance (s 300.2).

42. At common law, a person has in their possession whatever is, to their knowledge, physically in their custody or under their physical control (see DPP v Brooks [1974] AC 862, 866; He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523; R v Maio [1989] VR 281; R v Mateiasevici [1999] 3 VR 185). Custody for any length of time is sufficient (R v Boyce (1976) 15 SASR 40).

43. Providing the jury with an extensive definition of the concept of possession at common law is not always necessary. The jury should be told only so much of the law as is necessary, having regard to the issues at trial (see R v Clarke and Johnstone [1986] VR 643; R v Mateiasevici [1999] 3 VR 185; R v Bandiera and Licastro [1999] 3 VR 103; R v Tran [2007] VSCA 19).

44. The burden of proving possession rests upon the prosecution (see Momcilovic v R (2011) 245 CLR 1).

45. Two fault elements are required to make out this form of trafficking.

46. First, the accused must 'intend' to possess the substance. Therefore, the prosecution must prove the accused 'meant' to possess the substance (ss 5.2, 5.6).

47. For this element, the prosecution must prove that the accused knew that he or she has the substance under his/her custody or control. Knowledge of the nature of the substance is covered by the third element (see R v Boyesen [1982] AC 768; Campbell v R (2008) 73 NSWLR 272).

48. This approach differs from the common law, the earlier provisions under the Customs Act 1901 (Cth) and the Victorian Drugs Act, which required awareness of the nature of the substance as part of proof of possession. Cases on other provisions and on the common law must therefore be read with caution (see below [57]–[58]; c.f. He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523; Momcilovic v R 245 CLR 1; R v Mario [1989] VR 281).

49. Second, the accused must have possessed the substance with the intention of selling any of the substance (s 302.1(1)(e)).

50. If the accused possessed a 'trafficable quantity' of a substance, then the person is presumed to have the necessary intention or belief concerning the sale of the substance (s 302.5(1)(a)). See above [26]–[30] for details on the operation of this presumption.

The substance is a 'controlled drug'

51. A controlled drug is defined exhaustively as a substance (other than a growing plant) which is either:

    (a) Listed by a regulation as a controlled drug;

    (b) A drug analogue of a listed controlled drug; or

    (c) Determined by the Minister as a controlled drug under s 301.13 (s 301.1(1)).

A. Listed by a regulation as a controlled drug

52. A 'listed' controlled drug is one listed by a regulation made for the purposes of s 301.1(1)(a) (s 300.2).

53. The current 'listed' controlled drugs for the purposes of s 301.1(1)(a) are found in the Criminal Code Regulations 2002 (Cth) Schedule 3 column 1 (Criminal Code Regulations 2002 (Cth) r 5A). This Schedule commenced operation 28 May 2013.

B. A 'drug analogue' of a 'listed' a controlled drug

54. Drug analogues of listed controlled drugs are defined in the same manner as drug analogues of listed border controlled drugs (see 9.1.2 Importing/Exporting Border Controlled Drugs and Plants, [44]–[45]).

C. Determined by the Minister as a controlled drug

55. The Minister may determine that a substance is a controlled drug via an Emergency Determination (s 301.13(1)(a)).[1228]

56. The process, effect and conditions of an Emergency Determinations of controlled drugs are the same as for Emergency Determinations of border controlled drugs and border controlled plants (see 9.1.2 Importing/Exporting Border Controlled Drugs and Plants, [41]–[43]).

[1228] This system of emergency determination replaces the previous system of listing additional drugs as controlled drugs temporarily through interim regulations (which were for a maximum period 12 months) or urgently through emergency determinations (which for a maximum period of 56 days). These changes came into force 28 May 2013 under the Crimes Legislation Amendment (Serious Drugs, Identity Crime and Other Measures) Act 2012 (Cth).

The person was reckless as to the substance being a controlled drug

57. The prosecution must prove that the accused was reckless as to the substance being a controlled drug (ss 302.2(2), 302.3(2), 302.4(2)).

58. See 9.1.2 Importing/Exporting Border Controlled Drugs and Plants, [46]–[54] for information on this element. As noted, there is limited caselaw on the operation of this element and judges should seek submissions from parties in cases where the element is in issue.

Commercial or Marketable Quantity

59. Where a person is prosecuted under ss 302.2 or 302.3 with trafficking a commercial or marketable quantity, the prosecution must prove that the quantity trafficked is a commercial or marketable quantity (ss 302.2(1)(c), 302.3(1)(c)).

60. For controlled drugs, commercial and marketable quantity are defined under ss 301.10 and 301.11 (see 9.1.2 Importing/Exporting Border Controlled Drugs and Plants, [54]–[58]. For drug analogues of controlled drugs, the relevant quantities are defined under item 2 of ss 301.10, 301.11).

61. The list of commercial quantities of controlled drugs is found in Criminal Code Regulations 2002 (Cth) Schedule 3 column 2 (Criminal Code Regulations 2002 (Cth) r 5A(2)).

62. The list of marketable quantities of controlled drugs is found in Criminal Code Regulations 2002 (Cth) Schedule 3 column 3 (Criminal Code Regulations 2002 (Cth) r 5A(3)).

63. For guidance as to how to determine quantity in specific circumstances, see below [65]–[82].

Fault element as to quantity

64. While absolute liability applies to the quantity requirements (ss 302.2(3), 302.3(3)), s 313.4 creates a partial defence in relation to mistake as to quantity (see below [92]–[97]).

Provisions Relevant to Determining Quantity

65. The following provisions may be relevant in determining if the quantity requirements are satisfied:

- Combining different parcels on the same occasion – s 311.1
- Combining parcels from multiple offences – s 311.8
- Combining parcels from organised commercial activity – s 311.2
- Calculating quantity of drugs in mixtures – s 312.1
- Calculating quantity of several drugs in mixtures – s 312.2

A. Combining quantities of drugs

66. If on the same occasion, a person traffics in different parcels of controlled drugs, the person may be charged with a single offence against Part 9.1 in respect of all or any of those different parcels (s 311.1(1)(a)).

67. See 9.1.2 Importing/Exporting Border Controlled Drugs and Plants, [62]–[65].

B. Combining parcels from multiple offences

68. The prosecution may prove a Division 302 trafficking offence by proving:

    (a) The defendant committed offences against Division 302 on different occasions;

(b) Each offence was committed within 7 days from another offence; and

(c) In total, the relevant quantity of a controlled drug or combination of drugs was trafficked during the commission of the offences (s 311.8).

69. For general rules on combining parcels from multiple offences see 9.1.2 Importing/Exporting Border Controlled Drugs and Plants, [66]–[69].

70. This provision differs from Giretti trafficking under the Victorian Drugs Act. Instead of allowing a charge based on a course of conduct, s 311.8 requires proof multiple offences against Division 302. This provision provides a narrower basis for aggregating quantities than allowed under Victorian law where trafficking is alleged on a Giretti basis, as each offence must be separately proved (Pantazis v The Queen (2012) 268 FLR 121).

71. Where different kinds of controlled drug are trafficked, see below [80]–[82].

C. Combining quantities from organised commercial activities

72. A commercial or marketable quantity can be made out if the prosecution proves:

(a) The defendant was engaged in an organised commercial activity that involved repeated trafficking in controlled drugs, and

(b) The relevant quantity of a controlled drug or combination of drugs was trafficked in the course of that activity (s 311.2(1)).

73. The prosecution does not need to specify the exact dates of trafficking or quantity of drug trafficked on each occasion (s 311.2(2)).

74. Where the prosecution seeks to rely on this provision to aggregate quantities, the presumption that a person intends to sell or intends another to sell a quantity over a trafficable quantity does not apply. The prosecution must actually prove that the defendant was involved in the organised commercial activity and had the requisite commercial intention (s 311.2(3); compare s 302.5)

75. Unlike s 311.8, which allows prosecutors to combine parcels of drugs trafficked on separate occasions, there is no time restriction over which the organised commercial activity takes place.

76. Where different kinds of controlled drug are trafficked, see below [80]–[82] (s 311.2 Note 1).

77. This provision only assists in proving the relevant quantity of controlled drug has been trafficked (Pantazis v The Queen (2012) 268 FLR 121). It therefore, differs from Giretti Trafficking under the Victorian Drugs Act (see above [70]).

D. Calculating quantities of drugs in mixtures

78. When a controlled drug is within a mixture, the prosecution must prove the mixture contains the relevant quantity of the controlled drug in pure form (s 312.1(1)(a)).[1229]

79. This approach differs from the approach under the Victorian Drugs Act where minimum quantities of mixtures are provided in addition to minimum quantities of pure drugs.

[1229] Section 312.1(1)(b) purports to provide another means by which the prosecution can prove the quantity requirement, however it refers to division 314 which is now repealed (effective 28 May 2013).

E. Calculating quantities where different kinds of drugs are involved

80. If the accused is charged with a single offence involving trafficking in more than one kind of controlled drug, then the quantity of drugs is a trafficable, marketable or commercial quantity if the sum of the requisite fractions of the trafficable, marketable or commercial quantity of each of those drugs is equal to or greater than one (s 312.2(2)).

81. See 9.1.2 Importing/Exporting Border Controlled Drugs and Plants, [80] for an example of the calculation of the requite fraction.

82. When a controlled drug is within a mixture of substances, the requisite fraction is calculated on the basis of the quantity of the controlled drug in pure form (s 312.2(4)(a)).[1230]

Defences

83. Two defences under Division 313 apply to all trafficking offences in Division 302:

    - Conduct justified or excused by or under a law (s 313.1);
    - Reasonable belief that conduct justified or excused by or under a law (s 313.2).

84. The defendant bears the evidential burden of proof in relation to these defences (ss 13.3(3), 313.1 Note 1, 313.2 Note). To satisfy the burden the defendant must adduce or point to evidence that suggests a reasonable possibility that the conduct was justified or excused (for s 313.1) or they had a reasonable belief the conduct was justified or excused (for s 313.2) (s 13.3(6)).

A. Conduct justified or excused by or under a law

85. The trafficking offences do not apply in relation to conduct engaged in a State or Territory and justified or excused by or under a law of the State or Territory (s 313.1).

86. In addition, no criminal responsibility exists if the person's conduct was justified or excused by or under another Commonwealth law (s 313.1 Note 2).

B. Reasonable belief that conduct justified or excused by or under a law

87. No criminal responsibility exists if:

    (a) At the time of the conduct constituting the offence, the person was under a mistaken but reasonable belief that the conduct was justified or excused by or under a law of the Commonwealth or of a State or Territory; and

    (b) Had the conduct been so justified or excused – the conduct would not have constituted the offence (s 313.2).

88. See 9.1.2 Importing/Exporting of Border Controlled Drugs and Plants, [90]–[95].

Alternative Verdicts

89. Three alternative verdicts under Division 313 apply to all trafficking offences in Division 302:

    - Proof of alternative offence (s 313.3);
    - Mistake as to quantity of drug (s 313.4); and [1230] Section 312.2(4)(b) purports to provide another means by which the requisite fraction can be calculated, however it refers to division 314 which is now repealed (effective 28 May 2013).

- Mistake as to identity of drug (s 313.5).

A. Proof of alternative offence

90. If the jury is not satisfied that the defendant is guilty of the alleged offence but is satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the defendant is guilty of another offence against Part 9.1, they may find the defendant not guilty of the alleged offence but guilty of the other offence (s 313.3).

91. See 9.1.2 Importing/Exporting of Border Controlled Drugs and Plants, [96]–[97].

B. Mistake as to quantity of the drug

92. A partial defence in relation to mistake of quantity is available where the defendant is charged with an offence involving a commercial or marketable quantity of a controlled drug and:

    (a) The defendant proves that, at the time of the alleged offence, he or she was under a mistaken belief about the quantity of the drug;

    (b) If the mistaken belief had been correct, the defendant would have been guilty of another offence against Part 9.1; and

    (c) The maximum penalty for the other offence is less than the maximum penalty for the alleged offence (s 313.4(2)(a)–(c)).

93. If the three conditions set out in s 313.4(2)(a)–(c) are met, the jury may find the defendant not guilty of the alleged offence (s 313.4(2)(d)) and guilty of the other offence (s 313.3(2)(e)).

94. The defendant bears a legal burden in relation to the mistaken belief element under s 313.4(2)(a) (s 13.4(b)). The defendant must prove these matters on the balance of probabilities (s 13.5).

95. The effect of this defence is to allow the accused to be convicted of a less serious offence where they intended to traffic in a lesser quantity (Luong v DPP (Cth) (2013) 46 VR 780).

96. There is no requirement that the belief be reasonable (see s 313.4). However, whether the belief was reasonable will likely be relevant to determining whether the accused actually held the belief (see, in the context of sexual offences, DPP v Morgan [1976] AC 182; R v Ev Costa 2/4/1997 CA Vic; R v Saragozza [1984] VR 187; R v Zilm (2006) 14 VR 11).

97. There is no specific requirement that the defendant considered the exact quantity of drug they were trafficking (see generally s 313.4). However, it is necessary for the defendant to show they actually formed a belief as to quantity (s 313.4(2)(a)).

C. Mistake as to identity of the drug

98. This defence applies if:

    (a) The defendant proves that, at the time of the alleged offence, he or she was under a mistaken belief about the identity of the drug;

    (b) If the mistaken belief had been correct, the defendant would have been guilty of another offence against Part 9.1; and

    (c) The maximum penalty for the other offence is less than the maximum penalty for the alleged offence (ss 313.5(2)(a)–(c)).

99. Where this defence is relied upon, the court will need to consider whether the quantity of drug the accused believed that he or she was trafficking, rather than the drug they were actually trafficking, was commercial or marketable.

100. For example, if a person is accused of trafficking 11kg of Oxycodone (commercial quantity of 5kg), but believed that he was trafficking in Opium (commercial quantity of 20kg), then if the accused can prove that belief on the balance of probabilities, then the jury may find the accused not guilty of trafficking a commercial quantity of a controlled drug and guilty of trafficking a marketable quantity of controlled drug (Opium – marketable quantity of 10kg).

101. The partial defences of mistake of quantity and mistake of identity may both operate where a person believes that they are trafficking in a reduced quantity of a different drug to that which is proved. If established on the balance of probabilities, then the accused may be convicted on the basis of their mistaken belief(s).

Last updated: 23 March 2015

9.1.1.1 Charge: Trafficking Marketable or Commercial Quantities of Controlled Drugs

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge may be used when the accused is charged with the following:

i) Trafficking commercial quantities controlled drugs under s 302.2.

ii) Trafficking marketable quantities controlled drugs under s 302.3.

This charge is designed for use where it is alleged the accused trafficked a commercial or marketable quantity by selling a controlled drug. It must be adapted if the prosecution argues the accused trafficked a controlled drug in one of the other ways listed in 302.1.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the offence of trafficking a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a controlled drug.

To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following four elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused intentionally trafficked in a substance.

Two – the substance trafficked was a controlled drug.

Three – the accused was reckless as to the substance trafficked being a controlled drug.

Four – the accused trafficked a [commercial/marketable] quantity of the controlled drug.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Traffics

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intentionally trafficked in a substance.

The prosecution has argued that NOA trafficked by selling the substance. In order for this form of trafficking be made out, the prosecution must prove two matters beyond reasonable doubt:

First, the prosecution must prove the accused sold the substance. NOA will have sold the substance if the prosecution proves there was an exchange or agreement to sell. Money does not necessarily have to change hands but giving something away for free does not constitute selling.

Second, the prosecution must prove the accused intended to sell the substance. This means that the accused meant to sell the substance. For this element, you are not required to consider if the accused knew of the nature of the substance. That is the third element.

Intention is a state of mind. To determine the accused's state of mind, the prosecution invites you to draw an inference as to the accused's state of mind from certain facts. You will remember what I told you earlier about drawing inferences.[1231]

[Set out the facts and discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

Controlled drug

The second element the prosecution must prove is that the substance trafficked was a controlled drug.

You have heard evidence from [identify relevant witness] that the substance that the accused is alleged to have sold was [identify relevant controlled drug]. I direct you as a matter of law that [identify relevant controlled drug] is a controlled drug.

The defence has argued that [identify relevant defence evidence and arguments regarding whether the substance is a controlled drug].

If you are not satisfied that the substance that the accused is alleged to have sold was [identify relevant controlled drug], then you must find the accused not guilty.

[If the substance is trafficked in a mixture, add the following shaded section.]

You will remember the evidence that the substance that the accused is alleged to have sold was a mixture of [identify relevant controlled drug] and [identify other substance]. Provided you are satisfied that the substance contained [identify relevant controlled drug], then you may find this element proved.

Recklessness

Warning! As noted in 9.1.1 Trafficking Controlled Drugs, there is very little guidance on the operation of this element. Judges are encouraged to discuss this part of the direction with counsel and seek submissions.

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused was reckless as to the substance trafficked being a controlled drug.

I have already directed you that, as a matter of law, [insert relevant substance] is a controlled drug.

This element looks at what NOA knew or believed about the substance s/he is alleged to have sold. The prosecution will prove this element if you are satisfied that NOA knew or believed that the substance was [insert relevant substance].

This element will also be established if the prosecution has proved that NOA was aware of a substantial risk that the substance was [insert relevant substance] and that in the circumstances as s/he knew them to be, it was unjustifiable to risk trafficking the substance. Whether taking such a risk is unjustifiable is a question of fact for you to determine.

[If it would be open to the jury to find that the accused knew, believed or was aware of a substantial risk that the substance was a different controlled drug, add the following shaded section.]

A third way the prosecution can prove this element is to show that NOA knew, believed or was aware of a substantial risk that the substance was a different controlled drug, such as [insert any relevant examples]. This element is made out if you are satisfied NOA was reckless as to whether the substance was a controlled drug of any kind.

[1231] Where the prosecution seeks to rely on Kural reasoning to establish the accused's state of mind, this charge will need to be adapted to incorporate this. See Bahri Kural v R (1987) 162 CLR 502; Smith & Afford v R (2017) 259 CLR 291; [2017] HCA 19.

[Discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

Quantity

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that NOA trafficked a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a controlled drug.

I direct you as a matter of law that [specify relevant quantity] is a [commercial/marketable] quantity of [identify relevant controlled drug]. The prosecution does not have to prove that the accused knew of the weight of the substance, or knew that [specify relevant quantity] is a [commercial/marketable] quantity of [identify relevant controlled drug]. So, if you are satisfied that NOA trafficked [identify relevant quantity and controlled drug alleged], then you may find this element proved.

[If a number of parcels are trafficked on a single occasion, add the following shaded section.]

You have heard evidence that the [identify relevant controlled drug] was contained in [identify number of parcels] separate parcels. If you are satisfied that all of these parcels were trafficked on the one occasion, then you can combine the weight of [identify relevant controlled drug] in each of these parcels, to determine whether NOA trafficked a [commercial/marketable] quantity of [identify relevant controlled drug].

[If the accused trafficked drugs at different times, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution alleges that NOA trafficked [identify relevant controlled drug] on [identify number of occasions] occasions. In determining whether NOA trafficked a [commercial/marketable] quantity, you may add together the quantities trafficked on these different occasions if you are satisfied the prosecution has proved two matters beyond reasonable doubt. First, that NOA trafficked [identify relevant controlled drug] on different occasions. This requires you to be satisfied that the first three elements have been proved beyond reasonable doubt by the prosecution in relation to each alleged occasion of trafficking. Second, that each of these proved trafficking occasions occurred within seven days of at least one other proved trafficking occasion.

I have given you a document, [identify relevant document] which lists the different times when NOA is alleged to have trafficked a controlled drug, and the quantity s/he is alleged to have trafficked. You will see that each of these occasions are no more than seven days apart. If the prosecution has proved that NOA trafficked a controlled drug on each occasion alleged, then you may add the quantity trafficked on each occasion together. However, if there is one or more occasion where you are not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that NOA trafficked a controlled drug, you must strike those occasions from the list. You can then only add the quantities trafficked on the remaining occasions together where the remaining occasions occur within seven days of another offence, which you found proved. [Judges may wish to explain this point using an example from the case, based on the dates of trafficking and explain the consequences if the jury finds a particular occasion not proved.]

[If the accused is alleged to be in a business of trafficking, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA was involved in an organised commercial activity that involved repeated trafficking of controlled drugs. If you satisfied that NOA trafficked [identify relevant controlled drug] on multiple occasions as part this business, and that over the course of this business a [commercial/marketable] quantity was trafficked, you can find the accused guilty of trafficking a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a [insert relevant controlled drug]. To make this determination, you must be satisfied of two things. First you must be satisfied the accused was involved in an organised commercial activity that involved repeated trafficking controlled drugs. This requires you to be satisfied that the first three elements occurred on repeated occasions as part of this business. Second, you must be satisfied that a [commercial/marketable] quantity was trafficked over the course of the organised commercial activity.

[If the controlled drugs are in a mixture add the following shaded section.]

You will remember you heard evidence that the [identify relevant controlled drug] was in a mixture with [identify other substance]. You will also remember that you heard evidence that the amount of [insert relevant controlled drug] in the mixture was [insert relevant quantity]. I direct you as a matter of law that this is a [commercial/marketable] of [identify relevant controlled drug]. If you are satisfied that the mixture contained this quantity of pure [identify relevant controlled drug], then you may find this element proved.

[If the prosecution relies on the proportions of multiple controlled drugs, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution has argued the accused trafficked more than one kind of controlled drug. Specifically: [identify relevant controlled drugs and quantities]. If you are satisfied that NOA trafficked these quantities of controlled drugs, then I direct you as a matter of law that these quantities, combined, form a [commercial/marketable] quantity and so you may find this element proved.

[If the accused had a mistaken belief about the quantity or identity of the drug, add the following shaded section.]

The defence has argued that NOA was under a mistaken belief as to the [quantity of [insert relevant controlled drug]/identity of [insert relevant controlled drug]] s/he was trafficking. The defence argues that NOA mistakenly believed that s/he was trafficking [insert relevant quantity] of [insert relevant controlled drug]. I direct you as a matter of law that, if NOA held this belief, and if you found all other elements proved, then NOA would be not guilty of trafficking a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a controlled drug, but would be guilty of the lesser offence of [trafficking a marketable quantity of a controlled drug/trafficking a controlled drug].

It is for the accused to prove that they were under this mistaken belief. This is one of the rare situations where the accused must prove an issue. Where the accused must prove a matter, a different standard applies compared to when the prosecution must prove a matter. That is, NOA does not need to prove matters "beyond reasonable doubt". Instead, the accused only needs to establish matters on what is called the "balance of probabilities". That is, such matters only need to be shown to be more likely than not. If you imagine a set a scales, with the evidence for the prosecution on one side and the evidence for the accused on the other, then the accused will prove this matter if the scales tip slightly in his/her favour. This is what the "balance of probabilities" means and you will understand that it is a much lower standard than "beyond reasonable doubt".

In determining whether NOA held this belief, you may consider the reasonableness of the belief and whether NOA turned his/her mind to the quantity of the controlled drug s/he was trafficking.

[Discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

So, if you find on the balance of probabilities, that the accused held a mistaken belief that s/he was trafficking [insert relevant quantity] of [insert relevant controlled drug], and you satisfied that the first three elements of the offence are proved, then you may find the defendant not guilty of trafficking a [commercial/marketable] quantity and guilty of the lesser offence of [trafficking a marketable quantity of a controlled drug/trafficking a controlled drug].

Trafficking marketable quantities of controlled drugs

[If the accused has been charged with trafficking a commercial quantity of a controlled drug and trafficking a marketable quantity is available as an alternative verdict, add the following shaded section.]

I must also direct you about the crime of trafficking a marketable quantity of a controlled drug. This is an alternative to the offence of trafficking a commercial quantity of a controlled drug. This means you only need to deliver a verdict to this offence if you are not satisfied that the prosecution has proved the offence of trafficking a commercial quantity of [insert controlled drug], beyond reasonable doubt. If you are satisfied NOA is guilty of trafficking a commercial quantity of [insert controlled drug], then you do not need to deliver a verdict on this alternative.

The offence of trafficking a marketable quantity of [insert controlled drug] is very similar to the offence of trafficking a commercial quantity of a controlled drug. There is, however, one important difference: the prosecution need only prove that NOA trafficked a marketable quantity, as opposed to commercial quantity, of the controlled drug.

So the four elements of the offence of trafficking a marketable quantity of a controlled drug are:

One – the accused intentionally trafficked in a substance.

Two – the substance trafficked was a controlled drug.

Three – the accused was reckless as to the substance trafficked being a controlled drug.

Four – the accused trafficked a marketable quantity of the controlled drug

You will remember my earlier directions about the first three elements. The difference here lies in the fourth element – you need only be satisfied a marketable, rather than commercial, quantity was trafficked.

I direct you as a matter of law that [specify relevant quantity] is a marketable quantity of [identify relevant controlled drug]. If you are satisfied that NOA trafficked [identify relevant quantity and controlled drug alleged], then you may find this fourth element proved. If you are also satisfied that the prosecution has proved the first three elements, you may find NOA guilty of this alternative offence of trafficking a marketable quantity of a controlled drug.

[Discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

Trafficking controlled drugs

[If trafficking a controlled drug is available as an alternative verdict, add the following shaded section.]

I must also direct you about the crime of trafficking a controlled drug. This is an alternative to the offence of trafficking a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a controlled drug. This means you only need to deliver a verdict to this offence if you are not satisfied that the prosecution has proved the offence of trafficking a [commercial/marketable] quantity of [insert controlled drug], beyond reasonable doubt. If you are satisfied NOA is guilty of trafficking a [commercial/marketable] quantity of [insert controlled drug], then you do not need to deliver a verdict on this alternative.

The offence of trafficking [insert controlled drug] is very similar to the offence of trafficking a [commercial/marketable] quantity of [insert controlled drug]. There is, however, one important difference: the prosecution does not need to prove that NOA trafficked a particular quantity of the controlled drug.

So the three elements of the offence of trafficking a controlled drugs are:

One – the accused intentionally trafficked in a substance.

Two – the substance trafficked was a controlled drug.

Three – the accused was reckless as to the substance trafficked being a controlled drug.

You will remember my earlier directions about these three elements.

[Discuss relevant evidence or arguments].

Defences

[Insert directions on any relevant 'general' defences under the Criminal Code.]

[The following defences specific to Part 9.1 may also be relevant.]

Reasonable belief that conduct was justified or excused by or under a law

[If the evidence raises the issue of whether the accused had a reasonable belief that the conduct was justified or excused by or under a law, add the following shaded section.]

The defence has argued that NOA was under a mistaken but reasonable belief that his/her conduct was [justified/excused] under a law of [the Commonwealth/a State/a Territory].

[Insert evidence and argument relied on by the accused.]

Before you may find NOA guilty of [this offence/these offences], the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, the accused did not have such a mistaken belief. You must find the defendant not guilty if the prosecution has failed to prove this beyond reasonable doubt.

[Discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

Summary

To summarise before you can find NOA guilty of trafficking a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a controlled drug, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused intentionally trafficked in a substance.

Two – the substance trafficked was a controlled drug.

Three – the accused was reckless as to the substance trafficked being a controlled drug.

Four – the accused trafficked a [commercial/marketable] quantity of the controlled drug

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of trafficking a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a controlled drug.

Last updated: 1 July 2017

9.1.1.2 Checklist: Trafficking Marketable or Commercial Quantities of Controlled Drugs

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used where it is alleged the accused trafficked a commercial or marketable quantity by selling a controlled drug.

Before you can convict the accused of trafficking a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a controlled drug, there are four elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally trafficked in a substance; and

2. The substance trafficked was a controlled drug; and

3. The accused was reckless as to the substance trafficked being a controlled drug; and

4. The accused trafficked a [commercial/marketable] quantity of the controlled drug.

Intentional act of trafficking

1.1. Has the prosecution proved that the accused sold the substance?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of trafficking a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a controlled drug

1.2. Has the prosecution proved the accused intended to sell the substance?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of trafficking a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a controlled drug

Controlled Drug

2. Has the prosecution proved that the substance trafficked was a controlled drug?

Consider: [Insert relevant controlled drug] is a controlled drug.

If Yes, then go to 3.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of trafficking a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a controlled drug

Recklessness about nature of substance

3.1. Has the prosecution proved that the accused knew that the substance was [insert relevant controlled drug]?

If Yes, then go on to 4

If No, then go to 3.2

3.2. Has the prosecution proved that the accused believed that the substance was [insert relevant controlled drug]?

If Yes, then go on to 4

If No, then go to 3.3

3.3. Has the prosecution proved that the accused was aware that there was a substantial risk that the substance was [insert relevant controlled drug] and knew that in the circumstances it was not justifiable to do what s/he did?

If Yes, then go on to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of trafficking a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a controlled drug

Quantity

4. Has the prosecution proved that the quantity of the controlled drug trafficked was [commercial/marketable]?

Consider: [Insert relevant quantity] is a [commercial/marketable] quantity of [insert name of controlled drug].

If Yes then the accused is guilty of trafficking a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a controlled drug (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1.1, 1.2, 2 and either 3.1, 3.2 or 3.3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of trafficking a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a controlled drug

Last updated: 23 March 2015

9.1.1.3 Charge: Trafficking Controlled Drugs

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge may be used when the accused is charged with trafficking controlled drugs under s 302.4.

This charge is designed for use where it is alleged the accused trafficked by selling a controlled drug. It must be adapted if the prosecution argues the accused trafficked a controlled drug in one of the other ways listed in 302.1.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the offence of trafficking a controlled drug.

To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following three elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused intentionally trafficked in a substance.

Two – the substance trafficked was a controlled drug.

Three – the accused was reckless as to the substance trafficked being a controlled drug.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Traffics

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intentionally trafficked in a substance.

The prosecution has argued that NOA trafficked by selling the substance. In order for this form of trafficking be made out, the prosecution must prove two matters beyond reasonable doubt:

First, the prosecution must prove the accused sold the substance. NOA will have sold the substance if the prosecution proves there was an exchange or agreement to sell. Money does not necessarily have to change hands but giving something away for free does not constitute selling.

Second, the prosecution must prove the accused intended to sell the substance. This means that the accused meant to sell the substance. For this element, you are not required to consider if the accused knew of the nature of the substance. That is the third element.

Intention is a state of mind. To determine the accused's state of mind, the prosecution invites you to draw an inference as to the accused's state of mind from certain facts. You will remember what I told you earlier about drawing inferences.[1232]

[Set out the facts and discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

Controlled drug

The second element the prosecution must prove is that the substance trafficked was a controlled drug.

You have heard evidence from [identify relevant witness] that the substance that the accused is alleged to have sold was [identify relevant controlled drug]. I direct you as a matter of law that [identify relevant controlled drug] is a controlled drug.

The defence has argued that [identify relevant defence evidence and arguments regarding whether the substance is a controlled drug].

If you are not satisfied that the substance that the accused is alleged to have sold was [identify relevant controlled drug], then you must find the accused not guilty.

[If the substance is trafficked in a mixture, add the following shaded section.]

You will remember the evidence that the substance that the accused is alleged to have sold was a mixture of [identify relevant controlled drug] and [identify other substance]. Provided you are satisfied that the substance contained [identify relevant controlled drug], then you may find this element proved.

Recklessness

Warning! As noted in 9.1.1 Trafficking Controlled Drugs, there is very little guidance on the operation of this element. Judges are encouraged to discuss this part of the direction with counsel and seek submissions.

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused was reckless as to the substance trafficked being a controlled drug.

I have already directed you that, as a matter of law, [insert relevant substance] is a controlled drug.

This element looks at what NOA knew or believed about the substance s/he is alleged to have sold. The prosecution will prove this element if you are satisfied that NOA knew or believed that the substance was [insert relevant substance].

This element will also be established if the prosecution has proved that NOA was aware of a substantial risk that the substance was [insert relevant substance] and that in the circumstances as s/he knew them to be, it was unjustifiable to risk trafficking the substance. Whether taking such a risk is unjustifiable is a question of fact for you to determine.

[If it would be open to the jury to find that the accused knew, believed or was aware of a substantial risk that the substance was a different controlled drug, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution will also prove this element if NOA knew, believed or was aware of a substantial risk that the substance was a different controlled drug, such as [insert any relevant examples]. This element is made out if you are satisfied NOA was reckless as to whether the substance was a controlled drug of any kind.

[1232] Where the prosecution seeks to rely on Kural reasoning to establish the accused's state of mind, this charge will need to be adapted to incorporate this. See Bahri Kural v R (1987) 162 CLR 502; Smith & Afford v R (2017) 259 CLR 291; [2017] HCA 19.

[Discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

Defences

[Insert directions on any relevant 'general' defences under the Criminal Code.]

[The following defences specific to Part 9.1 may also be relevant].

Reasonable belief that conduct was justified or excused by or under a law

[If the evidence raises the issue of whether the accused had a reasonable belief that the conduct was justified or excused by or under a law, add the following shaded section.]

The defence has argued that NOA was under a mistaken but reasonable belief that his/her conduct was [justified/excused] under a law of [the Commonwealth/a State/a Territory].

[Insert evidence and argument relied on by the accused.]

Before you may find NOA guilty of [this offence/these offences], the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, the accused did not have such a mistaken belief. You must find the defendant not guilty if the prosecution has failed to prove this beyond reasonable doubt.

[Discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

Summary

To summarise before you can find NOA guilty of trafficking a controlled drug, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused intentionally trafficked in a substance.

Two – the substance trafficked was a controlled drug.

Three – the accused was reckless as to the substance trafficked being a controlled drug.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of trafficking a controlled drug.

Last updated: 1 July 2017

9.1.1.4 Checklist: Trafficking Controlled Drugs

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used where it is alleged the accused trafficked by selling a controlled drug.

Before you can convict the accused of trafficking a controlled drug, there are three elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally trafficked in a substance; and

2. The substance trafficked was a controlled drug; and

3. The accused was reckless as to the substance trafficked being a controlled drug.

Intentional act of trafficking

1.1. Has the prosecution proved that the accused sold the substance?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of trafficking a controlled drug

1.2. Has the prosecution proved the accused intended to sell the substance?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of trafficking a controlled drug

Controlled Drug

2. Has the prosecution proved that the substance trafficked was a controlled drug?

Consider: [Insert relevant controlled drug] is a controlled drug.

If Yes, then go to 3.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of trafficking a controlled drug

Recklessness about nature of substance

3.1. Has the prosecution proved that the accused knew that the substance was [insert relevant controlled drug]?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of trafficking a controlled drug (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1.1, 1.2 and 2)

If No, then go to 3.2

3.2. Has the prosecution proved that the accused believed that the substance was [insert relevant controlled drug]?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of trafficking a controlled drug (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1.1, 1.2 and 2)

If No, then go to 3.3

3.3. Has the prosecution proved that the accused was aware that there was a substantial risk that the substance was [insert relevant controlled drug] and knew that in the circumstances it was not justifiable to do what s/he did?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of trafficking a controlled drug (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1.1, 1.2 and 2)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of trafficking a controlled drug

Last updated: 23 March 2015

9.1.2 Importing/Exporting Border Controlled Drugs and Plants

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Import-Export Offence Overview

1. Division 307 of the Criminal Code establishes four subdivisions related to import-export of border controlled drugs, plants and precursors:
    - Subdivision A (ss 307.1–307.4): Importing and exporting border controlled drugs or border controlled plants;
    - Subdivision B (ss 307.5–307.7): Possessing unlawfully imported border controlled drugs or border controlled plants;
    - Subdivision C (ss 307.8–307.10): Possessing border controlled drugs or border controlled plants reasonably suspected of having been unlawfully imported;
    - Subdivision D (ss 307.11–307.14): Importing and exporting border controlled precursors.
2. This topic only considers the operation of Subdivision A.
3. For information on trafficking offences under the Criminal Code see 9.1.1 Trafficking Controlled Drugs.
4. Unless stated otherwise, all references to sections are to the Criminal Code.
5. Import-export offences also exist under the Customs Act 1901 (Cth). These offences are not covered in this chapter.

Commencement Information and Amendments

6. Division 307 was inserted into the Criminal Code by the Law and Justice Legislation Amendment (Serious Drug Offences and Other Measures) Act 2005 (Cth). The division commenced operation 6 December 2005.
7. On 20 February 2010, the definition of 'import' was broadened to include dealing with the substance in connection with its importation as well as bringing the substance into Australia (Crimes Legislation Amendment (Serious and Organised Crime) Act (No. 2) 2010 (Cth) s 9 sch 9 item 1).
8. Commencing 28 May 2013, the words 'other than a determined border controlled drug or determined border controlled plant' were added to the substance requirement for the import/export offence with no defence of lack of commercial intent (see s 307.4; Crimes Legislation Amendment (Serious Drugs, Identity Crime and Other Measures) Act 2012 (Cth) s 3 sch 1 item 17; see also below [41]–[43]).

Importing and exporting commercial quantities of border controlled drugs or border controlled plants

Overview of offences

9. Subdivision A of Division 307 of the Criminal Code establishes four import-export offences.
    - Section 307.1: Importing and exporting commercial quantities of border controlled drugs or border controlled plants.
    - Section 307.2: Importing and exporting marketable quantities of border controlled drugs or border controlled plants.
    - Section 307.3: Importing and exporting border controlled drugs or border controlled plants
    - Section 307.4: Importing and exporting border controlled drugs or border controlled plants – with no defence relating to lack of commercial intent.
10. Any reference to Subdivision A is to Criminal Code Division 307, Subdivision A.

Overview of elements

11. The following must be proved by the prosecution beyond reasonable doubt for all offences in subdivision A:
    - The person imports or exports a substance;
    - The person intended to import or export the substance;
    - The substance is a border controlled drug or border controlled plant;
    - The person was reckless as to the substance being a border controlled drug or border controlled plant (ss 307.1(1)–(2), 307.2(1)–(2), 307.3(1)–(2), 307.4(1)–(2)).
12. Where the accused has been charged with one of the aggravated offences, the prosecution must also prove that:
    - The quantity imported or exported was a 'commercial quantity' (s 307.1(c)); or
    - The quantity imported or exported was a 'marketable quantity' (s 307.2(c)).
13. Absolute liability applies to these quantity requirements (ss 307.1(3), 307.2(3)). Unlike for trafficking offences, there is no partial defence where the accused is mistaken regarding the identity or quantity of a drug (Compare 9.1.1 Trafficking Controlled Drugs, [92]–[97]).
14. In Smith & Afford v R (2017) 259 CLR 291, [69], the High Court set out twelve points of guidance for directions on this offence. However, the High Court did not refer to the impact of Jury Directions Act 2015 s 61, and so judges should consider whether that section requires any modification to point (7) of that guidance.

The person imports or exports a substance

15. The first element requires the prosecution to prove that the accused either 'imported' a substance or 'exported' a substance.

A. Import

16. To 'import' a substance includes:
    (a) bringing the substance into Australia; and
    (b) dealing with the substance in connection with its importation (s 300.2).
17. This definition may be viewed as creating a 'primary' and 'extended' definition of 'import' (see R v Tranter (2013) 116 SASR 452; Brown v The Queen [2020] VSCA 20, [50]). For offences committed before 20 February 2010, the definition of import is restricted to the primary definition of bringing the substance into Australia (see Crimes Legislation Amendment (Serious and Organised Crime) Act (No. 2) 2010 (Cth)).
18. Under the primary definition, a person imports a substance when the substance arrives in Australia and is delivered to a point where it will remain in Australia (Campbell v R (2008) 73 NSWLR 272; R v Tranter (2013) 116 SASR 452; R v Toe (2010) 106 SASR 203).
19. This primary definition is limited to the arrival of the goods, and not their subsequent distribution or use (Campbell v R (2008) 73 NSWLR 272).
20. Under the extended definition, the act of importing refers to a process of importation, rather than a specific finite act. This aspect of the definition of import is further expanded by the inclusion of the words 'in connection with'. Therefore, the extended definition will cover a broad spectrum of conduct occurring both before and after the time a substance has strictly been 'imported' (Brar v R [2016] VSCA 281, [47]–[49]; compare Campbell v R (2008) 73 NSWLR 272).

21. The following activities are now likely covered by the extended definition, but would not fall under the primary definition:

    (a) packaging the goods for importation into Australia;

    (b) transporting the goods into Australia;

    (c) recovering the imported goods after landing in Australia;

    (d) making the imported goods available to another person;

    (e) clearing the imported goods;

    (f) transferring the imported goods into storage;

    (g) unpacking the imported goods;

    (h) arranging for payment of those involved in the importation process (see Explanatory Memorandum, Crimes Legislation Amendment (Serious and Organised Crime) Bill (No 2) 2010 (Cth); R v Tranter (2013) 116 SASR 452).

22. The extended definition of import in section 300.2 can be broken into two requirements:

    (a) the accused must deal with the substance; and

    (b) the dealings with the substance must be in connection with its importation (R v Tranter (2013) 116 SASR 452).

23. Provided the dealing is in connection with the importation, it does not matter whether the dealings occur before, during or after importation (R v Tranter (2013) 116 SASR 452).

24. The first requirement is that the accused must have dealt with the substance. While the terms 'deal' and 'in connection with' are not defined in the Criminal Code, they are words of relatively wide meaning (R v Tranter (2013) 116 SASR 452; Brar v R [2016] VSCA 281, [47]–[49]).

25. In order to have dealt with a substance, the accused must have had possession of the substance, or in a material respect had control of the disposition of the substance (Zhao v DPP (Cth) [2021] VSCA 101, [15(3)]).

26. Provision of an address for delivery, or tracking a delivery, is not enough, without more, to constitute possession or the necessary degree of control of the disposition of the substance to constitute dealing with the substance. In a case where this conduct arises, the judge must direct the jury that such conduct cannot, by itself, be sufficient to constitute dealing with the substance (Chen v The Queen [2021] VSCA 143, [14], [22]).

27. The requirement of proof that the accused dealt with 'the substance' means that a dealing with something other than the substance which is imported is not sufficient (Ribbon v The Queen (2019) 134 SASR 328, [136]–[138]).

28. While dealings can occur before, during or after importation, the subject-matter of the importation must exist at the time of the relevant conduct, otherwise the accused will not have dealt with 'the substance'. Therefore, actions such as asking a third party to send drugs, or telling a third party where drugs should be sent, may not be sufficient to prove a dealing with a substance if there is no evidence that the drugs in question existed at the time of the accused's conduct (Ribbon v The Queen (2019) 134 SASR 328, [145]–[147]).

29. Where the substance is fully substituted by police (whether in Australia or overseas), the process of bringing the substance into Australia for the purpose of the primary definition is at an end. An accused cannot be charged on the basis of his or her conduct which post-dates the time when the substance was imported (Campbell v R (2008) 73 NSWLR 272, R v Tranter (2013) 116 SASR 452; R v Toe (2010) 106 SASR 203).

30. Further, a dealing will not be with 'the substance' if it occurs after a full substitution, as the accused's conduct will only be a dealing with the substituted substance. Such a person may, however, have attempted to deal with the substance and so may be charged with attempting to import the prohibited substance (R v Tranter (2013) 116 SASR 452, 474 [88]; Ribbon v The Queen (2019) 134 SASR 328, [141], [153]; R v Nolan (2012) 83 NSWLR 534).

31. The second requirement is that the accused's dealings are 'in connection' with the importation. This is a term of wide meaning which may refer to conduct that occurs before the importation, during the importation or after the importation has concluded. However, there will come a point at which the alleged dealing is so far removed from the actual importation that it is no longer 'in connection with' the importation. In determining whether this point is reached, the court or jury will consider matters such as time, geography and other like matters (R v Tranter (2013) 116 SASR 452; Brar v R [2016] VSCA 281, [49])

32. Whether conduct is in connection with an importation is a question of fact for the jury in each case (Brar v R [2016] VSCA 281, [59]).

33. The answer to whether conduct is in connection with an importation is not assisted by considering whether the dealing took place before, or in connection with, the arrival of the substance at its 'final destination' in Australia. Such a consideration is a distraction from the statutory test and risks the wrong application of that test (Brar v R [2016] VSCA 281, [50]).

B. Export

34. To 'export' includes to take from Australia (s 300.2).

35. Unlike the definition of import, the definition of 'export' does not include an extended meaning of dealing with a substance in connection with its exportation.

36. The focus on the definition is likely to be on when the substance leaves Australian territory, rather than when it arrives at its final destination (see R v Campbell (2008) 73 NSWLR 272; [2008] NSWCCA 214).

37. The jury must therefore focus on the accused's conduct in taking the substance from Australia. Controlled interception which takes place before the goods are removed from Australia may therefore prevent the offence being completed. In such cases, a charge of attempting to export may be appropriate (see R v Campbell (2008) 73 NSWLR 272).

The person intended to import or export the substance

38. The prosecution must also prove that the accused intended to import or export the substance (s 5.6; see also R v Campbell (2008) 73 NSWLR 272).

39. A person intends to engage in conduct if he or she means to engage in conduct (s 5.2).

40. Therefore, the prosecution must prove the accused:

    (a) meant to import the substance; or

    (b) meant to export the substance.

41. At common law, it was appropriate to direct the jury that it could infer an intention to import narcotic drugs from finding that the accused held a belief, falling short of actual knowledge, that a package contained narcotic drugs. Similarly, a jury could infer intention from satisfaction that the accused was aware of the likelihood of the existence of the substance and the likelihood that it was a narcotic drug (Kural v R (1987) 162 CLR 502). This path of reasoning has been called 'Kural reasoning'.

42. Kural reasoning remains available for this element (Smith & Afford v R (2017) 259 CLR 291, [57]–[61]).

43. As the majority in Smith & Afford v R (2017) 259 CLR 291 stated at [60]:

> where it is established in cases like this that an accused perceived there to be a real or significant chance of a substance being present in an object which the accused brought into Australia, it is open to infer on the basis of all the facts and circumstances of the case that the accused intended to import the substance.

44. To use Kural reasoning in relation to this element, it is not necessary to show that the accused knew or believed:
    - what the substance was;
    - what the substance looked like;
    - how it was wrapped;
    - what the substance otherwise contained;
    - where it was located or concealed (Smith & Afford v R (2017) 259 CLR 291, [63])
45. When directing the jury about Kural reasoning, the judge must make clear that:
    - The second and fourth fault elements involve different questions and must be considered separately (Smith & Afford v R (2017) 259 CLR 291, [68]);
    - Kural reasoning involves a process of inferential reasoning, and that proof of knowledge or belief provides part of the basis for drawing an inference of intent. Knowledge or belief that there is a real or significant chance of the substance being present is not a substitute for, or the equivalent of, proving intent (Smith & Afford v R (2017) 259 CLR 291, [65]–[66]).
46. The interaction between this element and the fourth element of recklessness as to importing or exporting a border controlled drug can be complex.
47. This element does not look at whether the accused was aware that the substance was a border controlled drug or border controlled plant. All that is required to establish the intention is proof the accused intended to import or export a package, whatever it contained (see Campbell v R (2008) 73 NSWLR 272).
48. However, where the substance is concealed within a larger package (either in a hidden compartment, or through seemingly innocuous wrapping), an intention to import the larger package is not sufficient. Instead, the accused must have intended to import the concealed substance. This may be inferred from evidence that the accused knew or believed there was a real or significant chance that there was a concealed substance in the larger package, and failed to take steps to inspect the package or declare those concerns to Customs officials (see Smith & Afford v The Queen (2017) 259 CLR 291, [58]–[59], [63]).

The substance is a border controlled drug or border controlled plant

49. Each offence under Subdivision A requires the accused to have imported or exported a 'border controlled drug' or 'border controlled plant'. These terms are defined exhaustively in ss 301.4 and 301.5 (s 300.2).
50. A border controlled plant is a growing plant which is either:
    (a) listed by a regulation as a border controlled plant; or
    (b) determined by the Minister as a border controlled plant under section 301.13 (s 301.5(1)).
51. A border controlled drug is a substance (other than a growing plant) which is either:

(a) listed by a regulation as a border controlled drug

(b) a drug analogue of a listed border controlled drug

(c) determined by the Minister as a border controlled drug under s 301.13 (s 301.4(1)).

A. Listed by a regulation as a border controlled drug or border controlled plant

52. Listed border controlled drugs and plants are those drugs and plants listed by a regulation made for the purposes of ss 301.4(1)(a) or 301.5(1)(a) (s 300.2).

53. The current listed border controlled drugs are found in the Criminal Code Regulations 2002 (Cth) Schedule 4 column 1 (Criminal Code Regulations 2002 (Cth) reg 5D).

54. The current listed border controlled plants are found in the Criminal Code Regulations 2002 (Cth) reg 5E (Criminal Code Regulations 2002 (Cth) reg 5E(1)).

B. Determined by the Minister as a border controlled drug or border controlled plant

55. The Minister may determine that a substance is a border controlled drug or border controlled plant via an Emergency Determination (ss 301.13(1)(a), (b)).[1233] The Minister is not permitted to make more than one determination under this section in relation to a particular substance (s 301.13(3)).

56. A determination under s 301.13 operates from the time it is registered for a period of 12 months (or such shorter period specified in the determination) (s 301.16(1)).

57. Where the accused is charged under s 307.4 with importing or exporting a border controlled drug without commercial intent, the border controlled drug or plant must be either a listed drug or plant or a drug analogue of a listed drug and not a determined border control drug or determined border controlled plant (see the definition in s 300.2).

C. A drug analogue of a listed border controlled drug

58. The definition of 'drug analogue' in the Criminal Code sets out ways in which a substance can be related to a listed border controlled drug or a 'primary analogue' of the listed border controlled drug (see s 301.9(1)). These conditions relate to similarities in the chemical structure between a substance and a listed controlled drug.

59. If one of the chemical relationships defined in s 301.9(1) exists, then the substance is a drug analogue of a listed border controlled drug. A substance cannot be a 'drug analogue' if it is already a listed controlled drug (s 301.9(2)).

[1233] This system of emergency determination replaces the previous system of listing substances as border controlled drugs or plants temporarily through interim regulations (which were for a maximum period 12 months) or urgently through emergency determinations (which for a maximum period of 56 days). These changes came into force 28 May 2013 under the Crimes Legislation Amendment (Serious Drugs, Identity Crime and Other Measures) Act 2012 (Cth) s 3 sch 1 item 16.

60. Section 301.9(1)(d) specifies that a drug is an analogue of a listed controlled drug or a listed border controlled drug if it is "any other homologue, analogue, chemical derivative or substance substantially similar in chemical structure". The words "substantially similar in chemical structure" qualify all previous terms (homologue, analogue and chemical derivative) and are not limited to the immediately preceding word "substance" (R v AL [2016] VSCA 156, [26]–[29]).

61. Whether one drug is a chemical derivative of a listed drug is a question of fact for the jury. It will require expert evidence which will examine matters such as whether one drug can be made from another and whether one drug is structurally related to another (see Daley v Tasmania (2012) 21 Tas R 247; Clegg v Western Australia (No 2) [2017] WASCA 30).

The person was reckless as to the substance being a border controlled drug or border controlled plant

62. The prosecution must prove that the accused was reckless as to the substance being a border controlled drug or border controlled plant (ss 307.1(2), s 307.2(2), s 307.3(2) and 307.4(2)).

63. A person is reckless as to the imported or exported substance being a border controlled drug or border controlled plant if:

    (a) He or she is aware of a substantial risk that the substance is a border controlled drug or border controlled plant; and

    (b) Having regard to the circumstances known to him or her, it is unjustifiable to take the risk (s 5.4(1)).

64. A person is also reckless as to the substance being a border controlled drug or border controlled plant if:

    - he or she believes that the substance is a border controlled drug or border controlled plant; or
    - he or she is aware that the substance is a border controlled drug or border controlled plant or will be a border controlled drug or border controlled plant in the ordinary course of events (ss 5.4(4), 5.2(2), 5.3).

65. The jury must determine whether it is unjustifiable to take a risk on the facts known to the accused (s 5.4(1)(b)). However, the accused does not need to have believed that it was unjustifiable to take the risk. The test is objective not subjective.

66. The question of whether a risk is unjustifiable requires the jury to make a moral or value judgment relating to the accused's advertent disregard of risk (R v Saengsai-Or (2004) 61 NSWLR 135).

67. The jury must assess the likelihood of the risk eventuating, and determine whether the risk is one that should not have been taken (Lustig v R (2009) 195 A Crim R 310).

68. This element can be proved where the accused was aware that there was a substantial risk that the substance was one kind of border controlled drug or border controlled plant but was in fact a different border controlled drug or border controlled plant. The prosecution does not need to prove that the person was reckless as to the particular identity of the border controlled drug or border controlled plant imported as opposed to the substance being a border controlled drug or border controlled plant (s 300.5; see, e.g. R v Hill (2011) 212 A Crim R 359; Weng v R (2013) 279 FLR 119).

69. While courts have not directly addressed the issue, the better view appears to be that this element only requires that the accused was reckless as to the identity of the substance in question and the prosecution does not need to prove that the accused was reckless as to its status as a proscribed substance. However, given the lack of caselaw on this point, judges should seek submissions from parties in cases where this issue is relevant.

70. The partial defence of mistake as to identity of drug, plant or precursor under s 313.5 does not apply to offences under Division 307 (compare 9.1.1 Trafficking Controlled Drugs, [92]–[97]).

71. Where the accused is charged with attempting to import or export a border controlled drug or plant, recklessness remains the fault element associated with proof that the substance is a controlled drug or plant. This is an exception to the general rule for attempt charges that the fault element for all physical elements is intention or knowledge (s 300.6; c.f. s 11.1).

Commercial/marketable quantity

72. Where a person is charged under s 307.1 or 307.2 with importing or exporting a commercial or marketable quantity, the prosecution must prove that the quantity imported or exported was commercial or marketable (ss 307.1(1)(c), 307.2(1)(c)).

73. For border controlled plants and border controlled drugs other than a drug analogue, a commercial or marketable quantity is the lesser of:

    (a) The quantity listed in a regulation as a commercial or marketable quantity for these offences (ss 301.10 item 1(a), 301.11 item 1(a)). For the current list see Criminal Code Regulations 2002 (Cth) s 5E(1) (for plants) and Schedule 3 (for drugs) (Criminal Code Regulations s 5D, 5E); and[1234]

    (b) The quantity determined by the Minister under an Emergency Determination in s 301.15 as a commercial or marketable quantity (ss 301.10 item 1(b), 301.11 item 1(b)). Such a determination can only be made if there is no quantity regulation already in force (s 301.15(2)).

74. A commercial or marketable quantity of a drug analogue of a border controlled drug is the commercial or marketable quantity of the listed border controlled drug of which it is an analogue (ss 301.10 item 3(a), 301.11 item 3(a)). If the substance is a drug analogue for two or more listed border controlled drugs, a commercial or marketable quantity is the smallest commercial or marketable quantity of the listed border controlled drugs of which it is an analogue (ss 301.10 item 3(b), 301.11 item 3(b)).

75. The amounts listed in the Criminal Code Regulations 2002 (Cth) are based on the pure amount of the drug (Weng v R (2013) 279 FLR 119; R v King [1979] VR 399; see also s 312.1(1)(a)).

76. For guidance as to how to determine quantity in specific circumstances, see Provisions Relevant to Determining Quantity, [61]–[81] below.

Absolute liability as to quantity

77. Absolute liability applies to the quantity requirements. This means that there is no associated fault element (ss 307.1(3), 307.2(3), 307.3(3)).

Provisions relevant to determining quantity

78. The following provisions may be relevant in determining if the quantity requirements are satisfied:

    - Combining different parcels on the same occasion – s 311.1
    - Combining parcels from multiple offences – s 311.8
    - Combining parcels from organised commercial activity – s 311.2
    - Calculating quantity of drugs in mixtures – s 312.1

[1234] In the past, a listing of commercial quantities of controlled drugs was found in s 314.1 of division 314 to the Criminal Code. This division has now been repealed, effective 28 May 2013.

- Calculating quantity of several drugs in mixtures – s 312.2

A. Combining quantities of plants or drugs

79. If on a single occasion, a person imports or exports several parcels of border controlled drugs or border controlled plants, the person may be charged with a single offence against Part 9.1 in respect of all or any of those different parcels (s 311.1(1)(f)).

80. The quantity of drugs is the sum of the quantities of drugs in the several parcels (s 311.1(2)).

81. Where different kinds of border controlled drugs or border controlled plants are involved see [78]–[81] below.

82. Despite this method of aggregation, a person may still be charged with separate offences in respect of several parcels of drugs, plants or precursors imported or exported on a single occasion (s 311.1(4)).

B. Combining quantities from multiple offences

83. Under s 311.13, the prosecution can aggregate the quantities imported or exported from multiple occasions into a single offence if the prosecution can prove that:

    (a) The defendant committed several offences against Subdivision A on different occasions;

    (b) Each offence was committed within 30 days from another offence; and

    (c) In total, the relevant quantity of a border controlled drug or border controlled plant or both, or of a combination of border controlled drugs or border controlled plants or both, was imported or exported during the commission of the offences (s 311.13)

84. This provides a means for the prosecution to prove that the accused imported or exported a commercial or marketable quantity on the basis of a series of offences, each of which was less than the relevant threshold quantity.

85. The following general rules apply to combining parcels from multiple offences:

    - The particulars of the individual offences alleged to have been committed on different occasions must be set out in the charge (s 311.22(1)).
    - The same parcel of controlled drugs must not be counted more than once (s 311.22(2)). For example if an accused deals with the substance in connection to its importation one day and then physically brings the substance into Australia the next day, only the quantity imported on one of these occasions can be counted.
    - Despite the ability to combine parcels from multiple offences, there is nothing to prevent a person from being charged with separate offences for each different occasion (s 311.22(3)).

86. Where different kinds of border controlled drugs or border controlled plants are involved see [78]–[81] below (s 311.13 note 1).

C. Combining quantities based on a business of importing or exporting border controlled drugs or border controlled plants

87. A commercial or marketable quantity can be made out if the prosecution proves:

    (a) The defendant was engaged in an organised commercial activity that involved repeated importing or exporting of border controlled drugs or border controlled plants, or both; and

    (b) The relevant quantity of border controlled drug or border controlled plant or both, or a combination of border controlled drugs or border controlled plants or both, was imported or exported in the course of that activity (s 311.4(1)(c)–(d))).

88. The phrase "organised commercial activity", which is used in s 311.4, is not defined in the Code.

89. The prosecution does not need to specify the exact dates of each occasion or the exact quantity imported or exported on each occasion (s 311.4(2)).

90. This provision provides a more flexible basis than s 311.13 for aggregating quantities over a prolonged process of importing or exporting, where it is conducted as a business.

91. For a comparison between establishing quantity under a similar provision of the Criminal Code and Giretti Trafficking see 9.1.1 Trafficking Controlled Drugs, [70], [77].

92. See also 9.1.1 Trafficking in a Drug of Dependence for discussion of what constitutes a 'business' as it relates to Giretti Trafficking. These concepts are potentially transferrable to this provision.

93. Where different kinds of controlled drug are imported, see [76]–[80] below (s 311.4 Note 1).

D. Calculating quantities of drugs in mixtures

94. When a border controlled drug is within a mixture, the prosecution must prove that the mixture contains the relevant quantity of the border controlled drug in pure form (s 312.1(3)(a)).[1235]

E. Calculating quantities where different kinds of substances are involved

95. If the accused is charged with a single offence involving importing or exporting more than one kind of border controlled drug or border controlled plant, then the quantity imported or exported is a marketable or commercial quantity if the sum of the requisite fractions of the marketable or commercial quantity of each of those drugs or plants is equal to or greater than one (s 312.2(2)).

96. The 'requisite fraction' is determined by dividing the actual quantity of the substance by the smallest marketable or commercial quantity of that substance (s 312.2(3)).

97. For example, where a person is accused of importing 9.5kg of Opium and 3kg of Oxycodone, the Code Criminal Code Regulations 2002 (Cth) Schedule 4 column 2 items 165 and 168 provide that:

    - A commercial quantity of Opium is 20kg;
    - A commercial quantity of Oxycodone is 5kg

    Therefore:

    - The requisite fraction of Opium is 0.475 of a commercial quantity
    - The requisite fraction of Oxycodone is 0.6 of a commercial quantity
    - The combined requisite fractions are 1.075 of a commercial quantity and the person may therefore be charged with importing a commercial quantity of a combination of Opium and Oxycodone.

98. When a border controlled drug is within a mixture of substances, the requisite fraction is calculated on the basis of the quantity of the controlled drug in pure form (s 312.2(5)(a)).[1236]

Defences and alternative verdicts

99. The following defences/alternative verdicts apply to Division 307:

[1235] Section 312.1(1)(b) purports to provide another means by which the prosecution can prove the quantity requirement, however it refers to division 314 which is now repealed (effective 28 May 2013).

[1236] Section 312.2(5)(b) purports to provide another means by which the requisite fraction can be calculated, however it refers to division 314 which is now repealed (effective 28 May 2013).

(a) Lack of commercial intent (ss 307.2(4), 307.3(3));

(b) Reasonable belief that conduct was excused by or under state law (s 313.2);

(c) Proof of alternative offence (s 313.3).

100. The other defences and alternative verdicts under Division 313 are not applicable to Division 307 (compare 9.1.1 Trafficking Controlled Drugs).

A. Lack of Commercial Intent

101. Where the accused is charged with importing or exporting a marketable quantity, or importing or exporting a border controlled drug or plant, the accused has a defence where he or she proves that he or she neither intended, nor believed that another person intended, to sell any of the border controlled drug or border controlled plant or its products (ss 307.2(4), 307.4(3)).

102. 'Sell' is defined as including:

(a) Barter and exchange

(b) Agree to sell (s 300.2)

See 9.1.1 Trafficking Controlled Drugs, [15]–[19] for more detail on the definition of 'sell'.

103. The defendant bears the legal burden of proving a lack of commercial intent on the balance of probabilities (ss 13.4, 13.5).

104. Where the accused proves the defence of lack of commercial intent, the prosecution may seek to rely on the offence under s 307.4, where the defence of lack of commercial intent does not apply, as a factual alternative (s 307.4).

105. The lack of commercial intent defence is not available for the offence of importing or exporting a commercial quantity of a border controlled drug or a border controlled plant (s 307.1).

106. Determined border controlled drugs or determined border controlled plants are explicitly excluded from the operation the import-export offence with no defence of lack of commercial intent (s 307.4(1)(b)). Therefore, no offence under Subdivision A has been committed where:

- The quantity imported or exported was less than commercial (c.f if the quantity is commercial and no defence of lack of commercial intent is available: s 307.1);
- The defendant had no commercial intent (see ss 307.2(4), 307.3(3)); and
- The substance s/he have imported or exported was a determined border controlled drug or determined border controlled plant (s 307.4(1)(b)).

However, the accused may still be liable for a possession offence under Subdivision B or Subdivision C of Division 307 (Weng v R (2013) 279 FLR 119).

B. Reasonable Belief that Conduct was Excused by or Under Commonwealth, State or Territory Law

107. No criminal responsibility exists if:

(a) At the time of the conduct constituting the offence, the person was under a mistaken but reasonable belief that the conduct was justified or excused by or under a law of the Commonwealth or of a State or Territory; and

(b) Had the conduct been so justified or excused – the conduct would not have constituted the offence (s 313.2).

108. This defence provides an exception to the general rule under the Criminal Code that a person can still be criminally responsibility for an offence even if he or she is mistaken about or ignorant of the law (s 9.3).

109. While there is no case law on the operation of this defence, it appears designed to cover those situations where a person mistakenly believed that they held a valid licence or other authorisation to deal with the border controlled substance (See Explanatory Memoranda, Law Justice Legislation Amendment (Serious Drug Offences and Other Measures) Act (Cth) 2005).

110. The defendant bears the evidential burden of proof in relation to this defence (s 13.3(3); the note in s 313.2). To satisfy this burden, the defendant must adduce or point to evidence that suggests a reasonable possibility that they had a reasonable belief the conduct was justified (s 13.3(6)).

111. The defence under s 313.1 – which absolves the accused of liability where the conduct occurs in a state or territory and the conduct is justified or excused by or under a law of a State or Territory – does not apply to Division 307 offences (compare Division 302 trafficking offences – see 9.1.1 Trafficking Controlled Drugs, [85]–[86]).

112. However, the general defence under s 10.5 does apply to Division 307. This general defence operates so that a person is not criminally responsible for an offence if the conduct constituting the offence is justified or excused by or under a law of the Commonwealth (see s 10.5).

C. Proof of Alternative Offence

113. If the jury is not satisfied that the defendant is guilty of the alleged offence but is satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the defendant is guilty of another offence against Part 9.1, they may find the defendant not guilty of the alleged offence but guilty of the other offence (s 313.3).

114. The maximum penalty of the 'other offence' must not be greater than the maximum penalty for the alleged offence and the defendant must have been accorded procedural fairness in relation to that finding of guilt (s 313.3).

Last updated: 21 July 2021

9.1.2.1 Charge: Importing/Exporting Marketable or Commercial Quantities of Border Controlled Drugs and Border Controlled Plants

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge may be used when the accused is charged with the following:

i) Importing or exporting commercial quantities of border controlled drugs or border controlled plants under s 307.1

ii) Importing or exporting marketable quantities of border controlled drugs or border controlled plants under s 307.2

This charge is designed for use where the accused is charged with importing a border controlled substance. It must be adapted if the accused is charged with exporting a border controlled substance.

This charge is designed for use where the border controlled substance is a border controlled drug. It must be adapted if the accused is charged with importing or exporting a border controlled plant.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the offence of importing a [marketable/commercial] quantity of a border controlled drug.

To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following five elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused imported a substance.

Two – the accused intended to import the substance.

Three – the substance imported was a border controlled drug.

Four – the accused was reckless as to the substance imported being a border controlled drug.

Five – the accused imported a [commercial/marketable] quantity of the border controlled drug.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Import

The first element the prosecution must prove is that the accused imported a substance.

An accused imports a substance if they have:

1. Brought the substance into Australia; or

2. Dealt with the substance in connection with its importation

[If the accused is alleged to have brought the substance into Australia, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution says that the accused brought the substance into Australia. In assessing whether this in fact occurred, you must only look at whether the accused has caused the substance to arrive in Australia to a point where it will remain in the country.

[If relevant on the facts, add the following darker shaded section.]

This element is not proved where the accused only used or distributed the substance after it arrived in Australia.

[If the accused is alleged to have dealt with the substance in connection with its importation, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution says that the accused dealt with the substance in connection with its importation. To prove this element, the prosecution must establish the following two matters.

First, that the accused dealt with the substance.

There is no legal definition for what it means to deal with a substance. You must approach this matter as a question of common sense, given your understanding of what it means to deal with a substance.

A person can only deal with a substance if the person has custody or control over the substance, or control over disposal of the substance. The person must also intend to exercise that custody or control over the substance, or the disposal of the substance.

[If there has been a full police substitution, add the following darker shaded section.]

The prosecution must prove that the accused dealt with the substance s/he is alleged to have imported. In this case, there is evidence that the police intercepted the [identify relevant substance] on [identify relevant date] and replaced it with a harmless substitute.

You cannot convict the accused on the basis of his/her conduct after [identify date of substitution]. This is because any such conduct will only have been a dealing with the substituted substance, and not with a prohibited import.[1237]

A person may deal with a substance before, during, or after the substance is imported.

However, if you are considering conduct before the substance was imported, you must also be satisfied that the substance existed at that time. It is not enough if the substance was still to be manufactured or acquired at the time of the accused's actions.

The second matter the prosecution must prove is that the dealings were in connection with the importation of the substance. Importation is an ongoing process, including but not limited to packaging the substance for importation, the transport of the substance to Australia and the transfer of imported goods into storage. However, you must be satisfied, as a matter of common sense, that the conduct is 'in connection with' and not too far removed from the importation.

[Discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

Intention

The second element the prosecution must prove is that the accused intended to import the substance.

This means that the accused meant to import the substance.

Intention is a state of mind. To determine the accused's state of mind, the prosecution invites you to draw an inference as to the accused's state of mind from certain facts. You will remember what I told you earlier about drawing inferences.

[If the case concerns a substance contained within another object (a container), add the following shaded section. This direction should be adapted and included if the substance consists of or includes the substituted contents of a container.]

As you have heard, the prosecution seeks to prove that NOA imported [identify substance] within [identify container]. To prove this element, the prosecution must prove that the accused meant to import the [identify substance]. An intent to import [identify container] is not sufficient.

There are two matters which might help you reach a conclusion that NOA meant to import [identify substance]. First, did NOA know that [identify substance] was in [identify container]? Second, was NOA aware that there was a significant chance that [identify substance] was in [identify container]?

If you answer 'yes' to either of these questions, that may help you draw the conclusion that NOA meant to import [identify substance]. Remember, you must not look at pieces of evidence in isolation. Instead, you must decide, based on the evidence you accept, whether the prosecution has proved that NOA meant to import [identify substance].

[Set out the facts and discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

[1237] If attempted importation is left as an alternative, add the following: Such conduct may, however, be considered as part of the charge of attempting to import a (commercial/marketable quantity of a) border controlled drug. For that charge, you might find that the accused attempted to deal with the [identify relevant substance], but failed because it had already been substituted by police.

Border controlled drug/border controlled plant

The third element the prosecution must prove is that the substance imported was a border controlled drug.

You have heard evidence from [identify relevant witness] that the imported substance was [identify relevant border controlled drug]. I direct you as a matter of law that [identify relevant border controlled drug] is a border controlled drug.

The defence has argued that [identify relevant defence evidence and arguments regarding whether the substance is a border controlled drug].

If you are not satisfied that the substance was [identify relevant border controlled drug], then you must find the accused not guilty.

[If the substance is imported in a mixture, add the following shaded section.]

You will remember the evidence that the substance was a mixture of [identify relevant border controlled drug] and [identify other substance]. Provided you are satisfied that the substance contained [identify relevant border controlled drug], then you may find this element proved.

Recklessness

Warning! As noted in 9.1.2 Importing/Exporting Border Controlled Drugs and Plants, there is very little guidance on the operation of this element. Judges are encouraged to discuss this part of the direction with counsel and seek submissions.

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused was reckless as to the substance imported being a border controlled drug.[1238]

I have already directed you that, as a matter of law, [insert relevant substance] is a controlled drug.

This element looks at what NOA knew or believed about the substance s/he is alleged to have imported. The prosecution will prove this element if you are satisfied that NOA knew or believed that the substance imported was [insert relevant substance].

This element will also be established if the prosecution has proved that NOA was aware of a substantial risk that the substance imported was [insert relevant substance] and that in the circumstances as s/he knew them to be, it was unjustifiable to risk importing the substance. Whether taking such a risk is unjustifiable is a question of fact for you to determine.

[If it would be open to the jury to find that the accused was aware of a substantial risk that the substance was a different controlled drug, add the following shaded section.]

A third way the prosecution can prove this element is to show that NOA was aware of a substantial risk that the substance was a different controlled drug, such as [insert any relevant examples]. This element is made out if you are satisfied NOA was reckless as to whether the substance was a controlled drug of any kind.[1239]

[1238] If the prosecution cannot or does not particularise the border controlled drug in question, references to "[insert relevant substance]" (apart from in the second paragraph of this part of the charge) should be replaced with "a border controlled drug". See Nelson v DPP (Cth) (2014) 44 VR 461; [2014] VSCA 217 and Weng v R [2013] VSCA 221.

[1239] Judges should consider whether they need to explain the difference between a "substantial risk" and a "significant chance" to the jury. If such an explanation is considered necessary, judges should discuss their proposed formulation with counsel.

[Discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

Quantity

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that NOA imported a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a border controlled drug.

I direct you as a matter of law that [specify relevant quantity] is a [commercial/marketable] quantity of [identify relevant border controlled drug]. The prosecution does not have to prove that the accused knew of the weight of the substance. So, if you are satisfied that NOA imported [identify relevant quantity and border controlled drug alleged], then you may find this element proved.

[If a number of parcels are imported on a single occasion, add the following shaded section.]

You have heard evidence that the [identify relevant border controlled drug] was contained in [identify number of parcels] separate parcels. If you are satisfied that all of these parcels were imported on the one occasion, then you can combine the weight of [identify relevant border controlled drug] in each of these parcels, to determine that NOA imported a [commercial/marketable] quantity of [identify relevant border controlled drug].

[If the accused imported drugs at different times, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution alleges that NOA imported [identify relevant border controlled drug] on [identify number of occasions] occasions. In determining whether NOA imported a [commercial/marketable] quantity, you may add together the quantities imported on these different occasions if you are satisfied the prosecution has proved two matters beyond reasonable doubt. First, that NOA imported [identify relevant border controlled drug] on different occasions. This requires you to be satisfied that the first four elements have been proved beyond reasonable doubt by the prosecution in relation to each alleged occasion of importing. Second, that each of these proved import offences occurred within thirty days of at least one other proved import offence.

I have given you a document, [identify relevant document] which lists the different times when NOA is alleged to have imported a border controlled drug, and the quantity s/he is alleged to have imported. You will see that each of these occasions are no more than thirty days apart. If the prosecution has proved that NOA imported a controlled drug on each occasion alleged, then you may add the quantities imported on each occasion together. However, if there is one or more occasion where you are not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that NOA imported a border controlled drug, you must strike those occasions from the list. You can then only add the quantities imported on the remaining occasions together where the remaining occasions occur within thirty days of another offence, which you found proved. [Judges may wish to explain this point using an example from the case, based on the dates of importing and explain the consequences if the jury finds a particular occasion not proved.]

[If the accused is alleged to be in a business of importing, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA was involved in an organised commercial activity that involved repeated importing of border controlled drugs. If you satisfied that NOA imported [identify relevant border controlled drug] on multiple occasions as part this business, and that over the course of this business a [commercial/marketable] quantity was imported, you can find the accused guilty of importing a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a [insert relevant border controlled drug]. To make this determination, you must be satisfied of two things. First you must be satisfied the accused was involved in an organised commercial activity that involved repeated importing of border controlled drugs. This requires you to be satisfied that the first four elements occurred on repeated occasions as part of this business. Second, you must be satisfied that a [commercial/marketable] quantity was imported over the course of the organised commercial activity.

[If the border controlled drugs are in a mixture, add the following shaded section.]

You will remember you heard evidence that the [identify relevant border controlled drug] was in a mixture with [identify other substance]. You will also remember that you heard evidence that the amount of [insert relevant border controlled drug] in the mixture was [insert relevant quantity]. I direct you as a matter of law that this is a [commercial/marketable] of [identify relevant border controlled drug]. If you are satisfied that the mixture contained this quantity of pure [identify relevant border controlled drug], then you may find this element proved.

[If the prosecution relies on the proportions of multiple border controlled drugs, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution has argued the accused imported more than one kind of border controlled drug. Specifically: [identify relevant border controlled drugs and quantities]. If you are satisfied that NOA imported these quantities of border controlled drugs, then I direct you as a matter of law that these quantities, combined, form a [commercial/marketable] quantity and so you may find this element proved.

Importing marketable quantities of border controlled drugs

[If the accused has been charged with importing a commercial quantity of a border controlled drug and importing a marketable quantity is available as an alternative verdict, add the following shaded section.]

I must also direct you about the crime of importing a marketable quantity of a border controlled drug. This is an alternative to the offence of importing a commercial quantity of a border controlled drug. This means you only need to deliver a verdict to this offence if you are not satisfied that the prosecution has proved the offence of importing a commercial quantity of [insert border controlled drug], beyond reasonable doubt. If you are satisfied NOA is guilty of importing a commercial quantity of a border controlled drug, then you do not need to deliver a verdict on this alternative.

The offence of importing a marketable quantity of a border controlled drug is very similar to the offence of importing a commercial quantity of a border controlled drug. There is, however, one important difference: the prosecution need only prove that NOA imported a marketable quantity, as opposed to commercial quantity, of a border controlled drug.

So the five elements of importing marketable quantities of border controlled drugs are:

One – the accused imported a substance.

Two – the accused intended to import the substance.

Three – the substance imported was a border controlled drug.

Four – the accused was reckless as to the substance being a border controlled drug.

Five – the accused imported a marketable quantity.

You will remember my earlier directions about the first four elements. The difference here lies in the fifth element – you need only be satisfied that NOA imported a marketable, rather than commercial, quantity.

I direct you as a matter of law that [specify relevant quantity] is a marketable quantity of [identify relevant border controlled drug]. If you are satisfied that NOA imported [identify relevant quantity and border controlled drug alleged], then you may find this fifth element proved. If you are satisfied that the prosecution has proved the first four elements, then you may find NOA guilty of this alternative offence of importing a marketable quantity of a border controlled drug.

[Discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

Importing border controlled drugs

[If importing a border controlled drug is available as an alternative verdict, add the following shaded section.]

I must also direct you about the crime of importing a border controlled drug. This is an alternative to the offence of importing a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a border controlled drug. This means you only need to deliver a verdict to this offence if you are not satisfied that the prosecution has proved the offence of importing a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a border controlled drug, beyond reasonable doubt. If you are satisfied NOA is guilty of importing a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a border controlled drug, then you do not need to deliver a verdict on this alternative.

The offence of importing a border controlled drug is very similar to the offence of importing a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a border controlled drug. There is, however, one important difference: the prosecution does not need to prove that NOA imported a particular quantity of a border controlled drug.

So the four elements of importing border controlled drugs are:

One – the accused imported a substance.

Two – the accused intended to import the substance.

Three – the substance imported was a border controlled drug.

Four – the accused was reckless as to the substance being a border controlled drug.

You will remember my earlier directions about these four elements.

[Discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

Defences

[Insert directions on any relevant 'general' defences under the Criminal Code.]

[The following defences specific to Part 9.1 may also be relevant.]

Lack of commercial intent

[If the accused has been charged with importing a marketable quantity of border controlled drugs, and the evidence raises the issue of whether the defendant lacked a commercial intent, add the following shaded section.]

NOA has argued s/he neither intended to sell, nor believed that another person intended to sell any of the [identify relevant border control drug] or its products.

It is for the accused to prove that s/he did not intend to sell or believed that another person intended to sell any of the [identify relevant border controlled drug] or its products.

This is one of the rare situations where the accused must prove an issue. Where the accused must prove a matter, a different standard applies compared to when the prosecution must prove a matter. That is, NOA does not need to prove matters "beyond reasonable doubt". Instead, the accused only needs to establish matters on what is called the "balance of probabilities". That is, such matters only need to be shown to be more likely than not. If you imagine a set a scales, with the evidence for the prosecution on one side and the evidence for the accused on the other, then the accused will prove this matter if the scales tip slightly in his/her favour. This is what the "balance of probabilities" means and you will understand that it is a much lower standard than "beyond reasonable doubt".

So, if you are satisfied, on the balance of probabilities, that the accused did not intend to sell or believe that another person intended to sell any of the [insert name of border controlled drug] or its products, then you must find NOA not guilty of importing a marketable quantity a border control drug.

[Discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

However, you may still find the accused guilty of the offence of importing a border controlled drug without commercial intent. This is an alternative to the offence of importing a marketable quantity of a border controlled drug. This means you only need to deliver a verdict on this offence if you are satisfied, on the balance of probabilities, that the defendant neither intended nor believed that another person intended to sell any of the border controlled drug or its products. If you are not satisfied of this, then you do not need to deliver a verdict on this alternative.

The offence of importing a border controlled drug without commercial intent is very similar to the offence of importing a marketable quantity of a border controlled drug. There are, however, two important differences: there is no quantity requirement and it is not open to the accused to argue they did not intend to sell or believe another person intended to sell the border controlled drug or its products.

So, the four elements of importing border controlled drugs without commercial intent are:

One – the accused imported a substance.

Two – the accused intended to import the substance.

Three – the substance imported was a border controlled drug.

Four – the accused was reckless as to the substance being a border controlled drug.

You will remember my earlier directions about these four elements. If you are satisfied that the prosecution has proved these four elements, then you may find NOA guilty of this offence.

[Discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

Reasonable belief that conduct was excused by or under state law

[If the evidence raises the issue of whether the accused had a reasonable belief that the conduct was justified or excused by or under a law, add the following shaded section.]

The defence has argued that NOA was under a mistaken but reasonable belief that his/her conduct was [justified/excused] under a law of [the Commonwealth/a State/a Territory].

[Insert evidence and argument relied on by the accused.]

Before you may find NOA guilty of [this offence/these offences], the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, the accused did not have such a mistaken belief. You must find the defendant not guilty if the prosecution has fails prove this beyond reasonable doubt.

[Discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

Summary

To summarise before you can find NOA guilty of importing a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a border controlled drug, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused imported a substance.

Two – the accused intended to import the substance.

Three – the substance imported was a border controlled drug.

Four – the accused was reckless as to the substance imported being a border controlled drug.

Five – the accused imported a [commercial/marketable] quantity of the controlled drug.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of importing a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a border controlled drug.

Last updated: 14 May 2021

9.1.2.2 Checklist: Importing Marketable or Commercial Quantities of Border Controlled Drugs

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used where it is alleged the accused imported a commercial or marketable quantity of a border controlled drug.

Before you can convict the accused of importing a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a border controlled drug, there are five elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused imported a substance; and

2. The accused intended to import the substance; and

3. The substance imported was a border controlled drug; and

4. The accused was reckless as to the substance imported being a border controlled drug; and

5. The accused imported a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a border controlled drug.

Imported a substance

1. Has the prosecution proved that the accused imported a substance?

Consider: Did the accused either:

a) Bring the substance into Australia; or

b) Deal with the substance in connection with its importation?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of importing a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a border controlled drug

Intention to import

2. Has the prosecution proved that the accused intended to import the substance?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of importing a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a border controlled drug

Border controlled drug

3. Has the prosecution proved that the substance imported was a border controlled drug?

Consider: [Insert relevant border controlled drug] is a border controlled drug.

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of importing a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a border controlled drug

Recklessness about nature of substance

4.1. Has the prosecution proved that the accused knew that the substance was a border controlled drug?

If Yes, then go on to 5

If No, then go to 4.2

4.2. Has the prosecution proved that the accused believed that the substance was a border controlled drug?

If Yes, then go on to 5

If No, then go to 4.3

4.3. Has the prosecution proved that the accused was aware that there was a substantial risk that the substance was a border controlled drug and knew that in the circumstances it was not justifiable to do what s/he did?

If Yes, then go on to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of importing a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a border controlled drug

[Commercial/marketable] quantity

5. Has the prosecution proved that the quantity of the controlled drug imported was [commercial/marketable]?

Consider: [Insert relevant quantity] is a [commercial/marketable] quantity of [insert name of border controlled drug].

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of importing a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a border controlled drug (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2, 3 and either 4.1, 4.2 or 4.3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of importing a [commercial/marketable] quantity of a border controlled drug

Last updated: 23 March 2015

9.1.2.3 Charge: Importing/Exporting Border Controlled Drugs and Border Controlled Plants

Click here for a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge may be used when the accused is charged with the following:

i) Importing or exporting border controlled drugs or border controlled plants under s 307.3

ii) Importing or exporting border controlled drugs or border controlled plants – with no defence of lack of commercial intent under s 307.4

This charge is designed for use where the accused is charged with importing a border controlled substance. It must be adapted if the accused is charged with exporting a border controlled substance.

This charge is designed for use where the border controlled substance is a border controlled drug. It must be adapted if the accused is charged with importing or exporting a border controlled plant.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the offence of importing a border controlled drug.

To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following four elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused imported a substance.

Two – the accused intended to import the substance.

Three – the substance imported was a border controlled drug.

Four – the accused was reckless as to the substance imported being a border controlled drug.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Import

The first element the prosecution must prove is that the accused imported a substance.

An accused imports a substance if they have:

i) Brought the substance into Australia; or

ii) Dealt with the substance in connection with its importation.

[If the accused is alleged to have brought the substance into Australia, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution says that the accused brought the substance into Australia. In assessing whether this in fact occurred, you must only look at whether the accused has caused the substance to arrive in Australia to a point where it will remain in the country.

[If relevant on the facts, add the following darker shaded section.]

This element is not proved where the accused only used or distributed the substance after it arrived in Australia.

[If the accused is alleged to have dealt with the substance in connection with its importation, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution says that the accused dealt with the substance in connection with its importation. To prove this element, the prosecution must establish the following two matters.

First, that the accused dealt with the substance.

There is no legal definition for what it means to deal with a substance. You must approach this matter as a question of common sense, given your understanding of what it means to deal with a substance.

A person can only deal with a substance if the person has custody or control over the substance, or control over disposal of the substance. The person must also intend to exercise that custody or control over the substance, or the disposal of the substance.

[If there has been a full police substitution, add the following darker shaded section.]

The prosecution must prove that the accused dealt with the substance s/he is alleged to have imported. In this case, there is evidence that the police intercepted the [identify relevant substance] on [identify relevant date] and replaced it with a harmless substitute.

You cannot convict the accused on the basis of his/her conduct after [identify date of substitution]. This is because any such conduct will only have been a dealing with the substituted substance, and not with a prohibited import.[1240]

A person may deal with a substance before, during, or after the substance is imported.

However, if you are considering conduct before the substance was imported, you must also be satisfied that the substance existed at that time. It is not enough if the substance was still to be manufactured or acquired at the time of the accused's actions.

The second matter the prosecution must prove is that the dealings were in connection with the importation of the substance. Importation is an ongoing process, including but not limited to packaging the substance for importation, the transport of the substance to Australia and the transfer of imported goods into storage. However, you must be satisfied, as a matter of common sense, that the conduct is 'in connection with' and not too far removed from the importation.

[Discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

Intention

The second element the prosecution must prove is that the accused intended to import the substance.

This means that the accused meant to import the substance.

Intention is a state of mind. To determine the accused's state of mind, the prosecution invites you to draw an inference as to the accused's state of mind from certain facts. You will remember what I told you earlier about drawing inferences.

[If the case concerns a substance contained within another object (a container), add the following shaded section. This direction should be adapted and included if the substance consists of or includes the substituted contents of a container.]

As you have heard, the prosecution seeks to prove that NOA imported [identify substance] within [identify container]. To prove this element, the prosecution must prove that the accused meant to import the [identify substance]. An intent to import [identify container] is not sufficient.

There are two matters which might help you reach a conclusion that NOA meant to import [identify substance]. First, did NOA know that [identify substance] was in [identify container]? Second, did NOA know or believe that there was a real or significant chance that [identify substance] was in [identify container]?

[1240] If attempted importation is left as an alternative, add the following: Such conduct may, however, be considered as part of the charge of attempting to import a (commercial/marketable quantity of a) border controlled drug. For that charge, you might find that the accused attempted to deal with the [identify relevant substance], but failed because it had already been substituted by police.

If you answer 'yes' to either of these questions, that may help you draw the conclusion that NOA meant to import [identify substance]. Remember, you must not look at pieces of evidence in isolation. Instead, you must decide, based on the evidence you accept, whether the prosecution has proved that NOA meant to import [identify substance].

[Set out the facts and discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

Border controlled drug/border controlled plant

The third element the prosecution must prove is that the substance imported was a border controlled drug.

You have heard evidence from [identify relevant witness] that the imported substance was [identify relevant border controlled drug]. I direct you as a matter of law that [identify relevant border controlled drug] is a border controlled drug.

The defence has argued that [identify relevant defence evidence and arguments regarding whether the substance is a border controlled drug].

If you are not satisfied that the substance was [identify relevant border controlled drug], then you must find the accused not guilty.

[If the substance is imported in a mixture, add the following shaded section.]

You will remember the evidence that the substance was a mixture of [identify relevant border controlled drug] and [identify other substance]. Provided you are satisfied that the substance contained [identify relevant border controlled drug], then you may find this element proved.

Recklessness

Warning! As noted in 9.1.2 Importing/Exporting Border Controlled Drugs and Plants, there is very little guidance on the operation of this element. Judges are encouraged to discuss this part of the direction with counsel and seek submissions.

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused was reckless as to the substance imported being a border controlled drug.[1241]

I have already directed you that, as a matter of law, [insert relevant substance] is a controlled drug.

This element looks at what NOA knew or believed about the substance s/he is alleged to have imported. The prosecution will prove this element if you are satisfied that NOA knew or believed that the substance imported was [insert relevant substance].

This element will also be established if the prosecution has proved that NOA was aware of a substantial risk that the substance imported was [insert relevant substance] and that in the circumstances as s/he knew them to be, it was unjustifiable to risk importing the substance. Whether taking such a risk is unjustifiable is a question of fact for you to determine.

[If it would be open to the jury to find that the accused knew, believed or was aware of a substantial risk that the substance was a different controlled drug, add the following shaded section.]

[1241] If the prosecution cannot or does not particularise the border controlled drug in question, references to "[insert relevant substance]" (apart from in the second paragraph of this part of the charge) should be replaced with "a border controlled drug". See Nelson v DPP (Cth) (2014) 44 VR 461; [2014] VSCA 217 and Weng v R [2013] VSCA 221.

A third way the prosecution can prove this element is to show that NOA knew, believed or was aware of a substantial risk that the substance was a different controlled drug, such as [insert any relevant examples]. This element is made out if you are satisfied NOA was reckless as to whether the substance was a controlled drug of any kind.[1242]

[Discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

Defences

[Insert directions on any relevant 'general' defences under the Criminal Code.]

[The following defences specific to Part 9.1 may also be relevant.]

Lack of commercial intent

[If the accused has been charged with importing border controlled drugs, and the defendant has argued a lack of commercial intent, add the following shaded section.]

NOA has argued s/he neither intended to sell, nor believed that another person intended to sell any of the [identify relevant border control drug] or its products.

It is for the accused to prove that s/he did not intend to sell or believed that another person intended to sell any of the [identify relevant border controlled drug] or its products.

This is one of the rare situations where the accused must prove an issue. Where the accused must prove a matter, a different standard applies compared to when the prosecution must prove a matter. That is, NOA does not need to prove matters "beyond reasonable doubt". Instead, the accused only needs to establish matters on what is called the "balance of probabilities". That is, such matters only need to be shown to be more likely than not. If you imagine a set a scales, with the evidence for the prosecution on one side and the evidence for the accused on the other, then the accused will prove this matter if the scales tip slightly in his/her favour. This is what the "balance of probabilities" means and you will understand that it is a much lower standard than "beyond reasonable doubt".

So, if you are satisfied, on the balance of probabilities, that the accused did not intend to sell or believe that another person intended to sell any of the [insert name of border controlled drug] or its products, then you must find NOA not guilty of importing a border control drug.

[Discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

However, you may still find the defendant guilty of the offence of importing a border controlled drug without commercial intent. This is an alternative to the offence of importing a border controlled drug. This means you only need to deliver a verdict on this offence if you are satisfied, on the balance of probabilities, that the defendant neither intended nor believed that another person intended to sell any of the border controlled drug or its products. If you are not satisfied of this, then you do not need to deliver a verdict on this alternative.

The offence of importing a border controlled drug without commercial intent is very similar to the offence of importing a border controlled drug. The only difference is that it is not open to the accused to argue they did not intend to sell or believe another person intended to sell the border controlled drug or its products.

[1242] Judges should consider whether they need to explain the difference between a "substantial risk" and a "significant chance" to the jury. If such an explanation is considered necessary, judges should discuss their proposed formulation with counsel.

So, the four elements of importing border controlled drugs without commercial intent are:

One – the accused imported a substance.

Two – the accused intended to import the substance.

Three – the substance imported was a border controlled drug.

Four – the accused was reckless as to the substance imported being a border controlled drug.

You will remember my earlier directions about these four elements. If you are satisfied that the prosecution has proved these four elements, then you may find NOA guilty of this offence.

[Discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

Reasonable belief that conduct was excused by or under state law

[If the evidence raises the issue of whether the accused had a reasonable belief that the conduct was justified or excused by or under a law, add the following shaded section.]

The defence has argued that NOA was under a mistaken but reasonable belief that his/her conduct was [justified/excused] under a law of [the Commonwealth/a State/a Territory].

[Insert evidence and argument relied on by the accused.]

Before you may find NOA guilty of [this offence/these offences], the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, the accused did not have such a mistaken belief. You must find the defendant not guilty if the prosecution fail to prove this beyond reasonable doubt.

[Discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

Summary

To summarise before you can find NOA guilty of [importing a border controlled drug/importing a border controlled drug with no defence of lack of commercial intent], the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused imported a substance.

Two – the accused intended to import the substance.

Three – the substance imported was a border controlled drug.

Four – the accused was reckless as to the substance imported being a border controlled drug.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of [importing a border controlled drug/importing a border controlled drug with no defence of lack of commercial intent].

Last updated: 14 May 2021

9.1.2.4 Checklist: Importing Border Controlled Drugs

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used where it is alleged the accused imported a border controlled drug.

Before you can convict the accused of importing a border controlled drug, there are four elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused imported a substance; and

2. The accused intended to import the substance; and

3. The substance imported was a border controlled drug; and

4. The accused was reckless as to the substance imported being a border controlled drug.

Imported a substance

1. Has the prosecution proved that the accused imported a substance?

Consider: Did the accused either:

a) Bring the substance into Australia; or

b) Deal with the substance in connection with its importation?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of importing a border controlled drug

Intention to import

2. Has the prosecution proved that the accused intended to import the substance?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of importing a border controlled drug

Border controlled drug

3. Has the prosecution proved that the substance imported was a border controlled drug?

Consider: [Insert relevant border controlled drug] is a border controlled drug.

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of importing a border controlled drug

Recklessness about nature of substance

4.1. Has the prosecution proved that the accused knew that the substance was [insert relevant border controlled drug]?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of importing a border controlled drug (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then go to 4.2

4.2. Has the prosecution proved that the accused believed that the substance was [insert relevant border controlled drug]?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of importing a border controlled drug (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then go to 4.3

4.3. Has the prosecution proved that the accused was aware that there was a substantial risk that the substance was [insert relevant border controlled drug] and knew that in the circumstances it was not justifiable to do what s/he did?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of importing a border controlled drug (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of importing a border controlled drug

Last updated: 23 March 2015

9.2 People Smuggling (Basic Offence)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. The Migration Act 1958 (Cth)[1243] contains the following four people smuggling offences, which commenced operation on 1 June 2010:
    - People smuggling (s 233A);
    - Aggravated people smuggling (exploitation or danger) (s 233B);
    - Aggravated people smuggling (5 or more people) (s 233C);
    - Supporting people smuggling (s 233D).
2. This topic examines the basic people smuggling offence.

Elements

3. The offence of people smuggling has the following 5 elements:
    i) The accused organised or facilitated the bringing or coming to Australia of a second person, or the entry or proposed entry of a second person into Australia;

    ii) The accused did so intentionally;

    iii) The second person was a non-citizen;

    iv) The second person had no lawful right to come to Australia;

    v) The accused was reckless about the second person's lack of a lawful right of entry (Migration Act 1958 s 233A).
4. Section 233A creates one offence which may be committed in a number of different ways. It does not create a number of separate offences (R v Ahmad (2012) 31 NTLR 38).

[1243] Unless otherwise stated, all references to legislation are to Commonwealth legislation.

Organising or facilitating entry to Australia

5. The first element the prosecution must prove is that the accused organised or facilitated:
    - The bringing or coming to Australia of a second person; or
    - The entry or proposed entry of a second person into Australia (Migration Act 1958 s 233A).
6. "Australia" is defined to include the coastal sea of Australia, the Territory of Christmas Island and the Territory of Cocos (Keeling) Islands, but not any other external Territory (Acts Interpretation Act 1901 s 2B, 15B).
7. This is a physical element which consists of "conduct" (PJ v R (2012) 36 VR 402; Criminal Code Act 1995 s 4.1(a)).[1244]
8. The words "organise" and "facilitate" carry their ordinary meanings:
    - "Organise" means "arrange personally; take responsibility for providing (something)" (PJ v R (2012) 36 VR 402. See also R v Bahar (2011) 45 WAR 100).
    - "Facilitate" means "make easy or easier; promote; help forward (an action result etc)" (PJ v R (2012) 36 VR 402. See also R v Mahendra [2011] NTSC 57; R v Bahar (2011) 45 WAR 100).
9. The words "organise" and "facilitate" are active verbs, describing conduct directed at producing a result or outcome. They require the accused's conduct to have been directed at the purpose of bringing about the arrival of the relevant passengers at, or their entry into, Australia (PJ v R (2012) 36 VR 402).
10. This element is not met simply because the accused provided food, accommodation, medical or other humanitarian assistance to refugees or asylum seekers, if that conduct was not connected with organising or facilitating entry to Australia (Ahmadi v R [2011] WASCA 237).
11. The expression "coming to Australia" refers to the journey to Australia, rather than the actual entry into Australia (R v Ahmad (2012) 31 NTLR 38).
12. This element is completed once the relevant act of organisation or facilitation has occurred. The journey to Australia does not need to have been undertaken, and the second person does not need to have arrived at or entered Australian territory (R v Ahmad (2012) 31 NTLR 38; R v Mahendra [2011] NTSC 57).[1245]

Intentionally organising or facilitating entry

13. The second element the prosecution must prove is that the accused intentionally organised or facilitated the bringing or coming to Australia of a second person, or their entry or proposed entry into Australia (PJ v R (2012) 36 VR 402; Bahar v R (2011) 45 WAR 100; Criminal Code Act 1995 s 5.6(1)).
14. A person "intends" to engage in conduct if he or she means to engage in that conduct (Criminal Code Act 1995 s 5.2(1)).
15. For this element to be met, the accused must have been aware of the purpose and destination of the voyage (Bahar v R (2011) 45 WAR 100).

[1244] Consequently, the appropriate fault element is intention: Criminal Code Act 1995 s 5.6(1). See the discussion of the second element below for further information.

[1245] While successful entry into Australia is not an element of the crime, it may be relevant to sentencing: R v Ahmad (2012) 31 NTLR 38.

16. This requires the prosecution to prove that the accused intended to organise or facilitate entry to a place known to the accused as Australia. It is not enough to show that he or she intended to organise or facilitate entry to a place that the law defines to be Australia (PJ v R (2012) 36 VR 402; Bahar v R (2011) 45 WAR 100).

17. The relevant point in time to examine the accused's intention is the moment when he or she engaged in the relevant conduct (Bahar v R (2011) 45 WAR 100).

18. Thus, if it is alleged that the accused facilitated entry to Australia by conduct performed during the voyage to Australia, the prosecution must prove that he or she intended to facilitate entry when he or she committed the relevant conduct. They do not need to prove that the accused intended to facilitate entry at the time he or she boarded the vessel (Bahar v R (2011) 45 WAR 100).

The second person is a non-citizen

19. The third element the prosecution must prove is that the second person is a non-citizen (Migration Act 1958 s 233A).

20. A non-citizen is defined as a person who is not an Australian citizen (Migration Act 1958 s 5).

21. This is an element of absolute liability (Migration Act 1958 s 233A(2)). Consequently:

    - The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused was aware that the second person was a non-citizen; and
    - The defence of mistake of fact is not available (Criminal Code Act 1995 s 6.2; PJ v R (2012) 36 VR 402).

No lawful right of entry

22. The fourth element the prosecution must prove is that the second person had no lawful right to come to Australia (Migration Act 1958 s 233A).

23. This is a physical element which consists of a "circumstance in which conduct … occurs" (PJ v R (2012) 36 VR 402; Criminal Code Act 1995 s 4.1(c)).[1246]

24. A non-citizen has no lawful right to come to Australia if he or she:

    - Does not hold a visa permitting entry;
    - Is not covered by a relevant exemption; and
    - Is not permitted by regulations to travel to Australia without a visa permitting entry (Migration Act 1958 s 228B(1)).[1247]

[1246] Consequently, the appropriate fault element is recklessness: Criminal Code Act 1995 s 5.6(2). See the discussion of the fifth element below for further information.

[1247] This section was amended by the Anti–People Smuggling and Other Measures Act 2010, which commenced operation on 1 June 2010.

25. A person who fails to meet these entry requirements has no lawful right to come to Australia, even if he or she is seeking protection or asylum. This is the case regardless of any protection obligations Australia owes non-citizens under the Refugees Convention or for any other reason (Migration Act 1958 s 228B(2); R v Baco (2011) 29 NTLR 221; SZ v Minister for Immigration and Cultural Affairs (2000) 101 FCR 342).[1248]

Recklessness about the lack of lawful right of entry

26. The fifth element the prosecution must prove is that the accused was reckless about the second person's lack of lawful right to come to Australia (Criminal Code Act 1995 s 5.6; PJ v R (2012) 36 VR 402).

27. This requires the prosecution to prove that the accused:

    - Was aware of a substantial risk that the second person had no lawful right to enter Australia; and
    - Having regard to the circumstances known to the accused, it was unjustifiable to take that risk (Criminal Code Act 1995 s 5.4; PJ v R (2012) 36 VR 402).

28. Proof of intention or knowledge is also sufficient to prove this element (Criminal Code Act 1995 s 5.4(4)).

29. A person will have intention in relation to this element if he or she believes that the second person has no lawful right to come to Australia (Criminal Code Act 1995 s 5.2).

30. A person will have knowledge in relation to this element if he or she is aware that the second person has no lawful right to come to Australia (Criminal Code Act 1995 s 5.3)

31. It is not sufficient to show that the accused was reckless about the second person's right to enter their ultimate destination (which happened to be Australia). The element requires proof that the accused turned his or her mind to the risk that the second person had no lawful right to enter a place known to the accused as Australia, and decided (unjustifiably) to take the risk (PJ v R (2012) 36 VR 402).

32. It is for the jury to determine whether or not it was unjustifiable to take the risk (Criminal Code Act 1995 s 5.4(3)). This requires them to make a moral or value judgment concerning the accused's advertent disregard of the risk (R v Saengsai-Or (2004) 61 NSWLR 135).

33. The jury must assess the likelihood of the risk eventuating, and determine whether the risk is one which should have been taken (Lustig v R [2009] NSWCCA 143).

34. The unjustifiability of the risk must be assessed on the facts as the accused perceived them (Criminal Code Act 1995 s 5.4(1)(b)). However, the accused does not need to have believed that it was unjustifiable to take the risk. The test is objective not subjective.

Defences

35. Section 4A of the Migration Act 1958 states that Chapter 2 of the Criminal Code Act 1995 applies to all offences against that Act.[1249] Consequently, any of the defences set out in Part 2.3 of the Criminal Code Act 1958 may be relevant to a charge of people smuggling.

[1248] This section was added by the Deterring People Smuggling Act 2011. It has retrospective operation, and is taken to have commenced operation on 16 December 1999.

[1249] This section commenced operation on 19 September 2001.

36. One commonly raised defence is sudden or extraordinary emergency (see, e.g. Warnakulasuriya v R [2012] WASCA 10; Tran v The Commonwealth (2010) 187 FCR 54). See Sudden or Extraordinary Emergency (Topic Not Yet Complete) for information concerning the scope of this defence.

Extra-Territoriality

37. Section 233A operates extra-territorially. The offence may be complete before the other person arrives at or enters Australian territory (Migration Act 1958 s 228A; R v Ahmad (2012) 31 NTLR 38; R v Mahendra [2011] NTSC 57).

Last updated: 18 September 2013

9.2.1 Charge: People Smuggling (Basic Offence)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge is designed for use where the accused is charged with the basic offence of people smuggling (Migration Act 1958 s 233A).

If the accused is charged with the aggravated offence under Migration Act 1958 s 233C, use 9.3.1 Charge: Aggravated People Smuggling (5 or more people) instead.

This charge is designed for use in cases where it is alleged that the accused facilitated a person's entry into Australia. If a different form of smuggling is in issue, the Charge will need to be modified accordingly.

This charge is designed for use in cases where there is no issue regarding whether the person smuggled is a non-citizen who had no lawful right to come to Australia. Where those elements are in dispute, the Charge will need to be modified accordingly.

I must now direct you about the crime of people smuggling. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused facilitated a person's entry into Australia;

Two – the accused intended to facilitate that person's entry into Australia;

Three – the person was a non-citizen;

Four – the person had no lawful right to come into Australia; and Five – the accused was reckless about the person's lack of a lawful right to come into Australia.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Facilitating entry

The first element that the prosecution must prove is the accused facilitated a person's entry into Australia.[1250]

In this case, it is alleged that NOA facilitated NOP's entry into Australia by [describe alleged acts of facilitation].

[Discuss relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

[1250] If a different form of smuggling is in issue, this element will need to be modified accordingly. See 9.2 People Smuggling (Basic Offence) for information concerning the other ways in which this element may be satisfied.

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that when NOA [identify conduct], s/he intended to facilitate NOP's entry into Australia.[1251]

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied that NOA knew that it was Australia that NOP was entering, and meant to help him/her to enter.

[Where the prosecution seeks to rely on Kural reasoning, add the following shaded section.]

One matter which might help you decide whether NOA intended to facilitate the group's entry into Australia is whether NOA was aware that there was a significant chance that s/he was helping the group enter Australia.

If you accept that NOA was aware that there was a significant chance that s/he was helping the group enter Australia, that may help you draw the conclusion that NOA intended to facilitate the group's entry into Australia. Remember, you must not look at pieces of evidence in isolation. Instead, you must decide, based on the evidence you accept, whether the prosecution has proved that NOA knew it was Australia that the group was entering and meant to help him/her to enter.

[Discuss relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Non-citizen

The third element the prosecution must prove is that NOP was not a citizen of Australia when NOA facilitated his/her entry.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOP was a non-citizen.

No lawful right to come to Australia

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that NOP had no lawful right to come into Australia. As a matter of law, NOP did not have a lawful right to come into Australia.

[Judges may add the following section to address possible misconceptions about this element.]

A person only has a lawful right to come to Australia if he or she holds a visa permitting entry, is covered by a relevant exemption, or is permitted by regulations to travel to Australia without a visa permitting entry.

This element is not in dispute.

Recklessness about lack of lawful right

The fifth element the prosecution must prove is that NOA was reckless about NOP's lack of a lawful right to come into Australia.

[1251] If a different form of smuggling is in issue, this element will need to be modified accordingly.

This element looks at what NOA knew or believed about the immigration status of NOP. The prosecution will prove this element if NOA knew or believed that NOP did not have a lawful right to enter Australia. This element will also be proved if NOA was aware that there was a substantial risk that NOP did not have a lawful right to come into Australia and that in the circumstances as known to him/her, it was not justifiable to do what s/he did. In this case, it is difficult to think of circumstances in which it would be justifiable to ignore a substantial risk that the person had no lawful right to come into Australia.[1252] The focus of this element is therefore whether NOA was aware that there was a substantial risk that NOP did not have a lawful right to come into Australia.

[Judges may add the following section to address possible misconceptions about this element.]

It is not justifiable to take a risk that NOP had no lawful right to come to this country because NOA wanted to help NOP seek asylum, or because of any sympathy you might have for asylum seekers. Such matters are irrelevant to this element and you must put them out of your mind. You must instead look at the circumstances known to the accused and determine whether it was justifiable to take the risk that NOP had no lawful right to enter Australia.

[If relevant, add the following shaded section.]

It is not enough for the prosecution to prove that NOA was aware of a substantial risk that NOP did not have a lawful right to come into [describe relevant destination, e.g. Christmas Island]. S/he must have been aware of a significant risk that NOP had no lawful right to come into Australia.

[Discuss relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Defences

[Insert directions on any relevant defences, such as Sudden or Extraordinary Emergency, here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of people smuggling the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA facilitated NOP's entry into Australia; and

Two – that NOA intended to facilitate NOP's entry; and

Three – that NOP was a non-citizen; and Four – that NOP had no lawful right to come into Australia; and Five – that NOA was reckless about NOP's lack of a lawful right to come into Australia.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of people smuggling.

Last updated: 1 July 2017

9.2.2 Checklist: People Smuggling (Basic Offence)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Before you can convict the accused of people smuggling, there are five elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

[1252] If justification is open on the evidence, then this passage will need to be modified.

1. The accused facilitated a person's entry into Australia; and

2. The accused intended to facilitate that person's entry into Australia; and

3. The person was a non-citizen; and

4. The person had no lawful right to come into Australia; and

5. The accused was reckless about the person's lack of a lawful right to come into Australia.

Facilitated a person's entry

1. Has the prosecution proved that the accused facilitated a person's entry into Australia?

Consider – What did the accused do to help the person enter Australia?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of People Smuggling

Intention

2. Has the prosecution proved that NOA intended to facilitate a person's entry into Australia?

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of People Smuggling

Non-Citizen

3. Has the prosecution proved that the person was not a citizen of Australia when the accused facilitated his or her entry?

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of People Smuggling

No lawful right to come to Australia

4. Has the prosecution proved that the person did not have a lawful right to come into Australia?

If Yes then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of People Smuggling

Recklessness about lack of lawful right

5.1. Has the prosecution proved that the accused knew that the person did not have a lawful right to enter Australia?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of People Smuggling (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If No, then go to 5.2

5.2 Has the prosecution proved that the accused believed that the person did not have a lawful right to enter Australia?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of People Smuggling (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If No, then go to 5.3

5.3. Has the prosecution proved that the accused was aware that there was a substantial risk that the person did not have a lawful right to come into Australia and knew that in the circumstances it was not justifiable to do what s/he did?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of People Smuggling (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of People Smuggling

Last updated: 18 September 2013

9.3 People Smuggling (5 or More People)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. The Migration Act 1958 (Cth) contains the following four people smuggling offences, which commenced operation on 1 June 2010:
    - People smuggling (s 233A);
    - Aggravated people smuggling (exploitation or danger) (s 233B);
    - Aggravated people smuggling (5 or more people) (s 233C);
    - Supporting people smuggling (s 233D).
2. This topic examines the offence of aggravated people smuggling (5 or more people).

Availability of offence

3. Following a direction by the Attorney-General under section 8(1) of the Director of Public Prosecutions 1983 (Cth), the Commonwealth Director of Public Prosecutions must not commence proceedings for this offence unless:
    - the accused commits a repeat offence or may be convicted of a repeat offence in the same proceeding;
    - the accused's role extended beyond that of a crew member;
    - a death occurred in relation to the people smuggling venture (Director of Public Prosecutions – Attorney-General's Direction 2012).

Elements

4. The offence of aggravated people smuggling (5 or more people) has the following 5 elements:

    i) The accused organised or facilitated the bringing or coming to Australia of a group of at least 5 people, or the entry or proposed entry of a group of at least 5 people into Australia;

    ii) The accused did so intentionally;

    iii) At least 5 people in the group were non-citizens;

iv) The non-citizens had no lawful right to come to Australia;

v) The accused was reckless as to the non-citizens' lack of a lawful right of entry (Migration Act 1958 s 233C).

5. These elements only differ from the elements of the basic people smuggling offence (s 233A) in one way: they involve a group of five or more people rather than a single person.
6. See 9.2 People Smuggling (Basic Offence) for further information concerning the elements of this offence.

Last updated: 18 September 2013

9.3.1 Charge: Aggravated People Smuggling (5 or More People)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge is designed for use where the accused is charged with aggravated people smuggling (5 or more people) (Migration Act 1958 s 233C).

If the accused is charged with the basic people smuggling offence under Migration Act 1958 s 233A, use 9.2.1 Charge: People Smuggling (Basic Offence) instead.

This charge is designed for use in cases where it is alleged that the accused facilitated entry into Australia. If a different form of smuggling is in issue, the Charge will need to be modified accordingly.

This charge is designed for use in cases where there is no issue regarding whether the people smuggled are non-citizens who had no lawful right to come to Australia. Where those elements are in dispute, the Charge will need to be modified accordingly.

I must now direct you about the crime of aggravated people smuggling. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused facilitated the entry of a group of 5 or more people into Australia;

Two – the accused intended to facilitate the group's entry into Australia;

Three – at least 5 of the people in the group were non-citizens;

Four – at least 5 of the non-citizens had no lawful right to come into Australia; and Five – the accused was reckless about those non-citizens' lack of a lawful right to come into Australia.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Facilitating entry

The first element that the prosecution must prove is the accused facilitated the entry of a group of 5 or more people into Australia.[1253]

In this case, it is alleged that NOA facilitated the entry of [identify group] into Australia by [describe alleged acts of facilitation].

[Discuss relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

[1253] If a different form of smuggling is in issue, this element will need to be modified accordingly. See 9.2 People Smuggling (Basic Offence) for information concerning the other ways in which this element may be satisfied.

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that when NOA [identify conduct], s/he intended to facilitate the entry of a group of 5 or more people into Australia.[1254]

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied that NOA knew that it was Australia that the group were entering, and meant to help them to enter.

[Where the prosecution seeks to rely on Kural reasoning, add the following shaded section.]

One matter which might help you decide whether NOA intended to facilitate the group's entry into Australia is whether NOA was aware that there was a significant chance that s/he was helping the group enter Australia.

If you accept that NOA was aware that there was a significant chance that s/he was helping the group enter Australia, that may help you draw the conclusion that NOA intended to facilitate the group's entry into Australia. Remember, you must not look at pieces of evidence in isolation. Instead, you must decide, based on the evidence you accept, whether the prosecution has proved that NOA knew it was Australia that the group was entering and meant to help him/her to enter.

[Discuss relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Non-citizen

The third element the prosecution must prove is that at least 5 people in the group were not citizens of Australia when NOA facilitated their entry.

In this case, there is no dispute that [identify people] were non-citizens.

No lawful right to come to Australia

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that at least 5 of the non-citizens had no lawful right to come into Australia. As a matter of law, NOP did not have a lawful right to come into Australia.

[Judges may add the following section to address possible misconceptions about this element.]

A person only has a lawful right to come to Australia if he or she holds a visa permitting entry, is covered by a relevant exemption, or is permitted by regulations to travel to Australia without a visa permitting entry. None of these categories apply to NOP.

This element is not in dispute.

Recklessness about lack of lawful right

The fifth element the prosecution must prove is that NOA was reckless about those non-citizens' lack of a lawful right to come into Australia.

[1254] If a different form of smuggling is in issue, this element will need to be modified accordingly.

This element looks at what NOA knew or believed about the immigration status of those non-citizens. The prosecution will prove this element if NOA knew or believed that NOP did not have a lawful right to enter Australia. This element will also be proved if NOA was aware that there was a substantial risk that the non-citizens did not have a lawful right to come into Australia and that in the circumstances as known to him/her, it was not justifiable to do what s/he did. In the circumstances of this case, it is difficult to think of circumstances in which it would be justifiable to ignore a substantial risk that the non-citizens had no lawful right to come into Australia.[1255] The focus of this element is therefore whether NOA was aware that there was a substantial risk that NOP did not have a lawful right to come into Australia.

[Judges may add the following section to address possible misconceptions about this element.]

It is not justifiable to take a risk that a group of non-citizens have no lawful right to come to this country because NOA wanted to help them seek asylum, or because of any sympathy you might have for asylum seekers. Such matters are irrelevant to this element and you must put them out of your mind. You must instead look at the circumstances known to the accused and determine whether it was justifiable to take the risk that the group of non-citizens had no lawful right to enter Australia.

[If relevant, add the following shaded section.]

It is not enough for the prosecution to prove that NOA was aware of a substantial risk that those non-citizens did not have a lawful right to come into [describe relevant destination, e.g. "Christmas Island"]. S/he must have been aware of a significant risk that they had no lawful right to come into Australia.

[Discuss relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Defences

[Insert directions on any relevant defences, such as Sudden or Extraordinary Emergency, here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of aggravated people smuggling the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA facilitated the entry of a group of 5 or more people into Australia; and

Two – that NOA intended to facilitate the group's entry; and Three – that at least 5 people in the group were non-citizens; and

Four – that at least 5 of the non-citizens had no lawful right to come into Australia; and

Five – that NOA was reckless about those non-citizens' lack of a lawful right to come into Australia.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of aggravated people smuggling.

Last updated: 1 July 2017

9.3.2 Checklist: People Smuggling (5 or More People)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Before you can convict the accused of aggravated people smuggling, there are five elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

[1255] If justification is open on the evidence, then this passage will need to be modified.

1. The accused facilitated the entry of a group of 5 or more people into Australia; and

2. The accused intended to facilitate the group's entry into Australia; and

3. At least 5 of the people in the group were non-citizens; and

4. At least 5 of the non-citizens had no lawful right to come into Australia; and

5. The accused was reckless about those non-citizens' lack of a lawful right to come into Australia.

Facilitated a person's entry

1. Has the prosecution proved that the accused facilitated the entry of a group of 5 or more people into Australia?

Consider – What did the accused do to help the group enter Australia?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Aggravated People Smuggling

Intention

2. Has the prosecution proved that NOA intended to facilitate the group's entry into Australia?

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Aggravated People Smuggling

Non-Citizens

3. Has the prosecution proved that at least 5 members of the group were not citizens of Australia when the accused facilitated their entry?

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Aggravated People Smuggling

No lawful right to come to Australia

4. Has the prosecution proved that at least 5 members of the group did not have a lawful right to come into Australia?

Consider – The 5 members of the group for this element must be the same as for the third element

Consider –The jury must be unanimous about the identity of the 5 members of the group.

If Yes then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Aggravated People Smuggling

Recklessness about lack of lawful right

5.1. Has the prosecution proved that the accused knew that the non-citizens did not have a lawful right to enter Australia?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Aggravated People Smuggling (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If No, then go to 5.2

5.2 Has the prosecution proved that the accused believed that the non-citizens did not have a lawful right to enter Australia?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Aggravated People Smuggling (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If No, then go to 5.3

5.3. Has the prosecution proved that the accused was aware that there was a substantial risk that the non-citizens did not have a lawful right to come into Australia and knew that in the circumstances it was not justifiable to do what s/he did?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Aggravated People Smuggling (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Aggravated People Smuggling

Last updated: 18 September 2013

9.4 Use of Carriage Service for Child Abuse Material

Click here for a Word version of this document

1. Section 474.22 of the Criminal Code creates the statutory offence of using a carriage service for child abuse material.

Commencement Information

2. Section 474.22 of the Code came into operation on 1 March 2005 and was inserted into the Act by Schedule 1(1) of the Crimes Legislation Amendment (Telecommunications Offences and Other Measures) Act (No 2) 2004. Its field of operation was expanded with the commencement on 21 September 2019 of clause 29 of Schedule 7 of the Combatting Child Sexual Exploitation Legislation Amendment Act 2019, which amalgamated the definition of child pornography material into the existing definition of child abuse material (which had previously only dealt with depictions of children as victims of torture, cruelty or physical abuse).
3. The purpose of this change was described in the explanatory memorandum to the Combating Child Sexual Exploitation Legislation Amendment Bill 2019 as being "to reflect changes in international language norms and the seriousness of harm associated with material that depicts child sexual abuse" (page 57).
4. Following the amalgamation of the definitions, the definition of child pornography, and the child pornography specific offences, were repealed. The result is that for conduct committed between 1 March 2005 and 20 September 2019, sexual depictions of children were dealt with s 474.19 of the Criminal Code, while violent depictions were dealt with by s 474.22 of the Criminal Code. Then from 21 September 2019 onwards, both sexual and violent depictions of children are dealt with by s 474.22 of the Criminal Code.

Overview of Elements

5. A person is guilty of the offence if:
   (a) the person intentionally:

i) accesses material; or

ii) causes material to be transmitted to himself or herself; or

iii) transmits, makes available, publishes, distributes, advertises or promotes material; or

iv) solicits material; and

(b) the person does so using a carriage service;

(c) the material is child abuse material; and

(d) the person is reckless as to the material being child abuse material.

Intentionally engaged in conduct

6. The first element the prosecution must prove is that the accused intentionally engaged in one of the forms of conduct listed in s 474.22(1)(a).

7. The Code proscribes four distinct forms of conduct. These are:

   (a) Accessing material;

   (b) Causing material to be transmitted to him or herself;

   (c) Transmitting, making available, publishing, distributing, advertising or promoting material; or

   (d) Soliciting material (Criminal Code s 474.22(1)(a)).

8. Access is defined to include:

   (a) the display of the material by a computer or any other output of the material from a computer; or

   (b) the copying or moving of the material to any place in a computer or to a data storage device; or

   (c) in the case of material that is a program—the execution of the program (Criminal Code s 473.1).

9. Given the structure of s 474.22, it is likely that the section creates a single offence with multiple available conduct elements. As each form of conduct involves different factual issues, the jury must unanimously agree that the prosecution has proved a single form of conduct (see R v Walsh (2002) 131 A Crim R 299).

10. The fault element for engaging in conduct is intention (Criminal Code s 474.2(2)(a)).

11. As this physical element involves conduct, proof of intention requires proof that the accused meant to engage in that conduct (Criminal Code s 5.2).

Use of a carriage service

12. The second element is that the accused engaged in the conduct constituting the first element using a carriage service (Criminal Code s 474.22(1)(aa)).

13. Under the Dictionary to the Code, "carriage service" has the same meaning as in the Telecommunications Act 1997 (Cth).

14. Under section 7 of the Telecommunications Act 1997 (Cth), "carriage service" means a service for carrying communications by means of guided and/or unguided electromagnetic energy.

15. This draws attention to the means by which a communication is delivered, rather than the content of the communication itself.

16. The explanatory memorandum to the Crimes Legislation Amendment (Telecommunications Offences and Other Measures) Bill (No 2) 2004, which introduced this provision, states that use of a carriage service includes "making a telephone call, sending a message by facsimile, sending an SMS message, or sending a message by email or some other means using the Internet" (see also R v McDonald and Deblaquiere [2013] ACTSC 122. But c.f. Hale v R [2011] NSWDC 97).

17. Under s 473.5 of the Criminal Code, a person is taken not to use a carriage service by engaging in particular conduct if:

    (a) The person is a carrier and, in engaging in that conduct, is acting solely in that person's capacity as a carrier; or

    (b) The person is a carriage service provider and, in engaging in that conduct, is acting solely in the person's capacity as a carriage service provider; or

    (c) The person is an internet service provider and, in engaging in that conduct, is acting solely in the person's capacity as an internet service provider; or

    (d) The person is an internet content host and, in engaging in that conduct, is acting solely in the person's capacity as an internet content host.

18. Absolute liability applies to this element and so there is no associated fault element (Criminal Code s 474.22(2A)).

Child abuse material

19. The third element is that the material in question is "child abuse material".

20. "Child abuse material" is defined as:

(a) material that depicts a person, or a representation of a person, who:

(i) is, or appears to be, under 18 years of age; and

(ii) is, or appears to be, a victim of torture, cruelty or physical abuse;

and does this in a way that reasonable persons would regard as being, in all the circumstances, offensive; or

(b) material that describes a person who:

(i) is, or is implied to be, under 18 years of age; and

(ii) is, or is implied to be, a victim of torture, cruelty or physical abuse;

and does this in a way that reasonable persons would regard as being, in all the circumstances, offensive; or

(c) material that depicts a person, or a representation of a person, who is, or appears to be, under 18 years of age and who:

(i) is engaged in, or appears to be engaged in, a sexual pose or sexual activity (whether or not in the presence of other persons); or

(ii) is in the presence of a person who is engaged in, or appears to be engaged in, a sexual pose or sexual activity;

and does this in a way that reasonable persons would regard as being, in all the circumstances, offensive; or

(d) material the dominant characteristic of which is the depiction, for a sexual purpose, of:

(i) a sexual organ or the anal region of a person who is, or appears to be, under 18 years of age; or

(ii) a representation of such a sexual organ or anal region; or

(iii) the breasts, or a representation of the breasts, of a female person who is, or appears to be, under 18 years of age; in a way that reasonable persons would regard as being, in all the circumstances, offensive; or

(e) material that describes a person who is, or is implied to be, under 18 years of age and who:

(i) is engaged in, or is implied to be engaged in, a sexual pose or sexual activity (whether or not in the presence of other persons); or

(ii) is in the presence of a person who is engaged in, or is implied to be engaged in, a sexual pose or sexual activity;

and does this in a way that reasonable persons would regard as being, in all the circumstances, offensive; or

(f) material that describes:

(i) a sexual organ or the anal region of a person who is, or is implied to be, under 18 years of age; or

(ii) the breasts of a female person who is, or is implied to be, under 18 years of age;

and does this in a way that reasonable persons would regard as being, in all the circumstances, offensive; or

(g) material that is a doll or other object that resembles:

(i) a person who is, or appears to be, under 18 years of age; or

(ii) a part of the body of such a person;

if a reasonable person would consider it likely that the material is intended to be used by a person to simulate sexual intercourse (Criminal Code s 473.1).

21. The definition of "a sexual pose" used in (c) and (e) is of uncertain scope, because Australian society permits certain activity which involves the sexualisation of young children, particularly in a commercial context. In addition, modern society treats certain child-like activity by adults as sexually suggestive. This does not mean that the same activity by children takes on a sexual quality, unless the child has been encouraged to adopt that activity for the purpose of providing sexual gratification to observers (see R v Silva [2009] ACTSC 108, [26]–[28]).
22. A sexual pose is a deliberately-struck attitude that draws attention to the sexual aspects of the subject's identity or personality. It is not necessary that the child subjectively understand the sexual connotations of the pose being adopted. Nor does it require that the child be nude (R v Silva [2009] ACTSC 108, [29]).
23. Each of the definitions of child abuse material under s 473.1 of the Criminal Code (except for the child sex doll provisions in paragraph (g)) contains a requirement that the material "does this in a way that reasonable persons would regard as being, in all the circumstances, offensive". The Code provides that the matters to be taken into account in deciding whether reasonable persons would regard particular material as being, in all the circumstances, offensive include:
    (a) The standards of morality, decency and propriety generally accepted by reasonable adults; and
    (b) The literary, artistic or educational merit (if any) of the material; and
    (c) The general character of the material (including whether it is of a medical, legal or scientific character (Criminal Code s 473.4).
24. In cases where it is disputed that the material is child abuse material, the judge must direct the jury that it must take these matters into account.
25. These matters require attention to the standards of the community at large, including in art, literature, advertising and mass media, rather than the personal sexual morality of individual members of the jury (R v Silva [2009] ACTSC 108, [33]).

Recklessness

26. The fourth element is that the accused is reckless as to the material being child abuse material.
27. For the purpose of this offence, a person is reckless if:
    (a) He or she is aware of a substantial risk that the material will be child abuse material; and
    (b) Having regard to the circumstances known to him or her, it is unjustifiable to take the risk (see Criminal Code s 5.4).
28. Proof that the accused knew or intended that the material be child abuse material will also prove this element (Criminal Code s 5.4(4)).

29. A person will intend that material be child abuse material if he or she believes that it is or will be child abuse material (Criminal Code s 5.2(2)).

30. A person will know that material is child abuse material if he or she is aware that it is child abuse material or will be child abuse material in the ordinary course of events (Criminal Code s 5.3).

Defences

31. As well as the general defences provided for in Part 2.3 of the Criminal Code, four specific defences to s 474.22 are provided for in s 474.24.

32. For each defence under s 474.24, the accused carries the evidential burden to raise the defence (see Criminal Code s 13.3).

33. The explanatory memorandum to the Crimes Legislation Amendment (Telecommunications Offences and Other Measures) Bill (No 2) 2004 (Cth) indicates that most of the defences in s 474.21 are similar in application to the general defence of lawful authority in section 10.5 of the Criminal Code. However, that defence is not specific to the circumstances covered by these defences and does not sufficiently cover all the types of people that would be legitimately entitled to a defence for the child pornography material (or as the Code is now structured, child abuse material) offences.

Public benefit defence

34. A person is not criminally responsible for an offence against section 474.22 because of engaging in particular conduct if the conduct:

    (a) is of public benefit; and

    (b) does not extend beyond what is of public benefit (Criminal Code s 474.24(1)).

35. In determining whether this defence applies, the question whether the conduct is of public benefit is a question of fact and the person's motives in engaging in the conduct are irrelevant (Criminal Code s 474.24(1)).

36. Conduct is of public benefit if, and only if, the conduct is necessary for, or of assistance in:

    (a) enforcing a law of the Commonwealth, a State or a Territory; or

    (b) monitoring compliance with, or investigating a contravention of, a law of the Commonwealth, a State or a Territory; or

    (c) the administration of justice; or

    (d) conducting scientific, medical or educational research that has been approved by the AFP Minister in writing for the purposes of this section (Criminal Code s 474.24(2)).

37. The conduct discussed in s 474.24(2)(a) is targeted at persons who may be required to engage in the offending conduct as part of their duties in connection with law enforcement, but who are not covered by the defence for law enforcement officers in subsection 474.24(3). An example is where a criminologist assists law enforcement agencies in the identification of victims of child abuse (Explanatory memorandum, Crimes Legislation Amendment (Telecommunications Offences and Other Measures) Bill (No 2) 2004 (Cth)).

38. The defence in s 474.24(2)(b) is targeted at officers of government agencies involved in the monitoring and investigation of online material in accordance with regulatory schemes that they administer. This includes organisations such as the Australian Broadcasting Authority (ABA), the Australian Communications Authority (ACA) and the Office of Film and Literature Classification (OFLC) (Explanatory memorandum, Crimes Legislation Amendment (Telecommunications Offences and Other Measures) Bill (No 2) 2004 (Cth)).

39. The types of people likely to be covered by s 474.24(2)(c) include judicial officers and court staff hearing a proceeding involving child pornography, legal representatives of a party to the proceedings, and witnesses in the proceedings (Explanatory memorandum, Crimes Legislation Amendment (Telecommunications Offences and Other Measures) Bill (No 2) 2004 (Cth)).

40. Finally, s 474.24(2)(d) protects legitimate research dealing with child pornography on the Internet, provided the authorisation of the AFP Minister is received. Persons who are caught with Internet child abuse material and who argue that they were involved in 'personal research' will not have a defence available to them unless they have received approval for their research from the Minister. Likewise, if a person who has received approval for particular research engages in conduct that falls outside what is 'necessary for or of assistance in' conducting that research, the defence will not be available to them. (Explanatory memorandum, Crimes Legislation Amendment (Telecommunications Offences and Other Measures) Bill (No 2) 2004 (Cth)).

Law enforcement defence

41. A person is not criminally responsible for an offence against section 474.22 if:

    (a) the person is, at the time of the offence, a law enforcement officer, or an intelligence or security officer, acting in the course of his or her duties; and

    (b) the conduct of the person is reasonable in the circumstances for the purpose of performing that duty (Criminal Code s 474.24(3)).

Defence for those assisting Children's eSafety Commissioner

42. A person is not criminally responsible for an offence against section 474.22 if the person engaged in the conduct in good faith for the sole purpose of assisting the Children's eSafety Commissioner to perform the functions, or exercise the powers, conferred on the eSafety Commissioner by Part 9 of the Online Safety Act 2021 (Criminal Code s 474.24(4)(a)).

Defence for those manufacturing or developing, or updating, Content Filtering Technology

43. A person is not criminally responsible for an offence against section 474.22 if the person engages in the conduct in good faith for the sole purpose of manufacturing or developing, or updating, content filtering technology (including software) in accordance with:

    (i) an industry code registered under Division 7 of Part 9 of the Online Safety Act 2021; or

    (ii) an industry standard registered under Division 7 of Part 9 of the Online Safety Act 2021 (Criminal Code s 474.24(4)(b)).

Last updated: 4 March 2024

9.4.1 Charge: Use of Carriage Service to Access Child Abuse Material

Click here for a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge may be used when the accused is charged with using a carriage service to access child abuse material under s 474.22(1)(a)(i). Where other forms of conduct under s 474.22(1)(a) are alleged, such as transmitting or soliciting child abuse material, the charge must be adapted.

I must now direct you about the offence of using a carriage service to access child abuse material. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following four elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused intentionally accessed material.[1256]

Two – the accused used a carriage service to access this material.

Three – the material is child abuse material.

Four – the accused was reckless as to the material being child abuse material.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Conduct

The first element the prosecution must prove is that NOA intentionally accessed material.[1257]

In order to prove this part of the offence, the prosecution must prove two matters beyond reasonable doubt:

First, the prosecution must prove that NOA accessed the material.

Second, the prosecution must prove that NOA did so intentionally. This means [she/he] meant to access this material.

The prosecution argue that [refer to relevant prosecution evidence and arguments].

The defence disputes this, and say [refer to relevant defence evidence and arguments].

Carriage Service

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that NOA accessed the material using a carriage service.

[Identify relevant service] is a carriage service. To prove this element, the prosecution must prove that NOA accessed the material using [identify relevant service].

[Discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

Child abuse material

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the material is child abuse material.

The law provides many definitions of child abuse material. In this case, only one definition applies. You must consider these three questions.

One – Does it show a person under the age of 18 years?

Two – Is the person under the age of 18 in a sexual pose or engaging in sexual activity?

Three – Would a reasonable person regard the image as offensive, given all the circumstances?[1258]

If you answer yes to each question, then the material is child abuse material.

[1256] If the prosecution relies on a different form of conduct, this element must be modified accordingly.

[1257] If the prosecution relies on a different form of conduct, this element must be modified accordingly.

[1258] This direction must be modified in cases where other aspects of the definition apply. See 9.4 Use of Carriage Service for Child Abuse Material for guidance.

To decide whether a reasonable person would consider something to be offensive, you must consider current community standards and values. Is it offensive when measured against the standards of morality, decency and propriety generally accepted by reasonable adults?

You must also consider the literary, artistic or educational merit, if any, of the material and the general character of the material. For example a photograph of a naked child in a medical journal may not be offensive, even though the same photograph may be considered offensive if it was in a pornographic magazine.

Age

[If the age of the person depicted is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

As you have heard, the defence disputes that [identify relevant person] is or appears to be under 18.

Determining whether a person appears to be under 18 requires no special skill. For example, in your everyday life, you may look at a person and, based on their physical characteristics, estimate that they are over 50, or under 20. It is the same exercise here. The difference is that this is an element of the offence. You can only find this element proved if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the person is or appears to be under the age of 18.

The prosecution says that you can find that [insert relevant person] was under the age of 18, or appeared to be under 18 at the time the [insert relevant material] was created. [Refer to relevant prosecution evidence and arguments.]

The defence dispute this, and say [refer to relevant defence evidence and arguments].

Recklessness

The fourth element relates to NOA's state of mind.

The prosecution alleges that NOA was reckless as to whether the material [he/she] accessed was child abuse material. This means it must prove that NOA was aware of a substantial risk that the material was child abuse material and in the circumstances as s/he knew them to be, it was unjustifiable to risk accessing the materials.

[If the prosecution also alleges the accused knew or believed the material was child abuse material, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution will also prove this element if you are satisfied the accused knew or believed the material [he/she] accessed was child abuse material.

[Discuss relevant evidence or arguments.]

Defences

[If any of the defences in s 474.24 are relevant, insert appropriate directions on that defence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find the accused guilty, you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proved the following four elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused intentionally accessed material.

Two – the accused used a carriage service to access this material.

Three – the material is child abuse material.

Four – the accused was reckless as to the material being child abuse material.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of using a carriage service to access child abuse material.

Last updated: 4 March 2024

10 Unfitness to Stand Trial

10.1 Investigations into Unfitness to Stand Trial

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. People cannot be tried for criminal offences unless they are fit to stand trial (R v Dashwood [1943] KB 1; R v Benyon [1957] 2 QB 111; Eastman v The Queen (2000) 203 CLR 1).
2. The issue of fitness to stand trial relates to the accused's condition at the time of the trial. This is in contrast to the defence of mental impairment, which relates to the accused's condition at the time of the offence (see 8.4 Mental Impairment) (R v Dennison NSWCCA 3/3/1988; Ngatayi v The Queen (1980) 147 CLR 1; R v Presser [1958] VR 45).
3. The Crimes (Mental Impairment and Unfitness to be Tried) Act 1997 (Vic) (the Act)[1259] sets out the procedure for determining a person's fitness to stand trial. This procedure applies to all trials, regardless of when the alleged offences were committed (Schedule 3).
4. According to the Act, when a real and substantial question is raised concerning a person's fitness to stand trial, an investigation must be held to determine whether s/he is unfit (ss 8, 9). The outcome of that investigation must be determined by the judge (s 14C). These investigations are the focus of this Chapter.
5. Prior to amendments introduced by the COVID–19 Omnibus (Emergency Measures) Act 2020 and the Justice Legislation Amendment (System Enhancements and Other Matters) Act 2021, fitness to stand trial was determined by a specially empanelled jury. The sections which provide for jury determination of fitness remain in force in the Act, but are temporarily suspended while the judge–alone determination provisions are in force (s 5C).
6. If the judge finds the person unfit to stand trial, the judge must determine whether it is likely that s/he will become fit to stand trial within 12 months. If it is likely that s/he will recover within that time, the judge must adjourn the matter. If it is not likely, a special hearing must be held to determine whether that person committed the offence charged (ss 14F, 15). These special hearings are examined in 10.2 Special Hearings.

When must an Investigation into the Accused's Fitness be Held?

7. A judge must order an investigation into the accused's fitness to stand trial if it appears that there is a "real and substantial question" about that issue (s 9).
8. A "real and substantial question" will exist whenever it would be open to a properly instructed jury to conclude that the accused was not fit to stand trial (Eastman v The Queen (2000) 203 CLR 1; R v Alford [2005] VSC 404; Kesavarajah v The Queen (1994) 181 CLR 230).

[1259] All references to legislative sections and schedules refer to the Crimes (Mental Impairment and Unfitness to be Tried) Act 1997 (Vic).

9. To order an investigation, a judge does not need to have formed a prima facie view that the accused is unfit to be tried. When the question of fitness was to be determined by a jury, courts held that where there is a reason to doubt the accused's fitness, it must be left to the jury unless no reasonable jury could conclude that the accused was unfit (s 7(3); Kesavarajah v The Queen (1994) 181 CLR 230; R v Khallouf [1981] VR 360).

10. It is not necessary to call admissible evidence to raise a real and substantial question of the accused's fitness to be tried. Assertions from the bar table setting out a reasonable basis for concerns about fitness can be sufficient to raise the question, or at least warrant an adjournment to gather further evidence. Similarly, abnormal or eccentric behaviour by the accused during a trial may raise the question of the accused's fitness to be tried (SM v R (2011) 33 VR 393; [2011] VSCA 332; Eastman v R (2000) 203 CLR 1; [2000] HCA 29 (Callinan J); c.f. R v Coffee, Unreported, NSW SC, 20 November 1992).

11. The obligation to order an investigation is part of the judge's duty to ensure a fair trial. Where the accused is unrepresented, or has previously been found unfit to be tried, the judge must be particularly careful to ensure that the trial is not unfair (Heffernan v The Queen (2005) 194 FLR 370; Eastman v The Queen (2000) 203 CLR 1).

12. Failing to order an investigation where there is a real and substantial question about the accused's fitness to stand trial will constitute a fundamental defect in the trial procedure, rendering the trial a nullity (Eastman v The Queen (2000) 203 CLR 1).

13. It is not clear whether the change from the jury determining fitness to the judge determining fitness affects when it will be appropriate to refer fitness to an investigation.

14. In R v Young, the trial judge was found to have erred by giving significant weight to the impact of planned adjustments to trial procedure in deciding whether there remained a real question about fitness after receiving expert evidence which contended that the accused was unfit. The Queensland Court of Appeal held that such reasoning engaged with the merits of the fitness question, rather than focusing on the threshold question of whether the jury needed to consider the accused's fitness (R v Young (2021) 8 QR 68, [207]).

Procedure for Ordering an Investigation

15. The issue of the accused's fitness to stand trial may be raised at any stage of the proceedings by the prosecution, the defence or the judge (s 9; Eastman v The Queen (2000) 203 CLR 1; R v Presser [1958] VR 45).

16. The procedure for ordering an investigation differs, depending on when the issue of fitness arises. If it arises during a committal hearing:

    - The committal must proceed in accordance with the normal procedure;
    - If the accused is committed for trial, the magistrate must reserve the question of fitness for consideration by the trial judge;
    - The trial judge must then determine whether there is a real and substantial question about the accused's fitness; and
    - If the judge decides that there is a real and substantial question about the accused's fitness, an investigation into his/her fitness must commence within 3 months of the committal (with scope for extension) (s 8).

17. If the question of fitness arises during a trial, the trial must be adjourned or discontinued to allow an investigation to be conducted (s 9).

18. The potential obligation to order an investigation into the accused's fitness continues until the jury's verdict has been delivered. A judge may therefore be required to adjourn a trial and order an investigation after the close of the prosecution case, or even after final addresses to the jury – because the accused must be able to make a defence (see below), and so may be unfit if s/he is not able to respond to jury questions (especially if s/he is unrepresented) (Kesavarajah v The Queen (1994) 181 CLR 230).

19. As the issue of the accused's fitness to stand trial may be raised more than once in the same proceedings, the fact that an investigation has previously been held does not prevent a judge from ordering another investigation (s 9(3)).

20. A judge may vacate an order for an investigation prior to empanelling a jury. This may be suitable where the order was made in error, or if the question about the accused's fitness has been resolved (R v Demicoli [2006] VSCA 69).

Nature of an Investigation

Role of the Judge

21. The question of the accused's fitness to stand trial is a question of fact (s 7(3)).

22. It is presumed that every person is fit to stand trial. The judge's role in an investigation is to determine, on the balance of probabilities, whether that "presumption of fitness" has been rebutted (s 7).

Evidence

23. The court must hear any relevant evidence and submissions put by the prosecution or the defence (s 14D(1)(a)).

24. The trial judge may also call evidence on his/her own initiative, if s/he is of the opinion that it is in the interests of justice to do so (s 14D(1)(b)(i)).

25. The trial judge may require the accused to undergo a medical examination, and require the results of that examination to be put before the court (s 14D(1)(b)(ii)–(iii)).

Onus of Proof

26. The standard of proof in an unfitness investigation is the civil standard of the balance of probabilities (s 14C).

27. Which party will bear the onus of proof depends on who raises the issue:

    - If it is raised by the prosecution, it will be for the prosecution to prove;
    - If it is raised by the defence, it will be for the defence to prove;
    - If it is raised by the judge, neither party bears the onus of proof (although the prosecution has carriage of the matter) (ss 7(4), 7(5)).[1260]

Test for Determining the Accused's Fitness

Statutory Test

28. According to section 6(1) of the Act, to find a person unfit to stand trial the judge must be satisfied, on the balance of probabilities, that because his/her mental processes are disordered or impaired, s/he is (or will be at some time during the trial):

    i) Unable to understand the nature of the charge; or [1260] In such cases, the jury must still determine, on the balance of probabilities, whether the presumption of fitness has been rebutted.

ii) Unable to enter a plea; or

iii) Unable to exercise the right to challenge jurors or the jury pool; or

iv) Unable to understand the nature of a trial as an inquiry into whether the accused committed the offence; or

v) Unable to follow the course of the trial; or

vi) Unable to understand the substantial effect of any evidence that may be given in support of the prosecution; or

vii) Unable to instruct counsel.

29. There are two parts to this test. The judge must find that:

i) The accused currently suffers from at least one of the abovementioned incapacities, or will at some time during the trial; and

ii) That incapacity is caused by the accused's impaired or disordered mental processes.

Relevance of Common Law Authorities

30. The statutory test is largely derived from the common law test for fitness to stand trial. Common law authorities will therefore be relevant when interpreting the statutory test.

31. Under the common law, a person would be unfit to stand trial if s/he was:

i) Unable to understand the nature of the charge; or

ii) Unable to plead to the charge or exercise the right of challenge; or

iii) Unable to understand the nature of the proceedings as an inquiry into whether s/he committed the offence charged; or

iv) Unable to follow the course of the proceedings so as to understand what is going on in court in a general sense, even though s/he need not understand the purpose of all the various court formalities; or

v) Unable to understand the substantial effect of any evidence that may be given against him/her; or

vi) Unable to decide what defence s/he will rely upon or make his/her defence or version of facts known to the court or to counsel (R v Presser [1958] VR 45; Eastman v The Queen (2000) 203 CLR 1).

Determining the Accused's Capacities

32. The judge should determine whether the accused is unfit to stand trial in a common sense fashion – because if the test is applied too literally, it may incorrectly set a threshold for fitness that can only be met by a person of very high intelligence (Sinclair v The King (1946) 73 CLR 316; R v Presser [1958] VR 45).

33. The fact that the accused could perform better against some of the specified requirements if s/he had greater intelligence, or received additional treatment, is not determinative. The critical question is whether the accused meets the minimum requirements for fitness specified in the Act (R v Rivkin (2004) 59 NSWLR 284; Clarkson v The Queen [2007] NSWCCA 70).

34. The ability of an accused to follow the course of the trial, and to understand the substantial effect of the evidence, may depend on the complexity of the trial. For example, a greater degree of understanding and capacity may be required for a complex fraud trial than for a trial in which the issues are narrow and well defined (R v Wahlstedt [2003] SADC 172; R v Gillard [2006] SASC 46).

35. Where counsel will aid the accused during the trial, the jury should take this assistance into account in determining whether s/he is, or will be, able to understand and follow its processes (Ngatayi v The Queen (1980) 147 CLR 1; R v Miller [No 2] [2000] SASC 152).

36. Poor forensic choices, or counter-productive behaviour, will not, of themselves, render a person unfit to be tried. While the accused must be able to make forensic choices, and instruct counsel on the nature of his/her defence, s/he is not required to make an able defence (Heffernan v The Queen (2005) 194 FLR 370; Eastman v The Queen (2000) 203 CLR 1; Kesavarajah v The Queen (1994) 181 CLR 230; R v Taylor (1992) 77 CCC (3d) 551; R v Presser [1958] VR 45).

37. A person will not be unfit to stand trial simply because s/he is suffering from memory loss (e.g. s/he cannot remember the facts surrounding the alleged offending) (s 6(2); R v Dennison NSWCCA 3/3/1988).

38. Bizarre or disruptive behaviour does not, of itself, render a person unfit to be tried (Eastman v The Queen (2000) 203 CLR 1; R v Taylor (1992) 77 CCC (3d) 551).

39. The mere fact that a person refuses to rely on the defence of mental impairment, which may be open on the evidence, does not mean that s/he is unfit to stand trial. A person may rationally reject such an option out of concern for the consequences of a finding of not guilty by reason of mental impairment (R v Bridge [2005] NSWCCA 122).

Future Unfitness

40. In assessing whether an accused is fit to be tried, the judge is required to consider both his/her present condition and his/her likely condition during the trial (s 6(1)).

41. The expected length of the trial may affect the jury's assessment of the accused's likely future condition. They may take into account the possibility of deterioration over the course of the trial, as well as the risks associated with the disruption of a longer trial (Kesavarajah v The Queen (1994) 181 CLR 230; R v Miller [No 2] [2000] SASC 152).

42. In cases where the accused's condition is sensitive to stress, the jury may also take into account the fact that as a trial continues, his/her stress is likely to progressively accumulate. This may be of particular relevance in lengthy trials (R v Wilson [2000] NSWSC 1104).

Unfitness and Mental Impairment

43. The fitness of the accused to be tried addresses different issues to the defence of mental impairment. An accused may be unfit to be tried even if s/he is not insane (in either the colloquial sense or the M'Naughten sense) (Ngatayi v The Queen (1980) 147 CLR 1; R v Presser [1958] VR 45).

44. Similarly, the mere existence of a mental disorder will not mean that the accused is unfit to be tried. There must be some link between the mental disorder and the ability of the accused to understand and participate in the trial process (Heffernan v The Queen (2005) 194 FLR 370; Eastman v The Queen (2000) 203 CLR 1; R v Taylor (1992) 77 CCC (3d) 551).

45. A mental disorder may produce delusions related to the subject matter of the case, or affect the accused's ability to have a trusting relationship with his/her counsel, without affecting his/her fitness to be tried (Heffernan v The Queen (2005) 194 FLR 370; Eastman v The Queen (2000) 203 CLR 1; R v Taylor (1992) 77 CCC (3d) 551).

Impaired or Disordered Mental Processes

46. While the accused does not need to be insane to be considered unfit to stand trial, his/her incapacity must be caused by impaired or disordered mental processes (Crimes (Mental Impairment and Unfitness to be Tried) Act 1997 s 6(1)).

47. This does not mean that the accused must suffer from a mental illness. A person's mental processes may be impaired or disordered due to other factors, such as an intellectual impairment, a learning disability or acquired brain injury (R v Miller [No 2] [2000] SASC 152; R v Gillespie (1987) 30 A Crim R 14).

48. A person's "mental processes" may also be "impaired or disordered" where impairment impedes the reception rather than the processing of information (R v Abdulla (2005) 93 SASR 208). This means that in some circumstances, a physical impairment such as deafness or a language barrier may fall within s 6(1).

Last updated: 22 March 2023

10.2 Special Hearings

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. The Crimes (Mental Impairment and Unfitness to be Tried) Act 1997 (Vic) (the Act)[1261] sets out the procedure to be followed if a person may be unfit to stand trial. This procedure applies to all trials, regardless of when the alleged offences were committed (Schedule 3).

2. According to the Act, when a real and substantial question is raised concerning a person's fitness to stand trial, an investigation must be held to determine whether s/he is unfit (ss 8, 9). The outcome of that investigation must be determined by a specially convened jury (s 11). These investigations are examined in 10.1 Investigations into Unfitness to Stand Trial.

3. If that jury finds the person unfit to stand trial, it may be necessary to hold a special hearing to determine whether s/he committed the offences charged (ss 12, 15). These special hearings are the focus of this Chapter.

When Must a Special Hearing be Held?

4. There are three stages at which a judge may be required to order a special hearing:

   i) At the conclusion of an investigation into the accused's fitness to stand trial;

   ii) At the end of an adjournment period following a finding of unfitness; or

   iii) Upon application by the defence or the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Purpose of a Special Hearing

5. The purpose of a special hearing is to determine whether, on the evidence available, the accused:

   - Is not guilty of the offence charged;
   - Is not guilty of the offence charged because of mental impairment; or
   - Committed the offence charged or an available alternative offence (s 15).

6. The jury's role is to make one of the abovementioned findings (s 18(1)).

[1261] All references to legislative sections or schedules refer to the Crimes (Mental Impairment and Unfitness to be Tried) Act 1997 (Vic).

7. A finding that the accused "committed the offence charged" (or an available alternative) is not the same as a verdict of guilty. It is a qualified finding of guilt, and does not constitute a basis in law for any conviction for the offence to which the finding relates (s 18(3)(a)).
8. Where the jury makes such a finding, the judge must declare that the accused is liable to supervision, or order that s/he be released unconditionally (s 18(4)).
9. A finding that the accused committed the offence charged constitutes a bar to further prosecution in respect of the same circumstances, and is subject to appeal in the same manner as if the accused had been convicted of the offence in a criminal trial (ss 18(3)(b), (c)).
10. Jury findings of "not guilty" and "not guilty because of mental impairment" are to be taken for all purposes as if they were findings made at a criminal trial (ss 18(1), (2)).

Onus of Proof

11. To find that the accused committed the offence charged, or an available alternative offence, the jury must be satisfied of that fact beyond reasonable doubt (s 17(2)).
12. To find the accused not guilty because of mental impairment, the jury must be satisfied by defence argument on the balance of probabilities (s 21(2); 8.4 Mental Impairment).

Procedure

13. At a special hearing, the accused is taken to have pleaded not guilty (s 16(2)(a)).
14. Special hearings should be conducted as nearly as possible as if they were criminal trials. To that end:
    - The Juries Act 2000 applies;
    - The rules of evidence apply;
    - Criminal Procedure Act 2009 ss 197 and 232A apply;
    - The accused's legal representative may exercise the accused's rights to challenge jurors or the jury;
    - All defences that would be available in a criminal trial are available (including the defence of mental impairment); and
    - Any alternative verdicts that would be available in a criminal trial are available (s 16).

Special Hearings and Mental Impairments

15. The "consent mental impairment" provisions of Crimes (Mental Impairment and Unfitness to be Tried) Act 1997 s 21(4) do not apply to special hearings (SM v R (2013) 46 VR 464).
16. This means that, where a person is found unfit to be tried, the question of mental impairment must be resolved by a jury and cannot be determined through the judge–alone process (SM v R (2013) 46 VR 464. Compare s 21(4)).
17. See 8.4 Mental Impairment (on page 628) for further information concerning Crimes (Mental Impairment and Unfitness to be Tried) Act 1997 s 21.

Mandatory Directions

18. At the start of a special hearing, the judge must explain to the jury:
    - That the defendant is unfit to be tried in accordance with the usual procedures of a criminal trial;

- The meaning of being unfit to stand trial;
- The purpose of the special hearing;
- The findings that are available; and
- The standard of proof required for those findings (s 16(3)).[1262]

19. These directions must be given at the commencement of a special hearing. It is not sufficient to give them in running, or at the end of proceedings (Subramaniam v The Queen (2004) 211 ALR 1).
20. A judge cannot avoid giving these directions on the basis that counsel have already covered the relevant matters in their addresses to the jury (Subramaniam v The Queen (2004) 211 ALR 1).

Other Directions

21. As special hearings must be conducted (as far as possible) as if they were criminal trials, judges must give any other directions which must ordinarily be given in a criminal trial. See Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.
22. Judges must be alert to ensure that there is not a miscarriage of justice. For example, if the accused's mental impairment leads him/her to behave in a way that is prejudicial to his/her own interests, the jury should be given a suitable warning to counter the prejudice (R v Smith [1999] NSWCCA 126).
23. The jury do not need to be told why the accused is unfit to be tried. A special hearing may proceed without any information being led concerning the accused's mental impairment (Subramaniam v The Queen (2004) 211 ALR 1).
24. Confession evidence given by a person suffering from a mental impairment carries special risks (R v Parker (1990) 19 NSWLR 177).

Last updated: 20 May 2022

10.2.1 Charge: Special Hearing

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge addresses the directions which must be given at the beginning of a special hearing (Crimes (Mental Impairment and Unfitness to be Tried) Act 1997 s 16). It has been designed to be used instead of 1.5.1 Charge: The Role of Judge and Jury and 1.7.1 Charge: Onus and Standard of Proof.

Many other charges contained in the Charge Book will also be relevant to special hearings. If these charges are used, appropriate changes should be made to reflect the differences between special hearings and criminal trials (e.g. the available findings).

Introduction

Serving on a jury may be a completely new experience for some, if not all, of you. To help you perform that role properly, I will now describe your duties as jurors and the procedures that we will follow. I will also explain to you some of the principles of law that apply in this case.

During and at the end of this hearing, I will give you further instructions about the law that applies to this case. You must listen closely to all of these instructions and follow them carefully.

[1262] As these directions are required by law, Part 3 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 does not apply (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 10).

If at any time you have a question about anything I say, please feel free to ask me. It would be best if you did this by writing it down, and passing it to my tipstaff, [insert name], who will hand it to me.

Fitness to Stand Trial

Members of the jury, you represent one of the most important institutions in our community – the institution of the jury. Our legal system guarantees any individual charged with a criminal offence the right to have the case presented against him or her determined at a trial by twelve independent and open-minded members of the community, in accordance with the law.

However, the law recognises that it would be unfair and unjust for a trial to take place if the person charged is unable to understand the case against him or her, or to meaningfully participate in the trial. According to the law, a person must be fit to stand trial before he or she can be convicted of an offence.

To be fit to stand trial, a person must be capable of meeting the minimum standards of mental capacity specified by the law. If a jury determines that s/he is unable to meet all of these standards, s/he will be unfit to be tried in accordance with the usual procedures of a criminal trial.

That is what has happened in this case. A question was raised about NOA's fitness to stand trial, and a jury found that s/he is not fit to stand trial in the usual way. Special procedures must therefore be used instead.

Reasons for Unfitness

The accused's unfitness for a normal trial may or may not be apparent to you as this hearing proceeds. That is because there are several reasons why a person may be unfit to stand trial.

S/he may not, for example, understand the nature of the charge against him/her, or be able to decide whether s/he has a defence to it. S/he may not be able to make a rational decision about whether s/he is guilty or not guilty of the offence[s] charged, or about how to plead to the charge[s]. S/he may not be able to understand the nature of the criminal proceedings and what their course and outcome may mean to him/her, or to involve himself/herself in these proceedings in an informed or constructive way.

His/her unfitness to stand trial may relate to his/her ability to give instructions to his/her lawyer. For example, s/he may not be able to adequately tell his/her lawyer what his/her defence is, or in what respects the prosecution evidence is wrong or should be questioned and tested.

None of these matters may be apparent to you in relation to NOA. But whether or not they are apparent, you must accept that s/he is unable to meet all of the minimum standards required for a person to receive a fair trial.

Purpose of a Special Hearing

The fact that a person is not fit to stand trial does not prevent a jury from determining whether or not s/he committed a crime. It simply means that the matter may not be determined in accordance with the usual procedures of a criminal trial. Instead, it must be determined at what is called a "special hearing". That is what is happening here today.

The purpose of a special hearing is to see that justice is done to both the accused person and the prosecution, in light of the accused's inability to be tried in the normal way. In particular, it allows a jury to determine whether or not an accused who is unfit to stand trial committed the offence[s] charged. The accused and the prosecution both have an interest in resolving this matter.

In this case, it has been alleged by the prosecution that NOA committed the offence[s] of [insert offences]. This is a special hearing for you to determine whether s/he did commit [that offence/those offences].

I note that, when referring to the crime[s] that the accused has been charged with, I will sometimes use the words "offence", "count" or "charge" – they all mean the same thing.

Differences between Special Hearings and Criminal Trials

Available Findings

The verdicts that you may give in a special hearing differ from those that you may give in a criminal trial. In a criminal trial, if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused committed an offence, you must give a verdict of "guilty". By contrast, in a special hearing, your verdict in that circumstance must be that the accused "committed the offence".

This reflects the fact that, while the parties to this case have an interest in determining whether the accused committed the relevant offence[s], it would be unjust to find him/her guilty when s/he is not fit to be tried in the normal way. While in such circumstances it would be unfair for the accused to receive a criminal conviction, it would not be unjust to find the accused not guilty of the offence.

At the end of the hearing, the other verdicts available to you will therefore be "not guilty" or "not guilty because of mental impairment". I will explain the difference between these two verdicts later.

Accused's Role

A special hearing may also differ from a normal criminal trial in the way in which the accused contributes to his/her defence. For example, in a criminal trial, the accused may or may not choose to give evidence. In a special hearing, while the accused is entitled to contribute to his/her defence, his/her unfitness may make him/her incapable of making rational decisions about what to do. S/he may therefore not be as involved in the hearing as s/he might be in a criminal trial.

Although there are some differences between a special hearing and a normal criminal trial, the law aims to ensure that a special hearing does not prejudice the accused any more than his/her unfitness already may do. S/he may therefore raise, or have raised on his/her behalf, any defences a fit person could raise in a normal trial.

Roles of Judge, Jury and Counsel

In all hearings of this type, the court consists of a judge and jury. We are going to be assisted in this case by counsel for the prosecution, [insert prosecutor's name], and defence counsel, [insert defence counsel's name].[1263] Each of us has a different role to play.

Role of the Jury

It is your role, as the jury, to decide what the facts are in this case. You are the only ones in this court who can make a decision about the facts. You make that decision from all of the evidence given during the hearing.

It is also your task to apply the law to the facts that you have found, and by doing that decide whether the offence[s] charged [has/have] been proven against the accused.

To find that the accused committed the offence[s] charged, you must be satisfied that s/he committed [it/them] beyond reasonable doubt. In contrast, to find the accused not guilty because of mental impairment, you must be satisfied of that fact on the balance of probabilities. If you are not able to make either of those findings, then you will find the accused not guilty. I will give you more directions about these two standards of proof later.

[1263] This sentence will need to be modified if the accused is unrepresented.

Role of the Judge

It is my role, as the judge, to ensure that this hearing is fair and conducted in accordance with the law. I will also explain to you the principles of law that you must apply to make your decision. You must accept and follow all of those directions.

I want to emphasise that it is not my responsibility to decide this case. The verdict that you return has absolutely nothing to do with me. So while you must follow any directions I give you about the law, you are not bound by any comments I may make about the facts.

It is unlikely that I will make any comments about the evidence. If you disagree with my comments, you must disregard them. Do not give them any extra weight because I, as the judge, have made them. It is your view of the facts which matters, not mine. You are the judges of facts – you alone.

Role of Counsel

The role of counsel is to present the case for the side for which they appear. [Insert name of prosecutor] presents the charge[s] in the name of the State. [Insert name of defence counsel] appears for the accused, and will represent him/her throughout the hearing.[1264]

You do not need to accept any comments that counsel may make during their addresses. Of course, if you agree with an argument they present, you can adopt it – in effect, it becomes your own argument. But if you do not agree with their view, you must put it aside. As I have told you, you alone are the judges of the facts.

Similarly, you are not bound by what counsel says about the law. I am the judge of the law, and it is what I tell you about the law that matters. If counsel says something different from what I say about the law, you must ignore it and follow my directions.

[Insert directions from 1.5.1 Charge: Decide Solely on the Evidence and 1.6.1 Charge: Assessing Witnesses]

Onus and Standard of Proof

I'm now going to give you directions about the standards of proof. The starting point is that in our justice system people are presumed to be innocent, unless and until they are proved guilty. This principle applies in this special hearing just as it does in a regular trial.

As the prosecution brings the charge[s] against the accused, it is for the prosecution to prove that/those charge[s].

The prosecution must prove the accused committed the offence[s] charged beyond reasonable doubt. You have probably heard these words before, and they mean exactly what they say – proof beyond reasonable doubt.

This is the highest standard of proof that our law demands. It is not enough for the prosecution to prove that the accused probably, or very likely, committed the offence[s] charged. That is enough to prove something on the balance of probabilities, but it is not enough to prove something beyond reasonable doubt.

In deciding whether the prosecution has proved its case beyond reasonable doubt, you should remember that it is almost impossible to prove anything with absolute certainty when reconstructing past events and the prosecution does not have to do so. A reasonable doubt is not an imaginary or fanciful doubt, or an unrealistic possibility.

[1264] This section will need to be modified if the accused is unrepresented.

Unless I tell you otherwise, when I say that the prosecution must "prove" or "establish" a matter, or that you must be "satisfied" about a matter, I mean the prosecution must prove or establish a matter, or you must be satisfied of that matter, beyond reasonable doubt.

The prosecution does not need to prove every fact that they allege to this standard. It is the essential ingredients or "elements" of the charge[s] that they must prove to this standard. In this case, that means that the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that [list elements of the primary offence. Repeat for any other offences].[1265]

I will explain these elements to you in detail, and relate them to the evidence in this case, after you have heard all of the evidence.

However, for now you should know that it is only if you find that the prosecution has proven all of the elements of a charge beyond reasonable doubt that you may find that the accused committed the offence[s] charged. If you are not satisfied that the prosecution has done this, your verdict in relation to that charge must be "Not Guilty".

As I mentioned before, the third verdict you can return is "not guilty because of mental impairment", and the accused must establish this on the balance of probabilities. This is one of those rare situations in which a matter must be proved by the defence. The prosecution must still prove [identify matters the prosecution must prove] before you need to consider the issue of mental impairment. However, if you are satisfied that those matters have all been proven, it is defence counsel who must prove the requirements of this defence if you are to find the accused not guilty because of mental impairment.

Unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – the defence only needs to prove these requirements on what is called the "balance of probabilities". This is a much lower standard than that required of the prosecution when proving an offence. It only requires the defence to prove that it is more probable than not that NOA was mentally impaired to the necessary degree. I will have more to say about this at the end of the trial.

Last updated: 4 March 2024

11 Factual Questions and Integrated Directions

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Understanding factual question directions

1. Jury Directions Act 2015 s 67 permits a judge to give directions in the form of factual questions which address the matters the jury must consider in order to reach a verdict. When combined with evidentiary directions, references to how the prosecution and defence have put their case and any necessary references to the evidence, the result is described as an 'integrated direction'.
2. Factual question directions are sometimes called:
    - Question trails
    - Decision trees
    - Route to verdict
    - Stepped verdict
3. For the sake of clarity, this Charge book uses the following terminology:

[1265] See Mental Impairment and Proof of Elements in 8.4 Mental Impairment for information on which elements should be identified for this purpose.

- A question trail is the jury handout which contains a statement of the matters the jury must determine in the form of factual questions
- Factual question directions are the oral directions provided by the judge which instruct on how to use the question trail
- Integrated directions are a form of factual question direction which includes directions about the evidence and how the parties put their case as part of directing the jury about each individual factual question.

4. Juror comprehension researchers have described factual question directions in the following manner:

> [J]udges determine the elements of the offence that must be proved, as well as those of any relevant defences. These elements are converted into the form of questions relating directly to the facts of the case, and are then placed in their most logical order. The questions are presented in writing in the form of a "question trail", and may be accompanied by relevant evidentiary directions and arguments in summary form.
>
> Such an approach largely removes the need for jurors to learn and understand the law, since the judge has already performed the task of identifying relevant legal principles and their application in the particular case. This should theoretically reduce the intrinsic cognitive load associated with standard instructions, leading to improved application.[1266]

5. Factual question directions and question trails are also thought to improve deliberative processes. By providing the jury with a clear framework for decision making, jurors appear to be able to structure their discussions in a way that maximises the performance of all jurors on the jury. It also assists jurors to identify what they need to do, and to focus their discussions on the facts in issue.[1267]

6. The difference between question trails and the checklists presented earlier in this Charge Book lies in the degree of specificity of the written material. Spivak and others described the distinction as follows:

> Unlike question trails, which utilize a sequence of concrete questions that make explicit reference to the facts of the case; checklists typically utilize a sequence of abstract questions of law that reflect the elements of the case.[1268]

7. Directing a jury by reference to factual questions is not new. In 1973, Lucas J in a murder prosecution arising out a fire lit at a nightclub, framed the questions for the jury as:

> (1) Did Finch light the fire?
>
> (2) Did Stuart counsel Finch to light the fire, in the sense which I have tried to explain it to you?
>
> (3) Did the fire cause the death of Jennifer Davie?

[1266] Jonathan Clough et al, 'The Judge as Cartographer and Guide: The Role of Fact-based Directions in Improving Juror Comprehension' (2018) 42 Crim LJ 278, 293, 295-6.

[1267] Jonathan Clough et al, 'The Judge as Cartographer and Guide: The Role of Fact-based Directions in Improving Juror Comprehension' (2018) 42 Crim LJ 278, 283; Benjamin Spivak, James RP Ogloff and Jonathan Clough, 'Asking the Right Questions: Examining the Efficacy of Question Trails as a Method of Improving Lay Comprehension and Application of Legal Concepts' (2019) 26(3) Psychiatry, Psychology and Law 441, 452.

[1268] Benjamin Spivak et al, 'The Impact of Fact-Based Instructions on Juror Application of the Law: Results from a Trans-Tasman Field Study', (2020) 101(1) Social Science Quarterly 346.

> (4) Did Finch light the fire in the prosecution of the unlawful purpose of extortion carried on in conjunction with Stuart?
> (5) Was Finch's act in lighting the fire an act of such a nature as to be likely to endanger human life?
> (6) Was the offence constituted by the unlawful killing of Jennifer Davie a probable consequence of carrying out Stuart's counsel?[1269]

8. More recently, in Clayton v The Queen, the High Court considered the way in which a jury should be directed when the prosecution put forward three separate bases for accessorial liability in proof of murder. Noting that the three different forms of accessorial liability gave rise to a degree of repetition, the majority judgment observed that:

> The real issues in the case which the jury had to decide were issues of fact. It was for the trial judge to determine what those real issues were and to instruct the jury about only so much of the law as must guide them to a decision on those issues. It may have been possible to instruct the jury in a way that avoided repetition of what, in the end, were relatively few issues for their consideration (Clayton v The Queen [2006] 81 ALJR 439, [24]).

9. Similarly, the Court of Appeal in MG v The Queen observed that a factual question of whether the accused was awake at the time of offending would have addressed whether the act was conscious, voluntary and deliberate, but that the trial judge's attempt to subsume voluntariness within a question of intention was not appropriate.[1270]

10. Factual question directions provide ones means of giving effect to the guidance from Alford v Magee, where the High Court endorsed the approach of Sir Leo Cussen:

> He held that the only law which it was necessary for them to know was SO much as must guide them to a decision on the real issue or issues in the case, and that the judge was charged with, and bound to accept, the responsibility (1) of deciding what are the real issues in the particular case, and (2) of telling the jury, in the light of the law, what those issues are. If the case were a criminal case, and the charge were of larceny, and the only real issue were as to the asportavit, probably no judge would dream of instructing the jury on the general law of larceny. He would simply tell them that if the accused did a particular act, he was guilty of larceny, and that, if he did not do that particular act, he was not guilty of larceny.[1271]

11. In the United Kingdom, factual questions (called Routes to Verdict or RTVs) have been enthusiastically endorsed by their Court of Appeal (Criminal Division), which relies on them in the following ways:

> First, the RTV enables the CACD to express confidence about how, even if not why, the jury reached its verdict. Second, by analysing the verdict and the RTV the CACD has enhanced confidence in rejecting arguments that verdicts were inconsistent. Third, in some case the RTV has been used to contextualise jury questions and allay concerns about any potential jury confusion. Fourth, RTVs help validate the way disputed evidence was left to the jury.
> ...
> The Court has, of course, also repeatedly relied on the RTV as confirmation of a failing at trial rendering the conviction unsafe—as where the elements of the offence were wrong in law, or when dealing with post-Jogee challenges to old joint enterprise [1269] Stuart v The Queen (1974) 134 CLR 426, 431.

---

[1270] MG v The Queen (2010) 29 VR 305.

[1271] Alford v Magee (1952) 85 CLR 437, 466. See also R v AJS (2005) 12 VR 563, 577 [54]-[56].

directions.[1272]

12. Ormerod and Thomas, however, warn of risks inherent in using Routes to Verdict:

> By reducing everything to a series of questions presented concisely and simply the subtleties of legal definitions might be lost or the law "glossed" for convenience. For example, in multi-handed murders, following Jogee, D2 must be shown, inter alia, to have intended that D1 intentionally kill or do GBH. The Supreme Court recognised that in some cases there will be no practical distinction between that test and whether D2 himself intended that V be killed or suffer GBH, but underlined that strictly speaking the former test is sufficient to render D2 a murderer. When crafting an RTV, judges may well be tempted by pragmatism to invite the jury to consider simply whether D2 intended death or GBH. That allows for the same RTV question on mens rea for both principals and accessories. But is this interpretation driven by the convenience of the RTV? There may well be many other instances in which RTVs risk putting a gloss on the law in a similar way.[1273]

13. A factual question style of directing the jury on particular issues has been upheld from time to time by appellate courts in Victoria, including in:

- Quail v The Queen [2014] VSCA 336 – Where self defence was replaced with a direction to determine whether the accused was the aggressor by bringing the gun to the scene[1274]
- Farquharson v The Queen (2012) 36 VR 538 – Where voluntariness was expanded through a direction that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused did not suffer from a particular medical condition which would have been inconsistent with causing death by a conscious, voluntary and deliberate act
- White v The Queen [2011] VSCA 441 – Where proof of the identity of the offender was expanded through a direction that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that a different person did not shoot the deceased.

14. In Star v The Queen, the trial judge gave the jury a document which was described on appeal as "a series of 'integrated directions' (commonly described as a 'question trail'), as authorised by s 67 of the Jury Directions Act 2015". This document contained a statement of the element, the particulars of the element by reference to each charge, and a summary of the prosecution and defence case on that element for each charge.[1275] The practice of including a summary of the case as part of the question trail document is commonly followed in New Zealand, but is not proposed in the sample question trails in this Charge Book, for several reasons:

- It some cases, the final position of the parties is not known until final addresses, and there is insufficient time for the judge to prepare the summary after final addresses and before the judge's directions

---

[1272] David Ormerod and Cheryl Thomas, 'Routes to verdict – what we know and what we need to know', 2021 8 Crim LR 615, 617 (citations omitted). See also R v Kay [2017] EWCA Crim 2214, [34]; R v Atta-Dankwa [2018] EWCA Crim 320, [29]-[32].

[1273] David Ormerod and Cheryl Thomas, 'Routes to verdict – what we know and what we need to know', 2021 8 Crim LR 615, 618.

[1274] But note that Priest JA, in dissent found that while simplification of issues is desirable, it must not obscure the essential issues for the jury's determination.

[1275] Star v The Queen [2020] VSCA 331, [42].

- Including summaries risks exacerbating the appearance that the charge is not balanced between the prosecution and defence, if the summaries are not of similar length
- Some lawyers and judges have concerns that reducing the case to writing in that way will cause the jury to pay disproportionate attention to the summary, compared to their own recollection of the evidence

15. Despite these considerations, it is worth noting that the Court of Appeal in Star observed that the document was likely to be of great assistance to the jury "by integrated the elements of the offences with the facts of the case in the form of easily comprehensible questions".[1276]

16. Different judges have different views on which trials are most suited to a question trail approach. On one view, question trails are best used in the most complex cases, where there is often a high degree of case management, and a need to maximise the assistance for the jury. Another view is that question trails are suitable for all cases, but the degree of difference between the question trail and the conventional checklist varies, depending on what issues are in dispute and whether there is a difference between the legal and factual issues.

Preparing factual question directions

17. The following topics in this Charge Book provide examples of factual question directions and checklists.

18. In developing these samples, the authors of the Charge Book adopted the following sequence:

    (a) Develop a hypothetical model for the trial which identifies the facts and issues in dispute

    (b) Revise the standard offence checklist to transform the elemental questions of the checklist into factual questions, based on the hypothetical model

    (c) Revise the standard offence directions to align with the factual question checklist and the issues in the hypothetical model.

19. Jury Directions Act 2015 s 11 states:

[1276] Star v The Queen [2020] VSCA 331, [43].

After the close of all evidence and before the closing address of the prosecution—

(a) the prosecution must inform the trial judge whether it considers that the following matters are open on the evidence and, if so, whether it relies on them—

(i) any alternative offence, including an element of any alternative offence;

(ii) any alternative basis of complicity in the commission of the offence charged and any alternative offence; and

(b) defence counsel must then inform the trial judge whether he or she considers that the following matters are or are not in issue—

(i) each element of the offence charged;

(ii) any defence;

(iii) any alternative offence, including an element of any alternative offence;

(iv) any alternative basis of complicity in the commission of the offence charged and any alternative offence.

20. This process will provide the judge with the information required to identify what elements, defences, alternative offences and alternative bases of complicity must be considered in the form of factual questions.

21. As Maxwell P and Tate JA noted in Quail v The Queen:

> It is not always necessary to put before a jury matters such as self-defence or accident, or even those that are elemental, if they are not raised as an issue by the evidence.[1277]

22. The sample question trails, factual question directions and integrated directions are designed for a specific hypothetical scenario. Like all materials in this charge book, they must be adapted to address the real issues in any given case, based on the evidence and issues.

23. After preparing the proposed question trail and factual question directions, the judge should cautiously consider the following questions:

(a) Do the directions accurately reflect the factual questions which the jury must determine in the circumstances of the case?

(b) Do the directions erroneously omit any necessary elements?

(c) Are the factual questions and hence the directions organised in a logical sequence, based on the issues in the case?

(d) Where there are alternative offences, how do the answers to particular questions affect the need to consider alternative verdicts? For example, if there are issues of both identity and intention, then the jury will only need to consider alternative offences involving lesser states of intention if the prosecution proves the attacker was the accused in relation to the primary charge. For this reason, the sample factual question checklists invite the judge to identify which offence the jury should consider next, after reaching a verdict of guilty or not guilty.

[1277] Quail v The Queen [2014] VSCA 336, [43], citing R v Getachew (2012) 248 CLR 22, 27 [10], 32-3 [25].

24. While the parties are not responsible for settling the judge's charge, it is often good practice when giving factual question directions to ensure the parties know, understand and agree that all matters in dispute are covered by the proposed factual questions.

Timing of factual question directions

25. Judicial experience with factual question directions has shown some success in providing the directions before closing addresses.[1278] This may be termed the 'split charge' approach.[1279]

26. The purpose of a split charge is to ensure the jury knows and is focused on the precise questions they will need to decide before hearing the final addresses of the parties. It also reduces the incentive for parties to pre-empt some of the judge's legal directions about the offences and how the offences interact, because the jury will already have heard that information.[1280] Finally, it allows the parties to refer the jury to the question trail, and structure their addresses by reference to the questions the jury will need to decide.

27. Despite noting these benefits, split charges can also come with drawbacks. First, a split charge requires that the question trail is ready before final addresses. Depending on how the trial has progressed, it may not have been possible to prepare the factual questions in advance. This creates the risk of delay (if the judge needs time to prepare the factual question), disruption (if the judge abandons plans to use a split charge at the last moment) or confusion (if the question trail does not match the final positions of the parties and needs to be amended after final addresses). Second, the split charge remains novel, and counsel may fail to adapt their final addresses based on the jury having already received certain information from the judge. Third, there is some risk of the split charge adding to the total length of final directions and final addresses, if the judge decides it is necessary to repeat parts of the pre-address charge after addresses are complete.

28. A sample set of final directions which uses the split charge approach is provided in the following subtopics. The sample question trail directions are designed to be used with the split charge approach.

29. One consequence of the split charge approach is that the judge will not give the jury evidentiary directions or remind the jury of the evidence of arguments at the time of giving the offence-specific directions. Instead, the judge will fulfil their obligations under Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 65 and 66 in the second part of the split charge, under the heading Judge's Summary of Issues and Evidence. As part of this summary, the judge will also provide any necessary evidentiary directions when reminding the jury about evidence to which that direction applies.

[1278] See, e.g., Sir Brian Leveson, 'Review of Efficiency in Criminal Proceedings', (2015) 78-9 [302]-[303].

[1279] This approach was adopted in the UK Criminal Practice Directions following amendments made on 30 March 2016. However, this language is no longer part of the current UK practice direction, following the comprehensive rewrite of the directions in 2023. The latest edition of the UK Crown Court Compendium, issued after the changes to the practice direction states "Proceeding by way of a split summing up – legal directions (or at least the principal ones) followed by advocate's closing address and then the reminder of the evidence – has become prevalent if not the norm in many courts" (at 1-7).

[1280] See also UK Criminal Practice Directions 2015 26K.16 (revoked), which states that "the provision of appropriate directions prior to the closing speeches may avoid repetitious explanations of the law by the advocates".

30. It is possible to give factual question directions without adopting a split charge approach. If a judge adopts the traditional sequence, then the factual question directions are given at the same time as they would be when giving traditional offence-specific directions. This will be, in the language of the Jury Directions Act 2015 and the terminology explained at the start of this commentary, an integrated direction if it incorporates references to the evidence and how each party puts its case into the discussion of each question in the question trail.

31. Regardless of whether the judge adopts a split charge or a traditional charge, it is important to ensure that the judge fulfils the obligation under Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 65 and 66 by referring to the evidence and the way the parties have put their case.

11.1 Consolidated final directions – Split charge

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Note: This document replicates the directions in 3.2 – 3.9, 3.11, 3.12 and 3.15. If the case involves an intermediary, the direction in 3.14 should be added at an appropriate point.

Overview of Final Directions

Members of the jury, you have now heard all the evidence that will be called in this trial. I will soon invite counsel to address you and put arguments to you about how to approach the evidence and issues in this trial. But before that, I will first give you a question trail. This document identifies the matters you must decide to reach your verdicts in this case.

[Associate / Tipstaff], please give the jury the question trails.

The question trail numbers match the charge numbers on the indictment. Question trail one relates to charge one, question trail 2 relates to charge 2, and so on. The differences relate to what NOA allegedly did on each occasion, and when s/he did it. As I directed you at the start of the trial, and I will remind you again after counsel's addresses, you must consider each charge separately, using only the evidence that is relevant to that charge. It is wrong to say that simply because you find the accused guilty or not guilty of one charge, s/he must be guilty or not guilty of another charge.

[Insert question trail offence directions]

Using the question trails - Alternative Charges on the Indictment

[If there are alternative charges on the indictment, add the following shaded section]

In this case, charges [insert principal charge] and [insert alternative charge] relate to the same alleged event, and are alternatives. The prosecution does not say that NOA is guilty of both of these charges, but of one or the other.

When you are delivering your verdict[s], you will first be asked for your verdict on charge [number], which is the more serious charge.[1281] If you reach a verdict of guilty in relation to that charge, you will not be asked for a verdict on [insert alternative charge].

It is only if find NOA not guilty of charge [number] that you will be asked to deliver a verdict on charge [number].

[1281] This charge is based on the assumption that the charges are of differing gravity. If the charges are of the same gravity, it will need to be modified accordingly.

The question trails help you remember this in two ways. First, the question trail for charge [number] states it is an alternative to charge [number]. Second, the instructions in charge [number] direct you to go to either charge [number] or charge [number], depending on your answers.

I remind you that the accused is entitled to a separate trial of each charge, and that you must not reach your verdict by compromising between them.

Using the question trails - Alternative Charges Not on the Indictment

[If there are alternative charges not on the indictment, add the following shaded section]

In this case, the accused has been charged with [insert principal offence]. The law says that when a person is charged with this offence, you are entitled to find him/her guilty of the offence of [insert alternative offence] instead.

When you are delivering your verdict[s], you will first be asked for your verdict on charge [number], which is the more serious charge.[1282] If you reach a verdict of guilty in relation to that charge, you will not be asked for a verdict on [insert alternative charge].

It is only if find NOA not guilty of charge [number] that you will be asked to deliver a verdict on charge [number].

The question trails help you remember this in two ways. First, the question trail for charge [number] states it is an alternative to charge [number]. Second, the instructions in charge [number] direct you to go to either charge [number] or charge [number], depending on your answers.

I remind you that the accused is entitled to a separate trial of each charge, and that you must not reach your verdict by compromising between them.

Closing addresses of counsel

[Prosecuting counsel], you may now address the jury.

[Prosecution counsel's final address]

Thank you [prosecuting counsel]. [Defence counsel], you may now address the jury.

[Defence counsel's final address]

Thank you [defence counsel].

[1282] This charge is based on the assumption that the charges are of differing gravity. If the charges are of the same gravity, it will need to be modified accordingly.

Final directions

Before you leave to consider your verdict, I must remind you the principles of law you must apply when you decide the case. While I have already told you some of these principles at different times during the trial, it is important that I both remind you of what I said earlier, and place those principles in the context of the trial which has now taken place. You must apply these instructions carefully. I will also explain how the evidence and the arguments of the parties relate to the questions in your question trails. In doing this, I will have to be selective. The mere fact that I don't mention certain evidence does not mean that that evidence is not important. Similarly, the fact that I include certain evidence does not make that evidence more important than other evidence. You must consider all of the evidence, not just the parts of it that I mention. Which parts of that evidence are important or not important is a matter for you to determine. I will then explain what verdicts you may return and what happens when you have reached your verdicts.

Remember, if at any time you have a question about anything I say, you are free to ask me by passing a note to my tipstaff.

Review of the Role of the Jury

In this case, the prosecution alleges that NOA committed the offence[s] of [insert offences].[1283] These are the offences stated in the indictment and on your question trails. The accused has pleaded "not guilty", and so it is for you, and you alone, to decide whether s/he is guilty or not guilty of [this/these] crime[s].

You do that by answering the questions on each question trail. Your answers will depend on what you make of the evidence that has been given during the trial.

Review of the Role of the Judge

It is my role, as the judge, to explain to you the principles of law that you must apply when you are answering the questions on the question trails. You must accept and follow all of those directions.

I want to emphasise again that it is not my responsibility to decide this case – that is your role. The verdict that you return has absolutely nothing to do with me. So while you must follow any directions I give you about the law, you are not bound by any comments I may make about the facts.

As I told you at the start of the trial, it is unlikely that I will make any comments about the evidence. If I do make a comment about the evidence, you must not give it any extra weight because I, as the judge, have made that comment. You must disregard any comment I make about the evidence, unless you agree with that view after making own independent assessment of the evidence. That is what I mean when I say that you alone are the judges of the facts in this case.

Review of the Role of Counsel

Throughout the trial, counsel have presented the prosecution and defence cases. While their comments and arguments have been designed to assist you to reach your decision, you also do not need to accept what they have said. Of course, if you agree with an argument they have presented, you can adopt it. But if you do not agree with their view, you must put it aside.

[1283] This charge is drafted for cases involving one accused. If the case involves multiple accused, it will need to be modified accordingly.

Review of the Need to Decide Solely on the Evidence

I have told you that it is your task to determine the facts in this case. In determining the facts, you must consider all of the evidence that you heard from the witness box. Remember, it is the answers the witnesses gave that are the evidence, not the questions they were asked.

You must also take into account the exhibits that were tendered. These include [insert examples]. When you go to the jury room to decide this case, [most of/some of] the exhibits will go with you, where you may examine them. Consider them along with the rest of the evidence and in exactly the same way.[1284] [However, the following exhibits will not go with you to the jury room [insert exhibits]].

[If any formal admissions were put to the jury, add the following shaded section.]

In addition, in this case the following admissions were made: [insert admissions]. You must accept these admissions as established facts.

Nothing else is evidence in this case. As I have told you, this includes any comments counsel make about the facts.[1285] It also includes:

[Identify other relevant matters which do not constitute evidence in the case, such as transcripts.

It may be appropriate to insert charges relating to these matters here.]

It your duty to decide this case only on the basis of the witnesses' testimony, [the admissions] and the exhibits. You should consider the evidence which is relevant to a particular matter in its individual parts and as a whole, and come to a decision one way or another about the facts.

As I have told you, in doing this you must ignore all other considerations, such as any feelings of sympathy or prejudice you may have for anyone involved in the case. You should not, for example, be influenced by [insert case specific examples].[1286] Such emotions have no part to play in your decision.

Remember, you are the judges of the facts. That means that in relation to all of the issues in this case, you must act like judges. You must dispassionately weigh the evidence logically and with an open-mind, not according to your passion or feelings.

[1284] Depending on the nature of the evidence, it may be necessary to warn the jury of the possible dangers of conducting experiments in the jury room: see Decide Solely on the Evidence for further information.

[1285] If the accused is unrepresented, the jury should be told that what s/he said in his/her addresses, or when questioning witnesses, is also not evidence.

[1286] Some matters which it may be appropriate to point out (as they could conceivably give rise to prejudice or sympathy) include:

- The nature of the injuries suffered by the complainant;
- The race or ethnicity of the accused or the complainant;
- The sexual orientation of the accused or the complainant;
- The fact that the accused or the complainant are drug users.

In some cases, it may be appropriate to point out that although a party's behaviour does not accord with what the jury might think is morally acceptable, the jury is not a court of morals. Everyone has the right to be treated equally before the law.

Outside Information

At the start of the trial I also told you that you must not base your decision on any information you may have obtained outside this courtroom. For example, you must completely ignore anything that you have seen or heard in the media about this case, or about the people involved in it. You must consider only the evidence that has been presented to you here in court.[1287]

Circumstantial Evidence and Inferences

I will now give you some directions about how you approach the evidence in this case.

Evidence comes in many forms. It can be evidence about what someone saw or heard. It can be an exhibit admitted into evidence. It can be someone's opinion.

Some evidence can prove a fact directly. For example, if a witness said that s/he saw or heard it raining outside, that would be direct evidence of the fact that it was raining.

Other evidence can prove a fact indirectly. For example, if a witness said that s/he saw someone enter the courthouse wearing a raincoat and carrying an umbrella, both dripping wet, that would be indirect or 'circumstantial' evidence of the fact that it was raining outside. You can conclude from the witness's evidence that it was raining, even though s/he didn't actually see or hear the rain.

As far as the law is concerned, it makes no difference whether evidence is direct or indirect. Although people often believe that indirect or circumstantial evidence is weaker than direct evidence, that is not true. It can be just as strong or even stronger. What matters is how strong or weak the particular evidence is, not whether it is direct or indirect.

However, you must take care when drawing conclusions from indirect evidence. You should consider all of the evidence in the case, and only draw reasonable conclusions based on the evidence that you accept. Do not guess. While we might be willing to act on the basis of guesses in our daily lives, it is not safe to do that in a criminal trial.

[In cases involving a significant amount of circumstantial evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In determining whether a conclusion is reasonable, you should look at all of the evidence together. It may help you to consider the pieces of evidence to be like the pieces of a jigsaw puzzle. While one piece may not be very helpful by itself, when all the pieces are put together the picture may become clear.

However, when putting all the pieces together, you must take care not to jump to conclusions. It is sometimes easy for people to be too readily persuaded of a fact, on the basis of insufficient evidence or evidence that turns out to be truly coincidental. Once convinced of that fact, they may then seek support for it in the other evidence, perhaps distorting that evidence to fit their theory or disregarding 'inconvenient' facts. You must make sure that you do not do this. You must keep an open mind, and be prepared to change your views.

You may only convict the accused if you are satisfied that his/her guilt is the only reasonable conclusion to be drawn from the whole of the evidence, both direct and indirect. If there is another reasonable view of the facts which is consistent with the accused's innocence, then the prosecution will not have proved his/her guilt beyond reasonable doubt, and you must acquit him/her.

[1287] If there has been significant publicity about the case or the parties involved, it may be necessary to give a more detailed warning.

Review of the Assessment of Witnesses

You have now listened to what each witness has said, and watched how they presented their evidence and answered the questions under cross-examination. No further evidence will be given.

To decide what the facts are in this case, you now need to assess the evidence. It is up to you to decide how much or how little of the testimony of any witness you will believe or rely on. You may believe all, some or none of a witness's evidence. No one can tell you how to approach any particular witness's evidence in this regard.

It is also for you to decide what weight should be attached to any particular evidence – that is, the extent to which the evidence helps you to determine the relevant issues.

As I mentioned at the start of the trial, in assessing witnesses' evidence, some matters which may concern you include their credibility and reliability. It is for you to judge whether the witnesses told the truth, and whether they correctly recalled the facts about which they gave evidence. This is something you do all the time in your daily lives. There is no special skill involved – you just need to use your common sense.

While you may take into account the witness's manner when he or she gave evidence, you should be careful when doing so. As I noted at the start of the case, giving evidence in a trial is not common, and may be a stressful experience. People react and appear differently. Witnesses come from different backgrounds, and have different abilities, values and life experiences. There are too many variables to make the manner in which a witness gives evidence the only, or even the most important, factor in your decision.

In making your decision, do not consider only the witnesses' testimony. Also take into account the exhibits [and admissions]. Consider all of the evidence in the case, use what you believe is true and reject what you disbelieve. Give each part of it the importance which you – as the judge of the facts – think it should be given, and then determine what, in your judgment, are the true facts.

Review of the Onus and Standard of Proof

I want to emphasise again that under our justice system people are presumed to be innocent, unless and until they are proved guilty. So before you may return a verdict of guilty, the prosecution must satisfy you that [each of] the accused is guilty of the charge[s] in question. The accused does/do not have to prove anything.

The prosecution must do this by proving [each of] the accused's guilt of the charge[s] beyond reasonable doubt.

Beyond reasonable doubt is the highest standard of proof that our law demands. It is not enough for the prosecution to prove that the accused is probably guilty, or very likely to be guilty.

As I have told you, it is almost impossible to prove anything with absolute certainty when reconstructing past events and the prosecution does not have to do so. A reasonable doubt is not an imaginary or fanciful doubt, or an unrealistic possibility.

You cannot be satisfied the accused is guilty if you have a reasonable doubt about whether the accused is guilty.

As I have told you, these words mean exactly what they say – proof beyond reasonable doubt.

The prosecution does not need to prove every fact that they allege to this standard. It is the essential ingredients or "elements" of the charge[s] that they must prove beyond reasonable doubt. To help you in your deliberations, the question trails identify each element in the form of a question. By answering the questions in a question trail, and following the instructions after each question, you will decide whether the accused is guilty or not guilty of that charge.

Judge's Summary of Issues and Evidence

I am now going to remind you of some of the evidence and arguments you have heard. Before doing so, I want to remind you again that the mere fact that I may leave out a part of a particular witness' evidence does not mean that that evidence is not important.

Similarly, the fact that I include evidence from a particular witness does not make that evidence more important than the evidence of other witnesses. You must consider all of the evidence and not just the parts of it that I mention. Which parts of the evidence are important or not important is a matter for you to determine.

I'll do this by reference to the question trails. So please turn to the first question trail.

I also want to emphasise again that it is not my responsibility to decide this case – that is your role. So while you must follow any directions I give you about the law, you are not bound by any comments I may make about the facts. If I happen to express any views upon questions of fact, you must disregard those views, unless they happen to agree with your own assessment of the evidence.

[Note – When describing the evidence on each element, add any necessary evidentiary directions, including any from chapter 4 of this charge book, when first discussing that type of evidence.]

Sole Evidence Direction

[If there is a single piece of evidence relied on to prove one or more elements, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the only evidence that [identify relevant elements or facts in issue] is the evidence that [describe relevant single piece of evidence, e.g., NOA confessed to NOW]. It follows that you cannot be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that [identify relevant elements or facts in issue] unless you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the evidence of [describe relevant single piece of evidence] is true and proves [identify relevant elements or facts in issue].

Liberato Direction

[If the case turns on a conflict between the evidence of a prosecution witness and a defence witness, and there is a reasonable likelihood that the jury will think that they must believe the defence evidence to be true before they can acquit the accused, add the following shaded section].

In this case, there is a clear conflict between the evidence of [prosecution witness] and the evidence of [defence witness].

It is not necessary for you to accept [defence witness's] evidence in order to find the accused "not guilty". In keeping with the requirement that the prosecution must prove their case beyond reasonable doubt, you must acquit NOA if [defence witness's] evidence gives rise to a reasonable doubt.

This is the case even if you prefer the evidence of [prosecution witness] to the evidence of [defence witness]. It is not sufficient for you merely to find the prosecution case to be preferable to the defence case. Before you can convict NOA, you must be satisfied that the prosecution have proven their case beyond reasonable doubt.

So even if you do not think [defence witness] is telling the truth, but are unsure where the truth lies, you must find the accused "not guilty".

In fact, even if you are convinced that [defence witness's] evidence is not true, it is not the case that you must convict NOA. In such circumstances, you should put [defence witness's] evidence to one side, and ask yourself whether the prosecution have proved the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt on the basis of the evidence you do accept.

Review of Separate Consideration - Multiple Accused

[If the case involves multiple accused, add the following shaded section].

I now want to remind you of the significance that there are [number] separate accused. As I told you at the start of the trial, there are really [insert number] trials [all] being heard together for convenience.

You must be careful not to allow convenience to override justice. The accused and the prosecution are entitled to have the case against each accused considered separately.

You must consider the case against each accused separately, in light only of the evidence which applies to that accused. You must ask yourselves, in relation to each accused, whether the evidence relating to that accused has satisfied you, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he is guilty of the offence s/he has been charged with. If the answer is yes, then you should find him/her guilty. If the answer is no, then you should find him/her not guilty.

You will note that I said you must consider the case against each accused "in light only of the evidence which applies to that accused". This is because some of the evidence you have heard in this case is only relevant to the case against one accused or another. If a particular piece of evidence is only relevant to one accused, you may only use it when deciding whether or not that accused is guilty. You must not consider it in relation to [any of] the other accused.

As part of explaining the case in relation to each charge, I highlighted the main evidence relevant to each question. I am now going to highlight the evidence which you might mistakenly think is relevant for certain charges or particular accused. [Identify any evidence which is not admissible against particular accused].

Review of Separate Consideration – Multiple Charges

[If the case involves multiple charges, add the following shaded section].

I now want to remind you of the significance that there are [number] separate charges.

I want to remind you that you must be careful not to allow the convenience of one jury deciding all these charges to override justice. Both the prosecution and the accused are entitled to have you consider each charge separately.

It would therefore be wrong to say that simply because you find the accused guilty or not guilty of one charge, that s/he must be guilty or not guilty, as the case may be, of another.

[If logic dictates that a finding in relation to one charge is material to another charge, this should be clearly explained to the jury here. For example, the jury should be told if an acquittal on one charge would require an acquittal on another.]

You must consider each charge separately, in light only of the evidence which applies to it. You must ask yourselves, in relation to each charge, whether the evidence relating to that charge has satisfied you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused is guilty of that particular crime. If the answer is yes, then you should find the accused guilty of that charge. If the answer is no, then you should find the accused not guilty of it.

You will note that I said you must consider each charge "in light only of the evidence which applies to it". This is because some of the evidence you have heard in this case is only relevant to one charge or another. If a particular piece of evidence is only relevant to one charge, you may only use it when deciding whether or not the accused is guilty of that charge. You must not consider it in relation to [any of] the other charge[s].

As part of explaining each question trail, I highlighted the main evidence relevant to each question. I am now going to highlight the evidence which you might mistakenly think is relevant for certain charges. [Identify any evidence which is not admissible against particular accused].

Unanimous and Majority Verdicts

I will now explain the verdicts you can return and how you reach them.

In almost all criminal cases, a verdict of guilty or not guilty must be unanimous. That is, whatever decision you make, you must all agree on it.

So if, for example, you are to find NOA guilty of [insert charge 1], then you must all agree that [he/she] is guilty of that offence. In exactly the same way, if you are to find NOA not guilty of [insert charge 1], then you must all agree that [he/she] is not guilty of that offence.

However, this requirement does not mean that you must all reach your verdict for the same reasons. Indeed, you may each rely on quite different reasons for making your decision. For example, you may each rely upon different parts of the evidence, or you may each emphasise different aspects of the evidence.

You also might reach your verdict by reference to different questions on the question trail. For example, for a verdict of not guilty, some of you might find the accused not guilty at question [number], while others might find the accused not guilty at question [number].

[If the question trail provides several different paths to guilt, and extended unanimity is not required, add the following shaded section]

Similarly, for charge [number], some of you might find the accused guilty at question [number], while others find the accused guilty at question [number].

What is important is that, no matter how you reach your verdict, you all agree. Your verdict of guilty or not guilty [in relation to each charge / for each person charged] must be unanimous, the agreed decision of you all.

You may have noted that I said that a verdict must be unanimous in "almost all" criminal cases. There are some circumstances in which a jury is allowed to give a majority verdict instead of a unanimous verdict. However, this is not yet one of those cases and may never be. I will tell you if the situation changes. Until I do, you should consider that your verdict[s] of guilty or not guilty must be unanimous.[1288]

Using the question trails - Materially Different Issues or Consequences

[The following shaded section may be added if evidence has been presented which shows possible alternative bases of responsibility for a particular offence, and the bases involve materially different issues or consequences. For example, culpable driving causing death due to gross negligence or culpable driving causing death due to intoxication: See Unanimous and Majority Verdicts.]

I now need to mention an exception to the general rule I just explained, that you only need to agree on your verdict, and not your reasons for the verdict.

Charge(s) [number] contains alternative pathways to guilt and a verdict of guilt requires special unanimity. Special unanimity means you agree on a verdict of guilt due to the same question on the [1288] This paragraph should be excluded in cases of murder, treason, offences against sections 71 or 72 of the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981, or offences against a law of the Commonwealth, as majority verdicts are not permitted in relation to such offences (Juries Act 2000 s 46).

question trail.

[Identify the questions which allow conviction through materially different findings].

You can only find NOA guilty of this/those charge(s) if you all agree on the same pathway. For example, this might mean that all of you answer yes to question [number]. Or it might mean that all of you answer yes to question [different number].

If some of you find NOA guilty by answering yes to question [number] and others find [him/her] guilty by answering yes to question [different number], then you do not have the kind of special unanimity the law requires for this charge. If that happens, there are three ways forward. First, those of you who reached a verdict at question [number] could go on to consider the remaining questions, and decide whether they would also reach the same verdict if they did not stop at question [number]. Second, you could discuss the case further as a jury, each of you putting forward your views and listening to the opinions of your fellow jurors, to see whether anyone's views change. But you must always reach your own decision, according to your personal view of the evidence. You must not change your mind merely to reach a unanimous verdict. Third, you could let me know that you are unable to agree on a verdict, and I can give you further directions.

Importantly, special unanimity only applies to [identify relevant charges] and only to a finding a guilt. There is no equivalent principle for finding NOA not guilty. You could have 12 different ways of finding NOA not guilty, and that would still be unanimous.

Using the question trails - Multiple Discrete Acts

[The following shaded section may be added if evidence has been presented of multiple acts on the basis of which guilt can be found, but there must be unanimity as to at least one [or a specified number] of those acts having been committed.

This requirement has mostly arisen in relation to a charge of maintaining a sexual relationship with a child under 16, under which the jury must agree on (at least) the same three acts having been committed from amongst all of the acts presented by the prosecution. For this reason, this charge has been drafted in relation to the requirement for agreement on three acts. If necessary, this can be amended to instead require agreement on a different number of acts.]

I now need to mention an exception to the general rule I just explained, that you only need to agree on your verdict, and not your reasons for the verdict.

If you turn to page [number] of your question trails, you will see that question [number] asks whether the prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that NOA committed at least three of the following acts.

A verdict of guilty on this charge requires a special form of unanimity. You can only find NOA guilty of this charge if you all agree on the same three acts. If half of you thought [identify group of acts] were proved, and half thought [identify different group of acts], then even though you have all answered yes to question [number], you are not unanimous about the same acts and so do not have a unanimous verdict. If that happens, then you should give the tipstaff note saying that you cannot agree on one of the charges, and I can give you further directions. In the note, do not tell me which charge, or why you cannot agree.

Importantly, this special form of unanimity only applies to question [number] on [identify relevant charges] and only to a finding a guilt. There is no equivalent principle for finding NOA not guilty. You could have 12 different ways of finding NOA not guilty, and that would still be unanimous.

Taking a Unanimous Verdict

Once you have reached a unanimous verdict on [all of] the charge[s], you should push the buzzer in the jury room and tell my tipstaff. [He/she] will then arrange for us all to return to court.

When you have taken your places in the jury box, my associate will ask you whether you have agreed on a verdict, and what your verdict is [in relation to each charge in turn]. Your foreperson will answer "guilty" or "not guilty", according to the decision the jury has reached.

My associate will then read your verdict back to you, to confirm that what [he/she] has recorded is correct. If any of you think that what my associate has recorded is wrong in any way, you should say so immediately. The record of your verdict[s] can then be corrected.

Concluding Remarks

Questions

If, at any stage of your discussions, you would like me to repeat or explain any directions of law I have given you, please do not hesitate to ask. It is fundamental that you understand the principles you are required to apply. If you have any doubt about those principles, then you are not only entitled to ask for further assistance, but you should ask for it.

You should do this by handing a note to my tipstaff indicating what your question is. S/he will pass it to me, and after discussing the matter with counsel, we will reassemble in court to assist you.

There is really only one thing that you must not include on any note, and that is the numbers involved in any part of your discussions such as any vote within the jury. That matter must remain completely confidential to you and that includes even telling me about it in a note. Please in any note leave the numbers out.[1289]

Transcripts

[If the jury has not been provided with a transcript, add the following shaded section.]

I also want to remind you that all of the evidence in this trial has been tape-recorded and transcribed. If at any time during your discussions you wish to have a certain section of the evidence replayed to you, or have a section of the transcript [read back/provided] to you, please let me know. You can do this by providing a note to my tipstaff, outlining the part of the evidence you wish to hear.

Conclusion

I have now completed my summing-up. With a final reminder that any verdict[s] you reach must be unanimous, I ask you to go to the jury room to consider your verdict[s]. When you have reached a verdict or if you have a question, please send a note to the court through the tipstaff.

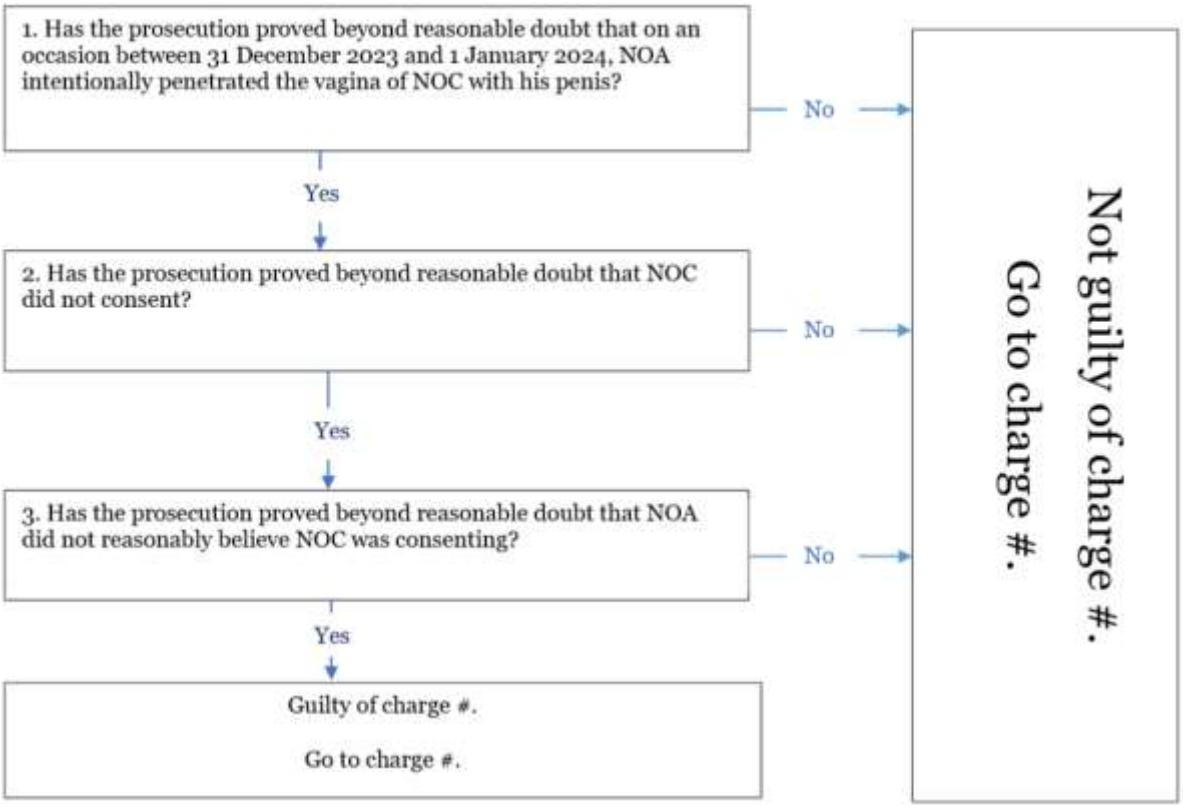
Last updated: 17 April 2024

11.2 Rape (2015) sample question trail and charge

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

[1289] In MRJ v R [2011] VSCA 374, the Court of Appeal stated that jurors should be instructed to omit any information on the outcome of discussions when asking for further directions or assistance.

Charge # – Rape



1. Has the prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt that on an occasion between 31 December 2023 and 1 January 2024, NOA intentionally penetrated the vagina of NOC with his penis?
No
Yes
2. Has the prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not consent?
No
Yes
3. Has the prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt that NOA did not reasonably believe NOC was consenting?
No
Yes
Guilty of charge #.
Go to charge #.
Not guilty of charge #.
Go to charge #.

Question Trail Charge: Rape (2015)

The first / next question trail is for charge # on the indictment, which is a charge of rape. This charge relates to what NOA allegedly did to NOC on New Years' Eve, 2020, at her house. There are three questions in this question trail.[1290]

Intentional Sexual Penetration

The first question is "Has the prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt that on an occasion between 31 December 2020 and 1 January 2021, NOA intentionally penetrated the vagina of NOC with his penis?"[1291]

It does not matter whether the conduct occurred before or after midnight on New Years' Eve.

Lack of consent

The second question is "Has the prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not consent to that act?"

Consent means free agreement. So the prosecution must prove that NOC did not freely agree to NOA penetrating her vagina at the time.[1292]

A person can consent to an act only if they are capable of consenting, and free to choose whether or not to engage in or to allow the act.

Where a person has given their consent to an act, they may withdraw that consent before the act happens or at any time while it is happening.

Remember, the question asks whether the prosecution has proved that NOC did not consent. The accused does not need to prove the complainant did consent.

No reasonable belief in consent

The third question is "Has the prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt that NOA did not reasonably believe NOC was consenting to that act of sexual penetration?"

This question requires you to consider the accused's state of mind about the complainant's consent.

A belief will only be reasonable if there are reasonable grounds for a person in the position of the accused to hold that belief. You must consider all the circumstances when deciding whether a belief in consent was reasonable.

In looking at the evidence, you should consider whether the accused took any steps to find out whether the complainant was consenting or might not be consenting and, if so, the nature of those steps.

[1290] If you have already directed the jury about this offence, then you should modify the following directions minimise repetition and highlight charge-specific differences.

[1291] The question must be modified for other forms of sexual penetration.

[1292] If this element is not in issue, it will generally be sufficient to state that conclusion at this point and elaborate no further.

When you are considering whether a belief in consent is unreasonable, you must consider what the community would reasonably expect of the accused in the circumstances in forming a reasonable belief in consent. As members of the community, you have the best idea of what the community would reasonably expect of NOA in the circumstances in forming a reasonable belief in consent.

If you find that NOA was intoxicated at the relevant time, you must not take this into account when assessing whether he/she reasonably believed that NOC was consenting.

The law requires you to consider whether his/her belief in NOC's consent would have been reasonable to a person who was not intoxicated at the relevant time.[1293]

Summary

In summary, as you can see on the question trail, if you answer no to any question, then you must find NOA not guilty of this charge. It is only if you answer yes to each question that you can find NOA guilty of this charge.

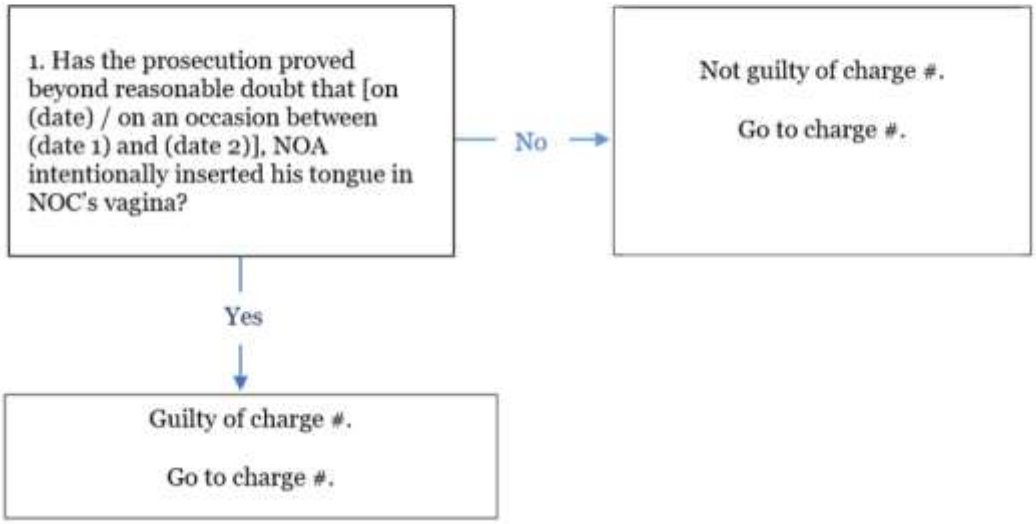
Last updated: 17 April 2024

11.3 Incest (2015) sample question trail and charge

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Charge # – Incest

Note: The parties have agreed that NOC is NOA's daughter, and NOA knew that NOC was his daughter.



[1293] This direction will need to be modified if the intoxication is not self-induced. See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(3)(b)(ii) and Charge: Statutory Intoxication (Self-induced) for guidance.

Question Trail Charge: Incest

The first / next question trail is for charge # on the indictment, which is a charge of incest. This charge relates to what NOA allegedly did to [identify complainant, date and any relevant information about the occasion].[1294]

I explained to you at the start of the trial that, speaking generally, incest is a crime that involves sexual activity with a close relative. In this trial, everyone accepts that NOC is NOA's daughter, and he knew that she was his daughter. The only issue the prosecution still needs to prove is whether NOA performed a sexual act on NOC. This question trail therefore only has one question.

Sexual penetration

The question is "Has the prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt that [on (date) / On an occasion between (date 1) and (date 2)], NOA intentionally inserted his tongue in NOC's vagina?"[1295]

For the purpose of this question, there are several principles of law you must follow.

- First, the law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that NOA introduced his tongue to any extent between the outer lips of NOC's vagina.
- Second, NOA's tongue does not need to have gone all the way into NOC's vagina. Even slight penetration is enough.
- Third, there must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the tongue to the outer surface of the external lips of the vagina is not enough.

If you answer this question yes, then you can find NOA guilty of this charge. If your answer is no, then you must NOA not guilty of this charge.

Last updated: 17 April 2024

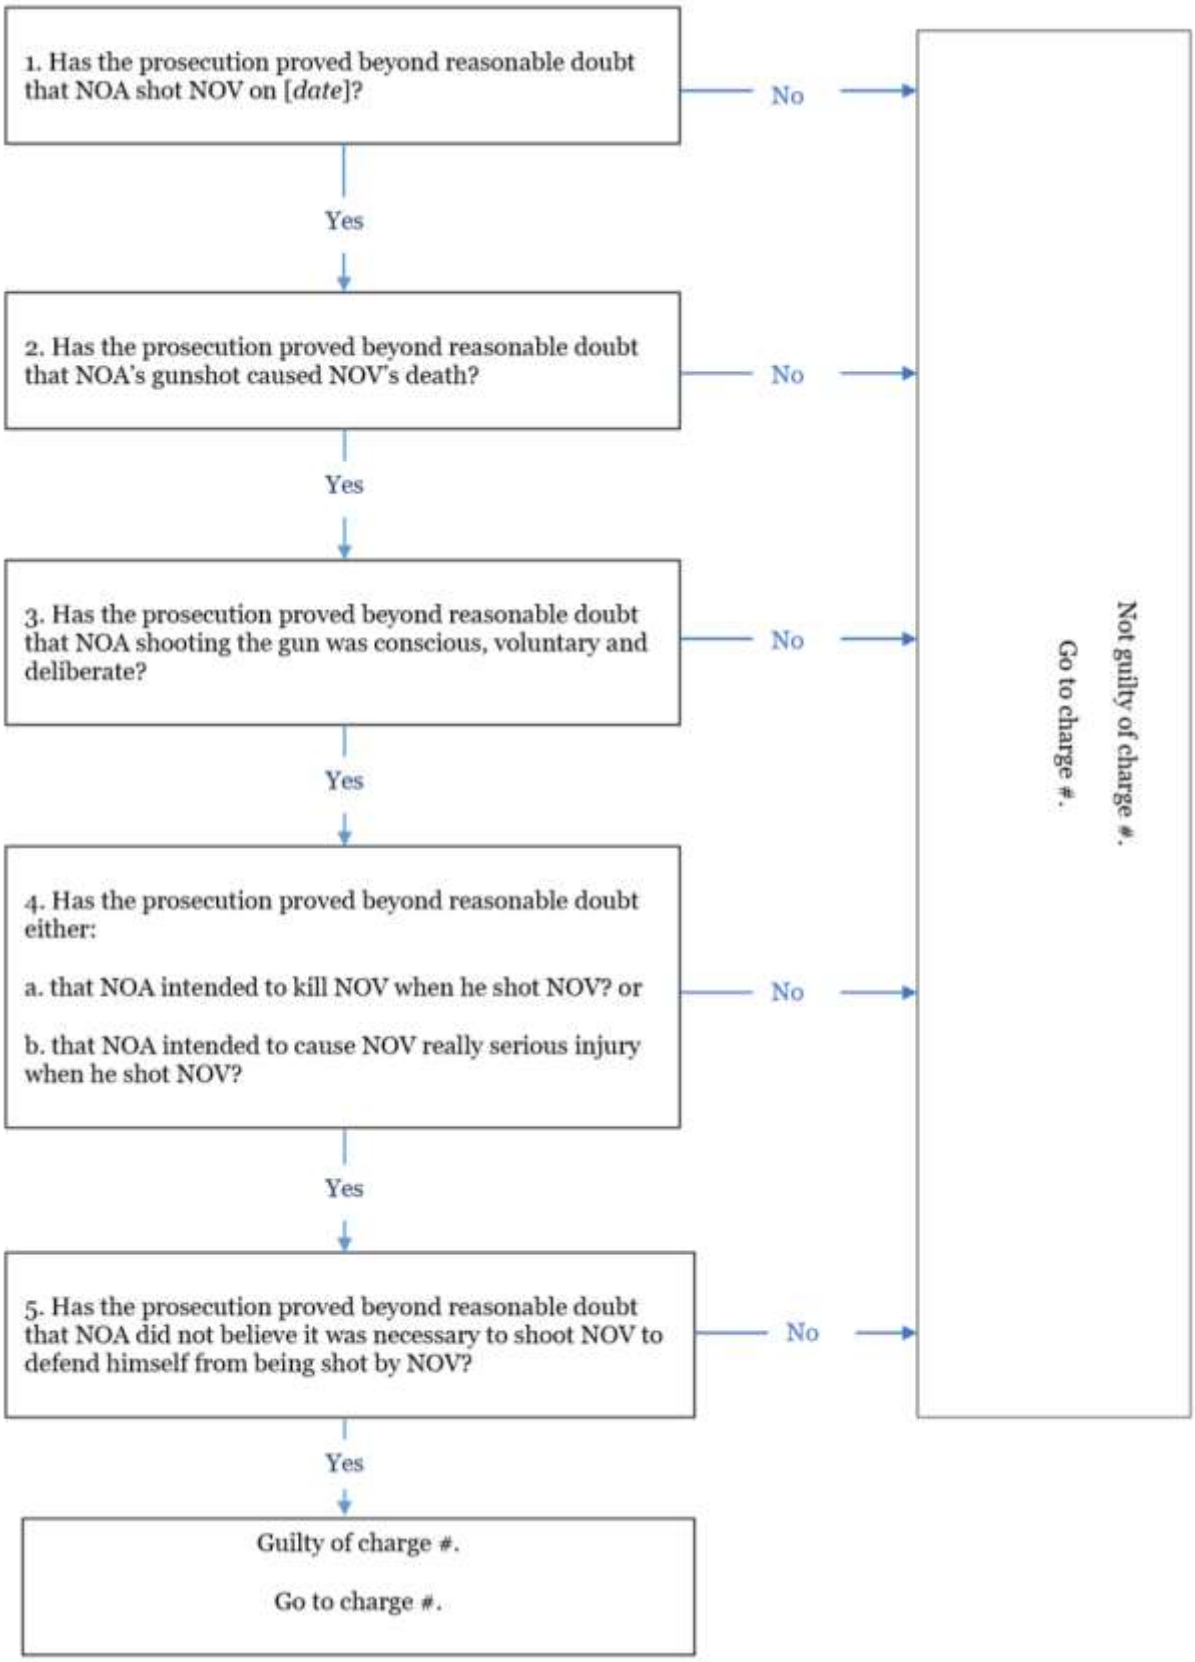
11.4 Intentional murder sample question trail and charge

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

[1294] If you have already directed the jury about this offence, then you should modify the following directions minimise repetition and highlight charge-specific differences.

[1295] If the case raises the issue of medical or hygienic procedures, the question trail and directions should be modified to provide an additional question which addresses that issue – "Has the prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt that NOA's act of inserting his tongue in NOC's vagina was not for a medical or hygienic purpose?"

Charge # - Murder



Question Trail Charge: Intentional Murder

The first/next question trail is for charge # on the indictment, which is a charge of murder. This charge relates to the allegation that NOA killed NOV by shooting him on [date].

I'm now going to take you through the 5 steps on that question trail.

Actions of accused

The first question is "Has the prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt that NOA shot NOV on [date]?"

This is a question of fact you must decide. You have heard all the evidence about NOV and NOA's movements on [date], and we will soon hear what [prosecution counsel] and [defence counsel] say about that evidence.

Causation

The second question is "Has the prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt that NOA's gunshot was a cause of NOV's death?"

The most relevant evidence on this question will be the medical evidence you heard from NOW.

In this case you have heard evidence that there were several people who shot at NOV, and it is uncertain who fired which bullet.

For this question, you do not need to determine who fired which bullet, or which bullet was fatal. The law says that a person does not need to be only cause of a death, or the direct or immediate cause. Instead, you may find that NOA's gunshot caused NOV's death if you are satisfied that the shot was a substantial or significant cause of NOV's death.

You must approach this question in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

Voluntariness

The third question is "Has the prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt that NOA shooting the gun was conscious, voluntary and deliberate?" These words each have a special meaning in law, which I will briefly explain.

The term "conscious" excludes the acts of an unconscious person, such as a sleepwalker, or a person rolling over in bed.

The term "voluntary" directs you to the requirement that the shooting must have been a "willed" act, that is, one resulting from the control by the accused of his/her own actions. This excludes the acts of a person operating in one of a number of rare mental states where the mind loses control of the body's actions.

The term "deliberate" excludes accidental acts, such as the consequences of falling over or fumbling an item.

I am not going to say anything more about this question until you've heard from [prosecution counsel] and [defence counsel].

State of Mind of the Accused

The fourth question is "Has the prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt either:

(a) that NOA intended to kill NOV when he shot NOV? or

(b) that NOA intended to cause NOV really serious injury when he shot NOV?"

When I say "really serious injury", I am not using a technical legal phrase. These are ordinary English words, and it is for you to determine what this phrase means to you as jurors.

Deciding whether NOA intended to kill or cause NOV really serious injury will require you to draw a conclusion from all the evidence. You will need to look at all of NOA's proven actions before, at the time of, and after the alleged shooting. All of these things may help you to determine what NOA intended, if you find that NOA was one of the shooters.

Remember, you can only convict the accused if you are satisfied that his/her guilt is the only reasonable conclusion to be drawn from the evidence. If there is another reasonable view of the facts which is consistent with the accused's innocence, then the prosecution has not proved the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt.

Self-defence

The fifth question is "Has the prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt that NOA did not believe it was necessary to shoot NOV to defend himself from being shot by NOV?"

As I understand the defence case, one argument you will hear is that even if you are satisfied that NOD shot NOV, then NOD only did this in order to protect himself from NOV, who was otherwise going to shoot him first.

The law recognises that a person faced with a threat of death or really serious injury can defend themselves, even to the point of killing their attacker.

This question requires you to consider NOA's state of mind at the time of the shooting and what motivated his/her actions. You must consider the issue from the accused's perspective. If NOA personally believed that NOV was going to shoot him/her, then you answer this question on that basis. Even if you find that NOA was mistaken about that belief.

In answering this question, you must look at all the circumstances. You must take into account the emergency of the situation and not judge NOA's actions with the benefit of hindsight. You may also need to consider whether NOA was the original aggressor, and whether any threat posed by NOV was itself an act of self-defence against NOA's aggression.

I will have more to say about those circumstances after you have heard from the prosecution and defence. But one key principle to remember when answering this question is that the prosecution must prove NOD did not act in self-defence. The accused does not need to prove that s/he did act in self-defence.

Summary

In summary, as you can see on the question trail, if you answer no to any question then you must find NOA not guilty of this charge. It is only if you answer yes to each question that you can find NOA guilty of this charge.

Last updated: 17 April 2024