1 Preliminary Directions

1. A number of studies into the jury system have suggested that it is highly beneficial for the judge to provide the jury with information at the beginning of a trial, to assist them in performing their role.[1]
2. It is suggested that "the process of being empanelled as a member of the jury can be a thoroughly confusing experience", and that the provision of basic information by the judge at the beginning of the trial can help jurors to "settle into their task".[2]
3. The following types of information have been seen to be of assistance to jurors:
    - Information about the importance of jury duty;
    - Information about the roles of the judge, jury and counsel;
    - Information about the nature of the trial process and about the characteristics of the adversary system;
    - Instructions concerning the onus and standard of proof and the right of each accused to separate consideration of his or her case;
    - An introduction to other common concepts that will be used throughout the trial, such as inferences;
    - Guidance about how to assess witnesses and evidence;
    - Information about matters such as note-taking and asking questions;
    - Procedural suggestions about matters such as electing a foreperson, arranging a discussion format and deliberation procedures;
    - Information about the secrecy and anonymity of jury deliberations;
    - Information about the court and about any local facilities available to jurors.
4. While the Juries Commissioner provides some of this information to jurors prior to the trial, it has been suggested that it is also advantageous for the judge to address these matters when jurors are beginning to focus more clearly on their jury service.[3]

5. Studies have shown that jurors who are given such information by the judge at the beginning of a trial are better able to follow the evidence presented in court, and to apply the law to the facts of the case during deliberations.[4]

6. This is supported by research in cognitive psychology, which has shown that the more information a person has, the better able that person is to frame the information that he or she is about to receive. This enhances recall and aids in the interpretation of ambiguous material. It also leads to greater levels of juror satisfaction.[5]

7. One study has even shown that a judge's instructions may only have an effect on the jury's decision when delivered at the commencement of the trial.[6] It is suggested that this is because jurors will usually have already assessed the evidence by the time the judge delivers his or her final charge, and will not be able to retrospectively evaluate and judge the evidence in accordance with instructions which are first given at that late stage.[7]

8. It is therefore desirable to provide the jury with information such as that outlined above at the outset of the trial, and again in summary form during the judge's final charge (see, e.g. R v PZG [2007] VSCA 54). Judges may also wish to give a charge welcoming potential jurors prior to empanelment. Part 1 of this Book contains a number of suggested directions for use at the beginning of a trial.

9. It is also desirable to give the jury a short break immediately after they have been empanelled and charged, to allow them to orient themselves as a group and familiarise themselves with their surroundings.

10. If a judge is concerned about addressing matters that may not arise during the trial, he or she should warn the jury that the preliminary instructions may touch on issues which are not essential to their decision. In the judge's final charge, he or she should deliver revised instructions, advising the jury of any changes that have occurred since giving the preliminary instructions.[8]

1.2 Jury Empanelment

Warning: Part 6 of the Juries Act 2000 (Vic) establishes a set of steps that must be followed when empanelling a jury. Failure to follow the applicable steps will lead to the jury being unlawfully constituted, and will result in the trial being viewed as a nullity (R v Panozzo; R v Iaria (2003) 8 VR 548).

Information to Provide to Jurors

1. In all cases the jury panel should be informed about the following matters prior to empanelment:
   (a) The type of charge;
   (b) The name of the accused;
   (c) The names of the principal witnesses expected to be called;
   (d) The estimated length of the trial; and
   (e) Any other information the court thinks relevant (Juries Act 2000 s 32(1)).
2. It is generally desirable to read out the names of all witnesses, as well as any other people whose names may be mentioned during the trial, a knowledge of whom might cause a juror to be embarrassed. If there are many names to be read, it may be appropriate to provide a list to the jury (see, e.g. R v Lewis (2000) 1 VR 290).
3. In addition to telling the jurors the estimated length of the trial, it is helpful to advise them of the hours the court ordinarily sits, and of any proposed breaks in the trial (e.g. to accommodate Christmas).[9]
4. If the judge intends to provide the jury with "other information" (as allowed by the Juries Act 2000 s 32(1)(e)), it is advisable to discuss the matter with counsel beforehand (see, e.g. R v Knight [2004] VSCA 48).
5. In a trial for murdering a security guard at an abortion clinic, it was held to be appropriate for the judge to ask the jury panel members whether they held strong views about abortion, such that it might affect their capacity to be impartial (R v Knight [2004] VSCA 48).

Excusing Jurors

6. After providing the jury panel with this information, the court must ask whether any people on the panel seek to be excused from jury service on the trial (Juries Act 2000 s 32(2)). The court may excuse a potential juror if it is satisfied that the person:
   (a) Will not be able to consider the case impartially; or
   (b) Is unable to serve for any other reasons (Juries Act 2000 s 32(3)).
7. Before the panel is assembled, the Juries Commissioner will have provided prospective jurors with information about the expected length of the trial and sitting hours, and invited applications to defer jury service on the basis of matter such as child care responsibilities, travel commitments, employment issues and health issues that may interfere with jury service.[10] Many of these applications are dealt with administratively by the Juries Commissioner, and so it is expected that judges will receive few applications to be excused on the basis of personal circumstances.
8. It is not necessary to excuse a person who has had a particular life experience (e.g. a victim of a sexual offence) from serving on a jury in a trial which concerns matters to which that experience is relevant (e.g. a sexual offence trial). It should not be assumed that such a person is any more likely to be prejudiced than other jurors (R v Goodall (2007) 15 VR 673, [3], [29]–[31]).

9. If it is anticipated that a number of documents will be provided to the jury during the trial, the judge may wish to inform jurors of this prior to seeking excuses. This will allow jurors who have difficulty reading to seek to be excused from jury service.
10. If it becomes apparent to a judge when taking a juror's oath or affirmation that there are particular difficulties that may restrict his or her capacity to serve as a juror (such as difficulties with English or certain physical conditions), the judge may wish to excuse the juror.
11. Jurors should be allowed to make their application for excusal in writing, as they might reasonably wish to keep the reasons for their application confidential. It is at the judge's discretion whether or not to allow the defence to see any written application provided by a juror (R v Lewis (2000) 1 VR 290).
12. There is no absolute right of an accused person to be told the ground on which a prospective member of the jury applies to be excused from serving or, if the application is refused, the ground of the refusal (R v Lewis (2000) 1 VR 290).
13. There is also no requirement for a judge to hear and determine applications for excusal in public. However, it is generally desirable to exercise the judge's power to excuse jurors in open court, to demonstrate publicly the seriousness with which the court regards a citizen's obligation to serve as a juror, and the trouble that the court takes in deciding whether a person summoned ought to be excused (R v Lewis (2000) 1 VR 290).

1.2.1 Charge: Jury Empanelment

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Members of the jury panel, in a moment I am going to give you a final opportunity to apply to be excused from sitting on the jury for this trial. Please listen carefully to what I am about to say, so that you will know whether you should apply.

Possible prejudicial knowledge

It is essential that every member of the jury be completely open-minded about the case that they will hear, and not favour one side or the other. Sometimes a juror knows one of the people involved in the trial, or knows something about them, and so may not be able to be unbiased. Even if that juror feels capable of treating the people involved in the case fairly, to the outside world it may seem likely that they will favour one side or the other. This would undermine the interests of justice.

A similar problem arises if a juror has, or believes they have, information about the facts of the case.

I therefore need to give you some information about this case, and the people involved in it. You should listen to this information carefully, to see if you recognise any of the names, or have any other information or knowledge about the case. If you do, you should apply to be excused when my associate asks you in a moment.

The accused person's name is [insert name].

[He/she] has been charged with [list and describe the offence[s], mentioning the name[s] of any victim[s]].

In the course of the trial, it is likely that the following people will be called as witnesses [insert names of witnesses]. You may also hear the following people mentioned [insert names of people who may be mentioned during the trial, a knowledge of whom might cause a juror to be embarrassed.]

[Insert any other relevant information that may affect juror impartiality. This information should be discussed with counsel prior to raising it with the jury.]

As I have said, if any of you know the accused, or any of the other people whose names I have mentioned, you should apply to be excused when my associate asks you.

Duration of the trial

This trial is expected to last until [insert anticipated end date]. During the trial, you will need to attend court [specify sitting days and hours. Advise of any anticipated breaks in the trial]. The Juries Commissioner has already given you several opportunities to apply to defer jury service because of the expected length of the trial, or because of personal circumstances, such as child care obligations or issues with your health. But you will have a further opportunity to apply to be excused if you wish to do so. If you think you have a valid reason for being excused because of the trial length or your personal circumstances, then you should apply to be excused when my associate asks you.

Other Reasons

Finally, there may also be some personal reason why you feel you cannot be a juror in this case. The law recognises that a person can be excused from being on a jury if they will be unable to consider the case impartially or if they are unable to serve for any other reason. Consider whether you will be able to decide the case fairly. In a case involving allegations of sexual offences, a potential juror once told the judge that it was "too close to home". That may have meant he or she could not treat the parties to the case fairly. However, other people in similar situations serve as jurors in sexual offence cases every day, and can put aside any personal experiences, or any bias or sympathy that may arise from the fact that the case involves an allegation of a sexual offence.

I urge you to think carefully before you apply to be excused because you cannot be impartial or for any other reason. Serving on a jury is one of the most important things that you can do as a member of the community, and our system of justice cannot operate unless people are prepared to perform this duty.

Applying to be excused

In a moment my associate will call each of your [numbers/names], and ask you to answer "present". If you want to apply to be excused, you should answer "excuse". Once everybody's [name/number] has been called, I will hear the applications to be excused. If your reason for wanting to be excused is personal, you may give it to me in writing. Paper will be provided to you upon request.

1.3 Selecting a Foreperson

1. It is necessary to choose a foreperson to communicate with the judge and to announce the verdict. Other than serving these roles, the foreperson has no higher status or different function than the other jurors (Ng v R (2003) 217 CLR 521 (Kirby J)).
2. Depending on the nature of the case, consideration should be given to delaying the appointment of the foreperson until the jurors have had time to become acquainted. Allowing the jurors to appoint the foreperson within a reasonable time after empanelment – rather than always requiring this to be done at the outset of the trial – will facilitate the appointment of the most appropriate person.
3. The jury may change the foreperson during the course of the trial. The process of selection and change is private to the jury. The reasons should remain unknown to the judge, the parties and the community (Ng v R (2003) 217 CLR 521 (Kirby J); R v Lonsdale [1915] VLR 269).
4. If more than 12 jurors have been empanelled and remain at the time at which the jury is required consider its verdict, and the foreperson is selected in the ballot to reduce the number of jurors to 12, that selection is to be disregarded and the foreperson is to remain on the jury (Juries Act 2000 s 48(2)).

1.3.1 Charge: Selecting a Foreperson

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

My associate is about to ask you to select a foreperson.

The foreperson will speak on your behalf. He or she will be the person who asks me any questions you may have, and who tells me anything else that you want to say. At the end of the trial, it is the foreperson who will deliver your verdict.

Other than that, the foreperson is no different from any other juror. You are all equal judges of the facts in the case, and are all entitled to have your opinions considered equally. Just because a person is appointed as a spokesperson does not mean that his or her opinions about the case count more than those of anyone else, or should be given any greater respect.

Given the role played by the foreperson, the person you select should be someone who is not going to be shy about asking questions or interrupting proceedings. He or she should be a person who is willing to speak up when necessary, and who can communicate any questions or other matters to me.

Although the foreperson will ordinarily be the person who communicates with me, that does not prevent any of you from directly raising a matter with me if necessary. You also have the right to say if your position has been misstated in anything said here in the courtroom, by the foreperson or any other person.

1.4 The Role of Judge and Jury

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Role of the Jury

1. The role of the jury is to determine the facts, apply relevant principles of law to those facts, and return a verdict (R v Dao (2005) 156 A Crim R 459; R v Nguyen [2006] VSCA 158; Azzopardi v R (2001) 205 CLR 50).
2. This requires the jury to:
    - Determine whether, and to what extent, the evidence is to be believed;
    - Decide whether to draw inferences from the evidence; and
    - Apply the law, as they are directed upon it, to the facts as they find them to be (Director of Public Prosecutions v Stonehouse [1978] AC 55. See also Metropolitan Railway Co v Jackson (1877) 3 App Cas 193; Cofield v Waterloo Case Co Ltd (1924) 34 CLR 363; Bratty v AG for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386).
3. It is for the jury alone to decide the facts of a case. This must not be obscured by the performance of the judge's duties (RPS v R (2000) 199 CLR 620; R v Melbourne (1999) 198 CLR 1).
4. Similarly, it is the jury alone that determines the verdict. The judge must be careful to make this clear (R v Johnson (1986) 43 SASR 63).
5. Although the jury are the sole judges of the facts, they must accept and apply the judge's directions about the law (Joshua v R [1955] AC 121; R v Beeby (1911) 6 Cr App R 138; R v Frampton (1917) 12 Cr App R 202).
6. Jurors should not be drawn into the process of questioning witnesses (Tootle v R (2017) 94 NSWLR 430, [59]). See also 1.10 Trial Procedure regarding jurors questioning witnesses.

Role of the Judge

7. The judge must instruct the jury about so much of the law as they need to know in deciding the real issue or issues in the case (Azzopardi v R (2001) 205 CLR 50; RPS v R (2000) 199 CLR 620).

8. This requires the judge to:

   i) Instruct the jury about the elements of the offences and the onus and standard of proof;

   ii) Identify the issues in the case and to relate the law to those issues;

   iii) Put the defence case fairly; and

   iv) In some cases warn the jury about impermissible reasoning, or about particular care that must be shown before accepting certain kinds of evidence (RPS v R (2000) 199 CLR 620; Azzopardi v R (2001) 205 CLR 50).

9. The judge also has an obligation to summarise the respective cases of both the prosecution and the defence, and should remind the jury of the arguments of counsel (RPS v R (2000) 199 CLR 620; R v Mogg (2000) 112 A Crim R 417; R v Conway [2005] QCA 194).

10. The judge may remind the jury of the facts, and assist them to understand those facts (Stingel v The Queen (1990) 171 CLR 312; Brownlee v R (2001) 207 CLR 278).

11. However, the jury always remain the sole judges of the facts. A judge must therefore not direct the jury about how they may (as opposed to may not) reason towards a conclusion of guilt (Azzopardi v R (2001) 205 CLR 50).

12. The role of the judge also includes:

    - Determining the admissibility of evidence;
    - Determining whether there is evidence which, if it is believed, could establish the facts in issue (Stingel v The Queen (1990) 171 CLR 312);
    - Determining whether inferences can legitimately be drawn from the evidence (Metropolitan Railway Co v Jackson (1877) 3 App Cas 193; Cofield v Waterloo Case Co Ltd (1924) 34 CLR 363); and
    - Exercising proper control over the proceedings, in a way that does not infringe on the accused's right to a fair trial (R v Boykovski and Atanasovski (1991) A Crim R 436).

13. The judge has power to exclude the jury from the courtroom while hearing arguments on the admissibility of evidence or determining other applications. This power may be exercised whether or not the accused consents (R v Hendry (1989) 88 Cr App R 187; Demirok v R (1977) 137 CLR 20; Peacock v R (1911) 13 CLR 619).

14. The judge should not explain to the jury the specific reason for asking them to leave the room, nor the outcome of the matter heard in the jury's absence, as it is not relevant to any decisions the jury needs to make, and may wrongly influence them (R v Williams [1982] WAR 277; R v Smith (1986) 85 Cr App R 197; Crosdale v R [1995] 2 All ER 500. See also Basto v R (1954) 91 CLR 628; R v Mitchell [1998] AC 695; Thompson v R [1998] AC 811).

15. However, because there is a danger that the jury will think that material prejudicial to the accused is going to be disclosed in their absence, the jury should be told that they are being asked to leave the room because there is a matter of law that needs to be resolved in their absence (R v Williams [1982] WAR 277; Crosdale v R [1995] 2 All ER 500; R v Anderson (1929) 21 Cr App R 178).

16. The judge must perform all of their tasks in a fair and even-handed manner (R v Dao (2005) 156 A Crim R 459; R v Nguyen [2006] VSCA 158).

17. See 3.2 Overview of Final Directions and 3.9 Judge's Summing Up on Issues and Evidence for further information on the role of the judge.

Need for a Direction

18. The judge must always direct the jury about the roles of the judge and jury (RPS v R (2000) 199 CLR 620; R v Sinclair (1989) 44 A Crim R 449).

19. This direction should usually be given at the commencement of the trial, as well as after the completion of all the evidence and the presentation of argument by counsel (see, e.g. R v Sinclair (1989) 44 A Crim R 449).

20. This is because it is good practice to provide some assistance to a jury at the outset of the trial. However, comments which are made at a preliminary stage may not have their significance fully appreciated by the jury, which is unfamiliar with the issues which may arise in the trial (R v Sinclair (1989) 44 A Crim R 449).

1.4.1 Charge: The Role of Judge and Jury

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Introduction

Serving on a jury may be a completely new experience for some, if not all, of you. To help you perform that role properly, I will now describe your duties as jurors and the procedures that we will follow during the trial. I will also explain to you some of the principles of law that apply in this case.

During and at the end of the trial, I will give you further instructions about the law that applies to this case. You must listen closely to all of these instructions and follow them carefully.

If at any time you have a question about anything I say, please feel free to ask me. You should do this by writing it down, and passing it to my tipstaff, [insert name], who will hand it to me.

Roles of Judge, Jury and Counsel

Members of the jury, you represent one of the most important institutions in our community – the institution of trial by jury. Our legal system guarantees any individual charged with a criminal offence the right to have the case presented against him or her determined by twelve independent and open-minded members of the community, in accordance with the law.

In this case, it is alleged by the prosecution that NOA has committed the offence[s] of [insert offences].[11] S/he has pleaded "not guilty", and so it is for you, and you alone, to decide whether s/he is guilty or not guilty of [this/these] crime[s].

I note that, when referring to the crime[s] that the accused has been charged with, I will sometimes use the words "offence" or "charge" – they all mean the same thing.

In all criminal trials of this type, the court consists of a judge and jury. We are going to be assisted in this case by counsel for the prosecution, [insert prosecutor's name], and defence counsel, [insert defence counsel's name].[12] Each of us has a different role to play.

[11] This charge is drafted for use in cases involving one accused. If the case involves multiple accused, it will need to be modified accordingly.

[12] This sentence will need to be modified if the accused is unrepresented.

Role of the Jury

It is your role, as the jury, to decide what the facts are in this case. You are the only ones in this court who can make a decision about the facts. You make that decision from all of the evidence given during the trial.

It is also your task to apply the law to the facts that you have found, and by doing that decide whether the accused is guilty or not guilty of the offence[s] charged.

Role of the Judge

It is my role, as the judge, to ensure that this trial is fair and conducted in accordance with the law. I will also explain to you the principles of law that you must apply to make your decision. You must accept and follow all of those directions.

I want to emphasise that it is not my responsibility to decide this case. The verdict that you return has absolutely nothing to do with me. So while you must follow any directions I give you about the law, you are not bound by any comments I may make about the facts.

It is unlikely that I will make any comments about the evidence. If you disagree with any comments I make, you must disregard them. Do not give them any extra weight because I, as the judge, have made them. It is your view of the facts which matters, not mine. You are the judges of facts – you alone.

Role of Counsel

The role of counsel is to present the case for the side for which they appear. [Insert name of prosecutor] presents the charge[s] for the prosecution. [Insert name of defence counsel] appears for the accused, and will represent him/her throughout the trial.[13]

You do not need to accept any comments that counsel may make during their addresses. Of course, if you agree with an argument they present, you can adopt it – in effect, it becomes your own argument. But if you do not agree with their view, you must put it aside. As I have told you, you alone are the judges of the facts.

Similarly, you are not bound by what counsel says about the law. I am the judge of the law, and it is what I tell you about the law that matters. If counsel says something different from what I say about the law, you must ignore it and follow my directions.

1.5 Decide Solely on the Evidence

1. The jury must be directed to base their verdict solely on the evidence given before them in the trial. In reaching their verdict they must disregard any knowledge they may otherwise have acquired about the case (Glennon v R (1992) 173 CLR 592; Murphy v R (1989) 167 CLR 94; R v VPH 4/3/94 NSW CCA; R v Vjestica [2008] VSCA 47).
2. The jury should be told that the following matters constitute evidence:
    - The answers to questions asked in court;
    - Documents and exhibits admitted into evidence;

[13] This section will need to be modified if the accused is unrepresented.

- Formal Admissions.

3. The jury should also be directed that the following matters do not constitute evidence:
    - Questions asked of witnesses (unless the witness agrees with the proposition) (R v Johnston [2004] NSWCCA 58; R v Lowe (1997) 98 A Crim R 300; Lander v R (1989) 52 SASR 424; R v Robinson [1977] Qd R 387);
    - Counsels' addresses and arguments (R v Parsons [2004] VSCA 92; R v Lowe (1997) 98 A Crim R 300);[14]
    - The judge's addresses and comments (R v Boykovski and Atanasovski (1991) A Crim R 436. See 3.9 Judge's Summing Up on Evidence and Issues for further information).
4. The principle that questions asked of witnesses are not evidence must be approached with caution when applied to puttage by defence counsel to prosecution witnesses. It may unfairly undermine the defence case to say that if the witness rejected the puttage then there is no evidence to support that proposition. Such a direction would only be permissible if there is no other basis in the evidence which provides direct or inferential support for that proposition (Mathieson v The Queen [2021] VSCA 102, [31]).
5. It may be desirable to tell the jury that if they disbelieve the answer of a witness, that does not amount to positive evidence of the opposite of that answer. Disbelief of a denial generally provides no evidence of the fact denied. For a matter to be sufficiently proven, there needs to be independent, positive evidence (Scott Fell v Lloyd (1911) 13 CLR 230; Edmunds v Edmunds [1935] VLR 177; Gauci v Cmr of Taxation (Cth) (1975) 135 CLR 81; Steinberg v FCT (1975) 134 CLR 640; R v Lowe (1997) 98 A Crim R 300).
6. There may, however, be situations where disbelief of a witness allows the jury to draw a further inference, such as a conclusion that the truth would harm the witness, or that the witness is lying. For this reason, it can be dangerous to tell the jury to simply set aside any matter on which a witness is disbelieved, and give it no further consideration. Further, where there are only two possible states of fact, disbelief of one state of facts can support the conclusion that the other set of facts exists (see Steinberg v FCT (1975) 134 CLR 640; Mathieson v The Queen [2021] VSCA 102, [45]–[56]).
7. The judge should tell the jury that if they are aware of any publicity concerning the case or the accused, this must be placed out of their minds. They must focus only on the evidence led in court (R v Skaf (2004) 60 NSWLR 86; R v Vjestica [2008] VSCA 47. See "Pre-trial Publicity" below for further information concerning pre-trial publicity).
8. The judge should also tell the jury to disregard any feelings of prejudice or sympathy they may have in relation to the accused (Glennon v R (1992) 173 CLR 592).

External Communications

9. The jury should be told to avoid speaking to any people in the precincts of the court (R v Skaf (2004) 60 NSWLR 86).
10. The jury should also be told not to discuss the case with anyone other than their fellow jurors, and to do that only in the privacy of the jury room (R v Skaf (2004) 60 NSWLR 86).

[14] If the accused is self–represented, the jury should be told that his or her addresses and arguments are also not evidence.

11. This includes communicating about the case with court officials.[15] All questions about the case should be directed to the judge (R v Stretton [1982] VR 251; R v Emmett (1988) 14 NSWLR 327; Jackson & Le Gros v R [1995] 1 Qd R 547; R v Briffa & Portillo 21/4/96 Vic CCA; R v GAE (2000) 1 VR 198. See 1.10 Trial Procedure for further information about juror questions).

12. Jurors should be told not to bring mobile telephones or computers into the jury room (R v Skaf (2004) 60 NSWLR 86; R v McCluskey (1994) 98 Cr App R 216; R v Evans (1995) 79 A Crim R 66).

13. It is useful to explain to the jury that one of the reasons for the prohibition against discussing the case is that most people will want to make observations about the case. Such observations will be of no value, since these people will not have heard or seen the evidence, or received directions which are binding upon them, and they will not be subject to the same oath or affirmation as the jurors (R v Skaf (2004) 60 NSWLR 86).

Juror Enquiries

14. It is an offence for a juror to "make an enquiry" for the purpose of obtaining information about a party to the trial or any matter relevant to the trial, except in the proper exercise of his or her functions as a juror (Juries Act 2000 (Vic) s 78A(1)).

15. "Making an enquiry" is defined to include:

    - Consulting with another person or requesting another person to make an enquiry;
    - Conducting research by any means (including using the internet) (see "Independent Research" below); or
    - Viewing or inspecting a place or object that is relevant to the trial, or conducting an experiment (see Private Views and Experiments below) (Juries Act 2000 (Vic) s 78A(5)).

16. This offence applies to all jurors from the time they are selected or allocated as part of the jury panel, until they are either excused from jury service, returned to the jury pool or discharged by the trial judge (Juries Act 2000 (Vic) s 78A(2)).

17. Jurors are not prohibited from making an enquiry of the court, or another member of the jury, in the proper exercise of their functions as a juror (Juries Act 2000 (Vic) s 78A(3)).

18. Although the Juries Act 2000 does not specify that judges must direct the jury about s 78A, this provision should be drawn to their attention (see, e.g. Martin v R (2010) 28 VR 579; DPP v Dupas [2010] VSC 409; R v Rich (Ruling No 7) [2008] VSC 437).

Independent Research

19. It is highly desirable for judges routinely to instruct the jury not to undertake any independent research (by internet or otherwise) concerning:

    - The parties to the trial;
    - Any other matter relevant to the trial; or
    - The law applicable to the case (Martin v R (2010) 28 VR 579; R v K (2003) 59 NSWLR 431. See also Juries Act 2000 (Vic) s 78A; Benbrika v R (2010) 29 VR 593).

20. Judges should not avoid giving such a warning merely because they fear that it might place the idea in the mind of an inquisitive juror, and result in them conducting the kind of research the warning is intended to prevent (R v K (2003) 59 NSWLR 431).

21. It is not sufficient merely to direct the jury that they must be true to their oath, to decide the case on the evidence and to identify the sanctions which apply to jurors who disobey the instructions. The judge must explain the reasons for the prohibition and how such conduct risks injustice and an unfair trial (SD v R (2013) 39 VR 487; R v Skaf (2004) 60 NSWLR 86; R v K (2003) 59 NSWLR 431).

22. The main reasons for the prohibition are that:

    - Independent research may involve acting on information that is not tested and may be wrong or inaccurate;
    - Independent research will involve acting on information which is unknown to the parties, which would be unfair. It is not for the jury to add to the evidence called by the parties;
    - Independent research may lead the jury to take into account legal principles that do not apply in the jurisdiction.

23. It is not inappropriate or improper for a jury to consult a dictionary about the meaning of an ordinary English word which they are told is a question for them (Benbrika v R (2010) 29 VR 593. See also R v Chatzidimitriou (2000) 1 VR 493 (Cummins AJA)).

Private Views and Experiments

24. The jury should be told they must not, either individually or as a group:

    - Make a private visit to the scene of the alleged offence;
    - Attempt any private experiment concerning any aspect of the case; or
    - Cause or request anyone else to do one of these things (R v Skaf (2004) 60 NSWLR 86. See also Juries Act 2000 (Vic) s 78A).

25. The judge should tell the jury that to commit any of these acts would be to change their role from that of impartial jurors to investigators, and would lead them to take into account material that was not properly placed before them as evidence. Such material might require expertise in order to ensure that the inspection or experiment was properly conducted. In addition, the prosecution and the defence would be unaware of the material the jury were taking into account, and would be unable to test it (R v Skaf (2004) 60 NSWLR 86).

26. The jury should also be told that it is only views or experiments which occur in the presence of all jurors, counsel and the judge that are permitted. This allows safeguards to be taken to replicate the conditions which existed at the time of the relevant events. It also allows any relevant differences in the crime scene or in the circumstances of the experiment to be pointed out (R v Skaf (2004) 60 NSWLR 86).

27. See Views for further information concerning legitimate views, experiments, demonstrations and reconstructions.

Jury Room Experiments

28. As material objects produced in evidence and admitted as exhibits are part of the evidence in a trial, the jury are entitled to examine them and have regard to them in reaching their verdict. They may touch and handle them, and may engage in a limited amount of simple experimentation with them (Kozul v R (1981) 147 CLR 221).

29. In conducting such simple experiments, the jury are doing no more than using their own senses to assess the weight and value of the evidence. The results do not stand in place of the evidence – they consist of the juror's perceptions of the evidence itself (Kozul v R (1981) 147 CLR 221).

30. While the jury may conduct simple experiments in the jury room, they must not conduct experiments in the absence of the parties that go beyond the mere examination and testing of the evidence, and become a means of supplying new evidence (Kozul v R (1981) 147 CLR 221; Hodge v Williams (1947) 47 SR (NSW) 489; Juries Act 2000 (Vic) s 78A).

31. So while the judge may encourage the jury to examine exhibits with a view to testing the evidence given, they should not encourage the jury to conduct experiments which will generate new evidence in the jury room (Kozul v R (1981) 147 CLR 221).

32. It may be necessary to warn the jury of the possible dangers of conducting even simple experiments in the jury room. For example, the present condition of the object experimented with may not be the same as its condition at the relevant time, or the fact to be observed may be such that a layperson might need to have their observation assisted by expert evidence (Kozul v R (1981) 147 CLR 221).

Irrelevance of Sentence

33. The judge should not tell the jury what the consequences of their verdict will be, unless required to do so by statute. This is because the question of sentence is the exclusive province of the trial judge, and is not relevant to the jury's determination (Lucas v R (1970) 120 CLR 171; Kingswell v R (1985) 159 CLR 264; R v Costi (1987) 48 SASR 269. See Mental Impairment for a statutory exception to this rule).

34. Counsel should also not refer to the penalty prescribed by law for the offence charged, or make any other reference to the consequences which will flow from the jury's verdict. If they do, the judge should intervene immediately in order to stop counsel, and instruct the jury that such matters are not their concern and are completely irrelevant to any issues they have to determine (Attorney-General for South Australia v Brown [1960] AC 432; R v Costi (1987) 48 SASR 269).

35. Counsel may, however, tell the jury that the accused faces an extremely serious charge, of which the law takes a serious view (R v Neal (1947) 53 ALR (CN) 616a).

36. Neither the judge nor counsel should mention the jury's right to add a rider to the verdict, or to make a recommendation for mercy (Lucas v R (1970) 120 CLR 171; R v Black [1963] 1 WLR 1311).

37. The judge must not tell the jury that the accused will not be prosecuted again on any other charge related to the matter in issue (R v Morton [2001] QCA 240).

Pre-trial Publicity

38. Where there has been pre-trial publicity about a case, or the people involved in a case, the judge has a responsibility to avoid unfairness to either party (Glennon v R (1992) 173 CLR 592; R v Vjestica [2008] VSCA 47; R v Dupas (2009) 28 VR 380).

39. In most cases, it will be possible to overcome any potential prejudice the accused might suffer due to pre-trial publicity by giving the jury appropriate and thorough directions designed to counteract such prejudice (Dupas v R (2010) 241 CLR 237; Glennon v R (1992) 173 CLR 592; R v Vjestica [2008] VSCA 47; R v Dupas (2009) 28 VR 380). See Dupas v R (2010) 241 CLR 237 for an example of such directions.

40. In determining whether such a direction will be sufficient to counter the effects of pre-trial publicity, jurors should not be regarded as exceptionally fragile and prone to prejudice. It should be assumed that they approach their task in accordance with the oath they take to listen to the directions that they are given, and to determine guilt only on the evidence before them (Dupas v R (2010) 241 CLR 237; Glennon v R (1992) 173 CLR 592; John Fairfax Publications Pty Ltd v District Court of NSW (2004) 61 NSWLR 344; R v Vjestica [2008] VSCA 47; R v Dupas (2009) 28 VR 380).

41. It is not necessary for a judge to be sure that any possible prejudice will be remediable by a warning, so long as they take all appropriate steps available to secure a fair trial (Glennon v R (1992) 173 CLR 592; Murphy v R (1989) 167 CLR 94).

42. If a judge determines that a warning alone will be insufficient to counter the effects of pre-trial publicity, they may conduct the trial in whatever manner is appropriate to counter those effects, within the ordinary procedural constraints. This includes adjourning the trial until the influence of prejudicial publicity subsides (Glennon v R (1992) 173 CLR 592; R v Dupas (2009) 28 VR 380. See also DPP v Dupas [2010] VSC 409).

43. The balancing of the legitimate interests of the accused and the prosecution will, in almost every case, mean that if the proceedings are to be stayed at all, they should only be stayed temporarily and for the minimum period necessary (Glennon v R (1992) 173 CLR 592; R v VPH 4/3/94 NSW CCA; R v Dupas (2009) 28 VR 380. See also DPP v Dupas [2010] VSC 409).

44. However, there may be extreme cases in which a permanent stay may be granted (Dupas v R (2010) 241 CLR 237; Glennon v R (1992) 173 CLR 592).

45. A permanent stay will only be necessary if there is a fundamental defect going to the root of the trial of such a nature that there is nothing the judge can do in the conduct of the trial to relieve against its unfair consequences (Dupas v R (2010) 241 CLR 237; Glennon v R (1992) 173 CLR 592).

46. A permanent stay should not be granted simply because there has been extensive adverse pre-trial publicity about the accused. Any unfair consequences of prejudice or prejudgment arising out of such publicity can be protected against by thorough and appropriate directions to the jury (Dupas v R (2010) 241 CLR 237).

47. In considering whether to grant a permanent stay, judges should take into account the substantial public interest of the community in having those who are charged with criminal offences brought to trial. Fairness to the accused is not the only consideration bearing on a court's decision as to whether a trial should proceed (Dupas v R (2010) 241 CLR 237).

Notifying the Judge About Irregularities

48. The jury should be directed that if it becomes apparent to any of them, in the course of the trial, that another juror has made an independent inquiry in relation to any aspect of the case, that should be brought immediately to the attention of the judge. This includes discovering that a juror has:

    - Made an inquiry about the accused or the background to the offence, or caused someone else to do so;
    - Made a private inspection of a relevant site, conducted a private experiment, or caused someone else to do one of these things; or
    - Discussed the case with anyone other than the remaining members of the jury (R v Skaf (2004) 60 NSWLR 86).

49. The jury should also be instructed that if it becomes apparent to any juror, in the course of the trial, that any matter which is not in evidence has found its way into the jury room, that should similarly be brought immediately to the attention of the trial judge (R v Skaf (2004) 60 NSWLR 86).

50. The jury should be told that the reason why it is necessary for such matters to be brought to the immediate attention of the judge is that, unless it is known before the end of the trial, it may not be possible to put matters right. This may either lead to an injustice occurring or a retrial becoming necessary (R v Skaf (2004) 60 NSWLR 86).

51. These directions should be expressed in specific terms, rather than simply instructing the jury to bring to the judge's attention any behaviour among the jurors that causes concern (cf. R v Mirza [2004] 1 WLR 665). Such a general direction may lead to matters being brought to the judge's attention which would involve inappropriate criticism of fellow jurors, or lead to the disclosure of jury deliberations (R v Skaf (2004) 60 NSWLR 86).

1.5.1 – Charge: Decide Solely on the Evidence

Introduction: What is Evidence?

I have told you that it is your task to determine the facts in this case, and that you should do this by considering all of the evidence presented in the courtroom. I now need to tell you what is and what is not evidence.

The first type of evidence is what the witnesses say.

It is the answers that you hear from the witnesses that are the evidence, and not the questions they are asked. This is important to understand, as sometimes counsel will confidently include an allegation of fact in a question they ask a witness. No matter how positively or confidently that allegation is presented, it will not form part of the evidence unless the witness agrees with it.

Let me give you a simple example that has nothing to do with this case. Imagine counsel says to a witness "The car was blue, wasn't it?", and the witness replies "No, it wasn't". Given that answer, there is absolutely no evidence that the car was blue.

Even if you do not believe the witness, or think he or she is lying, there is no evidence that the car is blue. Disbelief of a witness's answer does not provide evidence of the opposite. To prove that the car was blue, there would need to be evidence from some other source, such as a photograph or the testimony of another witness.

Of course, if the witness had instead replied "yes, it was", there would be evidence that the car was blue. In such a case, the witness has adopted the suggestion made in the question. However, if the witness does not agree with that suggestion, the only evidence you have is that the car was not blue.

The second type of evidence is any document or other item that is received as an "exhibit". The exhibits will be pointed out to you when they are introduced into evidence. When you go to the jury room to decide this case, some of the exhibits will go with you for you to examine. Consider them along with the rest of the evidence and in exactly the same way.

The third type of evidence is what is called an "admission". Admissions are facts that the prosecution and defence agree about. When that happens, no other evidence is required – the admissions are treated as established facts. I will tell you about any admissions that have been made in this case when relevant.

Nothing else is evidence in this case. This includes comments about the facts made by counsel.[16] The only evidence is the witnesses' testimony, [the admissions] and the exhibits.

No Sympathy or Prejudice

It is your duty to decide this case only on the basis of that evidence. You must ignore all other considerations.

In particular, you should dismiss any feelings of sympathy or prejudice you may have, whether it is sympathy for, or prejudice against, the accused or anyone else. No such emotion has any part to play in your decision.

[16] If the accused is unrepresented, the jury should be told that what s/he says in his/her addresses, or when questioning witnesses, is also not evidence.

You are the judges of the facts. That means that in relation to all of the issues in this case, you must act like judges. You must dispassionately weigh the evidence logically and with an open-mind, not according to your passion or feelings. Your duty is to consider the evidence using your intellect not your heart.

No Outside Information

When you retire to consider your verdict, you will have heard or received in court, or otherwise under my supervision, all the information that you need to make your decision.

Unless I tell you otherwise, you must not base your decision on any information you obtain outside this courtroom. For example, you must completely ignore anything that you have seen or heard in the media about this case or the people involved in it, or which you may see or hear. You must consider only the evidence presented to you here in court [if a view may be conducted add: "or otherwise under my supervision"].[17]

Most importantly, you must not make any investigations or enquiries, or conduct independent research, concerning any aspect of the case or any person connected with it. That includes research about the law that applies to the case. You must not use the internet to access legal databases, legal dictionaries, legal texts, earlier decisions of this or other courts, or other material of any kind relating to the matters in the trial. You must not search for information about the case on Google or conduct similar searches. You also must not discuss the case on Facebook, X or blogs, or look at such sites for more information about the case. If you believe you need more information, ask me. Part of my role is to ensure you understand the legal issues in the case.

You may ask yourself the question: what is wrong with looking for more information? Seeking out information, or discussing a matter with friends, may be a natural part of life for you when making an important decision. As conscientious jurors, you may think that conducting your own research will help you reach the right result. However, there are three important reasons why using outside information, or researching the case on the internet, would be wrong.

First, media reports, claims made outside court and information in legal databases you find may be wrong, inaccurate or not relevant. The prosecution and defence will not have a chance to test the information. Similarly, I will not know if you need any directions on how to use such material.

Second, deciding a case on outside information, which is not known to the parties, is unfair to both the prosecution and the defence. The trial is conducted according to well established legal principles and its not for you to go looking for other information or to add to the evidence or the directions I will give you.

Third, acting on outside information would be false to the oath or affirmation you took as jurors to give a true verdict according to the evidence. You would cease being a juror, that is, a judge of the facts, and have instead taken on the role of an investigator.

If one of your fellow jurors breaches these instructions, then the duty falls on the rest of you to inform me or a member of my staff, either in writing or otherwise, without delay. These rules are so important that you must report your fellow juror.

[Add the following shaded section if there is a risk that a juror may visit the crime scene or attempt a private experiment.]

[17] If there has been significant pre-trial publicity about the case or the parties involved, it may be necessary to give a more detailed warning. See 1.5 Decide Solely on the Evidence for further information.

For similar reasons, unless I tell you otherwise, you must not visit the scene of the alleged offence. You also must not attempt any private experiments concerning any aspect of the case. As I have explained, you are jurors assessing the evidence which is led in the case. You are not investigators, and must not take into account material that has not been properly presented to you as evidence.

Consequences of breaching instructions

You may have a question about what could happen if you acted on outside information or conducted your own research.

The immediate outcome is that the jury may need to be discharged and the trial may have to start again. This would cause stress and expense to the witnesses, the prosecution and the accused. It would also cause stress and inconvenience to the other jurors, who will have wasted their time sitting on a case which must be restarted.

Second, it is a criminal offence for a juror to discuss the case with others or to conduct research on the case. You could therefore be fined and receive a criminal conviction, which may affect your ability to travel to some countries. Jurors have even been sent to jail for discussing a case on Facebook.

More broadly, jurors conducting their own research undermines public confidence in the jury system. The jury system has been a fundamental feature of our criminal justice system for centuries.

For all these reasons, it is essential that you decide the case solely on the evidence presented in court, without feelings of sympathy or prejudice. You must not conduct your own research into the case or discuss the case with others who are not on the jury.

Warnings About Discussing the Case

As judges of the facts, it is also important that you are careful to avoid any situations that could interfere with your ability to be impartial, or that could make you appear to be biased towards one side or the other.

You must therefore be careful not to get into conversation with anyone you do not know, who you might meet around or near the court building. Otherwise you may find yourself talking to someone who turns out to have a special interest in the case.

You must also avoid talking to anyone other than your fellow jurors about the case. This includes your family and friends. You must not discuss the case on social media sites, such as Facebook, X, Instagram, blogs or anything else like that. Of course, you can tell your family and friends that you are on a jury, and about general matters such as when the trial is expected to finish. But do not discuss the case itself or talk about the evidence. It is your judgment, not theirs, that is sought. You should not risk that judgment being influenced by their views – which will necessarily be uninformed, because they will not have seen the witnesses or heard the evidence.

[If the judge considers it appropriate to warn against discussing the case with a doctor or psychologist, add the following shaded section]

If you speak to a medical professional during the trial, such as a doctor or a regular psychologist that you see, you could tell them you are on a jury if that is relevant. But as with your family and friends, you must not talk to them about the evidence, the arguments, or the opinions of your fellow jurors. Those are confidential between you and your fellow jurors, and must not be disclosed even to a medical professional.

[If the judge considers it appropriate to inform the jury of the Juror Support Program, add the following shaded section]

At the end of the trial, you will have the option to access a Juror Support Program. A Juries Victoria staff member will give you more information about that in due course.

[If the case is likely to involve distressing material, add the following shaded section instead of the shaded section directly above]

As this case involves charges of [identify relevant charges], you may hear or see evidence that may be distressing. [If desired, give an example, such as crime scene photos or evidence from the complainant]. Everyone has a different response to the sorts of material that are part of a criminal trial.

At the end of the trial, you will have access to a Juror Support Program. A Juries Victoria staff member will give you more information about that in due course.

Some of you might have a regular doctor or psychologist you speak to about distressing experiences. But as a juror there are limits on what you can say during the trial, even to medical professionals. You can tell them you are on a jury. You can also tell them about what effect the trial and the evidence has on you. But you must not tell them what the evidence is, or what the arguments are, or what fellow jurors have said. All those matters are confidential. And like with your friends and family, you must not risk having your view of the case influenced by medical professionals.

You are free to discuss the case amongst yourselves as it continues, although you should only do this in the jury room. However, you should form no conclusive views about the case until you have heard all of the evidence, listened to counsel on both sides, and received my instructions about the law. Keep an open mind.

Consequences of breaching instructions revisited

You have already heard what can happen when jurors disregard the instruction not to conduct their own research. Similar consequences can follow if you discuss the case with others.

You must therefore also let me know if someone tries to discuss the case with you, or if you learn that one of your fellow jurors has been discussing the case with someone outside the jury.

1.6 Assessing Witnesses

1. It is for the jury, who have seen and heard the witnesses, to decide whether they accept their evidence. They are free to accept or reject the whole of a witness's evidence, or to accept some of the evidence and reject the rest (Cubillo v Commonwealth (2000) 174 ALR 97; Flint v Lowe (1995) 22 MVR 1; S v M (1984) 36 SASR 316).
2. It is therefore customary to direct a jury that they are not bound to believe the evidence of any witness, and that they are not bound to believe the whole of the evidence of any witness. They should be told that they may accept some parts of a witness's evidence, but not other parts (Cubillo v Commonwealth 174 ALR 97; Dublin, Wicklow & Wexford Railway Co v Slattery (1878) 3 App Cas 1155).
3. The jury should also be directed that it is their duty to keep an open mind about the truthfulness of any individual witness, and about the accuracy of that witness's recollection, until all the evidence has been presented. It is only once they have heard all of the evidence that it will be possible for them to assess to what extent, if any, that witness's evidence has been confirmed, explained or contradicted by the evidence of other witnesses. Only then should they direct their minds to the question of whether the guilt of the accused has been proved beyond reasonable doubt (Haw Tua Tau v Public Prosecutor [1982] AC 136).

4. Where a witness was intoxicated at the time of the event about which he or she is giving evidence, it may be appropriate to direct the jury that the reliability of his or her evidence may be affected (see, e.g. O'Leary v Daire (1984) 13 A Crim R 404; Bedi v R (1993) 61 SASR 269; R v Mathe [2003] VSCA 165; R v Baltensberger (2004) 90 SASR 129; R v MC [2009] VSCA 122).[18]
5. The judge, prosecutor or defence counsel must not suggest in any way to the jury that an interest in the outcome of the trial is a factor to take into account in assessing the evidence of witnesses generally (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44H, as amended in 2017).
6. This is because the jury will likely conclude that the accused has the greatest interest, and so the direction may have the effect of undermining the presumption of innocence (Robinson v R (No 2) (1991) 180 CLR 531; R v McMahon (2004) 8 VR 101; Hargraves & Stoten v R (2011) 245 CLR 257; Criminal Law Review, Department of Justice and Regulation (Vic), Jury Directions: A Jury-Centric Approach Part 2 (Report, February 2017) 11–14).
7. Suggestions that a witness has a particular interest in the outcome of a trial are permitted. For information on directions about assessing the evidence of an accused, see 4.1 The Accused as a Witness.
8. It is undesirable to suggest that a conviction or acquittal will reflect favourably or unfavourably on the credit of a witness, or have some other effect on them (R v Coulston [1997] 2 VR 446).
9. The jury should not be told that witnesses must be presumed to be innocent. The presumption of innocence is only relevant to the accused (Howe v R (1980) 32 ALR 478).

1.6.1 Charge: Assessing Witnesses

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

In order to decide what the facts are in this case, you will need to assess the witnesses who give evidence. It is up to you to decide how much or how little of the testimony of any witness you will believe or rely on. You may believe all, some or none of a witness's evidence. It is also for you to decide what weight should be attached to any particular evidence – that is, the extent to which the evidence helps you to determine the relevant issues.

In assessing witnesses' evidence, matters which may concern you include their credibility and reliability. Credibility concerns honesty – is the witness telling you the truth? Reliability may be different. A witness may be honest, but have a poor memory or be mistaken.

It is for you to judge whether the witnesses are telling the truth, and whether they correctly recall the facts about which they are giving evidence. This is something you do all the time in your daily lives. There is no special skill involved – you just need to use your common sense.

In making your assessment, you should appreciate that giving evidence in a trial is not common, and may be a stressful experience. So you should not jump to conclusions based on how a witness gives evidence. Looks can be deceiving. People react and appear differently. Witnesses come from different backgrounds, and have different abilities, values and life experiences. There are too many variables to make the manner in which a witness gives evidence the only, or even the most important, factor in your decision.

You should keep an open mind about the truthfulness or accuracy of the witnesses until all of the evidence has been presented. This is because it is only once you have heard all of the evidence that it will be possible to assess to what extent, if any, the other evidence in the case confirms, explains or contradicts a particular witness's evidence.

[18] See Common Law Intoxication for information about other directions that may be necessary in cases involving intoxication.

In making your decision, do not consider only the witnesses' testimony. Also take into account the exhibits [and admissions]. Consider all of the evidence in the case, use what you believe and reject what you disbelieve. Give each part of it the importance which you – as the judge of the facts – think it should be given, and then determine what, in your judgment, are the true facts.

1.7 Onus and Standard of Proof

Presumption of Innocence

1. At common law, a person charged with a criminal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law (Woolmington v DPP [1935] AC 462; Howe v R (1980) 32 ALR 478).
2. The presumption is not that the accused is not guilty. It is that the accused is innocent (R v Palmer (1992) 64 A Crim R 1).
3. The presumption of innocence has been enshrined in s 25(1) of the Charter of Human Rights and Responsibilities Act 2006 (Vic).
4. The presumption of innocence is only relevant to the accused. It is a misdirection to tell the jury that witnesses are presumed to be innocent (Howe v R (1980) 32 ALR 478).

Onus of Proof

Offences

5. Except for limited statutory exceptions, in criminal trials the onus of proving the accused's guilt always lies on the prosecution. Accused people do not need to prove their innocence (Woolmington v DPP [1935] AC 462; He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523; Chugg v Pacific Dunlop Ltd (1990) 170 CLR 249).
6. If a statute is silent as to who bears the onus of proving an offence, it is presumed that it will be the prosecution (Chugg v Pacific Dunlop Ltd (1990) 170 CLR 249; Stingel v R (1990) 171 CLR 312; Czerwinski v Hayes (1987) 47 SASR 44).

Defences

7. Unless the onus is placed on the accused by statute, the prosecution will also bear the onus of disproving any defences that arise as issues in a trial (R v Youssef (1990) 59 A Crim R 1; Zecevic v DPP (1987) 162 CLR 645).
8. Where relevant, the prosecution must therefore prove that the accused's actions were not:
    - Accidental (Woolmington v DPP [1935] AC 462; Griffiths v R (1994) 125 ALR 545);
    - Involuntary as a result of a state of sane automatism (Bratty v AG for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386; Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30);
    - A result of duress (Crimes Act 1958 s 322O; R v Bone (1968) 52 Cr App R 546; R v Gill [1963] 1 WLR 841; R v Lawrence [1980] 1 NSWLR 122; Van den Hoek v R (1986) 161 CLR 158);
    - Formed without the required state of mind due to intoxication (R v O'Connor (1980) 146 CLR 64; R v Coleman (1990) 19 NSWLR 467);

- Provoked (Stingel v R (1990) 171 CLR 312; Moffa v R (1977) 138 CLR 601);[19]
- Committed in self-defence (Crimes Act 1958 s 322K; Viro v R (1978) 141 CLR 88; Zecevic v DPP (1987) 162 CLR 645);
- Done in an honest and reasonable belief in the existence of a state of affairs which, had it existed, would have made the acts innocent (He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523).

9. The prosecution only needs to disprove a defence if there is evidence, or other relevant material, which gives rise to that defence (R v Lobell [1957] 1 QB 547; Bullard v R [1957] AC 635; R v Howe (1958) 100 CLR 448; Bratty v AG for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386; Spautz v Williams [1983] 2 NSWLR 506).
10. The prosecution will need to disprove a defence if there is evidence on which a reasonable jury could decide the issue favourably to the accused, no matter how weak or tenuous the judge considers that evidence to be (R v Youssef (1990) 50 A Crim R 1; Zecevic v DPP (1987) 162 CLR 645; R v Kear [1997] 2 VR 555).
11. The evidence that raises a defence need not have been given by the defence. It is possible for the prosecution evidence to disclose facts which might give rise to a defence (see, e.g. R v Bonnick (1977) 66 Cr App R 266; R v McDonald [1991] Crim LR 122).
12. If the evidence discloses the possibility of a defence, the judge must instruct the jury that the prosecution needs to disprove that defence, whether or not the defence was raised by the accused (Zecevic v DPP (1987) 162 CLR 645).

Exceptions and Provisos

13. Some statutory offences are stated to be subject to certain qualifications. Whether the onus is on the accused to prove facts that would bring his or her case within the scope of such a qualification, or on the prosecution to disprove the existence of such facts, will depend on how the provision is construed:
    - If the qualification is part of the definition of the grounds of liability (known as a "proviso"), the onus of proof will be on the prosecution to prove that the proviso does not apply.
    - If the qualification is a new matter, which does not form part of the primary grounds of liability, but is a special exception or condition defeating or answering liability that otherwise exists (known as an "exception"), the onus of proof will be on the party seeking to prove the exception (Darling Island Stevedoring & Lighterage Co Ltd v Jacobsen (1945) 70 CLR 635; Barritt v Baker (1948) VLR 491; Dowling v Bowie (1952) 86 CLR 136; Vines v Djordjevitch (1955) 91 CLR 512).
14. Although not determinative, the form of the provision is an important consideration in deciding whether an offence is subject to a "proviso" or an "exception", and who bears the onus of proof:
    - If the qualification exists in a single proposition with the definition of the grounds of liability, it is likely that it is a "proviso", and that the onus of proof will be on the prosecution;
    - If the qualification exists in a distinct provision from that which defines the grounds of the liability, it is likely that it is an "exception", and that the onus of proof will be on the accused (Darling Island Stevedoring & Lighterage Co Ltd v Jacobsen (1945) 70 CLR 635; Dowling v Bowie (1952) 86 CLR 136; Chugg v Pacific Dunlop Ltd (1990) 170 CLR 249).

[19] Provocation is no longer a partial defence to murder (Crimes Act 1958 s 3B). This provision applies to offences committed on or after 23 November 2005.

15. However, while the form of the language may provide assistance, ultimately the question is to be determined upon considerations of substance rather than form (Dowling v Bowie (1952) 86 CLR 136; Chugg v Pacific Dunlop Ltd (1990) 170 CLR 249).

16. The question is whether it is possible to discern a legislative intention to impose upon the accused the ultimate burden of bringing his or her case within the scope of the qualification (DPP v United Telecasters Sydney Ltd (1990) 168 CLR 594; Chugg v Pacific Dunlop Ltd (1990) 170 CLR 249).

17. This intention may be discerned from express words or by implication (Chugg v Pacific Dunlop Ltd (1990) 170 CLR 249; R v Edwards [1975] QB 27; R v Hunt [1987] AC 352).

18. It may be possible to discern an intention to impose the onus on the accused if legislation prohibits an act from being done unless it is:

    - Committed in specified circumstances; or
    - Committed by people of a specified class or with specified qualifications; or
    - Committed with the licence or permission of specified authorities (Darling Island Stevedoring & Lighterage Co Ltd v Jacobsen (1945) 70 CLR 635; R v Edwards [1975] QB 27; R v Hunt [1987] AC 352; Chugg v Pacific Dunlop Ltd (1990) 170 CLR 249).

19. If the qualification relates to a matter that is peculiarly within the knowledge of the accused, that provides a strong indication that it is an exception which the accused will bear the onus of proving (Chugg v Pacific Dunlop Ltd (1990) 170 CLR 249; Darling Island Stevedoring & Lighterage Co Ltd v Jacobsen (1945) 70 CLR 635; DPP v United Telecasters Sydney Ltd (1990) 168 CLR 594; R v Douglas [1985] VR 721).

Standard of Proof

20. If the onus of proof is on the prosecution, the court is not to find the prosecution case proved unless it is satisfied that it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt (Evidence Act 2008 s 141(1)).

21. If the onus of proof is on the accused, the court is to find the case of an accused proved if it is satisfied that the case has been proved on the balance of probabilities (Evidence Act 2008 s 141(2)).

Proof Beyond Reasonable Doubt

23. The standard of "proof beyond reasonable doubt" can be compared with proof on the "balance of probabilities", which is the standard of proof that applies in:

    - Civil cases (Miller v Minister of Pensions [1947] 2 All ER 372; Malec v JC Hutton Pty Ltd (1990) 169 CLR 638);
    - Cases in which the onus is placed on the accused (Evidence Act 2008 s 141(2); Sodeman v R (1936) 55 CLR 192); and
    - Determining the jurisdiction of the court (Thompson v R (1989) 169 CLR 1; Ahern v R (1988) 165 CLR 87).

24. As the High Court recognised in R v Dookheea (2017) 262 CLR 402, [41], judges are encouraged to compare the criminal standard with the civil standard. This is:

> an effective means of conveying to a jury that being satisfied of guilt beyond reasonable doubt does not simply mean concluding that the accused may have committed the offence charged or even that it is more likely than not that the accused committed the offence charged.

25. The prosecution must prove all of the elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt (Thomas v R (1960) 102 CLR 584; La Fontaine v R (1976) 136 CLR 62; Van Leeuwen v R (1981) 55 ALJR 726; Chamberlain v R (No 2) (1984) 153 CLR 521; Hoch v R (1988) 165 CLR 292; R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30).

26. The prosecution must also disprove beyond reasonable doubt any defences that are raised as issues in a trial (R v Youssef (1990) 59 A Crim R 1; Zecevic v DPP (1987) 162 CLR 645).

27. The jury does not need to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt of the existence of each and every fact relied upon to prove an element, or disprove a defence, as long as they are satisfied that the accused's guilt has been proven beyond reasonable doubt (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 61; Shepherd v R (1990) 170 CLR 573 (Dawson J)).

28. Despite any uncertainty about the scope of the word "matters" in Jury Directions Act 2015 s 61, the Act is "emphatic in stipulating that it is only the elements of an offence (and disproof of any relevant defence), not some particular piece of evidence or intermediate fact, that must be proved beyond reasonable doubt" (DPP v Roder [2024] HCA 15, [17]).

29. At common law, a jury could not draw an inference of guilt from a fact unless, at the end of the trial, they were satisfied of the existence of that fact beyond reasonable doubt (Shepherd v R (1990) 170 CLR 573; Chamberlain v R (No 2) (1984) 153 CLR 521; Knight v R (1992) 175 CLR 495; R v Schonewille [1998] 2 VR 625). This rule has been abolished by Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 61 and 62. See 3.6 Circumstantial Evidence and Inferences for further information.

30. In some cases, there will be critical evidence that would allow a jury to decide the case on that evidence alone. Types of evidence that might have this character include confessions, identification evidence and DNA evidence. In such cases, it may be appropriate for the judge to identify clearly for the jury the importance of that evidence to prove the element. Judges should discuss the issue with counsel and hear submissions on what additional directions or comments are appropriate. One option is to refer to the evidence and direct the jury that it must be satisfied that that evidence proves the element beyond reasonable doubt (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 61, Example).

31. It is wrong for the jury to consider each item of evidence separately and eliminate it from consideration unless satisfied beyond reasonable doubt. The evidence must be considered together at the end of the trial. One piece of evidence may resolve the jury's doubts about another (Chamberlain v R (No 2) (1984) 153 CLR 521).

32. If, upon review of all the evidence, the jury are left in reasonable doubt about whether the prosecution case has been made out, or are satisfied that the accused's case has been made out, they must acquit (Woolmington v DPP [1935] AC 462).

Meaning of "Beyond Reasonable Doubt"

33. The following paragraphs summarise common law authorities on the meaning of beyond reasonable doubt. While the primary explanation of the meaning of beyond reasonable doubt is now found in Jury Directions Act 2015 s 64 (see Charging the Jury, below), the following principles may be relevant if the jury asks further questions which suggest it is not assisted by the s 64 explanation.

34. "Beyond reasonable doubt" is a composite expression, not intended to be broken into its component parts or analysed. It is designed to convey an accurate impression of the high standard of proof that the prosecution must satisfy. It is not possible to define each of the three words separately, because the phrase means more than the mere sum of its parts (R v Pahuja (1987) 49 SASR 191 (Cox J); R v Chatzidimitriou (2000) 1 VR 493 (Callaway JA)).

35. The jury itself has the task of determining what a reasonable doubt is, according to standards which the jurors adopt (R v Chatzidimitriou (2000) 1 VR 493).

36. A reasonable doubt is one that a jury which is properly aware of its responsibilities (i.e. which heeds the judge's directions, carefully considers the evidence, and eschews fanciful or unreal possibilities) is prepared to entertain at the end of its deliberations. The jury has the task of determining what is reasonable in the circumstances (Green v R (1971) 126 CLR 28; R v Pahuja (1987) 49 SASR 191; R v Neilan [1992] 1 VR 57; R v Chatzidimitriou (2000) 1 VR 493).

37. In principle, the standard of reasonable doubt applies to the jury as a whole, and not to the subjective processes of individual jurors. However, in practice, each individual juror must apply the standard of "beyond reasonable doubt" in their own consideration of the evidence. A judge's directions on the test therefore are directed as much to individual jurors as to the jury as a whole (R v Dookheea (2017) 262 CLR 402, [35]).

38. Although in England the term "beyond reasonable doubt" is seen to be synonymous with the term "sure" (see, e.g. R v Hepworth and Fearnley [1955] 2 QB 600; R v Onufrejczyk [1955] 1 QB 388), this is not the case in Australia (Thomas v R (1960) 102 CLR 584; Dawson v R (1961) 106 CLR 1; R v Punj [2002] QCA 333; R v Cavkic (No 2) (2009) 28 VR 341; Benbrika v R (2010) 29 VR 593).

39. Proof "beyond reasonable doubt" cannot be expressed mathematically (e.g. as a 99% certainty). Such an approach incorrectly implies that the jury should disregard any doubts that exist once the arbitrarily fixed percentage or rate is reached (R v Cavkic (2005) 12 VR 136).

Charging the Jury

Requirements

40. In all criminal cases the judge is required to direct the jury, in clear language, that the onus of proof is on the prosecution (Thomas v R (1960) 102 CLR 584; La Fontaine v R (1976) 136 CLR 72; Bartho v R (1978) 19 ALR 418; Van Leeuwen v R (1981) 36 ALR 591; R v Schonewille [1998] 2 VR 625).

41. The judge must instruct the jury that the prosecution has to prove the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt, and that it is for the jury to determine whether this has been done (R v Neilan [1992] 1 VR 57; R v Chatzidimitriou (2000) 1 VR 493).

42. The judge should tell the jury that the way in which the prosecution must prove the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt is by establishing the elements of the offence to that standard. The accused is entitled to the benefit of any reasonable doubt in the juror's minds (R v Reeves (1992) 29 NSWLR 109; R v McNamara 1/12/1998 Qld CA).

43. The charge must not relieve the prosecution of the burden of proving every element of the offence beyond reasonable doubt. Even if there is no evidence concerning a particular element, and that element is not contested by the defence, the judge must not tell the jury that they do not need to consider that element. Every element must be proven beyond reasonable doubt (Griffiths v R (1994) 125 ALR 545).

44. If the accused's counsel identifies that a defence is in issue under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 11, the judge must instruct the jury that the prosecution must also disprove that defence beyond reasonable doubt (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 11; Zecevic v DPP (1987) 162 CLR 645). It is not sufficient simply to give a general direction about the onus and standard of proof at the beginning of the charge, and not relate it to any defences in issue (R v Bone (1968) 52 Cr App R 546; R v Reeves (1992) 29 NSWLR 109).

45. The judge must give the jury an explanation of the phrase "beyond reasonable doubt" unless there are good reasons for not doing so. This explanation must be given before any evidence is adduced in the trial unless there are good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 63(1), (2)). The judge must have regard to the submissions of the prosecution and defence in deciding whether either of these good reasons tests are met (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 63(3)).

46. If the judge decides not to explain beyond reasonable doubt before any evidence is adduced, the judge must give the explanation at the earliest time the judge determines is appropriate (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 63(4)).

47. The judge may also explain the meaning of beyond reasonable doubt if the jury asks a direct question about its meaning, or a question indirectly raises the meaning of the phrase (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 63(5)).

48. The judge may repeat the explanation at any time in the trial. When repeating an explanation, the judge does not need to give the explanation in the exact same way they gave it the first time (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 63(6), (7)).

Explaining beyond reasonable doubt

49. When explaining the meaning of beyond reasonable doubt, the judge may:

    - Refer to the presumption of innocence and the prosecution's obligation to prove that the accused is guilty (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 64(1)(a); see also R v ALP [2002] VSCA 210; R v Henderson [1999] VSCA 125; R v Palmer (1992) 64 A Crim R; R v Reeves (1992) 29 NSWLR 109);
    - Indicate that it is not enough for the prosecution to persuade the jury that the accused is probably guilty or very likely to be guilty (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 64(1)(b); see also R v Wanhalla [2007] 2 NZLR 573 at 588 [49]);
    - Indicate that it is almost impossible to prove anything with absolute certainty when reconstructing past events and that the prosecution does not have to do so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 64(1)(c); see also R v Wanhalla [2007] 2 NZLR 573 at 588 [49]);
    - Indicate that the jury cannot be satisfied that the accused is guilty if the jury has a reasonable doubt about whether the accused is guilty (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 64(1)(d));
    - Indicate that a reasonable doubt is not an imaginary or fanciful doubt or an unrealistic possibility (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 64(1)(e); see also R v Lifchus [1997] 3 SCR 320 at 335, 337).

50. Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 63 and 64 reverse the common law principle which restricted a judge's ability to explain the meaning of beyond reasonable doubt.

51. The nature of the directions to be given about the onus and standard of proof will depend upon the particular circumstances of the case, the evidence relied upon by the prosecution and defence, and the way in which that evidence is discussed and commented upon by the trial judge (Miles v R [2000] WASCA 364 (Murray J); Salmon v R [2001] WASCA 270).

52. Judges should instruct the jury that they must not search legal dictionaries or texts in an attempt to elaborate the meaning of this phrase (Martin v R (2010) 28 VR 579; Juries Act 2000 (Vic) s 78A).[20]

Onus on the Accused

53. If the burden of proof lies with the accused, the jury must be told that the standard of proof is proof on the balance of probabilities (Evidence Act 2008 s 141(2); Sodeman v R (1936) 55 CLR 192; Taylor v Ellis [1956] VLR 457; R v Hunt [1987] AC 352).

54. In any case where the onus is placed on the accused, the judge should direct the jury that:

    - It is for them to decide if the accused has proved the matter;

[20] Although judges may not need to give this direction, in Martin v R (2010) 28 VR 579; [2010] VSCA 153 it was held that until the precise scope of Juries Act 2000 s 78 has been determined, it would be "wise" to do so. See 1.5 Decide Solely on the Evidence for further information concerning Juries Act 2000 (Vic) s 78A.

- The proof required is less than that required of the prosecution to prove the accused's guilt (i.e. proof beyond a reasonable doubt); and
- The onus may be discharged by evidence which satisfies them, on the balance of probabilities, of that which the accused must prove (R v Carr-Briant [1943] KB 607; Murray v Murray (1960) 33 ALJR 521; Mizzi v R (1960) 105 CLR 659; R v Bradley (No 2) (1986) 85 FLR 111).

55. The charge must enable the jury to clearly appreciate the difference between proof beyond reasonable doubt and proof on the balance of probabilities (Mizzi v R (1960) 105 CLR 659).

Prohibited Directions

56. The phrase "beyond reasonable doubt" should not be equated with terms such as "sure" or "certain". While this is permissible in England (see, e.g. R v Hepworth and Fearnley [1955] 2 QB 600; R v Onufrejczyk [1955] 1 QB 388), and was done in early Australian cases (see, e.g. Brown v R (1913) 17 CLR 570; Hicks v R (1920) 28 CLR 36), it is prohibited by current Australian law (R v Cavkic (No 2) (2009) 28 VR 341).

57. It is a juror's task to decide whether, at the end of the day, he or she entertains a doubt which he or she considers reasonable. It is the judge's task to direct the jury to that effect without, at the same time, inviting jurors to analyse their mental processes too carefully (R v Chatzidimitriou (2000) 1 VR 493).

58. Jurors must therefore not be told to subject their doubts to a process of analysis, to determine whether they are reasonable (Green v R (1971) 126 CLR 28; R v Wilson (1986) 42 SASR 203; R v Pahuja (1987) 49 SASR 191; R v Lancefield [1999] VSCA 176; R v Chatzidimitriou (2000) 1 VR 493).

59. The common law prohibition on inviting the jury to subject their doubts to a process of analysis does not mean that jurors do not need to determine if their doubts are reasonable. They must still be satisfied that the accused's guilt has been proved beyond reasonable doubt, which may involve discounting unreasonable doubts, even if done unconsciously. The prohibition is against requiring jurors to undertake such an analysis (R v Pahuja (1987) 49 SASR 191 (Cox J (dissenting)), cited with approval in R v Neilan [1992] 1 VR 57; R v Chatzidimitriou (2000) 1 VR 493).

Deciding Between Guilt and Innocence

60. The jury's function is not to determine the guilt or innocence of the accused, but to determine whether the accused is guilty beyond reasonable doubt. An accused should be acquitted even if the jury are satisfied that he or she is probably guilty (i.e. probably not innocent), but are not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that he or she is guilty (Bartho v R (1978) 19 ALR 418).

61. As guilty/not guilty is not synonymous with guilty/innocent, it is wrong to tell the jury that their duty is to decide between guilt and innocence. This may suggest that they should convict unless the evidence establishes that the accused was innocent (Bartho v R (1978) 19 ALR 418; R v Weetra (1996) 187 LSJS 317; DPP v Shannon [1975] AC 717).

A Contest of Adversaries

62. It is wrong to suggest that it is for the jury to choose between the prosecution's version of events and the accused's version. The issue is not which version of events the jury accepts, but whether the prosecution has negatived the accused's version as a reasonable possibility (Murray v R (2002) 211 CLR 193).

63. Judges should therefore avoid making any statements which suggests the trial is a contest of adversaries – the prosecution and its witnesses against the defence and its witnesses. Criminal trials are accusatory, and it must be made clear that throughout the trial that the prosecution must prove its accusation (R v Yildrimtekin 17/8/1994 NSW CCA).

64. When a case turns on a conflict between the evidence of several witnesses, the judge is permitted to ask the jury to consider who is to be believed. However, if that is done, the judge must give clear and unequivocal directions about the onus and standard of proof, so that there is no risk that the jury will treat the making of a 'choice' between the witnesses as the real question, or as concluding the issue whether the prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt the issues which it bears the onus of proving (R v KDY [2008] VSCA 104; R v SAB (2008) 20 VR 55; De Silva v The Queen (2019) 268 CLR 57, [9]).

65. In cases where the judge considers there is a risk that the jury will be left with an impression that the evidence favourable to the accused must be believed to give rise to a reasonable doubt, the jury may be told that:

    - if they believe the evidence that favours the accused, they must acquit;
    - if they do not accept the evidence that favours the accused, but think that it might be true, they must acquit – because they will have a reasonable doubt about the prosecution's case; and
    - if they do not believe the evidence that favours the accused, they should put that evidence to one side, and determine, upon the basis of the evidence they do accept, whether the prosecution has proved the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt (R v RP Anderson [2001] NSWCCA 488; De Silva v The Queen (2019) 268 CLR 57, [12]; Liberato v R (1985) 159 CLR 507 (Brennan and Deane JJ)).

66. The judge should not tell the jury that this direction (known as a "Liberato direction") is a 'comment' which they are free to disregard. The Liberato direction is a direction of law which the jury is bound to follow (R v BDX (2009) 24 VR 288; R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526).

67. While the Liberato direction is an elaboration on the onus and standard of proof, the High Court has indicated that the Jury Directions Act 2015 may limit the circumstances in which a Liberato direction should be given (see De Silva v The Queen (2019) 268 CLR 57, [10]). Judges will need to consider whether a Liberato direction is a "general direction" within the meaning of Jury Directions Act 2015 s 3 such that the request provisions do not apply, or whether it is a direction that is contingent on a request (compare Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 10, 14–16).

68. It is appropriate to give a Liberato direction if there is a reasonable likelihood that the jury will otherwise obtain the impression that they must believe the evidence on which the accused relies to be true before that evidence can give rise to a reasonable doubt about his or her guilt (R v Niass [2005] NSWCCA 120; R v KDY [2008] VSCA 104; R v SAB (2008) 20 VR 55; R v BDX (2009) 24 VR 288; R v Cordell [2009] VSCA 128).

69. So if, for example, the jury is told that the evidence of the accused and prosecution witnesses cannot both be right, or have been asked whether or not they accept the accused's evidence, it may be appropriate to give a Liberato direction to guard against the possibility that they may be misled about the onus (R v Nguyen [2006] VSCA 158).

70. Similarly, a Liberato direction may be appropriate when the accused gives evidence which conflicts with evidence from witnesses called by the prosecution (Salmon v R [2001] WASCA 270; R v Chen, Siregar & Isman (2002) 130 A Crim R 300).

71. For this purpose, the accused's evidence may consist of answers given in a record of interview. The need for a Liberato direction is not limited to cases where there is sworn evidence from the accused, though the risk of the jury thinking they must choose between the witnesses is likely highest when the accused does give or call evidence (De Silva v The Queen (2019) 268 CLR 57, [11]).

72. A Liberato direction should be given when the judge compares the relevant evidence, or at some other convenient proximate place in the charge (rather than at the start of the charge) (R v SAB (2008) 20 VR 55).

Sample Misdirections (Things that Should Not Be Said)

Onus of Proof

73. It is a misdirection to refer to the "task of the defence in trying to satisfy you that the accused did not intend" to commit the crime (Thomas v R (1960) 102 CLR 584).

74. It is wrong to direct the jury that they must acquit the accused if they are satisfied that the prosecution has not made out its case. Such a direction implies that the jury can convict the accused if they are in doubt about whether the prosecution has made out its case, which is contrary to the onus of proof (Van Leeuwen v R (1981) 36 ALR 591).

75. It is a misdirection to tell the jury that they must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that their verdict is the correct one. This might suggest that the jury needs to be satisfied that a verdict of not guilty is correct, when they only need to be satisfied that the prosecution has not established its case beyond reasonable doubt (Van Leeuwen v R (1981) 36 ALR 591).

76. It is dangerous to invite the jury to focus on the account of the accused, and to ask themselves how credible they find his or her account, and whether they accept everything he or she has said or have reservations about some parts of his or her evidence. Such an invitation may wrongly suggest to the jury that if they do not unreservedly accept the account given by the accused, the matter will have been proved beyond reasonable doubt. It also tends to suggest that the accused has some obligation to exculpate himself or herself from the allegations made against him or her, implicitly reversing the onus of proof (R v Schonewille [1998] 2 VR 625).

77. For similar reasons, the jury should not be told to ask themselves whether they think it is a reasonable possibility that what the accused says is correct (R v Holman [1997] 1 Qd R 373).

78. Judges should not ask a question such as "who else but the accused would have committed this crime?", as this may undermine the presumption of innocence (R v Russo (2004) 11 VR 1).

79. Judges should avoid saying that the onus of proof requires the prosecution to establish that the accused is "not innocent" (R v Maksimovic [2007] VSCA 248).

80. In giving a Liberato direction, a judge must not say that if the jury rejects the accused's evidence and puts it aside, then it does not raise a reasonable doubt and they will be satisfied of guilt (Platt v The Queen [2020] VSCA 130, [19]–[26]).

81. It is wrong to say "If on the evidence that you do accept, you are of the view that there is a reasonable explanation or hypothesis which has been put which you consider the Crown has not disproved, then you would have a reasonable doubt about that aspect". A reasonable doubt about guilt does not require the jury to positively accept any particular evidence. Further, it does not require the hypothesis consistent with innocence to have been put by the defence. Finally, reasonable doubt about an element is a reasonable doubt about the offence, and should not be confined to being a doubt on 'that aspect' (Mathieson v The Queen [2021] VSCA 102, [43]).

Standard of Proof

82. It is a misdirection to tell the jury to consider the words "beyond", "reasonable" and "doubt" separately, and to consider their own understanding of the word "reasonable" (R v Reeves (1992) 29 NSWLR 109).

83. It is undesirable to suggest to a jury that they may have doubts as to minor matters and nonetheless convict the accused. To say this is to weaken the force of the standard of proof (R v May [1962] Qd R 456).

84. Judges should not direct the jury that the prosecution has "merely" to prove a matter beyond reasonable doubt. The word "merely" is unnecessary and misplaced (R v Williams [1998] 4 VR 301).

85. Judges should not imply that there is a temporal aspect to the standard of proof – that jurors should disregard doubts that they "would entertain for only a second before discarding them as having no substance or being purely theoretical" or doubts that they were only "dallying with for a moment" (R v McNamara 1/12/1998 Qld CA).

86. It is a misdirection to tell the jury that they may determine whether the accused is guilty in the same way as they decide serious matters out of court (Thomas v R (1960) 102 CLR 584).

87. Judges should not lead the jury to think they must disregard possibilities that do not exceed the level of a "mere" possibility. If jurors have any possibilities in mind which cause them to retain doubt about the accused's guilt, they should acquit (R v Lancefield [1999] VSCA 176).

88. It is wrong to tell the jury to look at the evidence and then "apply the law to whatever you are satisfied took place". This incorrectly suggests that evidence of an event or circumstance cannot raise a reasonable doubt in the juror's minds unless they are satisfied that the event or circumstance occurred (Van Leeuwen v R (1981) 36 ALR 591).

89. Judges should not refer to community standards when describing the standard of proof (R v Kidd [2002] QCA 433; R v Irlam; Ex-parte A–G [2002] QCA 235).

90. The following definitions of "proof beyond reasonable doubt" have been held to be misdirections:

- Feeling "sure" or "really sure" (R v Punj [2002] QCA 333);
- Coming to a feeling of "comfortable satisfaction" that the accused is guilty (Thomas v R (1960) 102 CLR 584; Green v R (1971) 126 CLR 28);
- Satisfied "to a point of reasonable certainty" (R v Hildebrandt (1963) 81 WN (Pt 1) (NSW) 143);
- Satisfied "beyond any skerrick of doubt" (R v Chedzey (1987) 30 A Crim R 451).

91. The following definitions of "reasonable doubt" have been held to be misdirections:

- A "rational doubt" or a "doubt founded on reason" (Green v R (1971) 126 CLR 28; La Fontaine v R (1976) 136 CLR 625; R v Lancefield [1999] VSCA 176);
- A "substantial doubt" (R v Thompson [1992] VR 523; Burrows v R (1937) 58 CLR 249; R v Chatzidimitriou (2000) 1 VR 493);
- A "real" doubt (R v Pahuja (1987) 49 SASR 191);
- A "doubt which might affect you in the conduct of your everyday affairs" (R v Ching [1976] Crim LR 687)
- The following definitions of what is not a "reasonable doubt" have been held to be misdirections:
- A doubt "having no substance or being purely theoretical" (R v McNamara 1/12/1998 Qld CA);
- A "doubt beyond reason" (R v Wilson (1986) 42 SASR 203).

Juror Questions

92. In responding to a jury question regarding the meaning of "beyond reasonable doubt", a trial judge is not bound to choose between the options set out in Jury Directions Act 2015 s 64(1), but may combine multiple options. The answer given, however, needs to disabuse a jury of any erroneous belief regarding the meaning of the phrase "beyond reasonable doubt".

93. The statutory power for a trial judge to explain the meaning of the phrase "beyond reasonable doubt" does not limit any other power, whether at common law or otherwise, a trial judge has to explain the phrase (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 63(2)).

94. Where the jury seeks further assistance with the concept of reasonable doubt, judges must exercise their discretion as to how to explain the matter to the particular jury (R v Ching [1976] Crim LR 687).

95. The trial judge may adapt their explanation so that it responds to the question that the jury asked (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 64(2)).

96. Amplification of the onus and standard of proof may also be required if a jury question indicates that the jury has not properly understood these matters (R v Wickramarane [1998] Crim LR 565; R v Collins 23/2/1999 Qld CA; R v WG [2010] VSCA 34).

97. For example, if a jury asks a question which indicates that it is confused about the difference between a matter being "probable" or proved beyond "reasonable doubt", it is necessary to give a clear direction explaining the difference (R v Collins 23/2/1999 Qld CA).

98. Similarly, if the question suggests that the jury may believe that standard will be satisfied if they find the complainant's evidence to be "plausible", the judge should make it clear that it is not enough for the complainant's evidence to appear truthful, or even for its truth to be more likely than not. In order to convict, the jury must be satisfied of the elements of the offence charged beyond reasonable doubt (R v WG [2010] VSCA 34).

99. It is important that the trial judge does not expand or qualify the direction in such a way as to distract the jury from its task of determining the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt (R v Lancefield [1999] VSCA 176).

100. The appropriate way in which to explain the onus or standard of proof will depend on the question asked. It is vital that judges directly address the question, because if not properly resolved, the accused may be convicted on a lesser standard of proof, which would be a serious miscarriage of justice (R v Cavkic (2005) 12 VR 136).

101. For example, if the jury asks the judge to tell it what reasonable doubt is as a ratio (e.g. 70% or 80% certain), that is a question which indirectly raises the meaning of the phrase "beyond reasonable doubt". The judge will need to address the issue of percentages, to ensure that the jury properly understands that it should not approach the matter in that way. The judge may also give the explanations provided in Jury Directions Act 2015 s 64. It will be a miscarriage of justice if the judge simply restates his or her previous directions about the onus and standard of proof without directly responding to the jury's question (R v Cavkic (2005) 12 VR 136; see also Jury Directions Act 2015 s 63(1)).

102. If the jury asks what "reasonable" means, a judge may reply that a reasonable doubt is a doubt which the jury considers reasonable (R v Neilan [1992] 1 VR 57), and may also explain that a doubt which is imaginary or fanciful, or an unrealistic possibility, is not a "reasonable" doubt and remind the jury that it is almost impossible to prove anything with absolute certainty when reconstructing past events and that the prosecution does not have to do so (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 64(1)(d) and (e)).

103. If the jury asks whether "reasonable doubt" has an independent definition or is to be determined by jurors, it is desirable to tell it that it is the individual opinions of jurors about what level of "doubt" is "reasonable" that should be applied. Each individual juror must form his or her own view of the matter (R v Southammavong; R v Sihavong [2003] NSWCCA 312; compare R v Dookheea (2017) 262 CLR 402, [35]).

104. While it is not a misdirection to provide a dictionary to a jury that has requested a definition of "beyond reasonable doubt", it is undesirable to do so (R v Chatzidimitriou (2000) 1 VR 493 (Phillips JA and Cummins AJA, Callaway JA dissenting)).

Counsel's Influence

105. Historically, it was sometimes thought necessary to amplify the directions about onus and standard of proof because of counsel's arguments during the trial (Green v R (1971) 126 CLR 28; Thomas v R (1960) 102 CLR 584; R v Wilson (1986) 42 SASR 203; R v Lancefield [1999] VSCA 176).

106. For example, if counsel has laboured the emphasis on the onus of proof to such a degree as to suggest that fantastic or completely unreal possibilities ought to be regarded by the jury as affording a reason for doubt, it will be proper and necessary for a judge to restore the balance (Green v R (1971) 126 CLR 28; R v Hettiarachchi [2009] VSCA 270; R v Boyle (2009) 26 VR 219).

107. The need for this rebalancing is likely reduced, due to the obligation and power to explain the meaning of beyond reasonable doubt in Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 63 and 64, which include a statement that fanciful doubts or unrealistic possibilities are not reasonable doubts.

108. At common law, another way of restoring the balance was to remind the jury of the capacity of the human mind to conjure up fanciful, nervous or unreasonable misgivings about matters which are not in reality in doubt, and to warn them against doing so (Green v R (1971) 126 CLR 28; R v Wilson (1986) 42 SASR 203; R v Lancefield [1999] VSCA 176).

1.7.1 Charge: Onus and Standard of Proof

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

It is a critical part of our justice system that people are presumed to be innocent, unless and until they are proved guilty. So before you may return a verdict of guilty, the prosecution must satisfy you that [each of] the accused is guilty of the charge[s] in question.

As the prosecution brings the charge[s] against the accused, it is for the prosecution to prove that/those charge[s]. The accused does/do not have to prove anything. That never changes from start to finish. It is not for the accused to demonstrate his/her/their innocence, but for the prosecution to prove the charge[s] they have brought against him/her/them.

The prosecution must do this by proving [each of] the accused's guilt of the charge[s] beyond reasonable doubt. You have probably heard these words before, and they mean exactly what they say – proof beyond reasonable doubt.

This is the highest standard of proof that our law demands. It is not enough for the prosecution to prove that the accused is probably guilty, or very likely to be guilty. That would be enough in a civil case, such as where one person sues another for breach of contract. In that situation, matters only need to be proved on what is called the "balance of probabilities". That is, they need to be shown to be more likely than not.

By comparison, in a criminal trial the prosecution must prove the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt. This means you cannot be satisfied the accused is guilty if you have a reasonable doubt about whether the accused is guilty.

In deciding whether the prosecution has proved its case beyond reasonable doubt, you should remember that it is almost impossible to prove anything with absolute certainty when reconstructing past events and the prosecution does not have to do so. A reasonable doubt is not an imaginary or fanciful doubt, or an unrealistic possibility.

The prosecution does not need to prove every fact that they allege to this standard. It is the essential ingredients or "elements" of the charge[s] that they must prove to this standard. In this case, that means that the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that [list elements of the primary offence. Repeat for any other offences].

I will explain these elements to you in detail, and relate them to the evidence in this case, after you have heard all of the evidence.

However, for now you should know that it is only if you find that the prosecution has proven all of the elements of a charge beyond reasonable doubt that you may find the accused guilty of that charge. If you are not satisfied that the prosecution has done this, your verdict in relation to that charge must be "Not Guilty".

Your verdict of guilty or not guilty must be unanimous. That is, whatever decision you make, you must all agree on it.

1.8 Separate Consideration

Multiple Accused

1. If two or more accused stand trial together, the judge must direct the jury that they are to consider the case against each accused separately (R v Harbach (1973) 6 SASR 427; R v Nessel (1980) 5 A Crim R 374; R v Minuzzo and Williams [1984] VR 417; R v Mitchell 5/4/95 NSW CCA; Nicoletti v R 4/11/97 WA CCA).
2. If evidence is given which is not admissible against each accused,[21] the judge must also instruct the jury:
    - That evidence led in support of a count involving one accused does not provide proof of a count involving another accused; and
    - That they must decide the case against each accused solely on the evidence that is admissible in relation to that accused (R v Minuzzo and Williams [1984] VR 417; R v Taouk 17/12/92 NSW CCA; R v Mitchell 5/4/95 NSW CCA; T v R (1996) 86 A Crim R 293).
3. The judge should usually tell the jury that a certain item of evidence is inadmissible against a particular accused at the time that evidence is tendered. However, whether or not such a direction is given at that stage, it must always be given in the judge's summing up (R v Nessel (1980) 5 A Crim R 374; R v Towle (1955) 72 WN (NSW) 338).
4. In the judge's summing up, he or she must specify which evidence the jury may consider in relation to each accused, and which evidence is inadmissible against each accused. It is insufficient simply to rely on a direction that the jury are to consider the case against each accused separately (R v Towle (1955) 72 WN (NSW) 338; R v Minuzzo and Williams [1984] VR 417; R v Mitchell 5/4/95 NSW CCA; Nicoletti v R 4/11/97 WA CCA. See 3.9 Judge's Summing Up on Evidence and Issues for further information).

Multiple Counts

5. If the presentment contains multiple counts, the judge must direct the jury that they have to consider each of the counts separately (R v PMT (2003) 8 VR 50; MFA v R (2002) 213 CLR 606; KRM v R (2001) 206 CLR 221; R v TJB [1998] 4 VR 621; R v Robertson [1998] 4 VR 30; R v J (No 2) [1998] 3 VR 602).
6. Such a direction should be given even if all of the evidence is admissible in relation to each count,[22] because a jury still needs to reach separate verdicts on the counts even if, in reaching those verdicts, it considers the totality of the evidence (R v Mitchell 5/4/95 NSW CCA).
7. If evidence is given which is not admissible in relation to each count,[23] the judge must also instruct the jury:

[21] If the evidence against one accused is not admissible against a second accused, and this creates a risk that the second accused will be impermissibly prejudiced, the judge may need to consider ordering separate trials (see, e.g. R v Hauser (1982) 6 A Crim R 68; Webb v R (1994) 181 CLR 41).

[22] If evidence which is admissible in relation to one count is admissible in relation to another count as "similar fact evidence", an appropriate direction as to the permissible and impermissible uses of such evidence will be needed (see 4.17 Tendency Evidence and 4.18 Coincidence Evidence).

[23] If evidence which is admissible in relation to one count is not admissible in relation to another count, and in consequence there is a real risk of impermissible prejudice to the accused, the judge may need to consider ordering separate trials (see, e.g. R v TJB [1998] 4 VR 621. See also Crimes Act 1958 s 372).

- That evidence led in support of one count does not provide proof of any other count; and
- That they must decide each count solely on the evidence that is admissible in relation to that count (R v PMT (2003) 8 VR 50; MFA v R (2002) 213 CLR 606; KRM v R (2001) 206 CLR 221; R v TJB [1998] 4 VR 621; R v Robertson [1998] 4 VR 30; R v J (No 2) [1998] 3 VR 602).

8. It is also customary to instruct the jury that:
    - Combining more than one count in the presentment is a procedure of convenience, but that such convenience should not be permitted to usurp a just outcome, which entitles the parties to have each count considered by reference only to the evidence which applies to that count; and
    - If they decide to convict or acquit the accused on one count, it is wrong to reason that he or she is therefore guilty or not guilty (as the case may be) of the other counts. Proof of guilt upon one count is irrelevant to the question of guilt upon any other counts, and jurors should put any decisions they have made in relation to one count out of their minds when considering other counts (R v Robertson [1998] 4 VR 30. See also R v FJB [1999] 2 VR 425; T v R (1996) 86 A Crim R 293; BRS v R (1997) 191 CLR 275; R v TJB [1998] 4 VR 621; R v J (No 2) [1998] 3 VR 602; R v Appleby (1996) 88 A Crim R 456).
9. These directions will often be accompanied by a specific instruction that the evidence of a witness may be accepted in whole or in part (MFA v R (2002) 213 CLR 606).
10. The jury should not be told that each count "must be given the same ultimate determination because you will ultimately be asked… your verdict in regard to each count". Such a direction is likely to be confusing to a jury (R v Robertson [1998] 4 VR 30; R v Ev Costa 2/4/96 Vic CA).
11. In the judge's summing up, he or she must carefully explain which evidence relates to which count, and which evidence is inadmissible on each count. It is insufficient simply to rely on a direction that the jury are to consider each count separately (T v R (1996) 86 A Crim R 293; R v Mooseek (1991) 56 A Crim R 36. See 3.9 Judge's Summing Up on Issues and Evidence for further information).
12. Judges must not direct the jury that if they doubt the truthfulness or reliability of the complainant's[24] evidence in relation to one charge, then that doubt must be taken into account in their assessment of the truthfulness or reliability of the complainant's evidence generally or in relation to other charges. This does not limit the ability of a party to make such an argument, or the obligation of the judge to refer to how the parties put their case (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 44F–44G, as amended in 2017; see also R v PMT (2003) 8 VR 50; contra R v Markuleski (2001) 52 NSWLR 82).
13. Section 44F also does not require or permit a judge to direct a jury that if it has a doubt about one aspect of a witness' evidence, then the jury should put that aspect to one side. A conclusion that a witness has lied on one matter may provide a basis for doubting the witness' truthfulness on other matters (Mathieson v The Queen [2021] VSCA 102, [51]–[55]).

Related Matters

Tendency Warning

14. At common law, it was considered prudent to warn the jury against "tendency reasoning" in cases involving multiple counts, as well as the "separate consideration" direction (see R v J (No.2) [1998] 3 VR 602; R v TJB [1998] 4 VR 621).

[24] Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44F uses 'victim' instead of 'complainant'. We have retained 'complainant' to maintain consistency across the Charge Book.

15. Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, evidence relevant only to other counts, or admissible on a limited, contextual, basis, will usually fall within paragraph (c) of the definition of "other misconduct evidence" (see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 26).

16. Where evidence of other counts is "other misconduct evidence", the judge does not need to give a warning against tendency reasoning, unless the direction is requested (see Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 15, 29, 30). See 4.17 Tendency Evidence.

1.8.1 Charge: Separate Consideration Multiple Accused

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

In this trial there are [insert number] accused. The prosecution says each of them is guilty. Each of them says they are not guilty. So there are really [insert number] trials [all] being heard together.

It would be inconvenient and a great waste of time and money to hold separate trials of each accused on different occasions in different courts on this same matter. So for convenience they are all tried together.

But you must be careful not to allow convenience to override justice. The parties are entitled to have the case against each accused considered separately.

You must consider the case against each accused separately, in light only of the evidence which applies to that accused. You must ask yourselves, in relation to each accused, whether the evidence relating to that accused has satisfied you, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he is guilty of the offence s/he has been charged with. If the answer is yes, then you should find him/her guilty. If the answer is no, then you should find him/her not guilty.

1.8.2 Charge: Separate Consideration Multiple Charges

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

In this trial, the prosecution has brought [insert number] charges against the accused. While these are separate matters, they are [all] being dealt with in the one trial. This is done for convenience, as it would be expensive and time-consuming to hold a separate trial before a different judge and jury for each charge.

However, you must be careful not to allow convenience to override justice. Both the prosecution and the accused are entitled to have each charge considered separately.

It would therefore be wrong to say that simply because you find the accused guilty or not guilty of one charge, that s/he must be guilty or not guilty, as the case may be, of another.

Each charge must be considered separately, in light only of the evidence which applies to it. You must ask yourselves, in relation to each charge, whether the evidence relating to that charge has satisfied you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused is guilty of that particular crime. If the answer is yes, then you should find the accused guilty of that charge. If the answer is no, then you should find the accused not guilty of it.

1.9 Alternative Charges

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. The prosecution is entitled to include charges in an indictment that are presented in the alternative. Where this occurs, the jury cannot return a verdict on an alternative charge until it returns a verdict on the principal charge (LLW v R (2012) 35 VR 372; [2012] VSCA 54; Medici v R (2013) 39 VR 350; [2013] VSCA 111).
2. The judge must ensure that the jury understands this rule. If the jury cannot agree on the principal charge, any agreement on an alternative charge would involve impermissible compromise (LLW v R (2012) 35 VR 372; [2012] VSCA 54; Medici v R (2013) 39 VR 350; [2013] VSCA 111).
3. Where there are alternative charges on the indictment, the judge, at the start of the trial, should inform the jury that:
    - The indictment contains charges in the alternative;
    - The alternative charges all relate to the same factual allegations, but will require the jury to consider different legal tests;
    - At the end of the trial, the judge will need to take verdicts on each charge sequentially.
4. For information on the obligation to leave alternative charges, see 3.10 Alternative Verdicts.
5. For information on taking verdicts to alternative charges, see 3.12 Taking Verdicts.

1.9.1 Charge: Alternative Charges

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge should be given as part of the preliminary directions where the indictment contains alternatives. This model charge assumes that there is only one incident which involves alternatives. Where there are multiple incidents involving alternatives, this charge will need to be modified.

Members of the jury, my tipstaff is now going to hand you a document called an "indictment". This document lists the crimes that NOA is charged with. I will tell you more about what each crime involves at the end of the trial. However, there is one matter I want to draw to your attention now.

Charges [identify relevant alternatives] are given to you as alternatives. The prosecution does not say that the accused should be convicted of [both/all] of these charges, but of one or the other. This is because they [both/all] relate to the same incident.

At the end of the trial, when you are delivering your verdict[s], you will first be asked for your verdict on [insert principal offence], which is the more serious charge. If you reach a verdict of guilty in relation to that charge, you will not be asked for a verdict on [insert alternative charge].

It is only if you unanimously reach a verdict of not guilty on [insert principal offence] that you will be asked to deliver a verdict on [insert alternative charge]. This is because the prosecution is entitled to your verdict on the most serious charge. It would be wrong to compromise and say "we cannot agree on a verdict on charge one, but we agree that the accused is at least guilty of charge two".

So when you are listening to the evidence, bear in mind that while there are [insert number of charges] charges on the indictment, there are actually only [insert number] of allegations that relate to different events because the other [insert number] charges are alternatives.

1.10 Trial Procedure

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Order of Proceedings

1. To help set the jury at ease, and provide a framework for understanding the nature of the trial, it may be desirable to outline the way in which the trial is likely to proceed.
2. Unless the court otherwise directs, the prosecution must serve on the defence and file in court a summary of the prosecution opening at least 28 days before the trial is due to commence (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 182).
3. Once the prosecution has served its summary of the prosecution opening on the defence, the defence response must serve its response on the prosecution and file the response in court at least 14 days before the trial is listed to commence (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 183).
4. After the jury has been empanelled and the judge has given any preliminary directions, the prosecution will open their case (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 224).
5. Immediately after the prosecution opening, if the accused is represented by a legal practitioner, the defence must present their response to the jury (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 225). However, if the accused is not represented by a legal practitioner, the accused may choose not to present a response.
6. The prosecution opening and the defence response must be restricted to the matters set out in the documents served and filed under Criminal Procedure Act 2009 ss 182 and 183 (see also Duong v R [2017] VSCA 78, [39]–[41]).
7. If there is more than one accused, in the absence of agreement amongst counsel, they must make their addresses in the order in which their names appear on the presentment (R v Webb (1992) 64 A Crim R 38).
8. At any time during the trial, the judge may address the jury about the issues in the trial, the relevance of any admissions made, directions given or matters determined prior to the commencement of the trial or any other matters relevant to the jury's function (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 222).
9. It may be appropriate for the judge to refer to any other preliminary or practical matters which have not yet been addressed by counsel, such as the nature of the trial process and the hours of sitting. See 1.1 Introductory Remarks for further information about matters which may be addressed at this time.
10. The prosecution will then call their witnesses. At the close of the prosecution case, the defence must choose whether to make a submission that there is no case to answer, to choose to give evidence or call other witnesses, or not give evidence or call witnesses (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 226). It is at the judge's discretion whether this should be done in the presence or absence of the jury. However, it may be advisable to do so in the absence of the jury in joint trials or in trials in which a no-case submission may be anticipated (R v Aiton (1993) 68 A Crim R 578).
11. If there are 2 or more accused, all accused who wish to do so must make a submission that there is no case to answer before any accused indicates whether he or she wishes to give evidence or call witnesses. All submissions of no case to answer must first be resolved and if there are then 2 or more accused remaining, the judge must ask the first accused whether he or she wishes to give evidence or call witnesses. Each accused named subsequently on the indictment is not required to inform the judge of this decision until the close of the case for the previous accused (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 229).
12. If the accused intends to call witnesses, the accused must indicate, when called on by the judge to do so, the names of those witnesses other than the accused and the order in which the witnesses will be called (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 230).
13. The defence may give an opening address before calling the accused or a witness other than the accused (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 231).

14. After the close of all evidence, the prosecution may make a closing address, summing up the evidence (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 234).[25]

15. After the close of the evidence and after the prosecution closing address, the defence may give a closing address summing up the evidence (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 235).

16. If the accused, in his or her closing address, asserts facts which are not supported by evidence, the judge may allow the prosecution to make a supplementary address which is confined to replying to those assertions (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 236).

17. The power to allow the prosecution to make a supplementary submission under s 236 is limited to cases in which the defence asserts facts which are unsupported by evidence. It does not extend to cases in which the defence makes illogical, extravagant or dishonest defence arguments. It is for the judge to deal with such arguments in his or her charge in a way that restores the balance without engaging in impermissible advocacy for the prosecution (R v Glusheski (1986) 33 A Crim R 193; R v O'Donoghue (1988) 34 A Crim R 397; Kamalasanan & Sam v The Queen [2019] VSCA 180, [97]–[101]; Mareangareu v The Queen [2019] VSCA 101, [67]–[99]).

Juror Questions

Clarifying Law and Evidence

18. Jurors may question a judge about the evidence presented in a case, or about the relevant law. Judges are under a duty to ensure that jurors receive all of the assistance they require to discharge their task properly (R v Southammavong; R v Sihavong [2003] NSWCCA 312; R v Leggatt [1971] VR 705).

19. If a communication from the jury indicates that they require assistance on a material aspect of the case, the judge has a duty to ascertain the specifics of the assistance required (R v Ion (1950) 34 Cr App R 152; R v Berry (1992) 96 Cr App R 77).

20. If the jury asks a second question before the first is answered, the judge should not assume the jury no longer wants an answer to the first question. S/he must ask them whether they still want a response to the original question (R v De Simone [2008] VSCA 216).

21. If the jury's question indicates that they may be speculating or drawing inferences going beyond the evidence, they should be reminded of the extent of the evidence (R v Adair (1958) 42 Cr App R 227).

22. When answering the jury's question, the judge must be careful not to introduce a basis for liability which has not previously been addressed. This may disadvantage the accused, who will have had no opportunity to meet the new case (R v Falcone [2008] VSCA 225. See 3.9 Judge's Summing Up on Issues and Evidence for further information).

23. After answering the jury's question, the judge should enquire whether the answer covers their concerns. The judge is entitled to accept the foreperson's affirmative response, if given without dissent (R v Leggatt [1971] VR 705; R v Coombes 16/4/1999 CA Vic).

Questioning Witnesses

24. There is no rule of law prohibiting jurors from questioning witnesses (R v Lo Presti [1992] 1 VR 696; R v Cvijic 21/2/1986 Vic CCA; R v Boland [1974] VR 849).

[25] This provision overrides the practice of the prosecution not addressing the jury a second time when the accused was unrepresented (see, e.g. R v Ginies [1972] VR 494). The prosecution may now determine whether or not to give a closing address if the accused is unrepresented (R v Marijancevic [1982] VR 936; R v Trotter (1982) 7 A Crim R 8; R v Zorad (1990) 19 NSWLR 91).

25. In R v Lo Presti [1992] 1 VR 696, the Court of Appeal laid down the following guidelines in relation to such questions:

> 1. Juries should not be told of any right possessed by them to question a witness.
> 2. A juror who wishes to put, or have put, a question to a witness has a right for that to be done provided that the question or questions is or are limited to the clarification of evidence given or the explanation of some matter about which confusion exists.
> 3. It is not essential that the question asked be formulated by the foreman.
> 4. It is highly desirable that the question sought to be asked first be submitted to the judge so that he may consider its relevance and admissibility.
> 5. If the judge allows the question it is immaterial whether it is actually asked by the juror or the judge. However, if the judge puts the question there will be removed the risk that exists when a layman is the questioner of the generation of a spontaneous exchange of questions and answers in the course of which improper material may emerge.

26. The points above are guidelines only. Judges have discretion to determine what course is best in the circumstances to ensure justice between the parties and the avoidance of unacceptable prejudice to the accused. They have the right and obligation to control the proceedings in their court in a manner that will enable the ends of justice to be met (R v Lo Presti [1992] 1 VR 696. See also McKinnin v The Queen [2019] VSCA 114).

27. Judges should not encourage jurors to ask questions or give the jury time to formulate questions at the end of a witness' evidence. Doing so risks a fundamental departure from the jury's proper role as impartial arbiters and invites the jury to form views about the state of the evidence before the end of the trial (Tootle v R (2017) 94 NSWLR 430. See also McKinnin v The Queen [2019] VSCA 114).

28. Jurors are often told that the parties can be trusted to ask all relevant questions and, if a question is not asked, there is often a very good reason (Tootle v R (2017) 94 NSWLR 430, [60]).

Communicating with Jurors

29. Jurors should not ask court officers questions concerning the case, or channel questions to the judge through a court officer.[26] Questions should be asked by the foreperson in open court, or preferable put in writing by the foreperson and delivered directly to the judge. (R v Cavkic (No 2) (2009) 28 VR 341. See also R v Stretton [1982] VR 251; R v Emmett (1988) 14 NSWLR 327; Jackson & Le Gros v R [1995] 1 Qd R 547; R v Briffa & Portillo 21/4/96 Vic CCA; R v GAE (2000) 1 VR 198; R v Edwards [2002] 1 Qd R 203).

30. Juror questions should be asked (or read aloud) in open court, in the presence of the accused, their counsel and the jury – unless the communication is on a matter which does not touch upon the case in any relevant way. There should be no private communication between the judge and jury if the communication is material or may affect the jury's consideration of the case (R v Cavkic (No 2) (2009) 28 VR 341; Sonnet v R (2010) 30 VR 519; R v Yuill (1994) 34 NSWLR 179; Smith v R (1985) 159 CLR 532; R v Boland [1974] VR 849; R v Kerr (No 2) [1951] VLR 239).

31. A judge should not, upon receiving a note from the jury, send them an answer without communicating with the accused or defence counsel. That would infringe the fundamental principle that the accused is entitled to hear and see all that takes place during a trial (R v Black (2007) 15 VR 551; R v GAE (2000) 1 VR 198; Rabey v R [1980] WAR 84; R v Fitzgerald (1889) 15 VLR 40).

[26] Jurors may communicate with court officials about administrative or technical matters (such as setting up equipment) (Dempster (1980) 71 Cr App R 302; R v Barnowski [1969] SASR 386).

32. In most cases, a judge must inform the parties of the precise terms of the questions asked. It is not sufficient to identify the subject matter of the question in general terms (R v Black (2007) 15 VR 551; [2007] VSCA 61).

33. A judge must inform the parties of the terms of a question, even if that question indicates matters that are in the jurors' minds during their deliberations. This is especially important if the communication relates to matters in issue in the trial. In such circumstances, the parties are entitled to know the content of the communication and, if appropriate, to make submissions as to the appropriate response (R v Black (2007) 15 VR 551; Sonnet v R (2010) 30 VR 519).

34. However, if a communication reveals information which the jury should not have imparted (such as voting figures), the judge should not disclose that information to the parties. He or she should, however, announce the fact of the communication, and disclose any information that is unexceptionable (R v Black (2007) 15 VR 551; Sonnet v R (2010) 30 VR 519; R v Gorman [1987] 2 All ER 435).

35. If the judge needs a jury communication clarified, he or she should not question the foreperson about it on oath in isolation from the rest of the jury. It is instead preferable to suggest that the jury reformulate the communication in private (R v Foster (1995) 78 A Crim R 517).

36. If any answer to a communication from the jury would amount to a material irregularity, the judge should not answer the question nor disclose the contents of the communication until an appropriate stage of the proceedings (R v Oduro (1982) 76 Cr App R 38).

37. The trial judge should ensure that an adequate record appears in the transcript of proceedings of all communications which it is permissible to disclose, and that any written communications, of whatever nature, are preserved (R v Masters (1992) 26 NSWLR 450; Shepherd (No 4) (1989) 41 A Crim R 420).

Note-taking

38. Jurors are allowed to take notes during the trial if they choose, and should be provided with appropriate materials. Practices vary as to whether such note-taking is to be encouraged or discouraged.

39. Any notes made by a discharged juror should not be left with the remaining jurors (Derbas v R (1993) 66 A Crim R 327).

40. Notes and other documents left in the jury room after deliberations have ended must be collected and destroyed after the verdict has been delivered (R v Smart [1983] VR 265).

1.10.1 Charge: Trial Procedure

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Order of Proceedings

I will now describe the procedure that we will follow during the trial, and some general administrative matters.

In a moment we will hear the opening address from the prosecutor, and the reply from counsel for the accused.[27] Then we will proceed to hear the evidence. After that, there will be closing addresses from counsel. I will then instruct you about the law, the issues and the evidence. You will then go to the jury room to discuss your verdict[s].

Transcripts and Note-taking

All of the evidence in this case is going to be tape recorded and transcribed. This means that you will be able to check on any part of the evidence you later cannot remember.

However, you should always listen carefully to the evidence as it is given, because it is not only what the witnesses say, but also how they say it that is important to your assessment of their evidence.

When you are listening to the evidence from the witnesses, you may take notes if you wish, but you do not have to. It is completely up to you. If you do take notes, you should not allow it to distract you from listening to the evidence and assessing the witnesses. You may always ask to hear a tape of a witness's testimony or have some evidence read back to you, but you only have one chance to observe the appearance and behaviour of the witnesses when they give the evidence.

Sitting times and breaks

Our hours here in court are [insert starting time] until [insert lunch time] and then [insert starting time after lunch] until [insert finishing time].

If something comes up which means that you may not able to attend court when we would normally be sitting, please let me know as soon as possible, so that we can try to resolve the issue.

Jury Guide

To help you remember the directions I have just given you, my tipstaff will now give you a jury guide. You can write on it if you wish. The Guide, like all documents we will give you during the trial, must not be taken home. You may bring it to the courtroom, but you must leave it in the jury room at the end of each day. If you bring the Guide to the courtroom, do not allow it to distract you. Do not try to read it while I am giving you directions, or when counsel are addressing you, or while a witness is giving evidence.

The Guide is a simplified reminder of some of the directions I have given you. It is a publication designed for general use by jurors in criminal trials and is not specific to this case. It does not cover all of the directions I have given word for word and it will not cover directions I will give you during the trial and at the end of the trial which will be specific to this trial. If you think there is anything in the Guide which is different to what I have instructed you, then you must follow what I tell you in court and ignore what is in the guide. If you are confused or unsure about whether there is a difference between the Guide and my directions, you should ask me to clarify.

Opening Address

We will now hear the opening address from the prosecution, who will tell you what the case is about.

[After opening and reply, briefly state the issues.]

[27] This will need to be modified if the judge's remarks are made after the opening address and reply.

1.11 Consolidated Preliminary Directions

Click here for a downloadable version of this charge.

Note: This document replicates the directions in 1.4–1.10 in a single, consolidated document.

Introduction

Serving on a jury may be a completely new experience for some, if not all, of you. To help you perform that role properly, I will now describe your duties as jurors and the procedures that we will follow during the trial. I will also explain to you some of the principles of law that apply in this case.

During and at the end of the trial, I will give you further instructions about the law that applies to this case. You must listen closely to all of these instructions and follow them carefully.

If at any time you have a question about anything I say, please feel free to ask me. You should do this by writing it down, and passing it to my tipstaff, [insert name], who will hand it to me.

Roles of Judge, Jury and Counsel

Members of the jury, you represent one of the most important institutions in our community – the institution of trial by jury. Our legal system guarantees any individual charged with a criminal offence the right to have the case presented against him or her determined by twelve independent and open-minded members of the community, in accordance with the law.

In this case, it is alleged by the prosecution that NOA has committed the offence[s] of [insert offences].[28] S/he has pleaded "not guilty", and so it is for you, and you alone, to decide whether s/he is guilty or not guilty of [this/these] crime[s].

I note that, when referring to the crime[s] that the accused has been charged with, I will sometimes use the words "offence" or "charge" – they all mean the same thing.

In all criminal trials of this type, the court consists of a judge and jury. We are going to be assisted in this case by counsel for the prosecution, [insert prosecutor's name], and defence counsel, [insert defence counsel's name]. Each of us has a different role to play.[29]

Role of the Jury

It is your role, as the jury, to decide what the facts are in this case. You are the only ones in this court who can make a decision about the facts. You make that decision from all of the evidence given during the trial.

It is also your task to apply the law to the facts that you have found, and by doing that decide whether the accused is guilty or not guilty of the offence[s] charged.

[28] This charge is drafted for use in cases involving one accused. If the case involves multiple accused, it will need to be modified accordingly.

[29] This sentence will need to be modified if the accused is unrepresented.

Role of the Judge

It is my role, as the judge, to ensure that this trial is fair and conducted in accordance with the law. I will also explain to you the principles of law that you must apply to make your decision. You must accept and follow all of those directions.

I want to emphasise that it is not my responsibility to decide this case. The verdict that you return has absolutely nothing to do with me. So while you must follow any directions I give you about the law, you are not bound by any comments I may make about the facts.

It is unlikely that I will make any comments about the evidence. If you disagree with any comments I make, you must disregard them. Do not give them any extra weight because I, as the judge, have made them. It is your view of the facts which matters, not mine. You are the judges of facts – you alone.

Role of Counsel

The role of counsel is to present the case for the side for which they appear. [Insert name of prosecutor] presents the charge[s] for the prosecution. [Insert name of defence counsel] appears for the accused, and will represent him/her throughout the trial.[30]

You do not need to accept any comments that counsel may make during their addresses. Of course, if you agree with an argument they present, you can adopt it – in effect, it becomes your own argument. But if you do not agree with their view, you must put it aside. As I have told you, you alone are the judges of the facts.

Similarly, you are not bound by what counsel says about the law. I am the judge of the law, and it is what I tell you about the law that matters. If counsel says something different from what I say about the law, you must ignore it and follow my directions.

What is Evidence?

I have told you that it is your task to determine the facts in this case, and that you should do this by considering all of the evidence presented in the courtroom. I now need to tell you what is and what is not evidence.

The first type of evidence is what the witnesses say.

It is the answers that you hear from the witnesses that are the evidence, and not the questions they are asked. This is important to understand, as sometimes counsel will confidently include an allegation of fact in a question they ask a witness. No matter how positively or confidently that allegation is presented, it will not form part of the evidence unless the witness agrees with it.

[Add the following shaded section if the judge believes it is necessary to further explain this point.]

Let me give you a simple example that has nothing to do with this case. Imagine counsel says to a witness "The car was blue, wasn't it?", and the witness replies "No, it wasn't". Given that answer, there is absolutely no evidence that the car was blue.

Even if you do not believe the witness, or think he or she is lying, there is no evidence that the car is blue. Disbelief of a witness's answer does not provide evidence of the opposite. To prove that the car was blue, there would need to be evidence from some other source, such as a photograph or the testimony of another witness.

[30] This section will need to be modified if the accused is unrepresented.

Of course, if the witness had instead replied "yes, it was", there would be evidence that the car was blue. In such a case, the witness has adopted the suggestion made in the question. However, if the witness does not agree with that suggestion, the only evidence you have is that the car was not blue.

The second type of evidence is any document or other item that is received as an "exhibit". The exhibits will be pointed out to you when they are introduced into evidence. When you go to the jury room to decide this case, some of the exhibits will go with you for you to examine. Consider them along with the rest of the evidence and in exactly the same way.

The third type of evidence is what is called an "admission". Admissions are facts that the prosecution and defence agree about. When that happens, no other evidence is required – the admissions are treated as established facts. I will tell you about any admissions that have been made in this case when relevant.

Nothing else is evidence in this case. This includes comments about the facts made by counsel.[31] The only evidence is the witnesses' testimony, [the admissions] and the exhibits.

No Sympathy or Prejudice

It is your duty to decide this case only on the basis of that evidence. You must ignore all other considerations.

In particular, you should dismiss any feelings of sympathy or prejudice you may have, whether it is sympathy for, or prejudice against, the accused or anyone else. No such emotion has any part to play in your decision.

You are the judges of the facts. That means that in relation to all of the issues in this case, you must act like judges. You must dispassionately weigh the evidence logically and with an open mind, not according to your passion or feelings. Your duty is to consider the evidence using your intellect not your heart.

No Outside Information

When you retire to consider your verdict, you will have heard or received in court, or otherwise under my supervision, all the information that you need to make your decision.

Unless I tell you otherwise, you must not base your decision on any information you obtain outside this courtroom. For example, you must completely ignore anything that you have seen or heard in the media about this case or the people involved in it, or which you may see or hear. You must consider only the evidence presented to you here in court [if a view may be conducted add: "or otherwise under my supervision"].[32]

[31] If the accused is unrepresented, the jury should be told that what s/he says in his/her addresses, or when questioning witnesses, is also not evidence.

[32] If there has been significant pre-trial publicity about the case or the parties involved, it may be necessary to give a more detailed warning. See Decide Solely on the Evidence for further information.

Most importantly, you must not make any investigations or enquiries, or conduct independent research, concerning any aspect of the case or any person connected with it. That includes research about the law that applies to the case. You must not use the internet to access legal databases, legal dictionaries, legal texts, earlier decisions of this or other courts, or other material of any kind relating to the matters in the trial. You must not search for information about the case on Google or conduct similar searches. You also must not discuss the case on Facebook, Twitter or blogs, or look at such sites for more information about the case.

You may ask yourself the question: what is wrong with looking for more information? Seeking out information, or discussing a matter with friends, may be a natural part of life for you when making an important decision. As conscientious jurors, you may think that conducting your own research will help you reach the right result. However, there are three important reasons why using outside information, or researching the case on the internet, would be wrong.

First, media reports, or claims made outside court may be wrong or inaccurate. The prosecution and defence will not have a chance to test the information. Similarly, I will not know if you need any directions on how to use such material.

Second, deciding a case on outside information, which is not known to the parties, is unfair to both the prosecution and the defence. The trial is conducted according to well established legal principles and its not for you to go looking for other information or to add to the evidence.

Third, acting on outside information would be false to the oath or affirmation you took as jurors to give a true verdict according to the evidence. You would cease being a juror, that is, a judge of the facts, and have instead taken on the role of an investigator.

If one of your fellow jurors breaches these instructions, then the duty falls on the rest of you to inform me or a member of my staff, either in writing or otherwise, without delay. These rules are so important that you must report your fellow juror.

[Add the following shaded section if there is a risk that a juror may visit the crime scene or attempt a private experiment.]

For similar reasons, unless I tell you otherwise, you must not visit the scene of the alleged offence. You also must not attempt any private experiments concerning any aspect of the case. As I have explained, you are jurors assessing the evidence which is led in the case. You are not investigators, and must not take into account material that has not been properly presented to you as evidence.

Consequences of breaching instructions

You may have a question about what could happen if you acted on outside information or conducted your own research.

The immediate outcome is that the jury may need to be discharged and the trial may have to start again. This would cause stress and expense to the witnesses, the prosecution and the accused. It would also cause stress and inconvenience to the other jurors, who will have wasted their time sitting on a case which must be restarted.

Second, it is a criminal offence for a juror to discuss the case with others or to conduct research on the case. You could therefore be fined and receive a criminal conviction, which may affect your ability to travel to some countries. Jurors have even been sent to jail for discussing a case on Facebook.

More broadly, jurors conducting their own research undermines public confidence in the jury system. The jury system has been a fundamental feature of our criminal justice system for centuries.

For all these reasons, it is essential that you decide the case solely on the evidence presented in court, without feelings of sympathy or prejudice. You must not conduct your own research into the case or discuss the case with others who are not on the jury.

Warnings About Discussing the Case

As judges of the facts, it is also important that you are careful to avoid any situations that could interfere with your ability to be impartial, or that could make you appear to be biased towards one side or the other.

You must therefore be careful not to get into conversation with anyone you do not know, who you might meet around or near the court building. Otherwise you may find yourself talking to someone who turns out to have a special interest in the case.

You must also avoid talking to anyone other than your fellow jurors about the case. This includes your family and friends. You must not discuss the case on social media sites, such as Facebook, Myspace, Twitter, blogs or anything else like that. Of course, you can tell your family and friends that you are on a jury, and about general matters such as when the trial is expected to finish. But do not discuss the case itself. It is your judgment, not theirs, that is sought. You should not risk that judgment being influenced by their views – which will necessarily be uninformed, because they will not have seen the witnesses or heard the evidence.

You are free to discuss the case amongst yourselves as it continues, although you should only do this in the jury room. However, you should form no conclusive views about the case until you have heard all of the evidence, listened to counsel on both sides, and received my instructions about the law. Keep an open mind.

Consequences of breaching instructions revisited

You have already heard what can happen when jurors disregard the instruction not to conduct their own research. Similar consequences can follow if you discuss the case with others.

You must therefore also let me know if someone tries to discuss the case with you, or if you learn that one of your fellow jurors has been discussing the case with someone outside the jury.

Assessing Witnesses

In order to decide what the facts are in this case, you will need to assess the witnesses who give evidence. It is up to you to decide how much or how little of the testimony of any witness you will believe or rely on. You may believe all, some or none of a witness's evidence. It is also for you to decide what weight should be attached to any particular evidence – that is, the extent to which the evidence helps you to determine the relevant issues.

In assessing witnesses' evidence, matters which may concern you include their credibility and reliability. Credibility concerns honesty – is the witness telling you the truth? Reliability may be different. A witness may be honest, but have a poor memory or be mistaken.

It is for you to judge whether the witnesses are telling the truth, and whether they correctly recall the facts about which they are giving evidence. This is something you do all the time in your daily lives. There is no special skill involved – you just need to use your common sense.

In making your assessment, you should appreciate that giving evidence in a trial is not common, and may be a stressful experience. So you should not jump to conclusions based on how a witness gives evidence. Looks can be deceiving. People react and appear differently. Witnesses come from different backgrounds, and have different abilities, values and life experiences. There are too many variables to make the manner in which a witness gives evidence the only, or even the most important, factor in your decision.

You should keep an open mind about the truthfulness or accuracy of the witnesses until all of the evidence has been presented. This is because it is only once you have heard all of the evidence that it will be possible to assess to what extent, if any, the other evidence in the case confirms, explains or contradicts a particular witness's evidence.

In making your decision, do not consider only the witnesses' testimony. Also take into account the exhibits [and admissions]. Consider all of the evidence in the case, use what you believe and reject what you disbelieve. Give each part of it the importance which you – as the judge of the facts – think it should be given, and then determine what, in your judgment, are the true facts.

It is a critical part of our justice system that people are presumed to be innocent, unless and until they are proved guilty. So before you may return a verdict of guilty, the prosecution must satisfy you that [each of] the accused is guilty of the charge[s] in question.

As the prosecution brings the charge[s] against the accused, it is for the prosecution to prove that/those charge[s]. The accused does/do not have to prove anything. That never changes from start to finish. It is not for the accused to demonstrate his/her/their innocence, but for the prosecution to prove the charge[s] they have brought against him/her/them.

The prosecution must do this by proving [each of] the accused's guilt of the charge[s] beyond reasonable doubt. You have probably heard these words before, and they mean exactly what they say – proof beyond reasonable doubt.

This is the highest standard of proof that our law demands. It is not enough for the prosecution to prove that the accused is probably guilty, or very likely to be guilty. That would be enough in a civil case, such as where one person sues another for breach of contract. In that situation, matters only need to be proved on what is called the "balance of probabilities". That is, they need to be shown to be more likely than not.

By comparison, in a criminal trial the prosecution must prove the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt. This means you cannot be satisfied the accused is guilty if you have a reasonable doubt about whether the accused is guilty.

In deciding whether the prosecution has proved its case beyond reasonable doubt, you should remember that it is almost impossible to prove anything with absolute certainty when reconstructing past events and the prosecution does not have to do so. A reasonable doubt is not an imaginary or fanciful doubt, or an unrealistic possibility.

Unless I tell you otherwise, when I say that the prosecution must "prove" or "establish" a matter, or that you must be "satisfied" about a matter, I mean the prosecution must prove or establish a matter, or you must be satisfied of that matter, beyond reasonable doubt.

The prosecution does not need to prove every fact that they allege to this standard. It is the essential ingredients or "elements" of the charge[s] that they must prove to this standard. In this case, that means that the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that [list elements of the primary offence. Repeat for any other offences].

I will explain these elements to you in detail, and relate them to the evidence in this case, after you have heard all of the evidence.

However, for now you should know that it is only if you find that the prosecution has proven all of the elements of a charge beyond reasonable doubt that you may find the accused guilty of that charge. If you are not satisfied that the prosecution has done this, your verdict in relation to that charge must be "Not Guilty".

Your verdict of guilty or not guilty must be unanimous. That is, whatever decision you make, you must all agree on it.

Separate Consideration – Multiple Accused

[If the case involves multiple accused, add the following shaded section.]

In this trial there are [insert number] accused. The prosecution says each of them is guilty. Each of them says they are not guilty. So there are really [insert number] trials [all] being heard together.

It would be inconvenient and a great waste of time and money to hold separate trials of each accused on different occasions in different courts on this same matter. So for convenience they are all tried together.

But you must be careful not to allow convenience to override justice. The parties are entitled to have the case against each accused considered separately.

You must consider the case against each accused separately, in light only of the evidence which applies to that accused. You must ask yourselves, in relation to each accused, whether the evidence relating to that accused has satisfied you, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he is guilty of the offence s/he has been charged with. If the answer is yes, then you should find him/her guilty. If the answer is no, then you should find him/her not guilty.

Separate Consideration – Multiple Charges

[If the case involves multiple charges, add the following shaded section.]

In this trial, the prosecution has brought [insert number] charges against the accused. While these are separate matters, they are [all] being dealt with in the one trial. This is done for convenience, as it would be expensive and time-consuming to hold a separate trial before a different judge and jury for each charge.

However, you must be careful not to allow convenience to override justice. Both the prosecution and the accused are entitled to have each charge considered separately.

It would therefore be wrong to say that simply because you find the accused guilty or not guilty of one charge, that s/he must be guilty or not guilty, as the case may be, of another.

Each charge must be considered separately, in light only of the evidence which applies to it. You must ask yourselves, in relation to each charge, whether the evidence relating to that charge has satisfied you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused is guilty of that particular crime. If the answer is yes, then you should find the accused guilty of that charge. If the answer is no, then you should find the accused not guilty of it.

Alternative Verdicts

[Where there is one incident which involves alternatives, add the following shaded section. If there are multiple incidents involving alternatives, this charge will need to be modified.]

Members of the jury, my tipstaff is now going to hand you a document called an "indictment". This document lists the crimes that NOA is charged with. I will tell you more about what each crime involves at the end of the trial. However, there is one matter I want to draw to your attention now.

Charges [identify relevant alternatives] are given to you as alternatives. The prosecution does not say that the accused should be convicted of [both/all] of these charges, but of one or the other. This is because they [both/all] relate to the same incident.

At the end of the trial, when you are delivering your verdict[s], you will first be asked for your verdict on [insert principal offence], which is the more serious charge. If you reach a verdict of guilty in relation to that charge, you will not be asked for a verdict on [insert alternative charge].

It is only if you unanimously reach a verdict of not guilty on [insert principal offence] that you will be asked to deliver a verdict on [insert alternative charge]. This is because the prosecution is entitled to your verdict on the most serious charge. It would be wrong to compromise and say "we cannot agree on a verdict on charge one, but we agree that the accused is at least guilty of charge two".

So when you are listening to the evidence, bear in mind that while there are [insert number of charges'] charges on the indictment, there are actually only [insert number] of allegations that relate to different events because the other [insert number] charges are alternatives.

Trial Procedure

Order of Proceedings

I will now describe the procedure that we will follow during the trial, and some general administrative matters.

In a moment we will hear the opening address from the prosecutor, and the reply from counsel for the accused.[33] Then we will proceed to hear the evidence. After that, there will be closing addresses from counsel. I will then instruct you about the law, the issues and the evidence. You will then go to the jury room to discuss your verdict[s].

Transcripts and Note-taking

All of the evidence in this case is going to be tape recorded and transcribed. This means that you will be able to check on any part of the evidence you later cannot remember.

However, you should always listen carefully to the evidence as it is given, because it is not only what the witnesses say, but also how they say it that is important to your assessment of their evidence.

When you are listening to the evidence from the witnesses, you may take notes if you wish, but you do not have to. It is completely up to you. If you do take notes, you should not allow it to distract you from listening to the evidence and assessing the witnesses. You may always ask to hear a tape of a witness's testimony or have some evidence read back to you, but you only have one chance to observe the appearance and behaviour of the witnesses when they give the evidence.

Sitting times and breaks

Our hours here in court are [insert starting time] until [insert lunch time] and then [insert starting time after lunch] until [insert finishing time].

If something comes up which means that you may not able to attend court when we would normally be sitting, please let me know as soon as possible, so that we can try to resolve the issue.

Jury Guide

To help you remember the directions I have just given you, my tipstaff will now give you a jury guide. You can write on it if you wish. The Guide, like all documents we will give you during the trial, must not be taken home. You may bring it to the courtroom, but you must leave it in the jury room at the end of each day. If you bring the Guide to the courtroom, do not allow it to distract you. Do not try to read it while I am giving you directions, or when counsel are addressing you, or while a witness is giving evidence.

The Guide is a simplified reminder of some of the directions I have given you. It is a publication designed for general use by jurors in criminal trials and is not specific to this case. It does not cover all of the directions I have given word for word and it will not cover directions I will give you during the trial and at the end of the trial which will be specific to this trial. If you think there is anything in the [33] This will need to be modified if the judge's remarks are made after the opening address and reply.

Guide which is different to what I have instructed you, then you must follow what I tell you in court and ignore what is in the guide. If you are confused or unsure about whether there is a difference between the Guide and my directions, you should ask me to clarify.

Opening Address

We will now hear the opening address from the prosecution, who will tell you what the case is about.

[After opening and reply, briefly state the issues.]

What is a view?

1. Under s 53 of the Evidence Act 2008, the court may order a "demonstration, experiment or inspection" (collectively, a "view").[34]
2. These terms are not defined in the Evidence Act 2008. Based on the common law and the conventional meaning of the terms:
    - An inspection involves the court travelling to view a location or an object that could not be brought into the courtroom;
    - A demonstration builds on an inspection by allowing a witness to explain the incident in question, demonstrate the operation of a machine or other object, or attempt to recreate an event;
    - An experiment involves the jury watching a person carry out a test or trial for the purpose of discovering something or testing a principle or hypothesis (Evans v R (2007) 235 CLR 521).
3. Views take place outside the courtroom. Section 53 therefore does not apply to the examination of exhibits inside the courtroom, or courtroom demonstrations of the size or position of objects (Evans v R (2007) 235 CLR 521. See also Evidence Act 2008 s 53(5)).
4. The "experiments" referred to in s 53 are limited to those conducted as part of the trial in front of the jury, and do not include those conducted before the trial and described by witnesses at the trial (Evans v R (2007) 235 CLR 521; DPP v Farquharson (No.2) (Ruling No. 4) [2010] VSC 210).

When May a View Be Ordered

5. A judge may order a view on the application of a party (Evidence Act 2008 s 53).
6. Before ordering a view, the judge must be satisfied that:
    - The parties will be given a reasonable opportunity to be present; and [34] While the heading of s 53 is "views", that term is not used in the provision. It has been held that it was Parliament's intention to use the word "view" as a general word to encompass demonstrations, experiments and inspections. This differs from the common law, where a view was an inspection and did not encompass a demonstration or experiment (Hughes v Janrule [2010] ACTSC 5).

- The judge and jury will be present (Evidence Act 2008 s 53).

7. While the presence of the judge and jury at a view is mandatory, a party may choose not to be present (R v Milat NSWSC 12/4/96).
8. In some cases, counsel have sought to be excused from being present during a view. As a matter of principle, juries should not receive evidence in the absence of counsel for each party and there are significant limits on when a judge can communicate with a jury without the knowledge of counsel. Given that a view can be used as evidence and the jury can ask questions during a view, it will rarely be appropriate for a judge to excuse counsel for attending the view.
9. It is at the trial judge's discretion whether to hold a view in a particular case (R v Delon (1992) 29 NSWLR 29).
10. In deciding how to exercise the discretion, a judge must consider:
    - Whether the parties will be present;
    - Whether the view will assist the court to resolve issues of fact or understand the evidence;
    - The danger that the view might be unfairly prejudicial, might be misleading or confusing, or might cause or result in undue waste of time;
    - In the case of a demonstration, the extent to which it will properly reproduce the conduct or event to be demonstrated;
    - In the case of an inspection, the extent to which the place or thing being inspected has been materially altered (Evidence Act 2008 s 53).
11. Unlike at common law (see, e.g. R v Alexander [1979] VR 615), the circumstances to be demonstrated do not need to be identical to the circumstances that existed at the time of the event in question. Similarity of circumstances is merely one factor that a judge must consider (Evidence Act 2008 s 53).
12. A view may take place at any time during the trial. While this can even extend to conducting a view after the jury commences deliberations, the judge must have special regard for the prohibition on the prosecution splitting its case and the risk of prejudice to the accused when additional evidence is introduced after closing addresses (R v Delon (1992) 29 NSWLR 29).
13. As the Evidence Act 2008 substantially changed the law in this area, common law cases on the availability of a view must be read with considerable caution.

For What Purposes May a View be Used?

14. The jury may use a view as a source of evidence in the case, and may draw any reasonable inferences from what it sees, hears or otherwise notices during a view (Evidence Act 2008 s 54).
15. A view may also allow the jury to better understand the evidence given in court and to assess the credibility or value of that evidence (see, e.g. R v Alexander [1979] VR 615; Scott v Numurkah Corporation (1954) 91 CLR 300).

Conduct of a View

16. A view may be facilitated by a sworn 'shower' who points out what are said to be relevant features on the view. The 'shower' is usually a member of court staff, who has previously received a 'dry run' of the view with the assistance of the informant. It is only in an exceptional case that the informant should be sworn as the 'shower' (Aston v The Queen [2019] VSCA 225, [90]–[93]).
17. Those responsible for transporting the jury to a view, including both jury keepers and any bus drivers, should be made aware that they must not discuss anything related to the case in the presence of the jury (Aston v The Queen [2019] VSCA 225, [82]).

Directions on Views

18. The judge should instruct the jury that inspections and experiments are only allowed under the strict control of the court. Jurors must not conduct their own inspections or experiments during deliberations. Such conduct is a criminal offence (R v Skaf (2004) 60 NSWLR 86; Evidence Act 2008 s 53(4); Juries Act 2000 s 78A. See 1.5 Decide Solely on the Evidence for further information).
19. Before conducting a view, the judge should explain its purpose and how the jury may use the view in the circumstances of the case.
20. The judge should tell the jury not to talk to any accompanying witnesses, police officers or legal representatives during the view. (Evans v R (2007) 235 CLR 521; R v Ashton (1944) 61 WN (NSW) 134; R v Neilan [1992] 1 VR 57).[35]

Placing the View on the Record

21. Historically, one argument against using views as evidence was that there was no way for the results of the view to be transmitted to an appellate court. To overcome this problem, upon returning to court, judges should sum up (in the presence of the jury) what transpired, so that there is an accurate record of what occurred on the transcript (Ha v R (2014) 44 VR 319; R v FD (2006) 160 A Crim R 392).
22. This is an important tool to allow an appellate court to know what occurred on a view and so assess what inferences may have been open to a jury as a result of the view (Ha v R (2014) 44 VR 319).
23. A summary may be compiled through:
    - Recording a video of the view (provided it does not disclose the identity of the jurors). If a view is recorded, the judge should ensure that any questions from the jury are also recorded by reading the question out himself or herself;
    - A shorthand writer keeping a summary of the view while it takes place;
    - The judge making a summary on the return to court. Some judges invite counsel to prepare an agreed summary, which the judge will then settle (see Ha v R (2014) 44 VR 319).
24. The summary should identify where the jury were taken, what they observed and from what vantage points. It need not draw conclusions about what was observable from those vantage points (Ha v R (2014) 44 VR 319).
25. The summary of the view should include a note of any questions the jury asked in the course of the view (Ha v R (2014) 44 VR 319).

2.1.1 Charge: Views

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge should be given before going on a view. Upon returning to court, it is advisable to sum-up, in the presence of the jury, what transpired and summarise these directions.

You will shortly be taken to [an inspection/see a demonstration/see an experiment] at [insert location]. You will be accompanied by [identify all those who will attend the view, such as the judge, counsel for the parties, the accused, and any jury keepers].

The purpose of this [inspection/demonstration/experiment] is to assist you to better understand the evidence of the witnesses. You may also use your observations as evidence in the case and as part of your discussions. You are entitled to draw any reasonable inferences from what you see, hear or otherwise notice during the [inspection/demonstration/experiment]. Later in the trial I will give you directions about the need for care when drawing inferences from evidence.[36]

During the [inspection/demonstration/experiment], you must not discuss the case in any circumstances where you can be overheard by anyone other than your fellow jurors. Remember that all jury discussions must take place in the privacy of the jury room.

Do not speak to anyone other than a fellow juror or a court officer, and do not let anyone other than these people speak to you. If you have a question concerning the [inspection/demonstration/experiment], you should write it down and give it to my tipstaff, who will pass it to me.

At the start of the trial, I told you that you must not make any private investigations or enquiries about this case, and that it is a criminal offence to do so. You are jurors and not investigators. That direction still applies, and means that you must not visit the [describe view location] a second time. All [inspections/demonstrations/experiments] must be conducted under court supervision.

2.2 Providing Documents to the Jury

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

What Documents Can Be Given to the Jury?

1. Section 223(1) of the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 allows the judge to provide copies of the following documents to the jury (in any form that he or she considers appropriate) if he or she thinks it will assist the jury to understand the issues in the trial:

[36] If the judge has already directed the jury about drawing inferences, this paragraph must be modified accordingly.

(a) the indictment;

(b) the summary of the prosecution opening;

(c) the response of the accused to the summary of the prosecution opening and the response of the accused to the notice of pre-trial admissions of the prosecution;

(d) any document admitted as evidence;

(e) any statement of facts;

(f) the opening and closing addresses of the prosecution and the accused;

(g) any address of the trial judge to the jury under section 222;

(h) any schedules, chronologies, charts, diagrams, summaries or other explanatory material;

(ha) the transcript of the evidence in the trial;

(i) transcripts of evidence or audio or audiovisual recordings of evidence;

(j) transcripts of any audio or audiovisual recordings;

(k) the trial judge's directions to the jury under section 238;

(ka) a jury guide

(l) any other document that the trial judge considers appropriate.

2. The term "document" is not defined in the Criminal Procedure Act 2009. For the purposes of section 223, it should be given the definition contained in section 38 of the Interpretation of Legislation Act 1984 (R v BAH (2002) 5 VR 517).
3. Although a judge may have a discretion to allow a VARE to be provided to the jury to view in the jury room during their deliberations (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 223), it should only be exercised in exceptional circumstances. Any unrestricted access should be accompanied by strong warnings (R v Lyne [2003] VSCA 118; R v BAH (2002) 5 VR 517; R v H [1999] 2 Qd R 283; R v Lewis (2002) 137 A Crim R 85. See 2.3.3 Pre-recorded Evidence for further information).

When May a Document Be Given to the Jury?

4. A document may be provided to the jury on the application of a party, or on the judge's own motion (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 337; R v Benbrika and Ors (Ruling No. 11) [2007] VSC 580).
5. The judge must think that the document will assist the jury to understand the issues in the trial or the evidence (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 223; R v Benbrika and Ors (Ruling No. 11) [2007] VSC 580. See also Alucraft Pty Ltd (in liq) v Grocon Ltd (No 1) [1996] 2 VR 377).
6. While the philosophy behind s 223 should be embraced (as it is in both the jury's interests and the interests of efficiency generally), it must always be subject to the overriding responsibility of the court to ensure that the accused's right to a fair trial according to law is not infringed. A document should not be given to the jury if it would create a material risk of unfairness to the accused that cannot be overcome by a direction or warning (R v Benbrika and Ors (Ruling No. 11) [2007] VSC 580).

Marking Jury Documents as Exhibits

7. Documents which the judge gives the jury, such as written directions, should be tendered by the court and marked as exhibits. This ensures that the documents are recorded in the same way as other exhibits and are preserved for any future proceedings.

Types of Documents that May be Given to the Jury

Written Directions

8. Under the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 223, a judge may give the jury written directions summarising relevant matters of law, setting out the questions it may be pertinent for them to consider, or describing the possible verdicts at which they may properly arrive.

9. Written directions may be particularly helpful where the law is complicated, or where there are a number of alternative verdicts to be considered (R v Dunn (2006) 94 SASR 177; R v Bourke [2003] QCA 113; R v Youssef (1990) 59 A Crim R 1; R v Radford (1986) 133 LSJS 110; R v Wilson (1980) 17 A Crim R 359; R v Hughes (1980) 7 A Crim R 51; R v Petroff (1980) 2 A Crim R 101. See R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135 (Neave JA) for a discussion of the usefulness of written directions).

10. In cases involving numerous, detailed and complex legal issues, it may be an imposition on the jury not to assist them by providing them with written directions. It may be unrealistic to believe that they will be able to retain the key structure and content of the summing-up in their minds without the assistance of such a document (R v Radford (1986) 133 LSJS 110).

11. Written directions should not be used as a substitute for directions of law or references to how the parties have put their case. Instead, written directions may be used in conjunction with and to supplement oral directions (see Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 65, 66).

12. The oral directions must explain the written directions to the jury, and explain how they are to be used (R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135; [2008] VSCA 144 (Hansen AJA)).

13. The contents of written directions are a matter for the judge and counsel to consider in light of the evidence given at the trial. It is desirable to show them to counsel prior to providing them to the jury. This should be done before the judge's charge has commenced, to provide counsel with adequate opportunity to comment on the proposed directions, and correct any errors or omissions. While counsels' views should be taken into account, their consent is not required (R v Dunn (2006) 94 SASR 177; R v Radford (1986) 133 LSJS 110; R v Petroff (1980) 2 A Crim R 101; R v Abebe (2000) 1 VR 429).

14. The judge should refrain from giving the jury copies of legislative provisions (R v Phillips [1971] ALR 740).

15. Judges should carefully consider the best time to provide written directions to the jury. They must make sure that the jury is not distracted by any document provided. It may be desirable to give the jury time to read the document before proceeding with oral directions (R v Petroff (1980) 2 A Crim R 101).

16. It will be an error merely to provide a written document to the jury without explaining its contents and the use which may be made of it (R v Dunn (2006) 94 SASR 177).

17. A judge may, however, provide a jury with a transcript of directions given in running and state that those directions continue to apply, without reiterating each of those directions as part of the judge's final directions, or specifically instructing the jury that they must read those previously given directions. This is most likely appropriate where it is done with the consent of the parties (Nguyen v The Queen [2015] VSCA 76, [43]–[50]).

18. The judge should be careful not to overemphasise the use of the written directions (R v Petroff (1980) 2 A Crim R 101).

19. Care must be taken to ensure that the provision of selective written material does not disturb the essential balance in the oral charge between the prosecution and defence case (R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135; [2008] VSCA 144 (Redlich JA)).

Explanatory Materials (Charts, Schedules and Chronologies)

20. Judges may allow evidence to be given in the form of charts, summaries or other explanatory materials (Evidence Act 2008 ss 29(4), 50), and may provide schedules, chronologies, charts, diagrams, summaries or other explanatory materials to the jury (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 223(h)).

21. The use of charts, schedules and chronologies to assist the jury in complicated cases is encouraged. The jury is entitled to expect that all reasonable steps will be taken towards simplifying their task and facilitating their deliberations, and such explanatory materials provide an important and desirable method for doing this (Collins v R (1986) 44 SASR 214; Smith v R (1970) 121 CLR 572; R v Mitchell [1971] VR 46; Alucraft Pty Ltd (in liq) v Grocon Ltd (No 1) [1996] 2 VR 377).

22. In some complex cases, the only way that the interests of justice can be served is by presenting an overall picture to the jury with the aid of explanatory materials (R v Simmonds [1969] 1 QB 685; Collins v R (1986) 44 SASR 214).

23. In determining whether to admit a chart into evidence, a judge should consider whether it will assist in the fact-finding task without disadvantaging the accused (Alucraft Pty Ltd (in liq) v Grocon Ltd (No 1) [1996] 2 VR 377).

24. If a chart contains expressions of opinion, the person who prepared the chart must be qualified to express those opinions (Butera v DPP (Vic) (1987) 164 CLR 180 (Gaudron J); Alucraft Pty Ltd (in liq) v Grocon Ltd (No 1) [1996] 2 VR 377).

25. Care must be taken to ensure that any explanatory materials sent into the jury room are not inherently prejudicial to the accused, either by virtue of their form or because they might tend to give undue emphasis to a particular aspect of some evidence to the exclusion of other evidence (Collins v R (1986) 44 SASR 214); R v Benbrika and Ors (Ruling No. 11) [2007] VSC 580).

26. Consideration should be given to the language used in a summary. It should not implicitly express conclusions about the conversations summarised (e.g. through the use of conclusionary past participles such as "complained" or "confirmed"), where those conclusions are in dispute (R v Benbrika and Ors (Ruling No. 11) [2007] VSC 580).

27. If a chart purports to summarise all of a witness's evidence on a particular topic, it should do so fully. A judge should not allow a chart to be provided to the jury if it only selectively summarises that witness's evidence on that topic or contains errors (R v Van Beelen (1973) 4 SASR 353; Collins v R (1986) 44 SASR 214; Alucraft Pty Ltd (in liq) v Grocon Ltd (No 1) [1996] 2 VR 377; R v Benbrika and Ors (Ruling No. 11) [2007] VSC 580).

28. Explanatory materials should not introduce new evidence, or give rise to inferences or conclusions that cannot be drawn from the oral and documentary evidence that has already been disclosed or will be disclosed. Such materials should merely provide a convenient summary of the evidence that has been, or will be, given (Collins v R (1986) 44 SASR 214; Butera v DPP (Vic) (1987) 164 CLR 180 (Gaudron J); Alucraft Pty Ltd (in liq) v Grocon Ltd (No 1) [1996] 2 VR 377).

29. If explanatory materials are used, a judge should usually remind the jury that they are not a substitute for the oral or documentary evidence, point to any errors disclosed in the documents, and deal with the danger of drawing inferences from these materials which go beyond the evidence given (R v Van Beelen (1973) 4 SASR 353).

30. However, it is at judges' discretion whether to give such a direction. They may not want to do so if it has already been covered by counsel, and they wish to avoid giving the chart added significance in the eyes of the jury (see, e.g. Collins v R (1986) 44 SASR 214).

Transcripts

Transcripts of Evidence

31. A judge may provide the jury with a transcript of some or all of the oral evidence, including audio or audiovisual recordings of evidence, given in a trial if he or she thinks it will help them to understand the issues or the evidence (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 223(ha), (i)).

32. Prior to the enactment of this provision, views varied about when the jury should be allowed to take a transcript of evidence into the jury room. Some cases held that a transcript should not be provided to the jury without good reason, as:

    - The transcript may be given disproportionate weight or credibility by the jury;
    - If only part of the transcript is provided to the jury, or read by the jurors, it may give an unbalanced or incorrect impression of the evidence given. For example, a witness may have contradicted, qualified or corrected something said earlier in another (unread) part of his or her evidence, or a different witness may have given conflicting evidence; and
    - Jurors should focus on the oral evidence given rather than written documents (Butera v DPP (Vic) (1987) 164 CLR 180; R v Lowe (1997) 98 A Crim R 300; R v Fowler [2000] NSWCCA 142; Driscoll v R (1977) 137 CLR 517).

33. Other cases held that, if requested, a transcript generally should be provided to the jury. It was argued that:

    - As jurors are usually allowed to take notes of the evidence, a member of the jury may already make a full note of what was said and read it to other members of the jury. It is preferable to provide them with a transcript, which carries the additional quality of guaranteed accuracy (R v Taousanis (1999) 146 A Crim R 303);
    - A trial is not a memory test, and it is prudent for the jury to check their recollection against a transcript (R v Bartle (2003) 181 FLR 1);
    - Denying the jury the benefit of reading the evidence they have heard "put[s] the law into an ill-fitting straitjacket". Instead, the jury should be assisted to deliberate effectively and rationally on the evidence. The provision of the transcript will assist them to do this, by compensating for any lack of reliability in juror's notes, and saving time in their deliberations (R v Williams [1982] Tas R 266; R v Taousanis (1999) 146 A Crim R 303);
    - The risk of a transcript being given disproportionate weight or credibility, or of the jury receiving an unbalanced or incorrect impression of the evidence, can be eliminated by giving an adequate caution (R v Taousanis (1999) 146 A Crim R 303).

34. While these cases should now be approached with some caution (due to the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Act 2009), the considerations identified may still be of assistance in determining when to exercise the discretion provided by s 223(ha) and (i).

35. If a judge chooses to provide the jury with a transcript, he or she must instruct the jury in unambiguous terms that the transcript is not evidence, and is made available only for their convenience. The jury should be reminded that the evidence is what they saw and heard in court, not what they are about to read. This instruction should be given before the transcript is made available (Butera v DPP (Vic) (1987) 164 CLR 180 (Gaudron J); R v Morgan [2009] VSCA 225; R v MG (2010) 29 VR 305).

36. As criminal trials are essentially oral in nature, care must be taken to avoid the risk that undue weight will be given to a written record of a conversation as compared to the conversation itself heard in oral form (Gately v R (2007) 232 CLR 208; Butera v DPP (Vic) (1987) 164 CLR 180; R v Morgan [2009] VSCA 225).

37. Where a part of the transcript is provided in relation to a certain issue, as a matter of fairness it may be necessary to also provide a transcript of any other evidence contradicting, weakening or qualifying that evidence. Such evidence should usually be provided even if the jury does not request it. If this is not done, the judge must adequately instruct the jury about any matters which detract from the probative force of the evidence in the transcript (R v Lowe (1997) 98 A Crim R 300; Butera v DPP (Vic) (1987) 164 CLR 180 (Gaudron J)).

38. Where time has not been taken to address inaccuracies in the transcript, a direction may be necessary concerning its accuracy (R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135; [2008] VSCA 144).

39. If there is a dispute about whether the transcript is accurate, the problem should be presented to the jury, to be resolved by them with the greatest assistance that the court and counsel can provide. The jury should be told of the possibility of error, and that they must not hold any words against the accused unless they are sure that those words were used. The jury should be told that in the end they must rely upon their own recollection of what was said, rather than relying on the transcript which could be inaccurate (R v JWM (1999) 107 A Crim R 267).

40. If a judge provides a transcript, any arguments made in the absence of the jury should be expunged (see, e.g. R v Nikolaidis [2003] VSCA 191; R v Fowler [2000] NSWCCA 142).

41. See 2.3.3 Pre-recorded Evidence for information concerning transcripts of a VARE.

Transcripts of Addresses and the Judge's Charge

42. A judge has the power to allow transcripts of his or her summing-up, and any other addresses he or she has made, to be taken into the jury room. Transcripts of counsels' addresses may also be provided (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 ss 223(b), (c), (f), (g), (k)).

43. A judge may, upon request, provide a transcript of the whole summing-up to go to the jury, or arrange for a recording of it to be replayed to them (R v Sukkar [2005] NSWCCA 54).

44. Such transcripts may be of great assistance to jurors, as they may accurately and comprehensively remind them of what was said during the trial (R v Taousanis (1999) 146 A Crim R 303).

45. In addition, transcripts of the defence closing will remind the jury of the details of the defence accurately and comprehensively, and of the material which might give rise to a reasonable doubt. It may also help them to understand how the various strands of evidence might be drawn together, and remind them of the explanations for any pieces of potentially adverse evidence (R v Bartle (2003) 181 FLR 1).

46. Moreover, all of the reasons in favour of providing transcripts of evidence to the jury (see 'Transcripts of Evidence' above) equally apply to transcripts of counsels' addresses and the judge's charge (R v Taousanis (1999) 146 A Crim R 303).

47. If the jury requests a transcript of counsels' closing addresses, it may be a miscarriage of justice not to provide it. For example, in R v Bartle (2003) 181 FLR 1, a new trial was ordered because the judge declined, in a long and complex trial, to make such a transcript available. The Court pointed out that the jury could not be expected to remember all of the points made in the long, detailed and closely reasoned speeches. They could not even be expected to remember which matters they wanted to obtain more information about (and so could not request a part of the evidence be read back). It was noted that the jury were best placed to know what further assistance they needed, but did not receive it.

48. If the jury requests a transcript of counsels' addresses, it may not be sufficient to provide them with a transcript of the judge's summing-up instead. While the summing-up provides an outline of the respective cases, counsels' addresses may cover important factual material not contained in the judge's charge, and should generally be supplied upon request (R v Bartle (2003) 181 FLR 1).

49. If the jury requests a copy of the judge's charge, it may be sufficient to provide them with a summary of the elements of the offence instead (if the jury considers that such a summary answers whatever questions they have) (see, e.g. R v Coombes 16/4/1999 Vic CA).

Transcripts of Taped Evidence

Transcripts of Tapes in English

50. A tape recording may be admitted into evidence to prove that what is recorded took place in the circumstances and among the participants alleged by the prosecution, as well as to prove the content of any recorded conversation (Butera v DPP (Vic) (1987) 164 CLR 180).

51. It is the sound produced by playing the tape which is the evidence, not the tape itself. The tape cannot prove anything without being played (Butera v DPP (Vic) (1987) 164 CLR 180).

52. If the tape is available to play in court, a transcript of its contents should not be admitted as proof of those contents. The tape should be played to the jury, as that will provide the best evidence of what was recorded (Butera v DPP (Vic) (1987) 164 CLR 180).

53. However, a transcript of a tape recording may be given to the jury to help them to understand the words spoken on the tape. This is often done, but is particularly helpful if the contents are difficult to hear or understand, or if the recording is lengthy (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 223(j); Butera v DPP (Vic) (1987) 164 CLR 180; R v JWM (1999) 107 A Crim R 267; R v Menzies [1982] 1 NZLR 40).

54. Providing jurors with a transcript in such circumstances may help to limit the number of times a tape needs to be replayed before their ears become attuned to the words or other sounds recorded (Butera v DPP (Vic) (1987) 164 CLR 180).

55. Immediately before giving a transcript to the jury, they should be told that the purpose of giving it to them is not to provide independent evidence of the contents of the tape, but to help them to understand what is recorded on the tape. It is their understanding of the tape recording that is important, and the transcript is not to replace that understanding. Jurors must not rely on the transcript if they are not satisfied that it correctly sets out what they heard on the tape (Butera v DPP (Vic) (1987) 164 CLR 180; R v Miladinovic (1992) 107 FLR 241; R v Giovannone [2002] NSWCCA 323; Eastman v R (1997) 76 FCR 9).

56. A judge may allow the transcript to be taken into the jury room as a "transcript of any audio or audiovisual recordings" (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 223).

57. See 2.3.3 Pre-recorded Evidence for information concerning transcripts of a VARE.

Transcripts of Tapes in Languages Other than English

58. Written translations of tapes recorded in languages other than English are different from transcripts of recordings in English. Such translations are not admissible as an aid to the jury's understanding of the sounds recorded on the tape, because the jury will not understand those sounds (Butera v DPP (Vic) (1987) 164 CLR 180).

59. While it will probably be necessary for a translator to make written notes about the content of that tape for their own purposes, they should usually give oral evidence about the contents of that translation. Their situation is no different from that of any other witness giving evidence (Butera v DPP (Vic) (1987) 164 CLR 180).

60. However, the practice of requiring witnesses to give their evidence orally is not immutable. A judge has discretion to allow a transcript of a translator's evidence to be provided to the jury, just as he or she may allow a written transcript of any other witness's evidence to be provided to the jury (see "Transcripts of Evidence" above). This may be done where the judge thinks it would be of assistance to the jury. (Butera v DPP (Vic) (1987) 164 CLR 180; Alucraft Pty Ltd (in liq) v Grocon Ltd (No 1) [1996] 2 VR 377).

61. As such translations may be provided to the jury for the same reasons as any other transcript of evidence, the procedure for determining whether to allow this to occur, what documents to provide, and the directions to give will be the same as those outlined in "Transcripts of Evidence" above. For example, as a matter of fairness it may be desirable to also provide the jury with a written transcript of the cross-examination of the translator, to supplement and modify the written transcript which represents their evidence in chief (Butera v DPP (Vic) (1987) 164 CLR 180).

Jury Guide

62. The judge may provide the jury with a "jury guide", which may contain:
    (a) a list of questions to assist the jury in reaching a verdict, including a written form of any factual question directions or integrated directions;
    (b) evidentiary directions;
    (c) references to how the parties have put their cases;
    (d) references to evidence which the judge considers necessary to assist the jury to determine the issues in the trial;
    (e) any other information (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 223).
63. When providing this kind of guide, judges should be careful in the terminology they use to describe the guide, or components of the guide, and should not describe a jury document as a "question trail" unless it is an integrated direction in accordance with Jury Directions Act 2015 s 67 (McKinnin v The Queen [2019] VSCA 114, [78]).
64. A judge may also provide the jury with a "general jury guide" which may contain:
    (a) general information about criminal trials, including the role of the judge, jury and parties and the order of events in a trial;
    (b) general information about relevant legal concepts, including the presumption of innocence and the requirement of proof beyond reasonable doubt;
    (c) general information about jury deliberations, including what to do if a juror has a question, appointing a foreperson and how the jury may wish to organise its deliberations;
    (d) any other general information (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 223A).

[Insert name of witness] has just used a [insert type of explanatory material] to help to explain his/her evidence. This was used for convenience, and is not evidence in the case.

You must therefore not base your decisions in this case on the [insert type of explanatory material]. Your decision must be based solely on the evidence that has been given in court.

2.2.2 Charge: Transcripts of Evidence and Addresses

You are about to be given a transcript of [insert description]. I am giving this to you in order to help you remember the evidence that was given in court. The transcript itself is not evidence.

You may note that some of the pages are [missing/blank]. Those pages contain a transcript of legal matters discussed in your absence. You do not need to concern yourselves about those matters, as I explained to you earlier.

Do not regard the transcript as infallible. Sometimes the transcribers make mistakes or cannot hear what the witness has said. Counsel and I have checked the transcript for mistakes, but we can be mistaken too. The evidence is what you say it is – not the transcriber or counsel or me. If you see something in the transcript which you regard as wrong, then it is your recollection of what the witness said that is decisive, not the written words on the transcript.

It is important that you consider not only what was said, but how it was said. Your assessment of the witnesses themselves, and not just the words they said, may be of assistance in determining the facts in this case.

The transcript should be kept in the jury room when you are not in court. At the end of the trial you will need to return it to my tipstaff.

2.2.3 Charge: Transcripts of Taped Evidence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

You are about to be given a transcript of the [tape/video] you are about to [hear/see]. I am giving this to you to help you follow the [tape/video] as it is played. The [tape/video] is the only evidence. The transcript is just an aid. It is not evidence.

If what you read in the transcript differs from what you [hear/see] on the [tape/video], you are to use what you [hear/see] on the [tape/video] not what is in the transcript. So if the words you hear are different from those you read in the transcript, or if the speakers you [hear/see] are different from those identified in the transcript, it is for you to decide who was speaking and what was said.

In considering the tape evidence, it is important that you consider not only what is said, but how it is said. Listen carefully to the way the witnesses speak. Your assessment of the witnesses themselves, and not just the words they say, may be of assistance in determining the facts in this case.

2.3 Other Procedures for Taking Evidence

Overview

1. This chapter address the following areas, each of which involve taking evidence from witnesses in certain circumstances:
    - 2.3.1 Alternative Arrangements. These are procedures designed to reduce the stress of giving evidence on particular witnesses in certain types of proceedings (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 Part 8.2, Division 4);
    - 2.3.2 Protected Witnesses. These are procedures designed to prevent the accused from personally cross-examining certain witnesses (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 Part 8.2, Division 3);
    - 2.3.3 Pre-recorded Evidence. These are procedures which allow evidence that has been pre-recorded to be used in certain legal proceedings (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 Part 8.2, Divisions 5 and 6)
    - 2.3.4 Witness Support Dog. This discusses the availability of a witness support dog, and a direction that may be given to explain the presence of the support dog to the jury.
2. When interpreting and applying these procedures, the court must have regard to the guiding principles outlined in Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 338.

2.3.1 Alternative Arrangements

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

When Can Alternative Arrangements Be Made?

1. While ordinarily witnesses must give evidence in the courtroom in accordance with normal court procedures, the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 provides that alternative arrangements can be made if the proceedings relate (wholly or partly) to:
    - A "sexual offence"; or
    - An offence where the conduct constituting the offence consists of "family violence" within the meaning of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008;
    - An offence against section 17(1) or 19 of the Summary Offences Act 1966 (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 ss 359, 360).
2. A direction requiring the use of alternative arrangements may be made on the application of a party or on the court's own motion (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 337(1)).

What is a "Sexual Offence"?

3. A "sexual offence" is defined as:

(a) an offence against–

(i) a provision of Subdivision (8A), (8B), (8C), (8D), (8E), (8F) or (8FA) of Division 1 of Part I of the Crimes Act 1958; or

(ii) section 327(2) (failure to disclose a sexual offence committed against a child under the age of 16 years) of the Crimes Act 1958; or

(iii) section 5(1), 6(1), 7(1), 8(1), 9(1) or 11(1) of the Sex Work Act 1994;

(b) an offence an element of which involves-

(i) any person engaging in sexual activity; or

(ii) any person taking part in a sexual act; or

(iii) commercial sexual services; or

(iv) a sexual performance involving a child;

(c) an offence an element of which involves-

(i) an intention that any of the conduct referred to in paragraph (b) is to occur; or

(ii) soliciting, procuring, enabling or threatening any of the conduct referred to in paragraph (b); or

(iii) inducing or knowingly allowing a child to enter or remain on premises so that any of the conduct referred to in paragraph (b) may occur;

(d) an offence an element of which involves child abuse material;

(e) an offence an element of which involves indecency;

(f) an offence of attempting to commit, or of incitement or conspiracy to commit, an offence referred to in paragraph (a), (b), (c), (d) or (e);

(g) an offence against section 49C(2) (failure by person in authority to protect child from sexual offence) of the Crimes Act 1958 as in force before the commencement of section 16 of the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Act 2016 (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 4).

4. An offence against the Sex Work Act 1994 that is not listed in section 4(1)(a)(iiii) is not a sexual offence for the purpose of the Criminal Procedure Act 2009.

What is a "Family Violence" Offence?

5. Under the Family Violence Protection Act 2008, "family violence" is defined as:

- Behaviour towards a "family member"[37] that:
    - Is physically or sexually abusive;
    - Is emotionally or psychologically abusive;[38]
    - Is economically abusive;[39]
    - Is threatening;
    - Is coercive;
    - In any other way controls or dominates the family member and causes the family member to fear for the safety or wellbeing of the family member or another person; or
- Behaviour that causes a child to hear or witness, or otherwise be exposed to the effects of, the abovementioned behaviour (Family Violence Protection Act 2008 s 5(1)).

6. The definition of "family violence" explicitly includes the following kinds of behaviour:
    - Assaulting or causing personal injury to a family member, or threatening to do so;
    - Sexually assaulting a family member or engaging in other forms of sexually coercive behaviour, or threatening to do so;
    - Intentionally damaging a family member's property, or threatening to do so;
    - Unlawfully depriving a family member of his or her liberty, or threatening to do so;
    - Causing or threatening to cause the death of, or injury to, an animal so as to control, dominate or coerce the family member (Family Violence Protection Act 2008 s 5(2)).
7. Behaviour may constitute family violence even if it would not constitute a criminal offence (Family Violence Protection Act 2008 s 5(3)).

Types of Alternative Arrangements

8. Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 360 provides a non-exhaustive list of alternative arrangements that may be made in relation to any witness (including the complainant) who gives evidence in a proceeding that relates (wholly or partly) to a sexual offence or a family violence offence. These include:
    - Permitting the evidence to be given from a place other than the courtroom by means of technology such as closed-circuit television;
    - Using screens to remove the accused from the witness's direct line of vision;
    - Permitting a person chosen by the witness and approved by the court to be beside the witness while he or she is giving evidence, for the purpose of providing emotional support ("emotional support person");

[37] The definition of a "family member" under the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 is broad, and includes current and former partners and their children, other relatives and former relatives, and people who are reasonably regarded as being like a family member, having regard to the circumstances of the relationship. See Family Violence Protection Act 2008 ss 8–10 for further information.

[38] See Family Violence Protection Act 2008 s 7 for the meaning of "emotional or psychological abuse".

[39] See Family Violence Protection Act 2008 s 6 for the meaning of "economic abuse".

- Allowing only specified people to be present when the witness is giving evidence;
- Requiring legal practitioners not to robe;
- Requiring legal practitioners to be seated while examining or cross-examining the witness.

9. If evidence is given from a place other than the courtroom, the court must direct that the evidence be recorded (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 362).

Requirement to Use Alternative Arrangements for Complainants

10. In proceedings that relate (wholly or partly) to a sexual offence or a family violence offence, the court must direct that the complainant's evidence be given from a place other than the courtroom, unless:
    - The prosecution applies for the complainant to give evidence in the courtroom;
    - The court is satisfied that the complainant is aware of his or her right to give evidence from another place; and
    - The court is satisfied that the complainant is able and wishes to give evidence in the courtroom (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 363).
11. If the court allows the complainant to give evidence in the courtroom, it must direct that a screen be used to remove the accused from the complainant's direct line of vision, unless it is satisfied that the complainant is aware of the right to use a screen and does not wish to do so (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 364).
12. Regardless of the location from which the complainant gives evidence, the court must direct that he or she be permitted to have an emotional support person beside him or her when giving evidence, unless it is satisfied that the complainant is aware of the right to have an emotional support person with him or her, and he or she does not want such a person to be present (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 365).
13. Where the complainant is a child or has a cognitive impairment, his or her evidence must be pre-recorded at a special hearing, unless the court directs otherwise (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 ss 369–370).[40] The alternative arrangement provisions continue to apply to such complainants to the extent that they are relevant.

Jury Directions

14. Following the commencement of the Jury Directions and Other Acts Amendment Act 2017 on 1 October 2017, the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 no longer specifies any jury directions that are necessary when alternative arrangements are used.
15. The statutory jury directions in relation to alternative arrangements were repealed on the basis that mandatory directions were unnecessary because the special hearing procedure was commonplace, and to reduce the risk that a direction about the need to treat special hearing evidence the same way as other evidence would operate perversely by prompting jurors to treat special hearing evidence as unusual (Jury Directions and Other Acts Amendment Bill 2017 Explanatory Memorandum, clause 13).

2.3.1.1 Charge: Alternative Arrangements

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge may be given the first time an alternative arrangement is made. For subsequent witnesses, 2.3.1.2 Charge: Alternative Arrangement (Short Charge) may be used instead.

Before the next witness, NOW, gives evidence, there is a matter I must mention to you. [Describe alternative arrangements, e.g. "NOW will give evidence from a different location, using closed-circuit television" or "A screen has been put in place".]

These arrangements are made routinely in cases like this. As a matter of law, you must not draw any inference adverse to the accused from the fact that these arrangements have been made, and you must not give NOW's evidence any greater or lesser weight because of the use of these arrangements. You must treat his/her evidence in exactly the same way that you treat the evidence of any other witness in these proceedings.

2.3.1.2 Charge: Alternative Arrangements (Short Charge)

This charge may be used if the judge has previously directed the jury about alternative arrangements. When alternative arrangements are made for the first time, 2.3.1.1 Charge: Alternative Arrangements should be used instead.

Certain alternative arrangements have been made for the next witness. You will remember the directions I have previously given you in relation to such arrangements. I remind you that they are a routine practice and you must not draw any inference adverse to the accused or give NOW's evidence any greater or lesser weight because of the use of these arrangements.

2.3.2 Protected Witnesses

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Who is a "Protected Witness"?

1. The "protected witness" provisions of the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 apply to proceedings that relate (wholly or partly) to a charge for:
    - A "sexual offence"; [41] or
    - An offence where the conduct constituting the offence consists of "family violence" within the meaning of the Family Violence Protection Act 2008 (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 353).[42]
2. In such proceedings, the following people are "protected witnesses":
    - The complainant;

- A family member[43] of either the complainant or the accused; or
- Any other witness whom the court declares under s 355 to be a protected witness (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 354).

Cross-Examination of Protected Witnesses

3. A protected witness must not be personally cross-examined by the accused (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 356).
4. Where a protected witness gives evidence, and the accused is not legally represented, the court must inform the jury that the accused is not permitted to personally cross-examine the witness (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 357(1)(a)).
5. If an unrepresented accused obtains, or is provided with, legal representation for the purpose of cross-examining a protected witness, the judge must warn the jury:
    - That this is routine practice;
    - That no adverse inference may be drawn against the accused as a result of the cross-examination not being conducted by the accused in person; and
    - That the evidence given under cross-examination is not to be given any greater or lesser weight as a result of the cross-examination not being conducted by the accused personally (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 358).
6. These directions under sections 357 or 358 do not depend on a party making a request (compare Jury Directions Act 2015 Part 3).
7. As a matter of prudence, the accused should not be offered representation in the presence of the jury. Such matters should be resolved prior to the commencement of the trial.

2.3.2.1 Charge: Protected Witnesses

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

As you are aware, throughout this trial NOA has elected to conduct his/her own defence. While the law allows him/her to do this, it places some limits on what s/he may do. In particular, it does not permit him/her to personally cross-examine certain witnesses, including the next witness.

This does not mean this witness may not be cross-examined. It simply means that if NOA wishes to cross-examine this witnesses, the cross-examination must be conducted by defence counsel chosen by the accused or provided by the court.

[If the accused has obtained or been provided with defence counsel, add the following shaded section:]

In this case, [insert name of defence counsel] will be conducting NOW's cross-examination on NOA's behalf. This is routine practice in cases such as this.

As a matter of law, you must not draw any inference adverse to the accused from the fact that NOA is not conducting the cross-examination personally, and you must not give NOW's evidence any greater or lesser weight. You must treat his/her evidence in exactly the same way that you treat the evidence of any other witness in these proceedings.

[If the accused has not obtained or been provided with defence counsel, add the following shaded section:]

In this case, NOA has elected not to have NOW cross-examined by defence counsel, so you will only be hearing his/her evidence-in-chief.

2.3.3 Pre-Recorded Evidence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. While ordinarily witnesses must give their evidence at the time of the relevant legal proceeding, the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 specifies three circumstances in which pre-recorded evidence may be used:

   i) Division 5 of Part 8.2 allows the evidence-in-chief of certain witnesses to be given in the form of an audio or audiovisual recording of the witness answering questions put to him or her by a prescribed person (the "VARE procedure");

   ii) Division 6 of Part 8.2 allows the examination-in-chief, cross-examination and re-examination of certain witnesses to be given in the form of an audiovisual recording made at a special hearing (the "special hearing procedure").

   iii) Division 7 of Part 8.2 allows a court in proceedings for a sexual offence to use a recording of the complainant's evidence in a new trial, appeal or another proceeding (the "previous trial evidence procedure").

   These procedures are addressed in turn below.

The VARE Procedure

2. The VARE procedure may be used in criminal proceedings other than committal proceedings, that relate (wholly or partly) to a charge for:

   (a) A sexual offence;[44] or

   (b) An indictable offence which involves assault, injury or threat of injury (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 366(1). See also R v Davis [2007] VSCA 276);

   (d) Offences against sections 23 or 24 of the Summary Offences Act 1966 if those offences are related to an offence specified in paragraph (a), or (b) above.

3. In such proceedings, a prosecution witness's evidence-in-chief may be given by way of an audio or audiovisual recording which consists of the witness answering questions put to him or her by a prescribed person (a "VARE") in the following circumstances:

   - If the witness was under 18 when the recording was made; or
   - If the witness suffered from a cognitive impairment when the recording was made (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 ss 366(2), 367, 368(2)).

4. A VARE is admissible as the witness' evidence-in-chief. It should not be admitted as an exhibit (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 368; R v Lewis [2002] VSCA 200; R v BAH (2002) 5 VR 517). However, it should generally be marked for identification (see Gately v R (2007) 232 CLR 208).

5. Objections to leading questions in examination in chief must be applied with caution to leading questions during a VARE. The VARE is produced in a different context from the trial itself (SLJ v R (2013) 39 VR 514).

Indictable Offence Involving Assault, Injury or Threat of Injury

6. One of the circumstances in which the VARE procedure may be used is where the proceeding relates to a charge for an indictable offence which involves assault, injury or threat of injury (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 366(1)(b)).

7. The word "injury" in s 366(1)(b) includes mental harm (R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596).

8. In determining whether an offence falls within this category, the judge must look to the elements of the offence, as the elements apply in the particular case (Saenz v R [2011] VSCA 154; R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596).

9. As the elements of the offence of stalking (Crimes Act 1958 s 21A) involve injury or threat of injury, s 366(1)(b) applies to that offence (R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596).

10. The elements of kidnapping can be committed by force or fraud. Where the elements are committed by force, the offence will involve an assault, injury or threat or injury and the VARE procedure applies. The same result may not follow where the offence is committed by fraud (Saenz v R [2011] VSCA 154).

11. At the proceeding, the witness must:

    - Identify himself or herself and attest to the truthfulness of what he or she said on the recording;[45] and
    - Be available for cross-examination (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 368(1)(c)).

12. If the witness fails to attest to the truthfulness of the recording, the evidence may only be admitted if counsel for the defence does not object (R v LRG (2006) 16 VR 89).

13. The witness does not need to remember the matters which are the subject of the recording. The requirement that he or she attest to the truthfulness of the contents of the recording is satisfied if the witness is able to depose at trial that what he or she said would have been a truthful account of his or her recollections at the time the recording was made (R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596).

14. The judge may order at any time during the trial that the jury be provided with transcript of audiovisual recordings of evidence (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 223(1)(j); R v Welstead [1996] 1 Cr App R 59). See 2.2 Providing Documents to the Jury for information on the provision of transcripts.

[45] The witness should be asked whether his or her statements on the recording are truthful, rather than being asked whether the recording is truthful. The later question may mean no more than that the tape accurately recorded his or her statements. This question must be asked in language able to be understood by the witness (R v LRG (2006) 16 VR 89).

15. This may empower the judge to permit the jury to take a VARE transcript into the jury room. However, the leading authorities caution strongly against doing this, on the basis that there is no safeguard against the jury giving the transcribed evidence disproportionate weight (R v BAH (2002) 5 VR 517; R v Welstead [1996] 1 Cr App R 59).

16. These authorities were decided at a time when it was unusual for judges provide the trial transcript to the jury (compare Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 223(1)(ha)). It is now common for Victorian judges to provide the transcript. In cases where the jury has transcript of all, or substantially all the evidence in the trial, there may be no reason to exclude the VARE transcript from the jury room.

Replaying the VARE

17. Juries often ask to be allowed to view a VARE again during their deliberations. In responding to such a request, the judge has an overriding duty to ensure a fair trial (R v BAH (2002) 5 VR 517).

18. In such cases, the judge may choose to replay the tape in the courtroom, or to read relevant passages to the jury from the transcript or from his or her notes (R v BAH (2002) 5 VR 517).

19. In determining how to exercise this discretion, the judge should discuss the matter with counsel. If necessary, the judge may ask questions of the jury to identify the reason they wish to review the tape. Such questions should not intrude on the content of the jury's deliberations (R v BAH (2002) 5 VR 517; R v H [1999] 2 Qd R 283).

20. If the jury only require a reminder of what the witness said, it will usually be preferable to remind them of the relevant evidence by reading from the transcript. In contrast, if the jury seeks a reminder of how the witness said something, that may indicate a need to view the VARE again (R v Rawlings; R v Broadbent [1995] 1 WLR 178).

21. Like any other request to be reminded about the evidence, requests for VARE should be dealt with in open court. The relevant evidence should either be read out in court, or the tape should be played in the courtroom (R v BAH (2002) 5 VR 517; R v Lyne [2003] VSCA 118).

22. Previously, judges did not permit the jury to replay a VARE in the jury room. The authorities doubted that judges had power to permit this, and considered that if judges did have this power, it would rarely be proper to exercise the discretion in this way. This was because of the risk of the jury giving the evidence disproportionate weight in contrast to other evidence, and the perception that this may prejudice the accused (R v BAH (2002) 5 VR 517; R v Lyne [2003] VSCA 118; R v Lewis [2002] VSCA 200).

23. Since these cases were decided, the law has been changed to expressly permit the judge to order at any time during the trial that the jury be provided with audio or audiovisual recordings of evidence (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 223(1)(i)).

24. This appears to give the judge a discretion to allow the jury to play a VARE in the jury room, overcoming any limitations of the repealed s 19 of the Crimes (Criminal Trials) Act 1999 (see R v BAH (2002) 5 VR 517; R v Lyne [2003] VSCA 118*).*

25. If this statutory change permits judges to allow the jury to play a VARE in the jury room, it may also broaden the circumstances where this is a proper exercise of discretion. However that discretion must continue to be exercised with regard to the requirements of fairness and balance (see R v BAH (2002) 5 VR 517; R v Lyne [2003] VSCA 118*).*

Jury Directions and Comments

26. As a VARE stands as the evidence-in-chief of a witness, it is not appropriate to tell the jury that such evidence is in any way inferior to evidence given in the courtroom (R v MTP [2002] VSCA 81; Clarke v R [2013] VSCA 206).

27. If a VARE is replayed to the jury, or given to the jury to replay in the jury room, the judge should usually:

    - Remind the jury that what they are viewing is only part of the witness's evidence, and that they are viewing it a second or subsequent time and well after all the other evidence;

- Warn the jury that they must not give the evidence disproportionate weight, and must consider the other evidence in the case (R v BAH (2002) 5 VR 517; R v H [1999] 2 Qd R 283; R v MAG [2005] VSCA 47); and
- Ask the jury if they also wish to hear the rest of the witness's evidence replayed or consider providing the jury with the Division 6 (special hearing) recording.

28. This warning must be given with the authority of the judge's office. It is not sufficient for the judge to simply make a comment that there is other evidence that the jury may wish to consider (R v Lyne [2003] VSCA 118).
29. If a VARE is replayed, or given to the jury to replay in the jury room, the judge may also need to remind the jury of the witness's cross-examination, if not also replayed or provided to them, and of any weaknesses that have been identified in his or her evidence. This is not mandatory, and should be based on the jury's needs and the principle of a fair trial (R v BAH (2002) 5 VR 517; R v H [1999] 2 Qd R 283).

The Special Hearing Procedure

30. In a criminal trial that relates (wholly or partly) to a charge for a sexual offence,[46] the evidence of a complainant who was a child or who had a cognitive impairment when proceedings were commenced must be given at a special hearing, unless the court directs otherwise (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 ss 369, 370).[47]
31. A special hearing may be held before or during the trial. At a special hearing, the whole of the complainant's evidence must be recorded. Where the special hearing is held before the trial, the complainant's evidence must be presented in the form of that recording (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 370).
32. On the application of the prosecution, the court may direct that a special hearing not be held, and that the complainant give direct testimony in the proceeding, if it is satisfied that:
    - The complainant is aware of his or her right to have his or her evidence taken and recorded at a special hearing; and
    - The complainant is able and wishes to give direct testimony in the proceeding (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 370(2)).
33. During a special hearing, the complainant's evidence is to be given by closed-circuit television, and no person except those authorised by the court may be present in the same room as the complainant when his or her evidence is being given. In the case of a special hearing held during a trial, the jury must be present in the courtroom (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 372).
34. The court must direct that the complainant be permitted to have an emotional support person beside him or her when giving evidence, unless it is satisfied that the complainant is aware of the right to have an emotional support person with him or her, and he or she does not want such a person to be present (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 365).
35. The court may also direct the use of other alternative arrangements in the special hearing (e.g. requiring legal practitioners not to robe) (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 360). See 2.3.1 Alternative Arrangements for further information.

[47] Proceedings commence when the charge–sheet for the offence charged, or a related offence, is filed or signed, or when the Director of Public Prosecutions files a direct indictment (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 5).

36. A VARE may be used as the witness's evidence-in-chief in a special hearing (see "The VARE Procedure" above).

37. A recording of a special hearing held before the trial is admissible as the witness' evidence. It should not be admitted as an exhibit (R v Gately (2007) 232 CLR 208).

Replaying a Special Hearing Tape

38. A request by the jury to be reminded of the contents of a special hearing tape should ordinarily be dealt with in the same manner as other requests to be reminded about the evidence given in the trial (R v Gately (2007) 232 CLR 208). See also 3.15 Charge: Concluding Remarks and 2.2 Providing Documents to the Jury.

39. Historically, courts have held that it is not appropriate to provide audio visual recordings to the jury to watch in the jury room. Rather, judges were expected to either read out the relevant evidence, or to play the relevant parts of the recording in open court (see, e.g. Gately v The Queen (2007) 232 CLR 208).

40. With the advent of the CPA 2009 s 223(1)(i), there is a statutory basis for the court to provide the jury with audio or audio-visual recordings of evidence.

41. While the judge must be careful that the provision of material is consistent with a fair trial, there is no longer a prohibition on providing recordings for the jury to watch in the jury room. Instead, the judge can ensure a fair trial by providing recordings along with a direction reminding the jury that the recordings are only part of the case, that the jury must decide the case on all the evidence (see Carson v The Queen [2019] VSCA 317, [105]–[113]. C.f. R v BAH (2002) 5 VR 517; R v Lyne [2003] VSCA 118; R v Lewis [2002] VSCA 200).

Jury Directions and Comments

42. Following the commencement of the Jury Directions and Other Acts Amendment Act 2017 on 1 October 2017, the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 no longer specifies any jury directions that are necessary when a special hearing recording is played.

43. In some cases, including if a recording is given to the jury in the jury room, it may be necessary to warn the jury when they are watching the recording for a second or subsequent time that they must also consider other evidence in the case or other considerations raised by the accused (R v Gately (2007) 232 CLR 208).

44. Prior to the repeal of CPA 2009 s 375 (which had specified directions that judges needed to give about special hearing recordings), the Court of Appeal had held that a judge must not give any directions which are inconsistent with section 375. It was therefore inappropriate to give general direction about the need for caution when assessing evidence given on a VARE or a special hearing (Clarke v R [2013] VSCA 206).

45. CPA 2009 s 375 was repealed on the basis that the mandatory directions were unnecessary because the special hearing procedure was commonplace, and to reduce the risk that a direction about the need to treat special hearing evidence the same way as other evidence would operate perversely by prompting jurors to treat special hearing evidence as unusual (Jury Directions and Other Acts Amendment Bill 2017 Explanatory Memorandum, clause 13).

Previous Trial Evidence Procedure

46. In a criminal proceeding that relates (wholly or partly) to a charge for a sexual offence,[48] the evidence of a complainant who did not give evidence at a special hearing may be given through a recording of the complainant's evidence at a previous trial (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 ss 378, 379).
47. The court may allow a complainant's evidence to be given using a previous trial recording if it is in the interests of justice to do so, having regard to:
    (a) whether the complainant's recorded evidence is complete, including cross-examination and re-examination;
    (b) the effect of editing any inadmissible evidence from the recording;
    (c) the availability or willingness of the complainant to give further evidence;
    (d) whether the accused would be unfairly disadvantaged by the admission of the recording;
    (e) any other matter that the court considers relevant.
48. Following the commencement of the Jury Directions and Other Acts Amendment Act 2017 on 1 October 2017, the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 no longer specifies any jury directions that are necessary when a previous trial recording is used.
49. For more information on a previous trial recording, see the Victorian Criminal Proceedings Manual.

2.3.3.1 Charge: Playing a VARE

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

The evidence of the next witness, NOW, is going to be given in a slightly different manner from usual. First, you are going to see an audiovisual recording of him/her answering questions. That recording is considered to be part of his/her evidence. NOW will then confirm the truthfulness of that evidence and answer any additional questions the prosecution may have. Defence counsel will then have the opportunity to cross-examine NOW.

When confirming the truthfulness of the recording, and being cross-examined, [*describe alternative arrangements, e.*g. "NOW will not be present in the courtroom. His/her evidence will be given from a different location, using closed-circuit television" or "A screen will be in place"].

These arrangements are made routinely in cases like this. As a matter of law, you must not draw any inference adverse to the accused from the fact that these arrangements have been made, and you must not give NOW's evidence any greater or lesser weight because of the use of these arrangements. You must treat his/her evidence in exactly the same way that you treat the evidence of any other witness in these proceedings.

You are about to see [part of] the recording of NOW's evidence-in-chief again. When you watch this recording, you must keep in mind the fact that this is the second time that you are seeing this particular evidence, that you are seeing it after all the other evidence has been given in this case, and that it is only part of NOW's evidence.

In light of these factors, I must warn you to be careful not to give this part of NOW's evidence any greater weight than you give to any of the other evidence in this case. It is merely one part of the evidence, and you are required to consider all of the evidence when making your decision.

[If the jury needs to be reminded of the weaknesses of the evidence, add the following shaded section:]

In particular, you must consider [summarise relevant matters for consideration, such as the cross-examination of the witness or any weaknesses that have been identified in the evidence].

The evidence of the complainant, NOC, has been pre-recorded at what is called a "special hearing". This is a routine practice in cases where the complainant [is under the age of 18/has a cognitive impairment]. As a matter of law, you must not draw any inference adverse to the accused from the fact that NOC's evidence has been pre-recorded, and you must not give his/her evidence any greater or lesser weight. You must treat NOC's evidence in exactly the same way that you treat the evidence of any other witness in these proceedings.

2.3.4 Witness Support Dog

Click here for a Word version of this document

1. The Office of Public Prosecutions has a Witness Support Dog Program. Under the program, witnesses can ask for a trained support dog to accompany them while giving evidence from the remote witness facility or the courtroom.
2. The support dog usually lies calmly next to the witness giving evidence and the witness holds the dog's lead.
3. Support dogs provide comfort to vulnerable witnesses when waiting for court and while giving evidence.
4. The support dog only accompanies the witness with the Court's permission. The dog will usually lie on a mat while the witness is giving evidence and is out of view of the camera in the remote witness facility. If the witness is giving evidence physically in the courtroom, the dog will lie beside the witness out of view of the jury.
5. When a witness with a support dog is giving evidence physically in the courtroom, some judges ask the jury to leave the courtroom as the dog is brought in and out so the jury does not see the dog. However, this practice may not be necessary or practical if the witness is giving evidence over an extended period, with multiple breaks.
6. Feedback on the use of the support dog indicates that the dog helps witnesses give evidence with less stress, to stay focussed and give evidence with fewer breaks.
7. It is recommended that judges only allow dogs trained at schools accredited by Assistance Dogs International to provide support to witnesses giving evidence. This will help to reduce the risk of the dog behaving inappropriately or being a distraction to the proceedings.

2.3.4.1 Charge: Witness Support Dog

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge is designed for those cases where the judge believes the jury should be informed about the Witness Support Dog. It will not be necessary in all cases, as the dog usually lies out of view of the camera while the witness is giving evidence from the remote facility or out of view of the jury if the witness is giving evidence from the witness stand.

This charge may be modified for use where the judge decides to give the direction after the witness has given evidence.

Members of the jury, the next witness, NOW, will give evidence while accompanied by a support dog.

Some witnesses are allowed to use a support dog to help reduce the stress of giving evidence. The dog is not a pet, but is a trained support animal.

When you come to assess NOW's evidence, you should not take [his/her] use of a support dog into account. Do not give [his/her] evidence more or less weight because [he/she] had a support dog. Treat NOW the same as any other witness.

2.4 Unavailable Witnesses

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. This topic addresses the need for a direction in running where hearsay evidence is led from a witness who is unavailable to give evidence. For general information on directions relating to hearsay evidence, see 4.14 Previous Representations (Hearsay, Recent Complaint and Prior Statements).
2. Evidence Act 2008 s 65 sets out a series of exceptions to the hearsay rule that apply when the person who made the previous representation is not available to give evidence. These exceptions include:
    - Where the statement was made in circumstances where there are sufficient indicators of reliability (see Evidence Act 2008 ss 65(2)(b)–(d));
    - where evidence is led of a previous representation made in the course of giving evidence in a proceeding where the accused cross-examined the witness who became unavailable, or had a reasonable opportunity to do so (Evidence Act 2008 s 65(3)).
3. Evidence Act 2008 Dictionary, clause 4, specifies when a person is not available to give evidence about a fact. The circumstances listed include where the person is dead, not competent to give the evidence, or, despite all reasonable steps, the party seeking to call the witness has not been able to find or compel the person to give evidence.
4. Evidence of statements made in other proceedings can be adduced by producing an authenticated transcript or recording of the witness giving evidence (Evidence Act 2008 s 65(6)).
5. These exceptions may allow the prosecution to lead the evidence in the form of the witness' statement to police, evidence given at committal hearings and evidence on voir dire (see, e.g. Clarke v R [2017] VSCA 115; Luna v R [2016] VSCA 10; Fletcher v R (2015) 45 VR 634; Bray v R (2014) 46 VR 623. See also see Criminal Procedure Act 2009 ss 112, 130).
6. Where the prosecution seeks to lead evidence from the committal hearing, the witness' police statement will generally stand as the witness' evidence in chief at the committal hearing (Luna v R [2016] VSCA 10).

7. As a matter of practice, a witness' police statement is introduced by the prosecutor reading the relevant parts of the statement to the jury and not by tendering the statement as an exhibit. During this process, the prosecutor's reading of the statement should form part of the trial transcript which is given to the jury at the end of the trial.
8. At present, evidence given at committal hearings is audio recorded only. When the audio recording is played, the jury may be given a transcript of the recording, in the same way that a jury may be given a transcript when listening to other audio-recorded evidence. See 2.2 Providing Documents to the Jury and 2.2.3 Charge: Transcripts of Taped Evidence for information and directions about providing transcripts of audio-recorded evidence to the jury.
9. Where a party proposes to lead evidence from a witness who is not available to give evidence, it is appropriate for the judge to briefly explain the reason the evidence is being led in that manner.
10. At the end of the trial, a party may seek a direction that such evidence may be unreliable (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 31, 32). Directions at the end of the trial may also be necessary to address any risk of unfair prejudice arising from the reliance on the witness' previous statements (Bray v R (2014) 46 VR 623; DPP v BB & QN (2010) 29 VR 110).
11. Where unreliability directions are sought in relation to hearsay evidence from an unavailable witness, it may be appropriate to inform the jury of:
    - The disadvantages flowing from being unable to observe the witness giving evidence;
    - The disadvantages flowing from being unable to observe the witness being cross-examined;
    - The differences between cross-examination at committal and at trial;
    - The inability of defence counsel to put any newly discovered issues to the witness (see Luna v R [2016] VSCA 10, [46]).

2.4.1 Charge: Unavailable Witness

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This direction is designed for use in cases where the evidence of an unavailable witness is led by reading the witness' statement to the jury and then playing a recording of the witness being cross-examined at the committal hearing. It may be adapted for other circumstances.

The next evidence you will hear is going to be given in a slightly different manner than usual. The next witness, NOW, is not available to give evidence to you in person. Instead, you will receive [his/her] evidence in two parts.

First, the prosecutor will give you and will read out NOW's witness statement. This is a statement that NOW made to the police.

Then, you will hear a recording of NOW being cross-examined at the committal hearing. A committal hearing is a hearing before a magistrate to determine if the case should go to a jury.

At the end of the trial, I will tell you if there are any special principles you need to apply to this evidence. However, for the moment, you should treat the evidence the same way you treat the evidence from any other witness who gives evidence in person.

[If the judge considers it necessary to do so in the circumstances of the trial, add the following direction instructing the jury not to speculate on why NOW is unavailable.]

I also direct you, as a matter of law, do not speculate about the reason why NOW is not available to give evidence in person. The law allows evidence to be given in this form for many reasons, including where a person has died, or has a serious medical condition, or is overseas and cannot be reached.

2.5 Witness Invoking Evidence Act 2008 s 128

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. Evidence Act 2008 s 128 governs the exercise of the privilege against self-incrimination by witnesses. The section provides that:
    - a witness may object to giving evidence on the basis that the answer may tend to prove that the witness committed an offence or is liable to a civil penalty;
    - the court must determine whether there are reasonable grounds for the objection;
    - where the court finds there are reasonable grounds, it must inform the witness that the witness need not give evidence unless required to do so by the court, and that if the witness gives evidence either willingly or as required by the court, then the court will issue a s 128 certificate and the effect of a s 128 certificate
    - evidence covered by a s 128 certificate and evidence obtained as a direct or indirect consequence of such evidence cannot be used against the witness, except in proceedings regarding the falsity of the evidence (Evidence Act 2008 s 128)
2. A s 128 certificate is different from an indemnity from prosecution. Witnesses who receive a certificate can still be prosecuted for offences disclosed during their evidence. The certificate merely provides use and derivative use immunity in respect of the witness' evidence, except in proceedings regarding the falsity of the evidence (Spence v R [2016] VSCA 113, [68]).
3. A judge should correct erroneous statements made by parties about the effect of a s 128 certificate, such as a suggestion that the certificate means the witness is immune from prosecution, or could give false evidence with impunity (Trudigan v WA (2006) 33 WAR 163, [29]–[30]).

Procedure

4. Where it appears to the court that a witness may have the right to claim the privilege against self-incrimination, the judge must satisfy him or herself, in the absence of the jury, that the witness is aware of that right (Evidence Act 2008 s 132).
5. Witnesses who may have the right to claim the privilege against self-incrimination may need independent legal advice to decide whether to exercise that right, whether to volunteer answers under the protection of a s 128 certificate and matters that may be relevant to whether the court should compel an answer in the interests of justice.
6. As a matter of practice, where the issue of self-incrimination arises, the court will need to consider what steps should take place in the presence of the jury and what should occur in the absence of the jury.
7. It is not permissible to draw an adverse inference against a witness from the witness' claim of the privilege against self-incrimination (R v Roberts (2004) 9 VR 295, [83]).
8. It may therefore be appropriate in some cases to identify in the jury's absence whether the witness will raise the privilege and whether to grant a s 128 certificate. However, there is no absolute rule that claiming and determining the privilege must occur in the jury's absence.

Relevance of a s 128 certificate

9. The mere grant of a certificate does not automatically put the witness into a special category where the defence can say that the witness' evidence is unreliable (Spence v R [2016] VSCA 113, [85]).

10. However, there are cases where it is necessary to inform the jury of the fact that evidence was given under a certificate, as the grant of a certificate may affect the witness' credibility. Whether the existence of a certificate will require a direction on unreliability will necessarily depend on the facts of the case (Spence v R [2016] VSCA 113, [85]–[87]).

11. Where the jury are informed of a s 128 certificate, the judge should explain the effect of the certificate and explain that the certificate does not provide immunity from prosecution, or allow the witness to lie with impunity because the certificate does not protect against perjury (Spence v R [2016] VSCA 113, [88]).

2.5.1 Charge: Witness Invoking Evidence Act 2008 s 128 Jury Information

Click here for a Word version of this document for adaptation

This direction should only be given where, because of particular features of the case, the jury have been informed that a witness' evidence is covered by a s 128 certificate.

Members of the jury, you have heard references to the fact that NOW gave evidence 'under a certificate'. I need to explain this legal shorthand to you.

The law says that a witness may object to giving evidence on the basis that the evidence may incriminate them. That is, a witness may object to giving evidence which may tend to prove they have committed a crime.

To protect this important right, but also to allow juries to hear important evidence, the law has struck a balance.

If the judge thinks there was a reasonable basis for the witness' objection, then judge can issue a certificate which protects the witness from having [his/her] evidence used against [him/her] in other proceedings. In this case, I gave NOW this certificate. This meant that NOW could give evidence to you without needing to worry about having [his/her] evidence used against [him/her].

There are two limitations to a certificate which I must tell you about. First, the certificate does not prevent the witness' evidence being used where the witness is charged with giving untrue evidence. So if it could be proved that NOW lied to you, [he/she] could be charged with perjury, and the certificate would not protect [him/her] in that circumstance.

Second, the certificate does not render [him/her] immune from prosecution. NOW could still be charged with [identify relevant crime], if the prosecution has independent evidence. The certificate only prevents the prosecution from using the evidence [he/she] gave in this case, and any evidence discovered as a result of [his/her] answers, in later proceedings.

The certificate does not mean the witness is telling the truth or was accurate. It is for you to decide whether NOW told you the truth and was accurate. You will make your decision based on all of the evidence and the matters each party has raised about NOW's credibility and reliability.

[If a warning about the witness' potential unreliability is required, add it here. See Charge: Unreliable Evidence. But see Spence v R [2016] VSCA 113, [85]–[87] on the limited circumstances in which the grant of a certificate will itself justify an unreliability warning.]

2.5.2 Charge: Explanation of Evidence Act 2008 to a Witness

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This script may be adapted where a judge becomes aware that a witness may have grounds for making an objection under Evidence Act 2008 s 128 and needs to explain the effect of that section. The court must satisfy itself that the witness is aware of the effect of Evidence Act 2008 s 128 in the absence of the jury: Evidence Act 2008 s 132.

NOW, I have sent the jury out because the law requires me to ensure that you are aware of your rights to object to giving evidence.

The [prosecution/defence] will soon be asking you questions about [identify relevant topic].

The law says that you may object to answering these questions on the ground that your answers may tend to prove that you have committed an offence.

If you do not object to those questions on this basis, then the trial will proceed and you must answer the questions.

If you object to answering, then I will need to decide whether there are reasonable grounds for your objection. I will do this in the absence of the jury.

If I find that you do not have reasonable grounds for objecting, then I will override the objection and you will need to answer the question.

If I find that you have reasonable grounds for objecting, I will uphold the objection. At that point, I will need to consider what kind of offence you may have committed. If it is an offence in another country, then that is the end of the matter – You will not need to give evidence on that topic.

However, if it is an offence against the law of Australia, then you will not need to give the evidence unless I require you to do so. If you do give the evidence, either voluntarily or because I require you to, the court will issue an Evidence Act certificate.

An Evidence Act certificate has the effect that your answers given in this proceeding cannot be used in other proceedings and no evidence can be led which is obtained as a direct or indirect consequence of your evidence today, except in proceedings where you are charged with giving false evidence. In other words, a certificate means that your answers today cannot be used against you, unless you give false evidence.

I said a moment ago that if I uphold your objection, then you not need to give the evidence unless I require you to do so. The law allows me to find that, even though you have reasonable grounds for objecting to answering a question because it may show you have committed an offence, the interests of justice require me to insist that you give evidence. If we get to that point, then I will hear what the prosecution and defence have to say about the need for your evidence, and what you have to say about what the interests of justice require.

I'm now going to ask you some questions so that I can satisfy myself that you understand your right to object, and you understand what a certificate to protect your answers does.

[The judge will then ask the witness whether he or she understands this explanation. The judge may use closed or open questions. If the judge chooses to use open-ended questions, the following sample questions may be adapted:

- Do you understand that you can object to answering questions because the answers may show that you committed an offence?
- If you do object on this basis, what will happen?
- If I uphold your objection, but you end up giving evidence anyway, what can the prosecution do with your answers?
- If you object to giving evidence, I give you a certificate and you give false evidence, what can the prosecution do?]

[Once the witness has confirmed that he or she understands the objection and certificate process, the judge will need to decide whether to have the witness questioned on voir dire to discover if the witness will raise an objection, or whether the objection should be made in the presence of the jury.]

3 Final Directions

3.1 Directions under Jury Directions Act 2015

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. The Jury Directions Act 2015 codifies the law on:
    - obligation of parties to request directions;
    - the content of directions on matters including post-offence conduct, other misconduct evidence, unreliable evidence, identification evidence, delay and forensic disadvantage, failure to give or call witnesses, delay and credibility and family violence;
    - the judge's obligations when summing up;
    - the meaning of proof beyond reasonable doubt.
2. This topic focuses on the request for direction process.

Guiding Principles

3. The Jury Directions Act 2015 contains the following guiding principles:
    - the role of a jury is to determine the issues that are in dispute between the prosecution and the accused;
    - in recent decades, the law of jury directions in criminal trials has become increasingly complex;
    - as jury directions have become complex, technical and lengthy, it has been increasingly difficult for trial judges to comply with the law and has been increasingly difficult for jurors to understand and apply directions;
    - research indicates that jurors find complex, technical and lengthy directions difficult to follow;
    - it is the responsibility of the trial judge to determine the matters in issue, the directions that should be given and the content of the directions; and
    - one of the responsibilities of legal practitioners appearing in a criminal trial is to assist the judge to determine the matters in issue, the directions that should be given and the content of the directions (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 5).
4. The Act states that it is Parliament's intention that when giving directions, the judge should:

    (a) give directions on only so much of the law as the jury needs to know to determine the issues in the trial; and

    (b) avoid using technical legal language whenever possible; and

    (c) be as clear, brief, simple and comprehensible as possible (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 5(4)).
5. The Act also states that it is to be applied and interpreted having regard to the guiding principles (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 5).

Requests for Directions

6. Part 3 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 creates a process for parties to request directions, and sets out the consequences of a party requesting or failing to request a direction.

7. The purpose of Part 3 is to assist the judge to identify the matters in issue between the parties, the directions that should be given and the content of those directions and ensure that legal practitioners discharge their duty to assist the trial judge to determine those matters (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 9).

8. Part 3 also sets out how the judge determines what directions to give if the accused is not represented by a legal practitioner.

9. The Act does not prevent judges giving directions which are consistent with the Act which the judge considers necessary before the close of the evidence. However, in deciding whether to give a direction in running, the judge must have regard to the submissions of the parties (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 10).

Directions Request Process

10. Part 3 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 sets out a process for judges to ask prosecution and defence counsel about the issues in the case at the end of the trial. It is good practice for trial judges to discuss these matters early in the trial, and use the process required under the Jury Directions Act 2015 to identify any changes in the position of the parties.

11. After the close of the evidence and before closing addresses, the prosecution must inform the trial judge whether it considers the following matters are open and whether it relies on them:

    (a) any alternative offence, including an element of any alternative offence;

    (b) any alternative basis of complicity in the commission of the offence charged and any alternative offence.

12. Once the prosecution has provided this information to the trial judge, defence counsel must inform the trial judge whether or not the following matters are in issue:

    (a) each element of the offences charged;

    (b) any defences;

    (c) any alternative offences and the elements of any alternative offences;

    (d) any alternative bases of complicity for the offences charged or any available alternative offences (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 11).

13. While s 11 provides that parties must identify available alternative offences in issue after the close of the evidence, defence counsel may be under an obligation to identify necessary alternative charges earlier in proceedings. This obligation arises where the defence believes the alternative is necessary to ensure a fair trial, and it is clear that the prosecution has rejected the availability of those alternatives (Chaarani & Ors v The Queen (2020) 61 VR 353, [89]).

14. After prosecution and defence counsel set out the matters that are or are not in issue, the prosecution and defence counsel must ask that the judge give or not give particular directions about:

    (a) the matters in issue; and

    (b) the evidence in the trial relevant to the matters in issue (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 12).

15. The judge will usually seek requests for directions before final addresses and give the parties an opportunity to make further requests after final directions and after the judge's charge.

16. Vague terms such as "the directions given in the previous trial" or "delay, impact on credibility" should be avoided in favour of clear identification of any directions sought (Horton v R [2015] VSCA 319, [34] (Redlich JA)).

17. The judge must give the jury any directions that are requested, unless there are good reasons for not doing so. The Act specifies that in determining whether there are good reasons for not giving a direction, the judge must consider:

(a) the evidence in the trial;

(b) the manner in which the parties have conducted their cases, including whether the direction raises a matter not relied on by the accused and whether the direction would involve the jury considering the issues in a manner different from the way the accused presented his or her case (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 14).

18. Subject to a residual obligation, the trial judge must not give the jury a direction which has not been requested (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 15).

19. Parties are under an obligation to request the directions they believe should be given. The fact that a judge has given a preliminary indication that a certain direction is not necessary, even in strong terms, does not relieve a party of that obligation. In that situation, parties are expected to attempt, "politely but firmly" to persuade the judge that the direction should be given (Pyliotis v The Queen [2020] VSCA 134, [85]).

20. Under the Jury Directions Act 2013, the equivalent to section 15 only removed the obligation on a judge to give directions which were not requested. Under the 2015 Act, "the trial judge must not give the jury a direction that has not been requested under section 12" (emphasis added). Under the new provision, judges may only give directions which are general directions (and hence not subject to a request), requested directions, or directions under the residual obligation. There is no power for judges to give directions outside these three categories on a discretionary or prudential basis.

Residual Obligation to Give Directions Not Requested

21. As the trial judge has the responsibility to determine the matters in issue, the directions that are required and the content of the directions, the judge has a residual obligation to give a direction if there are substantial and compelling reasons for doing so, even though the direction has not been sought (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 16).

22. Reasons will not be substantial and compelling "unless they are of considerable importance and strongly persuasive in the context of the issues in the trial" (Gul v R [2017] VSCA 153, [48]).

23. One situation in which there will be substantial and compelling reasons is where the judge considers that the failure to seek the direction is due to incompetence (Gul v R [2017] VSCA 153, [48] (Ashley and Priest JJA)).

24. Prior to the commencement of the Jury Directions Act 2015, the residual obligation required judges to give a direction where it was necessary to avoid a substantial miscarriage of justice. This test was modified by the 2015 Act to remove the requirement for trial judges to predict how the Court of Appeal may deal with the issue (Explanatory Memorandum, Jury Directions Bill 2015). This new test applies to all trials that commence on or after 29 June 2014.

25. Where a judge considers that a direction is necessary under the residual obligation, he or she must inform the parties that he or she is considering giving the direction and invite submissions about the direction and whether there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving the direction (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 16).

26. The residual obligation sets a higher threshold for when a direction is necessary than the common law obligation from R v Miletic that the judge give "any direction that is necessary and practical, in the circumstances of the case, to avoid a perceptible risk of miscarriage of justice" (R v Miletic [1997] 1 VR 593).

27. While the old residual obligation used the same language as the criminal appeal provisions, it did not adopt the jurisprudence that had arisen under Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 276. The appeals test invites attention to the strength of the evidence and the impact of the jury's verdict. Such considerations are inappropriate as a test for whether a direction is necessary at trial (Xypolitos v R (2014) 44 VR 423).

28. Under the 2013 Act, the residual obligation was a test of necessity, which was narrower than the common law test. Under the 2013 Act, the judge was required to consider whether there would, not might, be a substantial miscarriage of justice in the absence of the direction. In Xypolitos v R, the Court of Appeal held that this:

> [R]equires a state of affirmative satisfaction by the trial judge that the direction is of such central importance to one or more issues in the trial that, if the accused is convicted, a failure to give the direction will have occasioned a miscarriage of justice. If the circumstances, considered objectively, did not require such a conclusion, the failure to give the direction would not have amounted to an error in the trial. The trial judge, applying formulations such as that of Barwick CJ in R v Storey, must be satisfied that in the absence of the direction, the appellant will have lost a 'real chance of acquittal', or that had the direction been given 'a reasonable jury might well have acquitted.' (see also Tukuafu v R [2014] VSCA 345, [91]; Horton v R [2015] VSCA 319 (Redlich JA)).

29. In most cases, the obligation to identify the directions required and the issues in dispute falls on counsel (Xypolitos v R (2014) 44 VR 423; Horton v R [2015] VSCA 319 (Redlich JA)).

30. The new terms of the residual obligation are more stringent than under the 2013 Act, and the above extract from Xypolitos must be read in that light (Keogh v R [2018] VSCA 145, [76]; Dunn v R [2017] VSCA 371, [82]).

31. The residual obligation operates in the context of the trial as it has been conducted by the parties. The judge must consider the issues in the case (as identified in accordance with ss 11 and 12 of the Jury Directions Act 2015), the forensic decisions of counsel and the way the defence has sought to answer the charge (Gul v R [2017] VSCA 153, [48]–[49]. See also Dunn v R [2017] VSCA 95, [22]; Keogh v R [2018] VSCA 145, [77]; Arico v R [2018] VSCA 135, [132]–[133] (Maxwell ACJ and Weinberg JA)).

32. The potential for a direction to be detrimental to the defence case, either generally or on some charges, can exclude the possibility that there are substantial and compelling reasons to give a direction that was not requested (The Queen v Falzon [2018] HCA 29, [48]. See also Keogh v R [2018] VSCA 145, [80]–[82]).

33. Subject to the residual obligation, the Jury Directions Act 2015 expressly abolishes the common law requirement to direct on defences or alternative offences open on the evidence which have not been identified as reasonably open during the trial. The judge is also not required to direct on alternative bases of complicity which have not been identified as reasonably open during the trial (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 17).

Part 3, the Common Law and Matters Not Raised

34. At common law, a judge had a duty to leave alternative offences to the jury, depending on the evidence and the nature of the offences. See 3.10 Alternative Verdicts.

35. It was also an error to withdraw an element from the jury's consideration, even if it was not contested by the accused. However, where an element was not in issue in the trial, and the evidence itself did not raise an issue as to the existence of that element, it was not necessary for the judge to direct the jury about that element (Huynh & Ors v R [2013] HCA 6; R v VN (2006) 15 VR 113; Griffiths v R (1994) 125 ALR 545; R v Simon [2010] VSCA 66).

36. At common law, if there was evidence that disclosed the possibility of a defence, the judge was also required to instruct the jury that about that defence (Fingleton v R (2005) 227 CLR 166; Zecevic v DPP (1987) 162 CLR 645; Pemble v R (1971) 124 CLR 107; R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135).

37. This obligation applied even if the judge considered the evidence about a particular defence was weak or tenuous. The judge was required to direct the jury about a defence if there was evidence on which a reasonable jury could decide the issue favourably to the accused (R v Kear [1997] 2 VR 555; R v Youssef (1990) 50 A Crim R 1; Zecevic v DPP (1987) 162 CLR 645).

38. Under Part 3 of the Jury Directions Act 2015, the prosecution must indicate whether alternative offences or alternative forms of complicity are relied upon and defence counsel must indicate whether each element of the offence is in issue and whether any defences, alternative offences or alternative bases of complicity are in issue. A judge does not need to direct a jury on matters that are not in issue, subject to the residual obligation to give directions where there are substantial and compelling reasons to do so (see Gul v R [2017] VSCA 153, [39]–[40]).

39. In addition, the Act recognises that the manner in which the parties have conducted their case is relevant to deciding if there are good reasons for not giving a direction which has been requested (see Gul v R [2017] VSCA 153, [39]–[40]).

40. In Parker v The King [2024] VSCA 72, the Court of Appeal considered the situation which arises where it is the trial judge that proposes that certain elements are not in issue and proposes a direction to explain that to the jury. Even though defence counsel accepted the judge's analysis and proposed direction, the Court of Appeal held that this was not a statement that the elements were not in issue under s 11 (at [123] per Whelan JA) or a request under s 12 for the direction proposed by the judge (at [4]–[5] per Niall and Boyce JJA and [124], [131(2)] per Whelan JA). In any event, the Court concluded that the proposed direction was wrong, and so should not have been given (at [7] per Niall and Boyce JJA and [129] per Whelan JA). This suggests that when judges are too interventionist in the Part 3 conversation process, statements by counsel will not be treated as operative under Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 11 or 12 and so may not be capable of narrowing the scope of matters in issue.[49]

Exceptions to Request for Directions Process

41. The request for directions process does not apply to "general directions" or directions the judge must give or must not give under the provisions of the Jury Directions Act 2015 or another Act (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 10).

42. "General directions" are defined as "directions concerning matters relating to the conduct of trials generally". The Act contains an inclusive list of general directions which includes:

    (a) the role of the trial judge, the jury and counsel;

    (b) the empanelment of a jury and the selection of a foreperson;

    (c) trial procedure;

    (d) the need to decide issues on the basis of admissible evidence only;

    (e) the need to decide each charge separately according to the evidence relating to that charge;

    (f) the assessment of witnesses;

    (g) the presumption of innocence and the burden and standard of proof, including what must be proved beyond reasonable doubt;

    (h) the drawing of conclusions and the distinction between direct and circumstantial evidence;

    (i) jury deliberations and verdicts.

43. Within this Charge Book, the directions contained in Part 1: Preliminary Directions and Part 3: Final Directions (other than Chapter 3.8) are treated as general directions. The obligation to give such directions is unaffected by Part 3 of the Jury Directions Act 2015.

[49] Niall and Boyce JJA also doubted that a direction which removed an element could be a request for "particular directions in respect of the matters in issue" under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 12(a), stating:

> "[a] direction that had the effect of removing a matter in issue, is not easily seen as being a direction in relation to a matter in issue" (at [6]).

44. Section 10(b) provides that Part 3 of the Act does not apply to directions the judge must give or must not give under the Jury Directions Act or any other Act. In this Charge Book, at least part of the following directions must be given under an Act and so the Part 3 process does not apply:

    - 2.3.2 Protected Witnesses;
    - 3.9 Judge's Summing Up on Evidence and Issues;
    - 4.6 Incriminating Conduct (Post Offence Lies and Conduct).

Obligation to Correct Prohibited Statements or Suggestions

45. The trial judge must correct any statement or suggestion by the prosecutor, defence counsel or an unrepresented accused that is prohibited by the Act. The judge must also correct a statement or suggestion prohibited by the Act that is in a question from the jury. This obligation does not depend on any request for directions. However, the judge need not correct a statement or suggestion if there are good reasons for not doing so, such as where the prosecutor or defence counsel corrects their own misstatement (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 7).

46. Provisions of the Jury Directions Act 2015 which prohibit certain statements or suggestions include:

    - section 33 – Prohibitions on certain statements concerning child witnesses
    - section 42 – Prohibitions on certain statements regarding the accused's failure to give or call evidence
    - section 51 – Prohibitions on certain statements regarding complainants in sexual offence cases.

Self-Represented Accused

47. Where the accused is not represented, the trial judge must comply with the request for directions process as if the accused has stated that all matters are in issue and had requested all directions which it would have been open to request, if the accused had been represented by a legal practitioner (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 13).

48. Despite the general rule that the judge must treat the accused as having requested all directions open, the judge need not give a direction if he or she considers that there are good reasons for not giving the direction or if it is otherwise not in the interests of justice to give the direction (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 13(2)).

Application to hearings not involving a jury

49. The following parts of the Jury Directions Act 2015 apply to the court's reasoning in certain hearings that do not involve a jury:

    (a) a summary hearing under the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 that commenced on or after 1 October 2017.

    (b) a committal proceeding under the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 when the committal hearing commenced on or after 1 October 2017.

    (c) a case stated under the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 or Part 5.4 of the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005, when the hearing from which the question of law arose commenced on or after 1 October 2017.

    (d) an appeal under the Criminal Procedure Act 2009, Part 5.4 of the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005, or ss 24AA or 38ZE of the Crimes (Mental Impairment and Unfitness to be Tried) Act 1997, when the appeal commenced on or after 1 October 2017.

(e) a special hearing under Division 3 of Part 5A of the Crimes (Mental Impairment and Unfitness to be Tried) Act 1997, when the special hearing commenced on or after 1 October 2017 (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 4A).

(f) a trial by judge alone (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 420ZG).

50. In these hearings, the court's reasoning with respect to any matter in relation to which Parts 4 (Evidentiary directions), 5 (Sexual offences), 6 (Family violence), and 7 (General directions) of the Jury Directions Act 2015 makes provision:

(a) must be consistent with how a jury would be directed in accordance with the Act; and

(b) must not accept, rely on or adopt a statement or suggestion that the Act prohibits a trial judge from making, or a direction that the Act prohibits a trial judge from giving (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 4A(2)).

51. These provisions do not require a party in a summary hearing to file an incriminating conduct notice before relying on that type of evidence (DPP v Dyke [2020] VSC 300, [13]–[17]).

3.2 Overview of Final Directions

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. The fundamental task of a judge is to ensure a fair trial of the accused (RPS v R (2000) 199 CLR 620; Crofts v R (1996) 186 CLR 427).

2. The requirement for a fair trial requires the judge to instruct the jury about so much of the law as they need to know in order to dispose of the issues in the case. In most cases, this will require the judge to:

    1. Give instructions about the burden and standard of proof, the respective roles of the judge and jury, and the elements of the relevant offences and defences;

    2. Succinctly and accurately identify the issues in the case and relate the law to those issues;

    3. Refer to how the prosecution and defence have put their cases, without needing to summarise the closing addresses;

    4. Identify so much of the evidence as is required to help the jury determine the issues in the trial; and

    5. Give the jury any warnings about how it may reason, or about particular kinds of evidence, as is required in the case (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 65; RPS v R (2000) 199 CLR 620; R v Coombes 16/4/1999 CA Vic. See also R v Zorad (1990) 19 NSWLR 91; R v Lawrence [1982] AC 510).

3. Regardless of the way in which judges approach their role, they must ensure that they tailor their charge to the case before them. The charge should be custom built to make the jury understand their task in the case. It must not merely formulaically adopt the principles of law set out in the charge book, which are intended as a guide only (R v Zilm (2006) 14 VR 11; R v Coombes 16/4/1999 CA Vic; R v Anderson [1996] 2 VR 663; R v Lawrence [1982] AC 510).

4. The summing-up should not address issues of law which are not raised by the particular case, nor should it be a complete statement of the law in relation to the crime charged. It should also not address every piece of evidence given in the trial. The judge should only address as much of the law and evidence as is necessary to guide them to a decision on the real issues that arise in the case (R v VN (2006) 15 VR 113; R v Zilm (2006) 14 VR 11; Fingleton v R (2005) 227 CLR 166; R v Chai (2002) 187 ALR 436; RPS v R (2000) 199 CLR 620; Alford v Magee (1952) 85 CLR 437).

5. The identification of issues and any necessary evidentiary directions is informed by the statutory conversation required under Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 11–12.

6. As a matter of practice, the judge should consider the jury's attention span in structuring the charge. It is undesirable to give directions on important issues when the jury may be losing concentration. Similarly, if the final directions are interrupted by a weekend or longer adjournment, it may be necessary to remind the jury of key matters when the directions resume.
7. When a party raises an issue with the directions, the judge will need to decide whether any redirection is needed to clarify the issue for the jury. If the redirection is responding to earlier, erroneous, directions, the judge should explicitly tell the jury that the earlier directions were wrong. It is not sufficient to give the jury corrected directions without also telling the jury to disregard the earlier directions, as that produces a situation where the jury has conflicting and confusing directions (Ritchie v The Queen [2019] VSCA 202, [130]).
8. See 3.9 Judge's Summing Up on Evidence and Issues for further information concerning the judge's summing-up.

3.2.1 Charge: Overview of Final Directions

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Members of the jury, before you leave the court to consider your verdict, I must give you instructions on the law and the evidence. There are three parts to these instructions.

First, I will remind you of several important principles of law which apply to this case. While I have already told you some of these principles at different times during the trial, it is important that I tell them to you again – not only to remind you of what I said earlier, but also to place those principles in the context of the trial which has now taken place. You must apply these instructions carefully.

Secondly, I will tell you the issues that you need to decide, and will refer you to the evidence that relates to those issues and the arguments from prosecution and defence counsel. In doing this, I will have to be selective. The mere fact that I don't mention certain evidence does not mean that that evidence is not important. Similarly, the fact that I include certain evidence does not make that evidence more important than other evidence. You must consider all of the evidence, not just the parts of it that I mention. Which parts of that evidence are important or not important is a matter for you to determine.

Thirdly, I will explain what verdict[s] you may return in this case, and how you may wish to approach your discussion of the case in the jury room.

Remember, if at any time you have a question about anything I say, you are free to ask me by passing a note to my tipstaff.

3.3 Review of the Role of the Judge and Jury

3.3.1 Charge: Review of the Role of Judge and Jury

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Note: This charge is based on the assumption that the judge has already instructed the jury about the respective roles of the judge and jury at the beginning of the trial (see 1.4.1 Charge: Role of Judge and Jury). If this has not been done, it will need to be modified accordingly.

See 1.4 The Role of Judge and Jury, for a discussion of the legal principles relevant to this area.

Review of the Role of the Jury

In this case, it is alleged by the prosecution that NOA committed the offence[s] of [insert offences].[50] S/he has pleaded "not guilty", and so it is for you, and you alone, to decide whether s/he is guilty or not guilty of [this/these] crime[s].

You do that by deciding what the facts are in this case. As I have told you, you are the only ones in this court who can make a decision about the facts. You make that decision from all of the evidence that has been given during the trial.

You then apply the law to the facts that you have found, and decide whether the accused is guilty or not guilty of the offence[s] charged.

Review of the Role of the Judge

It is my role, as the judge, to explain to you the principles of law that you must apply to make your decision. You must accept and follow all of those directions.

I want to emphasise again that it is not my responsibility to decide this case – that is your role. The verdict that you return has absolutely nothing to do with me. So while you must follow any directions I give you about the law, you are not bound by any comments I may make about the facts.

As I told you at the start of the trial, it is unlikely that I will make any comments about the evidence. If I do make a comment about the evidence, you must not give it any extra weight because I, as the judge, have made that comment. You must disregard any comment I make about the evidence, unless you agree with that view after making own independent assessment of the evidence. That is what I mean when I say that you alone are the judges of the facts in this case.

Review of the Role of Counsel

Throughout the trial, counsel have presented the prosecution and defence cases. While their comments and arguments have been designed to assist you to reach your decision, you also do not need to accept what they have said. Of course, if you agree with an argument they have presented, you can adopt it. But if you do not agree with their view, you must put it aside.

3.4 Review of the Requirement to Decide Solely on the Evidence

3.4.1 Charge: Review of the Need to Decide Solely on the Evidence

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Note: This charge is based on the assumption that the judge has already instructed the jury about the need to base their decision solely on the evidence at the beginning of the trial (see 1.5.1 Charge: Decide Solely on the Evidence). If this has not been done, it will need to be modified accordingly.

See 1.5 Decide Solely on the Evidence, for a discussion of the legal principles relevant to this area.

[50] This charge is drafted for cases involving one accused. If the case involves multiple accused, it will need to be modified accordingly.

Introduction: The Evidence

I have told you that it is your task to determine the facts in this case. In determining the facts, you must consider all of the evidence that you heard from the witness box. Remember, it is the answers the witnesses gave that are the evidence, not the questions they were asked.

You must also take into account the exhibits that were tendered. These include [insert examples]. When you go to the jury room to decide this case, [most of/some of] the exhibits will go with you, where you may examine them. Consider them along with the rest of the evidence and in exactly the same way.[51] [However, the following exhibits will not go with you to the jury room [insert exhibits]].

In addition, in this case the following admissions were made: [insert admissions]. You must accept these admissions as established facts.

Nothing else is evidence in this case. As I have told you, this includes any comments counsel make about the facts.[52] It also includes:

[Identify other relevant matters which do not constitute evidence in the case. See 2.2 Providing Documents to the Jury and associated charges. It may be appropriate to insert charges relating to these matters here.]

Review of the Need to Decide Solely on the Evidence

It your duty to decide this case only on the basis of the witnesses' testimony, [the admissions] and the exhibits. You should consider the evidence which is relevant to a particular matter in its individual parts and as a whole, and come to a decision one way or another about the facts.

As I have told you, in doing this you must ignore all other considerations, such as any feelings of sympathy or prejudice you may have for anyone involved in the case. You should not, for example, be influenced by [insert case specific examples].[53] Such emotions have no part to play in your decision.

[51] Depending on the nature of the evidence, it may be necessary to warn the jury of the possible dangers of conducting experiments in the jury room: see 1.5 Decide Solely on the Evidence for further information.

[52] If the accused is unrepresented, the jury should be told that what s/he said in his/her addresses, or when questioning witnesses, is also not evidence.

[53] Some matters which it may be appropriate to point out (as they could conceivably give rise to prejudice or sympathy) include:

• The nature of the injuries suffered by the complainant;

• The race or ethnicity of the accused or the complainant;

• The sexual orientation of the accused or the complainant;

• The fact that the accused or the complainant are drug users.

In some cases, it may be appropriate to point out that although a party's behaviour does not accord with what the jury might think is morally acceptable, the jury is not a court of morals. Everyone has the right to be treated equally before the law.

Remember, you are the judges of the facts. That means that in relation to all of the issues in this case, you must act like judges. You must dispassionately weigh the evidence logically and with an open mind, not according to your passion or feelings.

Outside Information

At the start of the trial I also told you that you must not base your decision on any information you may have obtained outside this courtroom. For example, you must completely ignore anything that you have seen or heard in the media about this case, or about the people involved in it. You must consider only the evidence that has been presented to you here in court.[54]

3.5 Review of the Assessment of Witnesses

3.5.1 Charge: Review of the Assessment of Witnesses

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Note: This charge is based on the assumption that the judge has already instructed the jury about how to assess witnesses at the beginning of the trial (see 1.6.1 Charge: Assessing Witnesses). If this has not been done, it will need to be modified accordingly.

See 1.6 Assessing Witnesses, for a discussion of the legal principles relevant to this area.

You have now listened to what each witness has said, and watched how they presented their evidence and answered the questions under cross-examination. No further evidence will be given.

To decide what the facts are in this case, you now need to assess this evidence. It is up to you to decide how much or how little of the testimony of any witness you will believe or rely on. You may believe all, some or none of a witness's evidence. No one can tell you how to approach any particular witness's evidence in this regard.

It is also for you to decide what weight should be attached to any particular evidence – that is, the extent to which the evidence helps you to determine the relevant issues.

As I mentioned at the start of the trial, in assessing witnesses' evidence, some matters which may concern you include their credibility and reliability. It is for you to judge whether the witnesses told the truth, and whether they correctly recalled the facts about which they gave evidence. This is something you do all the time in your daily lives. There is no special skill involved – you just need to use your common sense.

While you may take into account the witness's manner when he or she gave evidence, you should be careful when doing so. As I noted at the start of the case, giving evidence in a trial is not common, and may be a stressful experience. People react and appear differently. Witnesses come from different backgrounds, and have different abilities, values and life experiences. There are too many variables to make the manner in which a witness gives evidence the only, or even the most important, factor in your decision.

In making your decision, do not consider only the witnesses' testimony. Also take into account the exhibits [and admissions]. Consider all of the evidence in the case, use what you believe is true and reject what you disbelieve. Give each part of it the importance which you – as the judge of the facts – think it should be given, and then determine what, in your judgment, are the true facts.

[54] If there has been significant publicity about the case or the parties involved, it may be necessary to give a more detailed warning.

[This may be an appropriate point to instruct the jury about any issues relating to particular types of witnesses who have given evidence, such as:

- 4.1 The Accused as a Witness*;*
- 4.2 Child Witnesses*;*
- 4.21 Unreliable Evidence Warning.

It may also be an appropriate point to instruct the jury about any issues relating to particular types of evidence given in the case, such as:

- 4.3 Character Evidence*;*
- 4.5 Confessions and Admissions*;*
- 4.12 Identification Evidence*;*
- 4.13 Opinion Evidence*;*
- 4.14 Previous Representations (Hearsay, Recent Complaint and Prior Statements);
- 4.17 Tendency Evidence;
- 4.18 Coincidence Evidence.]

3.6 Circumstantial Evidence and Inferences[55]

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

What is Circumstantial Evidence?

1. A fact that is in issue can be proved in two ways:

   i) By providing evidence which directly proves that fact, without requiring the jury to draw any inferences ("direct evidence"[56]); or

   ii) By providing evidence of a related fact or facts, from which the jury can infer the existence of the fact in issue ("circumstantial evidence") (Shepherd v The Queen (1990) 170 CLR 573. See also Doney v R (1990) 171 CLR 207; Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593; Myers v DPP [1965] AC 1001; R v Spina [2005] VSCA 319).

2. The distinction between direct and circumstantial evidence does not relate to the nature or content of the evidence given (e.g. whether it is evidence of an event the witness personally saw, rather than evidence of an event they were told about), but to the way in which the evidence is to be used. If it is necessary for the jury to infer a particular fact from the evidence, it will be circumstantial evidence of that fact.[57]

[55] This document was last updated on 21 July 2021.

[56] The term "direct evidence" is also used to refer to testimonial evidence given by a witness of a matter they have personal knowledge about (e.g. which they personally saw or heard). When used in this sense, direct evidence is contrasted with hearsay evidence rather than circumstantial evidence (see Cross on Evidence para 1110).

[57] This is in contrast to the distinction between "direct evidence" and "hearsay evidence", which relates to the nature of the evidence given (see above).

3. The same piece of evidence can therefore be both direct and circumstantial, depending on what it is being used to prove. For example, evidence given by a witness that s/he saw the accused holding a gun could be:

    - Direct evidence that the accused possessed a firearm; and
    - Circumstantial evidence that the accused murdered someone with that firearm.

Use of Circumstantial Evidence

4. In many cases no one will have directly witnessed the facts which the prosecution must prove, and so they will need to rely on circumstantial evidence. In such cases, the ultimate inference which the jury will often be asked to draw is that of the accused's guilt (Shepherd v The Queen (1990) 170 CLR 573).
5. As there is nothing in the law that makes proof by circumstantial evidence unacceptable or suspect of itself (De Gruchy v R (2002) 211 CLR 85), circumstantial evidence can be used to prove the accused's guilt in this way (Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593; Chamberlain v R (No 2) (1984) 153 CLR 521).
6. However, research using mock juries indicates that there is a risk that jurors will consider circumstantial evidence inherently weaker or less reliable than direct evidence. Judges may address this misconception, and may consider using the phrase 'indirect evidence' rather than 'circumstantial evidence' (Simplification of Jury Directions Project, 2012).
7. If circumstantial evidence is relied upon by the prosecution, it may be necessary for the judge to direct the jury that before the accused's guilt can be inferred, it must be the only rational inference that can be drawn from that evidence.

Inferential Reasoning ('Hodge' direction)

8. Where the prosecution case depends upon circumstantial evidence, it is usually necessary to give the following two directions:

    i) To find the accused guilty, his or her guilt must not only be a reasonable inference, it must be the only reasonable inference which can be drawn from the circumstances established by the evidence; and

    ii) If the jury considers that there is any reasonable explanation of those circumstances which is consistent with the innocence of the accused, they must find him or her not guilty (R v Hodge (1838) 2 Lewin 227; Mannella v R [2010] VSCA 357; Knight v R (1992) 175 CLR 495; Shepherd v The Queen (1990) 170 CLR 573; Chamberlain v R (No 2) (1984) 153 CLR 521; Barca v R (1975) 133 CLR 82; Plomp v R (1963) 110 CLR 234; Thomas v R (1960) 102 CLR 584).

9. These directions stem from the general requirement that guilt must be proved beyond reasonable doubt. They simply convey the meaning of "beyond reasonable doubt" in cases involving circumstantial evidence. They do not reflect a separate rule that operates in such cases (R v Kotzmann [1999] 2 VR 123; R v Lancefield [1999] VSCA 176; Knight v R (1992) 175 CLR 495; Shepherd v The Queen (1990) 170 CLR 573; R v Sorby [1986] VR 753; Grant v R (1976) 11 ALR 503).

Reasonable Inference

10. Given the high standard of proof required in criminal trials, it is important that the jury only draws inferences which can be properly deduced from the direct evidence ("reasonable inferences"), rather than making guesses or engaging in speculation (R v McIntyre (2000) 111 A Crim R 211).

11. In determining whether an inference is reasonable, the jury should consider the evidence as a whole. A reasonable inference can be drawn from a combination of facts, none of which viewed alone would support that inference (Chamberlain v R (No 2) (1984) 153 CLR 521; R v Sorby [1986] VR 753; Shepherd v The Queen (1990) 170 CLR 573; R v Hillier (2007) 228 CLR 618; R v Allen [2007] VSCA 97).

12. The jury should therefore not reject one circumstance because, considered alone, no reasonable inference of guilt can be drawn from it. The jury must consider the weight which is to be given to the united force of all the circumstances put together. One piece of evidence may resolve the jury's doubts about another (R v Hillier (2007) 228 CLR 618; R v Allen [2007] VSCA 97; Chamberlain v R (No 2) (1984) 153 CLR 521; Van Beelen; Thomas v R [1972] NZLR 34; Shepherd v The Queen (1990) 170 CLR 573).

"Only" Reasonable Inference

13. The inference drawn by the jury must be the only reasonable inference which can be drawn from the facts (Shepherd v The Queen (1990) 170 CLR 573; Chamberlain v R (No 2) (1984) 153 CLR 521).

14. The existence of a particular fact-in-issue will be the only rational inference to be drawn from circumstantial evidence if:

    - The jury find those circumstances to have been established; and
    - According to the common course of human affairs, there is such a high probability that the occurrence of those circumstances would be accompanied by the existence of that fact-in-issue that the contrary cannot reasonably be supposed (Martin v Osborne (1936) 55 CLR 367; Plomp v R (1963) 110 CLR 234; R v Taouk [2005] NSWCCA 155).

No Other Reasonable Hypothesis

15. When the case against an accused person rests substantially upon circumstantial evidence, the jury cannot return a verdict of guilty unless the circumstances exclude any reasonable hypothesis other than the guilt of the accused (Peacock v R (1911) 13 CLR 619; Barca v R (1975) 133 CLR 82; Chamberlain v R (No 2) (1984) 153 CLR 521; Doney v R (1990) 171 CLR 207; R v Allen [2007] VSCA 97).

16. This is because a reasonable doubt will necessarily arise where any other inference consistent with innocence is reasonably open on the evidence (Shepherd v The Queen (1990) 170 CLR 573; Doney v R (1990) 171 CLR 207).

17. So if the jury finds that an inference or hypothesis consistent with innocence is open on the evidence, they must give the accused the benefit of the doubt necessarily created by that circumstance and acquit him or her (Knight v R (1992) 175 CLR 495).

18. The judge should not invite the jury to determine whether there are any other reasonable conclusions arising from the facts. Such a direction misstates the onus of proof, as it is for the prosecution to exclude all reasonable hypotheses consistent with innocence (Gregg v The Queen [2020] NSWCCA 245, [523]).

19. An alternative hypothesis does not have to be "equally open" or "equally compelling" in order to give rise to a reasonable doubt as to guilt. Such a doubt will arise where any other inference consistent with innocence is reasonably open on the evidence (Mannella v R [2010] VSCA 357).

20. The jury does not have to be able to infer that the event suggested by the innocent hypothesis actually occurred. It is sufficient if there is a reasonable possibility that such an event took place (R v McIntyre (2000) 111 A Crim R 211; R v Gover (2000) 118 A Crim R 8).

21. Even if there is only one circumstance inconsistent with a conclusion of guilt, that may be sufficient to destroy the hypothesis of guilt (Peacock v R (1911) 13 CLR 619; R v Taouk [2005] NSWCCA 155).

22. Where competing inferences arise in a case, it is for the jury to determine whether the inference of guilt arises, and if so whether it completely overcomes all other inferences so as to leave no reasonable doubt in their minds (R v Plomp (1963) 110 CLR 234; Peacock v R (1911) 13 CLR 619).

Must Be A "Reasonable" Hypothesis

23. The jury cannot act upon some fanciful supposition or possibility that cannot reasonably be inferred from the facts proved. The hypothesis must be "reasonable" (R v Clarke (1995) 78 A Crim R 226).

24. A "reasonable hypothesis" must possess some degree of acceptability or credibility. A hypothesis will not be reasonable if it is fanciful, impossible, incredible, not tenable or too remote or tenuous (Bushell v Repatriation Commission (1992) 175 CLR 408; R v Clarke (1995) 78 A Crim R 226).

25. For an inference to be reasonable, it must rely upon something more than mere conjecture. The bare possibility of innocence should not prevent a jury from finding the accused guilty, if the inference of guilt is the only inference reasonably open upon a consideration of all the facts (Peacock v R (1911) 13 CLR 619; Barca v R (1975) 133 CLR 82).

26. The mere existence of a conclusion consistent with innocence therefore will not necessarily mean that the prosecution has failed to establish its case. The existence of that conclusion may be regarded by the jury as of little weight in the circumstances of the case (Chan (1992) 28 NSWLR 421).

27. While a reasonable hypothesis must be based on something more than mere conjecture, there need not be positive evidence supporting that hypothesis. Even in the absence of such evidence, a hypothesis may be reasonable so long as it is consistent with the evidence accepted by the jury (R v McIntyre (2000) 111 A Crim R 211; R v Gover (2000) 118 A Crim R 8).

28. However, it is wrong to tell the jury that they must decide whether they accept the evidence which establishes the hypothesis consistent with innocence. Such a direction reverses the burden of proof. Instead, the prosecution must exclude the hypothesis as a reasonable possibility (Ankur v The Queen [2021] VSCA 110, [30]–[39], [57]).

29. While it is proper for a judge to tell a jury that they must not engage in speculation or make guesses, s/he needs to be careful that such a direction does not detract from the jury's duty to acquit if they cannot exclude all reasonable hypotheses consistent with innocence. Although it will often be a matter of speculation as to whether one of these innocent explanations occurred, there is no speculation involved in considering whether the hypotheses are reasonable possibilities (R v McIntyre (2000) 111 A Crim R 211).

Warning of dangers in drawing inferences ('Hodge' warning)

30. The need for expanded directions on the process of drawing inferences arises because the human mind is apt to jump to conclusions, attaching too much weight to a fact that is really only one part of the case, or being too quickly convinced by an accumulation of detail that is in truth explicable as coincidence or in some other way consistent with innocence (R v Kotzmann [1999] 2 VR 123).

31. In addition, a single circumstance inconsistent with guilt is of more importance than all other circumstances, as it may destroy a hypothesis of guilt (R v Hodge (1838) 2 Lewin 227).

32. While there is little case-law on the need for these directions, the model direction in this Charge Book includes these warnings as part of the expanded direction on circumstantial evidence.

When to give the Charge

33. Whenever circumstantial evidence is relied upon by the prosecution, the judge must consider whether or not the case calls for directions about the need for guilt to be the only rational inference, and the requirement for reasonable hypotheses consistent with innocence to be excluded (Grant v R (1976) 11 ALR 503; R v Sorby [1986] VR 753).

34. Such directions do not need to be given in every case in which the prosecution relies on circumstantial evidence. It is for the trial judge to determine whether they should be given, based on the circumstances of the case and the nature of the summing-up (Shepherd v The Queen (1990) 170 CLR 573; R v Spina [2005] VSCA 319; R v Garth (1990) 49 A Crim R 298; R v Sorby [1986] VR 753; Grant v R (1976) 11 ALR 503; R v Rajakaruna (No 2) (2006) 15 VR 592; R v KDY [2008] VSCA 104).

35. In many, if not most, cases involving substantial circumstantial evidence, it will be helpful to give such directions (R v Kotzmann [1999] 2 VR 123; Shepherd v The Queen (1990) 170 CLR 573; R v Plomp (1963) 110 CLR 234; R v Peacock (1911) 13 CLR 619).

36. These directions should be given if, in a particular case, the jury cannot be expected to understand and apply the rules concerning the onus and standard of proof (R v Sorby [1986] VR 753).

37. If the directions are unnecessary, or are likely to confuse the jury rather than assist them, they should not be given (Grant v R (1976) 11 ALR 503; R v Sorby [1986] VR 753; La Fontaine v R (1976) 136 CLR 62; Shepherd v The Queen (1990) 170 CLR 573).

38. The direction should generally not be given in cases which do not depend on circumstantial evidence, or where the amount of circumstantial evidence involved is slight. In such cases, these directions will put an unnecessary gloss on the explanation of the onus of proof (La Fontaine v R (1976) 136 CLR 62. See also Shepherd v The Queen (1990) 170 CLR 573).

39. There is no obligation to give such directions where the only substantial inference which needs to be drawn is about the accused's state of mind (R v Rogerson (1992) 65 A Crim R 530; R v Tillott (1991) 53 A Crim R 46; R v Shepherd (No 3) (1988) 85 ALR 387; McGreevy v DPP (1973) 57 Cr App R 424. But see R v Knight (1992) 175 CLR 495).

Directing the Jury About Alternative Hypotheses

40. If evidence raises a reasonable possibility that the circumstances pointed to someone other than the accused being guilty of the offence, then a direction about the need to exclude such a possibility beyond reasonable doubt should usually be given (R v Clarke (1995) 78 A Crim R 226).

41. Such a direction should be given even if the evidence is very slight, if it could be interpreted as raising a reasonable possibility of innocence (R v Clarke (1995) 78 A Crim R 226).

42. The failure of the defence to put forward an alternative hypothesis consistent with innocence does not relieve the prosecution of the burden of proving its case to the requisite standard (R v Lancefield [1999] VSCA 176). It is not incumbent on the defence either to establish that some inference other than guilt should reasonably be drawn from the evidence, or to prove particular facts that would tend to support such an inference. If the jury thinks that the evidence as a whole is susceptible of a reasonable alternative explanation, the accused is entitled to be acquitted (Barca v R (1975) 133 CLR 82).

43. However, the judge is only required to direct the jury about the real issues in the case. The defence must indicate the elements or defences that are in issue and the directions required. Unless there are substantial and compelling reasons to do so, the trial judge must not give a direction which is not requested (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 12, 14, 15, 16).

44. It will be a misdirection to direct the jury that a reasonable explanation consistent with innocence must be given by the accused before it can be considered (R v Betancur-Galvis [2003] NSWCCA 333; Druett v R (1994) 123 FLR 249; R v Baartman [2000] NSWCCA 298; Loader v R [2003] NTCCA 10).

Content of the Charge

45. The content of the charge will vary according to the nature of the evidence that the prosecution offers as proof. Directions should be constructed around the central principle that the prosecution must establish guilt beyond reasonable doubt, and should be more or less elaborate according to the risks in the case (R v Sorby [1986] VR 753).

46. In most cases, it will be sufficient simply to tell the jury that the accused's guilt must be established beyond reasonable doubt, and that they must entertain such a doubt where any inference consistent with innocence is reasonably open on the evidence (Shepherd v The Queen (1990) 170 CLR 573).

47. If some cases, however, a more detailed direction may be required. In such cases the judge should explain clearly to the jury that:

    - The prosecution case cannot succeed unless the prosecution has proved all of the elements beyond reasonable doubt;
    - The prosecution case against the accused (on a particular issue) is a circumstantial evidence case;
    - For a circumstantial evidence case to succeed, guilt must not only be a rational inference, but must be the only rational inference that can be drawn from the evidence;
    - A reasonable doubt arises where any inference consistent with innocence is reasonably open on the evidence;
    - In so far as any alternative hypotheses consistent with innocence are open, it is part of the prosecution's burden of proof to refute each and every one of those alternative hypotheses; and
    - They may only draw an inference of guilt if it so overcomes any other possible inferences as to leave no doubt in their minds. Otherwise, they should give the accused the benefit of doubt created by the alternative hypothesis, and acquit (See, e.g., R v Taouk [2005] NSWCCA 155; R v Chen, Siregar & Isman (2002) 130 A Crim R 300; R v Kotzmann (No 2) (2002) 128 A Crim R 479; Wedd v R (2000) 115 A Crim R 205; Pitkin v R (1995) 130 ALR 35; Knight v R (1992) 175 CLR 495).

48. It is proper for a judge to explain to the jury that a reasonable hypothesis consistent with innocence means a reasonable hypothesis having regard to the whole of the evidence, not to each individual item of circumstantial evidence regarded separately (R v Perera [1986] 1 Qd R 211; R v Beble [1979] Qd R 278).

49. Where "fanciful" or "unreal" possibilities have been put to the jury by defence counsel, it is appropriate for the trial judge to redress the balance (see 1.7 Onus and Standard of Proof). In doing so, the judge must be careful not to give a direction which is likely to distract the jury from the simple task of considering whether a hypothesis consistent with innocence is reasonably open on the evidence (R v Lancefield [1999] VSCA 176).

50. A judge must also avoid giving a direction about when a possibility is fanciful or unreal that implies or suggests that the defence case is fanciful or unreal. An example which shows the difference between reasonable hypotheses and guesswork will adequately explain the concept without needing to specifically give an example which involves a fanciful explanation (see Ankur v The Queen [2021] VSCA 110, [59]–[78]).

Base Decision on Established Evidence

51. It is not the evidence presented, but what is accepted of it by the jury which is to be considered in relation to any hypotheses. To justify conviction, the jury must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the evidence they accept is inconsistent with a hypothesis of innocence (Barca v R (1975) 133 CLR 82).

52. The jury should therefore be told that they are not obliged to accept as proved all the circumstances to which the witnesses have testified. It is for them to determine which of the circumstances to accept, and whether those circumstances establish the accused's guilt. As with direct evidence, any circumstantial evidence unacceptable to them may be discarded (R v Van Beelen (1973) 4 SASR 353).

Misdirections

53. The jury should not be told that they must consider the explanation or inference contended for by the prosecution and consider whether it was a reasonable one. This may lead the jury to mistakenly think that they are also required to consider any other possibilities they regard as reasonable, and to weigh them against the prosecution's explanation to see which is preferable. It may also lead the jury to wrongly think that it is their function to see whether the accused has offered an alternative reasonable explanation, and if no alternative reasonable explanation has been offered to convict (R v Lancefield [1999] VSCA 176).

54. The jury should not be led to think they should only take into account a possibility if it exceeds the level of a "mere" possibility. If they have any possibility in mind which gives them cause for retaining doubt about the accused's guilt, they must acquit (R v Lancefield [1999] VSCA 176).

55. The jury should not be told that they must choose between two (or more) inferences which are "equally open". To convict, the jury must be able to reject as rational any inferences which are consistent with innocence (Knight v R (1992) 175 CLR 495; Mannella v R [2010] VSCA 357).

56. The jury should not be told that for an inference to be reasonable it has to be "based on evidence", or based on the evidence they accept. This may lead them to think they cannot consider as reasonable any possibilities suggested by defence counsel, or any other possibilities which occurred to them, unless evidence had been given to support that inference by or on behalf of the accused. This is likely to reverse the onus of proof, or at least to dilute the standard of proof (R v Lancefield [1999] VSCA 176. See also Ankur v The Queen [2021] VSCA 110, [30]–[39], [57]).

Proof of Facts on Which Inferences are Based

57. At common law, prior to 1984, it was widely understood that the prosecution only needed to establish the elements of a crime beyond reasonable doubt. They were not required to prove any other facts to that standard (see, e.g., R v Dickson [1983] 1 VR 227).

58. However, this understanding changed in 1984, when the High Court held that if proof of an element of a crime is to be inferred, the facts relied upon to found the inference must also be proved beyond reasonable doubt (Chamberlain v R (No 2) (1984) 153 CLR 521).

59. Chamberlain was initially interpreted as requiring the jury to be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, of all of the facts upon which they based their inferences (see, e.g., R v Sorby [1986] VR 753; R v Maleckas [1991] 1 VR 363).

60. However, in Shepherd v The Queen (1990) 170 CLR 573 the High Court rejected this interpretation. The Court held that when the majority in Chamberlain had said that facts relied upon as a basis for an inference of guilt must be proved beyond reasonable doubt, they were only referring to intermediate facts which are an indispensable step upon the way to an inference of guilt. Other facts upon which inferences are based need not be proved to that high standard.

61. In reaching this conclusion, the High Court drew a distinction between two different types of circumstantial cases:

    i) Cases in which the accused's guilt is proved by an accumulation of detail ("strands in a cable"); and

    ii) Cases in which the accused's guilt is proved by sequential reasoning ("links in a chain").

62. Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, this approach has been abolished. Unless an Act otherwise provides, the only matters which a judge can direct the jury must be proved beyond reasonable doubt are the elements of the offence charged or an alternative offence and the absence of any relevant defence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 61. See also DPP v Roder [2024] HCA 15, [15]).

63. This applies to all trials commencing on or after 29 June 2015 (Jury Directions Act 2015 s.2).

64. All common law rules which require judges to direct that a matter other than the elements and the absence of any defences must be proved beyond reasonable doubt are abolished (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 62; Beqiri v R [2017] VSCA 112 at [121], [130]; DPP v Roder [2024] HCA 15, [17]). A note to the section states that it abolishes the rule attributed to Shepherd v The Queen (1990) 170 CLR 573 regarding the standard of proof for circumstantial evidence and the rule attributed to R v Sadler (2008) 20 VR 69 regarding the standard of proof for uncharged acts.

65. As a consequence of Jury Directions Act 2015 s 61, counsel should not tell the jury that, as a matter of law, the jury needs to be satisfied of certain, non-elemental, facts beyond reasonable doubt in order to convict. Counsel may, however, make evidentiary arguments that certain factual matters are critical to a conclusion of guilt (Beqiri v R [2017] VSCA 112 at [112]–[120]).

66. In general, the prosecution does not need to prove any fact, or any piece of evidence relied upon to prove an element by inference, beyond reasonable doubt. The jury may properly draw the necessary inference having regard to the whole of the evidence, whether or not each individual piece of evidence relied upon is proved beyond reasonable doubt, as long as they reach their conclusion upon the criminal standard of proof (see Shepherd v The Queen (1990) 170 CLR 573; R v Spina [2005] VSCA 319; Beqiri v R [2017] VSCA 112 at [121], [130]; DPP v Roder [2024] HCA 15, [27]–[31]).

67. It is the function of the jury to determine the weight which should be given to the circumstances relied upon by the prosecution and whether, at the end of the day, the combination of circumstances which they accept are of sufficient strength to prove the guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt (see R v Kotzmann (No 2) (2002) 128 A Crim R 479).

68. Unless an Act otherwise provides, the judge must not direct the jury that they cannot use a fact as a basis for inferring guilt unless that fact is proved beyond reasonable doubt. This applies even if the evidence would, at common law, be treated as a 'link in a chain' or is potentially so significant that, as a matter of prudence, the jury should not act on it unless satisfied beyond reasonable doubt (see Beqiri v R [2017] VSCA 112 at [121], [130] and compare Kotvas v R [2010] VSCA 309; R v LRG (2006) 16 VR 288).

69. Section 61 does not relieve the judge of the obligation to identify the evidence that establishes the elements (see Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 65, 66).

70. In some cases, there will be critical evidence that would allow a jury to decide the case on that evidence alone. Types of evidence that might have this character include confessions, identification evidence and DNA evidence. In such cases, it may be appropriate for the judge to identify clearly for the jury the importance of that evidence to prove the element. Judges should discuss the issue with counsel and hear submissions on what additional directions or comments are appropriate. One option is to refer to the evidence and direct the jury that it must be satisfied that that evidence proves the element beyond reasonable doubt (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 61, Example).

71. Where the judge instructs on the elements in the form of a factual question under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 67, the judge must direct the jury that it must be satisfied of those matters beyond reasonable doubt (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 61, notes).

Timing of the Charge

72. If a direction about circumstantial evidence is given, it does not need to be kept separate and distinct from the direction that the prosecution must prove its case beyond reasonable doubt (see 1.7.1 Charge: Onus and Standard of Proof). The judge may simply elaborate on the general directions (Plomp v R (1963) 110 CLR 234).

73. It may also be desirable to introduce the concept of circumstantial evidence at the beginning of the trial, or when the jury is first asked to draw an inference, to help the jury to understand that:

    - That there need not be direct evidence of every essential element of the offence charged;
    - That the essential elements of the offence may be proved by circumstantial evidence;
    - That circumstantial evidence involves drawing an inference; and

- That circumstantial evidence is perfectly good evidence, not an inferior form of proof (Canadian Judicial Council, Model Jury Instructions in Criminal Matters. See also R v PZG [2007] VSCA 54).

3.6.1 Charge: Circumstantial Evidence and Inferences

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Evidence comes in many forms. It can be evidence about what someone saw or heard. It can be an exhibit admitted into evidence. It can be someone's opinion.

Some evidence can prove a fact directly. For example, if a witness said that s/he saw or heard it raining outside, that would be direct evidence of the fact that it was raining.

Other evidence can prove a fact indirectly. For example, if a witness said that s/he saw someone enter the courthouse wearing a raincoat and carrying an umbrella, both dripping wet, that would be indirect or 'circumstantial' evidence of the fact that it was raining outside. You can conclude from the witness's evidence that it was raining, even though s/he didn't actually see or hear the rain.

As far as the law is concerned, it makes no difference whether evidence is direct or indirect. Although people often believe that indirect or circumstantial evidence is weaker than direct evidence, that is not true. It can be just as strong or even stronger. What matters is how strong or weak the particular evidence is, not whether it is direct or indirect.

However, you must take care when drawing conclusions from indirect evidence. You should consider all of the evidence in the case, and only draw reasonable conclusions based on the evidence that you accept. Do not guess. While we might be willing to act on the basis of guesses in our daily lives, it is not safe to do that in a criminal trial.

In determining whether a conclusion is reasonable, you should look at all of the evidence together. It may help you to consider the pieces of evidence to be like the pieces of a jigsaw puzzle. While one piece may not be very helpful by itself, when all the pieces are put together the picture may become clear.

However, when putting all the pieces together, you must take care not to jump to conclusions. It is sometimes easy for people to be too readily persuaded of a fact, on the basis of insufficient evidence or evidence that turns out to be truly coincidental. Once convinced of that fact, they may then seek support for it in the other evidence, perhaps distorting that evidence to fit their theory or disregarding 'inconvenient' facts. You must make sure that you do not do this. You must keep an open mind, and be prepared to change your views.

You may only convict the accused if you are satisfied that his/her guilt is the only reasonable conclusion to be drawn from the whole of the evidence, both direct and indirect. If there is another reasonable view of the facts which is consistent with the accused's innocence, then the prosecution will not have proved his/her guilt beyond reasonable doubt, and you must acquit him/her.

3.6.2 Charge: Sole Evidence Direction

Click here to obtain a word version of this document

This charge may be used where there is a single piece of evidence relied on to prove one or more elements. This charge may be suitable where the prosecution case is entirely dependent on a confession or an identification.

You will remember my direction the prosecution must prove its case beyond reasonable doubt. In this case, the only evidence that [identify relevant elements or facts in issue] is the evidence that [describe relevant single piece of evidence, e.g. "NOA confessed to NOW"]. You therefore cannot be satisfied that the prosecution has proved its case beyond reasonable doubt unless you are satisfied this evidence proves [identify relevant element] beyond reasonable doubt.

3.7.1 Charge: Conventional Directions

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Note: This charge is based on the assumption that the judge has already instructed the jury about the onus and standard of proof at the beginning of the trial (see 1.7.1 Charge: Onus and Standard of Proof). If this has not been done, it will need to be modified accordingly.

See 1.7 Onus and Standard of Proof, for a discussion of the legal principles relevant to this area.

I want to emphasise again that under our justice system people are presumed to be innocent, unless and until they are proved guilty. So before you may return a verdict of guilty, the prosecution must satisfy you that [each of] the accused is guilty of the charge[s] in question. The accused does/do not have to prove anything.

The prosecution must do this by proving [each of] the accused's guilt of the charge[s] beyond reasonable doubt. As I have told you, these words mean exactly what they say – proof beyond reasonable doubt.

Beyond reasonable doubt is the highest standard of proof that our law demands. It is not enough for the prosecution to prove that the accused is probably guilty, or very likely to be guilty.

As I have told you, it is almost impossible to prove anything with absolute certainty when reconstructing past events and the prosecution does not have to do so. A reasonable doubt is not an imaginary or fanciful doubt, or an unrealistic possibility.

You cannot be satisfied the accused is guilty if you have a reasonable doubt whether the accused is guilty.

As I have told you, these words mean exactly what they say – proof beyond reasonable doubt. The prosecution does not need to prove every fact that they allege to this standard. It is the essential ingredients or "elements" of the charge[s] that they must prove beyond reasonable doubt. I will explain these elements in detail in a moment.

The prosecution must also disprove any possible defences beyond reasonable doubt. In this case, that means the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was not [insert relevant defence]. I will also explain this defence in more detail shortly.

It is only if you are satisfied that the prosecution has proven all of the elements of a charge [and disproved all defences] beyond reasonable doubt that you may find the accused guilty of that charge. If you are not satisfied that the prosecution has done this, your verdict must be "Not Guilty".

3.7.2 Charge: Reverse Onus

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge can be given if there is a matter which the accused is required to prove on the balance of probabilities.

The requirements for this charge were not modified by the commencement of the Evidence Act 2008.

In this case, there is one exception to the general rule that the prosecution must prove the case against the accused beyond reasonable doubt. The law says that in relation to the offence of [insert relevant offence], it is for the accused to prove [insert relevant matter].

I will explain this requirement in more detail shortly. For now, however, I want to emphasise that where it is for the accused to prove a matter, it is not necessary for him/her to do this to the same extent as the prosecution. That is, s/he does not need to prove matters "beyond reasonable doubt".

Instead, the accused only needs to establish matters on what is called the "balance of probabilities". That is, such matters only need to be shown to be more likely than not.

3.7.3 Charge: Liberato Direction

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge should be given if the case turns on a conflict between the evidence of a prosecution witness and a defence witness, and there is a reasonable likelihood that the jury will think that they must believe the defence evidence to be true before they can acquit the accused. See 1.7 Onus and Standard of Proof for further information.

The requirements for this charge were not modified by the commencement of the Evidence Act 2008.

In this case, there is a clear conflict between the evidence of [insert name of prosecution witness] and the evidence of [insert name of defence witness].

It is not necessary for you to accept [insert name of defence witness's] evidence in order to find the accused "not guilty". In keeping with the requirement that the prosecution must prove their case beyond reasonable doubt, you must acquit NOA if [insert name of defence witness's] evidence gives rise to a reasonable doubt.

This is the case even if you prefer the evidence of [insert name of prosecution witness] to the evidence of [insert name of defence witness]. It is not sufficient for you merely to find the prosecution case to be preferable to the defence case. Before you can convict NOA, you must be satisfied that the prosecution have proven their case beyond reasonable doubt.

So even if you do not think [insert name of defence witness] is telling the truth, but are unsure where the truth lies, you must find the accused "not guilty".

In fact, even if you are convinced that [insert name of defence witness's] evidence is not true, it is not the case that you must convict NOA. In such circumstances, you should put [insert name of defence witness's] evidence to one side, and ask yourself whether the prosecution have proved the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt on the basis of the evidence you do accept.

Note: This charge is based on the assumption that the judge has already instructed the jury about the need for separate consideration at the beginning of the trial (see 1.8.1 Charge: Separate Consideration Multiple Accused). If this has not been done, it will need to be modified accordingly.

See 1.8 Separate Consideration, for a discussion of the legal principles relevant to this area.

As you know, in this trial there are really [insert number] trials [all] being heard together for convenience.

I want to remind you that you must be careful not to allow convenience to override justice. The accused and the prosecution are entitled to have the case against each accused considered separately.

You must consider the case against each accused separately, in light only of the evidence which applies to that accused. You must ask yourselves, in relation to each accused, whether the evidence relating to that accused has satisfied you, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he is guilty of the offence s/he has been charged with. If the answer is yes, then you should find him/her guilty. If the answer is no, then you should find him/her not guilty.

You will note that I said you must consider the case against each accused "in light only of the evidence which applies to that accused". This is because some of the evidence you have heard in this case is only relevant to the case against one accused or another. If a particular piece of evidence is only relevant to one accused, you may only use it when deciding whether or not that accused is guilty. You must not consider it in relation to [any of] the other accused.

In this case [instruct jury about which evidence is or is not admissible in relation to each accused].

3.8.2 Charge: Multiple Charges

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Note: This charge is based on the assumption that the judge has already instructed the jury about the need for separate consideration at the beginning of the trial (see 1.8.2 Charge: Separate Consideration Multiple Charges). If this has not been done, it will need to be modified accordingly.

See 1.8 Separate Consideration, for a discussion of the legal principles relevant to this area.

As you know, in this trial the prosecution has brought [insert number] charges against the accused. As I explained earlier, while these are separate matters, they are [all] being dealt with in the one trial for convenience.

I want to remind you that you must be careful not to allow convenience to override justice. Both the prosecution and the accused are entitled to have each charge considered separately.

It would therefore be wrong to say that simply because you find the accused guilty or not guilty of one charge, that s/he must be guilty or not guilty, as the case may be, of another.

[If logic dictates that a finding in relation to one charge is material to another charge, this should be clearly explained to the jury here. For example, the jury should be told if an acquittal on one charge would require an acquittal on another.]

Each charge must be considered separately, in light only of the evidence which applies to it. You must ask yourselves, in relation to each charge, whether the evidence relating to that charge has satisfied you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused is guilty of that particular crime. If the answer is yes, then you should find the accused guilty of that charge. If the answer is no, then you should find the accused not guilty of it.

You will note that I said you must consider each charge "in light only of the evidence which applies to it". This is because some of the evidence you have heard in this case is only relevant to one charge or another. If a particular piece of evidence is only relevant to one charge, you may only use it when deciding whether or not the accused is guilty of that charge. You must not consider it in relation to [any of] the other charge[s].

In this case [instruct jury about which evidence is or is not admissible in relation to each charge].

3.9 Judge's Summing Up on Issues and Evidence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Obligations When Summing Up

1. A judge's charge need not follow any specific pattern. Each charge must be tailored to the particular circumstances of the case (Alford v Magee (1952) 85 CLR 437; Werry v R [2010] VSCA 314; Huynh v R [2013] HCA 6).
2. When summing up, the judge must:
    - Explain only so much of the law as is necessary for the jury to determine the issues in the trial;
    - Refer to the way the parties have put their cases in relation to the issues, but need not summarise the closing addresses;
    - Identify so much of the evidence as he or she considers necessary to assist the jury determine the issues in the trial, but need not give a summary of the evidence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 65).
3. This reflects the judge's obligations at common law when summing up (Harris v The Queen [2021] VSCA 197, [66]).
4. The summing up may use a combination of oral and written components (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 65).
5. The Jury Directions Act 2015 draws a distinction between "referring" to or "identifying" evidence or arguments and "summarising", and removes any obligation to summarise evidence or arguments, or remind the jury of the content of the evidence (Murrell v R [2014] VSCA 334, [14]).
6. While a judge does not need to summarise the evidence, he or she must still give the jury guidance on how the evidence relates to the directions of law (R v RNS [1999] NSWCCA 122; R v Condon (1995) 83 A Crim R 335).
7. Whether the judge is bound to refer to an evidentiary matter or argument depends upon whether a reference to that matter or argument is necessary to ensure that the jurors have a sufficient knowledge and understanding of the evidence to discharge their duty to determine the case according to the evidence (R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135; Domican v R (1992) 173 CLR 555; R v Williams (1999) 104 A Crim R 260; R v Veverka [1978] 1 NSWLR 478).

Identification of issues

8. Based on the matters identified by prosecution and defence counsel as being in issue (see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 11), the judge must decide what are the real issues in the case, tell the jury what those issues are, direct the jury on so much of the law as is necessary to enable the jury to resolve those issues and explain how the law applies to the facts of the case (R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135; R v DD (2007) 19 VR 143; R v Zilm (2006) 14 VR 11; R v AJS (2005) 12 VR 563; R v Chai (2002) 187 ALR 436; R v Anderson [1996] 2 VR 663; Alford v Magee (1952) 85 CLR 437; Murrell v R [2014] VSCA 334).

9. It is not necessary to direct the jury about all elements of every offence charged. The responsibility of the judge is to determine what matters are in issue in the case and explain to the jury only as much of the law as is necessary to resolve those matters (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 65; Huynh v R [2013] HCA 6; R v VN (2006) 15 VR 113; R v Aden and Toulle (2002) 162 A Crim R 1; Holland v R (1993) 67 ALJR 946; Quail v R [2014] VSCA 336).

10. The judge may identify an issue as a factual question, rather than any underlying legal question (Quail v R [2014] VSCA 336). See Integrated Directions and Factual Questions below for more detail.

11. While the judge need not direct the jury about every element, it is erroneous to withdraw an issue from the jury (Griffiths v R (1994) 125 ALR 545; Huynh v R [2013] HCA 6).

12. It is the judge's responsibility to focus the jury's attention on the issues he or she identifies. That responsibility should not be delegated to counsel (R v Amado-Taylor [2000] 2 Cr App R 18).

13. The obligation to identify issues and relevant evidence is limited to the issues or matters that are actually in dispute in the trial (R v RR [2011] NSWCCA 235; Buckley v R [2012] NSWCCA 85).

14. In identifying the issues, there must be evidence to support those issues. In assessing which defences arise, and the factual basis for defences, there must be some evidence on which a reasonable jury could decide the issue favourably to the accused (Quail v R [2014] VSCA 336, [22]).

15. A factual basis for a defence may arise as a matter of inference from other evidence, even where witnesses are asked and deny that particular conclusion (see, e.g. Mathieson v The Queen [2021] VSCA 102, [22]–[26]).

16. The judge should ensure that the issues for decision in the trial are simply but adequately presented to the jury, without unnecessary emphasis on abstract legal concepts or theories. The judge should tell the jury what the prosecution must prove, rather than give the jury a short lecture on the law (R v Whiting [1995] 2 Qd R 199).

17. The Jury Directions Act 2015 allows judges to direct the jury on issues in the form of factual questions which address the elements or defences in issue. See Integrated Directions and Factual Questions below.

Identification of Evidence

18. The judge must identify only so much of the evidence as is necessary to help the jury to determine the issues in the trial. To determine what evidence must be identified, the judge must consider the following matters:

    (a) The facts in issue and the complexity of the facts in issue

    (b) The length of the trial;

    (c) The complexity of the evidence;

    (d) The submissions and addresses of the parties;

    (e) The manner in which the judge refers to the way in which the parties put their cases;

    (f) Any special needs or disadvantages of the jury in understanding or recalling the evidence;

    (g) Any transcript of evidence or other document provided to help the jury understand the evidence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 66).

19. The obligation in s 66 reflects the scope of the common law obligation on trial judges to identify evidence (Harris v The Queen [2021] VSCA 197, [66]).

20. The Act does not draw a distinction between the obligation to identify direct evidence and circumstantial evidence. All evidence, whether direct or circumstantial, which may bear upon the primary or subsidiary issues must be identified. Indeed, the nature of circumstantial evidence may make it more important for a judge to identify how circumstantial evidence relates to the different issues in the case. This will require the judge to identify the factual conclusions which the prosecution must prove, and identify the evidence which the prosecution relies on to establish those factual conclusions. It is not enough to tell the jury to decide the case 'on 'all the evidence' (Murrell v R [2014] VSCA 334, [15]; Harris v The Queen [2021] VSCA 197, [52], [58]).

21. The summing-up must be fair and accurate, and must not usurp the role of the jury as finder of fact. The judge must be careful not to misrepresent the evidence in any way, or use language that may cause the jury to think they are being directed to find the facts in a particular way (Courtney-Smith (No 2) v R (1990) 48 A Crim R 49; R v Hughes (1989) 42 A Crim R 270; R v Perera [1986] 1 Qd R 211; R v Tikos (No 2) [1963] VR 306).

22. There is no absolute rule as to what the judge must address in the charge to ensure a fair trial. What is required will vary according to the circumstances of the case, and factors such as the length of the case, the complexity of the issues and the manner in which the case is conducted by the parties (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 66; Werry v R [2010] VSCA 314; R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135; R v DD (2007) 19 VR 143; R v Yusuf (No 2) [2006] VSCA 117; R v Zilm (2006) 14 VR 11; R v Dao [2005] VSCA 196).

23. The duty to identify the facts relevant to the issues is not confined to the ultimate facts in issue. The judge must also identify any substratum of facts which are in dispute and which bear upon the resolution of the ultimate issues. The evidence which is relevant to those subsidiary issues must also be identified (R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135; Murrell v R [2014] VSCA 334; Harris v The Queen [2021] VSCA 197).

24. The judge does not need to read out all the evidence or to analyse all the conflicts in it. Instead, judges must provide a fair and balanced explanation of the law, the issues and the respective cases of the prosecution and defence (see R v Meher [2004] NSWCCA 355; R v Piazza (1997) 142 FLR 64; R v DH [2000] NSWCCA 360; Mathieson v The Queen [2021] VSCA 102).

25. In discharging the obligation to put the defence case to the jury, the judge must refer to any items of evidence necessary to understand the defence case. It is not sufficient to refer to defence arguments in general terms without identifying the supporting pieces of evidence (El-Jalkh v R [2009] NSWCCA 139; Mencarious v R [2008] NSWCCA 237; R v Piazza (1997) 142 FLR 64; Gurung v The Queen [2019] VSCA 196, [73]–[74]).

26. Where there is a significant dispute about material facts, the judge should succinctly identify the pieces of evidence in conflict, to focus the jury's attention on the issues they have to resolve (R v Amado-Taylor (2000) 2 Cr App R 189; R v Mears (1993) 97 Cr App R 239).

27. Where the evidence is relatively short and the issues clearly drawn, and there is no delay between the giving of the evidence and the judge's charge, a detailed account of the evidence may not be necessary (PA v R [2010] VSCA 85; R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135; R v Yusuf (No.2) [2006] VSCA 117; R v Zilm (2006) 14 VR 11; R v Dao [2005] VSCA 196; R v Amado-Taylor [2000] 2 Cr App R 18).

28. However, in determining whether and to what extent it is necessary to identify evidence, judges should not assume that what a trained and experienced lawyer can recollect will be the same as what each member of the jury, without the same or any similar training, can recollect at the end of a trial. Many jurors do not have the experience, ability or opportunity of a judge to note significant evidence and cross-reference evidence from different sources which relate to the same issue (see Scetrine v R (2010) 28 VR 213; R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135; R v De'Zilwa (2002) 5 VR 408; R v Amado-Taylor [2000] 2 Cr App R 18; Murrell v R [2014] VSCA 334).

Relate Evidence to the Issues in the Case

29. As evidence is given witness by witness, rather than sequentially according to the issues, it is the judge's responsibility to arrange the evidence issue by issue, rather than leaving this task to the jury (R v Amado-Taylor [2000] 2 Cr App R 18).

30. The judge should provide the jury with a collected overview of the evidence that relates to each of the elements of the charged offences that are in issue, and a brief outline of the arguments which have been put in relation to that evidence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 65; R v Hannes (2000) 158 FLR 359; R v Piazza (1997) 94 A Crim R 459; R v Zorad (1990) 19 NSWLR 91. See also Harris v The Queen [2021] VSCA 197).

31. A detailed summary of all of the evidence given by each witness, without reference to prosecution or defence arguments, is not necessary or sufficient. It does not help in isolating the real issues for the jury's determination (R v Hytch (2000) 114 A Crim R 573; Jury Directions Act 2015 s 65).

32. Fairness requires that, if a judge refers to the evidence on a crucial issue, there also be reference to any competing versions and considerations, including any inferences that arise (Cleland v R (1982) 151 CLR 1; Domican v R (1992) 173 CLR 555).

33. Judges should usually avoid illustrating issues in the trial by way of factual examples which bear close resemblance to disputed facts in the case. Such examples might improperly be taken to invite a conclusion adverse to the accused (R v Ivanovic [2005] VSCA 238).

34. It is conventional to warn the jury that, while the judge is going to try to relate the evidence to the issues to assist the jury, it is for the jury, as the judges of the facts, to determine what evidence they think to be significant. Anything which the judge identifies as being significant is neither binding on the jury, nor necessarily accurate (R v Brdarovksi (2006) 166 A Crim R 366; [2006] VSCA 231; R v Yusuf (2005) 11 VR 492; R v De'Zilwa (2002) 5 VR 408).

Cases Involving Multiple Counts

35. In a trial involving multiple counts, as well as giving a separate consideration direction (see 1.8 Separate Consideration), the judge should carefully explain to the jury what evidence relates to which count, and what evidence is inadmissible on each count (T v R (1996) 86 A Crim R 293; R v Mooseek (1991) 56 A Crim R 36).[58]

36. The judge must identify the conduct encompassed by the separate counts. The jury must be under no misapprehension concerning what the prosecution has to establish in order to secure a conviction on any particular count (R v Huver [2005] VSCA 170).

37. In some cases, the judge should direct the jury that if they are not satisfied that a particular ingredient of one count has been proved, that finding will be material to their deliberations in respect of a related count. Whether such a direction is required will depend on the nature of the counts alleged, and the evidence led in support of them (R v Patton [1998] 1 VR 7; R v Anderson [1996] 2 VR 663).

38. The jury should be told if an acquittal on one count would require an acquittal on another (R v Scott (1996) 131 FLR 137; R v Patton [1998] 1 VR 7).

39. In cases involving multiple counts, it may also be necessary to give a warning against tendency reasoning (see 4.17 Tendency Evidence).

[58] If evidence which is admissible on one count is not admissible on another, and in consequence there is a real risk of impermissible prejudice to the accused, the judge may need to consider ordering separate trials (see R v TJB [1998] 4 VR 621; Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 193).

Cases Involving Multiple Accused

40. One problem which a judge has to overcome in joint trials is the risk of prejudice resulting from evidence being allowed in which is not admissible against all of the accused (R v Nessel (1980) 5 A Crim R 374; Webb v R (1994) 181 CLR 41 (Toohey J)).

41. While this risk will be partly overcome by giving a separate consideration direction (see 1.8 Separate Consideration), such a direction will usually not be sufficient. The judge must also:

    - Tell the jury which evidence can be used against each accused, the circumstances in which that evidence can be used, and the purposes for which it can be used; and
    - Identify the evidence which is not admissible against each accused, and warn the jury not to use it against that accused (R v Nessel (1980) 5 A Crim R 374; R v Hauser (1982) 6 A Crim R 68; R v Minuzzo and Williams [1984] VR 417; Nicoletti v R 4/11/97 WA CCA; R v Mayberry [2000] NSWCCA 531).

42. It is not sufficient simply to tell the jury that they must base their decision on the evidence that is admissible against each accused, because this tacitly attributes knowledge of the rules of evidence to the jury. The judge must apply those rules to the evidence in the case (R v Minuzzo and Williams [1984] VR 417).

43. The best way in which to identify the evidence that is admissible and inadmissible against each accused will depend on the facts of the case. In some cases it may be appropriate to identify all of the evidence generally, and then focus on the evidence that is inadmissible against each accused. In other cases it may be necessary to identify the evidence admissible against each accused separately (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 75; Nicoletti v R 4/11/97 WA CCA; R v Minuzzo and Williams [1984] VR 417. See also R v Taouk 17/12/92 NSW CCA; R v Masters (1992) 26 NSWLR 450).

44. Where a substantial body of the evidence is common to more than one accused, and the judge has identified the relevant evidence in relation to the first accused, it is not necessary to repeat that evidence in the same detail when dealing with each of the other accused to whom the same material relates. However, unless the evidence is wholly identical against each accused, it is necessary to deal with each accused separately by presenting the case against him or her separately (R v Taouk 17/12/92 NSW CCA; R v Masters (1992) 26 NSWLR 450; R v Towle (1955) 72 WN (NSW) 338).

45. If the defence of one accused is conducted in a manner likely to prejudice a second accused (due to the inclusion of evidence that would ordinarily be inadmissible against him or her), the judge must give very full and detailed directions, referring to the inadmissible evidence and the potential prejudice it creates, and directing the jury to ignore that evidence when considering the case against the second accused. If the nature of the prejudice is such that not even a strong warning will be sufficient to guard against it, the judge should discharge the jury in respect of the second accused, and order that he or she be tried separately (R v Taouk 17/12/92 NSW CCA; R v Hauser (1982) 6 A Crim R 68; Webb v R (1994) 181 CLR 41).

46. The jury should usually be told that a certain item of evidence is inadmissible against a particular accused at the time that it is tendered. However, whether or not such a direction is given at that stage, it must always be given in the judge's summing-up (R v Nessel (1980) 5 A Crim R 374; R v Towle (1955) 72 WN (NSW) 338).

47. Similarly, if a document is admissible in relation to one accused but not in relation to a second accused, the judge must give the jury a clear and forceful direction about the limitations of the use they can legitimately make of the document at the time that it is provided to them, and again in his or her summing-up (R v Hauser (1982) 6 A Crim R 68).

Referring to the Parties' Cases

48. The judge does not need to summarise the closing addresses of the parties, but must refer the jury to the way in which the prosecution and accused have put their cases on the issues in the trial (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 65).

49. The judge must put the respective cases for the prosecution and the defence to the jury accurately, fairly and in neutral terms (Domican v R (1992) 173 CLR 555; Cleland v R (1982) 151 CLR 1; Kayirici v The Queen [2021] NSWCCA 127, [160]).

50. It is especially important that the judge fully, clearly and fairly present the defence case, as this provides a fundamental safeguard in our system. Failure to present an important part of the defence case will be a miscarriage of justice (R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135; R v Coombes 16/4/1999 CA Vic; R v Melbourne (1999) 198 CLR 1; R v McKellin [1998] 4 VR 757; R v Wiles and Briant [1965] VR 475; R v Schmahl [1965] VR 745).

51. The judge is obliged to ensure that the jury's attention is drawn to the evidence on which the defence relies. However, the judge does not need to summarise defence counsel's address or the evidence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 65. See also R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135; R v Soldo [2005] VSCA 136).

52. The way in which a judge refers to counsel's address will depend on the circumstances of the case. In some cases, in order to ensure that the defence case is adequately presented to the jury, it will be necessary to refer to the addresses in some detail (e.g. where the arguments put forward in the address do not emerge clearly from the judge's references to the evidence, or the nature of the case itself). In other cases, a much briefer reminder of counsel's arguments will suffice (Werry v R [2010] VSCA 314).

53. This requirement does not oblige the judge to put to the jury every argument made by counsel for the accused, as long as the accused's case is put fairly. Whether it is necessary to refer to a particular argument will depend on the nature of the case (Werry v R [2010] VSCA 314; R v Sukkar [2005] NSWCCA 54; R v Meher [2004] NSWCCA 355; Domican v R (1992) 173 CLR 555; R v Forster [1955] VLR 253).

54. The defence should be put in such a way that, upon their retirement to consider the verdict, the jury has a clear understanding of the accused's position (R v Nguyen [2006] VSCA 158; R v Dao [2005] VSCA 196; Stokes v R (1960) 105 CLR 279).

55. Putting the defence fairly and adequately will generally require the judge to refer to any evidence of inconsistencies in the prosecution witnesses' accounts that the accused has sought to exploit (R v Amado-Taylor [2000] 2 Cr App R 18).

56. Judges should not intermingle their explanation of the defence case with disparaging and adverse comments upon it. It is not part of the proper function of the judge to pass comments regarding the quality of counsel's arguments (R v Abdirahman-Khalif [2020] HCA 36, [77]. See also "Distinction between Directions and Comments" below).

57. The judge should also avoid structuring their summary of the prosecution and defence case in a manner that intermingles prosecution rebuttal of defence arguments with the summary of the defence case (Becker v The King [2023] VSCA 332, [242]–[251]).

58. However, where the prosecution or defence make a statement or suggestion that is prohibited by the Jury Directions Act 2015, the trial judge must correct that statement or suggestion unless there are good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 7). For example, a direction may not be required if the party withdraws the statement and corrects their misstatement at the invitation of the judge (see, e.g. Reeves v R (2013) 41 VR 275).

59. It is insufficient for judges to rely on counsels' addresses. They must lend the weight of their judicial position and authority to the respective cases by referring to the way each party have put their case (see R v Tomazos 6/8/71 NSW CCA; Jury Directions Act 2015 s 65).

60. The summing-up must present a balanced account of the conflicting cases. Where one case is strong and the other weak, this is not achieved by under-weighting the strong case and over-weighting the weak one. A balanced account in such a situation would reflect the strength of the one and weakness of the other (R v Ali (1981) 6 A Crim R 161; Sumner v R [2010] VSCA 298).

61. The obligation to present a balanced summing up can be particularly difficult when the defence misstates the evidence. It is not necessary to correct every error. The judge will need to balance the need to present fair and neutral summing up with the need to correct errors. In doing so, the judge must not express ridicule or scepticism regarding the defence case (see Kayirici v The Queen [2021] NSWCCA 127, [154]–[162]).

62. A balanced summing up does not involve instructing the jury only on the different paths it could take to conviction. As part of providing a balanced summing up that puts the defence case, the judge should refer to specific evidentiary issues which may favour the defence case (Gurung v The Queen [2019] VSCA 196, [73]–[74]).

63. The summing-up is not to be used for the purpose of filling gaps, or rectifying deficiencies, in counsels' submissions to the jury. A desire on the part of the trial judge to reduce a perceived imbalance in the quality of representation cannot provide a justification for an unbalanced summing-up (R v Esposito (1998) 45 NSWLR 442).

64. It is not the judge's role to respond to matters raised in defence counsel's address that the prosecution has not adequately dealt with. Doing so may give the jury the impression that the judge disagrees with the defence arguments and is urging the jury to infer guilt (R v Lao and Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129).

65. Keeping a balance between the prosecution and defence cases requires the use of moderate and reasoned language which is not likely to inflame the jury. The judge should never betray an emotional approach to the facts (R v Machin (1996) 68 SASR 526; Cornelius & Briggs v R (1988) 34 A Crim R 49; Galea v R (1989) 1 WAR 450; Green v R (1971) 126 CLR 28; R v Byczko (1982) 30 SASR 578).

66. Where the prosecution case seems to be very strong, it is particularly important that the judge maintain the appearance of strict judicial impartiality by taking a disinterested position (Sumner v R [2010] VSCA 298).

67. It is inappropriate for a judge to refer to the accused by his or her surname only, while preceding the surname of the complainant and prosecution witnesses with the terms "Ms", "Mrs" or "Mr" (R v Soldo [2005] VSCA 136).

Integrated Directions and Factual Questions

68. The Jury Directions Act 2015 allows judges to give directions in the form of factual questions that address the matters the jury must consider or be satisfied of in order to reach a verdict (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 67). These directions are sometimes also called "question trails".

69. Factual question directions are designed to reduce the difficulty of the jury understanding and applying abstract principles of law. Instead, the directions will ask the jury to resolve specific factual questions and spell out the legal consequences of possible findings of fact. Such directions are designed to put the critical issues of fact before the jury, without complications from the interpretation of the relevant law (see, e.g. Stuart v R (1974) 134 CLR 426).

70. For example, in Quail v R [2014] VSCA 336, the trial judge, with the consent of prosecution and defence counsel, integrated the legal question of self-defence within the factual question of whether the accused or the victim was the original aggressor. Resolution of that question was sufficient to determine whether the prosecution had disproved self-defence.

71. The judge may combine directions in the form of factual questions with:

    (a) Directions on the evidence and how the evidence is to be assessed;

    (b) The reference to the way the parties have put their case in relation to the issues;

(c) The identification of evidence necessary to assist the jury determine the issues in the trial (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 67).

72. A judge who gives a direction in the form of a factual question or a factual question combined with another matter (an "integrated direction") does not need to also address the matter in another form (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 67).

73. Where a person is charged with committing the same offence on multiple occasions, a question trail may identify the central factual question, the occasions that are relevant to each charge, and contain a short factual statement about how the prosecution and defence puts their case in relation to each occasion. Such a process is likely to be of great assistance to the jury by simplifying the issues to be decided and integrating the elements with the facts in the form of easily comprehensible questions (see Star v The Queen [2020] VSCA 331, [42]–[43]).

74. Where there are multiple accused and the evidence against each accused is different, there are risks in using a question trail which does not differentiate between the accused (McKinnen v The Queen [2019] VSCA 114, [77]).

75. Integrated directions should contain questions that are tied to individual elements and explain the consequences that flow from each answer for the next step in the reasoning (McKinnin v The Queen [2019] VSCA 114, [78]).

76. A judge should not describe a jury document as a question trail unless it is an integrated direction in accordance with s 67 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 (McKinnin v The Queen [2019] VSCA 114, [78]).

77. Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, it is only the elements and the absence of any defences which must be proved beyond reasonable doubt. When a judge directs on the elements in the form of factual questions, those factual issues must be proved beyond reasonable doubt (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 61).

Jury Checklists

78. An alternative to integrated directions and factual questions is to provide the jury with an element checklist. That is a document which succinctly states the elements of each offence or defence the jury must consider, and identifies how decisions on each element lead to a particular legal conclusion.

79. Sample checklists are provided in this Charge Book for most offences.

80. Checklist questions are designed to present questions which are answered either as yes or no.

81. Consistent with the onus of proof, in most situations, the jury may only answer yes to a checklist question if it is satisfied of the relevant matter beyond reasonable doubt.[59] The corollary to this is that if the jury is not satisfied of an element beyond reasonable doubt, then the jury should answer no to the question that reflects that element.

[59] To provide consistency for a jury between questions regarding elements of offences and elements of defences, questions which require the prosecution to prove a negative proposition as often framed in the form "Has the prosecution proved, beyond reasonable doubt that the accused did not …?". The alternative, where the prosecution must prove a negative, is to ask the jury "Is it reasonably possible that the accused …?". If used, that formulation is best used for exculpatory matters, such as the elements of self-defence (see Gregg v The Queen [2020] NSWCCA 245, [503]–[510]; Moore v The Queen [2016] NSWCCA [43], [99]–[127]; Towney v The Queen [2018] NSWCCA 65, [71]–[82]; c.f. Hadchiti v The Queen (2016) 93 NSWLR 671, [67]–[112]).

82. A judge must not leave the jury with the impression that it may only answer no to a checklist question which asks if the prosecution has proved a particular element if it has a positive belief that the answer is no. Such an impression would diminish or reverse the onus of proof (Gregg v The Queen [2020] NSWCCA 245, [508]–[510]).

83. In New South Wales, there was a practice of directing the jury, as part of a checklist, that "if you are undecided as to the answer of any of the questions, you should consider the remaining ones in order to determine whether the answer to any of them is in the negative and if so, you should acquit the accused". This instruction has now been disapproved, on the basis that it undermines the prosecution's burden of proof by suggesting that a positive state of belief is required when answering either yes or no to a checklist question (Gregg v The Queen [2020] NSWCCA 245, [509]).

84. It is likely that the impugned instruction reflects a concern raised by Judge Berman in Question trails in jury instruction – a note of caution 24(4) Judicial Officers Bulletin (May 2012), that in following a checklist, a jury may collectively cease their deliberations due to an inability to agree on one element, even though the jury would agree that an offence was not proved if they considered all elements.

85. In Victoria, this concern is addressed by jurors using the checklist individually, rather than expecting the jury to work through the checklist in a collective, step-by-step, process where unanimity is required at each step.

Written Directions

86. Under the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 223, a judge may give the jury written directions summarising relevant matters of law, setting out the questions it may be pertinent for them to consider, or describing the possible verdicts at which they may properly arrive.

87. The judge may also provide the jury with a "jury guide", which contains any of the following:

    (a) A list of questions to assist the jury in reaching a verdict, including a written form of any factual question directions or integrated directions; or

    (b) Evidentiary directions; or

    (c) References to how the parties have put their cases; or

    (d) References to evidence which the judge considers necessary to assist the jury to determine the issues in the trial; or

    (e) Any other information (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 223).

88. These directions should not be used as a substitute for directions of law or references to how the parties have put their case. Instead, written directions may be used in conjunction with and to supplement oral directions (see Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 65, 66).

89. The court should mark and tender any written directions, question trails or jury guides as exhibits. This ensures that they are preserved for any future proceedings.

90. See 2.2 Providing Documents to the Jury for further information concerning written directions.

Distinction between Directions and Comments

91. A distinction is drawn between "directions" and "comments":

    - A direction is something which the law requires a judge to give to the jury, and which they must heed;

- A comment is something the judge tells the jury, which they may choose to ignore (Azzopardi v R (2001) 205 CLR 50; Mahmood v State of Western Australia (2008) 232 CLR 397).[60]

92. A judge must give all directions required by the law. In doing so, he or she must make it clear that he or she is giving a direction, and that the direction must be heeded (Azzopardi v R (2001) 205 CLR 50; Mahmood v State of Western Australia (2008) 232 CLR 397).

93. However, as it is for the jury alone to determine the facts, the judge must never direct them that they must accept his or her view of disputed evidence (RPS v R (2000) 199 CLR 620; R v Boykovski and Atanasovski (1991) A Crim R 436).

94. Although a judge may make non-binding comments or observations about the evidence, he or she should generally avoid doing so (R v Brdarovksi (2006) 166 A Crim R 366; R v Ivanovic [2005] VSCA 238; R v Mathe [2003] VSCA 165; R v Soldo [2005] VSCA 136).

95. In particular, the judge must not comment on a disputed issue in such a way as to suggest how the jury should resolve that issue. This prohibition applies equally to comments that might be favourable to the prosecution and the defence, even though a comment that unfairly favours the defence cannot be remedied by appeal (McKell v The Queen [2019] HCA 5, [46]; McKinnin v The Queen [2019] VSCA 114; Mareangareu v The Queen [2019] VSCA 101; Pyliotis v The Queen [2020] VSCA 134; R v Abdirahman-Khalif [2020] HCA 36, [77]).

96. Comments about disputed factual issues, or the resolution of those issues, have two vices. First, they are not consistent with the different constitutional functions of the judge and jury. The judge's function in addressing the jury is to ensure the jury have a fair and accurate understanding of what they need to know to do justice to the issues of fact. Comments are not necessary for performing that duty. Second, there is tension between suggesting how the jury might or should think and directing the jury that they are free to ignore that suggestion. Such a comment risks being an attempt to persuade the jury, and function as a second address that favours either the prosecution or defence (McKell v The Queen [2019] HCA 5, [48]–[52], [55]. See also R v Brdarovksi (2006) 166 A Crim R 366; R v Ivanovic [2005] VSCA 238; Mule v R (2005) 221 ALR 85; Neena v The Queen [2021] VSCA 183, [78]–[81]).

97. In addition, the powerful position occupied by judges should make them slow to comment on the facts of a case. As judges appear to be neutral, with their statements carrying the earmarks of balanced justice, their comments cannot fail to bear heavily on the jury. This creates a risk that the jury will be overawed by a judge's view, even if they are warned that they need not take that view into account (Broadhurst v R [1964] AC 441; R v Mawson [1967] VR 205; R v Machin (1996) 68 SASR 526; R v Mong (2002) 5 VR 565; R v Mathe [2003] VSCA 165; Neena v The Queen [2021] VSCA 183, [95]).

98. It will therefore most often be the safer course for a judge to make no comment on the facts (RPS v R (2000) 199 CLR 620; Azzopardi v R (2001) 205 CLR 50; R v Mong (2002) 5 VR 565; R v Mathe [2003] VSCA 165; R v Soldo [2005] VSCA 136; R v Ivanovic [2005] VSCA 238).

99. A judge may comment to restore the balance and correct misleading impressions created by counsel, provided the comment is made in a way that only restores the balance and does not tip the balance in the other direction. Such statements might be necessary where counsel misrepresents the evidence (McKell v The Queen [2019] HCA 5, [53]–[54]; R v Abdirahman-Khalif [2020] HCA 36, [81]; R v Castle (2016) 259 CLR 449, [61]).

[60] In Mahmood v State of Western Australia (2008) 232 CLR 397, the court gave the following examples: Telling the jury that they may attach particular significance to a fact, or that other evidence may be considered of greater weight, is a comment. Warning the jury about the care needed in assessing some evidence, or the use to which it may be put, is a direction.

100. Any judicial comments that are made must be fair and appropriate, and exhibit a judicial balance, so that the jury is not deprived of an adequate opportunity of understanding and giving effect to the defence and the matters relied upon in support of the defence (Stokes v R (1960) 105 CLR 279; Green v R (1971) 126 CLR 28; B v R (1992) 175 CLR 599; R v Meher [2004] NSWCCA 355).

Redirection

101. The judge should, at the conclusion of the summing-up, ask counsel, in the absence of the jury, whether the judge failed to give any directions of law or warnings which were requested, and hear submissions on the correctness or otherwise of the directions of law which have been given (R v Gulliford [2004] NSWCCA 338; R v Mostyn [2004] NSWCCA 97; R v Roberts (2001) 53 NSWLR 138; Lean v R (1993) 66 A Crim R 296).

102. Counsel may also seek additional directions which were not previously sought in relation to the matters in issue or the evidence relevant to the matters in issue (see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 12). See also Overview – Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015.

103. Counsel may be asked to formulate any direction, warning or comment they believe is required by the judge, if they submit that what the judge has said was insufficient to ensure a fair trial for the accused or the prosecution (R v Micalizzi [2004] NSWCCA 406).

104. It is appropriate to redirect the jury if the judge is satisfied that he or she failed to give a requested direction and were no good reasons for not giving the direction. However, the trial judge must ensure that any redirection does not give undue emphasis to any matter which would affect the balance of fairness (Holt v R (1996) 87 A Crim R 82; Jury Directions Act 2015 s 14).

105. When giving a redirection to address an earlier, erroneous, direction, the judge should explicitly tell the jury that the earlier direction was wrong. It is not sufficient to give the jury a corrected direction without also telling the jury to disregard the earlier direction, as that produces a situation where the jury has conflicting and confusing directions (Ritchie v The Queen [2019] VSCA 202, [130]).

106. The judge should ensure that an appropriate note is made of any submissions, rulings and redirections. The failure to take exception to an aspect of the judge's charge is often significant to the disposal of an appeal, as it may demonstrate that the matter in question did not cause a substantial miscarriage of justice (R v Clarke [1986] VR 643; R v McKellin [1998] 4 VR 757; R v Zilm (2006) 14 VR 11; R v MAG [2005] VSCA 47; R v IAB [2009] VSCA 229. See also Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 15, 16).

107. A judge should ensure that no further directions are to be sought or given before asking the jury to consider their verdict (R v McCormack (1995) 85 A Crim R 445. See also Knight v R 18/12/90 NSW CCA; Trivitt 13/6/91 NSW CCA; Lean v R (1993) 66 A Crim R 296).

I am now going to take you to the issues you need to decide, and remind you of some of the evidence that has been given in relation to those issues. Before doing so, I want to remind you again that the mere fact that I may leave out a part of a particular witness's evidence does not mean that that evidence is not important.

Similarly, the fact that I include evidence from a particular witness does not make that evidence more important than the evidence of other witnesses. You must consider all of the evidence, not just the parts of it that I mention. Which parts of that evidence are important or not important is a matter for you to determine.

I also want to emphasise again that it is not my responsibility to decide this case – that is your role. So while you must follow any directions I give you about the law, you are not bound by any comments I may make about the facts. If I happen to express any views upon questions of fact, you must disregard those views, unless they happen to agree with your own assessment of the evidence.

[Insert directions on relevant offences, incorporating references to the evidence, parties' arguments and evidentiary directions. Judges should only refer to so much of the evidence as is relevant to the real issues in the case, clearly relating the evidence to the issues: see 3.9 Judge's Summing Up on Issues and Evidence.]

3.10 Alternative Verdicts

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

When is an Alternative Verdict Available?

1. The Crimes Act 1958 provides that the jury may return specified alternative verdicts[61] in relation to a number of offences, including:
    - Murder (ss 421, 6(2));
    - Negligently causing serious injury or culpable driving causing death (s 422A);
    - Indictable offences alleging wounding or causing grievous bodily harm (s 423);
    - Conduct endangering life (including unlawfully and maliciously administering poison) (s 424);
    - Destroying or damaging property (s 427(1));
    - Arson causing death (s 427(2));
    - Unauthorised modification of data to cause impairment (s 428);
    - Unauthorised impairment of electronic communication (s 429);
    - Riot-related charges (s 435).[62]
2. A list of statutory alternatives is available in the Victorian Criminal Proceedings Manual.
3. Some assistance about available alternative verdicts may be obtained from I. Freckelton Indictable Offences in Victoria (4th Ed, 1999).
4. In addition, in a trial for any offence except treason or murder, the jury may return an alternative verdict for another offence, if the allegations in the indictment amount to or include (expressly or by necessary implication) an allegation of that other offence (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 239(1)).
5. This involves the application of the common law 'red pencil' test. An offence will amount to or include another offence if words could be deleted from the particulars of an offence in the indictment in a way that leaves the particulars of the alternative offence (Mareangareu v The Queen [2019] VSCA 101, [44]; Chaarani & Ors v The Queen (2020) 61 VR 353, [83]).

[61] An alternative verdict is a verdict in relation to an offence which has not been specifically charged (R v Salisbury [1976] VR 452).

[62] On 28 February 2018, Justice Legislation Amendment (Victims) Act 2018 s 7 commenced operation. This repealed Crimes Act 1958 s 425, which previously specified alternative verdicts for certain sexual offences. According to the Explanatory Memorandum, s 425 had become obsolete due to Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 239, which provides general rules on when an alternative verdict is available.

6. The availability of an alternative verdict depends on the terms in which the charged offence is laid, and not upon the evidence adduced. The evidence led at the trial is only relevant to the extent that an accused cannot be found guilty of a lesser charge unless the evidence led supports a conviction on that charge (R v Salisbury [1976] VR 452; Reid v R (2010) 29 VR 446; Pollard v R (2011) 31 VR 416; R v Perdikoyiannis (2003) 86 SASR 262; Chaarani & Ors v The Queen (2020) 61 VR 353).

7. Section 239 does not allow a court to leave a State offence as a necessarily included alternative to a Commonwealth offence. This is because while s 239 may be 'picked up' by Judiciary Act 1903 s 79(1) to permit an alternative verdict of one Commonwealth offence for another, a substantive offence cannot be picked up by s 79 to become 'another offence within the jurisdiction of the court' (Chaarani & Ors v The Queen (2020) 61 VR 353, [66]; Fattal & Ors v The Queen [2013] VSCA 276, [122]).

8. Any allegation of an offence (other than treason) includes an attempt to commit that offence (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 239(2)).[63]

9. A judge may not leave a driving offence, such as dangerous driving causing death, as an alternative to a charge of murder under Crimes Act 1958 s 421(1) (R v Borthwick [2010] VSC 306).

10. The offence of sexual penetration of a child under 16 is not an alternative to a charge of rape (Pollard v R (2011) 31 VR 416).

Duty to leave alternative verdicts

11. Although an alternative verdict may be available at law, a judge is not always obliged to leave such a verdict to the jury. A judge may order that the guilt of a person in respect of such alternatives shall not be determined at the trial if he or she considers that it is expedient to do so in the interests of justice (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 240).

12. The judge's duty to leave an available alternative verdict to the jury will depend on the course of the trial and the evidence in the case.

13. Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, after the close of all the evidence, the prosecution must indicate whether any alternative offences are open on the evidence and, if so, whether it relies on them. Defence counsel must then indicate whether they consider any alternative offences are in issue and must request directions on the matters in issue (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 11, 12).

14. Three situations may therefore arise

    - If the possibility of an alternative verdict forms part of either party's case, appropriate directions about that verdict must be given to the jury (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 14; R v Kane (2001) 3 VR 542 (Ormiston JA));
    - If the possibility of an alternative verdict has not formed part of either party's case, but one of the parties has requested such a verdict be left to the jury, the judge must consider whether there are good reasons for not giving the requested direction (see "Good Reasons for Not Giving Requested Direction" below);
    - If the possibility of an alternative verdict has not formed part of either party's case, and the parties have not requested such a verdict be left to the jury (or have objected to such a verdict being left), the judge must decide whether fairness to the accused requires that the jury consider the alternative charge (see "Leaving Alternative Verdicts Even if Not Sought by Counsel") below.

[63] While Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 239 does not apply to a charge of murder, s 421(1) states that attempted murder is an alternative verdict to murder.

Good Reasons for Not Giving Requested Direction

15. Jury Directions Act 2015 s 14(1) states:

> The trial judge must give the jury a requested direction unless there are good reasons for not doing so.

16. In deciding whether there are good reasons for not giving a requested direction, the judge must consider the manner in which the parties have conducted their cases and whether the direction would involve the jury considering the issues in a manner different from the way in which the accused presented his or her case (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 14(2)(b)(ii)).

17. This provision appears designed to limit the ability of counsel to seek directions which require the jury to assess alternative theories of the case which are not raised with the jury by defence counsel. Until the provision is interpreted, it is not known when a judge should refuse to give a direction sought on the basis that it is not raised or relied on by the accused.

Leaving Alternative Verdicts Even if Not Sought by Counsel

18. Jury Directions Act 2013 s 16 abolished the common law rule which required a trial judge to direct the jury about offences open on the evidence which had not been identified during the trial and alternative bases of complicity. This abolition has continued despite the repeal of the Jury Directions Act 2013, but does not limit the residual obligation under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 16 (Interpretation of Legislation Act 1984 s 14(2)(c); Jury Directions Act 2015 s 17 Note).

19. Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, a judge has a residual obligation to give the jury a direction if there are substantial and compelling reasons for doing so even though the direction has not been requested (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 16).

20. This residual obligation presupposes that the parties have complied with their obligations under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 11 to identify alternative offences that are open on the evidence and whether those alternatives are relied upon or in issue (Aston v The Queen [2019] VSCA 225, [45], [52]).

21. While a judge is not required to leave an alternative charge that is not a realistic alternative, fairness to the accused may require that the judge leave an alternative charge where the jury might reasonably return a verdict on that alternative, even if the alternative charge was not sought by any party (Aston v The Queen [2019] VSCA 225, [46], [57]).

22. Before giving a direction that was not sought, the judge must inform the parties of his or her intention to give the direction and invite submissions on the direction and whether there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving the direction (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 16).

23. At common law, there was a greater obligation on judges to leave alternative verdicts in homicide cases compared to non-homicide cases.[64] It is unclear whether different principles continue to apply when determining whether a judge must give a direction regarding alternative offences under the residual obligation. These common law authorities are addressed below.

[64] The distinction is actually between murder/manslaughter cases and other cases (see "Other Alternative Verdicts to Murder" below). For the sake of simplicity, however, this topic refers to this distinction as the distinction between homicide and non-homicide cases.

Homicide Cases

Judge Must Direct Jury About Manslaughter if "Viable"

24. At common law, the judge in a murder trial was required to direct the jury to consider the alternative verdict of manslaughter if a "viable" case is available on the evidence. This was necessary even if the possibility of a manslaughter verdict has not been raised by any party, and even if a party objects (or all parties object) to the issue being left to the jury (R v Kanaan (2005) 64 NSWLR 527; DPP v Tabbit [2007] VSC 137; R v Parsons (2004) 145 A Crim R 519; R v Makin (2004) 8 VR 262; Gillard v R (2003) 219 CLR 1; R v Kane (2001) 3 VR 542; Gilbert v R (2000) 201 CLR 414; R v Doan (2001) 3 VR 349; Pemble v R (1971) 124 CLR 107; Gammage v R (1969) 122 CLR 444).

25. This duty also extended to cases of accessorial liability. Where the principal offender could be found guilty of either murder or manslaughter, the jury was directed about any "viable" bases of accessorial liability for both possible verdicts (R v Nguyen (2010) 242 CLR 491; R v Nguyen [2010] VSCA 23).[65] However, Jury Directions Act 2013 s 16 expressly removed the obligation to direct on alternative bases of complicity and the note to that section expressly referred to R v Nguyen (2010) 242 CLR 491 (see also Jury Directions Act 2015 s 17).

26. There was be a "viable" case of manslaughter if there was a basis for a manslaughter verdict on a reasonable view of the facts.[66] The evidence must have disclosed a reasonable basis upon which such a verdict could be found (R v Williamson (2000) 1 VR 58. See also R v Kane (2001) 3 VR 542; R v Doan (2001) 3 VR 349; R v Thorpe [1999] 1 VR 326; Van den Hoek v R (1986) 161 CLR 158; Varley v R (1976) ALJR 245; Pemble v R (1971) 124 CLR 107).

27. A retrial was generally required if a judge failed to direct the jury about manslaughter when it was available on the evidence, as this deprived the accused of a chance of being acquitted of murder (and convicted of manslaughter instead), causing a miscarriage of justice (Gillard v R (2003) 219 CLR 1; Gilbert v R (2000) 201 CLR 414; R v Kanaan (2005) 64 NSWLR 527; R v King (2004) 59 NSWLR 515; R v Kane (2001) 3 VR 542; R v Nguyen (2010) 242 CLR 491).

28. If there was no viable manslaughter case, and counsel has not raised the issue, the jury was not be directed about it (unless questioned about it by the jury: see below) and it may have been a misdirection to do so[67] (R v Williamson (2000) 1 VR 58; R v Kanaan (2005) 64 NSWLR 527; R v Iannazzone [1983] 1 VR 649; Markby v R (1978) 140 CLR 108; Gammage v R (1969) 122 CLR 444; Mraz v R (1955) 93 CLR 493).

Do Not Mislead Jury About their Ability to Return a Manslaughter Verdict

29. This section discusses the obligation on a trial judge not to mislead a jury about their ability to return a verdict of manslaughter. These principles remain relevant under the Jury Directions Act 2015.

[65] The "viable" bases of accessorial liability may vary for each verdict. For example, while complicity on the bases of acting in concert or extended common purpose may be viable in relation to a verdict of murder, in some cases these forms of complicity may not be viable in relation to a verdict of manslaughter (see, e.g. R v Nguyen [2010] VSCA 23).

[66] The requirement that there must have been a "viable" case of manslaughter did not differ in substance from the test in Pemble v R (1971) 124 CLR 107 that manslaughter should be left to the jury if such a verdict was "open on the evidence" (R v Kanaan (2005) 64 NSWLR 527).

[67] See, e.g. Mraz v R (1955) 93 CLR 493, in which it was held to be a misdirection to direct the jury about manslaughter where it was a case of murder or nothing (i.e. there was no doubt that a murder was committed, but the accused denied any involvement in it).

30. While the judge should not direct the jury about manslaughter if there is no viable case, he or she must not lead the jury to understand that a manslaughter verdict is beyond their power. The jury has the right under Crimes Act 1958 s 421(1) to return such a verdict, even if it is not open on the evidence (a "merciful verdict") (Gammage v R (1969) 122 CLR 444; Packett v R (1937) 58 CLR 190).[68]

31. It will therefore be a misdirection to tell the jury that they are not at liberty to find a verdict other than guilty or not guilty in relation to murder, even if on the evidence it is a case of murder or nothing (Brown v R (1913) 17 CLR 570).

32. Because of the possibility of merciful verdicts, the judge is bound to inform the jury of their capacity to return a manslaughter verdict if they ask about that possibility, even if such a verdict is not open on the evidence. To do otherwise would be to misstate the law, and would deny the jury a power they possess by statute (R v Williamson (2000) 1 VR 58; Gammage v R (1969) 122 CLR 444; *R v Stone (*1965) 84 WN (Pt 1) (NSW) 361; Brown v R (1913) 17 CLR 570).

33. The fact that the jury asks a question about the mental element of murder does not oblige the judge to leave manslaughter as an alternative verdict. In the absence of a viable case, a judge only needs to direct the jury about manslaughter if they specifically ask about its availability, or if they ask about the power to return a verdict other than murder (R v Williamson (2000) 1 VR 58).

34. While the judge must not tell the jury that they cannot return a manslaughter verdict, he or she may tell them that they should not return a manslaughter verdict if there is no evidence to support such a verdict (Gammage v R (1969) 122 CLR 444; R v Stone (1965) 84 WN (Pt 1) (NSW) 361).

35. If there is no viable manslaughter case, and the judge is asked by the jury whether they can return a manslaughter verdict, the judge should therefore:

    - Tell the jury that they may return a manslaughter verdict;
    - Inform the jury of the basis on which they may properly return a manslaughter verdict (e.g. if they are not satisfied that the accused committed murder, but are satisfied that the accused killed the deceased by an unlawful and dangerous act: see Manslaughter by Unlawful and Dangerous Act); and
    - Tell the jury that if they are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt of all the elements of the crime of murder, their duty is to convict of murder (Gammage v R (1969) 122 CLR 444).

36. A judge is not obliged to direct the jury about manslaughter simply because defence counsel asks them to do so in the absence of the jury. At common law, a judge only needed to direct the jury on manslaughter if it arose on the evidence, or if he or she was questioned about it by the jury (R v Williamson (2000) 1 VR 58). Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, the judge should consider whether there are good reasons for not giving the direction sought, as it was not a matter raised or relied on by the accused and would involve the jury considering the issues in the trial in a manner different from the way in which the accused presented his or her case (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 14).

Other Alternative Verdicts to Murder

37. The principles discussed above were limited to the alternative offence of manslaughter, and did not to apply to the other alternative offences to murder available under Crimes Act ss 421(1), 6(2) or 10(3).

38. This was clearly the case in relation to the alternative offence of "assist offender" (Crimes Act 1958 s 325). It was not always necessary to leave this offence as an alternative verdict in a murder case, even if it was open on the evidence. The question of whether to leave the alternative verdict of assist offender to the jury was decided according to the same principles that operated in relation to non-homicide offences (see below) (R v Saad [2005] VSCA 249).

[68] If the jury returns a verdict of manslaughter where there is no evidence to support it, the judge may request them to reconsider the matter. However, if they persist in that verdict, the judge must accept it (R v Kanaan (2005) 64 NSWLR 527).

Non-Homicide Cases

39. At common law, a judge was not required to direct the jury on alternative charges to offences other than murder (James v R (2013) 39 VR 149; R v Nous (2010) 26 VR 96; R v DD (2007) 19 VR 143; R v Saad [2005] VSCA 249; R v Doan (2001) 3 VR 349. However, see R v Kane (2001) 3 VR 542; R v Rehavi [1999] 2 Qd R 640; R v Elfar (2000) 115 A Crim R 64).

40. However, the common law recognised that there were cases where the circumstances required a direction on an alternative offence, even if the possibility of that offence has not been raised by any party (James v The Queen (2014) 253 CLR 475, [38]; R v Nous (2010) 26 VR 96; R v DD (2007) 19 VR 143; R v Christy (2007) 16 VR 647; R v Saad [2005] VSCA 249).

41. Whether an alternative offence should be left depended on all the circumstances of the case, including the dictates of the public interest, fairness to the accused, the course of the trial and the scope of forensic judgment on the part of counsel. The ultimate test was what justice required in the particular case (R v Nous (2010) 26 VR 96; R v DD (2007) 19 VR 143; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; R v Saad [2005] VSCA 249; R v Kane (2001) 3 VR 542).

42. The judge's obligation is to direct the jury only on the real issues in the case. Directions on alternative offences which have not been addressed by the parties may be inconsistent with this obligation and may cause unfairness to the parties by expanding the case beyond the issues the parties addressed. Such directions may also breach the separation of prosecutorial and judicial functions (James v R (2013) 39 VR 149; James v The Queen (2014) 253 CLR 475, [37]).

43. The interests of justice could demand that lesser alternatives be left to the jury, even if not raised by counsel, to guard against the following two dangers:

    i) Faced with a false choice between conviction or acquittal of the main offence and nothing else, the jury would acquit the accused altogether when he or she should be convicted of the alternative offence; or

    ii) Faced with the same false choice, the jury would convict the accused of the more serious offence rather than let him or her get off scot-free for what is, on any view, serious misconduct (Aston v The Queen [2019] VSCA 225, [47]–[48]; R v Saad [2005] VSCA 249; R v Kane (2001) 3 VR 542; R v Maxwell [1990] 1 WLR 401; R v Fairbanks [1986] 1 WLR 1202).

44. The following factors bear upon whether, in the interests of justice, a lesser alternative offence should be left to the jury:

    - The presence of evidence which raises the alternative offence as a real and not remote or artificial possibility;
    - A party's reliance upon that evidence as being inconsistent with the proof of one or more of the elements of the more serious offence;
    - A real chance that the jury may convict the accused of the lesser offence; and
    - A request by a party that the lesser alternative offence be left to the jury (R v Nous (2010) 26 VR 96).

45. Thus, there may be no need to leave an alternative verdict to the jury where:

    - There is no reasonable basis on the evidence for that verdict (e.g. where there is no dispute that the principal offence was committed, and the only issue is whether the accused committed it) (R v DD (2007) 19 VR 143; R v Bui [2005] VSCA 300; R v Benbolt (1993) 60 SASR 7; R v Perdikoyiannis (2003) 86 SASR 262; R v Willersdorf [2001] QCA 183; R v King (2004) 59 NSWLR 515; Jensen v R (1991) 52 A Crim R 279);
    - The evidence in support of the alternative verdict is flimsy, or the prospect of a conviction on the lesser offence rather than the major offence is fanciful (R v King (2004) 59 NSWLR 515); or

- The principal offence is grave and the alternative is comparatively trifling and remote from the real point of the case (R v Saad [2005] VSCA 249; R v Kane (2001) 3 VR 542; R v King (2004) 59 NSWLR 515; R v Maxwell [1990] 1 WLR 401; R v Fairbanks [1986] 1 WLR 1202).

46. Above all, the common law required judges to keep in mind the course of the trial. Other things being equal, the effect of forensic judgment on the part of counsel was likely to be one of the most important considerations. In non-homicide cases, calculated abstention from raising an alternative verdict was a relevant consideration (R v Saad [2005] VSCA 249; R v Nous (2010) 26 VR 96; James v R (2013) 39 VR 149). These principles are likely to remain relevant under the Jury Directions Act 2015.

47. Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, counsel have a positive duty to identify to the judge alternative offences that are open on the evidence and must indicate whether those offences are relied upon or in issue. Under this scheme, there appears to be less scope for 'calculated abstention' from raising an alternative. Such abstention is likely to involve a failure to fulfil counsel's obligations under the Act. Where that occurs, the focus on appeal will be on what fairness to the accused required, rather than whether there were substantial and compelling reasons for leaving the alternative charge (see Aston v The Queen [2019] VSCA 225, [51]–[55]).

48. While the judge and not counsel is responsible for deciding what are the real issues to be left to the jury, the forensic decisions of counsel affect the scope of issues in dispute. Where the judge was of the opinion that there was a real issue as to whether the prosecution had established an element of the more serious offence and, after discussion with counsel (see below), considered that there was a real possibility that the jury could find the accused guilty of the lesser alternative offence, the common law stated that the offence should be left to the jury (R v Nous (2010) 26 VR 96; James v R (2013) 39 VR 149 (Maxwell P)).

Discuss Alternative Verdicts with Counsel

49. At common law, judges needed to ensure that leaving to the jury the possibility of convicting the accused of an alternative offence did not involve a risk of injustice to the accused, and that the accused had the opportunity of fully meeting that alternative in the course of his or her defence (Commissioner of Police v Wilson [1984] AC 242).

50. It was therefore prudent for the judge to ask counsel before empanelment, or at least no later than at the close of the defence case, whether consideration had been given to alternative verdicts (Ross v R (1922) 30 CLR 246; R v Evans [1969] VR 858; R v Pureau (1990) 19 NSWLR 372; R v Perdikoyiannis (2003) 86 SASR 262).

51. These considerations will remain relevant when a judge is deciding whether to exercise the residual power to give a direction not sought by the parties (see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 16).

52. If it seems clear that an alternative charge arises on the prosecution case, but the prosecution does not open on that alternative, the judge should raise the issue with the prosecution. The judge may also wish to draw the alternative verdict to the jury's attention before the evidence is called, so that they have it in mind when they hear the evidence (R v Benbolt (1993) 60 SASR 7 (Perry J)).

53. If the judge proposes to leave an alternative verdict which has not been raised by counsel, he or she should inform counsel of this fact before their final addresses. This will allow submissions to be made about whether raising such an alternative so late would be likely to cause injustice to the accused, and will also allow counsel to address it in their closing arguments (R v Benbolt (1993) 60 SASR 7; R v Pureau (1990) 19 NSWLR 372).

54. In determining whether to leave an alternative verdict which has not been sought by the prosecution, the judge should consider the fact that objections to the evidence, lines of cross-examination and decisions upon the material to be presented on behalf of the accused will have been governed by the nature of the prosecution case. It is therefore possible that real prejudice could arise if he or she raises new approaches available to, but not expressly relied upon by, the prosecution (R v Solomon [1980] 1 NSWLR 321; R v Cameron [1983] 2 NSWLR 66; R v Pureau (1990) 19 NSWLR 372).

55. Raising an alternative verdict for the first time during the summing-up is likely to prejudice the accused, because defence counsel will not have had an opportunity to address the issue in their closing address. This prejudice cannot be remedied by allowing counsel to make supplementary submissions after the judge's summing-up, as that would give undue emphasis to the alternative charge, and tend to make it more likely that the jury would find the accused guilty at least on that alternative charge (R v Kane (2001) 3 VR 542 (Ormiston JA); R v Benbolt (1993) 60 SASR 7; Quinn v R (1991) 55 A Crim R 435; R v Heaton 1/6/90 NSW CCA; R v Pureau (1990) 19 NSWLR 372).

56. As the factual situation which gives rise to the prospect of an alternative verdict of attempt is often not apparent until the trial is under way, this offence may differ from other alternative offences. A judge may be more likely to conclude that the late raising of attempt will not prejudice the accused. However, the alternative of attempt should not be raised for the first time during summing-up, when neither counsel will have had the opportunity of addressing it (R v Pureau (1990) 19 NSWLR 372; Quinn v R (1991) 55 A Crim R 435).

Directions About Alternative Verdicts

57. If an alternative offence is to be left to the jury, the judge must explain to the jury to issues of law and fact involved determining whether the alternative offence is proved, including how the prosecution puts its case in relation to the alternative (R v Pureau (1990) 19 NSWLR 372; R v Crisologo (1997) 99 A Crim R 178; Pemble v R (1971) 124 CLR 107).

58. Where the evidence is unclear about the date of the offence, and the judge needs to direct the jury about an alternative offence which pre-dates the charged offence, the judge will need to explain how a doubt about the date of the offence affects the jury's verdict. In some cases, the date may only be an essential particular in relation to the more recent offence. The jury may then be able to return a verdict of guilty in relation to the alternative offence if satisfied that the conduct occurred, even if it cannot be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that it occurred either before or after the relevant date. Whether this is permissible will depend on the nature of the offences and the operation of any relevant transitional provisions (see Dibbs v R [2012] VSCA 224).

59. The jury cannot return a verdict on an alternative charge until it returns a verdict on the principal charge. The judge must ensure that the jury understands this rule. If the jury cannot agree on the principal charge, any agreement on an alternative charge would involve impermissible compromise (LLW v R (2012) 35 VR 372; Medici v R (2013) 39 VR 350).

60. At common law, jurors were free to organise their processes of reasoning and their discussions in any way they see fit. As a result, a judge was prohibited from giving any direction which interfered with this freedom. This included a direction on the order in which the jury must consider various offences. This was distinguished from a direction about the order in which the jury must return its verdicts, which was permissible (Stanton v R (2003) 198 ALR 41; LLW v R (2012) 35 VR 372; Medici v R (2013) 39 VR 350; Smith v R (2013) 39 VR 336; Vo v R (2013) 39 VR 543).

61. Jury Directions Act 2015 s 64E, as amended in 2017, abolishes that common law rule. Judges may direct the jury on the order in which they must consider the offences. Section 64E also preserves judges' common law ability to suggest an order in which they may consider the offences (see also Smith v R (2013) 39 VR 336).

62. Judges may also direct the jury on the order in which it must consider the following matters:

    - some or all of the elements of an offence charged or an alternative offence;
    - defences to an offence charged or an alternative offence;
    - the matters in issue;
    - an alternative basis of complicity in the commission of an offence charged or an alternative offence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 64F).

63. Such a direction may be given in the form of an integrated direction or factual question under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 67. For further information see 3.9 Judge's Summing Up on Issues and Evidence.

64. The judge needs to be careful not to leave alternatives to the jury in a way that suggests that the only question is of which alternative the accused is guilty (e.g. murder or manslaughter). The jury must be told of its entitlement to acquit, and of its obligation to acquit if it is not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt of the accused's guilt (R v Williamson (1996) 67 SASR 428; Pemble v R (1971) 124 CLR 107).

65. Written directions are of particular assistance to the jury where alternative verdicts are available (R v Youssef (1990) 59 A Crim R 1. See 2.2 Providing Documents to the Jury for further information).

3.11 Unanimous Verdicts and Extended Jury Unanimity

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

When to Give the Charge

1. It is appropriate to instruct the jury about the need for unanimity in all cases (R v Rajakaruna (2004) 8 VR 340).

Issues

2. An appropriate person, such as the judge's associate, should question jurors prior to the judge receiving the verdict, to ensure the decision is unanimous (Milgate v R (1964) 38 ALJR 162; R v Sergi [1974] VR 1).

Extended Jury Unanimity

3. In some cases it may be necessary to direct the jury that they must be unanimous about a particular matter (in addition to being unanimous about whether or not the accused is guilty).

4. In addressing this issue, a distinction is drawn between two types of cases:

    i) Those in which alternative bases of guilt are proposed by the prosecution; and

    ii) Those in which one offence is charged, but a number of discrete acts is relied upon as proof, any of which would entitle the jury to convict (R v Walsh (2002) 131 A Crim R 299; R v Klamo (2008) 18 VR 644; R v Cramp (1999) 110 A Crim R 198; Zandipour v R [2017] VSCA 179).

Alternative Bases of Guilt

5. Where the prosecution has presented alternative bases for a finding of guilt, the need for an expanded direction about unanimity will depend on whether the case involves:

    i) Alternative factual bases of liability (e.g. where the accused is charged with culpable driving causing death due either to gross negligence or intoxication); or

    ii) Alternative legal formulations of liability based on the same or substantially the same facts (e.g. where the accused is charged with unlawful and dangerous act manslaughter and/or manslaughter due to gross negligence) (R v Cramp (1999) 110 A Crim R 198).

6. In the first type of case, the jury must be directed that they need to unanimously agree about at least one of the alleged bases of liability. It is not sufficient for some jurors to find the accused guilty of one basis (e.g. culpable driving due to gross negligence), while others find the accused guilty of the alternative (e.g. culpable driving due to intoxication (R v Beach (1994) 75 A Crim R 447).

7. In the second type of case, there need only be unanimity as to the verdict (e.g. guilty of manslaughter). The basis upon which the accused is found guilty (e.g. due to having committed an unlawful or dangerous act or having been grossly negligent) is irrelevant (R v Clarke and Johnstone [1986] VR 643; R v Isaacs (1997) 41 NSWLR 374).

8. Cases in which the prosecution has argued that the accused could be liable as either a principal or an accessory are an example of the second type of case. The jury therefore does not need to be in unanimous agreement about the capacity in which the accused committed the crime. They merely need to unanimously agree that s/he caused the result, and had the relevant mens rea (R v Giannetto [1997] 1 Cr App 1; R v Leivers and Ballinger [1997] 1 Qd R 649).

9. The key issue in determining which category a case falls into seems to be whether or not the alternative bases involve materially different issues or consequences:

    i) If the bases do involve materially different issues or consequences, the jury must be unanimously satisfied that the requirements of at least one of the bases have been met.

    ii) If the bases do not involve materially different issues or consequences, the jury need only be unanimously satisfied of the verdict: (R v Leivers and Ballinger [1999] 1 Qd R 649; R v Cramp (1999) 110 A Crim R 198).

10. However, the precise application of this principle in Victoria is unclear. For a detailed discussion of this area, see R v Walsh (2002) 131 A Crim R 299.

Multiple Discrete Acts

11. When a number of discrete acts are committed, any of which would entitle a jury to convict, the jury may need to be unanimous in its view about at least one of those acts (R v Walsh (2002) 131 A Crim R 299; KBT v The Queen (1997) 191 CLR 417; R v Klamo (2008) 18 VR 644).

12. This will depend on whether those discrete acts go to the proof of an essential ingredient of the crime charged, or merely provide a route by which the jury can find the accused guilty of the crime (R v Walsh (2002) 131 A Crim R 299; R v Klamo (2008) 18 VR 644).

13. If the acts go to the proof of an essential ingredient of the crime, then the jury must be directed that they cannot convict unless they are unanimously agreed upon an act which, in their opinion, constitutes that essential ingredient (R v Klamo (2008) 18 VR 644).

14. By contrast, if the acts do not go to the proof of an essential ingredient of the crime, but merely provide a route by which the jury can find the accused guilty of the crime, then the jury only needs to unanimously agree that the crime was committed (R v Walsh (2002) 131 A Crim R 299).

15. Determining whether the acts go to the proof of an essential ingredient of the crime charged will depend upon the precise nature of the charge, the nature of the prosecution's case and the defence, and what the live issues are at the conclusion of the evidence (R v Walsh (2002) 131 A Crim R 299).

16. In determining whether acts are relevantly discrete, the judge must look at whether the acts are separated in time or circumstance. In the case of a violent assault measured in second, or even minutes, all of which occurs in the same area, the jury would be entitled to treat the assault as a single transaction and would not need to be unanimous about the parts of the assault which caused the harm alleged (Zandipour v R [2017] VSCA 179; R v McCarthy (2015) 124 SASR 190; R v Heaney (2009) 22 VR 164; Dookhea v R [2016] VSCA 67; Hope v The Queen [2018] VSCA 230, [31]–[33]).

17. Even where the jury can treat an event as a continuous transaction, there may be evidence that the harm alleged was caused by a particular part of that transaction. In that situation, individual jurors may have two paths to verdict which do not require unanimity. First, a juror may be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the harm was caused by a particular part of the transaction, and that the necessary fault element existed at the moment of that part. Second, a juror may be satisfied that the harm was caused by the transaction as a whole, in which case the juror must find that the fault element existed for the whole of the transaction. The need for a direction on this issue will depend, in part, on whether the accused may have had a different state of mind at different stages of the transaction (see, e.g. Zandipour v R [2017] VSCA 179).

Cases Requiring Unanimity about Particular Acts

18. Where the accused is charged with persistent sexual abuse of a child under 16 (Crimes Act 1958 s 49J), the prosecution must prove at least 3 separate sexual offences of the relevant kind (see Persistent Sexual Abuse of a Child (From 1/7/17). In such cases, if the prosecution provides evidence of more than 3 acts upon which the accused can be convicted, the jurors must unanimously agree that at least 3 particular acts were committed. It is not sufficient for each juror to find that the accused committed 3 of the alleged acts, if the 3 selected acts differ from juror to juror (see KBT v The Queen (1997) 191 CLR 417).
19. Where the accused is charged with manslaughter by an unlawful and dangerous act, and the prosecution relies on two discrete acts, each of which is capable of constituting the crime charged, the jury must unanimously agree upon which act constitutes the crime (R v Klamo (2008) 18 VR 644).
20. In a case of fraudulently inducing investments, where the issue of whether the accused made a false statement (as identified in the particulars) as an inducement to invest was seen to be essential, it was held that the jury had to unanimously agree on a particular false statement (amongst several presented) in order to convict (R v Brown (1984) 79 Cr App R 115).
21. In cases involving fraud (including obtaining financial advantage by deception), it will usually be necessary to direct the jury about the need for unanimity about the acts of fraud if the prosecution particularises multiple discrete acts of fraud (Ardrey v WA [2016] WASCA 154. See also R v Holmes [2006] VSCA 73; Magnus v R (2013) 41 VR 612).
22. However, where there is only one relevant deception for each separate charge, a unanimity direction is not necessary (Magnus v R (2013) 41 VR 612).

Cases Not Requiring Unanimity About Particular Acts

23. In relation to a charge of stalking (Crimes Act 1958 s 21A), the jury does not need to be unanimous as to the particular acts which constituted the "course of conduct". The requirement for unanimity will be met as long as the jury unanimously agrees that the accused engaged in a course of conduct which included any of the matters set out in the section (R v Hoang (2007) 16 VR 369).
24. In relation to a charge of conspiracy to defraud, there does not need to be unanimous agreement about the particular representations the conspirators agreed to make. The agreement to make any particular representation is not an essential element of the crime, but merely a path to arriving at the objective of the conspirators – obtaining an advantage by fraud (R v Hancock [1996] 2 Cr App R 554; R v Walsh (2002) 131 A Crim R 299).
25. In a case of procuring an advantage by deception by means of a fraudulent claim, where the essential issue was whether the accused made the fraudulent claim (and the particulars of the fraud were simply a matter of evidence), it was held that the jury only had to unanimously agree on the verdict and not on the particulars. Issues such as whether the accused had been fraudulent as to the amount of wages paid, the people employed or the hours worked, were seen to be only incidental, doing no more than providing the jury with alternative routes of arriving at the same result (R v Agbim [1979] Crim LR 171).

3.11.1 Charge: Unanimous and Majority Verdicts

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

In almost all criminal cases, a verdict of guilty or not guilty must be unanimous. That is, whatever decision you make, you must all agree on it.

So if, for example, you are to find NOA guilty of [insert charge 1], then you must all agree that [he/she] is guilty of that offence. In exactly the same way, if you are to find NOA not guilty of [insert charge 1], then you must all agree that [he/she] is not guilty of that offence.

However, this requirement does not mean that you must all reach your verdict for the same reasons. Indeed, you may each rely on quite different reasons for making your decision. For example, you may each rely upon different parts of the evidence, or you may each emphasise different aspects of the evidence.

What is important is that, no matter how you reach your verdict, you all agree. Your verdict of guilty or not guilty [in relation to each charge/for each person charged] must be unanimous, the agreed decision of you all.

You may have noted that I said that a verdict must be unanimous in "almost all" criminal cases. There are some circumstances in which a jury is allowed to give a majority verdict instead of a unanimous verdict. However, this is not yet one of those cases and may never be. I will tell you if the situation changes. Until I do, you should consider that your verdict[s] of guilty or not guilty must be unanimous.[69]

[If the case involves alternative bases of responsibility for a particular offence, insert the relevant Additional Charge.]

3.11.2 Additional Charge: Materially Different Issues or Consequences

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge may be added if evidence has been presented which shows possible alternative bases of responsibility for a particular offence, and the bases involve materially different issues or consequences. For example, culpable driving causing death due to gross negligence or culpable driving causing death due to intoxication: See 3.11 Unanimous and Majority Verdicts.

Because of the nature of this case, I need to give you some more directions about how this requirement for unanimity works in relation to [insert relevant offence].

The prosecution has argued that there are two different bases upon which you can find NOA guilty of this offence.

Firstly, the prosecution has argued that NOA is guilty of [insert offence] because [he/she] [insert summary of one basis for guilty].

Alternatively, the prosecution has argued that NOA is guilty of [insert offence] because [he/she] [insert summary of alternative basis].

[69] This paragraph should be excluded in cases of murder, treason, offences against sections 71 or 72 of the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981, or offences against a law of the Commonwealth, as majority verdicts are not permitted in relation to such offences (Juries Act 2000 s 46).

In order to find NOA guilty of [insert offence], you only need to find that one of these two alternatives has been proven beyond reasonable doubt.

However, all twelve of you must agree that the same alternative has been proven. For example, all of you must agree that NOA was guilty because [insert one basis]. Or all of you must agree that NOA was guilty because [insert alternative basis].

If some of you find NOA guilty due to [insert basis one], and others find [him/her] guilty due to [insert alternative basis], then you have not reached a unanimous verdict.

3.11.3 Additional Charge: No Materially Different Issues or Consequences

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge should be added if evidence has been presented which shows possible alternative bases of responsibility for a particular offence, and the bases do not involve materially different issues or consequences. For example, manslaughter by unlawful and dangerous act or manslaughter by gross negligence.

It should also be added if the prosecution has argued that the accused could be liable as either a principal or an accessory: See 3.11 Unanimous and Majority Verdicts.

Because of the nature of this case, I need to give you some more directions about how this requirement for unanimity works in relation to [insert relevant offence].

The prosecution has argued that there are two different bases upon which you can find NOA guilty of this offence.

Firstly, the prosecution has argued that NOA is guilty of [insert offence] because [he/she] [insert summary of one basis for guilty].

Alternatively, the prosecution has argued that NOA is guilty of [insert offence] because [he/she] [insert summary of alternative basis].

Although you must all reach the same decision in relation to this offence – either guilty or not guilty – you do not need to all rely on the same basis in reaching that decision. For example, seven of you might find NOA guilty of [insert offence] due to [insert one basis], while the other five of you might find NOA guilty due to [insert alternative basis]. That does not matter – as long as you all reach the same verdict in relation to [insert offence]. In such a situation, your verdict is still considered to be unanimous, despite your different reasoning.

What is important is that you all agree on the final decision. Your verdict of guilty or not guilty in relation to [insert offence] must be unanimous.

3.11.4 Additional Charge: Multiple Discrete Acts

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge may be added if evidence has been presented of multiple acts on the basis of which guilt can be found, but there must be unanimity as to at least one [or a specified number] of those acts having been committed.

This requirement has mostly arisen in relation to a charge of maintaining a sexual relationship with a child under 16, under which the jury must agree on (at least) the same three acts having been committed from amongst all of the acts presented by the prosecution. For this reason, this charge has been drafted in relation to the requirement for agreement on three acts. If necessary, this can be amended to instead require agreement on a different number of acts.

Because of the nature of this case, I need to give you some more directions about how this requirement for unanimity works in relation to [insert relevant offence].

In attempting to prove NOA's guilt in relation to this offence, the prosecution has presented evidence of a number of different acts which it alleges provide the basis for you to find [him/her] guilty.

The prosecution has alleged that [insert summary of the different acts relied upon by the prosecution].

You do not need to find that [he/she] committed all of these acts. In order for you to find NOA guilty, you must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that [he/she] committed at least three of these acts.

However, before you can find NOA guilty of [insert offence], all twelve of you must agree that the same three acts have been proven beyond reasonable doubt. If some of you find NOA guilty on the basis of three particular acts [identify example], and others find [him/her] guilty on the basis of a different three acts [identify example], then you have not reached a unanimous verdict.

3.12 Taking Verdicts

Alternative Charges

1. Unless expressly provided for by law, an accused must not be punished more than once for the same act or omission (Interpretation of Legislation Act 1984 (Vic) s 51; R v Sessions [1998] 2 VR 304).
2. This means that when alternative charges are left to the jury, the accused must not be convicted of the lesser offence if found guilty of the major offence (R v Sessions [1998] 2 VR 304; R v Weeding [1959] VR 298. See also Crimes Act 1958 s 421(2)).
3. When alternative charges of differing gravity are left to the jury, the verdicts should be taken in descending order of gravity. The judge should discharge the jury from returning a verdict on the lesser offence once the jury has returned a verdict of guilty of the major offence (R v Sessions [1998] 2 VR 304; R v Weeding [1959] VR 298).
4. Where the alternative charges are of equal gravity or are inconsistent (e.g. theft or receiving stolen goods), the jury should be asked whether they have found the accused guilty on any charge. If they have, the charge should be identified, the verdict taken, and the jury discharged without verdict on the other charge (R v Seymour (1954) 38 Cr App R 68).

Multiple Accused

5. If multiple accused are tried jointly, it is usual for the judge to charge the jury in respect of all of the accused and all of the charges at the one time, before allowing the jury to deliberate about all of the matters together (R v Houssein (1980) 70 Cr App R 267; R v Wooding (1980) 70 Cr App R 256).
6. However, in a trial of unusual complexity it is open to the trial judge to vary the procedure. For example, a judge may:
    - Direct and take a verdict in respect of each accused separately; or
    - Direct and take a verdict in respect of each charge separately in respect of each accused (see, e.g. R v Newland (1953) 37 Cr App R 154; R v Mitchell [1971] VR 46).
7. Although the trial judge has a discretion to adopt such alternative procedures, the risk to a fair trial is such that this course should not be adopted unless the case really demands it (R v Houssein (1980) 70 Cr App R 267; R v Wooding (1980) 70 Cr App R 256).

8. If the trial judge is contemplating adopting an alternative procedure, it would be desirable to discuss the matter with counsel as soon as possible. The discussions should include submissions about whether the jury is to be kept together throughout their deliberations or permitted to separate under s 50 of the Juries Act 2000 (Vic).

Persistent sexual abuse of a child under 16

9. In Chiro v R [2017] HCA 37, the High Court held that for offences such as persistent sexual abuse of a child (see Crimes Act 1958 s 49J) where there is an extended unanimity requirement concerning proof of constituent acts, the judge should ask the jury to specify the acts proved.
10. When sentencing, a judge must sentence consistently with the jury's verdict. For this kind of offence, that requires information from the jury on the basis for its verdict. Without that information, the judge must sentence on the assumption that the jury were satisfied of the minimum number and the least serious offences that were available to prove the offence charged.
11. For information on asking the jury to identify the basis for its verdict, see Persistent sexual abuse of a child (From 1/7/17).

3.12.1 Charge: Taking a Unanimous Verdict

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Once you have reached a unanimous verdict on [all of] the charge[s], you should push the buzzer in the jury room and tell my tipstaff. [S/he] will then arrange for us all to return to court.

When you have taken your places in the jury box, my associate will ask you whether you have agreed on a verdict, and what your verdict is [in relation to each charge in turn]. You, [Mr/Madam] foreman, will answer "guilty" or "not guilty", according to the decision the jury has reached.

My associate will then read your verdict back to you, to confirm that what [he/she] has recorded is correct. If any of you think that what my associate has recorded is wrong in any way, you should say so immediately. The record of your verdict[s] can then be corrected.

3.12.2 Charge: Taking a Majority Verdict

Click here to obtain Word version of this document for adaptation

I told you earlier what you should do once you reach a unanimous verdict. The procedure is slightly different if you reach a majority verdict.

My associate will first ask you, [Mr/Madam] foreman, whether the jury has reached a verdict, and what your verdict is. Once you have told [him/her] your verdict [in relation to each charge], my associate will ask you whether you have reached the verdict unanimously, or by a majority of eleven [10 or 9] of you. It is your job, [Mr/Madam] foreman, to answer that question.

You need only tell my associate if your verdict was reached unanimously or by a majority. The identity of the minority juror is irrelevant. You will not be asked for that information, and you should not reveal it.

3.12.3 Charge: Alternative Charges on the Indictment

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

In this case, charges [insert principal charge] and [insert alternative charge] relate to the same alleged event, and are alternatives. The prosecution does not suggest that the accused should be convicted of both of these charges, but of one or the other.

When you are delivering your verdict[s], you will first be asked for your verdict on [insert principal offence], which is the more serious charge.[70] If you reach a verdict of guilty in relation to that charge, you will not be asked for a verdict on [insert alternative charge].

It is only if you unanimously reach a verdict of not guilty in relation to [insert principal offence] that you will be asked to deliver a verdict on [insert alternative charge].

I remind you that the accused is entitled to a separate trial of each charge, and that you must not reach your verdict by compromising between them.

3.12.4 Charge: Alternative Charges Not on the Indictment

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

In this case, the accused has been charged with [insert principal offence]. The law says that when a person is charged with this offence, you are entitled to find him/her guilty of the offence of [insert alternative offence] instead.

When you are delivering your verdict[s], you will first be asked for your verdict on [insert principal offence]. If you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA is guilty of that offence, then you will not be asked to return a verdict on [insert alternative offence].

However, if you all agree that NOA is not guilty of [insert principal offence], you will be asked for your verdict on whether or not the prosecution have proved, beyond reasonable doubt, all the elements of [insert alternative offence].

I remind you that the accused is entitled to a separate trial of each charge, and that you must not reach your verdict by compromising between them.

3.13 Perseverance and Majority Verdict Directions

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. This topic addresses two separate directions which may be appropriate where the jury is having difficulty reaching a verdict. The first is an instruction to persevere in attempting to reach a unanimous verdict. The second is a direction allowing the jury to return a majority verdict. Each of these are discussed in more detail below.

Effect of Jury Directions Act 2015

2. Jury directions relating to perseverance and majority verdicts have been significantly changed by the Jury Directions Act 2015 following amendments which commenced on 1 October 2017 by the Jury Directions and Other Acts Amendment Act 2017.

3. The Act:

[70] This charge is based on the assumption that the charges are of differing gravity. If the charges are of the same gravity, it will need to be modified accordingly.

- prohibits the judge from directing the jury to persevere to reach a unanimous verdict at the same time as or immediately before or after giving a majority verdict direction (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 64B);
- abolishes any common law rule or practice to direct the jury to persevere to reach a unanimous verdict before giving a majority verdict direction (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 64C).

4. The effect of these amendments are also explained below.

Perseverance (Black) Directions

5. If it appears that the jury has been deliberating for an extended period without reaching a verdict, it may be appropriate to ask counsel to make submissions about whether the jury should be recalled and given further directions, or should continue to be given uninterrupted time to deliberate (see R v K (1997) 68 SASR 405).
6. If the jury is recalled, the judge should ask the jury whether it desires more time to deliberate, or whether it is experiencing difficulty in reaching a unanimous verdict (R v K (1997) 68 SASR 405).
7. If the jury indicates that it is having difficulty reaching a unanimous verdict, the judge should decide whether to give the jury a direction to persevere, or a direction that it may return a majority verdict (See Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 64C, 64D; Black v R (1993) 179 CLR 44; R v Muto & Eastey [1996] 1 VR 336; R v K (1997) 68 SASR 405). For information on when to direct the jury that it may return a majority verdict, see Exercising the Discretion to Take a Majority Verdict below.
8. If the jury asks a question, the question should be answered and the jury given further time to resolve their differences (in light of that answer) before giving a perseverance or majority verdict direction. To do otherwise may put the jury under pressure to reach a verdict, without satisfying themselves about matters which seem important to them (see R v De Simone [2008] VSCA 216).
9. Following the commencement of Jury Directions Act 2015 s 64B on 1 October 2017, a judge must not direct the jury to persevere to reach a unanimous verdict at the same time as, or immediately before or immediately after, the judge gives a majority direction.

Majority Verdict Directions

What is a Majority Verdict?

10. The meaning of "majority verdict" varies depending on the size of the jury at the time the verdict is returned:
    - If the jury consists of 12 jurors, a majority verdict is a verdict on which 11 of them agree;
    - If the jury consists of 11 jurors, a majority verdict is a verdict on which 10 of them agree;
    - If the jury consists of 10 jurors, a majority verdict is a verdict on which 9 of them agree (Juries Act 2000 (Vic) s 46(1)).

Preconditions for Taking a Majority Verdict

11. A judge may decide to take a majority verdict if:
    - the jury has been deliberating for a period of time that the court thinks is reasonable, having regard to the nature and complexity of the trial and has not reached a unanimous verdict; and
    - the accused is not charged with murder, treason, an offence against sections 71 or 72 of the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981, or an offence against a law of the Commonwealth (Juries Act 2000 (Vic) s 46).

12. Prior to the amendment of the Juries Act 2000 by s 22 of the Jury Directions and Other Acts Amendment Act 2017 on 1 October 2017, the jury was required to have deliberated for at least six hours, not including discrete and substantial breaks from the performance of the jury's task. The six hour requirement was removed by the Jury Directions and Other Acts Amendment Act 2017 s 22.

Exercising the Discretion to Take a Majority Verdict

13. Before the judge gives the jury a majority verdict direction, the judge should invite submissions about the appropriateness of allowing a majority verdict in the circumstances (R v Muto & Eastey [1996] 1 VR 336; R v Ahmet (2009) 22 VR 203). This may include submissions about whether, having regard to the nature and complexity of the trial, a reasonable period of time for deliberation has passed.

14. At common law, it was considered that a judge should usually give a perseverance direction before giving a majority verdict direction, so as to provide the jury with a further opportunity to reach a unanimous verdict. However, Jury Directions Act 2015 s 64C provides that a judge may give a majority direction regardless of whether he or she has previously provided a perseverance direction (Jury Directions 2015 s 64C).

15. Jury Directions Act 2015 s 64B provides that a judge must not give a majority direction at the same time as, or immediately before or immediately after, they give a perseverance direction. This abolishes the common law rule of practice that a jury should be encouraged to persevere towards unanimity even if the judge permits a majority verdict (R v Ahmet (2009) 22 VR 203).

16. If the judge decides to exercise his or her discretion to allow a majority verdict to be given, this should be made clear (R v Di Mauro (2001) 3 VR 62).

17. At common law, a modified perseverance direction was used where the judge had exercised his or her discretion to allow a majority verdict to be given (Black v R (1993) 179 CLR 44; R v Muto & Eastey [1996] 1 VR 336). Jury Directions Act 2015 s 64C requires a clear distinction between the two, as judges giving a majority direction must not refer to the perseverance direction.

Other Directions Concerning Jury Deliberations

18. If the jury asks what happens if they fail to reach a unanimous verdict, the judge should answer the question (Coulson v R [2010] VSCA 146).

19. If that question arises before the judge has exercised their discretion to allow a majority verdict, he or she may wish to seek submissions as to whether it would now be appropriate to do so. If so, a majority verdict direction could be given in response to the question.

20. There is no obligation to mention the potential to discharge the jury without verdict at the time of permitting a majority verdict. It is up to the trial judge to decide whether and when to give this information, provided the judge does not place pressure on the jury to reach a verdict. One form of pressure on a jury is if the judge gives the impression that the deliberations must continue until the jury reaches a verdict (Aulsebrook v The Queen [2019] VSCA 238, [39]–[47]; Millar v The Queen [2003] WASCA 211).

21. Historically, judges have told the jury about the option to discharge the jury as part of a perseverance direction given before allowing the jury to return a majority verdict. As explained above, Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 64B and 64C have abolished that practice.

22. If the judge does not consider it appropriate to exercise his or her discretion to take a majority verdict, the judge's answer could encourage the jury to persevere with their deliberations, and inform them that while in some circumstances a majority verdict may be allowed, those circumstances have not yet arisen. This answers the jury's question and complies with the requirement that the two directions may not be given at the same time (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 64B, as amended in 2017).

23. In some cases it may be appropriate for a trial judge to make suggestions as to what might be a convenient way for the jury to approach their deliberations, so that they can reach a unanimous verdict (Gassy v R (2008) 236 CLR 293).
24. If a judge makes such suggestions, he or she must be especially careful to maintain a proper balance between the prosecution case and the defence case (Gassy v R (2008) 236 CLR 293).
25. This means that if the judge suggests a "way forward" that leads to conviction, s/he must balance that suggestion with a reminder of the paths that lead to the opposite outcome (Gassy v R (2008) 236 CLR 293).
26. This reminder of the countervailing considerations must be given contemporaneously with the suggested "way forward". It is not sufficient to assume that the jury will keep in mind any counter-balancing directions given earlier (Gassy v R (2008) 236 CLR 293).
27. The judge should also emphasise the fact that he or she is merely making suggestions, which the jury are free to accept or reject as they see fit (Gassy v R (2008) 236 CLR 293).

3.13.1 Charge: Unanimous Verdict Required

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

I have been told that you have not yet been able to reach a verdict. Although I have the power to dismiss you without a verdict having been reached, I should only do this if I am satisfied that you will not be able to agree on a verdict even if you are given more time for discussion. I am not yet satisfied that this is the case.

What I urge you to do is to return to the jury room and try to resolve your differences. Experience has shown that juries can often agree if given more time to consider and discuss the issues.

Each of you has affirmed or sworn that you will give a true verdict according to the evidence. That is an important responsibility. You must fulfil it to the best of your ability. Each of you takes into the jury room your individual experience and wisdom – and you are expected to judge the evidence fairly and honestly in that light.

You also have a duty to listen carefully and with an open mind to the views of every other juror. You should calmly weigh up each other's opinions about the evidence, and test them by discussion. Calm and rational discussion of the evidence often leads to a better understanding of the differences of opinion which juries may have. This discussion may convince you that your original opinion was wrong.

That said, you must always reach your own decision, according to your own view of the evidence. If, after calmly considering the evidence and listening to the opinions of other jurors, you cannot honestly agree with their conclusions, then you should not change your mind simply to reach a unanimous verdict. Indeed, you must not agree to a verdict if you do not honestly and genuinely think that it is the correct one. To do that would breach your duty to this court.

But, as I said earlier, experience has shown that often juries are able to agree in the end, if they are given more time to consider and discuss the evidence. For that reason, judges usually request juries to re-examine the matters that they disagree about, and make a further attempt to reach a verdict. That is what I am asking you to do here. Please return to the jury room and consult with one another. Express your own views. Listen to the views of others. Discuss your differences with an open mind. Try your best to reach a unanimous verdict.

3.13.2 Charge: Majority Verdict Allowed No Perseverance Direction

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge can be used when a judge has exercised their discretion to allow a majority verdict, and no perseverance direction has been given. Judges must not give a perseverance direction at the same time as, or immediately before or immediately after, giving a majority direction (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 64B–64C, as amended in 2017).

I have been told that you have not yet been able to reach a verdict. Although I have the power to dismiss you without a verdict having been reached, I should only do this if I am satisfied that you will not be able to agree on a verdict even if you are given more time for discussion. I am not yet satisfied that this is the case.

However, I am satisfied that you should now be allowed to give a majority verdict.[71] This means that if you cannot all agree on a verdict, I will accept a verdict that is agreed upon by eleven [10 or 9] of you.

Please return to the jury room and consult with one another. Express your own views. Listen carefully to the views of others jurors. Discuss your differences with an open mind. Calmly weigh up each other's opinions about the evidence, and test them by discussion.

If eleven of the twelve [10/11 or 9/10] of you – reach agreement on a verdict, then you can decide to return a majority verdict.

3.14 Intermediaries and Ground Rules Explained

This chapter contains two directions for use where the case involved an intermediary or modifications to questioning practices due to ground rules hearings.

For information about these procedures, see the Victorian Criminal Proceedings Manual.

3.14.1 Charge: Explaining Intermediaries and Adaptations

Click here for a Word version of this document for adaptation

I now want to direct you about the evidence of NOC.

Before NOC gave evidence, NOI[72] was sworn/took an affirmation. NOI is an intermediary. Because NOC [was a child/had a cognitive impairment], the law allows an intermediary to be appointed to help the parties question NOC. NOI is an independent person who was here to assist the court by providing advice on how NOC should be questioned.

As a [child/person with a cognitive impairment], NOC's language skills are not as developed as those of many other witnesses.

NOI's role was to ensure NOC was questioned using language that [he/she] could understand. Giving evidence in court can be a stressful process, especially for a [child/person with a cognitive impairment]. At an earlier hearing, NOI, [insert name of prosecution counsel] and [insert name of defence counsel] and I discussed how NOC would be asked questions.

[71] A majority verdict is not permitted in relation to charges of murder, treason, offences against sections 71 or 72 of the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981 (Vic), or offences against a law of the Commonwealth (Juries Act 2000 s 46).

[72] Name of Intermediary.

This was to ensure the questions were formulated in such a way that NOC could understand what was being asked of him/her.

[If the judge or intermediary interrupted to reinforce ground rules, add the following shaded section.]

As part of this, NOI/I interrupted the barristers a few times during the questioning to make sure the barristers framed their question in language that NOC could understand.

This included: [Identify interventions by the intermediary, such as:

- suggesting the barrister rephrase questions;
- asking the witness whether [he/she] understood the question;
- asking the witness whether [he/she] needed a break.]

You would appreciate that, as a matter of fairness, these adjustments [and interruptions] were necessary to ensure that NOC was able to understand the questions and that NOC was able to answer those questions without being overwhelmed by complex language or by other stressors or pressures that might affect his/her evidence.

It is also important to understand that ordinarily cross examination is the method that lawyers use to test evidence. However in the case of a [child/person with cognitive impairment] cross-examination cannot proceed in the same robust manner that it might for an adult witness. The form of questions, the tone of the questions and the content of the questions must be adapted to accommodate the age and understanding of the child. The law requires that this be done.

Taking those matters into account, you must not form the view that because a less confrontational approach was taken in the cross examination of NOC, that the allegations are any less challenged or less strenuously denied.

Ultimately, it is for you to decide what parts of NOC's evidence you accept, if any, and whether the prosecution has proved its case beyond reasonable doubt. You must base your decision on the evidence you hear in court and must not allow a different process of questioning witnesses to distract you from the issues in the case and the need to assess the evidence.

3.14.2 Charge: Adaptations at Ground Rules Hearings

Click here for a Word version of this document for adaptation

I now want to make a few comments about how NOC gave evidence.

[If other witnesses were questioned in a conventional way, add the following shaded section.]

You may also have noticed that NOC was questioned in a different way from other witnesses. Generally, the questions were simpler, and more direct.

As a [child/person with a cognitive impairment], NOC's language skills are not as developed as many other witnesses. [insert name of prosecution counsel] and [insert name of defence counsel] therefore had to adapt their questions to match NOC's language ability. Otherwise, there was a risk that NOC would have become tired, stressed or confused, and might have given answers that [he/she] didn't mean to give. This would not have been fair to NOC and would have made your task of assessing the evidence more difficult than it should be.

Despite the different style and tone of [insert name of defence counsel's] questions, the defence say that you should not accept NOC's evidence. The defence say [refer to relevant aspects of defence case in relation to NOC]. The prosecution argues that [refer to relevant aspects of prosecution case in relation to NOC].

Ultimately, it is for you to decide what parts of NOC's evidence you accept, if any, and whether the prosecution has proved its case beyond reasonable doubt.

Questions

If, at any stage of your discussions, you would like me to repeat or explain any directions of law I have given you, please do not hesitate to ask. It is fundamental that you understand the principles you are required to apply. If you have any doubt about those principles, then you are not only entitled to ask for further assistance, but you should ask for it.

You should do this by handing a note to my tipstaff indicating what your question is. S/he will pass it to me, and after discussing the matter with counsel, we will reassemble in court to assist you.

There is really only one thing that you must not include on any note, and that is the numbers involved in any part of your discussions such as any vote within the jury. That matter must remain completely confidential to you and that includes even telling me about it in a note. Please in any note leave the numbers out.[73]

Transcripts

[If the jury has not been provided with a transcript, add the following shaded section:]

I also want to remind you that all of the evidence in this trial has been recorded and transcribed. If at any time during your discussions you wish to have a certain section of the evidence replayed to you, or have a section of the transcript [read back/provided] to you, please let me know. You can do this by providing a note to my tipstaff, outlining the part of the evidence you wish to hear.

Conclusion

I have now completed my summing-up. With a final reminder that any verdict[s] you reach must be unanimous, I ask you to go to the jury room to consider your verdict[s]. When you have reached a verdict or if you have a question, please send a note to the court through the tipstaff.

3.16 Consolidated Final Directions

Click here for a downloadable version of this document

Note: This document replicates the directions in 3.2–3.9, 3.11, 3.12 and 3.15. If the case involves an intermediary, the direction in 3.14 should be added at an appropriate point.

[73] In MRJ v R (2011) 33 VR 306; [2011] VSCA 374, the Court of Appeal stated that jurors should be instructed to omit any information on the outcome of discussions when asking for further directions or assistance.

Overview of Final Directions

Members of the jury, before you leave the court to consider your verdict, I must give you instructions on the law and the evidence. There are three parts to these instructions.

First, I will remind you of several important principles of law which apply to this case. While I have already told you some of these principles at different times during the trial, it is important that I tell them to you again – not only to remind you of what I said earlier, but also to place those principles in the context of the trial which has now taken place. You must apply these instructions carefully.

Secondly, I will tell you the issues that you need to decide, and will refer you to the evidence that relates to those issues and the arguments from prosecution and defence counsel. In doing this, I will have to be selective. The mere fact that I don't mention certain evidence does not mean that that evidence is not important. Similarly, the fact that I include certain evidence does not make that evidence more important than other evidence. You must consider all of the evidence, not just the parts of it that I mention. Which parts of that evidence are important or not important is a matter for you to determine.

Thirdly, I will explain what verdict[s] you may return in this case, and how you may wish to approach your discussion of the case in the jury room.

Remember, if at any time you have a question about anything I say, you are free to ask me by passing a note to my tipstaff.

Review of the Role of the Jury

In this case, it is alleged by the prosecution that NOA committed the offence[s] of [insert offences].[74] S/he has pleaded "not guilty", and so it is for you, and you alone, to decide whether s/he is guilty or not guilty of [this/these] crime[s].

You do that by deciding what the facts are in this case. As I have told you, you are the only ones in this court who can make a decision about the facts. You make that decision from all of the evidence that has been given during the trial.

You then apply the law to the facts that you have found, and decide whether the accused is guilty or not guilty of the offence[s] charged.

Review of the Role of the Judge

It is my role, as the judge, to explain to you the principles of law that you must apply to make your decision. You must accept and follow all of those directions.

I want to emphasise again that it is not my responsibility to decide this case – that is your role. The verdict that you return has absolutely nothing to do with me. So while you must follow any directions I give you about the law, you are not bound by any comments I may make about the facts.

As I told you at the start of the trial, it is unlikely that I will make any comments about the evidence. If I do make a comment about the evidence, you must not give it any extra weight because I, as the judge, have made that comment. You must disregard any comment I make about the evidence, unless you agree with that view after making own independent assessment of the evidence. That is what I mean when I say that you alone are the judges of the facts in this case.

[74] This charge is drafted for cases involving one accused. If the case involves multiple accused, it will need to be modified accordingly.

Review of the Role of Counsel

Throughout the trial, counsel have presented the prosecution and defence cases. While their comments and arguments have been designed to assist you to reach your decision, you also do not need to accept what they have said. Of course, if you agree with an argument they have presented, you can adopt it. But if you do not agree with their view, you must put it aside.

Review of the Need to Decide Solely on the Evidence

I have told you that it is your task to determine the facts in this case. In determining the facts, you must consider all of the evidence that you heard from the witness box. Remember, it is the answers the witnesses gave that are the evidence, not the questions they were asked.

You must also take into account the exhibits that were tendered. These include [insert examples]. When you go to the jury room to decide this case, [most of/some of] the exhibits will go with you, where you may examine them. Consider them along with the rest of the evidence and in exactly the same way.[75] [However, the following exhibits will not go with you to the jury room [insert exhibits]].

In addition, in this case the following admissions were made: [insert admissions]. You must accept these admissions as established facts.

Nothing else is evidence in this case. As I have told you, this includes any comments counsel make about the facts.[76] It also includes:

[Identify other relevant matters which do not constitute evidence in the case. See 2.2 Providing Documents to the Jury and associated charges. It may be appropriate to insert charges relating to these matters here.]

It your duty to decide this case only on the basis of the witnesses' testimony, [the admissions] and the exhibits. You should consider the evidence which is relevant to a particular matter in its individual parts and as a whole, and come to a decision one way or another about the facts.

[75] Depending on the nature of the evidence, it may be necessary to warn the jury of the possible dangers of conducting experiments in the jury room: see 1.5 Decide Solely on the Evidence for further information.

[76] If the accused is unrepresented, the jury should be told that what s/he said in his/her addresses, or when questioning witnesses, is also not evidence.

As I have told you, in doing this you must ignore all other considerations, such as any feelings of sympathy or prejudice you may have for anyone involved in the case. You should not, for example, be influenced by [insert case specific examples].[77] Such emotions have no part to play in your decision.

Remember, you are the judges of the facts. That means that in relation to all of the issues in this case, you must act like judges. You must dispassionately weigh the evidence logically and with an open mind, not according to your passion or feelings.

Outside Information

At the start of the trial I also told you that you must not base your decision on any information you may have obtained outside this courtroom. For example, you must completely ignore anything that you have seen or heard in the media about this case, or about the people involved in it. You must consider only the evidence that has been presented to you here in court.[78]

Circumstantial Evidence and Inferences

I will now give you some directions about how you approach the evidence in this case.

Evidence comes in many forms. It can be evidence about what someone saw or heard. It can be an exhibit admitted into evidence. It can be someone's opinion.

Some evidence can prove a fact directly. For example, if a witness said that s/he saw or heard it raining outside, that would be direct evidence of the fact that it was raining.

Other evidence can prove a fact indirectly. For example, if a witness said that s/he saw someone enter the courthouse wearing a raincoat and carrying an umbrella, both dripping wet, that would be indirect or 'circumstantial' evidence of the fact that it was raining outside. You can conclude from the witness's evidence that it was raining, even though s/he didn't actually see or hear the rain.

As far as the law is concerned, it makes no difference whether evidence is direct or indirect. Although people often believe that indirect or circumstantial evidence is weaker than direct evidence, that is not true. It can be just as strong or even stronger. What matters is how strong or weak the particular evidence is, not whether it is direct or indirect.

However, you must take care when drawing conclusions from indirect evidence. You should consider all of the evidence in the case, and only draw reasonable conclusions based on the evidence that you accept. Do not guess. While we might be willing to act on the basis of guesses in our daily lives, it is not safe to do that in a criminal trial.

[77] Some matters which it may be appropriate to point out (as they could conceivably give rise to prejudice or sympathy) include:

•The nature of the injuries suffered by the complainant;

•The race or ethnicity of the accused or the complainant;

•The fact that the accused or the complainant are drug users.

In some cases, it may be appropriate to point out that although a party's behaviour does not accord with what the jury might think is morally acceptable, the jury is not a court of morals. Everyone has the right to be treated equally before the law.

[78] If there has been significant publicity about the case or the parties involved, it may be necessary to give a more detailed warning.

[In cases involving a significant amount of circumstantial evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In determining whether a conclusion is reasonable, you should look at all of the evidence together. It may help you to consider the pieces of evidence to be like the pieces of a jigsaw puzzle. While one piece may not be very helpful by itself, when all the pieces are put together the picture may become clear.

However, when putting all the pieces together, you must take care not to jump to conclusions. It is sometimes easy for people to be too readily persuaded of a fact, on the basis of insufficient evidence or evidence that turns out to be truly coincidental. Once convinced of that fact, they may then seek support for it in the other evidence, perhaps distorting that evidence to fit their theory or disregarding 'inconvenient' facts. You must make sure that you do not do this. You must keep an open mind, and be prepared to change your views.

You may only convict the accused if you are satisfied that his/her guilt is the only reasonable conclusion to be drawn from the whole of the evidence, both direct and indirect. If there is another reasonable view of the facts which is consistent with the accused's innocence, then the prosecution will not have proved his/her guilt beyond reasonable doubt, and you must acquit him/her.

Review of the Assessment of Witnesses

You have now listened to what each witness has said, and watched how they presented their evidence and answered the questions under cross-examination. No further evidence will be given.

To decide what the facts are in this case, you now need to assess this evidence. It is up to you to decide how much or how little of the testimony of any witness you will believe or rely on. You may believe all, some or none of a witness's evidence. No one can tell you how to approach any particular witness's evidence in this regard.

It is also for you to decide what weight should be attached to any particular evidence – that is, the extent to which the evidence helps you to determine the relevant issues.

As I mentioned at the start of the trial, in assessing witnesses' evidence, some matters which may concern you include their credibility and reliability. It is for you to judge whether the witnesses told the truth, and whether they correctly recalled the facts about which they gave evidence. This is something you do all the time in your daily lives. There is no special skill involved – you just need to use your common sense.

While you may take into account the witness's manner when he or she gave evidence, you should be careful when doing so. As I noted at the start of the case, giving evidence in a trial is not common, and may be a stressful experience. People react and appear differently. Witnesses come from different backgrounds, and have different abilities, values and life experiences. There are too many variables to make the manner in which a witness gives evidence the only, or even the most important, factor in your decision.

In making your decision, do not consider only the witnesses' testimony. Also take into account the exhibits [and admissions]. Consider all of the evidence in the case, use what you believe is true and reject what you disbelieve. Give each part of it the importance which you – as the judge of the facts – think it should be given, and then determine what, in your judgment, are the true facts.

- 4.1 The Accused as a Witness*;*

- 4.5 Confessions and Admissions*;*
- 4.12 Identification Evidence*;*

Review of the Onus and Standard of Proof

I want to emphasise again that under our justice system people are presumed to be innocent, unless and until they are proved guilty. So before you may return a verdict of guilty, the prosecution must satisfy you that [each of] the accused is guilty of the charge[s] in question. The accused does/do not have to prove anything.

The prosecution must do this by proving [each of] the accused's guilt of the charge[s] beyond reasonable doubt.

Beyond reasonable doubt is the highest standard of proof that our law demands. It is not enough for the prosecution to prove that the accused is probably guilty, or very likely to be guilty.

As I have told you, it is almost impossible to prove anything with absolute certainty when reconstructing past events and the prosecution does not have to do so. A reasonable doubt is not an imaginary or fanciful doubt, or an unrealistic possibility.

You cannot be satisfied the accused is guilty if you have a reasonable doubt about whether the accused is guilty.

As I have told you, these words mean exactly what they say – proof beyond reasonable doubt.

The prosecution does not need to prove every fact that they allege to this standard. It is the essential ingredients or "elements" of the charge[s] that they must prove beyond reasonable doubt. I will explain these elements in detail in a moment.

[If a defence is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution must also disprove any possible defences beyond reasonable doubt. In this case, that means the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was not [insert relevant defence]. I will also explain this defence in more detail shortly.

It is only if you are satisfied that the prosecution has proven all of the elements of a charge [and disproved all defences] beyond reasonable doubt that you may find the accused guilty of that charge. If you are not satisfied that the prosecution has done this, your verdict must be "Not Guilty".

Sole Evidence Direction

[If there is a single piece of evidence relied on to prove one or more elements, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the only evidence that [identify relevant elements or facts in issue] is the evidence that [describe relevant single piece of evidence, e.g. "NOA confessed to NOW"]. It follows that you cannot be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that [identify relevant elements or facts in issue] unless you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the evidence of [describe relevant single piece of evidence] is true and proves [identify relevant elements or facts in issue].

Liberato Direction

[If the case turns on a conflict between the evidence of a prosecution witness and a defence witness, and there is a reasonable likelihood that the jury will think that they must believe the defence evidence to be true before they can acquit the accused, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, there is a clear conflict between the evidence of [insert name of prosecution witness] and the evidence of [insert name of defence witness].

It is not necessary for you to accept [insert name of defence witness's] evidence in order to find the accused "not guilty". In keeping with the requirement that the prosecution must prove their case beyond reasonable doubt, you must acquit NOA if [insert name of defence witness's] evidence gives rise to a reasonable doubt.

This is the case even if you prefer the evidence of [insert name of prosecution witness] to the evidence of [insert name of defence witness]. It is not sufficient for you merely to find the prosecution case to be preferable to the defence case. Before you can convict NOA, you must be satisfied that the prosecution have proven their case beyond reasonable doubt.

So even if you do not think [insert name of defence witness] is telling the truth, but are unsure where the truth lies, you must find the accused "not guilty".

In fact, even if you are convinced that [insert name of defence witness's] evidence is not true, it is not the case that you must convict NOA. In such circumstances, you should put [insert name of defence witness's] evidence to one side, and ask yourself whether the prosecution have proved the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt on the basis of the evidence you do accept.

Review of Separate Consideration – Multiple Accused

[If the case involves multiple accused, add the following shaded section.]

As you know, in this trial there are really [insert number] trials [all] being heard together for convenience.

I want to remind you that you must be careful not to allow convenience to override justice. The accused and the prosecution are entitled to have the case against each accused considered separately.

You must consider the case against each accused separately, in light only of the evidence which applies to that accused. You must ask yourselves, in relation to each accused, whether the evidence relating to that accused has satisfied you, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he is guilty of the offence s/he has been charged with. If the answer is yes, then you should find him/her guilty. If the answer is no, then you should find him/her not guilty.

You will note that I said you must consider the case against each accused "in light only of the evidence which applies to that accused". This is because some of the evidence you have heard in this case is only relevant to the case against one accused or another. If a particular piece of evidence is only relevant to one accused, you may only use it when deciding whether or not that accused is guilty. You must not consider it in relation to [any of] the other accused.

In this case [instruct jury about which evidence is or is not admissible in relation to each accused].

Review of Separate Consideration – Multiple Charges

[If the case involves multiple charges, add the following shaded section.]

As you know, in this trial the prosecution has brought [insert number] charges against the accused. As I explained earlier, while these are separate matters, they are [all] being dealt with in the one trial for convenience.

I want to remind you that you must be careful not to allow convenience to override justice. Both the prosecution and the accused are entitled to have each charge considered separately.

It would therefore be wrong to say that simply because you find the accused guilty or not guilty of one charge, that s/he must be guilty or not guilty, as the case may be, of another.

[If logic dictates that a finding in relation to one charge is material to another charge, this should be clearly explained to the jury here. For example, the jury should be told if an acquittal on one charge would require an acquittal on another.]

Each charge must be considered separately, in light only of the evidence which applies to it. You must ask yourselves, in relation to each charge, whether the evidence relating to that charge has satisfied you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused is guilty of that particular crime. If the answer is yes, then you should find the accused guilty of that charge. If the answer is no, then you should find the accused not guilty of it.

You will note that I said you must consider each charge "in light only of the evidence which applies to it". This is because some of the evidence you have heard in this case is only relevant to one charge or another. If a particular piece of evidence is only relevant to one charge, you may only use it when deciding whether or not the accused is guilty of that charge. You must not consider it in relation to [any of] the other charge[s].

In this case [instruct jury about which evidence is or is not admissible in relation to each charge].

Judge's Summary of Issues and Evidence

I am now going to take you to the issues you need to decide, and remind you of some of the evidence that has been given in relation to those issues. Before doing so, I want to remind you again that the mere fact that I may leave out a part of a particular witness's evidence does not mean that that evidence is not important.

Similarly, the fact that I include evidence from a particular witness does not make that evidence more important than the evidence of other witnesses. You must consider all of the evidence, not just the parts of it that I mention. Which parts of that evidence are important or not important is a matter for you to determine.

I also want to emphasise again that it is not my responsibility to decide this case – that is your role. So while you must follow any directions I give you about the law, you are not bound by any comments I may make about the facts. If I happen to express any views upon questions of fact, you must disregard those views, unless they happen to agree with your own assessment of the evidence.

[Insert directions on relevant offences, incorporating references to the evidence, parties' arguments and evidentiary directions. Judges should only refer to so much of the evidence as is relevant to the real issues in the case, clearly relating the evidence to the issues.]

Unanimous and Majority Verdicts

I will now turn to the third part of my directions – The verdicts you can return and how you reach them.

In almost all criminal cases, a verdict of guilty or not guilty must be unanimous. That is, whatever decision you make, you must all agree on it.

So if, for example, you are to find NOA guilty of [insert charge 1], then you must all agree that [he/she] is guilty of that offence. In exactly the same way, if you are to find NOA not guilty of [insert charge 1], then you must all agree that [he/she] is not guilty of that offence.

However, this requirement does not mean that you must all reach your verdict for the same reasons. Indeed, you may each rely on quite different reasons for making your decision. For example, you may each rely upon different parts of the evidence, or you may each emphasise different aspects of the evidence.

What is important is that, no matter how you reach your verdict, you all agree. Your verdict of guilty or not guilty [in relation to each charge/for each person charged] must be unanimous, the agreed decision of you all.

You may have noted that I said that a verdict must be unanimous in "almost all" criminal cases. There are some circumstances in which a jury is allowed to give a majority verdict instead of a unanimous verdict. However, this is not yet one of those cases and may never be. I will tell you if the situation changes. Until I do, you should consider that your verdict[s] of guilty or not guilty must be unanimous.[79]

Materially Different Issues or Consequences

[The following shaded section may be added if evidence has been presented which shows possible alternative bases of responsibility for a particular offence, and the bases involve materially different issues or consequences*. For example, culpable driving causing death due to gross negligence or culpable driving causing death due to intoxication*.]

Because of the nature of this case, I need to give you some more directions about how this requirement for unanimity works in relation to [insert relevant offence].

The prosecution has argued that there are two different bases upon which you can find NOA guilty of this offence.

Firstly, the prosecution has argued that NOA is guilty of [insert offence] because [he/she] [insert summary of one basis for guilty].

Alternatively, the prosecution has argued that NOA is guilty of [insert offence] because [he/she] [insert summary of alternative basis].

In order to find NOA guilty of [insert offence], you only need to find that one of these two alternatives has been proven beyond reasonable doubt.

However, all twelve of you must agree that the same alternative has been proven. For example, all of you must agree that NOA was guilty because [insert one basis]. Or all of you must agree that NOA was guilty because [insert alternative basis].

If some of you find NOA guilty due to [insert basis one], and others find [him/her] guilty due to [insert alternative basis], then you have not reached a unanimous verdict.

[79] This paragraph should be excluded in cases of murder, treason, offences against sections 71 or 72 of the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981, or offences against a law of the Commonwealth, as majority verdicts are not permitted in relation to such offences (Juries Act 2000 s 46).

No Materially Different Issues or Consequences

[The following shaded section should be added if evidence has been presented which shows possible alternative bases of responsibility for a particular offence, and the bases do not involve materially different issues or consequences*. For example, manslaughter by unlawful and dangerous act or manslaughter by gross negligence.*

It should also be added if the prosecution has argued that the accused could be liable as either a principal or an accessory.]

Because of the nature of this case, I need to give you some more directions about how this requirement for unanimity works in relation to [insert relevant offence].

The prosecution has argued that there are two different bases upon which you can find NOA guilty of this offence.

Firstly, the prosecution has argued that NOA is guilty of [insert offence] because [he/she] [insert summary of one basis for guilty].

Alternatively, the prosecution has argued that NOA is guilty of [insert offence] because [he/she] [insert summary of alternative basis].

Although you must all reach the same decision in relation to this offence – either guilty or not guilty – you do not need to all rely on the same basis in reaching that decision. For example, seven of you might find NOA guilty of [insert offence] due to [insert one basis], while the other five of you might find NOA guilty due to [insert alternative basis]. That does not matter – as long as you all reach the same verdict in relation to [insert offence]. In such a situation, your verdict is still considered to be unanimous, despite your different reasoning.

What is important is that you all agree on the final decision. Your verdict of guilty or not guilty in relation to [insert offence] must be unanimous.

Multiple Discrete Acts

[The following shaded section may be added if evidence has been presented of multiple acts on the basis of which guilt can be found, but there must be unanimity as to at least one [or a specified number] of those acts having been committed.

This requirement has mostly arisen in relation to a charge of maintaining a sexual relationship with a child under 16, under which the jury must agree on (at least) the same three acts having been committed from amongst all of the acts presented by the prosecution. For this reason, this charge has been drafted in relation to the requirement for agreement on three acts. If necessary, this can be amended to instead require agreement on a different number of acts.]

Because of the nature of this case, I need to give you some more directions about how this requirement for unanimity works in relation to [insert relevant offence].

In attempting to prove NOA's guilt in relation to this offence, the prosecution has presented evidence of a number of different acts which it alleges provide the basis for you to find [him/her] guilty.

The prosecution has alleged that [insert summary of the different acts relied upon by the prosecution].

You do not need to find that [he/she] committed all of these acts. In order for you to find NOA guilty, you must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that [he/she] committed at least three of these acts.

However, before you can find NOA guilty of [insert name of offence], all twelve of you must agree that the same three acts have been proven beyond reasonable doubt. If some of you find NOA guilty on the basis of three particular acts [for example …], and others find [him/her] guilty on the basis of a different three acts [such as …], then you have not reached a unanimous verdict.

Taking a Unanimous Verdict

Once you have reached a unanimous verdict on [all of] the charge[s], you should push the buzzer in the jury room and tell my tipstaff. [He/she] will then arrange for us all to return to court.

When you have taken your places in the jury box, my associate will ask you whether you have agreed on a verdict, and what your verdict is [in relation to each charge in turn]. You, [Mr/Madam] foreperson, will answer "guilty" or "not guilty", according to the decision the jury has reached.

My associate will then read your verdict back to you, to confirm that what [he/she] has recorded is correct. If any of you think that what my associate has recorded is wrong in any way, you should say so immediately. The record of your verdict[s] can then be corrected.

Alternative Charges on the Indictment

[If there are alternative charges on the indictment, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, charges [insert principal charge] and [insert alternative charge] relate to the same alleged event, and are alternatives. The prosecution does not suggest that the accused should be convicted of both of these charges, but of one or the other.

When you are delivering your verdict[s], you will first be asked for your verdict on [insert principal offence], which is the more serious charge.[80] If you reach a verdict of guilty in relation to that charge, you will not be asked for a verdict on [insert alternative charge].

It is only if you unanimously reach a verdict of not guilty in relation to [insert principal offence] that you will be asked to deliver a verdict on [insert alternative charge].

I remind you that the accused is entitled to a separate trial of each charge, and that you must not reach your verdict by compromising between them.

Alternative Charges Not on the Indictment

[If there are alternative charges not on the indictment, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the accused has been charged with [insert principal offence]. The law says that when a person is charged with this offence, you are entitled to find him/her guilty of the offence of [insert alternative offence] instead.

When you are delivering your verdict[s], you will first be asked for your verdict on [insert principle offence]. If you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA is guilty of that offence, then you will not be asked to return a verdict on [insert alternative offence].

However, if you all agree that NOA is not guilty of [insert principle offence], you will be asked for your verdict on whether the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, all the elements of [insert alternative offence].

I remind you that the accused is entitled to a separate trial of each charge, and that you must not reach your verdict by compromising between them.

[80] This charge is based on the assumption that the charges are of differing gravity. If the charges are of the same gravity, it will need to be modified accordingly.

Concluding Remarks

Questions

If, at any stage of your discussions, you would like me to repeat or explain any directions of law I have given you, please do not hesitate to ask. It is fundamental that you understand the principles you are required to apply. If you have any doubt about those principles, then you are not only entitled to ask for further assistance, but you should ask for it.

You should do this by handing a note to my tipstaff indicating what your question is. S/he will pass it to me, and after discussing the matter with counsel, we will reassemble in court to assist you.

There is really only one thing that you must not include on any note, and that is the numbers involved in any part of your discussions such as any vote within the jury. That matter must remain completely confidential to you and that includes even telling me about it in a note. Please in any note leave the numbers out.[81]

Transcripts

[If the jury has not been provided with a transcript, add the following shaded section.]

I also want to remind you that all of the evidence in this trial has been recorded and transcribed. If at any time during your discussions you wish to have a certain section of the evidence replayed to you, or have a section of the transcript [read back/provided] to you, please let me know. You can do this by providing a note to my tipstaff, outlining the part of the evidence you wish to hear.

Conclusion

I have now completed my summing-up. With a final reminder that any verdict[s] you reach must be unanimous, I ask you to go to the jury room to consider your verdict[s]. When you have reached a verdict or if you have a question, please send a note to the court through the tipstaff.

4 Evidentiary Directions

4.1 The Accused as a Witness

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Warning! The law relating to directions on the accused giving evidence was modified by the Jury Directions and Other Acts Amendment Act 2017. There has not yet been appellate guidance on the operation of these provisions. This information should be used with caution. Further information about the Jury Directions and Other Acts Amendment Act 2017 is available in the Department of Justice and Regulation report, 'Jury Directions: A Jury-Centric Approach Part 2'

1. This topic addresses the general directions that may be given when the accused has chosen to give evidence. It does not address any specific directions that may be required where the accused is cross-examined about matters such as his or her character. Those issues are addressed in other chapters in Part 4 of the Charge Book (see, e.g. 4.3 Character Evidence).

[81] In MRJ v R [2011] VSCA 374, the Court of Appeal stated that jurors should be instructed to omit any information on the outcome of discussions when asking for further directions or assistance.

When Can the Accused Give Evidence?

2. As the accused is a competent, but not compellable, witness for the defence (Evidence Act 2008 ss 12, 17), in every criminal trial the accused will have a choice about whether or not to give evidence.

3. While the accused's evidence should usually be given before the evidence of any other defence witnesses (as this will prevent the jury from thinking that the accused tailored his or her evidence to fit with the other evidence in the case: RPS v R (2000) 199 CLR 620), this is not mandatory (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 231(4)).

Effect of Jury Directions Act 2015

4. The law on jury directions about an accused giving evidence has been changed by the Jury Directions Act 2015 following amendments by the Jury Directions and Other Acts Amendment Act 2017, which commenced on 1 October 2017.

5. The Act:

    - Prohibits the trial judge, prosecution and defence from saying or suggesting to the jury:
        - That an interest in the outcome of the trial is a factor to take into account when assessing the evidence of witnesses generally; or
        - That the evidence of an accused is less credible, or requires more careful scrutiny, because any person who is on trial has an interest in the outcome of that trial (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44H);
    - Provides that the defence may request that the judge direct the jury on the accused giving evidence or the accused's interest in the outcome of the trial; and specifies what the judge must explain in such directions (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44I);
    - In relation to the accused's evidence, prohibits directions about:
        - Whether the accused is under more stress than any other witness; or
        - that the accused gave evidence because a guilty person who gives evidence will more likely be believed; or
        - that the accused gave evidence because an innocent person can do nothing more than give evidence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44J); and
    - Abolishes any rule of common law that:
        - prohibits a judge from directing a jury on the interest a witness or an accused may have in the outcome of a trial; and
        - requires or permits a judge to direct a jury about whether the accused is under more stress than any other witness; or that the accused gave evidence because a guilty person who gives evidence will more likely be believed, or an innocent person can do nothing more than give evidence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44K).

Content of Directions

6. The need for any direction about the accused as a witness depends on whether a direction is sought or whether there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving a direction in the absence of any request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

7. Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44I, as amended in 2017, sets out two types of directions about an accused giving evidence:

(a) A direction about the giving of evidence by the accused (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44I(1)(a)); and

(b) A direction about the interest the accused has in the outcome of the trial (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44I(1)(b)).

8. While s 44I(2) sets out four directions that must be given when the defence requests a direction "referred to in subsection (1)", the approach adopted in this Charge Book is that the directions in s 44I(2)(a)–(c) are relevant when the defence requests a direction about the accused giving evidence under s 44I(1)(a), while the direction in s 44I(2)(d) is only relevant when the defence requests a direction under s 44I(1)(b).

9. Therefore, where the defence has requested a direction about the accused giving evidence, the judge must explain that:

   - The accused is not required to give evidence; and
   - The fact that the accused has given evidence does not change the prosecution's obligation to prove that the accused is guilty; and
   - The jury must assess the evidence of the accused in the same way that the jury assesses the evidence of any other witness (see 1.6 Assessing Witnesses for information about the assessment of other witnesses' evidence) (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44I(2)(a)–(c));

10. When the defence requests a direction about the accused's interest in the outcome of the trial, the judge must explain that:

    - The jury must not give less weight to the evidence of the accused just because any person who is on trial has an interest in the outcome of that trial (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44I(2)(d)).

11. The directions provided by s 44I(2) largely reflect the common law (see Robinson v R (No 2) (1991) 180 CLR 531; R v D'Arcy (2001) 122 A Crim R 268; R v Goldman [2007] VSCA 25).

12. Under common law, a direction that the jury must not give less weight to the accused's evidence just because a person who is on trial has an interest in the outcome of the trial would only be given in exceptional circumstances, to correct an improper prosecution argument. Alternatively, the direction was sometimes necessary as a corrective measure when it was appropriate to invite the jury to consider the interest of a witness other than the accused in the outcome of the case and it was necessary to ensure the jury did not apply the same reasoning to the accused's evidence (De Rosa v Western Australia (2006) 32 WAR 136, [44], [56]; R v Rezk [1994] 2 Qd R 321; R v Parsons & Brady [2015] SASCFC 183).

13. While the direction may now be requested by defence counsel in accordance with Part 3 of the Jury Directions Act 2015, judges should exercise caution before giving this direction due to the risk of the direction backfiring and giving emphasis to the accused's interest in the outcome of the trial.

14. Given that the prosecution, defence counsel and the judge are prohibited from making a general statement that an interest in the outcome of the trial is a factor to take into account when assessing the evidence of witnesses (see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44H, discussed below), there will be a reduced need for a curative direction that interest in the outcome is a factor that can be relevant to witnesses, but not the accused.

Other General Direction Potentially Relevant to the Accused

15. At common law, the judge was not prohibited from reminding the jury that people often attempt to make excuses for their wrongful conduct, if it was be relevant to do so in a particular case. Such a statement did not single out the evidence of the accused or undermine the presumption of innocence (R v Franco (2006) 168 A Crim R 322; Rowbottom v R (2003) 13 NTLR 197). Section 44J does not appear to preclude this type of direction. See also 4.6 Incriminating Conduct (Post Offence Lies and Conduct) and Jury Directions Act 2015 Part 4, Division 1.

Prohibited directions

16. Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44J prohibits three directions which were usually given at common law about the evidence of an accused person:

    - That in assessing the evidence of the accused, the jury should bear in mind that the accused may be under more pressure than other witnesses;
    - That the accused may have given evidence because a guilty person who gives evidence is more likely to be believed; and
    - That the accused may have given evidence because an innocent person can do nothing more than give evidence (compare R v Haggag (1998) 101 A Crim R 593; R v Buckley (2004) 10 VR 215).

Prohibited statements

17. Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44H, as amended in 2017, provides that the trial judge, the prosecution and defence counsel must not say or suggest to the jury that:

    (a) An interest in the outcome of the trial is a factor to take into account in assessing the evidence of witnesses generally; or

    (b) The evidence of an accused is less credible, or requires more careful scrutiny, because any person who is on trial has an interest in the outcome of that trial.

Interest in the Outcome of the Case

18. The judge, prosecution and defence must not suggest that an interest in the outcome of the trial is a factor to take into account in assessing the evidence of witnesses generally (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44H(a), as amended in 2017).

19. While the judge, prosecution and defence counsel must not suggest that an interest in the outcome of the trial is a general factor relevant to assessing witnesses, they may suggest that a witness has a particular interest in the outcome of that trial, and that particular interest does or may affect the witness' credibility (Note to Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44H).

20. Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44H Note 2 also mentions the accused. It is likely that an accused's particular interest in the outcome of a case will only be relevant in exceptional cases where the accused may have a motive to lie which could operate independently of the outcome of the case. For example, an interest in protecting a co-accused family member, or a fear of the true offenders. Where it is suggested than an accused has such a particular interest, the judge should invite submissions from the parties on the appropriate direction to be given.

21. While care must be taken in construing s 44H(a) with reference to its common law predecessors, particularly given s 44K(1) and its first Note, the experience of the common law may provide guidance on the meaning of particular interest.

22. At common law, it was recognised that when a jury was assessing the evidence of any witness, including an accused, the jury was entitled to consider whether "some particular interest or purpose … will be served or promoted in giving evidence in the proceeding" (Robinson v R (No 2) (1991) 180 CLR 531).

23. However, it was not permitted for a judge to direct the jury that it should "evaluate evidence on the basis of the interest of witnesses in the outcome" because "[e]xcept in the most exceptional case, such a direction inevitably disadvantages the evidence of the accused when it is in conflict with the evidence for the Crown" (Robinson v R (No 2) (1991) 180 CLR 531).

24. The rationale for this prohibition was that it undermined the presumption of innocence and distracted the jury from its function of assessing whether the prosecution had proved its case beyond reasonable doubt (Hargraves & Stoten v R (2011) 245 CLR 257).

25. A direction to the jury to consider the accused's interest in the outcome undermined the presumption of innocence and risked circular reasoning because it invited the jury to assume that the accused was guilty and so had a motive to lie as a basis for giving the accused's evidence less weight and to use that as a stepping stone to a conclusion of guilt (R v Haggag (1998) 101 A Crim R 593. See also R v FAR [1996] 2 Qd R 49).

26. Under the common law, a judge could invite the jury to consider a witness' interest in the outcome of the proceeding as a factor that could affect the witness' credibility, provided it was made clear that this consideration could not be applied to the accused (R v Parsons & Brady [2015] SASCFC 183; De Rosa v WA (2006) 32 WAR 136).

27. In light of this history, it is likely that Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44H(a) prohibits any general invitation by the prosecution, defence counsel or the judge to consider a witness' interest in the outcome as a factor relevant to the witness' credibility. However, parties remain able to invite the jury to give less weight to a witness' evidence due to identified considerations specific to that individual (see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44H Note 2). Where the identified consideration could also apply to the accused, the judge should invite submissions from the parties on whether any direction quarantining this consideration from applying to the accused is necessary, such as a direction under s 44I(2)(d).

Credibility of Accused and Need for Careful scrutiny

28. The judge, prosecution and defence also must not suggest that the accused's evidence is less credible, or requires more careful scrutiny, because any person who is on trial has an interest in the outcome of that trial (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44H(b), as amended in 2017).

29. This is consistent with common law principles, which held that it was impermissible for a judge to single out the accused as a person whose evidence required greater scrutiny for no reason other than that he or she was the accused. Such a direction had the effect of treating the accused as a class of suspect witness like an accomplice (see Robinson v R (No 2) (1991) 180 CLR 531; Hargraves & Stoten v R (2011) 245 CLR 257; R v Stafford (1993) 67 ALJR 510; R v Ramey (1994) 68 ALJR 917; R v Osland [1998] 2 VR 636).

30. Under common law, it was permissible for the accused to be listed as one of a number of witnesses whose evidence must be carefully examined due to its importance in deciding the issues in the trial. Such an approach did not undermine the presumption of innocence and was not prejudicial to the accused, as it placed the accused's evidence in the same category as the evidence given by all other crucial witnesses (Martinez v Western Australia (2007) 172 A Crim R 389). The issue has not yet been considered in relation to Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44H.

31. At common law, the judge could tell the jury to "carefully consider" an issue that has arisen in the trial, even if the accused is the only witness who has given evidence about that issue, as long as the warning attaches to the issue itself, rather than the fact that it is the accused who has given evidence about that issue (R v Goodman [2007] VSCA 25; R v Franco (2006) 168 A Crim R 322).

32. While it has not been decided, it appears likely that Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44H(b) operates in the same manner as the common law prohibition. As such, it does not prevent directions about the need for scrutiny based on the importance of evidence on an issue. As at common law, it is likely that the provision only prohibits directions which state that there is a need for scrutiny of the accused because of his or her status as an accused.

Joint Trials

33. In trials of two or more accused, the judge must carefully consider the competing demands of justice, especially where one accused gives evidence and another accused stands mute (R v Webb (1994) 181 CLR 41).

34. At common law, it was suggested that the judge might:

    - Omit or modify the standard direction about evaluating the evidence of an accused (because such a direction risks prejudicing any accused who did not give evidence);

- Warn the jury not to attach too much significance to the election of one accused to stand mute; and
- Tell the jury to make sure that they approach the evidence of the other accused in a balanced and appropriate fashion (R v Phillips [1997] 1 VR 558).

35. Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, as amended in 2017, the judge will need to consider whether the statutory directions in s 44I(2) pose any risk of prejudice to an accused who stands mute. The judge should invite submissions from both parties about whether any directions need to be modified to ensure fairness to both accused.
36. The judge should also take into account Jury Directions Act 2015 s 42, which prohibits the judge, prosecution and defence counsel from suggesting that, because an accused did not give evidence, the jury may conclude that the accused is guilty or is more likely to be guilty, or would not have given evidence that would have assisted his or her case. See 4.10 Defence Failure to Call Witnesses for further information.
37. Particular care must also be taken in relation to accomplice warnings. See 4.21 Unreliable Evidence Warning and 4.22 Criminally Concerned Witness Warnings for further information.

4.1.1 Charge: Accused Giving Evidence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge may be given when the accused gives evidence, and defence counsel have requested a direction on the giving of evidence by the accused under s 44I(1)(a).

In this case, NOA chose to give evidence. S/he did not have to do that, as an accused person has the right to remain silent in court. As I have told you, it is the prosecution who must prove NOA's guilt beyond reasonable doubt. It is not for NOA to prove his/her innocence. This has not changed because NOA chose to give evidence.

In choosing to give evidence, NOA undertook to tell the truth. S/he also submitted him/herself to cross-examination, which is the way lawyers test a witness' credibility and truthfulness. In this respect, NOA is no different to any other witness. You must assess his/her evidence in the same way as you assess the evidence of any other witness.

In this case, there is a clear conflict between the evidence of [insert name of prosecution witness] and NOA's evidence.[82]

There are four broad conclusions you might reach about NOA's evidence. If you think it is true, then you will find him/her not guilty.

If you are not sure whether NOA's evidence is true, but think it might be, then you will have a reasonable doubt about the prosecution's case, and again, you will find the accused not guilty. Similarly, if you merely prefer the evidence of [insert names of prosecution witnesses] to NOA's evidence, then you must find NOA not guilty. It is not sufficient for you to merely find the prosecution case to be preferable to the defence case. In other words, it is not a question of simply balancing one case against the other. The prosecution must establish NOA's guilt beyond reasonable doubt.

[82] If the judge has already given a Liberato direction, this paragraph and the following paragraphs should be revised to refer back to that direction.

Finally, if you reject NOA's evidence, that does not mean you must find him/her guilty. Instead, if you reject his/her evidence, put it aside and ask whether the prosecution has proved NOA's guilt beyond reasonable doubt, on the basis of the evidence you do accept.

4.1.2 Charge: Accused's Interest in Outcome

This charge may be given when the accused gives evidence, and defence counsel have requested a direction on the interest that the accused has in the outcome of the trial under s 44I(1)(b).

In relation to the accused giving evidence, I must give you the following direction of law. When you are considering NOA's evidence, you must not give his/her evidence less weight just because s/he is the accused, and any person on trial has an interest in the outcome of the trial.

You will remember that at the start of the trial I told you that it is a critical part of our justice system that people are presumed to be innocent unless and until they are proved guilty. It would therefore be unfair to the accused and wrong to give his/her evidence less weight because s/he is the accused and so wants to be acquitted. If you did that, you would not be giving effect to the presumption of innocence.

4.2 Child Witnesses

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. The Jury Directions Act 2015 contains two sets of provisions concerning the evidence of children.
2. First, Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44N contains a mandatory direction about the evidence of children, to be given in a case where a child's credibility or reliability is in issue, unless there are good reasons not to give the direction.
3. Second, Jury Directions Act 2015 s 33 prohibits certain statements or directions about the evidence of children.
4. Section 33 expands upon the former Evidence Act 2008 ss 165(6) and 165A, which were implemented in response to the finding of the Australian, Victorian and New South Wales Law Reform Commissions that although research shows that children's evidence is not inherently less reliable than adults' evidence, juries and the community often underestimate it (Uniform Evidence Law: Report, ARLC 102 (2005), [18.64]).

Mandatory Direction about Child Witnesses (s 44N direction)

5. Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44N was introduced by the Victims and Other Legislation Amendment Act 2018 and commenced operation on 29 October 2018. It applies to all trials that commence on or after that date (Jury Directions Act 2015 Schedule 1, clause 5).
6. Under s 44N, if the trial judge considers that the reliability or credibility of a child witness is likely to be in issue, the judge must direct the jury in accordance with s 44N(4), unless there are good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44N(1), (2)).
7. The Act identifies that good reasons may include that the child is 17 years old and the judge considers the direction is unnecessary because the child has well developed language and cognitive skills (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44N(1)(a)).

8. The s 44N direction must be given before the child gives evidence if the judge forms the necessary view before hearing any evidence and after hearing submissions from the prosecution and defence. Otherwise, the judge must give the direction as soon as practicable if the judge considers the child's credibility or reliability is in issue at any other time (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44N(1), (2)).

9. The Act states that in giving a direction under s 44N(4), the judge must inform the jury that:

(a) children can accurately remember and report past events; and

(b) children are developing language and cognitive skills, and this may affect–

(i) whether children give a detailed, chronological or complete account; and

(ii) how children understand and respond to the questions they are asked; and

(c) experience shows that, depending on a child's level of development, they-

(i) may have difficulty understanding certain language, whether because that language is complicated for children or complicated generally; and

Examples

1 Hypothetical, ambiguous, repetitive, multi-part or yes/no questions.

2 The use of the passive voice, negatives and double negatives.

(ii) may have difficulty understanding certain concepts, whether because those concepts are complicated for children or complicated generally; and

Example

Relative concepts such as time, duration, measurement or frequency.

(iii) may not request the clarification of a question they do not understand; and

(iv) may not clarify an answer they have given that has been misunderstood.

Prohibited Statements and Directions

10. The judge, prosecution and defence must not say or suggest in any way that:

- children as a class are unreliable witnesses;
- the evidence of children as a class is inherently less credible or reliable, or require more careful scrutiny, than the evidence of adults;
- a particular child's evidence is unreliable solely on account of the age of the child;
- it would be dangerous to convict on the uncorroborated evidence of a witness because that witness is a child (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 33).[83]

[83] Following amendments introduced by the Jury Directions Act 2015, a judge must not warn a jury that it is dangerous to convict on the uncorroborated evidence of any witness, except in proceedings for perjury or a similar or related offence (Evidence Act 2008 s 164).

11. The judge must correct any statement or suggestion by prosecution or defence counsel that is contrary to the above prohibition, unless there are good reasons not to (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 7).

12. Section 33 preserves the statutory abolition of the common law rules that children are an unreliable class of witness and that judges must warn the jury about the danger of acting on the uncorroborated evidence of a child (compare Hargan v R (1919) 27 CLR 13; DPP v Hester [1973] AC 296; R v Pahuja (1987) 49 SASR 191; B v R (1992) 175 CLR 599).

13. Where a child gives sworn evidence, and the judge has ruled that the child is competent, the issue having been raised, the judge must not tell the jury that he or she has found that child capable of understanding the obligation to give truthful evidence, and therefore able to give sworn evidence. Such a direction may suggest that the judge has determined that the child is a credible witness, which may improperly influence the jury's decision making (R v Caine (1993) 68 A Crim R 233). If a party attacks a witness' competence (which a party should not do), rather than a witness' reliability, the judge will need to address the issue by an appropriate direction or comment.

Other Permissible Directions and Comments

General directions

14. The language and policy of Jury Directions Act 2015 s 33 precludes judges from expressing generalised concerns about the reliability of children's evidence (see Clarke v R [2013] VSCA 206).

15. At common law and under the Evidence Act 2008, courts held that where a party argues that the jury should give less weight to the evidence of a child witness because of the general qualities of children, the judge could direct the jury, as a matter of law, that the experience of the court is that the age of a witness is not determinative of his or her ability to give truthful and accurate evidence. However, a judge could not put evidence before the jury in the guise of directions of law, or make comments about controversial subject matter (CMG v R [2011] VSCA 416; R v Barker [2010] EWCA Crim 4; RGM v R [2012] NSWCCA 89; KRI v R [2012] VSCA 186).

16. The need for directions about how the age of a witness is relevant may be more limited now, because the Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44N authorises general directions about the evidence of children and s 33 prohibits an argument that the evidence of children is inherently less credible or reliable. However, s 44N(5) states the section does not limit what the trial judge may include in any other direction about the evidence of a child witness.

Comments

17. A judge may comment on the evidence in a way that does not express any generalised concerns about the reliability of children's evidence. In making such remarks, the judge must make it clear that the jury are not bound by the comments (KRI v R [2012] VSCA 186; Clarke v R [2013] VSCA 206).

18. A judge must be careful in making any comments that he or she does not trespass on the prohibitions in Jury Directions Act 2015 s 33. These prohibitions apply to both directions, comments and suggestions.

19. In some cases, judges may choose to remind the jury that children think and speak differently to adults and that the jury should not expect adult standards from a child. Jurors should use their own experiences and common sense when evaluating the evidence of a child (R v Muller [1996] 1 Qd R 74; R v B(G) [1990] 2 SCR 30; R v F(C) [1997] 3 SCR 1183; R v W(R) [1992] 2 SCR 122).

20. In the case of sexual offending against children where there has been a delay in complaint, any comment on possible reasons for delay should be based on the particular child's evidence in the trial, rather than on generalised assumptions about the behaviour of children. See also Section 53 direction in Effect of Delayed Complaint on Credit.

Directions about unreliability

21. Under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32(2)(b), counsel may seek a direction that the evidence of a child is unreliable, and must identify the significant matters, other than solely the age of the child, that may make that evidence unreliable. See also 4.21 Unreliable Evidence Warning.

22. Where a party requests such a direction, the judge must:

    (a) Warn the jury that the evidence may be unreliable;

    (b) Inform the jury of the significant matters, other than solely the age of the child, that the trial judge considers may make the evidence unreliable; and

    (c) Warn the jury of the need for caution in determining whether to accept the evidence and the weight to be given to it (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32(3)).

23. Circumstances that may indicate that a particular child's evidence is potentially unreliable include:

    - Behaviour by the child that seems inconsistent with the truth of the matters alleged; and
    - Questioning practices by investigating officials and others that may have heightened the risks of suggestibility (see, e.g. Robinson v R (1999) 197 CLR 162; Seen and Heard: Priority for Children in the Legal Process ALRC 84, [14.19]–[14.24]; Knowles v R [2015] VSCA 141).[84]

24. Counsel's inability to meaningfully cross-examine a child witness may also be a circumstance that justifies a s 32 unreliability direction (see R v NRC [1999] 3 VR 537; R v Hart (1999) 135 CCC (3d) 377).[85]

25. The fact that a particular child has not experienced full cognitive development is unlikely, by itself, to provide a reason for giving a s 32 unreliability direction. Children who are not fully cognitively developed may be able to give reliable evidence if questions are tailored to their level of cognitive development. The impact of cognitive development is addressed by the s 44N directions. In addition, s 33 prohibits any generalised direction or suggestion that a child's evidence is unreliable, such as an assertion that children are unable to distinguish between fact and fantasy (see R v FAR [1996] 2 Qd R 49; Reference of a Question of Law pursuant to the Criminal Code s 693A (Reference No 1 of 1999) [1999] WASCA 53).

26. As with other s 32 directions, the judge should only inform the jury about matters that are outside their common sense and experience (see R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301; R v ReIc (2006) 167 A Crim R 484; R v Baartman [2000] NSWCCA 298. See also TN v R [2005] QCA 160; Tully v R (2006) 230 CLR 234 (Crennan J); R v Tichowitsch [2007] 2 Qd R 462).

[84] Children can be more suggestible than adults and they may be especially vulnerable to leading questions in police interviews or while giving evidence. This means that they may give answers designed to please the questioner. They also may not be able to distinguish between original memory and a later–acquired suggestion (R v FAR [1996] 2 Qd R 49. See also Myers J, Saywitz K, Goodman G, Psychological Research on Children as Witnesses: Practical Implications for Forensic Interviews and Courtroom Testimony 28 Pacific Law Journal 3 (1996–1997) and compare Ceci S and Friedman R, Suggestibility of Children: Scientific Research and Legal Implications, 86 Cornell Law Review 33 (2000–2001)).

[85] While a child witness's evidence may be excluded if he or she cannot be effectively cross-examined, there is no inflexible rule requiring the exclusion of such evidence (R v NRC [1999] 3 VR 537).

27. At least in the case of children, the fact that evidence is unsworn is not a basis for finding that the evidence may be unreliable. The Evidence Act 2008 and the Jury Directions Act 2015 do not treat unsworn evidence as a kind that may be unreliable. There was also no requirement or rule of practice under the common law that judges warn the jury to take into account the differences between sworn and unsworn evidence when assessing reliability (R v GW (2016) 258 CLR 108, [55]–[57]).

Related Directions

28. In cases where a child gives evidence, a judge may also need to direct the jury about the following issues:

    - 4.13 Opinion Evidence;[86]
    - 2.3.3 Pre-recorded evidence;[87]
    - 4.14 Previous representations (Hearsay, Recent Complaint and Prior Statement).[88]

4.2.1 Charge: Child Witnesses (s 44N Direction)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This direction should be given before a child witness gives evidence, if it is identified that the reliability or credibility of a child witness is likely to be in issue.

This direction is drafted to be given just before the child gives evidence. If it is given at any other time, it must be modified accordingly.

Members of the jury, before NOW gives evidence, there are some general matters I must tell you, to help you assess NOW's evidence. Some of you may know these matters from your own experiences with children. But for others, some of these ideas may be new.

First, children can accurately remember and report past events.

Second, the language and mental skills of children develop as they get older. This may affect whether a child can give a detailed or complete account and whether their accounts correctly record the order in which different events occurred.

Third, children's language and mental skills also affect how they understand and respond to questions.

[86] A court may receive opinion evidence based on specialised knowledge of child development and child behaviour, including the impact of sexual abuse on children and child development (Evidence Act 2008 s 79).

[87] The prosecution may lead pre-recorded evidence of a complainant in a sexual offence case if the complainant was under 18 at the time the recording was made (see Division 5 of Part 8.2 of the Criminal Procedure Act 2009). In addition, the whole of the complainant's evidence must be pre-recorded at a special hearing if the complainant was a child when the proceedings were commenced, unless the court otherwise orders (see Division 6 of part 8.2 of the Criminal Procedure Act 2009).

[88] A court may receive evidence of a complainant's previous representations where he or she is available to give evidence and was under 18 when he or she made the representation (Evidence Act 2008 s 66(2)).

Experience shows that a child's level of development affects whether they have difficulty understanding certain words or phrases. These may be words or phrases that are hard for everyone to understand, or are only hard for children.

For example, some children have difficulty understanding hypothetical questions, repetitive questions, multi-part questions and questions that require a single yes or no answer. Some children also have difficulty with questions or statements that use negatives and double negatives.

A child's level of development also affects whether the child understands certain concepts. These can be concepts that are difficult for everyone, or concepts that are only difficult for children.

For example, experience shows that children often have difficulty with concepts that involving comparing two things, such as time, duration, measurement or frequency.

Because of a child's level of development, they may not ask someone to clarify a question they do not understand and may not clarify an answer which has been misunderstood.

You should take these directions into account when you are listening to NOW giving evidence, and when you are assessing NOW's credibility and reliability.

4.3 Character Evidence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

What is Character Evidence?

1. Character evidence addresses a person's inherent moral character (R v Rowton (1865) 169 ER 1497; Melbourne v R (1999) 198 CLR 1; Attwood v R (1960) 102 CLR 353).
2. The relevance and admissibility of character evidence, as well as the need for a direction and the content of that direction, depend on whether the evidence is of the accused's good character or bad character.
3. Directions about character evidence are directions about "the evidence in the trial relevant to the matters in issue". Part 3 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 applies (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 10).

Evidence of Good Character

What is "Good Character" Evidence?

4. "Good character" evidence includes:
    - Evidence of the accused's general good reputation; and
    - Evidence of the accused's favourable disposition (Eastman v R (1997) 76 FCR 9; Stirland v Director of Public Prosecutions [1944] AC 315; Attwood v R (1960) 102 CLR 353).
5. The expression "good character" in s 110 of the Evidence Act 2008 has the same meaning as it does at common law (Eastman v R (1997) 76 FCR 9).
6. The accused's good character can be proved in a variety of ways. Evidence of good character does not simply consist of evidence that the accused has not previously been convicted of a crime (Melbourne v R (1999) 198 CLR 1).

Relevance of Good Character Evidence

7. Evidence that the accused is of good character may be relevant for two purposes:
    i) It may make it more likely that the accused's evidence is credible; and

ii) It may make it less likely that the accused committed the offence (Melbourne v R (1999) 198 CLR 1; R v Baran [2007] VSCA 66; R v Zecevic [1986] VR 797; R v Murphy [1985] 4 NSWLR 42; R v Trimboli (1979) 21 SASR 577; R v Warasta (1991) 54 A Crim R 351; Attwood v R (1960) 102 CLR 353; Eastman v R (1997) 76 FCR 9).

8. Good character evidence can only make it "unlikely", rather than "improbable", that the accused committed the offence (R v Stalder [1981] 2 NSWLR 9).

9. Evidence that the accused is of good character may be relevant to the credibility of evidence given in court and statements made out of court (R v Vollmer & Ors [1996] 1 VR 95; R v Vye [1993] 1 WLR 471; Melbourne v R (1999) 198 CLR 1).

10. In some cases the two uses of good character evidence will entirely overlap, and will function as a single idea rather than as two discrete issues (R v Trimboli (1979) 21 SASR 577).

11. The court may limit the use to be made of good character evidence if there is a danger that a particular use of the evidence might be unfairly prejudicial to a party, or might be misleading or confusing (Evidence Act 2008 s 136). However, this will be rare (see, e.g. R v Lawrence [1984] 3 NSWLR 674; R v Murphy (1985) 4 NSWLR 42; R v Hamilton (1993) 68 A Crim R 298).

Admissibility of Good Character Evidence

12. The defence may adduce evidence to prove that the accused is a person of good character (Evidence Act 2008 s 110(1)).

13. The evidence may be used to prove that the accused is a good person generally, or in a particular respect (Evidence Act 2008 s 110(1)). This differs from the common law, which treats character as indivisible (with people considered to be either of good character or bad character) (Melbourne v R (1999) 198 CLR 1; Bishop v R (2013) 39 VR 642).

14. Good character evidence may consist of opinion evidence from a witness concerning the character of the accused, or evidence from a witness about the reputation of the accused within the community, or a part of the community (Bishop v R (2013) 39 VR 642; R v Chapman [2002] NSWCCA 105).

Probative Value of Good Character Evidence

15. The probative effect of good character evidence on the accused's credibility, and on the likelihood that he or she committed the offence charged, will vary depending on the circumstances of the case.

16. For example, the probative effect of good character evidence on the accused's credibility may be diminished where he or she does not give evidence in court, instead relying on out-of-court statements (R v Zecevic [1986] VR 797; R v Arundell [1999] 2 VR 228).

17. The probative value of good character evidence may also be affected by:

- The nature of the offence charged (R v Trimboli (1979) 21 SASR 577);[89]

[89] For some offences, good character evidence will not establish that the accused is the kind of person who would be unlikely to commit that crime. For example, it has previously been held that the fact that a person is of good character may not materially affect the likelihood that s/he would cultivate cannabis (see, e.g. R v Trimboli (1979) 21 SASR 577).

- The relationship between the type of character established and the type of offence charged (R v Arundell [1999] 2 VR 228; Braysich v R (2011) 243 CLR 434);[90] and
- The strength of the other evidence supporting the charge (Simic v R (1980) 144 CLR 319).

18. In some cases, the only evidence of the accused's good character will be his or her lack of prior convictions. The probative value of the character evidence in such cases is usually extremely limited (R v Cumberbatch (No 5) [2002] VSC 289; Melbourne v R (1999) 198 CLR 1).

Need for a Direction About Good Character Evidence

19. At common law, it was recognised that a judge was not required to direct the jury about the uses of good character evidence in all cases where that evidence was led (Melbourne v R (1999) 198 CLR 1; Benbrika v R (2010) 29 VR 593; R v DD (2007) 19 VR 143; Gallant v R [2006] NSWCCA 339; R v Arundell [1999] 2 VR 228).

20. The need for a direction depends on whether a direction is sought or whether there are substantial and compelling reasons to give a direction in the absence of a request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

21. Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, the judge should consider the significance of the good character evidence in the context of the trial when deciding whether to give the direction despite the absence of a request.

22. Prior to the Jury Directions Act 2015, the recommended practice in Victoria was that judges would give directions on good character evidence almost without exception (see R v Warasta (1991) 54 A Crim R 351). In Bishop v R (2013) 39 VR 642, which was decided after the commencement of the Jury Directions Act 2013, this practice was endorsed as continuing to provide guidance to trial judges. However, the court in Bishop did not refer to the effect of sections 13 and 15 of the Jury Directions Act 2013 (see now Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16).

23. In determining whether to give a direction, a judge should pay close attention to the relevance of the evidence to the offence, and to the issues to which the evidence relates (Stanoevski v R (2001) 202 CLR 115; R v Szabo [2000] NSWCCA 226).

24. A judge should consider the probative value of the evidence when determining whether or not to give a direction (Melbourne v R (1999) 198 CLR 1; Benbrika v R (2010) 29 VR 593; R v DD (2007) 19 VR 143).

25. A good character direction must be given where the evidence has an immediate and obvious connection with an issue in the case (Melbourne v R (1999) 198 CLR 1).

26. In deciding whether to direct the jury about good character evidence, a judge must separately consider the probative effect of the evidence on the accused's credibility and on the likelihood that he or she committed the offence charged (Melbourne v R (1999) 198 CLR 1*; Benbrika v R* (2010) 29 VR 593).

27. Where the evidence of good character comes from the accused him or herself there is generally less need for a direction on the uses of such evidence, as this will usually be self-explanatory (R v Mackrae–Bathory [2006] VSCA 179; R v TSR (2002) 5 VR 627).

[90] For example, evidence of honesty is not likely to be highly probative where the accused is charged with a violent crime (R v Arundell [1999] 2 VR 228).

28. No particular form of words is required for a direction on good character evidence (R v Trimboli (1979) 21 SASR 577; R v Arundell [1999] 2 VR 228; R v RJC 18/8/98 NSW CCA; R v Telfer (2004) 142 A Crim R 132; Fung v R [2007] NSWCCA 250).

29. The judge will need to consider whether the parties have sought a direction about the two permissible uses of good character evidence, and whether it is appropriate to direct on both uses. For example, the judge may have good reasons to direct on only one of the permissible uses of such evidence (Melbourne v R (1999) 198 CLR 1; R v Arundell [1999] 2 VR 228; R v Zecevic [1986] VR 797; Sindoni v R [2011] VSCA 195).

30. If the evidence relates to a particular aspect of the accused's character (rather than his or her character generally), the directions must be limited to that aspect (see, e.g. R v Zurita [2002] NSWCCA 22).

31. This may affect which of the two possible uses of the evidence the jury should be told about. For example, if the evidence has no bearing on truthfulness, and thus no relevance to credibility, the jury should not be directed that the accused's good character should be taken into account in assessing his or her credibility (R v Zurita [2002] NSWCCA 22).

32. Where the judge directs the jury about the relevance of the evidence to the issue of guilt, the direction should convey to the jury that they should bear in mind the accused's good character when considering whether they are prepared to draw from the evidence the conclusion of the accused's guilt. They should bear it in mind as a factor affecting the likelihood that the accused committed the crime charged (R v RJC 18/8/98 NSW CCA).

33. It is permissible to direct the jury that a person of good character is less likely to have committed the offence than a person not of good character (Fung v R [2007] NSWCCA 250; Kanbut v The Queen [2022] NSWCCA 259, [35]–[37]).

34. Where the judge directs the jury about the relevance of the evidence to the issue of credibility, the judge should convey to the jury that they should consider the accused's previous good character in assessing the credibility of any explanation he or she has given and, if he or she has given evidence in court, his or her credibility as a witness (R v RJC 18/8/98 NSW CCA).

35. The judge may remind the jury that people commit crimes for the first time, and that evidence of good character cannot alter proven facts or provide a defence in itself. Character evidence can only affect the jury's assessment of whether certain facts have been proven beyond reasonable doubt (R v Arundell [1999] 2 VR 228; Melbourne v R (1999) 198 CLR 1; R v Trimboli (1979) 21 SASR 577; R v Zecevic [1986] VR 797; R v RJC 18/8/98 NSW CCA; Bishop v R (2013) 39 VR 642).

36. Judges must exercise care when warning the jury about the need for caution in acting on good character evidence other than the standard directions that people commit crimes for the first time and the evidence cannot alter proven facts or provide a defence in itself (Bishop v R (2013) 39 VR 642).

37. In particular, where character evidence is led in a sexual offence case, the judge must not give a limiting direction that good character evidence is of less weight (or no weight) because sexual offences are committed in private and the evidence only addresses the accused's conduct in the presence of others (Bishop v R (2013) 39 VR 642; R v MWL (2002) 137 A Crim R 282).

38. Judges should exercise great care in departing from the traditional directions into directions which have not previously received curial approval (Bishop v R (2013) 39 VR 642).

39. Where good character evidence can be used both in assessing guilt and credibility, the judge must not direct the jury that the evidence cannot be used for one of these two purposes (R v Zecevic [1986] VR 797; R v Murphy [1985] 4 NSWLR 42).

40. In such cases, if the prosecution tells the jury that the evidence may not be used for one of the two permissible purposes, the judge must raise with the parties the need for a direction to ensure the jury is not misled (see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 16 and R v Schmahl [1965] VR 745).

41. A person who has a prior conviction that was overturned on appeal must be treated as a person without any prior convictions. Any direction on good character must not be qualified by reference to the quashed conviction (R v Lapuse [1964] VR 43).

Evidence of Bad Character

42. Evidence of the accused's bad character is generally inadmissible on the basis that it is unfairly prejudicial (Melbourne v R (1999) 198 CLR 1; R v Thomas [2006] VSCA 167; Donnini v R (1972) 128 CLR 114; Perry v R (1982) 150 CLR 580).[91]

43. However, under the Evidence Act 2008 there are three circumstances in which bad character evidence may be admissible:

    i) If evidence has been adduced to prove an accused's good character (either generally or in a particular respect), a co-accused or the prosecution may respond by leading evidence to prove that the accused is not a person of good character (either generally or in that respect) (ss 110(2)–(3)).

    ii) An accused may adduce opinion evidence about the character of a co-accused, where it is evidence of the opinion of a person who has specialised knowledge based on his or her training, study or experience, and the opinion is wholly or substantially based on that knowledge (Evidence Act 2008 s 111(1)); and

    iii) Evidence that reveals the accused's bad character may also be admissible under a provision of Part 3.7 concerned with credibility evidence.

44. Leave is required to cross-examine an accused about matters arising out of character evidence (Evidence Act 2008 s 112).[92] See Gabriel v R (1997) 76 FCR 279 for a discussion of relevant considerations.

Use of Bad Character Evidence

45. At common law, bad character evidence can only be used to negate evidence of good character. It cannot be used as directly relevant to the issue of guilt (see, e.g. BRS v R (1997) 191 CLR 275).

46. At first glance, the Evidence Act 2008 appears to make bad character evidence admitted under s 110 usable for tendency purposes.[93] This is because:

    - This evidence is not subject to the tendency rule (s 110);

[91] While evidence is generally inadmissible for the purpose of proving the accused's bad character, evidence that is relevant for another purpose is not rendered inadmissible solely because it also happens to show the bad character of the accused. Such evidence may be admitted for a limited, probative, purpose. In such cases, the judge must direct the jury to use the evidence only for the admissible purpose, and may need to warn the jury not to use the evidence for an irrelevant or prejudicial purpose (see, e.g. R v Thompson [2001] VSCA 208; Orman v R [2010] VSCA 246R).

[92] See R v El–Azzi [2004] NSWCCA 455 and Stanoevski v R (2001) 202 CLR 115 for a discussion of the meaning of "matters arising out of" this kind of evidence.

[93] In explaining the rationale behind the proposal on which s 110 is based, the Australian Law Reform Commission ("ALRC") noted that this restriction seems incapable of enforcement, and implied that it should not be adopted in the UEA (ALRC 26, vol.1, para 83).

- It is also exempted from the further restrictions on tendency evidence in s 101, because that extension "does not apply to tendency evidence that the prosecution adduces to explain or contradict evidence adduced by the defendant" (s 101(3)).

47. However, in NSW it has been held that the common law position remains unchanged, and that bad character evidence can only be used to negate good character evidence (R v OGD (No 2) (2000) 50 NSWLR 433; R v El-Kheir [2004] NSWCCA 461. See also Eastman v R (1997) 76 FCR 9 for a brief discussion of this issue).
48. The court may limit the use to be made of bad character evidence if there is a danger that a particular use of the evidence might be unfairly prejudicial to a party, or might be misleading or confusing (Evidence Act 2008 s 136).

Content of the Direction on Bad Character Evidence

49. Where evidence of bad character is admitted and the prosecution or counsel for the accused seeks a direction, the judge must explain to the jury that:
    - They may use the evidence when assessing the accused's credibility; and
    - They must not use the evidence to infer that the accused is more likely to have committed the offence because he or she is a person of bad character (R v Perrier (No 1) [1991] 1 VR 697; R v Thomas [2006] VSCA 167; Donnini v R (1972) 128 CLR 114; BRS v R (1997) 191 CLR 275; R v Stalder [1981] 2 NSWLR 9; R v Rihia [2000] VSCA 235).
50. At common law, there was seen to be a high degree of risk that a jury would use bad character evidence to engage in impermissible propensity reasoning. Judges were therefore required to clearly direct the jury on both the permissible and impermissible uses of bad character evidence (Donnini v R (1972) 128 CLR 114). This will continue to guide the content of directions on bad character evidence under the Jury Directions Act 2015.
51. The permissible uses of bad character evidence are not the converse of the permissible uses of good character evidence. The jury is allowed to use good character evidence to engage in a form of propensity reasoning that is not permitted for bad character evidence. This anomaly is deeply rooted in the law (Melbourne v R (1999) 198 CLR 1).

4.3.1 Charge: General Good Character Evidence

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge may be given where evidence that the accused is of good character generally has been adduced. It includes additional directions to be used where another party has led bad character evidence in rebuttal. See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

In this case you have heard evidence that NOA is a person of good character. [Describe good character evidence.]

[If bad character evidence has also been given, add the following shaded section.]

You have also heard evidence that NOA is a person of bad character. [Describe bad character evidence.] It is for you to determine whether NOA is of good character, bad character, or neither.

Good Character

If you accept that NOA is a person of good character, there are two ways in which you can use this fact.

First, you can use it when assessing the credibility of NOA's evidence and his/her denials of the prosecution case.[94] As a person of good character is generally thought to be more trustworthy than other people, you may be less willing to accept the prosecution's evidence than if NOA was not a person of good character.

Second, you can use it when determining the likelihood that NOA committed the offence[s] charged. As it is generally believed that a person of good character is unlikely to commit a criminal offence, you may be less willing to accept the prosecution's allegation that NOA committed [that offence/those offences] than you would be if s/he was not a person of good character.

Of course, this does not mean that you must find NOA not guilty if you accept that s/he is a person of good character. The mere fact that a person is of good character cannot alter proven facts – it can only help you to determine whether or not those facts have been proven. In addition, you should keep in mind the fact that a person who has previously been of good character can commit a crime for the first time.

By contrast, if you find that NOA is a person of bad character, you can only use this fact when assessing the credibility of [describe sources of NOA's evidence, e.g. "the evidence NOA gave in court" or "the statement NOA made to the police"].[95] As a person of bad character is generally thought to be less trustworthy than other people, you may be less willing to accept that evidence than you would be if NOA was not a person of bad character.

Unlike the situation where you find the accused to be of good character, a finding that the accused is of bad character cannot be used when determining the likelihood that NOA committed the offence[s] charged.[96] In particular, you must not reason that, because NOA is a person of bad character, s/he is more likely to have committed the offence[s] charged. That kind of reasoning is prohibited. Findings of guilt must be based only on the evidence given in the trial, not on assumptions about the kinds of people who commit crimes.

4.3.2 Charge: Specific Good Character Evidence

This charge may be given where evidence that the accused is of good character in a particular respect. It includes additional directions to be used where another party has led bad character evidence in rebuttal. See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

In this case you have heard evidence that NOA is a person of good character in relation to [describe respect in which it is alleged that the accused is of good character]. [Describe good character evidence.]

[94] If the accused has given no evidence in court, and made no out-of-court statements, this paragraph should be omitted and the charge modified accordingly.

[95] If the accused has given no evidence in court, and made no out-of-court statements, this paragraph should be omitted and the charge modified accordingly.

[96] This aspect of the charge is based on the assumption that the NSW interpretation of Evidence Act 2008 s 110 is correct. If it is not, then this paragraph will need to be modified accordingly. See 4.3 Character Evidence for further information.

[If bad character evidence has also been given, add the following shaded section.]

You have also heard evidence that NOA is a person of bad character in that respect. [Describe bad character evidence.] It is for you to determine whether NOA is of good or bad character in relation to [describe respect], or is of neither good nor bad character in that respect.

Good Character

If you accept that NOA is a person of good character in relation to [describe respect], there are two ways in which you can use this fact.

First, you can use it when assessing the credibility of NOA's evidence and his/her denials of the prosecution case.[97] As a person who is of good character in that respect is generally thought to be more trustworthy than other people, you may be less willing to accept the prosecution's evidence than if NOA was not a person of good character in that respect.

Second, you can use it when determining the likelihood that NOA committed the offence[s] charged.[98] As it is generally believed that a person who is of good character in relation to [describe respect] is unlikely to commit a criminal offence, you may be less willing to accept the prosecution's allegation that NOA committed [that offence/those offences] than you would be if s/he was not a person of good character in that respect.

Of course, this does not mean that you must find NOA not guilty if you accept that s/he is a person of good character in relation to [describe respect]. The mere fact that a person is of good character in that respect cannot alter proven facts – it can only help you to determine whether or not those facts have been proven. In addition, you should keep in mind the fact that a person who has previously been of good character can commit a crime for the first time.

By contrast, if you find that NOA is a person of bad character you can only use this fact when assessing the credibility of [describe sources of NOA's evidence, e.g. "the evidence NOA gave in court" or "the statement NOA made to the police"].[99] As a person who is of bad character is generally thought to be less trustworthy than other people, you may be less willing to accept that evidence than you would be if NOA was not a person of bad character in that respect.

Unlike the situation where you find the accused to be of good character, a finding that the accused is of bad character in that respect cannot be used when determining the likelihood that NOA

[97] This paragraph should be omitted, and the charge modified accordingly, if:

- The respect in which it is alleged that the accused is of good character is not of relevance to the issue of credibility; or
- The accused gave no evidence in court, and made no out-of-court statements.

[98] This paragraph should be omitted, and the charge modified accordingly, if the respect in which it is alleged that the accused is of good character is not of relevance to the issue of guilt.

[99] This paragraph should be omitted, and the charge modified accordingly, if:

- The respect in which it is alleged that the accused is of bad character is not of relevance to the issue of credibility; or
- The accused gave no evidence in court, and made no out-of-court statements.

committed the offence[s] charged.[100] In particular, you must not reason that, because NOA is a person of bad character, s/he is more likely to have committed the offence[s] charged. That kind of reasoning is prohibited. Findings of guilt must be based only on the evidence given in the trial, not on assumptions about the kinds of people who commit crimes.

4.3.3 Charge: Bad Character Evidence

This charge may be given where evidence that the accused is not of good character has been adduced under an exception to the credibility rule (and not as rebuttal evidence under s 110). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

In this case you have heard evidence that NOA is a person of bad character.[101] [Describe bad character evidence.]

If you accept that NOA is a person of bad character, you can use this fact when assessing the credibility of [describe sources of the accused's evidence, e.g. "the evidence NOA gave in court" or "the statement NOA made to the police"].[102] As a person of bad character is generally thought to be less trustworthy than other people, you may be less willing to accept that evidence than you would be if NOA was not a person of bad character.

However, you must not reason that, because NOA is a person of bad character, s/he is more likely to have committed the offence[s] charged. That kind of reasoning is prohibited. Your decision must be based only on the evidence given in the trial, not on assumptions about the kinds of people who commit crimes.

4.4 Prosecution Witness's Motive to Lie

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Warning! The law relating to directions on a prosecution witness' motive to lie was modified by the Jury Directions and Other Acts Amendment Act 2017. There has not yet been appellate guidance on the operation of these provisions. This information should be used with caution. Further information about the Jury Directions and Other Acts Amendment Act 2017 is available in the Department of Justice and Regulation report, 'Jury Directions: A Jury-Centric Approach Part 2'.

[100] This aspect of the charge is based on the assumption that the NSW interpretation of Evidence Act 2008 s 110 is correct. If it is not, then this paragraph will need to be modified accordingly. See 4.3 Character Evidence for further information.

[101] This charge is drafted for use in cases where the character evidence relates to the accused. If the character evidence relates to a different witness the charge will need to be modified.

[102] If the accused has given no evidence in court, and made no out-of-court statements, this paragraph should be omitted and the charge modified accordingly.

Effect of Jury Directions Act 2015

1. Jury directions relating to whether a prosecution witness has a motive to lie have been significantly changed by the Jury Directions Act 2015 following amendments by the Jury Directions and Other Acts Amendment Act 2017 which commenced on 1 October 2017.
2. Under the Act, if the issue of whether a prosecution witness has a motive to lie is raised in a trial, the defence may request that the judge explain to the jury:
    - The prosecution's obligation to prove that the accused is guilty; and
    - That the accused does not have to prove that the witness had a motive to lie (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44L).
3. The need for any direction about a prosecution witness' motive to lie depends on whether a direction is sought or whether there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving a direction in the absence of any request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.
4. Except as provided by s 44L, read in the context of the rest of the Jury Directions Act 2015, including ss 12–16, the judge is not required or permitted to direct the jury on the issue of whether a prosecution witness has a motive to lie. Any common law rule to the contrary is abolished (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44M).
5. While the Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44L applies to any prosecution witness, in practice, the issue is most often raised in relation to the complainant.

Relevance of the Complainant's Motive

6. If the complainant has a motive to make and persist in false allegations about the accused (a "motive to lie"), this may be a relevant factor in judging his or her credit and testing the acceptability of the accusation giving rise to the charges (Palmer v The Queen (1998) 193 CLR 1; R v Uhrig NSW CCA 24/10/96).
7. However, there is no onus on the accused to prove a motive for the complainant's allegations (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44L; see also R v Costin [1998] 3 VR 659; Palmer v The Queen (1998) 193 CLR 1; R v Cherry (No.2) [2006] VSCA 271).
8. The failure of the accused to identify a motive to lie is entirely neutral in relation to the assessment of the credibility of the complainant. A complainant's account gains no legitimate credibility from the absence of evidence of a motive to lie (Palmer v The Queen (1998) 193 CLR 1; R v PLK [1999] 3 VR 567; R v SAB (2008) 20 VR 55).
9. The fact that the accused has no knowledge of any fact from which it can be inferred that the complainant had a motive to lie is therefore generally irrelevant. In most cases, the fact that the accused lacks knowledge about the complainant's motive to lie will simply mean that his or her evidence cannot assist in determining whether the complainant has such a motive (Palmer v The Queen (1998) 193 CLR 1; R v PLK [1999] 3 VR 567; R v Hilsey [1998] VSCA 143).

Raising the Issue of the Complainant's Motive to Lie

10. As the fact that the complainant has a motive to lie is relevant, it is permissible for the defence to cross-examine the complainant about whether s/he has a motive to lie (Palmer v The Queen (1998) 193 CLR 1; R v Uhrig NSW CCA 24/10/96; R v PLK [1999] 3 VR 567).
11. It is also permissible for the defence to lead other evidence from which it can be inferred that the complainant has a motive to lie (Palmer v The Queen (1998) 193 CLR 1; R v Uhrig NSW CCA 24/10/96).
12. Where the accused alleges in his or her evidence that the complainant has a motive to lie, it is permissible for the prosecution to cross-examine the accused about the alleged motive (Palmer v The Queen (1998) 193 CLR 1; R v Uhrig NSW CCA 24/10/96; R v PLK [1999] 3 VR 567; R v Davis [2007] VSCA 276; R v SAB (2008) 20 VR 55).

13. However, any cross-examination of the accused must be conducted within the limits of relevant and admissible evidence. Thus, while s/he may be questioned about the factual basis of any allegations made, s/he should not be directly asked to give evidence on the motives of the complainant. Such evidence could only be speculative and a matter of opinion upon which the accused could have no expertise (Palmer v The Queen (1998) 193 CLR 1 (Kirby J); R v SAB (2008) 20 VR 55).

14. In cases where the defence alleges that a complainant has a motive to lie, it is also open to the prosecution to put arguments to the jury relating to the validity of that motive (Palmer v The Queen (1998) 193 CLR 1; R v Uhrig NSW CCA 24/10/96; R v PLK [1999] 3 VR 567; Schroder v The King [2024] VSCA 42, [37]–[38]).

15. While the prosecution may properly seek to rebut any motive put forward by the defence, they should not suggest that rejecting the suggested motive means accepting that the complainant has no motive to lie and is telling the truth. There may be other reasons, unknown to the accused, for the complainant making a false allegation (R v Hewitt [1998] 4 VR 862).

16. For the accused to be cross-examined about the complainant's motive to lie, s/he must have made an allegation about the complainant lying in his or her direct evidence. The fact that defence counsel made such an allegation in his or her arguments is not sufficient (R v Davis [2007] VSCA 276).

17. If no direct evidence has been given of a specific motive to lie, and there is no evidence from which a specific motive to lie could reasonably be inferred, the accused should not be cross-examined about the matter. This is because, as noted above, the fact that the accused cannot provide a possible motive for the complainant to lie is generally irrelevant (Palmer v The Queen (1998) 193 CLR 1; R v Uhrig NSW CCA 24/10/96; R v Davis [2007] VSCA 276).

18. As well as being irrelevant, it is objectionable to ask the accused why the complainant would lie (when the aim of the question is to show that the complainant had no such motive), because:

    - There is a risk that the jury will reason that the absence of evidence of a motive for lying is proof that there was no motive for lying. This method of reasoning, and conclusion, is impermissible;
    - Asking the question is to invite the jury to accept the complainant's evidence unless the accused gives a positive answer to that question. This risks reversing the onus of proof, as it implies that unless the jury is satisfied that the complainant is a liar, they should accept his or her evidence and convict the accused;
    - Such a question is unfair to the accused, who cannot be expected to see into the mind of the complainant and be held accountable for failing to discern his or her motives;
    - Asking why the complainant would lie is to invite the jury to speculate as to what might be possible motives for lying and to assess their likelihood. That is not trying the case on the evidence, but speculating concerning unproven facts;
    - Focusing on the complainant's motive to lie may distract the jury from the critical question in a criminal trial – whether the prosecution has proved the guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt (see Palmer v The Queen (1998) 193 CLR 1; R v PLK [1999] 3 VR 567; R v RC [2004] VSCA 183; R v E (1996) 39 NSWLR 450; R v F (1995) 83 A Crim R 502; R v Davis [2007] VSCA 276; R v SAB (2008) 20 VR 55).

19. Similar dangers can arise even if the accused is not specifically asked about the complainant's motive to lie – for example, if prosecuting counsel rhetorically asks the jury "why would the complainant lie?" in his or her address, or if the complainant asks "why would I lie?" when giving evidence and the jury are forcefully reminded of those words in the prosecutor's final address (R v RC [2004] VSCA 183).

20. It is therefore usually inappropriate for the prosecution to raise the question "why would the complainant lie?" in their final address, no matter how the issue of motive has arisen (R v RC [2004] VSCA 183).

When to Give a Direction

21. Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, the need for a direction depends on whether a direction is sought or whether there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving a direction in the absence of a request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

22. Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44L, as amended in 2017, provides that defence counsel may request a direction under s 12 of the Act on the issue of whether a witness for the prosecution has a motive to lie, if that issue is raised during a trial.

23. Unlike some sections of the Jury Directions Act 2015 which refer to requests for directions by either the prosecution or defence (see, e.g. s 32(1)), s 44L refers only to requests by defence counsel. This suggests the prosecution cannot request a direction on the issue. However, a judge has the power to give a direction under s 16 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 if the judge considers there are substantial and compelling reasons for doing so, and after hearing submissions.

24. If the prosecution believes that a direction under s 44L is necessary, then the prosecution should first invite defence counsel to ask for the direction. If the defence declines that invitation, the prosecution may invite the judge to form the view under s 16 that there are substantial and compelling reasons for the direction.

25. One circumstance in which the prosecution may believe that a s 44L direction is warranted is where the prosecution has cross-examined its own witness in accordance with Evidence Act 2008 s 38. However, it is unclear whether the s 44L direction is well-suited to this scenario. See "Section 44L and unfavourable prosecution witnesses" below.

26. Although s 44M(2) abolishes any rule of common law in relation to when a judge is required or permitted to direct the jury on the issue of a prosecution witness' motive to lie, common law cases may provide guidance as to what could constitute a substantial and compelling reason to provide the direction.

Common law authorities on the need for a motive to lie direction

27. At common law, judges could consider the prominence of the issue of motive to lie. If the complainant only refers to an absence of a motive to lie once in a lengthy cross-examination, a direction may not be required. However, if that comment was referred to again in counsel's address, it would assume greater significance and could require a direction (see, e.g. R v RC [2004] VSCA 183).

28. At common law, in most cases where the accused is asked "why would the complainant lie?", a firm and clear direction was usually necessary to overcome the dangers outlined above (Palmer v The Queen (1998) 193 CLR 1; R v PLK [1999] 3 VR 567; R v RC [2004] VSCA 183).

29. As these dangers were not limited to cases in which the prosecution had directly raised the question when cross-examining the accused, a direction could be required in other contexts as well. For example, it may have been necessary to give a direction if the issue of the complainant's motive to lie was raised by the complainant in his or her own evidence or in counsel's addresses (R v RC [2004] VSCA 183; R v PLK [1999] 3 VR 567).

30. Due to the many possible dangers posed by this issue (see above), where the question of motive for lying was raised by way of rhetorical questions in the prosecution's address, judges were encouraged to assume that the jury may have been misled or diverted from their true task, and to give a direction (R v RC [2004] VSCA 183).

31. It was generally appropriate to give a direction if the complainant's evidence was uncorroborated, and the question whether s/he had a motive to lie was a significant issue in the case (e.g. due to cross-examination of the complainant on the issue and/or a focus on the issue in counsel's address) (see, e.g. R v PLK [1999] 3 VR 567).

32. However, where there was more than the uncorroborated evidence of the complainant, motive to lie would assume a less significant role, and a direction may not have been necessary (R v PFG [2006] VSCA 130).

33. In many cases where the jury was invited to reject the motive to lie put forward by the defence, it was appropriate to give a direction. This was because there was a risk that, by accepting the prosecution's invitation, the jury would mistakenly think that, as no other motive to lie has been suggested, the complainant's credibility was thereby enhanced (Palmer v The Queen (1998) 193 CLR 1; R v Uhrig NSW CCA 24/10/96; R v PLK [1999] 3 VR 567). However, under the Jury Directions Act 2015, the motive to lie direction does not expressly contain a warning that the jury must not treat the rejection of a motive to lie as supporting a complainant's credibility. Judges should therefore consider whether this risk remains relevant when assessing whether to give a motive to lie direction which has not been sought.

34. A direction may not have been required if the prosecution did not challenge the fact that the complainant had a motive to lie (e.g. if they instead sought to convince the jury that, despite having such a motive, the complainant was telling the truth) (R v Cherry (No.2) [2006] VSCA 271).

35. Where police gave the accused an opportunity, in the record of interview, to suggest a motive to lie, the admission of the record of interview into evidence would not automatically require a Palmer direction to be given (R v Arundell [1999] 2 VR 228). It may, however, be appropriate to excise the parts of the record of interview which relate to the complainant's motive to lie (Graham v R (1998) 195 CLR 606).

Content of the direction

36. The content of the direction on a prosecution witness' motive to lie is specified in Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44L(2), as amended in 2017. It substantially modifies the common law direction, and will be the same regardless of whether or not the accused has directly alleged that the complainant had a specific motive to lie.

37. The prescribed direction requires the judge to explain:

    - The prosecution's obligation to prove that the accused is guilty; and
    - That the accused does not have to prove that the witness had a motive to lie.

Abolition of common law and prohibited directions

38. Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44M, as amended in 2017, states:

(1) Except as provided by this Division, a trial judge is not required or permitted to direct the jury on the issue of whether a witness for the prosecution has a motive to lie.

(2) Any rule of common law to the contrary of subsection (1) is abolished.

Notes

1 Subsection (2) abolishes directions based on Palmer v The Queen [1998] HCA 2; 1993 CLR 1.

2 Section 4 applies generally to override any rule of law or practice to the contrary of this Act.

39. Like many Jury Directions Act 2015 provisions, this abolishes the relevant common law and makes the statutory provisions the sole source of obligation to direct on this topic. However, most equivalent provisions in the Jury Directions Act 2015 do not include the words "or permitted" (see Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 24, 30, 34, 37, 44, 44E, 54, 62. But c.f. Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 40, 44G, 44M, 64D).

40. At common law, directions on motive to lie included:

- Where a motive to lie is suggested: telling the jury that, even if they reject a motive to lie put forward by the accused, that does not mean the witness is telling the truth and does not enhance the witness's credibility in any way. It simply removes one reason for rejecting the witness's evidence (compare Palmer v The Queen (1998) 193 CLR 1; R v PLK [1999] 3 VR 567; R v SAB (2008) 20 VR 55); and
- Where a motive to lie is not suggested: telling the jury that there are many reasons why people may lie; that it is not for the accused to identify a motive for the witness to lie; that it is unfair to expect the accused to identify a motive; that the jury must not speculate about the witness' motive to lie (if any); that the jury must not reason that because there is no apparent motive to lie then there is no reason for the witness to lie and so the witness must be telling the truth; and that an inability to identify a motive to lie cannot be used to enhance the witness's credibility (compare R v Costin [1998] 3 VR 659; R v PLK [1999] 3 VR 567; R v RC [2004] VSCA 183).

41. In Jury Directions: A Jury-Centric Approach Part 2, the Department of Justice identified the following problems with common law directions on motive to lie which the 2017 amendments were designed to address:

> The content of the [common law] directions may further reinforce the assumption that complainants frequently lie about sexual assault. Although the accused is often responsible for raising the complainant's motive to lie in the first place, the directions are designed to ensure that there is no disadvantage to the accused, even if he or she raises a 'spurious allegation of fabrication'. Even if the complainant can refute the allegation of motive to lie this does not operate to his or her benefit.
> In particular, the problematic Palmer direction provides that if the jury rejects the alleged motive of the witness to lie (for example, because the jury accepts the evidence given by the witness in rebuttal of the allegation raised by defence counsel) or decides that the witness did not have a motive to lie, this cannot enhance the credibility of the witness. Such a direction is unfair to the witness and unfairly advantageous to the accused. It suggests to the jury that even if it rejects the alleged motive to lie, the complainant should be regarded with suspicion. It may also suggest to the jury that a complainant has hidden motives.
> Also, the directions limit how the jury may use the absence of a motive to lie. For example, the jury may be told that if it rejects the defence's assertion of a motive to lie and accepts the prosecution submission, this cannot be relied on to show that the complainant is telling the truth or to enhance the credibility of the complainant's evidence. Likewise, if the prosecution raises the motive to lie, the jury may be told that it should not speculate on motives that the complainant might have for lying. Research shows that limiting directions of this nature are often ineffective. There is a > risk that they may backfire and have the opposite effect intended, leading jurors to speculate.

> Finally, the number of matters that need to be covered in the directions makes appeals and retrials on the adequacy of directions more likely. The length and complexity of these directions also makes them more difficult for jurors to understand and apply (at 16–17).

42. The Department's report further explains the purpose of ss 44L and 44M as follows:

> To clarify and simplify this area of the law, and to ensure that directions are fair to both the accused and the complainant (or witness), the Bill will set out what trial judges must include in a direction. These requirements are much shorter and simpler than the common law directions. The Bill will also provide that the trial judge must not otherwise direct on the issue of whether a prosecution witness has a motive to lie. This will abolish the Palmer direction and leave it to the jury to decide how motive to lie (or lack of such a motive) affects the witness's credibility, as is appropriate (at 17).

43. These passages indicate that s 44L should be viewed as a complete statement of what the judge needs to tell the jury about motive to lie and that features of the common law directions should not be read into the section.

44. When giving a s 44L direction, the judge should not comment on the plausibility of a suggested motive to lie, or suggests reasons why a jury might reject a possible motive to lie, beyond any obligation to remind the jury of the prosecution and defence arguments (see Briggs v The King [2024] VSCA 80, [128]–[134]).

Section 44L and unfavourable prosecution witnesses

45. As explained above, s 44L only explicitly allows the defence to request the direction. Where the prosecution believes the direction should be given, the prosecution must persuade the judge to exercise the discretion to give a direction under s 16 on the basis that there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving the direction.

46. One scenario which may cause difficulties is where the prosecution cross-examines a witness under Evidence Act 2008 s 38 on the basis that the witness gave evidence that is not favourable to the prosecution. See also 4.20 Unfavourable Witnesses.

47. By its terms, Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44L specifies the content of any direction where "the issue of whether a witness for the prosecution has a motive to lie is raised during a trial". By s 44M, a trial judge is not "required or permitted" to direct the jury on this issue other than as provided by Division 10 of Part 4 (ss 44L and 44M).

48. Where the prosecution cross-examines its own witness and suggests that the witness has a motive to lie (such as for loyalty to the accused, or out of fear of the accused), it is possible that the directions in s 44L(2) (that it is the prosecution's obligation to prove guilt and that the accused does not have to prove that the witness had a motive to lie) do not engage with the real issues in the case.

49. Trial judges will need to consider whether:

    (a) Division 10 of Part 4 can be read down to permit a judicial direction about the relevance of the motive identified by the prosecution and how it interacts with the burden and standard of proof; or

    (b) Division 10 of Part 4 prohibits any other directions about a prosecution witness' motive to lie, and so no relevant direction is possible. In that case, the judge will remain able to remind the jury of the evidence and arguments of the parties (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 65, 66), and may make a comment about how the prosecution arguments interact with the burden and standard of proof.

In this case, [identify how issue of whether the witness has a motive to lie has been raised]. The [suggestion/implication] is that NOW has a motive to give false evidence.

If you accept that NOW [identify relevant motive], or might have [identify relevant motive], then you will need to consider whether that affected the evidence s/he gave.

On the other hand, if you reject the idea that NOW [identify relevant motive], then you will ignore that argument when you are deciding what weight to give his/her evidence.

Remember, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused is guilty. You can only convict NOA of [insert offence] if, on the basis of all the evidence, you are satisfied of his/her guilt beyond reasonable doubt.

The accused does not have to prove that NOW had a reason for giving false evidence.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments of the parties.]

In this case, [identify how issue of whether the witness has a motive to lie has been raised]. The [suggestion/implication] is that NOW had no reason to give false evidence.

Remember, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused is guilty. You can only convict NOA of [insert offence] if, on the basis of all the evidence, you are satisfied of his/her guilt beyond reasonable doubt.

The accused does not have to prove that NOW had a reason for giving false evidence.

It would therefore be wrong to think that unless you can find a reason for NOW to give false evidence, then NOW must be telling the truth. If you did that, you would be expecting NOA to prove his/her innocence. And that would be contrary to the rule that the prosecution must prove the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt.

4.5 Confessions and Admissions

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Terminology

1. At common law, a distinction is drawn between a "confession" and an "admission".[103] This is not the case under the Evidence Act 2008, which uses the term "admission" to refer to both types of evidence.

[103] At common law, in a "confession" the accused directly discloses his or her guilt of an offence, while in an "admission" the accused merely discloses incriminatory facts. Despite this differentiation, at common law the same legal principles apply to both types of evidence (see R v DD (2007) 19 VR 143; [2007] VSCA 317).

2. Consequently, although this topic is titled "Confessions and Admissions" (to make clear the fact that they cover both types of evidence), in the remainder of this commentary, only the term "admission" is used.

What is an Admission?

3. The Dictionary to the Evidence Act 2008 defines an "admission" as a previous representation by a party to a proceeding that is adverse to the person's interest in the outcome of proceedings.

4. This definition (which must be read in conjunction with the definition of "previous representation") covers both express admissions and implied admissions by conduct.[104] It includes statements that may rebut a possible defence, such as intoxication. However, conduct such as producing a writing sample, or a refusal to take part in an identification parade, is not an "admission" (See R v Fowler (2003) 151 A Crim R 166; R v Esposito (1998) 45 NSWLR 442; R v Horton (1998) 104 A Crim R 306; Re A (a Child) (2000) 115 A Crim R 1; R v Knight (2001) 120 A Crim R 381).

5. Admissions can be made to police or to other witnesses (R v Robertson [1998] 4 VR 30; R v Buckley (2004) 10 VR 215).

6. One way in which an accused may admit his or her involvement in a crime is by pleading guilty at a committal hearing. Such a plea amounts to a solemn confession of every element of the offence (R v D'Orta-Ekenaike [1998] 2 VR 140; R v Rustum [2005] VSCA 142).

Admissibility of Admissions

7. The admissibility of admissions is governed by Part 3.4 of the Evidence Act 2008.

8. Where a statement contains both inculpatory and exculpatory elements (a "mixed statement"), the exculpatory elements will be admissible if reasonably necessary in order to explain the admission (Evidence Act 2008 s 81(2))

9. This topic does not address the admissibility of admissions. The focus is solely on the directions to be given when an admission is admitted.

Issues to be Addressed in the Charge

10. Depending on the circumstances of the case, a judge may need to:

    i) Direct the jury about the pre-requisites for using an admission;

    ii) Warn the jury that evidence of an admission may be unreliable.

    These directions are addressed in turn below.

Prerequisites for Using an Admission

The prerequisites

11. The jury may only use an alleged admission if they are satisfied that:

---

[104] Implied admissions by conduct include exculpatory statements that are relied upon as lies, or other post–offence conduct, that can be used as 'incriminating conduct' within the meaning of Jury Directions Act 2015 s 18.

i) It was made by the accused;[105] and ii) Its substance is truthful (Burns v R (1975) 132 CLR 258).

12. It is essential that the issues of whether the alleged admission was made, and whether it was truthful, are kept strictly separate. The presence of truthful facts in the alleged admission must not be allowed to distract the jury from the possibility that the admission was fabricated by a person aware of the underlying facts (Burns v R (1975) 132 CLR 258; R v Gay [1976] VR 577).

13. In some cases, it will also be necessary to direct the jury of the need to be satisfied that an alleged admission related to the acts charged in the indictment and not some other, uncharged, act. This is especially important where the alleged admission is made in general terms, such as agreeing that general allegations of sexual misconduct are true (Payne v R [2015] VSCA 291, [13]; Choudhary v R [2013] VSCA 325; R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501).

14. If the jury cannot be satisfied that the admission related to specific conduct alleged in the indictment, then it can only be used to assess the nature of the relationship between the parties, such as to show the existence of a sexual relationship (see Payne v R [2015] VSCA 291; Choudhary v R [2013] VSCA 325; R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501).

The Accused Must Have Made the Admission

15. Before the jury can use an admission, they must be satisfied that it was made in the terms alleged by the witness (i.e. the witness's evidence about the admission was "accurate") (McKinney v R (1991) 171 CLR 468).

16. The jury must assess this matter based on the whole of the relevant evidence (Burns v R (1975) 132 CLR 258).

17. Evidence that suggests that the content of an admission is untrue will cast doubt on the likelihood that the admission was made (McKinney v R (1991) 171 CLR 468).

18. Evidence concerning the circumstances of the alleged admission and the credibility of relevant witnesses may also bear on the probability that the accused made the admission (R v Gay [1976] VR 577).[106]

The Admission Must Have Been Truthful

19. Before the jury can use an admission, they must also be satisfied that the statement constitutes a truthful representation of the accused's involvement in the crime (Burns v R (1975) 132 CLR 258).

20. This requires the jury to be satisfied that the words used in the admission were intended to be an admission of guilt of the offence charged, and did not bear some other innocent meaning (R v Buckley (2004) 10 VR 215).

21. It also requires the jury to be satisfied that the accused was not boasting about or exaggerating his or her actions (R v Mitchell [2006] VSCA 289; R v Koeleman (2000) 2 VR 20).

22. The jury only needs to be satisfied that the statement is true in relation to the parts in which the accused implicates himself or herself in the commission of the offence. The jury does not need to be satisfied that the statement is true in all particulars (R v Burns [1975] VR 241).

[105] Section 87 of the Evidence Act 2008 allows admissions by a third party with the authority of the accused to also be taken as admissions by the accused.

[106] These factors may also be relevant to the admissibility of the admission (see Evidence Act 2008 s 85). The fact that the judge has taken such factors into account in determining that the admission is admissible does not mean that the jury must accept the evidence as truthful and reliable (see R v Williams (1981) 4 A Crim R 441; R v Blades; ex parte Attorney-General [2001] QCA 384; R v Basto (1954) 91 CLR 628; Burns v R (1975) 132 CLR 258).

When should the jury be directed about the prerequisites?

23. The need for a direction depends on whether a direction is sought and whether, despite the absence of any request, there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving the direction (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 12, 14, 16). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

24. Ordinarily, the jury will be able to evaluate evidence of an admission without assistance, and so a Burns direction will not be required (Carr v R (1988) 165 CLR 314; Bromley v R (1986) 161 CLR 315).

25. However, a direction may be necessary if the evidence is prone to misuse, or if the jury may fail to distinguish or apply the two prerequisites for using an admission (Burns v R (1975) 132 CLR 258; R v Perera [1986] 1 Qd R 211; Cotic v R (2000) 118 A Crim R 393; R v D'Orta-Ekenaike [1998] 2 VR 140).

26. Where there is no dispute that an admission, if made, was truthful, the judge may direct the jury only on the need to be satisfied that accused made the admission (R v Brooks (1998) 103 A Crim R 234).

27. Conversely, if there is no dispute that the admission was made, the judge should not direct the jury on the need to be satisfied that the admission was made. Such a direction would be superfluous and distracting (De Silva v The Queen [2019] HCA 48, [33]).

28. The need for a Burns direction does not depend on whether the admission was made to police or to some other witness. A direction may be required regardless of the person who witnessed the previous representation (R v Robertson [1998] 4 VR 30; R v Buckley (2004) 10 VR 215).

29. At common law, if the relevant admission consisted of a guilty plea made at a committal hearing (which has subsequently been changed), the judge was required to direct the jury about how they could use evidence of the plea (R v D'Orta-Ekenaike [1998] 2 VR 140; R v Rustum [2005] VSCA 142).

Content of a Burns Direction

30. The content of a Burns direction will depend on the circumstances of the case (Burns v R (1975) 132 CLR 258; Ross v R (1922) 30 CLR 246; Carr v R (1988) 165 CLR 314; McKay v R (1935) 54 CLR 1; R v Mitchell [2006] VSCA 289; R v Lewis (2000) 1 VR 290).

31. Where a full Burns direction is required, the judge must direct the jury that they may only use an alleged admission if they are satisfied that it was made by the accused and was truthful (Burns v R (1975) 132 CLR 258; R v PAB (2006) 162 A Crim R 449).

32. At common law it was customary to direct the jury that these two matters must be established beyond reasonable doubt (R v Franklin (2001) 3 VR 9; R v Kotzman [1999] 2 VR 123; Walford v McKinney [1997] 2 VR 353; R v Russo (2004) 11 VR 1; McKinney v R (1991) 171 CLR 468).

33. Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, the only matters that must be proved beyond reasonable doubt are the elements and the absence of any relevant defences (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 61. See also Payne v R [2015] VSCA 291, [13]; DPP v Roder [2024] HCA 15, [15]).

34. However, in some cases, an admission may be substantially the only evidence of one or more elements. In such cases, it may be appropriate for the judge to clearly identify for the jury the importance of the admission. Judges should discuss the issue with counsel and hear submissions on what additional directions or comments are appropriate. One option is to refer to the evidence of the confession or admission and direct the jury that it must be satisfied that that evidence proves the element beyond reasonable doubt (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 61, Example).The judge should identify the charge or charges in respect of which the evidence is capable of constituting an admission (CG v R [2011] VSCA 211).

35. In some cases, it will not be possible to link an admission, even if made, to particular charges. Where that occurs, the jury must be directed to only use the evidence to assess the general relationship between the parties, such as to show that a sexual relationship existed (Payne v R [2015] VSCA 291, [11]; Choudhary v R [2013] VSCA 325).

36. Where relevant, the jury should be told to consider whether a witness's evidence of the terms of an admission contains information which could only have come from the accused. The inclusion of such information reduces the chance that the admission was invented by the witness (Burns v R (1975) 132 CLR 258; R v Georgiev [2001] VSCA 18).

37. Conversely, in some cases the jury should be told that no conclusions can be drawn from the inclusion of information which the witness would have known even if the accused had not made an admission (R v Gay [1976] VR 577).

38. At common law, part of the rationale for allowing confessions and admissions to be led in evidence is that it is unlikely that an innocent person would implicate himself or herself in a crime (Burns v R (1975) 132 CLR 258).

39. This rationale should not be included as part of a charge on confessions or admissions. It is undesirable to give the jury general directions about what kinds of evidence are likely to be true and the direction does not help a jury decide whether to accept the evidence. Such a direction would be erroneous if it suggested that there was a legal presumption that admissions are truthful (Burns v R (1975) 132 CLR 258; Tunja v R (2013) 41 VR 208; Mule v R [2005] HCA 49; *Xypolitos v R (*2014) 44 VR 423).

40. If the case involves a written admission that has been altered, the jury should be told that they may only use that admission if they are satisfied that the alterations were adopted by the accused (Walford v McKinney [1997] 2 VR 353).

41. Where the evidence is ambiguous, the judge must also direct the jury that they need to determine whether the words used constitute an admission of the wrongdoing alleged in the case. This requires the jury to consider whether the accused effectively admitted his or her involvement in the offence charged (Magill v R (2013) 42 VR 616. See also R v Ly, NSWCCA, 25/5/1994; R v Khalil (1987) 44 SASR 23).

42. If the admission consists of a guilty plea made at a committal hearing (which has subsequently been changed), the direction will explain that the jury may only use the evidence of that plea if they are satisfied that the plea:

    - Was a true acknowledgment of guilt of the offence charged; and
    - Was intended to be a true acknowledgment of guilt of the offence charged (R v D'Orta-Ekenaike [1998] 2 VR 140; R v Perera [1986] 1 Qd R 211; Cotic v R (2000) 118 A Crim R 393).

43. In such cases, the judge should also explain the ways in which the accused disputes the evidentiary value of the plea (R v D'Orta-Ekenaike [1998] 2 VR 140; R v Rustum [2005] VSCA 142).

Mixed statements

44. In some cases, a statement will contain both an inculpatory admission and an exculpatory explanation (a 'mixed statement'). As a matter of fairness, the prosecution may not rely solely on the inculpatory parts of the statement, but must tender the whole statement (R v Rudd (2009) 23 VR 444).

45. When the jury receives a mixed statement, a party may request a direction on how the jury should treat the inculpatory and exculpatory parts of the statement (R v Rudd (2009) 23 VR 444).

46. Such a direction:

    - May tell the jury that it is for the jury to determine what weight to give the different parts of the statement;
    - Must not convey that the jury are bound as a matter of law to give less weight to some parts of the statement than others;
    - Should not state why admissions against interest are commonly regarded as reliable evidence (R v Rudd (2009) 23 VR 444; R v Berry & Wenitong (2007) 17 VR 153; Mule v R [2005] HCA 49).

47. It is not necessary for the jury to be asked to decide whether it accepts that the exculpatory part of a mixed statement was made. The requirement that the statement was made only applies to a disputed confessional statement (De Silva v The Queen [2019] HCA 48, [34]).

Unreliability of Admission Evidence

48. A judge may be required to warn the jury that evidence of an admission may be unreliable (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32).

49. This is a particular form of a s 32 unreliable evidence warning. This topic should therefore be read in conjunction with 4.21 Unreliable Evidence Warning.

When must a s 32 unreliability warning be given?

50. A judge must give a s 32 unreliability warning if:

    i) A party in a jury trial requests such a warning;

    ii) The evidence in question is "of a kind that may be unreliable"; and

    iii) There are no good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32).

51. See 4.21 Unreliable Evidence Warning for general information concerning the first and third requirements.

52. In relation to the second requirement, s 31(a) states that evidence of an admission is evidence "of a kind that may be unreliable".

53. However, a s 32 unreliability warning is not required simply because evidence of an admission has been led (and the other requirements of s 32 have been met). Such a warning will only be necessary if the judge finds that the specific evidence in the case is "of a kind that may be unreliable" (see R v Clark (2001) 123 A Crim R 506 Heydon J, [70]).

54. While evidence of an admission may be "of a kind that may be unreliable", this will not always be the case. Even if evidence falls within the description in s 31(a), judges must always consider whether the specific evidence given in the trial in question is "of a kind that may be unreliable" (see R v Clark (2001) 123 A Crim R 506 Heydon J, [70]).

55. Section 32 creates a test of "possibility". The question is whether the evidence is of a kind that "may be" unreliable (R v Flood [1999] NSWCCA 198, [3]).

56. In determining whether to give a s 32 warning, the judge must consider the issues that were raised in the trial about the reliability of the admission evidence (R v Fowler (2003) 151 A Crim R 166; Em v R [2006] NSWCCA 336).

57. It will usually be unnecessary to give a warning if:

    - The reliability of the evidence is not in issue, or
    - The jury can safely use its common sense and experience to assess any factors that affect the reliability of the evidence (see Em v R [2006] NSWCCA 336; R v Fowler (2003) 151 A Crim R 166; R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301; R v Baartman [2000] NSWCCA 298; R v Kanaan [2006] NSWCCA 109).

58. A warning will generally not be necessary where it is only the witness's honesty that is attacked, unless the witness falls into a category mentioned in s 32. In general, the court has no particular advantage over the jury in determining whether a witness is telling the truth (R v Fowler (2003) 151 A Crim R 166).

59. However, if the witness's honesty is attacked due to the fact that he or she falls within a special class (e.g. where he or she is a prison informer or a criminally concerned witness), a s 32 warning may be required on another ground (see R v Fowler (2003) 151 A Crim R 166). See 4.21 Unreliable Evidence Warning for information concerning the other grounds on which a s 32 warning may be required.

Content of an unreliable evidence warning

60. A s 32 unreliability warning must:

    i) Warn the jury that the evidence may be unreliable;

    ii) Inform the jury of the significant matters that may cause it to be unreliable; and

    iii) Warn the jury of the need for caution in determining whether to accept the evidence and the weight to be given to it (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32).

61. See 4.21 Unreliable Evidence Warning for information concerning the first and third requirements.

62. When a party requests a s 32 warning, it must identify the significant matters that may make the evidence unreliable. The judge will need to consider which of those matters are significant and must direct the jury accordingly (see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32).

63. As evidence of an admission is evidence of a previous representation, a judge may need to direct the jury about any significant matters that make the evidence potentially unreliable due to its nature as a previous representation (R v Johnston [2004] NSWCCA 58; ALRC Report 26, Volume 1, 1985 (Interim), [753]).[107] See 4.14 Previous Representations (Hearsay, Recent Complaint and Prior Statements) for further information.

64. In some cases, the following matters may also affect the reliability of admission evidence:

    - The possibility that the admission was induced in some way that undermines its reliability (see R v Tofilau (2006) 13 VR 28);

[107] Some of the risks posed by evidence of previous representations include:

- That in repeating what the speaker said, the original words or their effect may not have been accurately recalled and repeated;

- That any weaknesses of perception, memory, narration skill and sincerity of the speaker and the person reciting the representation may have been compounded;

- That the representation was not made in the court environment and may have been subject to pressures that resulted in a false account being given;

- That the representation was not made on oath or affirmation, and so may not have been truthful;

- That the jury was unable to assess the credibility of the speaker at the time he or she made the representation, and so are unable to know whether or not he or she was being honest (see, e.g. R v Harbulot [2003] NSWCCA 141; R v Vincent [2002] NSWCCA 369; R v Nemeth [2002] NSWCCA 281; Brown v R [2006] NSWCCA 69).

- The possibility that the accused may have perceived that making an untrue admission would be both safe and beneficial, such as if the accused was bragging, exaggerating or fantasising (see R v Tofilau (2006) 13 VR 28; R v De Martin [2009] NSWDC 113; R v Khalil (1987) 44 SASR 23);
- The possibility that the accused suffered from a mental illness or operated in a mental state that could have led to him or her making a false admission (see Mallard v R (2005) 224 CLR 125; Burns v R (1975) 132 CLR 258);
- The fact that the witness giving evidence of the admission has an interest in the outcome of the proceeding, and so may be biased or have a motive to be untruthful (Derbas v R [2007] NSWCCA 118);
- The fact that the evidence was easy to manufacture, hard to deny and very difficult to test (R v Robinson [2003] NSWCCA 188).

Withdrawn Pre-trial Disclosure or Concessions

65. As part of pre-trial disclosure obligations, the defence must file a response to the summary of the prosecution opening and a defence response to the prosecution's notice of pre-trial admissions (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 183). In the course of complying with these obligations, the defence may make some admissions.
66. While the defence is free to depart from any admissions made in those documents, or in the defence opening, the judge and, with leave, the prosecutor may make strong comments on that change of position (R v Shalala (2007) 17 VR 133; Sumner v R [2010] VSCA 298).
67. The judge may only grant leave to the prosecutor to comment on the departure if the comment is relevant, the comment is permitted by another Act or a rule of law and the comment is not unfairly prejudicial (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 237).
68. In addition, the jury may only use admissions in a pre-trial document if the judge allows the admissions to be received in evidence. This may depend on whether the prosecution can establish that it is reasonably open to find that the admission was made by a person who had authority on behalf of the accused to make such an admission (see Evidence Act 2008 s 87 and Hoy Mobile Pty Ltd v Allphones Retail Pty Ltd (2008) 167 FCR 314).

Timing of the Direction

69. A direction about admission evidence may be given at the time the evidence is received and/or in the judge's final charge (Burns v R (1975) 132 CLR 258).
70. A direction that is given when the evidence is received does not always need to be repeated in the final charge (Burns v R (1975) 132 CLR 258).

4.5.1 Charge: Confessions and Admissions

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

In this case, you heard evidence that NOA admitted that s/he had [describe the content of the admission]. The prosecution says that this evidence is relevant to [identify relevant charge and the way in which that admission is alleged to be relevant].

Before you can use this evidence, you must consider two matters.

First, you must accept that the accused actually made the alleged admission in the terms alleged by NOW. That is, you must accept that NOA [insert relevant details, e.g. "said to NOW 'I killed NOV'"].[108]

Secondly, you must accept that the accused's alleged admission was truthful. This requires you to accept that when NOA [insert relevant details, e.g. "said 'I killed NOV'"], s/he meant to admit [describe fact in issue, e.g. "that s/he killed NOV"], and that that admission was, in fact, true.[109]

[If a warning under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32 is necessary, add the following shaded section.]

In considering this evidence, I must warn you of the need for caution when considering NOW's evidence of the alleged admission.

Matters that may cause unreliability

I must give you this warning[110] because it is the experience of the law that evidence of admissions may be unreliable. This is because [identify the significant matters that may cause the evidence to be unreliable. Some possibilities include:

- NOW may not have accurately recalled or repeated NOA's admission and may have changed its meaning;
- It was not possible for you to assess NOA's demeanour at the time s/he made the admission, which may make it harder to assess whether the admission was true;
- The process of repeating a statement compounds any weaknesses of the people involved, such as imperfect perception, memory or sincerity. Errors can occur when the original statement is made, when it is heard or when it is repeated in court. This means that even if you accept NOW's evidence as truthful, it might not be an accurate representation of what happened – either because of problems in what NOW heard or remembered, or because NOA's statement itself was not accurate or truthful.
- [Describe relevant inducement or other relevant circumstance] may have caused NOA to make a false statement;
- NOA may have been bragging, exaggerating or fantasising about his/her actions;
- NOW may have reasons for giving untruthful evidence of an admission, such as [describe any relevant reasons, such as bias, etc.];
- An untruthful admission may be easy for a witness to manufacture, hard for an accused to deny and very difficult to test in court;
- NOA may have been subject to pressures that caused him/her to make a false admission, which you do not know about;
- The admission was not made in a court environment, and so NOA was not under the same obligation to tell the truth as s/he would have been if s/he gave evidence in court.]

[108] This part of the charge may be deleted if the accused does not dispute making the admission, but simply disputes its truthfulness.

[109] This part of the charge may be deleted if the accused disputes making the admission, but does not dispute its content.

[110] The judge should add any other matters that may cause the evidence to be unreliable, such as if the evidence comes from an accomplice. If the evidence is given by a prison informer, use 4.23.1 Charge: Confession to Prison Informer instead.

[The judge should also identify any other factors that may have a bearing on the reliability of the evidence in the case, such as any inconsistencies that exist between different admissions that have been made.]

Warning

The law says that every jury must take this potential unreliability into account when considering evidence of an admission. You must take it into account in determining whether you accept NOW's evidence at all, and if you do accept it, in deciding what weight to give to that evidence.

In this case, the prosecution argued that NOA made the alleged admission, and that that admission was truthful. [Describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments.]

The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant defence arguments, e.g. "that NOA never made the admission" or "that while NOA did make an admission, his/her statement was not truthful because s/he was only boasting about having committed the offence" or "that while NOA made a truthful statement, it was not an admission that s/he had …"]. [Summarise relevant defence evidence.]

It is for you to determine, based on all of the relevant evidence, whether NOA made the statement NOW said s/he did, and whether that statement was truthful. Unless you accept that both of these matters have been proven, you must disregard the evidence of NOA's alleged admission.

[If the admission is the only evidence of one or more elements, add the following shaded section.]

You will remember my directions the prosecution must prove its case beyond reasonable doubt. In this case, the only evidence that [identify relevant elements or facts in issue] is the evidence that [describe evidence of admission]. You therefore cannot be satisfied that the prosecution has proved its case beyond reasonable doubt unless you are satisfied this evidence proves [identify relevant element] beyond reasonable doubt.

4.5.2 Charge: Withdrawn Committal Plea

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

It is not disputed that NOA initially pleaded guilty to NOO.[111]

You can use this guilty plea as an admission of guilt. However, before you can do so, you must consider two matters.

First, you must accept that the plea was a true acknowledgement of his/her guilt of NOO. That is, you must accept that when NOA pleaded guilty to NOO, s/he was admitting his/her guilt of that offence.

Secondly, you must accept that the plea was intended to be a true acknowledgment of his/her guilt. This requires you to accept that when NOA pleaded guilty, s/he meant to accept his/her responsibility for the crime of NOO, and that that admission was, in fact, true.

In considering this evidence, I must warn you of the need for caution when considering evidence of NOA's earlier guilty plea.

Matters that may cause unreliability

[111] Name of Offence.

I must give you this warning[112] because it is the experience of the law that evidence of admissions may be unreliable. This is because [identify all of the risks of unreliability posed by the specific evidence in the case. Some possibilities include:

- It was not possible for you to assess NOA's demeanour at the time s/he made the admission, which may make it harder to assess whether the admission was true and was intended to be true;
- [Describe relevant inducement or other relevant circumstance] may have caused NOA to make a false plea;
- NOA may have been subject to pressures that caused him/her to make a false plea, which you do not know about.]

Warning

The law says that every jury must take this potential unreliability into account when considering evidence of an admission. You must take it into account in deciding whether NOA's plea was a true acknowledgement of his/her guilt of NOO and whether it was intended to be a true acknowledgement of guilt.

The prosecution invite you to use NOA's earlier guilty plea as evidence of his/her guilt. [Describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments.]

The defence argued that you should not use the evidence in this way. They say [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments, e.g. "that NOA only pleaded guilty to bring an end to the matter" or "that NOA was not aware that s/he had a valid defence".]

It is for you to determine, based on all of the relevant evidence, whether NOA's guilty plea was, and was intended to be, a true acknowledgment of his/her guilt of NOO. Unless you accept that both of these matters have been proven, you must disregard the evidence of NOA's alleged admission.

4.6 Incriminating Conduct (Post Offence Lies and Conduct)

Introduction

1. Division 1 of Part 4 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 regulates the admission and use of evidence of 'incriminating conduct'. The Part applies to "conduct" and "incriminating conduct" which are defined as:

[112] The judge should add any other matters that may cause the evidence to be unreliable, such as if the evidence comes from an accomplice. If the evidence is given by a prison informer, use 4.23.1 Charge: Confession to Prison Informer instead.

Conduct means the telling of a lie by the accused, or any other act or omission of the accused, which occurs after the event or events alleged to constitute an offence charged;

Incriminating conduct means conduct that amounts to an implied admission by the accused-

(a) of having committed an offence charged or an element of an offence charged; or

(b) which negates a defence to an offence charged (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 18).

2. These provisions replace the common law principles that were developed in relation to 'consciousness of guilt' and 'post offence conduct' (see Jury Directions Act 2013 s 28 and Jury Directions Act 2015 s 24).
3. Incriminating conduct falls into two broad categories: lies, and other post-offence behaviour (including acts such as flight or omissions). Similar principles apply to both areas (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 18; R v Renzella [1997] 2 VR 88 (CA); R v Boros [2002] VSCA 181).
4. Evidence of incriminating conduct can be used in only two ways:
   i) to attack the accused's credit where he or she gives an account either in a record of interview or in evidence; and/or
   ii) as an implied admission of having committed an offence of an element of an offence or which negates a defence to an offence charged (Edwards v R (1993) 178 CLR 193; R v Akkus [2007] VSCA 287; R v GVV (2008) 20 VR 395).
5. There are a number of specific inferences that can be drawn from post-offence conduct. Depending on the conduct, the jury may be able to infer that, by committing the relevant conduct, the accused impliedly admitted that:
   - s/he committed an offence charged or an alternative offence;
   - s/he had committed part of the actus reus of an offence;
   - s/he had a particular intention or mens rea when s/he engaged in particular conduct; or
   - s/he was not acting in a way consistent with possible legal defences or justifications (e.g. self-defence, duress or sudden extraordinary emergency) (R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26; R v Jakimov [2007] VSCA 9; Jury Directions Act 2015 s 18).
6. The Jury Directions Act 2015 sets out the following three directions:
   - a section 21 direction, to be given whenever evidence is relied on as incriminating conduct;
   - a section 22 direction, which may be requested when evidence is relied on as incriminating conduct; and
   - a section 23 direction, which may be requested when there is a risk of the jury improperly using evidence as incriminating conduct.
7. These provisions substantially replicate the former Part 6 of the Jury Directions Act 2013.
8. Conduct which only provides support for other circumstantial evidence (such as post-offence conduct used to prove a sexual interest in the complainant, or as context evidence) is not an implied admission of a specific charge. The need for directions on such evidence will depend on how the evidence is relevant (see, e.g. PDI v R [2011] VSCA 446).
9. If evidence of conduct is only used to attack credit, the judge will generally not need to warn the jury about the use of that evidence unless defence counsel requests a direction to address the risk of the jury misusing the evidence as an implied admission (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 23).

10. Previously, incriminating conduct was sometimes called evidence of "consciousness of guilt". This term is potentially misleading, and its use with juries is discouraged (Zoneff v R (2000) 200 CLR 234 (Kirby J); R v Nguyen (2001) 118 A Crim R 479; R v Franklin (2001) 3 VR 9; R v Chang (2003) 7 VR 236).

Admissibility of incriminating conduct – notice and leave requirements

11. The prosecution must not rely on evidence as incriminating conduct unless:
    - at least 28 days before the trial is listed the commence, the prosecution has served on the accused and filed in court:
        - a notice of intention to rely on evidence of incriminating conduct; and
        - a copy of the evidence the prosecution intends to rely upon; and
    - the trial judge finds that the evidence is reasonably capable of being used by the jury as evidence of incriminating conduct (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 19, 20).[113]
12. A judge may dispense with the need to give notice of an intention to rely on evidence of incriminating conduct if the prosecution first becomes aware of the relevant conduct during the trial, the prosecution gives oral notice of its intention to rely on that conduct as incriminating conduct and it is in the interests of justice to dispense with the requirements (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 20).
13. One situation in which the prosecution might only become aware of the alleged conduct during the trial is where the prosecution invites the jury to draw an inference about the content of the accused's instructions to counsel on the basis of the content of cross-examination. While it can be permissible to invite the jury to draw such an inference, a submission that the accused invented those instructions because the truth would implicate the accused is an invitation to treat the instructions as incriminating conduct. Such a submission requires compliance with the Post-offence conduct provisions of the Jury Directions Act 2015 (Ritchie v The Queen [2019] VSCA 202, [109]).
14. When assessing whether the evidence is reasonably capable of being used as incriminating conduct, the judge must consider the case as a whole. It is not necessary to assess whether a piece of evidence, standing alone, is capable of being used as an implied admission (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 20).
15. The following sections describe the circumstances in which lies and other post-offence conduct may be capable of being used as incriminating conduct.
16. If an innocent explanation of the post-offence conduct is so inherently likely that a jury could not properly regard the conduct as evidence of guilt, the judge must not allow the prosecution to rely on the conduct as evidence of incriminating conduct (R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26).

Post-offence lies

17. One form of conduct which may be capable of constituting incriminating conduct is evidence that the accused told a lie (Edwards v R (1993) 178 CLR 193; R v Renzella [1997] 2 VR 88 (CA)).
18. Only post-offence lies which are told because the accused perceives that the truth is inconsistent with his or her innocence provide evidence probative of guilt (Edwards v R (1993) 178 CLR 193).

[113] The incriminating conduct notice requirement does not apply in summary hearings. While Jury Directions Act 2015 s 4A requires magistrate conducting a summary hearing to reason in a manner consistent with Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 21–23 (as the case may be), the Act does not require parties in non-trial hearings to comply with the notice requirements (DPP v Dyke (2020) 61 VR 207, [13]–[17]).

19. Where the accused tells the same lie on multiple occasions, the prosecution should consider how it proposes to treat those multiple lies. Where it relies only on one instance of the lie as incriminating conduct and other instances as going to credit, there is a risk that the jury will be unable to draw that distinction and will instead rely on all instances of the lie as incriminating conduct. In such cases, it may be necessary to refuse leave to rely on the lie as incriminating conduct (R v Robb [2015] VSC 481).

20. The probative value of a lie depends on its nature and the use sought to be made of it. It will rarely be strong enough to prove guilt directly. It will usually form part of the body of circumstantial evidence from which the jury is asked to infer the guilt of the accused (R v Nguyen (2001) 118 A Crim R 479; R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26).

21. It is possible for a lie to be the only evidence of guilt – if the only reasonable inference to be drawn from the fact that the accused had lied was that s/he was confessing his/her guilt. However, this will be very rare (R v Zheng (1995) 83 A Crim R 572 (NSW CCA); Edwards v R (1993) 178 CLR 193).

22. Finding that the accused lied due to a belief in their own guilt is not the same as finding that s/he is guilty of the offence. It is merely one piece of evidence that can be used in the ultimate determination of guilt. The judge must tell the jury that even if they find that the accused believed that he or she committed the offence, the jury must still decide on the whole of the evidence whether the prosecution has proved the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 21; R v Camilleri (2001) 119 A Crim R 106; R v Franklin (2001) 3 VR 9).

23. In most cases lies are not used as an implied admission. Post-offence lies are generally used to discredit a witness, or simply in the context of providing contradictory evidence (Edwards v R (1993) 178 CLR 193; R v Renzella [1997] 2 VR 88 (CA)).

24. If lies are not used as an implied admission, it is a misdirection to tell the jury that they form part of the prosecution's circumstantial case, or to prove the accused's guilt (R v Renzella [1997] 2 VR 88 (CA); R v Benfield [1997] 2 VR 491 (CA); R v Russo (2004) 11 VR 1; R v Hartwick (2005) 14 VR 125).

Relevant types of lies

25. At common law, untrue assertions and false denials are only capable of being used as an implied admission if the accused perceives that the truth is inconsistent with innocence. As a result, a lie could only be used as incriminating conduct if:

    - the lie was deliberate;
    - the lie related to a material issue;
    - the telling of the lie showed knowledge of the offence and was told because the truth would implicate the accused;
    - there was no other explanation for the telling of the lie consistent with innocence (R v Edwards (1993) 178 CLR 193; R v Renzella [1997] 2 VR 88).

26. At common law, the jury was required to consider these matters before using evidence as an implied admission. Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, it is likely that these matters will remain relevant to determining whether a judge should grant leave to allow the prosecution to rely on evidence as incriminating conduct (see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 20).

27. There must be evidence that a statement is a lie before it can be left to the jury as a possible implied admission. If the only way to establish a statement as a lie is by finding the accused guilty ("bootstraps reasoning"), it cannot be used in this way (R v Laz [1998] 1 VR 453; R v Russo (2004) 11 VR 1; R v Sirillas [2006] VSCA 234).

28. A mere denial of guilt (which can only be shown to be a lie by proving the prosecution case) cannot be used as an implied admission (R v Gionfriddo and Faure (1989) 50 A Crim R 327 (Vic FC)).

29. For a lie to be used as an implied admission, it must relate to a material issue (Edwards v R (1993) 178 CLR 193; R v Gionfriddo and Faure (1989) 50 A Crim R 327 (Vic FC)).

30. The logic of incriminating conduct evidence depends on the accused's knowledge that he or she committed the offences and that the truth would implicate the accused. The fact that the applicant was not provided with the detail of the complainant's allegations before the accused made a statement said to contain a lie does not inform the question of the applicant's belief (Di Giorgio v R [2016] VSCA 335, [28]).

31. If a lie is not inconsistent with the prosecution's account of the alleged crime (i.e. even if the accused had told the truth, it would not have implicated him or her in the crime), it is unlikely to be material (see, e.g. R v Sutton (1986) 5 NSWLR 697).

32. A lie by an accused about why s/he failed to mention a fact can be used as an implied admission (R v Russo (2004) 11 VR 1).

33. It may be inappropriate to leave lies to the jury as evidence of guilt if the accused disavowed the lies within a short period of time (R v Lee (2005) 12 VR 249).

34. Pre-offence lies cannot be used as an implied admission. They can, however, be used as an implied admission of an intention to commit an offence, or that one is actually in the course of committing an offence (R v Appleby (1996) 88 A Crim R 456; R v Kotzmann [1999] 2 VR 123).

Other post-offence behaviour

35. Although lies have generally been given special treatment in the case law, they are just one instance of potentially incriminating conduct. Evidence of other post-offence behaviour, such as fleeing from the police or concealing evidence, is equally capable of being regarded as an implied admission (R v Gionfriddo and Faure (1989) 50 A Crim R 327 (Vic FC); R v Boros [2002] VSCA 181; R v McCullagh (No 2) [2005] VSCA 109).

36. Some examples of other post-offence behaviour which have been used as evidence probative of guilt include:

    - fleeing (R v McKenna (1956) 73 WN (NSW) 345 (CCA); R v Gay [1976] VR 577 (FC); R v Porter (2003) 85 SASR 581).
    - concealing evidence (R v Rice [1996] 2 VR 406; R v Chang (2003) 7 VR 236).
    - suborning witnesses (R v Liddy (2002) 81 SASR 22).
    - remaining silent when speech could have been expected (R v Salahattin [1983] 1 VR 521 (FC); R v Gallagher [1998] 2 VR 671. See also R v MMJ [2006] VSCA 226 (Warren CJ)).
    - modifying behaviour patterns (R v Gallagher [1998] 2 VR 671).
    - laying a false trail (R v Chang (2003) 7 VR 236; R v Loader (2004) 89 SASR 204).

37. Where a person is alleged to have committed an offence as part of a group, conduct such as concealing evidence may be directly relevant to the accused's participation in the group, without any obligation to use the evidence as an implied admission. The prosecution, the defence and the judge will need to consider whether the evidence is relevant as circumstantial evidence or as an implied admission and, if the prosecution does not seek to use the evidence as an implied admission, whether a direction is necessary under s 23 about the risk of misuse (Lowe v R (2015) 48 VR 351, [176]–[181]).

38. As with lies, there is a distinction between cases where post-offence conduct such as flight has no probative value, and those where it is used as an implied admission (R v Chang (2003) 7 VR 236; Dwyer v The King [2023] VSCA 85).

39. Flight will not be probative where there is an equally plausible, innocent, explanation for the conduct. For example, in Dwyer v The King [2023] VSCA 85, the accused left the vicinity of the alleged offending after becoming aware that several people were angry with him and were looking for him. In that situation, the Court held that a rational jury could not determine that the accused fled due to his recent offending, rather than due to fear of the gathering mob, and therefore could not use the evidence of flight either as incriminating conduct, or as evidence that reflected on the credibility of the accused (Dwyer v The King [2023] VSCA 85, [96]–[97]). For this purpose, an 'innocent explanation' is one where the accused is not guilty of the offence charged. For example, an 'innocent explanation' for fleeing from the police in relation to one armed robbery could be that the accused was wanted for a different armed robbery (see, e.g. R v Hartwick, Unreported, Supreme Court of Victoria Court of Appeal, 20 December 1995).

40. The principles that apply to the treatment of other forms of post-offence behaviour are generally the same as those that apply to lies (R v Renzella [1997] 2 VR 88 (CA); R v Nguyen (2001) 118 A Crim R 479; R v McCullagh (No 2) [2005] VSCA 109).

41. At common law, the principles of consciousness of guilt were not limited by a strict temporal separation between conduct before or during the offence and conduct after the offence. Conduct that revealed an awareness of current or future wrongdoing could require the same directions as post-offence conduct, or modified post-offence conduct directions. For example, a destruction of evidence or the means of detection (such as listening devices or CCTV cameras), or laying a false trail, could be used as an implied admission even if it predated the completion of the offence (La Rocca v The Queen [2021] NSWCCA 116, [116]–[117]; R v Appleby (1996) 88 A Crim R 456, 459, 485–487).

42. The definition of 'conduct' in Jury Directions Act 2015 s 18 specifically refers to conduct which "occurs after the event or events alleged to constitute the offence charged". It is likely that the abolition of the common law through Jury Directions Act 2013 s 28 is limited to post-offence conduct, and so directions about implied admissions arising from pre-offence conduct remain governed by the common law (see also the Notes to Jury Directions Act 2015 s 24).

Pretext conversation and incriminating conduct

43. The "pretext conversation" has become a common technique for the investigation of certain offences, especially sexual offences. A "pretext conversation" occurs where the complainant confronts the accused with an allegation of the offending. The conversation is recorded by police, and the recording may be played in the trial.

44. Where a pretext conversation produce evidence that meets the definition of incriminating conduct, the prosecution must give notice under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 19 if it wishes to rely on the evidence for that purpose.

45. Whether a pretext call meets the definition of incriminating conduct ("an implied admission by the accused of having committed an offence charged or an element of an offence charged…") will often depend on the degree of specificity in the conversation. The evidence will most likely meet the definition where the accused demonstrates an awareness of the offences alleged, fails to deny the offending or makes a generalised admission in respect of multiple allegations (see, e.g. WA v McBride [2015] WASC 275; R v LAF [2015] QCA 130; R v MBV [2013] QCA 17; Christian v R [2012] NSWCCA 34).

46. In contrast, where the call involves a specific allegation and a specific admission, it is more likely that statements in the pretext call will be treated as express admissions, rather than implied admissions (see, e.g. R v Cavalli [2010] QCA 343).

47. Further, in some cases, the statements made in a pretext conversation will be non-specific and a jury cannot link those statements to any particular alleged offence. In those circumstances, the conversation may instead be relevant to support other circumstantial evidence, such as to prove a sexual interest in an individual complainant, or as context evidence. In those circumstances, the evidence will not be "incriminating conduct", as defined in the Jury Directions Act 2015 (see, e.g. PDI v R [2011] VSCA 446; JWM v R [2014] NSWCCA 248; R v GVV (2008) 20 VR 395).

48. The fact that the accused went to see a solicitor after a pretext conversation cannot be used as a piece of incriminating conduct, as that would involve impermissible speculation (Meyer v R [2018] VSCA 140, [211]–[212]).

49. In determining the status of statements made during pretext calls, the principles of silence in response to equal parties and inferring guilt from demeanour (discussed below) will often be relevant.

Silence as incriminating conduct

50. When considering whether the accused's silence in response to questioning can be used as an implied admission, a distinction is drawn between silence in response to people in authority and silence in response to equal parties.

51. In addition to the principles discussed below, there may be cases where, in the ordinary course of human affairs, it would be reasonable to expect that a person would inform others about an exceptional event. In such circumstances, a failure to inform others may be treated as an incriminating conduct, even if the person is not asked about the event. For example, in Xypolitos v R (2014) 44 VR 423 the accused killed his stepson, destroyed the body and failed to inform his partner or the police. This was treated as incriminating conduct in relation to whether he killed his stepson in self-defence.

Silence in response to people in authority

52. The jury may not use the accused's silence in response to a person in authority as an implied admission (Evidence Act 2008 s 89; R v Cuenco (2007) 16 VR 118; R v Barrett (2007) 16 VR 240; R v Russo (2004) 11 VR 1; R v Bruce [1998] VR 579; Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95).

53. It is therefore not open to a jury to infer that the accused had implicitly admitted his/her guilt from the fact that s/he selectively exercised his/her right to answer questions (R v Barrett (2007) 16 VR 240; R v Russo (2004) 11 VR 1).

54. However, where the accused gives a detailed account of events to the police, the jury may be able to infer from the conscious omission of certain details that the accused had implicitly admitted his/her guilt (R v Cuenco (2007) 16 VR 118; R v Russo (2004) 11 VR 1; De Marco 26/6/1997 CA Vic; Johnstone v R (2011) 31 VR 320).[114]

55. Whether omissions of this nature can be used as incriminating conduct will depend on the other evidence in the case (R v Cuenco (2007) 16 VR 118; R v De Marco 26/6/1997 CA Vic CA; Johnstone v R (2011) 31 VR 320).

56. If evidence of an implied admission comes from a record of interview in which the accused has selectively answered questions, the judge should clearly direct the jury that while they may have regard to the answers given by the accused which have been identified as supporting the inference, they may not draw an inference from his or her "no comment" responses (see, e.g. R v Barrett (2007) 16 VR 240).

57. See 4.15 Silence in Response to People in Authority for further information.

Silence in response to equal parties

58. There may be circumstances in which the jury can infer from the accused's silence in response to a statement made by an equal party that s/he had implicitly admitted his/her guilt (Woon v R (1964) 109 CLR 529; R v Thomas [1970] VR 674; R v Salahattin [1983] VR 521; R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501).

[114] As long as this inference is drawn from the accused's conscious omission of details from his or her account, rather than his or her failure to answer a question or respond to a representation, it appears not to breach Evidence Act 2008 s 89.

59. The focus here is upon whether the accused's silence, although not amounting to an admission by him or her of the specific facts stated in his or her presence, nevertheless demonstrated his or her guilt in some way (R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501).

60. To infer that by remaining silent, the accused had implicitly admitted his/her guilt, the jury must find that:

    - the circumstances were such that, in ordinary experience, the accused would have been expected to respond to the statement made in his or her presence; and
    - the only reasonable explanation for the accused's silence is that the accused knew that he or she had committed the wrongful conduct which constituted the offence charged, and feared that a response would implicate him/her (R v Salahattin [1983] VR 521; R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501).

61. See 4.16 Silence in Response to Equal Parties for further information concerning the requirement that the statement called for a response, as well as a discussion of possible reasons for a person remaining silent in response to a statement made by an equal party.

Inferring Guilt from Demeanour

62. Although evidence of the accused's demeanour or reactions to a certain event is theoretically capable of constituting an implied admission, it will be rare for a judge to leave such evidence before the jury on this basis. This type of evidence is very imprecise and unreliable, and subject to misinterpretation. It will also generally be equivocal and incapable of supporting an inference that the accused had implicitly admitted their guilt (R v Favata [2006] VSCA 44; R v Barrett (2007) 16 VR 240).

63. If the accused's demeanour is relied upon as evidence of an implied admission, additional directions about the dangers of drawing such an inference from demeanour may be necessary, including warning the jury:

    - to be cautious about placing undue weight on the demeanour of the accused as an indicator that s/he believed him or herself to be guilty of any offence;
    - to have regard to the possibility that, when interviewed, other factors (such as drugs or tiredness) may have affected the accused's demeanour;
    - not to speculate about what would be the "normal" reactions of a person subjected to the pressures of such an interview, whether the allegations be true or false; and
    - that a conclusion based on a person's demeanour in such circumstances might be very unfair, and could amount to a reversal of the onus of proof (R v Barrett (2007) 16 VR 240).

Need for warnings

64. There are three different types of directions that may be given in relation to post-offence conduct:

    i) a section 21 direction, telling the jury the conditions that must be satisfied before post-offence conduct can be treated as an implied admission;

    ii) a section 22 direction, warning the jury about the dangers of using evidence as incriminating conduct;

    iii) a section 23 direction, warning the jury to avoid improper use of post-offence conduct evidence which cannot be used as an implied admission (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 21–23).

When to give a section 21 direction and content of the direction

65. A section 21 direction must be given if the prosecution relies on evidence as "incriminating conduct" (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 21).

66. This direction is not subject to a request process. The judge must give the direction in any case where the prosecution relies on evidence as incriminating conduct (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 21).

67. As described above, the prosecution may only rely on evidence as "incriminating conduct" if it has given notice at least 28 days before the trial and the judge ruled that the evidence is reasonably capable of being used as "incriminating conduct" (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 20).

68. The prosecution must precisely identify the alleged lie(s) or conduct in the notice, and that the prosecution arguments conform to the bounds set out in the notice (Maeda v DPP (Cth) [2015] VSCA 367, [78]).

69. Where there is a gap or deficiency in the notice, the prosecution may seek leave to extend time for filing a notice under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 8, and seek to file over a new incriminating conduct notice under section 19.

70. If the evidence is not capable of being used as an implied admission, but there is a real risk that the jury might treat the evidence in that way, defence counsel may seek a section 23 warning (see below).

If the prosecution does not seek to use evidence as 'incriminating conduct'

71. Section 21 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 is only engaged when the prosecution explicitly or expressly relies on the evidence as an implied admission. There is no scope for a judge to find that the prosecution has relied on evidence as incriminating conduct implicitly, despite the absence of a Notice (Lowe v R (2015) 48 VR 351).

72. The judge must determine, at the time it is necessary to give directions, whether the prosecution has relied on evidence as incriminating conduct giving rise to implied admissions (Lowe v R (2015) 48 VR 351, [144]).

73. In making this assessment, the court must consider how the case has been run as a whole. Oversight by prosecuting counsel, leading to the prosecution not mentioning incriminating conduct in the closing address, does not prevent the judge from giving an incriminating conduct direction which has been identified and discussed with the parties (see Mercer v The Queen [2021] VSCA 132, [42]–[44]).

74. If the prosecution does not contend that post-offence conduct is evidence of an implied admission, a section 21 direction must not be given (Lowe v R (2015) 48 VR 351, [142]).

75. In determining whether the prosecution has relied on evidence as 'incriminating conduct' it is not important whether the term "consciousness of guilt" or "incriminating conduct" has been used by counsel in the trial. What is important is whether the process of reasoning towards guilt which the jury has been invited to adopt involves the use of post-offence lies or conduct as implied admissions (see R v Lees [2006] VSCA 115; Rossi v R [2012] VSCA 228; Lowe v R (2015) 48 VR 351; Pompei v The King [2023] VSCA 71, [40]–[42]).

76. At common law, in some cases the judge was required to direct the jury on the use of evidence as an implied admission even if the prosecution did not rely on it for this purpose (R v Russo (2004) 11 VR 1). The Jury Directions Act 2015 has abolished this obligation (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 24). There is no residual discretion to give a section 21 direction where the evidence has not been led as incriminating conduct.

77. If the judge is concerned about the risk of the jury using evidence as evidence of incriminating conduct even though the prosecution has not relied on the evidence for that purpose, a section 23 direction may be necessary (see R v Cuenco (2007) 16 VR 118; Zoneff v R (2000) 200 CLR 234; Dhanhoa v R (2003) 217 CLR 1).

78. In some cases, the judge may need to intervene where the prosecution invites the jury to use evidence in a way that amounts to treating the evidence as incriminating conduct, even though it has not obtained leave to rely on evidence for that purpose (see R v Lees [2006] VSCA 115; R v Chang (2003) 7 VR 236). A judge may also need to consider giving a section 23 direction to neutralise the prosecution's argument or otherwise discharge the jury.

Content of a section 21 direction

79. There are two limbs to a section 21 direction. Under the first limb, the judge must tell the jury that they can use the evidence to find that the accused believed that he or she:

    (a) committed the offence charged;

    (b) committed an element of the offence charged; or

    (c) negated a defence to the offence charged;

    only if they find that:

    i) the conduct occurred; and

    ii) the only reasonable explanation of the conduct is that the accused held that belief (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 21(1)(a)).

80. When deciding whether the conduct occurred and whether the only reasonable explanation is that the accused believed that s/he committed the offence charged or part of the offence charged, the jury must consider all of the evidence in the case (R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26).

81. The second limb of the direction warns the jury that even if they find that the accused believed that he or she committed the offence charged, the jury must still decide on the whole of the evidence whether the prosecution has proved the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 21).

82. The second limb of the direction recognises that the accused may hold a mistaken belief in his or her own guilt, and that the role of the jury is to determine the accused's guilt, and not merely the accused's belief in his or her guilt.

83. It is not necessary to use any particular form of words when giving the two limbs of the section 21 direction (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 6).

84. However, in Maeda v DPP (Cth), the Court of Appeal noted the need for care when departing from the statutory language, due to the risk that any factual questions posed may not satisfy the requirements of section 21 (Maeda v DPP (Cth) [2015] VSCA 367, [85]).

85. The importance of the directions means it is generally unwise to deliver incriminating conduct directions extemporaneously. Judges should, instead, prepare written directions to ensure they comply with the requirements of the Jury Directions Act and the law generally (Healy v The King [2024] VSCA 81, [46]).

86. For example, in Saddik v The Queen, the judge had directed the jury, for the purpose of s 21(1)(a)(ii) that they must be satisfied that the only reasonable explanation for the conduct was that the accused thought it would tend to show that nothing improper had happened. The Court of Appeal held that this did not comply with s 21(1)(a)(ii). The judge should have told the jury to decide whether the accused believed he had indecently assaulted the complainant and performed the conduct to create an innocent explanation for his offending acts (Saddik v The Queen [2018] VSCA 249, [154]).

87. In addition, it is not appropriate for the judge to direct the jury that they can use the evidence in proof that the accused admitted guilt of some other offence. The direction must relate the evidence to an offence charged, the particular acts alleged and the way the prosecution seeks to use the evidence (Di Giorgio v R [2016] VSCA 335, [38], [40], [56]).

88. Section 21 removes the common law obligation to refer to each act or omission as part of the direction (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 21; c.f. Edwards v R (1993) 178 CLR 193; R v McCullagh (No 2) [2005] VSCA 109; R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26). However, it remains necessary for the prosecution to precisely identify the alleged lie(s) or conduct in the notice, and that the prosecution arguments conform to the bounds set out in the notice (Maeda v DPP (Cth) [2015] VSCA 367, [78]).

89. If the post-offence conduct includes both lies and other post-offence behaviour, the judge should make the jury aware that the direction applies to both (see R v Nguyen (2001) 118 A Crim R 479).

90. If the post-offence conduct could be used as an implied admission in relation to a number of different counts, the judge should relate each item of conduct to the appropriate charge or charges, and the jury should be told to examine the evidence in support of each charge separately (R v Kalajdic [2005] VSCA 160; R v Finnan [2005] VSCA 151; R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26).

91. If a lie is to be used as corroboration, confirmation or support of another witness's evidence, the jury must also be told that the accused's statement must clearly be shown to be a lie by evidence other than that of the witness who is to be corroborated – i.e. by admission or by evidence from an independent witness (Edwards v R (1993) 178 CLR 193).

92. Where the defence case involves a simple denial of all the conduct alleged, it may not be necessary to explain to the jury how the incriminating conduct evidence relates to any particular element or a particular charge (Davis v R [2016] VSCA 272, [119]).

Conduct motivated by consciousness of other offences

93. In some cases, an issue may arise as to whether the accused committed the post-offence conduct due to a fear of being implicated in the offence for which the prosecution wishes to use the evidence of that conduct, or because s/he feared being implicated in a lesser included offence, a different offence on a multiple count presentment, or another offence disclosed by the evidence ("other offences").

94. Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, the definition of "incriminating conduct" refers to conduct that amounts to an implied admission of an "offence charged", an element of an "offence charged" or which negates a defence to an "offence charged". The term "offence charged" is defined as including alternative offences (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 18).

95. The judge must determine whether it is open for the jury to use an item of post-offence conduct to prove an element of a principal offence or any available alternative offence (see also R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26).

96. At common law, evidence which was equally consistent with two or more available offences, or was otherwise "intractably neutral", could not be used as post-offence conduct. This requirement likely continues to apply under the Jury Directions Act 2015 (see R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26; R v Jakimov [2007] VSCA 9; R v Cuenco (2007) 16 VR 118; R v Dickinson [2007] VSCA 111; Pollard v R (2011) 31 VR 416; Dwyer v The King [2023] VSCA 85, [96]).

97. Such cases will, however, be rare. In most cases, although the post-offence conduct may not be enough in itself to sustain an inference that the accused has impliedly admitted guilt of a particular offence rather than some other offence, when considered in the context of the evidence as a whole (e.g. evidence of the accused's words and conduct before and during the offence, and other forensic evidence), it will be open to the jury to infer that the accused's conduct was related to a particular offence (R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26; R v Jakimov [2007] VSCA 9; Johnstone v R (2011) 31 VR 320; Brooks v R (2012) 36 VR 84).

98. In determining whether the post-offence conduct is equally consistent with two or more possible offences, or otherwise intractably neutral, the judge must consider the conduct in the context of the evidence as a whole (R v Jakimov [2007] VSCA 9; R v Cuenco (2007) 16 VR 118; R v Dickinson [2007] VSCA 111; Pollard v R (2011) 31 VR 416).

99. Despite this, it is permissible to treat particular items of post-offence conduct separately and consider whether those items are equally consistent with a lesser offence (see DPP v Pandilovski (Ruling No 1) [2022] VSC 552, [3]–[4]).

100. One factor the court will consider to decide if the evidence is equally consistent with two or more offences is whether the conduct is 'out of proportion' for the lesser offence (see DPP v Ristevski (Ruling No 1) [2019] VSC 165, [16]; DPP v Pandilovski (Ruling No 1) [2022] VSC 552, [12], [13], [29]).

101. It will often be helpful to explain to the jury that reference to "the offence charged" is a convenient way of saying that the accused made an implied admission of the alleged wrongful conduct which constituted the offence charged, rather than an admission of a specific crime as it is known to the law (R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26).

Other explanations for the post-offence conduct

102. Unlike at common law, a judge is not required to identify other reasons for having committed the conduct (compare Edwards v R (1993) 178 CLR 193; R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26).

103. The judge is also not required to identify possible motivations, other than a consciousness of guilt, for committing the post-offence conduct (compare R v Nguyen [2005] VSCA 120).

104. Other explanations may form part of a section 22 direction (see below).

Identifying the post-offence conduct

105. In charging the jury, the judge should take each offence left to the jury in turn, and by reference to that offence identify:

- the evidence of conduct upon which the prosecution relies;
- the issues which the post-offence conduct is relevant to prove. That is, whether the post-offence conduct proves part of the actus reus or the mens rea or disproves a possible defence or justification; and
- the evidence which shows that the conduct is incriminating conduct (R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26. See also R v Jakimov [2007] VSCA 9; R v Nguyen [2005] VSCA 120; R v McCullagh (No 2) [2005] VSCA 109; Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316; Johnstone v R (2011) 31 VR 320).

106. When directing the jury about incriminating conduct, it is not necessary to refer to each act or omission (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 21(2). Instead, the conduct may be described in general terms (c.f. R v Dang [2004] VSCA 38; R v Nguyen [2005] VSCA 120; Johnstone v R (2011) 31 VR 320. But see Ellis v R (2010) 30 VR 428).

107. A judge should not invite the jury to look for other post-offence conduct that could possibly be used as an implied admission (R v TY (2006) 12 VR 557; R v Cuenco (2007) 16 VR 118).

108. The judge must clearly identify for the jury which evidence of post-offence conduct can be used as an implied admission, and which can only be used in relation to the accused's credibility (R v Ray (2003) 57 NSWLR 616).

109. If there are multiple charges, the trial judge must relate the relevant lies or other acts to the appropriate count or counts (R v Kalajdic [2005] VSCA 160; R v Redmond [2006] VSCA 75; R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26).

110. In such cases, the jury must be directed to consider the post-offence conduct in relation to each charge separately (R v Woolley (1989) 42 A Crim R 418 (Vic FC); R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26).

When to give a section 22 direction and content of the direction

111. Where the judge gives or proposes to give a section 21 direction, the defence may seek a direction under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 22 (a 'section 22 direction').

112. A section 22 direction tells the jury:

- that there are many reasons why a person might behave in a way that makes him or her look guilty;

- that the accused might have engaged in incriminating conduct even though he or she is not guilty of the offence charged;
- even if the jury thinks that the conduct makes the accused look guilty, that does not necessarily mean that the accused is guilty (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 22)

113. This direction must be given if sought by the accused (unless there are good reasons for not giving the direction) or if there are substantial and compelling reasons to give the direction in the absence of a request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14, 16).

114. To determine whether there are substantial and compelling reasons to give a direction in the absence of a request, the judge should consider the significance of the post-offence conduct evidence and the degree of risk posed by not giving a section 22 direction. See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for more information on when directions are necessary.

115. At common law, a trial judge was required to identify possible reasons why a person might behave in a way that makes the person look guilty, and should include any explanations raised by defence counsel in the list of possible alternatives (R v Kalajdic [2005] VSCA 160; R v Spero (2006) 13 VR 225; R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26). It would be prudent to continue providing such information when giving a section 22 direction.

116. If the explanations advanced by the defence are the most cogent possible alternatives, there is no need to advance additional explanations (R v Finnan [2005] VSCA 151).

117. In cases where it is possible that the accused committed the post-offence conduct to distance him or herself from a different offence than that which the jury is considering (the "offence charged"),[115] the jury should be alerted to this possibility. They should be told that before they can use the post-offence conduct as evidence of guilt of the offence charged, they must be satisfied, having regard to all the evidence, that the desire not to be implicated in a different offence does not provide a possible reasonable explanation for the conduct. The judge must make it clear to the jury that the implied admission must be of the offence charged, rather than some other wrongdoing or unlawful behaviour (R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26; R v Barrett (2007) 16 VR 240; R v Smart [2010] VSCA 33; Johnstone v R (2011) 31 VR 320. But see Al-Assadi v R [2011] VSCA 111; Brooks v R (2012) 36 VR 84).

118. It is not necessary for the judge to refer to lesser included offences which have not been left to the jury as providing a possible alternative explanation. The directions to be given must depend on the issues in the case, and a lesser included offence is not in issue unless it is left to the jury (R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26. See also R v Martin [2006] VSCA 299).

When to give a section 23 direction and content of the direction

119. If the prosecution does not use evidence of post-offence conduct as an implied admission, defence counsel can seek a direction under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 23 (a 'section 23 direction').

120. This direction tells the jury that:

- there are all sorts of reasons why a person might behave in a way that looks like he or she is guilty; and
- even if they think that accused engaged in the conduct, they must not conclude from that evidence that the accused is guilty of the offence charged (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 23).

121. This direction replaces the common law Zoneff warning and is designed to address the risk of the jury misusing evidence as incriminating conduct.

[115] I.e. Trials involving a one count indictment with lesser included offences; trials involving multiple count indictment; or cases where the evidence adduced to prove a particular charge discloses the possible commission of other offences.

122. A section 23 direction is only necessary if sought by the accused, or if the judge considers there are substantial and compelling reasons to give the direction in the absence of a request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14, 16).

123. The judge should ask defence counsel whether he or she seeks a section 23 direction where the prosecution leads evidence of post-offence conduct and does not seek to use that evidence as incriminating conduct.

124. To determine whether there are substantial and compelling reasons to give a direction in the absence of a request, the judge should consider the significance of the post-offence conduct evidence and the degree of risk posed by not giving a section 23 direction. See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for more information on when directions are necessary.

125. At common law, the need for a direction about the misuse of evidence as incriminating conduct depended on factors such as the nature of the evidence which is said to require the direction, the purpose for which it is tendered, the use the prosecution makes of it, the existence of rational explanations for the conduct other than a consciousness of guilt, and the nature of counsel's addresses on the issue (see, e.g. R v Dupas [2001] VSCA 109; R v GJ [2008] VSCA 222; AE v R [2011] VSCA 168). Similar factors will inform the decision of whether there is a need for a section 23 direction (see Lowe v R (2015) 48 VR 351).

126. Even if the content of a particular lie is not highly probative, a section 23 direction may be required if there is little other evidence that supports the prosecution case. In such circumstances the mere fact that the accused told a lie may be treated as significant by the jury (AE v R [2011] VSCA 168).

127. It may be prudent to give a section 23 direction even if there is only a small risk that the jury will use the accused's lies or conduct as an implied admission, as this will remove all danger of the jury engaging in an impermissible reasoning process (see, e.g. R v Brdarovksi [2006] VSCA 231). However, in Dhanhoa v R (2003) 217 CLR 1, Gleeson CJ and Hayne J warned against giving this kind of direction too readily. This warning should be taken into consideration when deciding whether or not to give such a direction (R v Mitchell [2006] VSCA 289. See also Lowe v R (2015) 48 VR 351).

128. A section 23 direction is not required simply because there is a risk that a jury may treat the accused as a liar and thereby conclude that s/he is guilty. This will happen in most cases – juries will assess the evidence, and conclude that the accused is a liar at the same time as determining that s/he is guilty beyond reasonable doubt. A section 23 direction is only required if the jury is likely first to resolve that the accused is a liar, and then to conclude that, because s/he is a liar, s/he has committed the offence (R v Erdei [1998] 2 VR 606 (CA)).

129. If it is alleged that the accused told a number of lies, it may be inadvisable to give a section 23 direction in relation to only one of those lies. Such a direction would likely invite the jury to improperly consider what use should be made of the accused's other lies. Depending on the circumstances, the judge should either give a section 23 direction in relation to lies in general, or not give such a direction at all (see, e.g. R v Mitchell [2006] VSCA 289).

Post-offence lies as corroboration

130. A lie can provide corroboration of the evidence of another witness if it is capable of supporting an inference that the evidence of the witness is probably correct. This can occur only if the jury can infer that the telling of the lie was an implied admission (R v Heyde (1990) 20 NSWLR 234 (CCA)).

131. Great care must be taken in using lies as corroboration – it is fraught with the risk of a miscarriage of justice (R v Sutton (1986) 5 NSWLR 697; R v Heyde (1990) 20 NSWLR 234 (CCA); R v De Lam (1999) 108 A Crim R 440).

132. If the prosecution seeks to rely on a lie to provide corroboration, the usual criteria for using a lie as an implied admission (see above) must be established. The trial judge must also determine whether the lie is capable of providing corroboration. If so, the question of whether it does corroborate the evidence of a witness is to be left to the jury (R v Heyde (1990) 20 NSWLR 234 (CCA)).

133. In determining whether a lie is capable of providing corroboration, the trial judge must (R v Heyde (1990) 20 NSWLR 234 (CCA); Attorney-General's Reference (No 1 of 1983) [1983] 2 VR 410):

    i) decide whether it could be held to be a deliberate lie; and

    ii) decide whether there is evidence of conduct by the accused from which an inference can be drawn, which supports the evidence of the witness whom it is sought to corroborate in a material particular. A deliberate lie will be capable of doing this if it is rationally open to the jury to draw an inference that it was told because the accused perceived that the truth was inconsistent with his or her innocence.

134. Lies cannot be treated as corroborative of the evidence of a witness if it is necessary to rely on the evidence of that witness to establish the falsity of what the accused has said. In such circumstances the witness would be corroborating him or herself (Edwards v R (1993) 178 CLR 193; Green v R (1999) 161 ALR 648; R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26).

135. There are three ways in which a lie can be sufficiently proven so that it is capable of amounting to corroboration (R v Heyde (1990) 20 NSWLR 234 (CCA); R v Russo (2004) 11 VR 1):

    i) if conflicting evidence is given by a witness other than the one whose evidence is to be corroborated;

    ii) if conflicting evidence is given by the accused (either directly, or due to internal inconsistencies in his or her evidence); or

    iii) if the lie is seen to be inherently improbable.

136. It will only be in rare cases that a lie is capable of affording corroboration. In many cases it will not be so capable, due to factors such as it not being possible to infer that a deliberate lie was told; the lie not relating to a material issue; or the inference not being open that the lie was an implied admission (R v Heyde (1990) 20 NSWLR 234 (CCA)).

137. When discussing the issue of corroboration with the jury, use of the language of "confirmation" or "support" rather than "corroboration" may be appropriate, depending on the use to which the evidence is being put (R v Miletic [1997] 1 VR 593; R v Benfield [1997] 2 VR 491 (CA)).

Standard of proof

138. Jury Directions Act 2015 s 61 specifies that unless there is an enactment to the contrary, the only matters that need to be proved beyond reasonable doubt are the elements of the offence and the absence of any relevant defences. The common law obligation to direct the jury not to use incriminating conduct evidence unless satisfied that the evidence is "incriminating conduct" beyond reasonable doubt has been abolished (see also Jury Directions Act 2015 s 62).

139. In rare cases, where evidence of post-offence conduct is the only evidence of guilt, the judge may refer to the evidence of incriminating conduct and direct the jury that it must be satisfied that the evidence proves the elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt (see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 61 Examples).

4.6.1 Charge: Lies as Incriminating Conduct (s 21 Direction)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge should only be given if:

i) The judge has given leave for the prosecution to rely on evidence as incriminating conduct;

ii) The evidence of incriminating conduct consists of lies; and

iii) The prosecution relies on the evidence as incriminating conduct.

If the evidence of incriminating conduct consists of lies and other conduct, this charge must be modified.

If defence counsel requests a warning about the dangers of relying on evidence of incriminating conduct, also give 4.6.3 Charge: Additional direction on incriminating conduct (Section 22 direction).

Introduction

In this trial, the prosecution alleged that NOA told certain lies after the crime was committed. I now need to give you some directions about the way in which you can use evidence of lies. By lies, I mean that the accused told deliberate untruths.

Lies going to credibility

The law says that you may use the accused's lies to help you to assess his/her credibility.[116] If you find that the accused lied about something [when giving evidence/when speaking to police], you can use that fact to help you to decide whether or not you believe the other things that the accused said. That is not to say that just because you find that an accused lied about one matter, you must also find that s/he has been lying about everything else. But you can use the fact that s/he lied to help you determine the truthfulness of the other things that s/he said. It is one factor to take into account.

You can use any of NOA's alleged lies in this way. For example, if you find that NOA was lying when [insert example from evidence], you may take this into account when assessing the rest of his/her evidence.

[Identify relevant evidence and refer to relevant prosecution and defence arguments.]

It is for you to decide what significance to give these suggested lies. But I give you this warning: do not reason that just because a person is shown to have told a lie about something, s/he must be guilty.

Lies as an implied admission of guilt

The second way in which you may be able to use a lie in this case is as evidence that NOA believed that [describe relevant admission, for example 's/he committed the offence charged' or 'he shot the deceased', or 'he shot the deceased without acting in self-defence'].

You may only use evidence that NOA lied in this way if you find that he did tell a deliberate untruth and the only reasonable explanation for doing so is that s/he believed that [describe relevant admission].

However, I must warn you that even if you find that the accused believed that s/he committed the offence charged, you must consider all the evidence when deciding whether the prosecution has proved the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt.

[Insert section 22 direction here if required. See 4.6.3 Charge: Additional direction on incriminating conduct (Section 22 direction).]

[116] If the accused's credit is not in issue, this charge will need to be modified.

[Identify relevant evidence and refer to relevant prosecution and defence arguments. As part of this, the judge should, in relation to each offence:

- Identify the post offence conduct the prosecution relies upon in relation to that offence;
- Identify whether the post offence conduct is relevant to prove the whole charge, one or more elements, or the absence of any defences;
- Identify the matters which are said to show that the post offence conduct can be used as an implied admission of guilt.]

Incriminating conduct and unreliable evidence

4.6.2 Charge: Other Conduct as Incriminating Conduct (s 21 Direction)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge should only be given if:

i) The judge has given leave for the prosecution to rely on evidence as incriminating conduct;

ii) The evidence of incriminating conduct consists of acts only and not lies; and

iii) The prosecution relies on the evidence as incriminating conduct.

If the evidence of incriminating conduct also includes lies, this direction should be adapted and added to 4.6.1 Charge: Lies as Incriminating Conduct (Section 21 direction).

If defence counsel requests a warning about the dangers of relying on evidence of incriminating conduct, also give 4.6.3 Charge: Additional direction on incriminating conduct (Section 22 direction).

Introduction

In this trial, the prosecution argued that you can use the evidence that NOA [identify other conduct relied on as incriminating conduct] as evidence that s/he believed that [describe relevant admission, for example "s/he committed the offence charged" or "s/he shot the deceased", or "s/he shot the deceased without acting in self-defence".]

You may only use this evidence in this way if you find that this conduct occurred and the only reasonable explanation of this conduct is that the accused believed that [describe relevant belief, for example "s/he committed the offence and needed to dispose of evidence"].

However, I must warn you that even if you find that the accused believed that s/he committed the offence charged, you must consider all the evidence when deciding whether the prosecution has proved the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt.

[Insert section 22 direction here if required. See 4.6.3 Charge: Additional direction on incriminating conduct (Section 22 direction).]

[Identify relevant evidence and refer to relevant prosecution and defence arguments. As part of this, the judge should, in relation to each offence:

- Identify the post offence conduct the prosecution relies upon in relation to that offence;
- Identify whether the post offence conduct is relevant to prove the whole charge, one or more elements, or the absence of any defences;
- Identify the matters which are said to show that the post offence conduct can be used as an implied admission of guilt.]

Incriminating conduct and unreliable evidence

4.6.3 Charge: Additional Direction on Incriminating Conduct (s 22 Direction)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge may be given where the judge gives a direction on the use of evidence as incriminating conduct and the accused seeks an additional direction warning about the dangers of relying on that evidence.

The direction should be given immediately after the direction warning the jury that even if it concludes that the accused thought that he committed the offence charged, the jury must still decide on the whole of the evidence whether the prosecution has proved the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt.

Warning

I must also warn you that there are all sorts of reasons why a person might behave in a way that makes him/her look guilty. This means that NOA may have [describe relevant conduct] even though s/he is not guilty of [identify relevant offence charged].

For example, NOA may have [describe relevant conduct] because:

[Insert possible motivations for the incriminating conduct such as panic, shame, protecting another person or fear of the police. Care must be taken in selecting which motivations to include, so as not to advance too few alternatives, or spurious alternatives which are easily dismissed. Attempts should be made to provide plausible alternative explanations relevant to the circumstances. Any explanations raised by defence counsel should be included in the list].

Even if you think that this conduct makes NOA look guilty, that does not necessarily mean that s/he is guilty.

4.6.4 Charge: Avoiding Risk of Improper Use of Conduct Evidence (s 23 Direction)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge should only be given if:

i) Evidence of conduct is led which the prosecution does not rely on as evidence of incriminating conduct;

ii) Defence counsel request a direction to avoid the risk of the jury misusing the evidence as incriminating conduct.

Warning

In this trial, the prosecution alleged that NOA [describe relevant conduct, e.g. told a number of lies].

[Identify relevant conduct evidence.]

You might think that this makes it look like NOA committed the offence[s] charged. But I must direct you, as a matter of law that there are all sorts of reasons why a person might behave in a way that makes it look like s/he has committed an offence. Even if you think that NOA [describe relevant conduct], you must not use that to conclude that s/he is guilty of [any of] the offence[s] charged.

[If the conduct evidence consists of lies, add the following shaded section.]

What you may do, if you find that NOA deliberately told one of the suggested lies that I have just mentioned, is to use that to help you assess [his/her] credibility. If you find that the accused deliberately lied about something, you can use that fact in deciding whether or not you believe the other things that s/he said [in evidence/in his/her account to police]. That is not to say that just because you find that an accused lied about one matter, you must also find that they have been lying about everything else. But you can use the fact that they lied to help you determine the truthfulness of the other things that they said. It is one factor to take into account. The weight you give to that factor will depend on how significant you find the lie to be.

It is up to you to decide whether NOA deliberately lied. There is a difference between rejecting a person's statements and finding that they deliberately lied. Sometimes people make mistakes, or get confused, or genuinely cannot remember a fact. While what they say may be wrong, it is not a lie. That is, you must decide whether any of [his/her] statements were untrue, and whether [he/she] knew they were untrue at the time they were made.

But you must not reason that because NOA told these lies, s/he is guilty. Evidence that s/he told these lies is not evidence of guilt. These alleged lies are only relevant, if at all, in assessing NOA's credibility.

4.7 Corroboration (General Principles)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. With the exception of perjury offences, any previously persisting requirement that evidence be corroborated is now abolished (Evidence Act 2008 s 164).
2. The rules of law or practice that previously required directions concerning the absence of corroboration, including directions about the dangers of acting on uncorroborated evidence, have also been abolished (Evidence Act 2008 s 164(3)).
3. In addition, with the exception of perjury and similar offences, a judge must not
   (a) Warn the jury that it is dangerous to act on uncorroborated evidence or give a warning to the same or similar effect; or
   (b) Direct the jury regarding the absence of corroboration (Evidence Act 2008 s 164(4)).
4. Evidence Act 2008 s 164(4), which prohibits corroboration directions, was introduced by the Jury Directions Act 2015 and applies to all trials which commenced on or after 29 June 2015.
5. Despite the prohibition on corroboration directions, where the jury has been warned about a witness's potential unreliability, and there is evidence that may tend to confirm or support that witness's evidence, it will often be appropriate to direct the jury to look for supportive evidence (R v Milton [2004] NSWCCA 195; R v Connors [2000] NSWCCA 470, [133]). Such directions are included where appropriate in this Charge Book.

6. For information on the legal requirements of corroboration, which remain relevant to a charge of perjury, see Perjury.

4.8 Delayed Complaint

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Delayed Complaint

1. The timeliness or otherwise of making a complaint may be relevant in three different ways:

    i) In some circumstances evidence of an early complaint may be used both as evidence of the offence, and to bolster the complainant's credibility;

    ii) If the complainant failed to make a complaint in a timely fashion ("a delayed complaint"), this may be used to detract from his or her credibility;

    iii) If the delay in complaint (or prosecution) has had adverse consequences for the trial that the jury may not appreciate, the jury may need to be warned about these consequences.

Recent Complaint

2. Directions in respect of "recent complaint" are designed to explain the permissible uses of evidence and to warn the jury about types of evidence that may be unreliable. For more information see 4.14 Previous Representations (Hearsay, Recent Complaint and Prior Statements).

Delayed Complaint Relevant to Credit

3. At common law, the duty to direct a jury in respect of the potential impact of delayed complaint on the complainant's credit derived both from statute (Crimes Act 1958 s 61) and from the need to give a balanced charge where delay in making complaint is raised before the jury (Kilby v R (1973) 129 CLR 460; Crofts v R (1996) 186 CLR 427).

4. The Jury Directions Act 2015 has now codified the directions on the relevance of delay to credit in sexual offence cases, and any rule of the common law which required a judge to direct the jury that:

    (a) a complainant's delay in making a complaint or lack of complaint may cast doubt on the reliability of the complainant's evidence; and

    (b) the jury should take this into account when evaluating the credibility of the allegations made by the complainant– is abolished (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54).

5. For more information see Effect of Delayed Complaint on Credit.

Other Consequences of Delay

6. Two other consequences of delay may be the production of forensic disadvantage to the accused, and of honest but unreliable recollections of the complainant. These are commonly seen only as consequences of long delay, but the length of delay may not be determinative.

7. The law on these topics is modified by the Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16 and 48–54.

Delay Risking Miscarriage of Justice

8. For trials commenced prior to 1 December 2006, the judge's duty was primarily determined by the common law, as articulated in Longman v R (1989) 168 CLR 79 and the authorities that have applied it. In those cases, the question was whether the consequences of delay had created a perceptible risk of miscarriage of justice. The source of that risk was commonly considered to be the forensic disadvantage to the accused, and the potential for the complainant's recollection to be honest but erroneous.

Forensic Disadvantage

9. The need for and the content of a direction on forensic disadvantage is governed by Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 38–40. A judge must give the jury a forensic disadvantage direction if one is requested, unless there are good reasons for not giving such a direction. However, a judge need not give a direction if it has not been requested, unless there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving the direction in the absence of a request (see Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14, 16; c.f. Greensill v R (2012) 37 VR 257).

Honest But Erroneous Memory

10. The provisions of the Jury Directions Act 2015 are not directly concerned with directions about honest but erroneous memory following delay.

11. It is suggested that these issues should now be considered by reference to s 32 of the Jury Directions Act 2015. For more information see 4.8.3 Delay Risking Honest But Erroneous Memory.

Combination of Directions

12. If there is a dispute as to how soon after the alleged events the complaint was made, the judge may need to give the statutory directions on delayed complaint and also give directions on recent complaint at the end of the trial (see R v Munday (2003) 7 VR 423 and 4.14.4 Charge: Complaint Evidence).

13. Where multiple directions about the different consequences of delayed complaint are necessary in the circumstances of a case, it is permissible to combine them in a single direction (R v BDX (2009) 24 VR 288).

4.8.1 Delay Causing Forensic Disadvantage

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Scope

1. Two separate risks may arise where there is a delay in making a complaint or bringing a matter to trial:

   i) The accused may suffer a significant forensic disadvantage; or

   ii) The complainant's recollection of what happened may be honest but erroneous (Longman v R (1989) 168 CLR 79).

2. This topic only addresses the risk of forensic disadvantage. See 4.8.3 Delay Risking Honest But Erroneous Memory for information concerning the risk of honest but erroneous memory.

History of the Forensic Disadvantage Direction

3. Prior to 1 December 2006, if a complainant failed to make a timely complaint about an alleged sexual offence, the judge needed to warn the jury about any perceptible risks of miscarriage of justice that the delay had caused, including the risk of forensic disadvantage (Longman v R (1989) 168 CLR 79).

4. In such cases, the "Longman rule" often required judges to warn the jury that it would be dangerous to convict on the complainant's evidence alone unless, after scrutinising the evidence with great care, considering the circumstances relevant to its evaluation, and paying heed to the warning, they were satisfied of its truth and accuracy (Longman v R (1989) 168 CLR 79.).

5. The application of the Longman rule to the issue of forensic disadvantage was substantially modified by the insertion of ss 61(1A)–(1F) into the Crimes Act 1958, which codified the law in this area and abrogated any previous law. These provisions applied to "proceedings" commenced on or after 1 December 2006 (Crimes Act 1958 s 607).[117] From 2010, the issue of forensic disadvantage was also addressed by s 165B of the Evidence Act 2008.

6. From 29 June 2015, the new Part 4, Division 5 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 replaced the statutory directions of the Crimes Act 1958 and Evidence Act 2008 regarding delay and forensic disadvantage. The common law requirements on judges to direct the jury about forensic disadvantage were abolished and judges were prohibited from warning juries that it is dangerous to convict on the complainant's evidence alone.

When to Give a Forensic Disadvantage Direction

7. The need for a direction on forensic disadvantage is governed by Jury Directions Act 2015, Part 4. Division 5. Defence counsel may request that a judge direct the jury on the forensic disadvantage experienced by the accused due to the consequences of delay between the alleged offence and the trial (Jury Directions Act 2015, 39(1)). If sought, a judge must give the jury the direction unless there are good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14, 39(2)). A judge must not give a direction if it has not been requested, unless there are substantial and compelling reasons for doing so (see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 16).

8. The principles which govern the Jury Directions Act provisions on forensic disadvantage were summarised in Robbins v The Queen as follows:

> (1) The origins of the relevant concern are to be found in historic sex offence cases and the decision of the High Court in Longman.
> (2) The forensic disadvantage governed by s 39 is a disadvantage occurring because of the consequences of delay between the alleged offence and the trial.
> (3) The disadvantage must be of a forensic nature; that is, a disadvantage suffered by the accused in challenging, adducing or giving evidence, or in conducting the accused's case.
> (4) The direction can only be given if the trial judge is satisfied that the accused has experienced a significant forensic disadvantage.
> (5) There are disadvantages as a consequence of delay which do not warrant a direction under s 39. These disadvantages can be adequately dealt with in counsels' addresses and do not require a judicial direction.

[117] Under the common law, the "proceeding" commences when the court is seised of the matter by the filing of a presentment. There is a new "proceeding" if a new presentment is filed over (R v Taylor (No.2) (2008) 18 VR 613; R v BDX (2009) 24 VR 288). However, under the Criminal Procedure Act 2009, there is a single criminal proceeding that commences when the charge–sheet or direct indictment is filed and committal hearings, trials, appeals and re-trials are all part of a single proceeding (see Criminal Procedure Act 2009 ss 5, 162, 164).

(6) The accused has the onus of establishing that the consequences of delay give rise to a significant forensic disadvantage.
(7) It is incumbent upon the accused to identify the particular risks of prejudice which constitute the significant forensic disadvantage.
(8) A loss of opportunity to obtain evidence of a contemporaneous medical examination which had occurred, or medical or other scientific investigations which might have been undertaken, or expert medical opinion which might have been obtained, could, in a particular case, constitute a significant forensic disadvantage (Robbins v The Queen (2017) 269 A Crim R 244, [186] (citations and references omitted).

9. While the Jury Directions Act 2015 does not require it, judges should ask defence counsel whether they seek a forensic disadvantage direction if the judge is concerned that the issue may have been overlooked.

10. At common law, the delay which gave rise to the need for a warning was not mathematically defined. Judges needed to determine whether the case was one of "long delay" which gave rise to the need for the warning (Doggett v R (2001) 208 CLR 343 (Kirby J)).

Forensic Disadvantage

11. A judge may direct the jury on forensic disadvantage only if the judge is satisfied that the accused has experienced a significant disadvantage (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 39(2)).

12. A direction is not required simply because there has been a delay between the alleged offence and the trial. The judge must find that the accused suffered a significant disadvantage in challenging, adducing or giving evidence, or conducting their case because of the consequences of that delay (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 38; Slater v The Queen [2020] VSCA 270, [106]). A hypothetical disadvantage is not sufficient.

13. Some forensic disadvantages that may result from delay include:

- Loss of chance to explore the circumstances of the alleged offending in detail;
- Loss of chance to identify the occasion of the allegations with any specificity;
- Loss of chance to make any defence other than a simple denial;
- Loss of chance of medical examination of the complainant;
- Loss of chance to establish an alibi;
- Loss of chance to call evidence contradicting the broader evidence of the complainant;
- Loss of chance to obtain documents that may have assisted the defence;
- Disadvantage in testing events that may have affected the complainant's recollection or reliability (see Longman v R (1989) 168 CLR 79; Crampton v R (2000) 206 CLR 161; R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526; Robbins v The Queen (2017) 269 A Crim R 244, [186(8)]).

14. These disadvantages may be exacerbated where the complainant's own recollections are weakened by the delay, and he or she can therefore offer few specific details to be tested before the jury (Crampton v R (2000) 206 CLR 161).

15. Whether or not the accused has suffered any forensic disadvantage will depend on the circumstances of the case. For example:

- Where specific dates are given and opportunity is admitted, there may be no basis for arguing that a chance at alibi has been lost (R v GTN (2003) 6 VR 150);
- Where medical evidence could not have been led to prove or disprove the offence (e.g. an indecent touching), the lost opportunity to gather such evidence will not be significant (Tully v R (2006) 230 CLR 234).

16. While the passage of time alone cannot be determinative of whether a direction is required, the length of the delay will be a significant factor:

    i) The greater the delay, the more likely it is that the accused will have suffered a significant forensic disadvantage (see, e.g. Doggett v R (2001) 208 CLR 343 (Kirby J); R v GTN (2003) 6 VR 150);

    ii) The shorter the delay, the more difficult it will be to show that the accused has lost the ability to adequately test the evidence of the complainant or to adequately marshal his or her defence (see, e.g. Tully v R (2006) 230 CLR 234).

17. The judge will generally not need to find that the missing evidence would have assisted the accused. However, a positive finding that the missing evidence would not have assisted the accused will generally suggest that there has been no significant forensic disadvantage.

Content of the Charge

Forensic Disadvantage

18. When a forensic disadvantage direction is to be given, the judge must inform the jury of:

    i) the nature of the disadvantage experienced by the accused; and

    ii) the need to take the disadvantage into account when considering the evidence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 39(3)(a)).

19. The judge must clearly identify the specific forensic disadvantages which have resulted from the delay. The precise nature of those disadvantages will depend on the circumstances of the case (see above).

20. Although a judge has flexibility in the way he or she directs the jury, in light of its status as a mandatory statutory direction, and its function in protecting the accused from a potential miscarriage of justice, the direction should be invested with judicial authority. It should not be described as a "comment" (R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526).

21. "Forensic disadvantage" is a legal term of art and is unlikely to be understood by the jury without further explanation. It should not be used in the directions.

22. When informing the jury about the nature of the forensic disadvantages that have been identified, care should be taken to avoid suggesting that the judge has made any findings about the facts in issue in the trial.

23. A judge must not undermine a forensic disadvantage direction by commenting that the delay may also have disadvantaged the complainant, or that delay may mean there is a lack of evidence to corroborate the complainant. Similarly, it is not appropriate as part of a forensic disadvantage direction to comment that delay in relation to sexual assault allegations is common, or is not a criticism of the complainant. A statement that a lack of specificity is a "double-edged sword" is inappropriate, as it suggests the jury should balance the accused's disadvantage against the disadvantage of the prosecution or complainant (Briggs v The King [2024] VSCA 80, [85]–[94]).

Judge Must Not Warn Jury that it is "Dangerous to Convict"

24. The judge must not say, or suggest in any way, to the jury that, as a result of the delay:

    i) it would be dangerous or unsafe to convict the accused; or

    ii) the complainant's evidence should be scrutinised with great care (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 39(3)(b)).[118]

Associated Directions

25. Where there has been a delay, judges are commonly also asked to warn the jury about the risk that the complainant's memory may be honest but erroneous.[119] Where it is appropriate to give both warnings, it will generally be convenient to combine them in the one direction.
26. Where the complainant has failed to make a timely complaint, the judge may also be required to instruct the jury about the significance of delay. See Effect of Delayed Complaint on Credit for further information.
27. Where the complainant is the sole witness asserting the commission of a crime, it may be appropriate to warn the jury about the care required before convicting on the basis of that evidence (R v Murray (1987) 11 NSWLR 12; Robinson v R (1999) 197 CLR 427). While such a direction is customary in New South Wales, in Victoria it is not regarded as obligatory (R v Aden & Toulle (2002) 162 A Crim R 1).

4.8.2 Charge: Delay Causing Forensic Disadvantage

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge may be used in all trials that were commenced on or after 29 June 2015.

This charge should only be given where:

i) The judge is satisfied that the accused has suffered a significant forensic disadvantage because of the delay between the alleged offence and trial; and either:

a) A party has requested a direction on forensic disadvantage and there are not good reasons for not giving the requested direction; or

b) A party has not requested a direction on forensic disadvantage, but there are substantial and compelling reasons to give the direction despite the absence of a request.

Introduction

As you will be aware, the offences in this trial are alleged to have occurred [indicate date(s) or date range(s)]. NOC first complained to NOW about the offending on [indicate dates].[120] This means there was a delay of [indicate delay] before NOC told anybody about [the details of] these alleged offences.

Forensic Disadvantage

I must now inform you of a [further] significant consequence of this delay. This is the impact this delay has had on NOA's ability to defend himself/herself against these charges.

---

[118] Jury Directions Act 2015 uses 'victim' instead of 'complainant'. We have retained 'complainant' to maintain consistency across the Charge Book.

[119] See 4.8.3 Delay Risking Honest But Erroneous Memory.

[120] This charge is designed for use in cases where there was a delay in making the complaint. If the relevant delay arose after the complaint was made the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

In assessing the evidence in this case you must have regard to the following significant considerations. Because of this delay:

[List the specific forensic disadvantages suffered by the accused due to the consequences of delay. Only those disadvantages actually suffered in the circumstances of the case should be included. Possibilities include:

- NOA lost the opportunity to make enquiries at, or close to, the time of the alleged incident[s].
- NOA lost the ability to explore the alleged circumstances in detail soon after the offences were said to have occurred. Such an exploration may have uncovered evidence which would have [thrown doubt upon the complainant's allegations/confirmed NOA's denial of the charges].
- NOA lost the means of testing NOC's allegations which would have been available had there been no delay in prosecution.
- NOC is not able to identify the occasion on which the offences are alleged to have occurred with any specificity. This makes it difficult for NOA to raise any defence other than a simple denial.
- NOC's own recollection of the events has faded, so s/he has not been able to provide many specific details of the alleged offences. This [also] makes it difficult for NOA to raise any defence other than a simple denial.
- NOC could not be medically examined close to the time of the alleged offence, to provide evidence contradicting the allegations (referring also to expert evidence establishing the probability of detectable injury in the circumstances described by the complainant).
- Witnesses who may have been able to give evidence contradicting the complainant's allegation [are no longer available/can no longer remember relevant details].]

I instruct you as a direction of law that you must take these disadvantages into consideration when determining whether the prosecution has proved NOA's guilt beyond reasonable doubt.

4.8.3 Delay Risking Honest but Erroneous Memory

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Scope

1. Two separate risks may arise where there is a delay in making a complaint:[121]

   i) The accused may suffer a significant forensic disadvantage; and

   ii) The complainant's recollection of what happened may be honest but erroneous (Longman v R (1989) 168 CLR 79; R v MBX [2014] 1 Qd R 438).

2. This topic only addresses the risk of honest but erroneous memory. See 4.8.1 Delay Causing Forensic Disadvantage for information concerning the risk of forensic disadvantage.

[121] While these risks may also arise where a delay occurs after a complaint is made (e.g. where there is a delay in interviewing, charging or prosecuting the accused), the risk of honest but erroneous memory is less likely to occur when the complaint is made in a timely fashion (cf the risk of forensic disadvantage). Consequently, this topic focuses solely on the issue of delayed complaint.

Grounds for Giving a Warning

3. The need for a direction about the risk of honest but erroneous memory may arise under s 32 of the Jury Directions Act 2015.

4. Alternatively, where a direction is not sought, the judge may need to give a direction if there are substantial and compelling reasons to do so in the absence of a request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015.

5. An "honest but erroneous memory" warning is a particular form of an unreliable evidence warning. This topic should therefore be read in conjunction with 4.21 Unreliable Evidence Warning.

Section 32 Unreliability Warning

When must a s 32 unreliability warning be given?

6. A judge must give a s 32 unreliability warning if:

   i) A party requests such a warning;

   ii) The evidence in question is "of a kind that may be unreliable";

   iii) The party specifies the significant matters that may make the evidence unreliable; and

   iv) There are no good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32).

7. This topic focuses on the second requirement. See 4.21 Unreliable Evidence Warning for information concerning the first and fourth requirements.

"Evidence of a kind that may be unreliable"

8. Section 32 applies to "evidence of a kind that may be unreliable". While this includes the eight categories of evidence listed in s 31, it is not restricted to those categories. A s 32 warning may be required for any evidence which is "of a kind that may be unreliable" (see R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301; R v Covill (2000) 114 A Crim R 111).

9. At common law, evidence given by a complainant after a lengthy delay was seen to be potentially unreliable, due to the risk that his or her recollection of what happened may be honest but erroneous (Longman v R (1989) 168 CLR 79; Crampton v R (2000) 206 CLR 161.See "Risk factors identified at common law" below for further information).

10. Although not yet decided, it seems likely that, for the reasons identified at common law, evidence given by a complainant after a lengthy delay will also be treated as evidence that is "of a kind that may be unreliable" for the purposes of Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32.

11. However, the mere fact that there has been a delay in making a complaint does not mean that any evidence given will necessarily be "evidence of a kind that may be unreliable". In some circumstances there may be no risk that such evidence is unreliable, and so s 32 will not apply (see R v Clark (2001) 123 A Crim R 506; R v Fowler (2003) 151 A Crim R 166; R v Harbulot [2003] NSWCCA 141; Derbas v R [2007] NSWCCA 118. Cf R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301).

12. This means that even if there has been a delay in making a complaint, a judge must still consider whether the specific evidence given in the trial in question is "of a kind that may be unreliable" (R v Clark (2001) 123 A Crim R 506; R v Fowler (2003) 151 A Crim R 166; R v Harbulot [2003] NSWCCA 141; Derbas v R [2007] NSWCCA 118. Cf R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301).

13. This is a test of "possibility". The question is whether the evidence is of a kind that "may be" unreliable (R v Flood [1999] NSWCCA 198).

14. In determining whether the evidence in a particular case is "of a kind that may be unreliable", judges may take into account the risks of unreliability identified at common law (see "Risk factors identified at common law" below) (Papakosmas (1999) 196 CLR 297; R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301; Robinson v R (2006) 162 A Crim R 88).

Risk factors identified at common law

15. Where there has been a lengthy delay in making a complaint, there is a risk that false recollections will have been converted into honestly and strongly held beliefs. This risk makes the evidence given in such circumstances potentially unreliable (Longman v R (1989) 168 CLR 79; Crampton v R (2000) 206 CLR 161).

16. Judges should warn the jury about this risk, because of the chance that the jury will merely focus upon whether the complainant seems to be a truthful witness, without taking into account the possibility that the delay has affected the reliability of his or her honest recollection (Longman v R (1989) 168 CLR 79).

17. In the common law cases, the length of the delay was seen to be a significant factor in creating the risk of honest but erroneous memory (see R v GTN (2003) 6 VR 150 for an analysis of the periods of delay in a number of appellate cases). However, the cases do not identify any minimum period of delay necessary for this risk to arise.[122]

18. As the delay in question must be capable of transforming fantasy into false memory, it is possible that the requisite period of delay will be longer than the short periods deemed capable of producing a forensic disadvantage (see 4.8.1 Delay Causing Forensic Disadvantage).

19. The risk that the complainant's recollection will be honest but erroneous must be assessed in all the relevant circumstances. It will be strongest in cases where:

    - The offence was discovered while the complainant was half-asleep;
    - There is evidence suggesting that the complainant was suggestible;
    - There is a combination of substantial delay and during the intervening period the complainant has experienced mental illness which has affected the complainant's memory (Longman v R (1989) 168 CLR 79*, Robinson v R* (1999) 197 CLR 162; Crampton v R (2000) 206 CLR 161; Wade v The Queen [2019] VSCA 168).

Doubts about the assumptions

20. Commentators and judges have doubted the validity of the law's assumptions about child psychology that underlie the asserted need for directions about honest but erroneous memory (JJB v R [2006] NSWCCA 126, [3]–[8] (Spigelman CJ); R v MBX [2014] 1 Qd R 438 (Applegarth J). Cf Crampton v R (2000) 206 CLR 161; R v BWT (2002) 54 NSWLR 241; JJB v R [2006] NSWCCA 126 (Kirby J)).

21. Doubts have also been expressed as to whether these directions are truly mandated by authority (JJB v R [2006] NSWCCA 126, [3]–[8] (Spigelman CJ); R v MBX [2014] 1 Qd R 438 (Applegarth J). Cf Crampton v R (2000) 206 CLR 161; R v BWT (2002) 54 NSWLR 241; JJB v R [2006] NSWCCA 126 (Kirby J)).

[122] In Longman v The Queen (1989) 168 CLR 79 the delay between alleged offending and complaint was 20 years. In Crampton v The Queen (2000) 206 CLR 161 the delay ranged between 15 and 9 years.

22. In 2019 the Victorian Court of Appeal affirmed the need for an honest but erroneous memory direction in a case where there was a substantial delay in complaint, evidence of an intervening mental illness, and evidence of how the complainant tried to reconstruct his memories to distinguish fact from fantasy. The Court held that the trial judge had erred in finding that the degree of cross-examination and the absence of any latent danger constituted good reasons for not giving a requested direction as the risk of confabulation may not have been fully appreciated by the jury. In circumstances where the complainant's reliability was critical to the prosecution case, the Court found that a tailored direction on honest but erroneous memory was necessary (Wade v The Queen [2019] VSCA 168, [36]–[38]).

Content of the s 32 warning

23. A s 32 unreliability warning must:

    i) Warn the jury that the evidence may be unreliable;

    ii) Inform the jury of the significant matters that the trial judge considers may cause it to be unreliable; and

    iii) Warn the jury of the need for caution in determining whether to accept the evidence and the weight to be given to it (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32(3)).

24. See 4.21 Unreliable Evidence Warning for information concerning the first and third requirements.

25. In informing the jury about the significant matters that may cause the evidence to be unreliable (the second requirement), it is often appropriate for the judge to refer to the risk factors identified at common law (see above) (Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 449; Robinson v R (2006) 162 A Crim R 88).

26. It follows that where a s 32 warning is required because of a delay in making a complaint, the charge should include instructions to the effect that:

    - Experience has shown that human recollection may be erroneous and liable to distortion due to various factors; and
    - That the likelihood of error increases with delay (Longman v R (1989) 168 CLR 79).

Judge must not warn the jury that it is "dangerous to convict"

27. The judge must not warn the jury, or suggest to them in any way, that it would be dangerous or unsafe to find the accused guilty because of the delay (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 51(2). See also JJB v R (2006) 161 A Crim R 187).

28. These provisions expressly prohibit judges from charging juries in the common terms of a Longman warning (R v IAB [2009] VSCA 229).[123]

Do not breach the prohibitions in ss 33 and 51(1)(a)

29. Section 51(1) of the Jury Directions Act 2015 states that the judge must not warn the jury, or suggest in any way, that the law regards complainants in sexual cases as an unreliable class of witness or that complainants who delay in making a complaint are, as a class, less credible or require more careful scrutiny than other complainants.

[123] At common law, the "Longman rule" often required judges to warn the jury that it would be dangerous to convict on the complainant's evidence alone unless, after scrutinizing the evidence with great care, considering the circumstances relevant to its evaluation, and paying heed to the warning, they were satisfied of its truth and accuracy (Longman v R (1989) 168 CLR 79).

30. Any directions given in relation to the risk of honest but erroneous memory must not be expressed in terms that undermine this provision (e.g. by suggesting a stereotyped view that complainants in sexual assault cases are unreliable, or that delay in making a complaint about an alleged sexual offence is invariably a sign that the complainant's evidence is false) (R v Crofts (1996) 186 CLR 427; R v Rodriguez [1998] 2 VR 167).
31. Similarly, section 33 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 prohibits the judge from saying or suggesting that children as a class are unreliable witnesses or that the evidence of children as a class is inherently less credible or reliable, or requires more careful scrutiny, than the evidence of adults.
32. For this reason, it may be prudent to avoid any suggestion that the risk of an honest but erroneous memory is greater for memories of events said to have occurred in childhood. Instead, the direction should focus on the length of the delay.

Associated Directions

33. Where there has been a delay, judges are commonly also asked to warn the jury about the forensic disadvantages to the accused caused by that delay. See 4.8.1 Delay Causing Forensic Disadvantage. Where it is appropriate to give both warnings, it will generally be convenient to combine them in the one direction.
34. Where the complainant has failed to make a timely complaint, the judge may also be required to give the jury the statutory directions on the relevance of delay on credit. See Effect of Delayed Complaint on Credit for further information.
35. Where the complainant has given inconsistent or incomplete accounts, the judge may be required to direct the jury about how to assess those inconsistencies. See Differences in a Complainant's Account for further information.

4.8.4 Charge: Delay Risking Honest but Erroneous Memory

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge should only be given where:

i) A party has requested a Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32 warning about the risk of honest but erroneous memory; and

ii) There are no good reasons for not giving the direction.

Introduction

As you will be aware, the offences in this trial are alleged to have occurred [indicate date(s) or date range(s)]. NOC first complained to NOW about the offending on [indicate dates].[124] This means there was a delay of [indicate delay] before NOC told anybody about [the details of] these alleged offences.

[124] This charge is designed for use in cases where there was a delay in making the complaint. If the relevant delay arose after the complaint was made it will need to be modified accordingly.

Effect of Delayed Complaint on Reliability

Because of the passage of so many years between the date(s) of the alleged offences, and the date of NOC's first complaint about those alleged events, I must give you a warning about the reliability of NOC's evidence.

My warning to you is as follows. The honest recollections of a witness about events that s/he believed to have occurred many years before may be unreliable.

You will easily understand that the passage of time may affect any witness's memory. While in some cases people simply forget things, in other cases their memory may become distorted. That is, they may come to remember things that did not really happen.

Human recollection is frequently erroneous and liable to distortion in this way. The likelihood of this error increases with delay.

[Add any other factors which may have exacerbated the risk of honest but erroneous memory in the circumstances, such as evidence that the complainant was suggestible. Also refer to any factors which may support the complainant's recollection, such as the exceptional or traumatic nature of the alleged acts, or a timely complaint that was made to another person.]

Warning

The law says that every jury must take this potential unreliability into account when considering evidence that is given after a long delay.

You must take this potential unreliability into account in determining whether you accept NOC's evidence at all, and if you do accept it, in whole or in part, in deciding what weight to give to that evidence.

In making this assessment you must carefully consider not only whether NOC's evidence is honest, in the sense that NOC believes it to be true, but also whether it is in fact true. While you should use your common sense and experience in assessing the effect of the delay upon NOC's memory, you must also consider the possibility that s/he honestly believes what s/he is saying, but is mistaken due to the distortion of his/her memory.

Supporting evidence

[If there is evidence capable of "supporting" the witness's evidence that has not otherwise been dealt with, add the following shaded section.]

In considering whether it is safe to rely on NOC's evidence, you should have regard to any supporting evidence led in this trial that you accept. By "supporting evidence" I mean evidence that comes from a source that is independent of NOW, and that tends to show the truth of NOW's evidence of the accused's guilt.

In this case the prosecution relied upon [insert number] items of evidence as supporting NOC's evidence. These were [identify evidence capable of supporting the unreliable witness's evidence].

[If there is a danger that the jury might mistakenly believe certain evidence to be supportive, add the following darker shaded section.]

There was other evidence given in this case that you might have thought at first glance could support NOC's evidence. This includes the evidence [broadly identify non-supporting evidence].

I direct you that this other evidence is not capable of supporting NOC's account, because [explain why the evidence is not capable of supporting, e.g. "it does not come from an independent source".]

Complainants are not less reliable than other witnesses

To conclude this part of my charge, I must make clear that in giving you these directions I am not suggesting, and it would be wrong to suggest, that people who make complaints about sexual offences are less reliable than other witnesses. That is not the case.

These directions are necessary solely because of the because of the matters that I have explained to you.

4.9 Prosecution Failure to Call or Question Witnesses

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Scope

1. This topic addresses the directions which should be given where the prosecution fails to call a witness to give evidence at trial, or fails to ask a witness a material question during the trial.
2. Similar issues are addressed in the following:
    - 4.10 Defence Failure to Call Witnesses;
    - 4.11 Failure to Challenge Evidence (Browne v Dunne).
3. The need for directions on these issues depends on:
    - whether directions are sought; or
    - whether there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving a direction in the absence of any request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

Failure to Call a Witness

Obligation to Call Material Witnesses

4. The prosecution alone bears the responsibility of deciding whether to call a person as a witness for the prosecution (Apostilides v R (1984) 154 CLR 563).
5. The prosecution must call all witnesses necessary to unfold the narrative of events unless there is a good reason not to do so (Whitehorn v R (1983) 152 CLR 657; Dyers v R (2002) 210 CLR 285; Mahmood v Western Australia (2008) 232 CLR 397).
6. As the prosecution seeks the truth, it must call evidence favourable and unfavourable to its case (R v Soma (2003) 212 CLR 299; R v Shaw (1991) 57 A Crim R 425; R v Glennon (No. 2) (2001) 7 VR 631).
7. However, the prosecution does not need to call a witness if his or her evidence:
    - Is likely to be unreliable, untrustworthy or otherwise incapable of belief (Whitehorn v R (1983) 152 CLR 657; R v Newland (1997) 98 A Crim R 455);
    - Is likely to be unnecessarily repetitious, in light of the number of witnesses available for the proof of the matter on which they would give evidence (Whitehorn v R (1983) 152 CLR 657); or
    - Relates to an issue which has been raised by the defence, and on which the defence bears the onus of proof (e.g. mental impairment) (R v Fitchett (2009) 23 VR 91; [2009] VSCA 150).

8. Previously, one of the factors the prosecution could consider when deciding whether to call a witness was whether the interests of justice required that it be able to cross-examine that witness (see, e.g. Richardson v R (1974) 131 CLR 116). This was due to the restrictions the common law placed on the prosecution's ability to cross-examine its own witnesses. As Evidence Act 2008 s 38 now provides the prosecution with a greater opportunity to cross-examine its own witnesses, this is no longer a reasonable basis for refusing to call a witness (Santo v R [2009] NSWCCA 269; Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109; Kneebone v R (1999) 47 NSWLR 450 (Smart AJ)).[125]

Section 43 direction

9. Where the prosecution fails to call or question a witness without providing a reasonable explanation, the defence may seek a direction under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 43 (a 'section 43 direction').

10. This direction informs the jury that it may conclude that the witness would not have assisted the prosecution's case (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 43).

11. This direction is a statutory replacement for the common law rule in Jones v Dunkel (see Jones v Dunkel (1959) 101 CLR 298; Dyers v R (2002) 210 CLR 285; R v Le–Gallienne [2004] VSCA 223).

When Should a Section 43 Direction be Given

Prerequisites

12. A section 43 direction may be given if:

    i) A witness was available who could have given relevant evidence;

    ii) The prosecution could reasonably have been expected to call or question that witness to give evidence;

    iii) The prosecution failed to call or question the witness;

    iv) The prosecution provided no satisfactory explanation for that failure; and

    v) Counsel for the accused requests a direction or there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving the direction despite the absence of a request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 12, 43; Police v Kyriacou (2009) 103 SASR 243).

Discuss Issue With Counsel

13. Where the defence seeks a section 43 direction, the judge should discuss the issue with the prosecution before charging the jury. This will allow the prosecution to make submissions on why it was not reasonably expected to call or question the witness, or why there is a satisfactory explanation for not calling or questioning the witness (see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 43; R v OGD (1997) 45 NSWLR 744).

14. This discussion will provide the judge with the information needed to determine whether the statutory basis for the direction is established (see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 43. See also Dyers v R (2002) 210 CLR 285; R v Heinze [2005] VSCA 124; R v Kneebone (1999) 47 NSWLR 450).

[125] It will usually be unjust to refuse the prosecution leave to cross-examine a witness under Evidence Act 2008 s 38 where it has called that witness because of its duty to put all material evidence (including unfavourable evidence) before the jury (Santo v R [2009] NSWCCA 269; Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109; Kneebone v R (1999) 47 NSWLR 450 per Smart AJ).

15. If the judge finds that the prosecution does not have a good reason for failing to call a witness, he or she may ask the prosecution to reconsider its decision (Apostilides v R (1984) 154 CLR 563).[126] If the prosecution complies with the judge's request, a section 43 direction will not be necessary.

Reasonable explanations for failing to call a witness

The Witness is Likely to be Unreliable

16. A direction should not be given where the prosecution has a strong basis for considering the witness unreliable, untrustworthy or otherwise incapable of belief (R v Newland (1997) 98 A Crim R 455; Apostilides v R (1984) 154 CLR 563; Whitehorn v R (1983) 152 CLR 657).

17. It is not enough for the prosecution to merely suspect the witness is unreliable. There must be identifiable circumstances which clearly establish unreliability (Apostilides v R (1984) 154 CLR 563).

18. The prosecution should put forward the evidence on which it formed the view that the witness should not be called (R v Kneebone (1999) 47 NSWLR 450; R v Glennon (No 2) (2001) 7 VR 631).

19. The mere fact that a potential witness has made contradictory statements in the past is not a sufficient reason for failing to call him or her (R v Shaw (1991) 57 A Crim R 425; R v Armstrong [1998] 4 VR 533; R v Palmer [2000] VSCA 236).

20. The fact that the prosecution expects the witness to be unfavourable, or to give evidence that does not accord with the prosecution's case theory, is also not a sufficient reason for failing to call a witness (Whitehorse v R (1983) 152 CLR 657; R v Newland (1997) 98 A Crim R 455; R v Heinze [2005] VSCA 124; Dyers v R (2002) 210 CLR 285; R v Kneebone (1999) 47 NSWLR 450).

The Evidence is Unnecessary or Irrelevant

21. A direction should not be given if the witness's evidence is likely to be unimportant, cumulative or inferior to what has already been adduced (Police v Kyriacou (2009) 103 SASR 243).

22. The prosecution will also have a reasonable explanation for not calling a witness where the unled evidence would simply have supported the unchallenged evidence of another witness. The evidence in question must have been:

    - Potentially relevant to a contested issue (R v Dammous [2004] VSCA 62); and
    - Able to affect the question of whether or not the prosecution has proven its case beyond reasonable doubt (RPS v R (2000) 199 CLR 620; Mahmood v Western Australia (2008) 232 CLR 397. See also R v Louizos [2009] NSWCCA 71; HGA v R [2010] VSCA 114).

Other Reasons for Not Giving a Direction

23. At common law, the prosecution has been held to have a good reason for not calling a witness in the following circumstances:

    - Where it did not know what evidence the witness would give (e.g. because the police did not take a witness statement) (Gillan v Police (SA) (2004) 149 A Crim R 354);
    - Where the witness could not have been compelled to give evidence (R v Reardon (No 2) (2004) 60 NSWLR 454);
    - Where the witness had been deported and could not be subpoenaed (Fonseka v R (2003) 140 A Crim R 395);

[126] As the prosecution alone bears the responsibility of deciding whether a person will be called as a witness for the prosecution, the judge cannot force it to call a witness. Although the judge has the power to call a witness him or herself (and thus also avoid the need for a section 43 direction), this should only be done in the "most exceptional circumstances" (Apostilides v R (1984) 154 CLR 563).

- Where the witness had indicated that he or she would not give evidence due to a privilege under Evidence Act 2008 (R v Kessing (2008) 73 NSWLR 22).

24. These reasons are also likely to provide satisfactory explanations for the purpose of the Jury Directions Act 2015.

25. In some cases the complexity of the circumstances may provide good reasons for not giving a section 43 direction. For example, in R v Taufua [1999] NSWCCA 205 the court held that, in order for the jury to determine whether the prosecution should have called the relevant witness, the judge would have had to direct them about matters such as the prosecution's obligations to call a witness under Apostilides, the potential unreliability of the witness and directions under s 32 of the Jury Directions Act 2015, and the need to seek leave to cross-examine the witness under s 38 of the Evidence Act 2008. In such circumstances, it was seen to be preferable to give an anti-speculation direction rather than a section 43 direction (see also R v Smith [2000] NSWCCA 202).

26. A failure by police to question a relevant person is not a satisfactory reason for not calling the person. A prosecutor cannot remain passive, leaving a failure by police to dictate who should be called at the trial (Solis v The Queen [2018] VSCA 275, [104]–[108]).

27. Similarly, reticence of the complainant to identify a witness or provide a witness' contact details, or the fact that the witness is overseas, are not satisfactory explanations for a failure to call by themselves. It is not for a complainant to decide whether a witness is important, and the availability of audio-visual links means that living overseas does not stop a witness from giving evidence (Jacobs v The Queen [2019] VSCA 285, [160]).

Content of the Direction

28. Where a section 43 direction is required, the judge may direct the jury that it is entitled to conclude that the witness in question would not have assisted the prosecution's case and that this supports the defence case (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 43; Jones v Dunkel (1959) 101 CLR 298). In some cases, it will also be appropriate to tell the jury that the prosecution failure to call the evidence strengthens the defence case.

29. The direction must only describe a permissible path of reasoning to the jury. It must not require the jury to draw the inference described (Nadarajamoorthy v Moreton [2003] VSC 283).

30. The judge must not direct the jury that the missing evidence would have contradicted the prosecution's case or been unfavourable to the prosecution. He or she may only tell the jury that the evidence would not have assisted the prosecution (Nadajaramoorthy v Moreton [2003] VSC 283; R v Allen & Anor Vic CCA 20/12/1994; R v Buckland (1977) 2 NSWLR 452).

31. The judge may explain any competing inferences that arise in the circumstances of the case, including any innocent explanations for the failure to call the witness (R v Jenkins (2002) 6 VR 81; R v OGD (1997) 45 NSWLR 744; R v Glennon (No 2) (2001) 7 VR 631. See also Apostilides v R (1984) 154 CLR 563).

32. A judge may comment on the effect that the prosecution's failure to call a particular witness would appear to have had on the course of the trial (Apostilides v R (1984) 154 CLR 563).

33. If the prosecution fails to call a particular witness, but there are good reasons for not giving a section 43 direction, it may be appropriate to give an anti-speculation direction. See below for further information.

Failure to Question Witnesses

34. It is likely that section 43 also applies where the prosecution fails to question a witness about a particular matter, when it may be expected that the prosecution would ask about that matter (R v GEC (2001) 3 VR 334; R v Martin [2002] QCA 443; Western Australia v Coates [2007] WASC 307; Mahmood v Western Australia [2007] WASCA 101; R v Priest (2002) 137 A Crim R 133).[127]

35. This means that a section 43 direction may be given if:

    - A witness who was called could have given relevant evidence about a particular matter;
    - The prosecution could reasonably have been expected to question the witness about that matter, but failed to do so;
    - The prosecution provided no satisfactory explanation for that failure; and
    - Counsel for the accused requests a direction regarding that failure.

36. The need for this direction raises the same issues which are discussed above regarding the prosecution failure to call the witness.

37. At common law, one case where it was considered appropriate to direct the jury on the failure of the prosecution to question a witness about a topic was where:

    - The complainant's credibility was the foundation of the prosecution's case;
    - The matter that the prosecution did not ask the witness about was central to the complainant's credibility; and
    - The prosecution had no reason for not asking the witness about that matter (Western Australia v Coates [2007] WASC 307; R v GEC (2001) 3 VR 334).

38. The fact that defence counsel had the option to cross-examine the witness about the relevant matter does not remove the need for a direction. Defence counsel should not be expected to risk leading prejudicial evidence in cross-examination because the prosecution has failed to elicit all relevant evidence (R v GEC (2001) 3 VR 334).

39. See "Content of the Direction" above for a discussion of matters relevant to the content of a section 43 direction. If a section 43 direction is given in this context, modifications should be made to reflect the fact that an inference is being drawn from the prosecution's failure to question a witness, rather than its failure to call a witness.

Anti-speculation Direction

40. An anti-speculation direction may be given where:

    - It is possible that the jury might think that a witness could have been called by the prosecution to give evidence, or could have been questioned about a certain matter, but was not;
    - An adverse inference may not be drawn from the prosecution's failure to call or question the witness;

[127] In Dyers v R (2002) 210 CLR 285, the High Court referred to R v GEC (2001) 3 VR 334, but did not need to decide whether the rule in Jones v Dunkel extended to a prosecution failure to lead evidence from a witness who has been called.

- Counsel for the prosecution has requested the direction, or there are substantial and compelling reasons to give the direction despite the absence of a request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 12, 16; Dyers v R (2002) 210 CLR 285).

41. In such cases, the judge may direct the jury not to speculate about what the witness might have said (Dyers v R (2002) 210 CLR 285).
42. The judge may also direct the jury:
    - Not to speculate about why the witness was not called or questioned;
    - Not to place any weight on the failure to call or question the witness; and
    - To decide the case solely on the evidence presented at the trial (see, e.g. R v Newland (1997) 98 A Crim R 455; Hugo v R (2000) 113 A Crim R 484; R v Holden [2001] VSCA 63; R v Caratti (2000) 22 WAR 527; HGA v R [2010] VSCA 114).
43. If defence counsel has suggested that an adverse inference should be drawn against the prosecution for failing to call or question a witness, the judge should explicitly direct the jury not to draw such an inference (see, e.g. R v Heinze [2005] VSCA 124).
44. Where the prosecution does not call a witness because of doubts about his or her reliability, it will generally not be appropriate to tell that to the jury (see, e.g. R v Chimirri [2010] VSCA 57).
45. As an anti-speculation direction and a section 43 direction are contradictory, the two directions should not be given together (Dyers v R (2002) 210 CLR 285).

4.9.1 Charge: Section 43 Direction

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge may be given where an adverse inference can be drawn from the prosecution's failure to call a witness to give evidence.

It may only be given where the trial judge is satisfied that the prosecution:

i) was reasonably expected to call or question the witnesses; and

ii) has not satisfactorily explained why it did not call or question the witness.

The direction must also be requested by the defence, or there must be substantial and compelling reasons for giving the direction despite the absence of any request. See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015.

It may be modified for use in cases where an adverse inference can be drawn from the prosecution's failure to question a witness.

Section 43 Direction

In this case, you may have expected that the prosecution would have asked NOW to give evidence. However, they chose not to do so.[128]

[Explain reasons why the prosecution should have called the witness, and possible reasons for their failure to do so.]

[128] This charge was written for use in cases where the prosecution failed to call a witness. it must be adapted for cases where the prosecution fails to question a witness on a particular topic.

It is for you to determine whether the prosecution had a satisfactory reason for not asking NOW to give evidence. If you conclude that the prosecution did not have a satisfactory reason for failing to call NOW, then you may conclude that [his/her] evidence would not have helped the prosecution.

4.9.2 Charge: Anti-Speculation Direction

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge should be given where:

i) The jury might think that the prosecution should have called a particular witness to give evidence;

ii) An adverse inference may not be drawn from the prosecution's failure to call the witness;

iii) Prosecution counsel have requested the direction, or there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving the direction in the absence of a request.

It may be modified for use in cases where the jury might think that the prosecution should have questioned a witness about a particular matter.

Anti-speculation Direction

You may have noticed that NOW did not give evidence in this case. You must not speculate about what s/he might have said if s/he had given evidence. As I have told you, you must decide this case solely on the evidence which has been given in court.

4.10 Defence Failure to Call Witnesses

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Scope

1. This topic addresses directions that may be given where the defence fails to call a witness (including the accused) to give evidence at trial.
2. Similar issues are addressed in the following topics:
    - 4.9 Prosecution Failure to Call or Question Witnesses;
    - 4.11 Failure to Challenge Evidence (Browne v Dunn);
    - 4.15 Silence in Response to People in Authority;
    - 4.16 Silence in Response to Equal Parties.

No Obligation to Give Evidence or Call Witnesses

3. In contrast to the prosecution's duty to call all material witnesses (see 4.9 Prosecution Failure to Call or Question Witnesses), the defence is usually under no obligation to give evidence him or herself, or to call any other witnesses to give evidence. A criminal trial is an accusatorial process in which the prosecution bears the onus of proving the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt (RPS v R (2000) 199 CLR 620; Azzopardi v R (2001) 205 CLR 50. See 1.7 Onus and Standard of Proof).
4. This is sometimes expressed as the accused having a "right of silence". However, that expression describes a number of different rules that apply in the criminal law. To avoid confusion, it is useful to specify which aspect of the right of silence is relevant (RPS v R (2000) 199 CLR 620; Azzopardi v R (2001) 205 CLR 50).

5. In this context, the relevant aspect of the right of silence is the immunity of an accused person undergoing trial from being compelled to give or call evidence (Azzopardi v R (2001) 205 CLR 50).

Direction on Failure to Give Evidence or Call Witnesses

6. The need for any directions on the accused's failure to give or call evidence depends on
   (a) whether directions are sought or
   (b) whether there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving a direction despite the absence of a request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 12, 14, 15, 16). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.
7. Where the accused fails to give evidence or call a witness to give evidence at a trial, the defence may request a direction that warns the jury against the impermissible use of the accused's failure to give evidence or call a witness. This direction is referred to in this Charge Book as a 'Section 41 direction' (see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 41).

Warn the Jury Against Impermissible Use: The Section 41 Direction

8. As the accused is under no obligation to give evidence at trial, the fact that the accused does not do so cannot be used as evidence against him or her (Azzopardi v R (2001) 205 CLR 50. See also Weissensteiner v R (1993) 178 CLR 217; Dyers v R (2002) 210 CLR 285).
9. Therefore, where the accused does not give evidence, the defence may request a direction that the judge explains:
   (a) The prosecution's obligation to prove guilt;
   (b) That the accused is not required to give evidence or call a witness;
   (c) That the jury should not guess or speculate about the evidence the accused may have given, or the evidence the witness may have given;
   (d) That the fact that the accused did not give evidence or call a witness is not evidence against the accused or an admission, must not be used to fill gaps in the evidence and does not strengthen the prosecution case (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 41).
10. This direction is a statutory replacement for the common law Azzopardi direction, and contains most of the same content (See Azzopardi v R (2001) 205 CLR 50; Dyers v R (2002) 210 CLR 285; R v DAH [2004] QCA 419).
11. The direction applies to both the situation where the accused fails to give evidence and where the defence fails to call a particular witness.
12. At common law, such directions were given as a matter of practice, even if not requested by defence counsel. The directions were given to address the risk that the jury might use the accused's silence in court to his or her detriment (Johnston v R [2007] NSWCCA 133; Server v R [2007] NSWCCA 339; Azzopardi v R (2001) 205 CLR 50).
13. According to the joint judgment of the High Court in Azzopardi, it is "almost always" desirable to give these directions to address the risk of the jury reasoning impermissibly from the accused's silence (Azzopardi v R (2001) 205 CLR 50).
14. Judges conducting trials under the Jury Directions Act 2015 will need to consider how this statement on the desirability of these directions at common law informs the judge's assessment of whether there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving the directions in the absence of a request (compare Jury Directions Act 2015 s 16).
15. However, even at common law, these directions did not need to be given in every case (R v Richards [2002] NSWCCA 38; R v Park [2003] NSWCCA 203; R v SMR [2002] NSWCCA 258; R v Nguyen [2002] NSWCCA 342; R v Wilson (2005) 62 NSWLR 346. Cf R v Macris (2004) 147 A Crim R 99).

16. No particular form of words needs to be used when giving this direction. What is required is a warning appropriate to the issues in the particular case, paying proper attention to the guidance offered in Jury Directions Act 2015 s 41 and in Azzopardi (See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 6; Baquayee v R [2006] NSWCCA 103. See also R v Colville [2003] NSWCCA 23; R v Burns (2003) 137 A Crim R 557; R v Nicholson; Ex parte DPP (Cth) [2004] QCA 393; R v DAH [2004] QCA 419).

17. Although the High Court in Azzopardi used the expression "it cannot be used as a make-weight", the term "make-weight" should be avoided when charging the jury. This term was discouraged at common law as unhelpful for use with a jury, and the Jury Directions Act 2015 uses the term 'does not strengthen the prosecution case' (See R v DAH [2004] QCA 419).

Prohibited Directions

18. Section 42 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 prohibits the judge, the prosecution and defence counsel from saying or suggesting that because the accused did not give evidence or call a particular witness, the jury may:

    (a) conclude that the accused is guilty from that fact;

    (b) use the failure of the accused to provide an explanation, which must be within the knowledge of the accused, to more safely draw an adverse inference based on those facts which, if drawn, would prove the guilt of the accused; or

    (c) draw an inference that the accused did not give evidence or call a witness (as the case requires) because that would not have assisted his or her case (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 42).

19. Previous statutory limitations on the power of the judge or a prosecutor to comment on the accused's failure to give evidence or call witnesses were given a broad construction. The same approach will likely apply to Jury Directions Act 2015 s 42.

20. The prohibition applies to both statements and suggestions. This prohibits even "the most subtle allusion" which suggests that the accused's silence is evidence of guilt, or in any way supports the prosecution case (see Bataillard v R (1907) 4 CLR 1282; RPS v R (2000) 199 CLR 620).

21. In RPS v R (2000) 199 CLR 620 it was held that the jury should not be told any of the following:

    - That the accused's election not to give evidence can be taken into account in judging the value or weight of the prosecution's evidence;
    - That in the absence of a denial or contradiction of the prosecution evidence, the jury can more readily discount doubts about that evidence, and more readily accept the evidence;
    - That the accused's decision not to give evidence can enable the jury to feel more confident in relying on the evidence tendered by the prosecution;
    - That the jury is entitled to conclude from the accused's failure to give evidence that his or her evidence would not have been of assistance.

22. It is a misdirection to tell the jury that it is usually easier to accept uncontradicted evidence than evidence which is actively disputed (R v JJT (2006) 67 NSWLR 152).

23. However, it is not a misdirection for the judge to simply point out that some of the prosecution evidence remains uncontradicted. This differs from suggesting that the prosecution evidence might be more readily accepted as a result, or that adverse inferences can be drawn from that fact (R v Collie (2005) 91 SASR 339. See also R v Tran (2006) 96 SASR 8).

24. Similarly, it is permissible for the prosecution (and the judge in summarising the prosecution's case) to point to objective and uncontradicted circumstances from which the jury may draw a reasonable inference about the accused's state of knowledge. Such an argument does not involve reversing the onus of proof, or making a prohibited comment on the accused's silence (see, e.g., Kelly v The King [2024] VSCA 69, [46]–[47], where the prosecution invited the jury to infer that the accused's guilty plea was made on the basis of an adequate understanding of the charge, given it was made after having engaged a solicitor and while sitting next to the solicitor at the committal mention hearing, even though the accused and the solicitor did not give evidence).

25. The judge must not suggest that by making him or herself unavailable for cross-examination, the accused has deprived the jury of something to which they were entitled (R v Conway (2005) 157 A Crim R 474).

26. The judge should not tell the jury that the accused is "not required to help the prosecution", as this may imply that if the accused had given evidence it would have assisted the prosecution case (R v Collie (2005) 91 SASR 339).

Failure to Call a Witness: The common law Jones v Dunkel Direction prohibited

27. At common law, there was a limited power for judges to direct the jury that it was entitled to draw an adverse inference from the fact that the defence in a criminal trial failed to call a witness (see Jones v Dunkel (1959) 101 CLR 298; Dyers v R (2002) 210 CLR 285).

28. This direction was referred to as the Jones v Dunkel direction, and advised the jury that it could infer that the evidence from a witness who was not called would not have assisted the party (Jones v Dunkel (1959) 101 CLR 298).

29. However, due to the adversarial and accusatory nature of criminal trials, the Jones v Dunkel direction was only suitable in "rare and exceptional" cases (Dyers v R (2002) 210 CLR 285).

30. Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, the Jones v Dunkel direction is prohibited in relation to the accused. The judge, the prosecution and the defence must not say or suggest that the jury can infer that the accused did not call a witness because that would not have assisted his or her case (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 42(c)).[129]

31. If the prosecution or another party breaches this prohibition, then the judge must correct the statement or suggestion, unless there are good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 7).

32. Instead, the section 41 direction is available to warn the jury not to guess or speculate about what evidence a witness might have given, where the witness has not been called by the defence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 41).

Failure to Provide an Explanation: The common law Weissensteiner Direction Prohibited

33. The common law also provided for judges to direct a jury that it could more safely infer that the prosecution case was established where the accused failed to call evidence to contradict a circumstantial case which, if the evidence existed, could only have been known to the accused (see RPS v R (2000) 199 CLR 620; Weissensteiner v R (1993) 178 CLR 217).

[129] The Jones v Dunkel direction is only prohibited in relation to the hearing to determine guilt or non-guilt. Jones v Dunkel reasoning is permissible when the judge is determining facts on a voir dire to decide whether to exclude evidence under Evidence Act 2008 s 90 (Kelly v The King [2024] VSCA 69, [30]).

34. This direction was known as the Weissensteiner direction and could only be given in exceptional cases (Azzopardi v R (2001) 205 CLR 50. See also RPS v R (2000) 199 CLR 620; Weissensteiner v R (1993) 178 CLR 217).

35. Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, the Weissensteiner direction is prohibited. The judge, the prosecutor and the defence must not say or suggest to the jury that the accused's failure to give evidence or call a witness allows the jury to use that failure to provide an explanation of facts must, if true, must be within the knowledge of the accused, to more safely draw an inference of guilt (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 42(b)).

36. If the prosecution or another party breaches this prohibition, then the judge must correct the statement or suggestion, unless there are good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 7).

Prohibition on Comment by an Accused on a Co-accused's Failure to Give Evidence

37. Prior to the commencement of the Jury Directions Act 2015, section 20 of the Evidence Act 2008 allowed an accused to comment on the failure of a co-accused to give evidence and permitted the judge to comment on that comment.

38. Under the Evidence Act 2008, this comment could include inviting the jury to infer that a co-accused remained silent because that co-accused was guilty (R v Skaf [2004] NSWCCA 74; Azzopardi v R (2001) 205 CLR 50).

39. For trials commencing on or after 29 June 2015, such comments are prohibited. The trial judge, the prosecution and defence counsel must not say or suggest that the jury can use the fact that an accused did not give evidence as a basis to conclude that the accused is guilty (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 42(a)).

40. If a party makes this prohibited comment, the trial judge must correct the statement or suggestion, unless there are good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 7).

Prohibited Comments by the Prosecution

41. Under the Evidence Act, it was held that a statement in an opening address that the accused has a right to give evidence was not a comment on the failure to do so (Peterson v R (1979) 41 FLR 205; R v Anastasiou (1991) 21 NSWLR 394), while such a comment in final addresses was prohibited (R v Villar [2004] NSWCCA 302).

42. Similarly, under the Evidence Act 2008, the prosecution could refer to the defence's failure to call any witnesses without breaching this prohibition (see, e.g. R v Thornton (1980) 3 A Crim R 80). The prosecution could also refer to the fact that the only version before the court is that provided by prosecution witnesses and there is no evidence to support the alternative scenario provided by defence counsel (R v Yammine [2002] NSWCCA 289).

43. However, a comment that the accused has failed to contradict prosecution witnesses, or to provide an alternative version of events, would breach the prohibition (R v Siebel (1992) 57 SASR 558; R v Secombe [2010] VSCA 58).

44. Despite the differences between Evidence Act 2008 s 20, as it applied before 29 June 2015 and Jury Directions Act 2015 s 42, it is likely that the same principles will continue to apply. The prosecution must not address the jury with an argument that the accused's failure to give or call evidence strengthens the prosecution case in any way.

45. If the prosecution makes a prohibited statement or suggestion, the trial judge must correct the statement or suggestion, unless there are good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 7).

46. Such a direction may include the following elements:

    - That the jury must only take into account the directions given by the judge;

- That the prosecution was not entitled to refer to the fact that the accused or other party failed to give evidence;
- That the jury must ignore any comments made by the prosecution about the party's failure to give evidence;
- That there may be reasons, unknown to the jury, why an accused person remains silent; and
- Not to speculate about those reasons (see, e.g. R v Villar [2004] NSWCCA 302; R v Gardner (2001) 123 A Crim R 439).

Do Not Speculate About Reasons for Failure: The OGD Direction

47. Previously, it was held that where the accused fails to give evidence, it would ordinarily be necessary to direct the jury that:
    - There may be reasons, unknown to them, why an accused person remains silent, even if he or she is in a position to contradict or explain evidence; and
    - Not to speculate about those reasons (R v OGD (1997) 45 NSWLR 744).
48. However, it has been noted that the High Court in Azzopardi did not include this "OGD direction" in the warning which it described as "almost always" desirable to give (see "Warn the Jury Against Impermissible Use: The Section 41 Direction" above).
49. The section 41 direction does not contain a component warning the jury that there may be reasons for the accused to remain silent and not to speculate about those reasons. Judges will need to consider whether such a direction is specifically requested in addition to or as an alternative to the section 41 direction. Alternatively, the judge will need to consider whether there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving the direction despite the absence of a request.
50. At common law, it was suggested that as the OGD direction was designed to balance a Weissensteiner direction, it was only necessary to give an OGD direction in the rare cases where a Weissensteiner direction is given (R v Nguyen [2002] NSWCCA 342; R v Wilson (2005) 62 NSWLR 346).
51. The risk posed by the OGD direction is that it may lead the jury to consider what reasons the accused might have had for not giving evidence, which will usually be irrelevant (R v Graham [2005] NSWCCA 127 (Howie J)).
52. These common law principles identified above may inform whether there are good reasons for not giving the direction, or whether there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving the direction (see Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 15, 16).

4.10.1 Charge: Section 41 Direction

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge may be given where the defence has requested a direction on the failure of the accused to give evidence or call a witness. See Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

It can be modified for use in cases where the prosecution has improperly suggested that an adverse inference can be drawn from the defence's failure to call a witness. See Defence Failure to Call Witnesses for guidance.

You may have noticed that NOA did not [call NOW to] give evidence in this case. That is his/her right. As I have told you, it is for the prosecution to prove its case beyond reasonable doubt, and the accused is not required to [call any witnesses to] give evidence. The onus of proving the accused's guilt always remains on the prosecution, regardless of whether the accused chooses to [give/call] any evidence.

This means that the fact that NOA did not [call NOW to] give evidence cannot be used as evidence against him. That fact is not evidence in the case – and as I have told you, you must decide the case only on the evidence.

So the fact that NOA did not [call NOW] to give evidence does not constitute an admission by the accused, and may not be used to fill gaps in the evidence led by the prosecution. It does not add to or strengthen the prosecution's case in any way. It proves nothing at all.

You therefore must not draw any conclusions against the accused because s/he did not [call NOW to] give evidence, or even consider the fact that NOA did not [call NOW to] give evidence when deciding whether the prosecution has proved its case beyond reasonable doubt.

You also must not speculate about what [NOA/NOW] might have said if s/he had given evidence. You must decide this case solely on the evidence which has been given in court.

4.11 Failure to Challenge Evidence (Browne v Dunn)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Scope

1. This topic addresses the directions which may be given when a party fails to confront a witness with a proposed challenge to his or her evidence.
2. Similar issues are addressed in the following topics:
    - 4.9 Prosecution Failure to Call or Question Witnesses;
    - 4.10 Defence Failure to Call Witness.

The Rule in Browne v Dunn

3. The rule in Browne v Dunn requires counsel to:

    i) Put any matters concerning his or her own case that are inconsistent with a witness' evidence to that witness; and

    ii) Put any allegations or imputations that he or she intends to make against a witness to that witness (Browne v Dunn (1893) 6 R 67; MWJ v R (2005) 222 ALR 436; R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135; R v Coswello [2009] VSCA 300; KC v R (2011) 32 VR 61).

4. This is a rule of fairness designed to allow witnesses to confront any proposed challenges to their evidence, and to enable the jury to see and assess the reactions of witnesses to those challenges (MWJ v R (2005) 222 ALR 436; Bulstrode v Trimble [1970] VR 840; R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135; R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526).
5. The rule applies both where a party intends to call evidence that directly contradicts a witness's account, and where a party intends to suggest that the jury draw an inference adverse to the witness from the evidence in the case. In the latter case, the suggested inference should ordinarily be put to the witness in cross-examination (R v Birks (1990) 19 NSWLR 677. See also Evidence Act 2008 s 46(2)).
6. While the rule in Browne v Dunn applies in criminal trials, the content of the rule is narrower than in civil proceedings. This is due to the accusatorial nature of criminal trials, the obligation on the prosecution to present its whole case and the burden of proof (MWJ v R (2005) 222 ALR 436). These matters should be taken into account when considering the scope of the rule and the remedies for its breach (see below).

7. The rule does not require counsel to iron out inconsistencies that emerge in the other party's case. It only obliges counsel to give witnesses the chance to respond to evidence or submissions that form part of counsel's own case (MWJ v R (2005) 222 ALR 436; R v MG [2006] VSCA 264).
8. These obligations are not fulfilled simply because the accused challenged the witness's evidence in his or her record of interview. Counsel must put the version of events from the record of interview to any relevant witnesses (R v Baran [2007] VSCA 66).
9. The rule in Browne v Dunn admits of some flexibility. While it requires proposed challenges to a witness's evidence to normally be put to that witness, there are some circumstances in which this need not be done (see below) (Bugeja v R (2010) 30 VR 493)

Effect of the Evidence Act 2008

10. The rule in Browne v Dunn "remains alive and well" under the Uniform Evidence Acts (Heaton v Luczka [1998] NSWCA 104. See also Jardein Pty Ltd v Stathakis [2007] FCAFC 148).
11. However, a prosecution failure to challenge evidence can be particularly significant, in part because of Evidence Act 2008 s 38, which provides a party with a greater opportunity to challenge the evidence of its own witnesses (see below).

Effect of the Jury Directions Act 2015

12. The Jury Directions Act 2015 does not specify the content of any directions required in relation to the rule in Browne v Dunn.
13. However, the general provisions in Part 3 of the Act regarding requests for directions and the consequences of failing to request a direction apply.
14. The significance of a prosecution failure to comply with the rule in Browne v Dunn means that judges will often need to consider whether a direction is required, even if one is not requested (see Cavanagh and Rekviashvili v R [2016] VSCA 305, [103]).

Scope of the Rule

15. While the obligations in Browne v Dunn previously only applied to defence counsel (see, e.g. R v Macfie (No 2) (2004) 11 VR 215; R v Nicholas (2000) 1 VR 356), this is no longer the case.
16. A party may also have a duty to cross-examine one of their own witnesses, if they intend to introduce evidence that contradicts a part of that witness's account, or to criticise a part of that witness's evidence in their closing address (see, e.g. R v McCormack (No.3) [2003] NSWSC 645; Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109). In such cases, the party must apply for leave to cross-examine the witness under Evidence Act 2008 s 38.
17. The obligations in Browne v Dunn do not apply to committal hearings. No inference may be drawn from a failure to cross-examine a witness at an earlier committal hearing (R v Birks (1990) 19 NSWLR 677).

When is the Rule Breached?

18. The rule in Browne v Dunn places different obligations on the defence and the prosecution. This section looks at each party's obligations in turn.

Defence Obligations

19. The extent of the obligations that arise under the rule in Browne v Dunn in a particular case will be informed by the nature of the case to be presented by the defence and the forensic context of the trial (R v Coswello [2009] VSCA 300; R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526; Bugeja v R (2010) 30 VR 493; R v MG [2006] VSCA 264; R v Foley [2000] 1 Qd R 290).

20. Defence counsel must not only disclose that the evidence of the witness is to be challenged, but also how it is to be challenged (R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526; Allied Pastoral Holdings Pty Ltd v FCT [1983] 1 NSWLR 1).

21. If the defence case involves no more than a denial of the witness's evidence, without positive evidence or hypothesis of an alternative version of events, it may be sufficient to put that case to the witness in general terms (R v Coswello [2009] VSCA 300; R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526; Bellemore v Tasmania (2006) 16 Tas R 364).

22. If defence counsel has made clear from the manner in which the defence case is conducted that the witness's evidence will be contested, or if the witness's evidence is clearly implausible, there may not be a need for any specific matters to be put in cross-examination (R v Coswello [2009] VSCA 300; KC v R (2011) 32 VR 61; R v MG [2006] VSCA 264; Browne v Dunn (1893) 6 R 67).

23. Similarly, where the defence clearly, but unsuccessfully, challenges the witness on what the witness said or did, it may not be necessary to go on to put to the witness a possible motivation for the conduct which the witness has denied. Such a situation would not involve a failure to put instructions, or a matter about which a defence witness might give evidence, but merely a failure to put the defence case theory (see Dedeoglu v The Queen [2023] NSWCCA 126, [231]–[234], [266]).

24. By contrast, if a positive case is to be subsequently advanced, the essential elements of the eventual case must be put to any witness who may cast doubt on them (R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526; R v Foley [2000] 1 Qd R 290).

25. Witnesses must be given the opportunity to respond not only to any allegation which is to be made, but to its essential features – which may include the time, place and circumstances of the alleged occurrence (R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526).

26. Where defence counsel intends to adduce evidence of specific matters contrary to the witness' evidence, he or she must put those matters in such a way that the witness has an adequate opportunity to respond (R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526).

27. In determining whether the rule has been breached, the judge should not solely focus on what questions were or were not asked. It is necessary to examine whether, in the subsequent conduct of the defence, facts or propositions were advanced that had not been "fully or fairly" put to the relevant witnesses (KC v R (2011) 32 VR 61).

28. It will often be a matter of impression and interpretation as to whether the cross-examination sufficiently conveys the substance of the contrary evidence (R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526).

Prosecution Obligations

29. Little guidance has been given about the extent of the obligations the rule in Browne v Dunn places on the prosecution.

30. In Victoria and New South Wales, it was thought that the prosecutor was under an obligation to cross-examine an accused who gives evidence about the reasons for any failure by the defence to comply with the rule before the prosecutor could make any later argument about defence breach of the rule (see R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135; R v Scott [2004] NSWCCA 254).

31. The High Court has now disapproved this practice. Cross-examining the accused about the defence failure to comply with Browne v Dunn often extends to a suggestion that the failure occurred because the accused did not instruct counsel about the relevant matter, which occurred because the accused invented that matter while giving evidence. Where there are a number of possible explanations for the defence failure to put a matter to a prosecution witness, there is no proper basis for impugning the credit of the accused through such a suggestion of recent invention. Cross-examining the accused about the failure is also likely to involve impermissible questions which seek to expose the accused's instructions to counsel (Hofer v The Queen (2021) 395 ALR 1, [31]–[37]).

32. The prosecution should not put forward in its closing address novel factual theories drawn from the evidence of other witnesses which were not included in its opening unless it has cross-examined the accused about those novel theories. This is necessary to ensure procedural fairness to the accused (Astbury v The Queen [2020] VSCA 132, [71]–[77]).

33. However, the prosecution does not need to cross-examine the accused about a matter mentioned in a contested confession, which the prosecution relies upon to say that the confession was true (R v Arnott (2009) 26 VR 490).

34. It is likely that the prosecution must also comply with the other obligations outlined in "Defence Obligations" above. However, care must be taken when adapting those obligations to the prosecutorial context. In particular, judges should consider the accusatorial nature of criminal trials, the obligation on the prosecution to present its case and the burden of proof. In light of such matters, judges may more readily find that the prosecution has breached the rule in Browne v Dunn.

Prosecution failure to cross-examine unfavourable witnesses

35. Evidence Act 2008 gives the prosecution the right to seek leave to cross-examine a witness who gives unfavourable evidence. As explained in 4.20 Unfavourable Witnesses, the threshold for evidence being relevantly unfavourable is low (see R v McRae [2010] VSC 114).

36. The prosecution also has an obligation, as a matter of fairness, not to attack the credit of a witness it called without putting the basis of that attack to the witness (Smith v The Queen [2018] VSCA 139, [76]; Saddik v The Queen [2018] VSCA 249, [95]–[102]; Ritchie v The Queen [2019] VSCA 202, [66]–[67]; Meer v The Queen [2022] VSCA 164, [106]–[110]).

37. Finally, on an appeal against conviction alleging verdicts are unreasonable or cannot be supported having regard to the evidence, appellate courts have noted that where a prosecution witness gives unchallenged exculpatory evidence, it is not open to the jury to ignore or reject that evidence (see Ferguson v The Queen [2020] VSCA 166, [80]; Pell v The Queen [2020] HCA 12; Spurritt v The Queen [2021] VSCA 7, [98]).

38. A prosecution failure to challenge exculpatory evidence from its own witnesses can therefore have significant implications for the conduct of the prosecution case and the jury's decision making process.

39. The principles which oblige the prosecution to cross-examine its own witnesses must be applied with caution when dealing with vulnerable witnesses. In such cases, a prosecutor may make a proper forensic decision not to cross-examine or re-examine a vulnerable complainant about inconsistencies or omissions in the complainant's evidence, if satisfied that the process would be unlikely to provide any meaningful clarification (see Duesbury v The Queen [2022] VSCA 117, [82]–[88]).

Remedies for Breaching the Rule

40. Where counsel does not comply with the rule in Browne v Dunn, the trial judge has a discretion about how to best remedy the unfairness so that the trial does not miscarry (Archer v Richard Crookes Construction Pty Ltd NSW CA 22/10/97; Heaton v Luczka [1998] NSWCA 104; Scalise v Bezzina [2003] NSWCA 362).

41. What is necessary in any given case to ensure fairness will depend on the circumstances (R v Ferguson (2009) 24 VR 531; R v Commonwealth Conciliation and Arbitration Commission; Ex parte Angliss Group (1969) 122 CLR 546).

42. The rule in Browne v Dunn must be applied with considerable care and circumspection due to the accusatorial nature of criminal trials. The rule does not apply in the same way or with the same consequences as it does in civil proceedings (R v Coswello [2009] VSCA 300; R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526; MWJ v R (2005) 222 ALR 436; R v Demiri [2006] VSCA 64; R v Birks (1990) 19 NSWLR 677).

43. In determining what remedy is appropriate, the judge should consider whether it was the prosecution or the defence who breached the rule, and the obligations placed upon each party.

44. Great care must be taken where it is the prosecution which has suffered the unfairness. The trial judge must avoid adopting a remedy for unfairness to the prosecution which might itself work unfairness against the accused (R v Ferguson (2009) 24 VR 531).

Take Steps to Avoid the Need for Jury Directions

45. Where possible, steps should be taken in the running of the case to avoid having to direct the jury about the breach of the rule (R v Coswello [2009] VSCA 300; R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526; R v Foley [2000] 1 Qd R 290).

46. For example, depending on the nature of the case, the trial judge may be able to avoid the need to give a Browne v Dunn direction by:

    - Drawing the attention of counsel to the need to put matters to the witness during the course of cross-examination (R v Ferguson (2009) 24 VR 531; R v Coswello [2009] VSCA 300);
    - Permitting a witness to be recalled so that the relevant matters may be put to him or her (MWJ v R (2005) 222 ALR 436; R v Ferguson (2009) 24 VR 531; R v Coswello [2009] VSCA 300; R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135; R v MG [2006] VSCA 264). Leave to recall a witness may be given under Evidence Act 2008 s 46.
    - Allowing a party to reopen its case[130] to lead evidence to rebut the contradictory evidence or corroborate the relevant witness's evidence.[131]

Excluding Evidence and Preventing Arguments

47. The judge may refuse to admit evidence in breach of the rule in Browne v Dunn if its probative value is outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice (Evidence Act 2008 ss 135, 137. See also R v McCormack (No.3) [2003] NSWSC 645; R v Schneidas (No 2) [1981] 2 NSWLR 713; R v Body NSW CCA 24/8/94).

48. However, a judge is not entitled, by reason of defence non-compliance with the rule in Browne v Dunn, to withdraw an issue of fact from the jury, nor to treat an ingredient of the charge as proved (R v Rajakaruna (No 2) (2006) 15 VR 592; R v Costi (1987) 48 SASR 269).

49. In a criminal proceeding that relates (wholly or partly) to a charge for a sexual offence or a family violence offence, an unrepresented accused must not adduce evidence in relation to a fact in issue in order to contradict the evidence of a protected witness,[132] unless the evidence on which the accused intends to rely has been put to the protected witness during cross-examination (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 357).

[130] Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 233 allows the prosecution to reopen its case with leave of the trial judge when the accused gives evidence that could not reasonably have been foreseen by the prosecution, based on the defence response to the summary of the prosecution opening, and the defence response to the notice of pre-trial admissions.

[131] This remedy may not be appropriate if it would breach the prosecution's obligation not to split its case (R v MG [2006] VSCA 264; R v Chin (1985) 157 CLR 671; Killick v R (1981) 147 CLR 565).

[132] The following people are "protected witnesses": the complainant; a family member of the complainant; a family member of the accused; and any other witness who the court declares under s 355 to be a protected witness (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 354).

50. In some cases, it may follow from the conduct of the trial that it is not fairly open to counsel to make a particular suggestion in their closing address (R v Foley [2000] 1 Qd R 290; R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135). This remedy may be more appropriate for prosecution breaches of the rule than defence breaches.

When to Give a Jury Direction

51. While steps should be taken to avoid having to direct the jury about the breach of the rule in Browne v Dunn (see above), in some cases a direction may be appropriate (R v Coswello [2009] VSCA 300; R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526).

52. The need for a direction depends on whether a direction is sought and whether, despite the absence of any request, there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving the direction despite the absence of a request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 12, 14, 15, 16). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

53. Even if a direction is sought, great care should be taken when deciding whether to give a Browne v Dunn direction, as giving a direction when it is not warranted may cause a substantial miscarriage of justice (R v MG [2006] VSCA 264. See also R v Smart [2010] VSCA 33; KC v R (2011) 32 VR 61).

54. Prior to giving a Browne v Dunn direction, the judge should alert counsel to the failure to sufficiently put the matter to the witness, and provide an opportunity for recalling and cross-examining that witness. A direction should only be given if:

    - The party who called the witness refuses to recall them;
    - The party who failed to properly cross-examine the witness refuses the opportunity of further cross-examination; or
    - The circumstances render the possibility of further cross-examination impracticable (R v Coswello [2009] VSCA 300 (Nettle JA). See also R v MG [2006] VSCA 264).

55. Where there is a strong possibility that counsel's case was invented after the witness gave evidence, recalling the witness may not fully address the problem. In such cases, the judge may comment on the failure to comply with the rule, even though the witness has been recalled and properly cross-examined (R v Novak [2003] VSCA 46).

56. In deciding whether or not to give a direction, the judge should consider whether the failure was material in the context of the case (R v McDowell [1997] 1 VR 473; R v MG [2006] VSCA 264).

57. The judge should also consider the accusatorial nature of criminal trials, and the different obligations placed upon the prosecution and the defence. A direction may be given more readily where it is the prosecution that has breached the rule.

58. The judge should also take into account the extent of the breach. Where it is relatively minor, a direction should generally not be given (KC v R (2011) 32 VR 61).

59. The judge will usually have good reasons for not giving a direction on a party's failure to comply with the rule where:

    - The breach was due to a party's inability to cross-examine its own witness, as it was refused leave under Evidence Act 2008 s 38; or

- The party made it clear to the court that they wanted to cross-examine the witness, but were effectively prevented from doing so by the other party (Bugeja v R (2010) 30 VR 493);[133] or
- The disadvantaged party did not offer or seek to recall the witness (in order to correct the problem) (MWJ v R (2005) 222 ALR 436; R v MG [2006] VSCA 264).

Unrepresented Accused

60. As the rule in Browne v Dunn is a rule of professional practice and procedure, it may not be appropriate to give a direction if the accused is unrepresented (R v Birks (1990) 19 NSWLR 677; c.f. McInnis v R (1979) 143 CLR 575).

61. If a judge is going to make a comment about an unrepresented accused's breach of the rule in Browne v Dunn, fairness demands that he or she should first advise the accused of the existence of that rule and of the options available. If the judge fails to do so, he or she should not comment on the breach (R v Zorad (1990) 19 NSWLR 91).

Discharging the Jury

62. If nothing can be done to prevent a miscarriage of justice arising from the breach the jury may need to be discharged (see, e.g. R v SWC (2007) 175 A Crim R 71).

Content of the Direction

63. The charge given in relation to a breach of the rule in Browne v Dunn is properly seen as a "direction" rather than a "comment". The judge is instructing the jury that, as a matter of law, they may use counsel's failure to cross-examine a witness in a particular manner (R v McDowell [1997] 1 VR 473).

64. This section addresses the following directions in turn:
    - Defence breaches of the rule in Browne v Dunn;
    - Prosecution breaches of the rule in Browne v Dunn;
    - Other directions that may be required instead of a standard Browne v Dunn direction.

Defence Breaches of the Rule in Browne v Dunn

Overview of Directions

65. In most cases where a direction is necessary (see above), the judge should only direct the jury that the breach can be taken into account when assessing the weight of the contradictory evidence or the inferences that flow from that evidence (R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526; R v Coswello [2009] VSCA 300; KC v R (2011) 32 VR 61).

[133] E.g. In Bugeja v R (2010) 30 VR 493, the prosecution advised defence counsel that if they cross-examined a certain witness about a particular matter, they would re-examine that witness in such a way that one of the co-accused's prior convictions would be revealed to the jury. While defence counsel could theoretically have proceeded with the desired cross-examination, that would have been highly prejudicial to the accused's defence. It was thus seen as understandable that defence counsel would choose not to do so, and unfair of the prosecution to rely on the rule in Browne v Dunn in such circumstances.

66. Only in exceptional cases should the judge consider directing the jury that an adverse inference as to credibility may be drawn against the accused due to the breach. This will generally not be appropriate (R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526; Hofer v The Queen (2021) 395 ALR 1).

67. Where a Browne v Dunn direction is given, the judge should usually explain that there may be good reasons why a party failed to comply with the rule (R v MG [2006] VSCA 264; R v Manunta (1989) 54 SASR 17; R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135).

68. Each of these directions is discussed in more detail below.

Using the Breach to Assess Weight

69. Where defence counsel fails to comply with the rule in Browne v Dunn, the judge may direct the jury about the effect that failure may have on their assessment of the contradictory evidence (R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526; R v Coswello [2009] VSCA 300).

70. Where such a direction is required, the judge should:

- Outline the rule in Browne v Dunn and its purpose;
- Tell the jury that, under the rule, the witness should have been challenged about the relevant matters, so that he or she had an opportunity to deal with the challenge;
- Tell the jury that the witness was not challenged, and thus was denied the opportunity to respond to the challenge; and
- Tell the jury that they have therefore been deprived of the opportunity of hearing his or her evidence in response (R v Coswello [2009] VSCA 300 (Nettle JA); R v Foley [2000] 1 Qd R 290. See also R v Birks (1990) 19 NSWLR 677; R v Manunta (1989) 54 SASR 17; R v Senese [2004] VSCA 136; R v MG [2006] VSCA 264; R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135).

71. The judge may also tell the jury that the failure by defence counsel to put these matters to the witness can be taken into account when assessing the weight to be given to the allegation of fact that was not pursued with the relevant witness, or the arguments which rest upon that fact (R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526. See also R v Nicholas (2000) 1 VR 356; R v Rajakaruna (No 2) (2006) 15 VR 592).

72. Failure to comply with the rule in Browne v Dunn does not prove that the imputations against the witness are false. It only affects the weight the jury may attach to those imputations (R v Laz [1998] 1 VR 453; Bulstrode v Trimble [1970] VR 840).

73. Great care must be taken when directing the jury about any unfairness suffered by the prosecution. In such cases it may not be appropriate to comment strongly upon the failure to comply with the rule (see, e.g. R v Ferguson (2009) 24 VR 531).

74. These directions only concern the jury's assessment of the weight of the evidence. Failure to put matters to a witness cannot constitute supporting evidence or consciousness of guilt (See, e.g. R v MG [2006] VSCA 264).

Using the Breach to Draw Adverse Inferences

75. Directions about the possibility of adverse inferences have recently been given too readily in criminal trials. The rule in Browne v Dunn does not apply to criminal proceedings in the same way, or with the same consequences, as it does in civil proceedings. Consequently, its application requires considerable care and circumspection (R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526 (Nettle JA); KC v R (2011) 32 VR 61).

76. However, in exceptional cases the judge may direct the jury that an adverse inference as to credibility may be drawn against the accused due to the breach (R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526).

77. The circumstances in which such a direction will be necessary are rare. It is one thing to remark upon the fact that a witness or a party appears to have been treated unfairly, but it is another thing altogether to comment that the evidence of a person should be disbelieved, perhaps as a recent invention, because it raises matters that were not put in cross-examination to other witnesses by that person's counsel (R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526; R v Foley [2000] 1 Qd R 290; R v Birks (1990) 19 NSWLR 677).

78. An adverse inference as to credibility can only arise where the circumstances surrounding the failure to put the allegation to the witness raise a "prominent hypothesis" that the contradictory evidence is a recent invention or is otherwise a fabrication (R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526).

79. In such cases, the jury may be directed that they may infer from the failure to cross-examine the witness that any evidence which conflicts with that given by the impugned witness was invented after he or she gave evidence, and should not be believed (R v Birks (1990) 19 NSWLR 677; R v Novak [2003] VSCA 46; R v Manunta (1989) 54 SASR 17; R v Senese [2004] VSCA 136; R v MG [2006] VSCA 264; R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135).

80. The process of reasoning suggested by this direction is dangerous and should only be used with caution (R v Manunta (1989) 54 SASR 17; R v Laz [1998] 1 VR 453; R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135; R v Birks (1990) 19 NSWLR 677; R v Demiri [2006] VSCA 64). It will often be appropriate to direct the jury to proceed with care.

81. An adverse inference direction is unlikely to be appropriate where the prosecution has not cross-examined the accused to suggest that the breach of the rule in Browne v Dunn demonstrates that his or her evidence was a recent invention, and has not argued to that effect in closing arguments (see, e.g. R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526; R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135).

82. The judge must not direct the jury on the possibility of recent invention if there is evidence which excludes this possibility. Such evidence may arise from the record of interview (R v Baran [2007] VSCA 66; KC v R (2011) 32 VR 61).

83. It is open to a party to give or call evidence to negate the inference of recent invention. For example:

    - When being cross-examined, the accused can provide reasons for counsel's failure to cross-examine the relevant witness (see "Reasons for Failure to Comply with the Rule" below);
    - The accused's solicitor may be called to give evidence that his or her instructions had always been the same (see, e.g. Oldfield v R (2006) 163 A Crim R 242);
    - Counsel may tender evidence of a prior statement made by the accused presenting the same account as was presented in court (see, e.g. R v Foley [2000] 1 Qd R 290 and Evidence Act 2008 s 108).

Reasons for Failure to Comply With the Rule

84. Where a Browne v Dunn direction is given, the judge should usually:

    - Explain to the jury that there may be good reasons why defence counsel failed to comply with the rule in Browne v Dunn; and
    - Provide relevant examples of possible reasons for counsel's failure in the circumstances of the case (see, e.g. R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526; R v MG [2006] VSCA 264; R v Manunta (1989) 54 SASR 17; R v Birks (1990) 19 NSWLR 677; Oldfield v R (2006) 163 A Crim R 242; R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135).

85. The directions may also need to reject any improper submissions from a party about the reasons for the failure. In particular, the judge may need to warn the jury about any assumptions which underlie the improper submissions and direct the jury whether any adverse inferences are available (Hofer v The Queen (2021) 395 ALR 1, [37]).

86. For example, where the prosecution invites the jury to infer that the accused's evidence is a recent invention, the judge will first need to decide whether such a conclusion is open. If it is, then the judge will need to instruct the jury that it can only draw this inference if it is satisfied that there is no other reasonable explanation for the omission (R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526; R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135; R v MG [2006] VSCA 264; R v Manunta (1989) 54 SASR 17; R v Birks (1990) 19 NSWLR 677; R v McLachlan [1999] 2 VR 553; Oldfield v R (2006) 163 A Crim R 242).

87. The jury must be given sufficient directions to enable them to assess all other possible explanations (R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526).

88. This may require the judge to explain the course that trials may take, and the wide discretion available to counsel in their conduct (R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526; R v Foley [2000] 1 Qd R 290).

89. The judge may need to explain to the jury that counsel is not simply a "mouthpiece" for the client, conducting the case in close conformity with the client's directions (R v Manunta (1989) 54 SASR 17; R v Coswello [2009] VSCA 300).

90. Possible reasons for failing to comply with the rule in Browne v Dunn include:

    - Counsel may have considered the evidence unimportant in the context of the case;
    - Counsel may have overlooked the matter during cross-examination;
    - Counsel may have misunderstood his or her instructions;
    - The witness may not have been co-operative in providing a statement;
    - Forensic pressures may have resulted in looseness or inexactitude in the framing of questions;
    - The other evidence given by the witness may have made it clear that he or she would deny the challenge;
    - The witness' evidence may have been so fanciful that there was no need for any cross-examination (R v MG [2006] VSCA 264; R v Manunta (1989) 54 SASR 17; R v Birks (1990) 19 NSWLR 677; R v McLachlan [1999] 2 VR 553; R v Laz [1998] 1 VR 453; R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135; R v Foley [2000] 1 Qd R 290).

91. The judge must limit the reasons he or she provides to the jury to those that are realistic in the context of the trial (R v SWC [2007] VSCA 201).

92. The judge only needs to include reasons that the jury may otherwise overlook. This will depend on the issues in the context of the trial (R v Manunta (1989) 54 SASR 17; R v Birks (1990) 19 NSWLR 677; R v ZW [2006] VSCA 256).

93. Any explanations raised by defence counsel about why he or she failed to comply with the rule should be told to the jury (R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526).

94. It may not be appropriate to provide a possible explanation for counsel's failure to fully cross-examine a witness where the effect of doing so would be to emphasise the significance of counsel's omission, rather than to explain it (R v SWC [2007] VSCA 201; R v Smart [2010] VSCA 33).

95. Where it is clear that there is a good forensic reason for the party's failure to cross-examine the witness,[134] a Browne v Dunn direction should not be given. To give a direction in such circumstances would be to invite the jury to come to a conclusion about a matter based on a premise that everyone, apart from the jury, understands to be false (Bugeja v R (2010) 30 VR 493).

Prosecution Breaches of the Rule

96. Where the prosecution has breached the rule by failing to cross-examine a defence witness (including the accused), a direction should inform the jury of the prosecutor's failure to raise the matters in question with the witness and that the jury can take that into account in considering the weight they give to the prosecutor's arguments about that witness' evidence (Cavanagh and Rekhviashvili v R [2016] VSCA 305, [103]; Smith v R [2012] VSCA 187, [53]).

[134] E.g. Where the prosecution has made it clear that one of the co-accused's prior convictions will be revealed to the jury if defence counsel cross-examines the witness (Bugeja v R (2010) 30 VR 493).

97. In some cases, it may be appropriate to also inform the jury of answers the witness might have given, which would blunt a line of argument advanced by the prosecution, as a way of showing why the failure may be relevant to assessing the prosecutor's arguments (see, e.g. R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135, [68], [123]).

98. Directions on the prosecution breach may not, however, be necessary if the prosecution acknowledges the breach to the jury and withdraws any arguments which should not have been made due to the breach (see Cavanagh and Rekhviashvili v R [2016] VSCA 305, [103]).

99. In one of the few cases to specifically address this issue, it was held that where the prosecution has breached the rule by failing to cross-examine one of its own witnesses:

    - It would ordinarily be appropriate to tell the jury that the defence had been denied the opportunity to support that witness's evidence (either in cross-examination or by calling independent evidence); and
    - In some cases it may be appropriate to direct the jury to ignore the prosecution's suggestion that the witness's evidence be rejected. This will depend on factors such as whether other contradictory evidence has been given, and the circumstances of the breach (Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109).

100. Since Kanaan was decided, a body of authority has developed on the unfairness of the prosecution attacking the credit of its own witness without having sought to cross-examine that witness, and the significance of unchallenged exculpatory evidence when deciding whether a conviction is unreasonable or cannot be supported having regard to the evidence (see Prosecution failure to cross-examine unfavourable witnesses, above). In an appropriate case, it may be open to a trial judge to:

    - Note that the prosecution has not challenged a witness' exculpatory evidence;
    - Remind the jury that the prosecution bears the onus of proof; and
    - Direct the jury that, given the witness' exculpatory evidence is unchallenged, it would not be open to ignore or disregard that evidence.

101. It will generally not be appropriate to tell the jury that they may draw an adverse inference against the prosecution due to breaching the rule in Browne v Dunn, as prosecution breaches are unlikely to provide an opportunity for recent invention (see "Using the Breach to Draw Adverse Inferences" above). However, in some cases it may be appropriate to tell the jury that, due to the breach, they may more readily reject certain inferences sought by the prosecution.

102. While in some cases it may be appropriate to direct the jury that there may be good reasons why the prosecution failed to comply with the rule in Browne v Dunn (see "Reasons for Failure to Comply With the Rule" above), judges should be careful when doing so. Such a direction risks undermining the obligations placed on the prosecution to present all relevant material to the jury. In addition, the reasons why the prosecution failed to comply with the rule may not be relevant to the jury's consideration of the consequences of the breach.

Other Directions

103. In some circumstances, the judge may need to give one or more of the following directions instead of a standard Browne v Dunn direction:

    - That the breach reflects only on defence counsel (R v Foley [2000] 1 Qd R 290; R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526);
    - That because of the breach, it was not open to counsel to advance a particular submission (R v Ferguson (2009) 24 VR 531); or
    - That the jury must not make an adverse finding against the accused as a result of a suggested failure to challenge a witness (R v Coswello [2009] VSCA 300; Bellemore v Tasmania (2006) 16 Tas R 364).

104. These directions are addressed in turn below.

Breach Solely Reflects on Counsel

105. Where it is clear that the omission reflects only on the accused's counsel (or solicitor), and not on the accused him or herself, instead of giving a standard Browne v Dunn direction, the jury should be told that:

- The witness or the prosecution's case has been potentially disadvantaged by the omission; and
- This was not the fault of the accused but rather of counsel (or the solicitor) (R v Foley [2000] 1 Qd R 290; R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526 (Nettle JA)).

106. A direction of this nature should not be given where it is clear that the omission reflects only on the prosecution. Incompetence by the prosecution will not excuse a breach of the rule in Browne v Dunn. In such cases, the judge should continue to give a standard Browne v Dunn direction (see above).

Counsel Was Prevented From Advancing a Submission

107. Where, due to a breach of the rule in Browne v Dunn, it was not open to counsel to advance a particular submission in the course of his or her final address, a judge may need to direct the jury of that fact in strong terms (R v Ferguson (2009) 24 VR 531).

108. In directing the jury about this matter, the judge must be careful not to withdraw any issues of fact where the prosecution carries the burden of proof from the jury (see R v Ferguson (2009) 24 VR 531).

109. An alternative solution to preventing an argument is to warn the jury in strong terms of the danger of adopting or accepting that argument, given the party's failure to cross-examine relevant witnesses (CMG v R (2013) 46 VR 728).

Warning Against Improper Browne v Dunn Reasoning

110. In some cases the prosecution may improperly suggest that the defence has breached the rule in Browne v Dunn. For example, in cases where defence counsel has no obligation to put a matter to a particular witness, the prosecution may nevertheless cross-examine the accused about counsel's failure to do so, or argue that the jury should draw an adverse inference from that failure (see, e.g. R v Coswello [2009] VSCA 300; Bellemore v Tasmania (2006) 16 Tas R 364; Bugeja v R (2010) 30 VR 493).

111. In such circumstances, the judge must:

- Direct the jury that defence counsel was not obliged to put that matter to the witness; and
- Warn the jury not to make an adverse finding against the accused as a result of the suggested failure to challenge that witness (R v Coswello [2009] VSCA 300; Bellemore v Tasmania (2006) 16 Tas R 364; Bugeja v R (2010) 30 VR 493).

112. At common law, it was mandatory for the judge to give these directions. Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, defence counsel may request these directions, or the judge may consider that there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving the directions in the absence of a request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 15, 16).

113. In addition, the judge should warn the jury not to take the breach into account when assessing the weight of the contradictory evidence.

Role of the Jury

114. A Browne v Dunn direction generally only describes a permissible mode of reasoning. Where the direction concerns a defence breach, the jury is free to disregard the inferences that are open from the failure to properly cross-examine a relevant witness (R v Nicholas (2000) 1 VR 356; Bulstrode v Trimble [1970] VR 840; MWJ v R (2005) 222 ALR 436; R v Rajakaruna (No 2) (2006) 15 VR 592; Bugeja v R (2010) 30 VR 493). A prosecution breach may, however, require a direction about how certain modes of reasoning or findings are not open.

115. A judge should only give a Browne v Dunn direction if he or she is satisfied that a breach has, or has arguably occurred, and that it cannot be remedied by a different means (see e.g. R v Ferguson (2009) 24 VR 531; R v Morrow (2009) 26 VR 526). For more information see Remedies for Breaching the Rule and When to Give A Direction above.

116. If it is open to argue that defence counsel has not complied with the rule in Browne v Dunn, it is for the jury to determine whether the witness was given a fair opportunity to address the assertion being made by the cross examining party (R v Nicholas (2000) 1 VR 356; Beattie v Ball [1999] 3 VR 1; R v Manunta (1989) 54 SASR 17; R v Ferguson (2009) 24 VR 531).

117. When determining whether or not the rule has been breached, the tribunal must consider whether the differences between the witness's evidence and the other party's case were sufficiently material that the witness should have been challenged in cross-examination (R v Nicholas (2000) 1 VR 356; Beattie v Ball [1999] 3 VR 1; R v Manunta (1989) 54 SASR 17).

Explaining Exchanges with Counsel

118. Where counsel has asked the judge during cross-examination if he or she has complied with the rule in Browne v Dunn, the judge may explain this exchange to the jury (R v Demiri [2006] VSCA 64).

119. The judge should describe the obligation to put certain matters to a witness as a "rule of professional practice" rather than an "ethical obligation", as the latter may suggest that counsel is merely "going through the motions", and does not think that the matters he or she is putting to the witness are true (R v Demiri [2006] VSCA 64).

Do Not Comment on Other Unchallenged Evidence

120. Unless the rule in Browne v Dunn applies, judges should be careful about commenting on the fact that certain inculpatory evidence was unchallenged or uncontradicted. Such a comment may unfairly imply that it was open to defence counsel to have challenged or contradicted the evidence, when in many cases (e.g. in relation to complaint evidence) they will not have had scope to do so (Jiang v R [2010] NSWCCA 277).

4.11.1 Charge: Breach of the Rule in Browne v Dunn

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge may be used where:

i) Defence counsel has breached the rule in Browne v Dunn; and

ii) That breach cannot be remedied by means other than giving a direction; and

iii) The judge determines that a direction is necessary in the circumstances of the case. See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required

The charge may be modified for use in cases where the prosecution has breached the rule in Browne v Dunn. However, care should be taken when doing so. The judge should bear in mind the accusatorial nature of criminal trials, the obligation on the prosecution to present its whole case and the burden of proof. See 4.11 Failure to Challenge Evidence (Browne v Dunn) for guidance.

The Rule in Browne v Dunn

I now need to direct you about a rule of practice concerning the cross-examination of witnesses.

This rule says that whenever a prosecution witness gives evidence, defence counsel must cross-examine him or her about any matters that are relevant to the defence case, and must put any allegations that s/he intends to make against that witness directly to him or her.

This is a rule of fairness, which allows witnesses to confront any proposed challenges to their evidence, and enables you to see and assess the reaction of the witnesses to those challenges.

Using the Breach to Assess Weight

[If the fact that the rule was broken is not a jury issue, add the following shaded section.]

Defence counsel broke this rule by not challenging NOW about [describe relevant matter and/or allegation]. As a result, NOW was denied the opportunity to respond to that challenge, and you were deprived of the opportunity of hearing his/her evidence in response.

You may take this fact into account when assessing the weight you give to [describe relevant matter, allegation or argument].[135]

[If the allegation that the rule was broken is a jury issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution alleged that defence counsel broke this rule by not challenging NOW about [describe relevant matter and/or allegation]. They argued that NOW was therefore denied the opportunity to respond to that challenge, and you were deprived of the opportunity of hearing his/her evidence in response.

The defence denied breaking the rule, arguing that [describe defence argument, e.g. "they had put the matter to NOW in sufficient detail"].

It is for you to determine whether NOW was given a fair opportunity to address this matter. In making this determination, you should consider how significant the matter is, and whether counsel should have cross-examined NOW about it. [Insert any other information necessary for the jury to determine whether the rule was breached.]

If you find that defence counsel should have cross-examined NOW about [describe matter], you may take his/her failure to do so into account when assessing the weight you give to [describe relevant matter, allegation or argument].[136]

However, you should also consider the fact that there may be a good reason why defence counsel did not challenge NOW about this matter. For example, [describe possible reasons for counsel's failure to comply with the rule].[137]

Using the Breach to Infer Recent Invention

[If the circumstances of the breach give rise to the prominent hypothesis that the contradictory evidence is a fabrication, consideration may be given to adding the following shaded section.]

---

[135] In some cases, it may be appropriate to delete this paragraph.

[136] In some cases, it may be appropriate to delete this paragraph.

[137] Judges should only include reasons that are realistic in the context of the trial, and that the jury may otherwise overlook. A reason should not be provided if it would emphasise the significance of counsel's omission, rather than explain it. Examples of possible reasons are provided in 4.11 Failure to Challenge Evidence (Browne v Dunn).

Warning: This part of the charge should only be given in exceptional circumstances. See 4.11 Failure to Challenge Evidence (Browne v Dunn) for guidance.

You may also infer from defence counsel's failure to cross-examine NOW about [describe matter], that any evidence which conflicts with NOW's evidence about that matter was invented after NOW gave his/her evidence, and should not be believed. This would include [summarise relevant defence evidence].

This does not mean that you must disbelieve the defence evidence on this issue. I am simply describing an inference that you are permitted to draw. It is for you to determine whether or not to draw that inference.

You must be very cautious about drawing this inference. You will recall what I previously told you about drawing inferences.[138] In this context, that means that before inferring that NOA invented his/her account after NOW gave evidence, you must decide that there is no other reasonable explanation for defence counsel's failure to cross-examine NOW about [describe matter]. If you think that it is possible that there was another reason for defence counsel's failure to cross-examine NOW about that matter, you may not draw this inference.

4.11.2 Charge: Warning against Improper Browne v Dunn Reasoning

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge may be used where the prosecution has improperly suggested that the rule in Browne v Dunn has been breached.

See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

In this case the prosecution [describe relevant action, e.g. "cross-examined NOA about why defence counsel failed to ask NOW about..." or"suggested that defence counsel should have asked NOW about..."].

This was not an appropriate argument for the prosecution to make, as defence counsel was not obliged to ask NOW about this matter.

You must therefore disregard the prosecution's arguments on this point. You must not make any unfavourable findings against NOA as a result of defence counsel's suggested failure to challenge NOW about that matter, or take the fact that s/he failed to do so into account when assessing the evidence in this case.

4.12 Identification Evidence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Identification evidence is seen to be inherently fragile. In Alexander v R (1981) 145 CLR 395 at 426, Mason J stated that:

[138] This section of the charge assumes that the jury has been previously instructed about inferences. If this is not the case, the charge should be modified accordingly.

> Identification is notoriously uncertain. It depends upon so many variables. They include the difficulty one has in recognizing on a subsequent occasion a person observed, perhaps fleetingly, on a former occasion; the extent of the opportunity for observation in a variety of circumstances; the vagaries of human perception and recollection; and the tendency of the mind to respond to suggestions, notably the tendency to substitute a photographic image once seen for a hazy recollection of the person initially observed.

2. Despite this fragility, identification evidence is seen to be particularly seductive, especially as it is often given by witnesses who appear honest and convincing. Judicial experience has shown that such witnesses can be mistaken. It is often noted that serious miscarriages of justice have occurred in the past due to juries relying on such evidence (R v Burchielli [1981] VR 611; Domican v R (1992) 173 CLR 555; Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593; see also Jury Directions Act 2015 s 36).
3. As juries may not know of this danger, they may need to be warned about it, to prevent them from giving too much probative value to evidence that may be flawed (R v Burchielli [1981] VR 611; Domican v R (1992) 173 CLR 555; Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593).
4. Jury Directions Act 2015 Part 4, Division 4 prescribes the content of the warning a judge may give in relation to identification evidence.

What is Identification Evidence?

5. For the purposes of jury directions, "identification evidence" is defined in Jury Directions Act 2015 s 35. That definition is broader than the definition which applies under the Evidence Act 2008. It extends to capture the various common law categories of identification evidence, including:
    - positive identification evidence: evidence by a witness identifying a previously unknown person as someone they saw on a prior relevant occasion (see, e.g. Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593; R v Marijancevic (1993) 70 A Crim R 272);[139]
    - recognition evidence: evidence by a witness that, at the time the relevant act was committed, they recognised a person who was present (due to their prior familiarity with that person) (see, e.g. R v Marijancevic (1993) 70 A Crim R 272; R v Lovett [2006] VSCA 5);
    - similarity evidence: evidence asserting that someone's appearance or characteristics (e.g. age, race, stature, colour) are similar to that of a person seen on a prior occasion (see, e.g. R v Clune (No 2) [1996] 1 VR 1; Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593);[140]

[139] Positive identification evidence can be direct or circumstantial. It is direct evidence when it identifies the accused as the person who committed one or more of the acts that constitute the crime in question (e.g. evidence that the accused was seen killing the victim). It is circumstantial evidence when its acceptance provides the grounds for an inference that the accused committed the crime in question (e.g. evidence that the accused was seen leaving the scene of the crime) (Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593).

[140] Similarity evidence is sometimes called "circumstantial identification evidence" (see, e.g. R v Clune (No 2) [1996] 1 VR 1). Care should be taken not to confuse this with positive identification evidence of a circumstantial nature (see above).

- comparison evidence: evidence of a non-expert witness which compares two people or items which do not require particular expertise to compare (e.g. evidence comparing the voice of the accused with a voice on a tape) (see, e.g. Bulejcik v R (1996) 185 CLR 375; R v Theos (1996) 89 A Crim R 486 (Vic CA));[141]
- negative identification evidence: evidence identifying someone other than the accused as the offender, or evidence that the accused is not the offender (see, e.g. R v Pollitt (1990) 51 A Crim R 227).

When to Warn the Jury about Identification Evidence

6. A judge must warn the jury about identification evidence where the prosecution or defence counsel requests such a direction, unless there are good reasons for not doing so. If no request is made by counsel, a judge has a residual obligation to give a warning if he or she considers that there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving the warning (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 12, 16).
7. For more information on the request for direction process or on the residual obligation, see 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015.
8. When requesting a direction on identification evidence, the prosecution or defence must specify the significant matters that may make the evidence unreliable (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 36).

Content of the Charge

9. A direction on identification evidence will be sufficient where it:
    - warns the jury of the need for caution in determining whether to accept the evidence and the weight to be given to it;
    - and informs the jury of the following matters:
        - the significant matters which the trial judge considers may make the evidence unreliable (where a party has requested the direction, the judge should include those matters which the party has identified has significant, unless there are good reasons for not doing so); and
        - that a witness may honestly believe that his or her evidence is accurate when the witness is, in fact, mistaken and that the mistaken evidence of a witness may be convincing; and
        - if relevant, that a number of witnesses may all be mistaken; and
        - if relevant, that mistaken identification evidence has resulted in innocent people being convicted (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 36(3)).
10. While the judge should address these matters in the same part of the charge, the splitting of these directions will not necessarily constitute error (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301).
11. It is common practice for all of these matters to be addressed when the evidence is admitted in the trial, as well as in the judge's summing up (S Odgers, Uniform Evidence Law (8th ed, 2009) [1.4.2880]).
12. Additional directions, which are unrelated to the potential unreliability of identification evidence, may also be required where:

[141] Comparison evidence may be a form of positive identification evidence (if it posits that the items being compared are identical) or similarity evidence (if it simply asserts a resemblance between the items) (see, e.g. Bulejcik v R (1996) 185 CLR 375).

- an identification is made wholly or partly by examining pictures kept for the use of police officers (Evidence Act 2008 s 115); or
- evidence is given that the accused refused to participate in an identification parade (R v Davies (2005) 11 VR 314).

13. This topic first provides a brief outline of the types of evidence which fall within the definition of identification evidence in the Jury Directions Act 2015. This outline informs the remainder of this topic, which addresses the content of the warning and any additional directions that may be required.

14. In some cases, identification evidence may be substantially the only evidence of one or more elements. In such cases, it may be appropriate for the judge to clearly identify for the jury the importance of the evidence. Judges should discuss the issue with counsel and hear submissions on what additional directions or comments are appropriate. Options include:
    - when directing the jury about the element, direct the jury that the identification evidence is the only evidence (or substantially the only evidence) in support of that element and without that evidence, the element cannot be proved beyond reasonable doubt (see 3.6.2 Charge: Sole Evidence Direction);
    - directing the jury that the jury would need to be satisfied of the identification evidence beyond reasonable doubt before acting on it;
    - commenting to the jury that the identification evidence is the only evidence, or the most significant evidence, in proof of the element and they can only be satisfied of the element beyond reasonable doubt if they are satisfied of the identification evidence;
    - refer to the identification evidence and direct the jury that it must be satisfied that the identification evidence proves the relevant element beyond reasonable doubt.

"Identification Evidence" Under the Jury Directions Act 2015

15. Section 35 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 defines "identification evidence" as:

> An assertion by a person, or a report of an assertion by a person, to the effect that–
> (a) he or she recognizes, or does not recognise, a person or object as the person or object that he or she saw, heard or perceived on the relevant occasion; or
> (b) the general appearance or characteristics of a person or object are similar, or are not similar, to the general appearance or characteristics of the person or object that he or she saw, heard or perceived on the relevant occasion-
> and includes-
> (c) visual identification evidence within the meaning of section 114 of the Evidence Act 2008; and
> (d) picture identification evidence within the meaning of section 115 of the Evidence Act 2008.

16. Identification evidence may therefore be given in relation to any person, whether he or she is the accused or not, as well as in relation to objects (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 35; see also R v Bath [1990] Crim LR 716 (CA); R v Kotzmann [1999] 2 VR 123).

17. As the definition of identification evidence in the Jury Directions Act 2015 refers to what the person making the assertion "saw, heard or perceived", it appears to apply to:
    - aural identification (see, e.g. Bulejcik v R (1996) 185 CLR 375; R v Callaghan (2001) 4 VR 79); and
    - identification by touch (see, e.g. AK v The State of Western Australia [2006] WASCA 245), smell or taste (see, e.g. AK v The State of Western Australia (2008) 232 CLR 438 (Heydon J)).

18. The definition adopted by the Jury Directions Act 2015 does not, however, extend to circumstances where a jury makes their own comparison, such as between a photograph or CCTV camera footage and the accused, or between voices which are captured on recordings.

19. It is unclear whether the definition of identification evidence in the Jury Directions Act 2015 covers comparison evidence given by a non-expert witness. Arguably, the definition does cover such evidence, as the section addresses identifications that occur on a "relevant occasion". The term "relevant occasion" is not defined in the Act. Conceivably, a "relevant occasion" could include an occasion on which a witness hears an audio recording of a person's voice. Further, the Explanatory Memorandum to the Jury Directions Bill 2015 contemplates that comparison evidence given by a non-expert witness will constitute identification evidence for the purposes of the Jury Directions Act 2015.

Method of identification

20. The definition of identification evidence adopted in the Jury Directions Act 2015 encompasses identifications made by any method (e.g. identification parade, photo board identification or dock identification). This applies irrespective of whether the identification was conducted in or out of court (R v Taufua NSWCCA 11/11/1996; R v Tahere [1999] NSWCCA 170; R v Thomason (1999) 139 ACTR 21).

21. The definition of identification evidence in the Jury Directions Act 2015 only covers assertions made by people (or reports of such assertions). It does not cover:

    - identifications made by animals (e.g. tracker dogs) (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301);
    - identifications made by computer software (e.g. using facial recognition software) (see, e.g. R v Tang (2006) 65 NSWLR 681).

Types of Identification Evidence

22. The common law recognised several categories of identification evidence. These are described below, as the potential dangers of identification evidence differ between the categories.

Positive Identification Evidence

23. Positive identification evidence is evidence by a witness identifying a previously unknown person as someone he or she saw on a prior relevant occasion. Such evidence may be used as direct or circumstantial proof of an offence (Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593).

24. An example of positive identification evidence is picture identification evidence, as defined under s 115 of the Evidence Act 2008. Such evidence relates to 'an identification made wholly or partly by the person who made the identification examining pictures kept for the use of police officers' i.e. identification of an accused through mug shots or photo boards (see, e.g. R v Carpenter [2011] ACTSC 71, [41]).

Recognition Evidence

25. Recognition evidence is evidence from a witness that he or she recognises a person or object as the person or object that he or she saw, heard or perceived on a relevant occasion.

Similarity Evidence

26. Similarity evidence is evidence that the general appearance or characteristics a person or object perceived is similar to the person or object perceived on a relevant occasion.

Comparison Evidence

27. There are three ways in which comparisons may be made. These are comparisons:
    - by witnesses comparing people or items about which they have greater knowledge than the jury, but which do not require particular expertise to compare;
    - by witnesses comparing items about which they have particular expertise; and
    - by the jury comparing people or items which do not require particular knowledge or expertise to compare.
28. Only the first type of comparison listed above may be considered "identification evidence" for the purposes of the Jury Directions Act 2015. It is clear that jury comparisons do not fall within the ambit of that Act. Such comparisons may, however, require directions at common law.
29. Evidence comparing items about which a witness has particular expertise (e.g. fingerprints) should be treated as "opinion evidence" rather than "comparison evidence".[142]

Negative Identification Evidence

30. The term "negative identification evidence" is generally used to refer to exculpatory evidence in which:
    - someone other than the accused is identified as the offender; or
    - a witness states that the accused is not the offender (R v Pollitt (1990) 51 A Crim R 227; R v Johnson (2004) 89 SASR 294).
31. The term has also been used to refer to evidence that a witness failed to identify the accused from a photo-board or at an identification parade (see, e.g. Beresi v R [2004] WASCA 67).
32. Negative identification evidence may be adduced by the defence, or by a prosecution witness in fulfilling its duty to call all relevant witnesses (R v Rose (2002) 55 NSWLR 701; Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109).
33. This exculpatory evidence falls within the definition of 'identification evidence' under the Jury Directions Act 2015, as section 35 explicitly refers to statements that the witness does not recognise, or that the appearance of a person or object is not similar, to the person or object perceived on a relevant occasion.
34. The fact that negative identification evidence favours the accused does not itself provide a "good reason" for not giving a s 36 warning (Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109).

When to Give an Identification Evidence Warning

35. Part 3 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 governs the circumstances in which a judge may need to warn the jury about the potential unreliability of identification evidence.
36. The overall effect of the scheme (as outlined below) is that a warning must usually be given in relation to identification evidence if the prosecution or defence counsel requests a warning or if the judge considers that there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving the warning despite the absence of a request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 15, 16).
37. See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required under this residual obligation.

[142] See 4.13.1 General Principles of Opinion Evidence.

When is a Warning under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 36 Required?

38. The prosecution or defence counsel may request that the trial judge direct the jury on identification evidence. Such a request must be in accordance with Jury Directions Act 2015 s 12 (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 36(1)).

39. Counsel making such a request must specify the significant matters which may make the evidence unreliable (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 36(2)).

40. Once a party has made such a request, the trial judge must give a direction in respect of identification evidence, unless there are good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 15).

41. Further, a trial judge must give a direction in respect of identification evidence if he or she considers that there are substantial and compelling reasons to do so, despite the absence of a request (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 16).

42. When giving a direction in respect of identification evidence, the trial judge must:

    - warn the jury of the need to exercise caution when determining whether to accept the evidence and the weight to be given to it; and
    - inform the jury of the significant matters that he or she considers may make the evidence unreliable; and
    - inform the jury that:
        - a witness may honestly believe that his or her evidence is accurate when the witness is, in fact, mistaken; and
        - the mistaken evidence of a witness may be convincing; and
    - if relevant, inform the jury that a number of witnesses may all be mistaken; and
    - if relevant, inform the jury that mistaken identification evidence has resulted in innocent people being convicted (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 36(3)).

What is a "Significant" Matter?

43. The Jury Directions Act 2015 does not define what a "significant" matter is for the purposes of directions in respect of identification evidence. The matters which are significant will depend on the facts of the case and may include:

    - the circumstances of the sighting
    - whether the person was known to the witness
    - the time that elapsed between the sighting and the reporting to police
    - any differences between the description of the person and their actual appearance.[143]

44. The party requesting the direction must also specify the significant matters that may make the evidence unreliable. The role of the judge is to determine which of those matters are significant, and then direct the jury accordingly. Unless there are substantial and compelling reasons to do so, a judge does not need to add further matters which he or she considers significant (see Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 15, 16).

[143] Department of Justice, Jury Directions: the Next Step, 2013 p38.

Substantial and Compelling Reasons for a Warning

45. In some cases, there may be substantial and compelling reasons for a judge to give an identification evidence warning even where such a direction is not sought by the parties (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 16).

46. It is suggested that there will be "substantial and compelling" reasons for giving a direction in the following circumstances:

    - the judge considers that the direction is open on the evidence;
    - identification evidence is a matter which the judge considers is in issue in the trial. It is possible, although very unlikely, that a judge may draw such a conclusion even where defence counsel indicates that he or she does not consider it to be in issue (e.g. if defence counsel makes a fundamental error regarding what is or is not in issue and this has not been addressed during discussions with the trial judge);
    - identification evidence is a significant issue in the case. If it is a minor issue or only concerns a small portion of the evidence in the trial, it is unlikely that the reasons for giving an identification evidence direction would be substantial and compelling. On the other hand, if identification evidence is central to the issues in dispute, the direction is more likely to be necessary under the residual obligation; and
    - the reasons for giving the identification direction must substantially outweigh the reasons for not giving the direction. In applying the test, the judge must do more than merely weigh the reasons for giving the direction. He or she must also consider the reasons for not giving the direction.[144]

Factors affecting whether a direction is required

47. The following sections describe common law principles regarding when identification evidence directions are necessary. These principles may provide guidance on when a judge should suggest that counsel request a warning.

Positive Identification Evidence

48. At common law, a warning about positive identification evidence may be necessary where:

    - the evidence represents any significant part of the proof of guilt of an offence; and
    - the reliability of the identification is disputed (Domican v R (1992) 173 CLR 555; R v Burchielli [1981] VR 611; Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593; Dhanhoa v R (2003) 217 CLR 1).

49. A warning may be needed if the issue of identification is "fairly and squarely raised as an issue". This was for a judge to decide, in light of the circumstances of the case (R v MacKay [1985] VR 623; Sindoni v R [2011] VSCA 195).

50. It was unclear whether, at common law, a direction was required if the evidence was not disputed, but the judge considered that there was some evidence which cast doubt on the identification (compare R v Courtnell [1990] Crim LR 115 (CA) and R v Bath [1990] Crim LR 716 (CA).

51. The warning may be necessary in relation to direct and circumstantial positive identification evidence (Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593).

52. If the disputed identification evidence forms a significant part of the proof of guilt, a warning may need to be given even if a conviction could not be based on that evidence alone (e.g. if it is a purely circumstantial evidence, requiring other evidence to support it) (R v Crupi (1995) 86 A Crim R 229).

[144] Department of Justice, Jury Directions: the Next Step, 2013 p12.

53. The need for a warning is not removed by the existence of other evidence on which the accused could be convicted. The judge should assume that the jury may decide to convict solely on the basis of the identification evidence (Domican v R (1992) 173 CLR 555; Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593).

54. Even if there is other important evidence, if the jury could not convict without the identification evidence the judge may need to give a strong warning (R v Clune [1982] VR 1).

55. A warning may be needed even if there is more than one identifying witness, as experience has shown that mistakes can occur where two or more witnesses have made positive identifications (R v Burchielli [1981] VLR 611).

56. Even if the principal or sole defence goes to the credibility of the identifying witness (e.g. if the defence alleges that the identification evidence is fabricated, and the trial is conducted on that basis), it may be necessary to warn the jury about the dangers of identification evidence. This is due to the possibility that the jury will reject the defence argument. In such circumstances, the jury will then need to consider whether the identification evidence is reliable, and so will need to know about the potential dangers inherent in such evidence (Sindoni v R [2011] VSCA 195. But see R v Courtnell [1990] Crim LR 115; Shand v R [1996] 1 WLR 67).

Recognition Evidence

57. At common law, it was not always necessary to direct the jury about the dangers of acting on recognition evidence (see, e.g. R v Wright (No.2) [1968] VR 174; Arthurs v Attorney-General for Northern Ireland (1970) 55 Cr App R 161; R v Marijancevic (1993) 70 A Crim R 272; Peck v Western Australia [2005] WASCA 20; R v Lovett [2006] VSCA 5; R v Spero (2006) 13 VR 225).

58. Although a direction was not always necessary, there were circumstances in which the opportunity of the identifying witness to recognise a suspect was so limited, or the witness's familiarity with a suspect was of such a short duration, that a full Domican direction was required (R v Spero (2006) 13 VR 225. See also R v Boardman [1969] VR 151; R v Turnbull [1977] QB 224; WSJ v R [2010] VSCA 339; Sindoni v R [2011] VSCA 195).

59. Whether a direction is necessary in a particular case will depend on all of the relevant circumstances, including:

    i) the degree of familiarity of the witness with the accused;

    ii) the circumstances in which the accused was previously seen by the witness or known to the witness; and

    iii) the circumstances in which the accused is alleged to have been seen by the witness at or about the time of the crime (R v Carr (2000) 117 A Crim R 272; Smith v The State of Western Australia [2005] WASCA 19; R v Spero (2006) 13 VR 225; R v Defrutos [2008] VSCA 55; WSJ v R [2010] VSCA 339; Sindoni v R [2011] VSCA 195).

60. If the witness is very familiar with the person observed, there was an extended opportunity for observation, and the circumstances of the observation were such that there was little likelihood that the difficulties inherent in the identification process would lead to misrecognition, a direction may not need to be given (see, e.g. R v Carr (2000) 117 A Crim R 272; R v Lovett [2006] VSCA 5; R v Spero (2006) 13 VR 225; WSJ v R [2010] VSCA 339).

Similarity Evidence

61. In R v Benz (1989) 168 CLR 110, Mason CJ and Dawson J held that it is the unreliability of human recollection as a basis for recognition that produces the need for a warning about positive identification evidence. In the case of similarity evidence, there is no such recognition (the witness simply describes characteristics of the offender, or notes resemblances between the accused and the offender, but does not positively identify the accused as the offender), so there is no need for a warning (see also Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593 (McHugh J); R v Marijancevic (1993) 70 A Crim R 272; R v Hassan [2004] VSC 84. But cf. R v Benz (1989) 168 CLR 110 (Deane J); Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593 (Hayne and Kirby JJ)).

62. While there has been some debate about the need for a warning in relation to similarity evidence, the most recent cases in the area follow the judgment of Justice McHugh in Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593, holding that a direction is not always necessary in relation to such evidence (see, e.g. R v Cavkic (No 2) (2009) 28 VR 341; R v Debs [2005] VSCA 66; R v Campbell [2007] VSCA 189. But cf. Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593 (Hayne J); R v Theos (1996) 89 A Crim R 486 (Vic CA)).

63. Although a direction may not always be required, it may be necessary to provide some kind of direction depending on the circumstances (Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593; R v Debs [2005] VSCA 66; R v Campbell [2007] VSCA 189).

64. For example, if a witness claims that the facial features of the accused are similar to those of the offender, it may be appropriate to give a direction (Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593 (McHugh J)).

65. A direction will usually not be necessary where the evidence is of similarity between inanimate objects rather than people (R v Cavkic (No 2) (2009) 28 VR 341).

Comparison Evidence

66. Comparisons can be undertaken in three ways:

    i) by the jury comparing people or items which do not require particular knowledge or expertise to compare;

    ii) by witnesses comparing people or items about which they have greater knowledge than the jury, but which do not require particular expertise to compare; and

    iii) by witnesses comparing items about which they have particular expertise.

67. Only the first two types of comparison listed above are classified as "comparison evidence". Evidence comparing items about which a witness has particular expertise (e.g. fingerprints) should be treated as "opinion evidence" rather than "comparison evidence" (see 4.13.1 General Principles of Opinion Evidence). There is no need to give a direction about the dangers of identification or comparison evidence in such cases (R v Kotzmann [1999] 2 VR 123).

Comparisons Undertaken by the Jury

68. It is not always necessary to direct a jury which has been invited to make a comparison of two people or items about the dangers of making such a comparison (R v Kotzmann [1999] 2 VR 123).

69. As the jury is not required to rely on their memory of a fleeting observation when making such a comparison, a direction about the dangers which arise from weaknesses in human perception and recollection will not be relevant (Nguyen v R (2002) 26 WAR 59).

70. While there may be problems resulting from matters such as a lack of clarity or an inadequate quantity of material for comparison, these difficulties will usually be obvious to juries who are well equipped to make allowances for such matters (R v Kotzmann [1999] 2 VR 123).

71. However, there may be circumstances in which it is necessary to give the jury directions about how to assess the evidence, and about the potential difficulties or dangers in making a comparison. For example, if the jury may too readily conclude that a voice on a tape matches the voice of the accused, due to similar foreign accents, a direction may be required about the risks of making such a misidentification, and the consequent miscarriage of justice that could arise (see, e.g. Bulejcik v R (1996) 185 CLR 375; Nguyen v R (2002) 26 WAR 59).

72. A direction may need to be given if the jury is asked to compare a person seen in a photograph or film taken during the crime with the accused (see, e.g. R v Theos (1996) 89 A Crim R 486 (Vic CA)).

73. If the jury is not asked to perform such a comparison, either explicitly or implicitly, it may not be necessary to give a direction. Mere speculation that they may make such a comparison is not sufficient to require a direction to be given (R v Phong (2005) 12 VR 17; [2005] VSCA 149).

Comparisons Undertaken by Non-Expert Witnesses

74. It is not always necessary to direct the jury about the dangers of a witness's evidence comparing people or items about which they have greater knowledge than the jury, but which do not require particular expertise to compare (e.g. that the gait of a person seen in video footage matches that of a person the witness knows well) (R v Kotzmann [1999] 2 VR 123; Nguyen v R (2002) 26 WAR 59).

75. However, as with comparisons made by the jury, there may be circumstances in which it is necessary to give the jury directions about how to assess the witness's evidence, and about the potential difficulties or dangers in making a comparison (see, e.g. Bulejcik v R (1996) 185 CLR 375; Nguyen v R (2002) 26 WAR 59; R v Theos (1996) 89 A Crim R 486 (Vic CA)).

Directions in Respect of Picture Identification Evidence

76. The directions specified under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 36 do not affect any other statutory obligation to instruct the jury about identification evidence, where the direction does not relate to the unreliability of the evidence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 37).

77. Under Evidence Act 2008 s 115(7), if picture identification evidence adduced by the prosecutor is admitted into evidence, the trial judge must, on the request of the accused:

    - if the picture of the accused was made after the accused was taken into custody in relation to the relevant offence/s – inform the jury that the picture was made after the accused was taken into that custody; or
    - otherwise – warn the jury that it must not assume that the accused has a criminal record or has previously been charged with an offence (Evidence Act 2008 s 115(7)).

No Set Formula for Charge

78. While an identification warning must contain the mandatory matters set out in s 36, the trial judge is not required to adopt any particular form of words when giving the warning (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 6).

79. The charge must be cogent, effective and cover those matters necessary for the particular case. It must be tailored to the circumstances of the case (R v Burchielli [1981] VR 611; Domican v R (1992) 173 CLR 555; Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593; R v Campbell [2007] VSCA 189).

80. The strength of any necessary warning will depend to a large degree upon the extent to which the prosecution case relies on the identification evidence (R v Clune [1982] VR 1).

81. Not every matter needs to be referred to in every case – but the direction needs to be adequate, and must refer to the significant matters identified by the party requesting the warning which may make the evidence unreliable (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 36; R v Burchielli [1981] VR 611).

82. The judge must be careful that the directions do not rob the identification evidence of all probative value (Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593).

83. In fairness to the party adducing the evidence, the judge may make it clear that the warning is given because of the nature of the evidence, and that he or she is not expressing a personal opinion about it (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301).

84. At common law, it was recognised that a judge could tell the jury that "sometimes identification evidence is obviously correct, accurate and reliable". This direction did not impermissibly dilute the force of the warning (Milkins v R [2011] VSCA 93). It will be a matter for individual judges whether this statement is added to the statutory directions under the Jury Directions Act 2015.

Obligation to Give Directions With Judicial Authority

85. At common law, judges were required to give the directions with judicial authority (Domican v R (1992) 173 CLR 555; Pinta v R [1999] WASCA 125). It is not sufficient for the judge to merely refer to a submission about the matter made by counsel when addressing the jury. The warning must come from the judge, with the authority of the judge being used to impress the significance of the matter on the jury (R v TJF [2001] NSWCCA 127; R v Yates [2002] NSWCCA 520; R v Sullivan [2003] NSWCCA 100).

86. The language of the Jury Directions Act 2015 draws a distinction between the obligation to "warn" the jury of the need for caution in determining whether to accept the evidence and the weight to be given to it, and the obligation to "inform" the jury of the other matters specified in s 36(3), such as the significant matters that may make the evidence unreliable, and the possibility that a witness is honest, but mistaken. It is unclear whether this narrows the scope of the common law obligation to give directions on identification evidence with judicial authority (see Audsley v R [2018] VSCA 162, [54], [67] and compare Burchielli v R [1981] VR 611 and R v Mendoza [2007] VSCA 120).

Need for Caution

87. The Jury Directions Act 2015 requires the jury to be warned that there is a need for caution before accepting identification evidence, and in determining the weight to be given to such evidence, once it is accepted (*Jury Directions Act 201*5 s 36(3)(a)).

88. This differs from the position under the Evidence Act 2008, which required the jury to be warned that there is a "special" need for caution (Evidence Act 2008 ss 116, 165; R v Clarke (1997) 97 A Crim R 414).

89. Courts have previously noted that trial judges need to exercise care to ensure that any warnings which he or she gives do not render the identification evidence of no probative value (see Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593; R v Clarke (1993) 71 A Crim R 58).[145]

Multiple Witnesses

90. If multiple witnesses give identification evidence, the jury should be told that a number of such witnesses can all be mistaken (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 36(3)(d); R v Turnbull [1977] QB 224; R v Burchielli [1981] VR 611).

91. It may be necessary to warn a jury that two unsatisfactory or defective identifications do not necessarily support one another. However, there was debate over whether this direction was appropriate at common law (see R v Burchielli [1981] VR 611; R v Dickson [1983] 1 VR 227; R v Haidley and Alford [1984] VR 229 (Young CJ and Kaye J); R v Secombe [2010] VSCA 58. But cf. R v Weeder (1980) 71 Cr App R 228; R v Haidley and Alford [1984] VR 229 (Brooking J); R v Callaghan (2001) 4 VR 79).

92. If multiple witnesses give similarity evidence, the judge should usually instruct the jury against aggregating that evidence to establish identity. Similarity evidence cannot establish identity. Even if multiple people give similarity evidence, all that does is make it more likely that the accused resembles the offender (R v Clune (No 2) [1996] 1 VR 1).

Potential Causes of Unreliability

93. In giving an identification evidence warning pursuant to Jury Directions Act 2015 s 36, the judge will need to inform the jury about the general causes of unreliability which are significant (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 36).

[145] Jury Directions: The Next Step, Criminal Law Review, December 2013, p38.

94. The purpose of this part of the direction is to inform the jury of matters which may be outside their general experience and understanding. Those matters need be stated only with such detail as is required to achieve that purpose (Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109).

95. The jury should be warned about matters that may cause the identification evidence to be unreliable (as opposed to matters that necessarily made that evidence unreliable) (R v Riscuta [2003] NSWCCA 6).

96. The matters that may cause identification evidence to be unreliable generally differ depending on the:

    - the type of evidence given (e.g. positive identification evidence, recognition evidence or similarity evidence);
    - the identification process used (e.g. identification parade, photo board identification or dock identification);
    - the mode of identification (e.g. visual, aural or tactile);
    - the subject matter identified (e.g. a person or an object).

97. In rare circumstances, expert evidence about particular dangers associated with certain types of identification evidence may be admissible (see, e.g. R v Dupas [2011] VSC 180).

98. The general dangers associated with particular types of identification evidence are examined below.

General Dangers of Positive Identification Evidence

99. Positive identification evidence is seen to be "notoriously uncertain" due to the number of variables upon which it depends. These include:

    - the extent of the opportunity for making the observation;
    - the circumstances in which the observation was made;
    - the difficulties a person may have in recognising a person they observed only fleetingly, some time in the past;
    - the vagaries of human perception and recollection; and
    - the tendency of the mind to respond to suggestions (Alexander v R (1981) 145 CLR 395).

100. Despite these uncertainties, identification evidence is seen to be particularly seductive, especially as it is often given by witnesses who appear honest and convincing. Judicial experience has shown that such witnesses can be mistaken (R v Burchielli [1981] VLR 611; Domican v R (1992) 173 CLR 555; Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593).

101. This risk arises because of the way in which evidence of identification depends on the witness receiving, recording and accurately recalling a subjective impression on the mind (R v Dickson [1983] 1 VR 227).

102. At common law, judges often told the jury that it is essential to distinguish between honesty and accuracy, and not to assume the latter because of a belief in the former (R v Dickson [1983] 1 VR 227).

103. Section 36 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 focuses on the reliability of identification evidence, rather than the credibility of the witness giving the evidence. A witness can be credible but mistaken (see, e.g. R v Tran [2002] VSCA 29).

General Dangers of Recognition Evidence

104. The traditional identification warning was developed in relation to witnesses who were previously unfamiliar with the person identified. Many of the dangers identified in that context may not be relevant to recognition cases (R v Burchielli [1981] VR 611; R v Marijancevic (1993) 70 A Crim R 272; R v Conci [2005] VSCA 173; R v Spero (2006) 13 VR 225; R v Trudgett (2007) 70 NSWLR 696).

105. For example, the difficulties associated with the identification process will generally not exist in relation to recognition evidence, as there is ordinarily no need for a formal identification process (such as an identification parade) (see, e.g. R v Lovett [2006] VSCA 5; R v Spero (2006) 13 VR 225; R v Kelly [2002] WASCA 134).

106. However, although recognition evidence may be more reliable than evidence identifying a stranger, mistakes in recognition of close relatives and friends are still sometimes made (R v Boardman [1969] VR 151; R v Turnbull [1977] QB 224; R v Brotherton (1992) 29 NSWLR 95).

107. Such mistakes can arise because the difficulties surrounding the observation of a crime can be just as great when observing a familiar person as an unfamiliar person (R v Lovett [2006] VSCA 5).

108. There is also a possibility of jumping to a conclusion as to the identity of the offender, if they resemble a known person (R v Lovett [2006] VSCA 5).

109. Despite the potential unreliability of recognition evidence, there is a danger that witnesses will propound their conclusions with force and conviction (R v Trudgett (2007) 70 NSWLR 696).

110. Furthermore, recognition evidence is likely to be given special weight by a jury, even where its reliability is dubious (R v Trudgett (2007) 70 NSWLR 696).

111. The amount of care and the nature of the direction will vary according to the familiarity of the witness with the person identified (Davies and Cody (1937) 57 CLR 170; R v Marijancevic (1993) 70 A Crim R 272).

General Dangers of Similarity Evidence

112. The general dangers identified in a similarity evidence warning will depend on the nature of the evidence. The charge should be tailored to the case, and should not be a mere recitation of the suggested directions (Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593).

113. If the evidence is very weak (e.g. I saw a man wearing a red shirt), it may only be necessary to point to whatever difficulties the defence asserts the witness may have had in observing and accurately recollecting the event (Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593 (Hayne J)).

114. If the evidence is of facial similarities between the accused and the offender, the same dangers may arise as in the case of positive identification evidence (Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593 (McHugh J)).

115. In warning the jury about the need for caution in determining whether to accept the evidence and the weight to be given to it, the judge may need to point out that evidence of similarity, if accepted, only shows consistency of appearance between the accused and the offender. It is not evidence that positively identifies the accused (Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593 (Gleeson CJ); R v Morgan [2009] VSCA 225).

116. It may also be appropriate to warn the jury against taking the step from accepting that there is a similarity between the accused and the offender, to positively identifying the accused due to this similarity (see R v Benz (1989) 168 CLR 110 (Deane J)).

117. It may also be desirable to direct the jury that evidence of similarity is not sufficient, by itself, to entitle them to convict. The judge may need to point out the limited role that can be played by such evidence (R v Morgan [2009] VSCA 225; R v Athuai [2005] VSC 192).

118. If the judge gives directions about the limited weight of similarity evidence, the judge may need to distinguish that part of the direction from any directions about the weight to give to any positive identification evidence (see Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593 (McHugh J); R v Camilleri (2001) 127 A Crim R 290; R v Morgan [2009] VSCA 225).

119. If evidence can be interpreted as either positive identification evidence or as similarity evidence, it is for the jury to determine how that evidence should be treated. In such a case, the judge should:

- explain the distinction between positive identification evidence and similarity evidence;
- explain the limited utility of similarity evidence; and
- warn the jury that they cannot treat the evidence as positive identification evidence unless satisfied that the witness meant to identify the accused as the offender, as opposed to simply noting similarities between the accused and the offender (R v Hackett [2006] VSCA 138. See also R v Fahad [2004] VSCA 28).

120. However, if it is clear that the evidence should be treated in a particular way (e.g. that it is positive identification evidence rather than similarity evidence), the judge must instruct the jury accordingly. In the absence of any ambiguity, it is not for the jury to work out for themselves whether a piece of evidence is to be treated as positive identification evidence or similarity evidence (see, e.g. R v Theos (1996) 89 A Crim R 486 (Vic CA)).

121. While not technically incorrect, judges should avoid using the term "identification evidence" when charging the jury about similarity evidence. The terms "similarity evidence" or "resemblance evidence" are preferable (see, e.g. R v Razzak [2004] NSWCCA 62).

General Dangers of Comparison Evidence

122. The dangers posed by comparison evidence differ from those posed by other types of identification evidence. For example, in relation to voice comparisons, instead of being concerned with matters such as familiarity with the voice or the distinctiveness of the voice, issues such as whether the quality and quantity of the material is sufficient to enable a useful comparison to be made will be more important (Bulejcik v R (1996) 185 CLR 375).

123. Very careful and strong directions will often be called for in the case of voice comparisons (Bulejcik v R (1996) 185 CLR 375 (Toohey and Gaudron JJ)).[146]

124. Where a jury is asked to make a comparison between a recorded voice and the voice of the accused, the direction will explain the difficulty in making such a comparison (Bulejcik v R (1996) 185 CLR 375 (Toohey and Gaudron JJ); Nguyen v R (2002) 26 WAR 59; R v Madigan [2005] NSWCCA 170).

125. In relation to voice comparison, the similarity in circumstances in which the voices were spoken or recorded, and the number of similar words used, are likely to be significant matters which go to the determination of whether the evidence is reliable (Bulejcik v R (1996) 185 CLR 375).

126. The jury may need to consider whether there is a distinction between a live voice heard in court and a recorded voice (R v Madigan [2005] NSWCCA 170).

127. If the jury is asked to compare voices with foreign accents, they should be told of the difficulties involved in distinguishing between two such voices with which they are not familiar. In the absence of such a direction, the jury might too readily conclude that a foreign accent on a tape is that of the accused where the accents are similar (Bulejcik v R (1996) 185 CLR 375 (Toohey and Gaudron JJ)).

General Dangers of Photographic Identification Evidence

128. Identification from a photograph may be unreliable due to the differences between photographic representations and nature:

- photographs are two-dimensional, static and limited (Alexander v R (1981) 145 CLR 395; Roser v R (2001) 24 WAR 254; R v Campbell [2007] VSCA 189);
- photographs do not depict manner of moving, posture, variety of facial expression, complexion, body size, body shape, colouring, nor many other subtle physical characteristics that an actual sighting conveys to the mind (Roser v R (2001) 24 WAR 254);
- photographs may be black and white (Alexander v R (1981) 145 CLR 395);
- photographs often provide a clear and well-lit picture of the subject in circumstances very different from the initial observation (Alexander v R (1981) 145 CLR 395; R v Campbell [2007] VSCA 189);
- photographs may hazily resemble the person seen, and lead to a false identification (Roser v R (2001) 24 WAR 254; R v Campbell [2007] VSCA 189);
- photographs may be digitally edited without the jury or anyone else realizing.

129. In addition, the presentation of a group of photographs to an identifying witness may place that witness under some subconscious pressure to pick out a photograph of a suspect who looks like the offender, notwithstanding that the witness is unable to positively identify the subject of the photograph as the offender (R v Campbell [2007] VSCA 189; Pitkin v R (1995) 130 ALR 35).

130. The accused may also be disadvantaged by the process of photo board identification. In most cases, he or she will not have been present for the identification, and so will not have first hand information about the way in which the witness identified the photograph (cf. identification parades). The accused must therefore rely on cross-examination of witnesses for knowledge about the conditions of the identification, and what safeguards against error were taken (Alexander v R (1981) 145 CLR 395; R v Clarke (1997) 97 A Crim R 414 (NSW SC); Roser v R (2001) 24 WAR 254; R v Campbell [2007] VSCA 189).

131. A judge may have good reasons for not warning the jury about some of the deficiencies of photo board identification where the accused has refused to participate in an identification parade. For example, it may not be appropriate to direct the jury about the problems arising from the accused's absence from the identification process, or to instruct the jury about the differences between the two processes of identification (see R v Campbell [2007] VSCA 189).

General Dangers of Single Suspect, Court and Dock Identification

132. If the accused was identified in circumstances where the witness was presented with a single suspect, this so greatly increases the liability to mistake as to make it extremely dangerous to assign any probative value to the identification evidence (R v Burchielli [1981] VR 611).

133. Similar dangers attend an identification in the precincts of the court. At common law, it was considered not sufficient to avoid discussing the issue out of a wish to avoid emphasising the identification (R v Bedford (1986) 5 NSWLR 711; Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593 (Kirby J)).

134. If a dock identification takes place,[147] the jury may be warned that it is of no probative value (as the witness will inevitably point out the person who is on trial), and that it has only been done as a formality (in order to complete the picture and to avoid any speculation as to why it was not done) (see, e.g. Jamal v R (2000) 182 ALR 307; Alexander v R (1981) 145 CLR 395; R v Burchielli [1981] VR 611).[148]

135. The risks associated with dock identification do not necessarily apply to identification of chattels in court. For example, provided that the witness is not asked leading questions, he or she will usually not feel compelled to positively identify any particular chattel in the same way that he or she may feel compelled to positively identify the accused (Evans v R (2007) 235 CLR 521).

General Dangers of Voice Identification

136. The risk of mistake in identifying a voice is seen to be at least as great as that involved in visual identification (Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593; Li v R (2003) 139 A Crim R 281).

137. Some factors that may be relevant in relation to the voice identification process include:

- the enhanced difficulty of identifying voices (cf. faces);
- the risk that a person may have sought to disguise his or her voice;
- the fact that voices can vary depending on the purpose for which they are being used;
- the clarity with which the voice was heard on the relevant occasions;
- the witness's familiarity with the voice;
- the distinctiveness of the voice;
- the possibility of mistaking one accented voice for another (R v Callaghan (2001) 4 VR 79; see also Bulejcik v R (1996) 185 CLR 375; Festa v R (2001) 208 CLR 593; R v Madigan [2005] NSWCCA 170; R v E J Smith (1986) 7 NSWLR 444; R v Brownlowe (1986) 7 NSWLR 46).

138. The jury should be told to allow for the possibility that an offender may have sought to disguise his or her voice (R v E J Smith (1986) 7 NSWLR 444; R v Brownlowe (1986) 7 NSWLR 461).

139. The jury should be told that mistakes can be made even in the voice recognition of close friends and relatives (R v Brotherton (1992) 29 NSWLR 95; R v Turnbull [1977] QB 224; R v Bueti (1997) 70 SASR 370; R v Madigan [2005] NSWCCA 170).

140. The jury should not be told that voice identification is less reliable if a witness cannot describe the basis on which a match is made (e.g. by describing the intonation, rapidity of speech and cadence). Voice identification may be accurate even though a person is unable to analyse and explain the characteristics of the voice (Nguyen v R (2002) 26 WAR 59).

[147] Dock identification occurs when a person is asked to look either at the dock containing the accused, or the area where the accused might be expected to be sitting, and then make an identification. Where a witness simply happens to be in the same courtroom as the accused, and spontaneously recognises him or her, this is not "dock identification" (R v Rich (Ruling No. 6) [2008] VSC 436. See also R v Williams [1983] 2 VR 579).

General Dangers of Negative Identification Evidence

141. Many of the causes of unreliability which apply in the context of positive identification evidence also apply to negative identification evidence. For example, just as positive identification evidence may be affected by confusion and displacement, or contaminated by conversations after the event, so may negative identification evidence (Ilioski v R [2006] NSWCCA 164).

142. Some matters which may affect the reliability of negative identification evidence include:

- whether the witness knew the person identified;
- the duration of the circumstances in which the identification occurred;
- whether it is possible that the observer was unconsciously influenced by publicity; and
- the quality of the image used to make the identification and whether that was a good likeness of the relevant person (see, e.g. R v Rose (2002) 55 NSWLR 701).

143. If a direction is given, it will not be relevant to inform the jury that mistaken identification evidence has resulted in innocent people being convicted (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 36; R v Rose (2002) 55 NSWLR 701).

144. However, in most cases where negative identification evidence is adduced the jury should be instructed about how the burden and standard of proof operates in relation to this evidence (Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109; Mule v R [2002] WASCA 101; R v Johnson (2004) 89 SASR 294). This requires that the judge:

- emphasise that the jury has to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that it was the accused who committed the offence charged; and
- make it clear that the jury cannot be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the crime was committed by the accused if there remains a reasonable possibility that the crime was committed by someone else.

145. It was suggested in Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109 that an appropriate direction would be that "the Crown must remove or eliminate any possibility that the crime was committed by someone else, as well as satisfy you, on the evidence on which it relies, that beyond reasonable doubt the accused committed the offence" (see also Ilioski v R [2006] NSWCCA 164).

146. Although this formulation was suggested by the Court, it was made clear that no specific formula is required. All that is needed is for the judge to make it clear to the jury that there cannot be proof beyond reasonable doubt if there remains a reasonable possibility that the accused is not guilty (Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109; Ilioski v R [2006] NSWCCA 164).

147. The precise content of the direction will depend on the type of negative identification evidence adduced. For example:

- where a witness positively identifies a person as the offender who is not the accused, the judge may give modest directions about the need for caution when assessing the evidence, the circumstances of the identification and that witnesses may be honest but mistaken;
- where there is contradictory identification evidence, the judge will need to be direct the jury on the need for caution in assessing the evidence, contrast the different circumstances of the two witnesses, the risk of mistaken identification evidence and the interaction between positive and negative identification evidence (see below);
- where the witness has failed to identify the accused, then identification evidence directions are no likely to be appropriate and the judge should instead refer to the failure to identify as a matter casting doubt on the prosecution case.

148. In all cases however, the judge must remind the jury that the prosecution bears the onus of proof and that the accused does not need to prove the negative identification evidence. Instead, the evidence is a factor that, depending on the jury's view of the evidence, may raise a reasonable doubt about the prosecution's case.

Directions where Positive and Negative Identification Evidence are Adduced

149. Where both negative and positive identification evidence is adduced, the judge may need to direct the jury about the relationship between the two types of evidence. In particular, the judge may need to direct the jury about:

- the impact the negative identification evidence has on the positive identification evidence; and
- the relationship between the positive and negative identification evidence warnings.

150. The existence of contradictory, negative identification evidence, may be a significant matter which makes the positive identification evidence unreliable (see Beresi v R [2004] WASCA 67; Mule v R [2002] WASCA 101).

151. Similarly, the failure of a witness to select the accused from a previous photoboard or identification parade may cast doubt on the reliability of the subsequent identification (see Beresi v R [2004] WASCA 67).

152. The best approach for a judge to take in directing the jury on the relationship between the warnings will depend on the circumstances of the case:

- in some cases it will be convenient for the judge to set out separately the reasons for the warnings for each category of identification evidence;
- in other cases it will be disadvantageous to the accused to have all of the reasons for the warnings given twice – once for the positive identification evidence and once for the negative identification evidence (Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109).

Specific Causes of Unreliability

153. In addition to general dangers about particular forms of evidence, the judge will also need to inform the jury about any specific causes of unreliability which are significant (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 36).

154. These specific matters should be identified as part of the warning about identification evidence, and rather than in some other part of the judge's directions (R v Bint & Butterworth 19/7/1996 CA SA).

155. If matters referred to by counsel reasonably can be regarded as significant matters undermining the reliability of the identification evidence, the judge must inform the jury of those matters (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 36(3)(b). See also Domican v R (1992) 173 CLR 555; R v Dupas (2009) 28 VR 380).

156. It is insufficient for a judge to simply put a number of questions to the jury to consider, without relating them to the particular circumstances of the case (R v Ryan 3/8/1995 CA Vic).

157. The judge may point out significant matters supporting an identification, as long as the weaknesses are also highlighted (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 36(3)(b); R v Fox (No 2) [2000] 1 Qd R 640. See also R v Davies (2005) 11 VR 314).

158. Even if a matter of significance would be obvious to the jury, it should be identified (Ilioski v R [2006] NSWCCA 164).

159. However, a judge is only required to direct the jury about matters concerning the reliability of identification evidence. The identification evidence direction does not address matters such as bias or motives to lie (Ilioski v R [2006] NSWCCA 164).[149]

[149] There may, however, be a need for separate warnings concerning such matters.

160. Judges need not identify every possible weakness in the particular identification evidence in the case. He or she is only required to identify any weakness which is significant. On this basis, a judge must not overlook any evidence the jury may regard as having some cogency, which would be favourable to the accused in the resolution of the identification issue (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 36(3)(b); R v Bint & Butterworth 19/7/1996 CA SA).

161. The fact that there is evidence that tends to support an identification does not diminish the importance of the direction as to identification. In some circumstances it may actually increase the need for caution (WSJ v R [2010] VSCA 339).

Specific Factors Affecting the Reliability of Identification Evidence

162. Factors affecting the reliability of identification evidence in a particular case include:

- the opportunity to observe the person subsequently identified;
- the nature of the relationship between the witness and the person identified;
- the length of time between the incident and the identification; and
- the nature and circumstances of the identification (Domican v R (1992) 173 CLR 555).

163. Factors that may be relevant to the initial observation include:

- the length of opportunity for making the observation (R v Clune [1982] VR 1; Domican v R (1992) 173 CLR 555);
- the position of the witness and the person identified (R v Clune [1982] VR 1; R v Dickson [1983] 1 VR 227);
- the distance of the witness from the person identified (R v Turnbull [1977] QB 224);
- the lighting and weather (R v Clune [1982] VR 1; R v Dickson [1983] 1 VR 227);
- any impairments to the observation, such as passing people or traffic (R v Turnbull [1977] QB 224);
- the exposure of the witness to stress or fear (R v Clune [1982] VR 1; R v Dickson [1983] 1 VR 227. But see Winmar v Western Australia (2007) 35 WAR 159);
- whether the witness was influenced by drugs or alcohol, or by other factors such as fatigue (Peck v Western Australia [2005] WASCA 20);
- whether the circumstances were such as to cause the witness to be left with an impression of the features of the offender (R v Clune [1982] VR 1).

164. Factors that may be relevant to the nature of the relationship between the witness and the person observed include:

- whether the witness was previously acquainted with the person observed (Domican v R (1992) 173 CLR 555);
- how well the witness knew the observed person (R v Carr (2000) 117 A Crim R 272);
- the circumstances of any previous acquaintance (R v Carr (2000) 117 A Crim R 272).

165. Factors that may be relevant to the identification process include:

- the length of time between the incident and the identification (R v Clune [1982] VR 1; Domican v R (1992) 173 CLR 555; R v Dupas (2009) 28 VR 380);
- the absence of an identification parade and the general conduct of the identification process (R v Preston [1961] VR 761; R v Clune [1982] VR 1; R v Burchielli [1981] VR 611);
- whether the witness had heard a description of the suspect given before attempting an identification (R v Ryan 3/8/1995 CA Vic);

- any imbalances in the identification process (such as only one of the suspects having a moustache, or having only one non-custodial photograph to choose from) (R v Clune [1982] VR 1);
- whether the witness was encouraged to identify a particular person in any way (R v Davies (2005) 11 VR 314);
- whether there were any witnesses to the identification process (Alexander v R (1981) 145 CLR 395; Roser v R (2001) 24 WAR 254).

166. Other factors that may be relevant to the issue include:

- the perceptiveness of the witness (R v Clune [1982] VR 1; R v Dickson [1983] 1 VR 227);
- the dangers of cross-racial identification (R v Dodd (2002) 135 A Crim R 32);
- errors in describing the offender prior to the identification (R v Turnbull [1977] QB 224; R v Vincec (1990) 50 A Crim R 203 (Vic CA));
- evidence which points to a person other than the accused being the offender (R v Fahad [2004] VSCA 28);[150]
- incentives to cooperate with the police (R v Theos (1996) 89 A Crim R 486 (Vic CA));
- in the case of object identification, the commonness of the object identified (R v Theos (1996) 89 A Crim R 486 (Vic CA)).

167. There is no immutable principle requiring the discussion of any particular one of these matters – it will depend on the circumstances. This is, however, subject to the requirement that a judge inform the jury of the significant matters which specified by the party requesting an identification evidence direction, unless there are good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 15, 36; see also R v Dodd (2002) 135 A Crim R 32).

The Displacement Effect

168. One specific cause of unreliability that a judge may need to direct the jury about is the "displacement effect" (see, e.g. Alexander v R (1981) 145 CLR 395; Roser v R (2001) 24 WAR 254; DPP v Douglas Jensen [2006] VSC 179; R v Dupas (2009) 28 VR 380).

169. The "displacement effect" can occur when a witness initially identifies a person from a photograph, and then subsequently identifies the same person at an identification parade. In such circumstances, the witness's memory of the photograph viewed may displace his or her memory of the original sighting of the offender. Any subsequent face-to-face identification may be tainted as a result of this "displacement effect", as the witness may unwittingly compare the accused with the remembered photograph, rather than with his or her memory of the original sighting (Alexander v R (1981) 145 CLR 395; Roser v R (2001) 24 WAR 254; DPP v Douglas Jensen [2006] VSC 179).[151]

170. Thus, the "displacement effect" may be relevant where:

[150] See Negative Identification Evidence for a discussion of the directions to be given when evidence is adduced identifying a person other than the accused as the offender, or stating that the accused is not the offender.

[151] While the cases in this area generally refer to the risk that the memory of a photograph will displace the memory of the original sighting, memories of other types of representation (e.g. identikit pictures) may create the same risk.

- a person is initially identified from a photograph (or other representation);
- the same person is subsequently identified at an identification parade; and
- evidence of that identification parade is admitted (Alexander v R (1981) 145 CLR 395; Roser v R (2001) 24 WAR 254; DPP v Douglas Jensen [2006] VSC 179)

171. In such cases, the "displacement effect" may constitute a significant matter which affects the reliability of the identification evidence, warranting a warning cautioning against accepting the evidence, and if the evidence is accepted, cautioning against the weight to be given to that evidence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 36(3); see e.g. R v Burchielli [1981] VR 611).

Picture Identification

172. Section 115 of the Evidence Act 2008 provides that certain directions must be given in relation to "picture identification evidence" that is admitted into evidence.

173. These directions must be given if:

- the "picture identification evidence" is adduced by the prosecution; and
- a request for the directions is made by the accused or defence counsel (Evidence Act 2008 s 115(7)).

174. The content of the direction depends on whether the relevant picture was made before or after the accused was taken into custody:

- if it was made after the accused was taken into custody, the jury must be informed of that fact;
- if it was made before the accused was taken into custody, the jury must be warned not to assume that the accused has a criminal record, or has previously been charged with an offence (Evidence Act 2008 s 115(7)).

175. These directions are directed to the problems associated with the use of 'mug shots' – pictures which give the impression that the person depicted was known to the police (R v Maklouf [1999] NSWCCA 94).

176. 4.12.2 Charge: Photographic Identification includes a section addressing this issue in the context of photographic identification. This section can be modified for other forms of picture identification.

Failure to Hold an Identification Parade

177. If photographic identification evidence is admitted where it would have been reasonable and practicable to arrange for an identification parade to be held instead, it may be appropriate to:

- tell the jury such an identification parade could have been held;
- explain the differences between the identification processes;
- advise the jury that the accused has been deprived of the benefits of an identification parade;
- advise the jury that the accused may have lost the advantage they would have gained from an inconclusive parade; and
- direct the jury that it should take account of these facts in its assessment of the whole case, giving them such weight as it thinks fair (Roser v R (2001) 24 WAR 254).

Refusal to Participate in an Identification Parade

178. If evidence is given that the accused refused to participate in an identification parade, the judge should advise the jury that he or she had a right not to participate, and that the exercise of that right must not lead to any conclusion as to guilt (R v McCarthy (1993) 71 A Crim R 395; R v Davies (2005) 11 VR 314).

179. The direction should be given in very strong terms, explaining to the jury that it would make a mockery of our legal system to give the accused the right not to participate, but then to penalise them for relying on that right by allowing an adverse inference to be drawn from its exercise.

180. This direction should be given as soon as the evidence is given and, if necessary, again in the summing up (R v McCarthy (1993) 71 A Crim R 395; R v Davies (2005) 11 VR 314).

4.12.1 Charge: Identification Evidence

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

When to Use this Charge

This charge may be used where:

i) A witness gave identification evidence;[152] and

ii) The prosecution or defence counsel has requested a direction regarding the identification evidence and there are no good reasons for not doing so; or

iii) Despite the fact that neither party has requested a direction, there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving the direction

Introduction

Identification is an important issue in this case. The case against NOA depends, to a significant extent, on evidence claiming to identify [outline the nature of the identification evidence in the case].

Before you decide whether to accept this evidence, I must give you some warnings about identification evidence.

How are People Identified?

Before I give you these warnings, and to help you understand the reason why I am giving you these warnings, I will briefly explain how people are identified.

Positive identification evidence/similarity evidence

[If the identification evidence comprises positive identification evidence or similarity evidence, add the following shaded section.]

There are three stages that are involved whenever a positive identification is made and a witness may make an error at each stage. First, the witness must have observed somebody [insert relevant act].

[152] This charge has been constructed for use in cases where it is the accused that has been identified. If it is another party, or an object, that has been positively identified, the charge should be modified accordingly.

Second, the witness must have retained an image of that person in his or her mind until the time of the identification. Third, the witness must have later seen NOA, or a picture of NOA, and identified him or her as being the person seen [insert relevant act].[153]

Recognition evidence

[If the identification evidence is a form of recognition evidence, add the following shaded section.]

There are two stages that are involved whenever a person claims to recognise another person and a witness may make an error at each stage. First, the witness must have observed somebody [insert relevant act]. Second, the witness must have accurately recognised that person as someone the witness knew.

Comparison evidence

[If the identification evidence constitutes comparison evidence, add the following shaded section.]

There are three stages that are involved whenever a comparison is made and a witness may make an error at each stage. First, the witness must have heard somebody [insert evidence relating to the initial recording]. Second, the witness must have retained an impression of that person's voice in his or her mind until the time of the identification. Third, the witness must have later heard the voice of NOA, or a recording of the voice of NOA, and identified him or her as being the voice heard in the original recording.

Negative identification evidence

[If the identification evidence constitutes negative identification evidence, add the following shaded section.]

There are three stages that are involved whenever an identification of this nature is made and a witness may make an error at each stage. First, the witness must have observed somebody [insert relevant act]. Second, the witness must have retained an image of that person in his or her mind until the time of the identification. Third, the witness must have later seen NOA, or a picture of NOA, and stated that he or she was not the person seen [insert relevant act].

General Dangers of Identification Evidence

Identification evidence is potentially unreliable. For that reason, you must exercise caution in determining whether to accept the evidence and, if you do accept it, the weight that you accord to that evidence.

One of the reasons that identification evidence is potentially unreliable is that while a witness may honestly believe that his or her evidence is accurate when he or she is actually mistaken. And the mistaken evidence of a witness may be convincing.

[If there are multiple identification witnesses, add the following shaded section.]

You should also realise that a number of different witnesses may all be mistaken in their identification.

[153] Where the relevant identification evidence constitutes similarity evidence, this paragraph will need to be augmented. A suggested substitute is "First, the witness must have observed somebody [insert relevant act]. Second, the witness must have retained an image of that person in his or her mind until the time of the identification. Third, the witness must have later seen the accused, or a picture of the accused, and identified a similarity between him or her and the person seen [insert relevant act]."

[If the risk of mistaken identification evidence leading to an innocent person being convicted is relevant, add the following shaded section. Note that this will not be relevant in the case of negative identification evidence.]

The experience of the law has shown that witnesses have given mistaken identification evidence which has resulted in innocent people being convicted.

I will now turn to discuss the significant matters in this case which may make the identification evidence unreliable.

Significant Matters that May Make the Evidence Unreliable

Having given you that general warning about identification evidence, I now want to look at some of the specific factors that may affect the reliability of the evidence in this case.

Here, there are [insert number of significant factors] that may be relevant to your assessment of the reliability of the identification evidence. These are [insert significant factors affecting reliability, e.g. the circumstances in which the offender was observed; the characteristics of the witness who gave evidence; and the way in which the accused was identified].

You should examine each of these factors closely when deciding whether to accept the identification evidence.

I will now look at these factors in more detail.

Circumstances of Observation

[If the circumstance in which the witness made his or her observation is a significant matter which may make the evidence unreliable, add the following shaded section.]

You should examine the circumstances in which the offender was observed. You should consider what opportunity for accurate observation existed. Some of the questions you should ask yourself include:

[Isolate and identify the significant matters raised by counsel regarding the observation which may make the evidence unreliable, or which are otherwise necessary to include.]

- For how long did the witness observe the person?
- How far away was the witness from what s/he was observing?
- What was the angle of observation? For example, did the witness see the person's face or only his/her back?
- Had the witness ever seen the person s/he was observing before?
- What was the light like?
- Did anything get in the way of the witness's view, such as passing people or traffic?
- Did the witness have a reason for trying to observe the person involved and to remember his/her characteristics?
- Did the person observed have any distinguishing features or characteristics which would make it likely that the witness would remember him/her? For example, did s/he have a scar or a tattoo?

Factors Concerning the Witness

[If there are significant matters concerning the witness who made the identification which may make the evidence unreliable, add the following shaded section.]

You must also consider the characteristics of the witness who gave the identification evidence. In that context, some of the questions you should ask yourself include:

[Isolate and identify any significant witness-related factors raised by counsel that may make the evidence unreliable, or which are otherwise necessary to include.]

- Is it possible to assess the quality of this witness as an observer?
- Was the witness stressed or fearful at the time of the observation? If so, what effect would this stress have had on him/her? For some people, their powers of observation increase under stress. Others "black out" and their powers of observation diminish. You need to decide how the witness is likely to have reacted in this case.
- Were there any other factors that could have affected the witness's powers of observation, such as drugs or alcohol consumption, or fatigue?

Factors Concerning the Identification

[If the way in which the accused was identified raises significant matters which may make the evidence unreliable, add the following shaded section.]

You must consider the way in which NOA was identified/similarities between the person observed and NOA were noted. Some of the questions you should ask yourself include:

[Isolate and identify any significant factors about the identification process raised by counsel that may make the evidence unreliable, or which are otherwise necessary to include.]

- Did the witness give a description of the offender before identifying the accused? If so, does the description match the accused?
- Is the witness relying too heavily on a particular memorable feature or characteristic of the accused in identifying him/her?
- How long was there between the incident and the identification? Was it likely that the witness's memory was affected by any delay?
- Was the identification process conducted fairly? For example, did the other people in the [parade/photoboard] look sufficiently similar to the accused?
- Did the witness hear a description or see a picture of the accused before attempting to identify the offender? [If this occurred, and the risk of the "displacement effect" occurring is significant, the judge will need to warn the jury about that effect. See 4.12.2 Charge: Photographic Identification for an example of such a warning.]
- Was the witness influenced in any other way to identify the accused – for example, by the behaviour of the police?

Familiarity with the Accused

[If there are matters concerning the familiarity of the witness who made the identification with NOA, and these are significant matters which may make the evidence unreliable, add the following shaded section.]

You must consider how well the witness knew the accused. Some of the questions you should ask yourself include:

[Isolate and identify any significant factors about the witness's familiarity with the accused raised by counsel that may make the evidence unreliable, or which are otherwise necessary to include.]

- How did the witness know the accused?
- How often and in what circumstances had the witness previously seen the accused? Was s/he very familiar with the accused's appearance?
- When had the witness last seen the accused? Had the accused's appearance changed since that time?

Quality of the Material

[If the identification involves a non-expert giving comparison evidence, and the quality of the material being compared is a significant factor which may make the evidence unreliable, include the following shaded section.]

You must consider the quality of the material which the witness was comparing. Some of the questions you should ask yourself include:

[Isolate and identify any significant factors raised by counsel about the comparison made that may make the evidence unreliable, or which are otherwise necessary to include.]

- [If two recordings are being compared] In what circumstances were the recordings made? Were those circumstances very different?
- [If one recording is being compared with a live voice] Does the fact that the witness compared a recording with a live voice affect his/her ability to make an accurate comparison?
- Was there enough material to enable the witness to make a proper comparison?

Nature of the Voices

[If the identification involves a non-expert giving comparison evidence, and the nature of the voices being compared is a significant matter which may make the evidence unreliable, include the following shaded section.]

You must consider the nature of the voices that were compared by the witness. Some of the questions you should ask yourself include:

[Isolate and identify any significant factors raised by counsel about the comparison made that may make the evidence unreliable, or which are otherwise necessary to include.]

- Are the voices particularly distinctive?
- Did the voices use similar words? Did they have a similar manner of speaking?
- Is it possible that either or both of the speakers were trying to disguise their voice?
- [If the voices spoke with a foreign accent] Did the witness rely too heavily on the fact that both voices spoke with a foreign accent? It can be very difficult to distinguish between two unfamiliar voices that speak with a similar accent.

Limitations of Similarity Evidence

[If the identification evidence involved the witness saying that the accused appeared to be similar to the relevant person, include the following shaded section.]

You must consider the limitations of what NOW said. S/he has not given evidence actually identifying NOA as the person who [insert relevant act]. Instead, s/he has given evidence that NOA resembles the person who [insert relevant act].

Even if you accept this evidence as true, it only shows that NOA's [appearance/voice/other characteristic] is consistent with that of the offender. It does not show that s/he is the offender. You must not conclude from this evidence alone that NOA was the person who [insert relevant act].

I am not saying that you should ignore this evidence of similarity between NOA and the offender. You can use it together with the other evidence in the case to help you determine whether or not NOA is the person who [insert relevant act]. However, by itself this evidence is not enough to identify NOA as the offender.

Miscellaneous Factors

[If there are any other significant factors that do not fall within categories already discussed, add the following shaded section.]

Finally, you should consider any other significant factors that may affect the reliability of the identification evidence. In this case, [insert evidence about any other significant factors raised by counsel that may reasonably be regarded as undermining the reliability of the evidence, or which are otherwise necessary to include].

Summary

To summarise, it is important that you take care in determining whether you accept identification evidence, and if you do accept it, in deciding what weight to give to that evidence.

If, after careful examination of the identification evidence, and in light of all of the circumstances and other evidence given in the case, you find that the accused was correctly identified, then you can use the evidence in reaching your verdict.

4.12.2 Charge: Photographic Identification

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

If the accused has been identified from a photograph, add this section where indicated in the primary charge.

In this case, as NOA was [initially] identified from a photograph, I need to give you an additional warning about photographic identification evidence.

This sort of evidence may be unreliable due to the differences between photographs and real life. For example, photographs are two-dimensional, and do not show the way a person moves, the range of their facial expressions, their body shape, or many of the other characteristics that can help you to identify a person.

The photograph used to identify the accused may also have been taken in very different circumstances from those in which the offender was observed. For example, the light in the photograph may be much better than it was at the time of the crime.

These factors can increase the risks of misidentifying the offender, who may look like the accused as seen in a photograph, but may look different when viewed face-to-face. You should therefore treat photographic identification evidence with special care.

Lack of Witnesses

[If the conduct of the identification process is in issue, the following shaded section may be added.]

There is an additional problem with photographic identification. As the accused was not present during the identification process, s/he is unlikely to have any first-hand information about the way in which his/her photograph was selected. Instead, s/he can only rely on the cross-examination of the people who were present to gain any information about the conditions in which the identification took place, and what safeguards against error were taken. You should take this disadvantage into account when considering the evidence.

The "Displacement Effect"

[If the displacement effect is in issue, add the following shaded section.[154]]

I must also warn you about what is known as the "displacement effect". This effect can occur when a person is shown a photograph of a suspect before identifying them in a parade. The witness's memory of the person observed committing the crime can be effectively replaced by a memory of that photograph. In any later face-to-face identification, there is a risk that the witness might unintentionally identify the accused because his/her appearance matches the remembered photograph, rather than matching the person originally seen. In other words, the witness will have identified the person previously seen in the photograph, instead of the person seen committing the crime.

Because of this risk, it may be dangerous for you to treat the identification parade evidence as having any significant value.

Section 115 Direction (The "Rogues' Gallery Effect")

[If a request for a s 115 direction has been made by the defence, or the jury has become aware that the accused was identified by reference to a photograph held by police and the judge finds it necessary to address any possible prejudice, one of the following directions should be given.]

[If the photograph was taken before the accused was taken into custody, add the following shaded section.]

You may have noticed that NOA was identified from a photograph held by the police. You are not to attach any significance to this fact. The police have photographs of many different people for a variety of reasons. You must not assume that, because the police had a photograph of NOA, s/he has a criminal record or has previously been charged with an offence. In fact, you must not draw any conclusions from the fact that the police had a photograph of NOA.

[If the photograph was taken after the accused was taken into custody, add the following shaded section.]

You may have noticed that NOA was identified from a photograph held by the police. You are not to attach any significance to this fact. That photograph was made after NOA was taken into custody. It

---

[154] While this part of the charge has been designed for use in cases where there is a risk that a witness's memory of the offender has been displaced by a memory of a photograph, a modified version may be used where there is a risk that the witness's memory has been displaced by something else.

was not a photograph that the police already held.

If an Identification Parade Could Reasonably Have Been Held

[If the judge finds that an identification parade could reasonably have been held instead of identifying the accused from photographs, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, it would have been possible for the police to hold an identification parade instead of having NOW identify NOA from a photograph.

In an identification parade, a witness is asked whether they can identify the offender from a selection of people resembling the accused. This process has two main advantages over identification from photographs.

First, the witness is identifying an actual person, rather than a two-dimensional representation of that person. S/he is able to see all of the accused's physical characteristics, such as the way s/he moves and his/her facial expressions. This makes it more likely that the witness will accurately identify the offender.

Secondly, as the accused is present at an identification parade, s/he is able to obtain first-hand information about how it is carried out. S/he will be able to see what steps are taken to make sure that it is conducted fairly, rather than having to rely on cross-examination of the people present.

In this case, NOA was deprived of these benefits. S/he may also have lost any advantage s/he might have gained if an identification parade was inconclusive. You should take these disadvantages into account when assessing the evidence against NOA.

4.12.3 Charge: Single Suspect Identification

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

If the witness was presented with a single suspect to identify, add this section when the identification evidence is given, and again where indicated in the primary charge.

In this case, NOA was identified [insert circumstances of identification].

This type of identification is extremely unreliable, due to the fact that the witness is given just one option, instead of being provided with a selection of suspects to choose from. This greatly increases the likelihood that s/he will mistakenly identify the single suspect as the offender, relying on the fact that the police had narrowed down the selection to that one person.

It may be dangerous to rely on an identification made in these circumstances, or to give such evidence any significant value.

4.12.4 Charge: Court Identification

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

If the accused was identified in the precincts of the court, add this section when the identification evidence is given, and again where indicated in the primary charge.

In this case, NOA was identified [insert circumstances of identification].

This type of evidence is extremely unreliable, due to the risk that a witness will leap to the conclusion that the person they are being asked to identify must have been involved in the crime, because otherwise they would not have been at the court. Instead of comparing the person seen at the court with their memory of the person observed committing the crime, there is a danger that the witness may identify the accused on the basis of this false assumption. It may therefore be dangerous to rely on an identification made in these circumstances.

4.12.5 Charge: Dock Identification

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

If a dock identification took place, add this section when the identification evidence is given, and again where indicated in the primary charge.

In this case, NOA was identified here in court.

This type of identification is of no value to the issue of whether or not NOA committed the offence[s] charged. This is because, when asked in court to identify the person who committed the crime, the witness will inevitably point out the person who is on trial. NOA was only identified in this way as a formality, and you should not rely on that identification for any purpose.

4.13 Opinion Evidence

4.13.1 General Principles of Opinion Evidence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

What is Opinion Evidence?

1. The "opinion rule" provides that "evidence of an opinion" is generally inadmissible (Evidence Act 2008 s 76).[155]
2. While the Evidence Act 2008 does not define the term "opinion", it has been held that it refers to an "inference drawn from observed and communicable data" (Allstate Life Insurance Co v ANZ Banking Group Ltd (No 5) (1996) 64 FCR 73) or "evidence of a conclusion, usually judgmental or debatable, reasoned from facts" (R. W. Miller v Krupp Australia Pty Ltd (1992) 34 NSWLR 129. See also Hodgson v Amcor Ltd [2011] VSC 272).
3. Evidence of an "opinion" can be distinguished from evidence of a "fact". Where a witness simply gives evidence of something he or she observed, or of a particular state of past or present affairs, that will not be opinion evidence (see, e.g. Bodney v Bennell (2008) 167 FCR 84; Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Vines [2003] NSWSC 1095; Hodgson v Amcor Ltd [2011] VSC 272).

[155] See "Admissibility of Opinion Evidence" below for more information about the opinion rule.

4. Evidence of an "opinion" can also be distinguished from evidence of "experience". Evidence of a witness' experiences will not be opinion evidence, unless the witness proceeds to draw some inference from those experiences (see, e.g. Clark v Ryan (1960) 103 CLR 486).[156]

5. Hearsay evidence of an opinion is itself opinion evidence (R v Whyte [2006] NSWCCA 75; Jackson v Lithgow City Council [2008] NSWCA 312. But cf Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Rich (2005) 216 ALR 320).

6. The following matters have been held not to be opinion evidence for the purposes of the Uniform Evidence Acts:

    - Evidence given by anthropologists of their observations (Bodney v Bennell (2008) 167 FCR 84).
    - Evidence given by expert witnesses regarding their observations of an attempted reconstruction of an accident (Collaroy Services Beach Club Ltd v Haywood [2007] NSWCA 21).
    - Evidence given by witnesses about what they would have done in a hypothetical situation (Allstate Life Insurance Co v ANZ Banking Group Ltd (No 5) (1996) 64 FCR 73; Hughes Aircraft Systems International v Airservices Australia (1997) 80 FCR 276; Seltsam Pty Ltd v McNeill [2006] NSWCA 158).
    - Evidence given by an expert witness about how a certain type of professional would generally act in particular circumstances (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Vines [2003] NSWSC 1095).[157]
    - Evidence given by a member of an organisation about the information available to that organisation (Bank of Valletta PLC v National Crime Authority (1999) 90 FCR 565).
    - Evidence describing the workings of a complex piece of equipment, such as a computer (Hodgson v Amcor Ltd [2011] VSC 272).

Identification Evidence

7. It appears that identification evidence may be either evidence of fact or evidence of opinion, depending on the circumstances:

    - Where there is little risk of misidentification (e.g. where the witness identifies a person, clearly depicted in a studio photograph, as his or her spouse), identification evidence will normally be regarded as a statement of fact;
    - Where a real risk of misidentification is present (e.g. where the identification is made from a photograph which does not clearly depict the person who is its subject),[158] it will usually be appropriate to classify identification evidence as opinion evidence (see, e.g. R v Leung (1999) 47 NSWLR 405; Smith v R (2001) 206 CLR 650 (Kirby J); R v Drollett [2005] NSWCCA 356; R v Marsh [2005] NSWCCA 331).

[156] For example, where a witness with experience of how a particular type of vehicle behaves in certain conditions gives evidence of that experience, it will not be opinion evidence (Clark v Ryan (1960) 103 CLR 486).

[157] Whether or not this type of evidence will be opinion evidence will depend on the precise nature of the evidence given. It will not be opinion evidence where it is seen to be evidence of fact about professional practices or professional standards.

[158] See 4.12 Identification Evidence for a discussion of the many risks inherent in the process of identification.

8. This means that, in every case involving identification evidence, the trial judge must examine the nature of the evidence proposed to be adduced, and all of the relevant circumstances, to determine whether the evidence is opinion evidence (and is thus subject to the admissibility provisions outlined below) (R v Drollett [2005] NSWCCA 356).

Evidence in the Form of an Opinion

9. The opinion rule refers to "evidence of an opinion". It has been suggested that this phrase covers both of the following:
    - Evidence which is substantively an opinion (i.e. an inference drawn from observed and communicable data); and
    - Evidence of a fact or observation which is given in the form of an opinion (e.g. evidence from a witness that "in his or her opinion" another person was intoxicated) (S Odgers, Uniform Evidence Law (8th ed, 2009) [1.3.4090]).

Admissibility of Opinion Evidence

10. The opinion rule states that evidence of an opinion is not admissible to prove the subject matter of the opinion (Evidence Act 2008 s 76).[159]
11. There are two main exceptions to the opinion rule:
    - Opinion evidence from an "expert" witness is admissible if it is wholly or substantially based on specialised knowledge that the witness has obtained from training, study or experience (Evidence Act 2008 s 79).[160]
    - Opinion evidence from a "lay" witness is admissible if it is based on what the witness saw, heard or otherwise perceived about a matter or event, and evidence of the opinion is necessary to obtain an adequate account or understanding of the witness' perception of the matter or event (Evidence Act 2008 s 78).
12. Other exceptions to the opinion rule include:
    - Summaries of voluminous or complex documents (s 50(3));
    - Evidence that is admitted to prove something other than the subject matter of the opinion (s 77);[161]
    - Evidence about the existence or content of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander traditional laws and customs (s 78A);
    - Evidence of an admission (s 81);
    - Evidence of matters which are exceptions to the rule that usually excludes evidence of judgments and convictions (s 92(3)); and

---

[159] Section 76 states: "Evidence of an opinion is not admissible to prove the existence of a fact about the existence of which the opinion was expressed."

[161] For example, where the evidence is admitted to establish the consistency of the witness' conduct, rather than the truth of his or her assertions.

- Character evidence (ss 110–111) (see 4.3 Character Evidence).

Evidence Must Be Relevant

13. Opinion evidence, like any other evidence, is only admissible if it is relevant (Evidence Act 2008 ss 55–56).

14. The relevance of opinion evidence may depend upon an assessment of its factual basis. Opinion evidence will not be relevant if it does not have a rational factual basis (Evidence Act 2008 s 55; R v Panetta (1997) 26 MVR 332).

Abolition of Common Knowledge and Ultimate Issue Rules

15. Opinion evidence may not be excluded simply on the basis that it is about:

    - A matter of common knowledge; or
    - An ultimate issue in the proceeding (Evidence Act 2008 s 80).

16. Although the effect of this provision is to abolish the common knowledge and ultimate issue rules, it should be noted that s 80 does not make any evidence admissible. It simply provides that opinion evidence is not inadmissible on the specified bases (Idoport Pty Ltd v National Australia Bank Ltd (2000) 50 NSWLR 640).

17. This means that evidence which is about a matter of common knowledge, or which relates to the ultimate issue in a proceeding, should not always be admitted. Such evidence may be inadmissible on another basis (e.g. because it is not wholly or substantially based on specialised knowledge, and thus does not comply with the requirements of s 79), or it may be excluded at the judge's discretion under ss 135 or 137 (see, e.g. R v GK (2001) 53 NSWLR 317; Idoport Pty Ltd v National Australia Bank Ltd (2000) 50 NSWLR 640; Yates Property Corp v Boland (1998) 85 FCR 84).

Expert Evidence in Homicide Cases Involving Family Violence

18. In homicide cases involving family violence, evidence may be led to show:

    - The cumulative effect of family violence on a person, including the psychological effect;
    - The social, cultural or economic factors that may affect a person affected by family violence;
    - The nature and dynamics of relationships affected by family violence, including the possible consequences of separation from the abuser;
    - The psychological effect of violence on people who are or who have been in a relationship affected by family violence; and
    - The social or economic factors that affect people who are or who have been in a relationship affected by family violence (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AH).

Identification of Factual Basis

19. At common law, when expert opinion evidence is admitted:

    - The witness must state the factual basis for any conclusions he or she draws; and
    - The witness should explain how he or she has reached those conclusions (Clark v Ryan (1960) 103 CLR 486; R v Bonython (1984) 38 SASR 45; R v BDX (2009) 24 VR 288).

20. This allows the jury to determine whether the opinion has any value in light of their findings of fact, and to assess the weight to be given to that opinion (Arnotts Ltd v Trade Practices Commission (1990) 24 FCR 313; R v GK (2001) 53 NSWLR 317).

21. While the Evidence Act 2008 does not require witnesses to state the factual basis for their conclusions or to demonstrate their reasoning process, in the other Uniform Evidence Act jurisdictions they have generally been required to do so (see, e.g. Makita (Australia) Pty Ltd v Sprowles (2001) 52 NSWLR 705; Hevi Lift (PNG) Ltd v Etherington [2005] NSWCA 42; Seven Network Ltd v News Ltd (No 15) [2006] FCA 515).

22. Thus, it may remain prudent to require expert witnesses to identify the facts they have relied upon to form their opinion (see, e.g. Arnotts Ltd v Trade Practices Commission (1990) 24 FCR 313; R v GK (2001) 53 NSWLR 317; Makita (Australia) Pty Ltd v Sprowles (2001) 52 NSWLR 705. See also R v Anderson (2000) 1 VR 1; R v Ryan [2002] VSCA 176; R v Johnson (1994) 75 A Crim R 522).

23. Experts should also be required to explain how their opinion was reached, and the application of their expertise (R v Johnson (1994) 75 A Crim R 522; R v Haidley & Alford (1984) VR 229).

24. Experts may consider matters of common knowledge, as well as their specialised knowledge, when forming their opinion. They should explain that they are relying on this accumulation of knowledge, as well as the way in which they acquired that knowledge (Velevski v R (2002) 187 ALR 233; Arnotts Ltd v Trade Practices Commission (1990) 24 FCR 313).

25. The need to identify and explain the factual basis of an expert opinion will only arise where that basis is contested. If evidence is adduced without objection, the trial judge may ordinarily assume that all matters crucial to the admissibility of the evidence are conceded by the opposing party (Sydneywide Distributors Pty Ltd v Red Bull Australia Pty Ltd (2002) 234 FCR 549; [2002] FCAFC 157).

26. While the failure of an expert to explain his or her reasoning process will not necessarily render the evidence inadmissible, it will usually mean that it is less persuasive for the jury (HG v R (1999) 197 CLR 414 (Gaudron J). See also Guide Dog Owners' & Friends' Association Inc v Guide Dog Association (NSW & ACT) (1998) 154 ALR 527).

Hearsay Evidence Admitted as the Basis of an Opinion

27. Witnesses' opinions will often be based on out-of-court representations. Evidence of those representations will generally be admissible to explain the assumptions on which an opinion is based (see, e.g. R v Lawson [2000] NSWCCA 214).[162]

28. If admitted for this purpose, an out-of-court representation may also be used to prove the existence of any facts asserted in that representation (Evidence Act 2008 s 60).

29. It has been suggested that, due to the potential unfairness that may follow from the application of this rule, it may be preferable to avoid admitting evidence of out-of-court representations solely to explain the assumptions on which an opinion is based (R v Lawson [2000] NSWCCA 214 (Sperling J)).

30. If such evidence is admitted, it may be desirable to use the discretion in s 136 to limit the use that may be made of such evidence (Roach v Page (No 11) [2003] NSWSC 907. But see Harrington-Smith v Western Australia (No 2) (2003) 130 FCR 424; Alphapharm Pty Ltd v H Lundbeck A/S [2008] FCA 559; Bodney v Bennell (2008) 167 FCR 84).

Use of Opinion Evidence

31. The precise way in which the jury may use opinion evidence will vary depending on the nature of the evidence given and the purpose for which it was admitted (see "Admissibility of Opinion Evidence" above).

[162] As this evidence is not being admitted to prove the existence of the facts asserted by the representation, it is not captured by the hearsay rule: Evidence Act 2008 s 59(1).

32. This topic addresses the uses that may be made of opinion evidence that is admitted under Evidence Act 2008 s 79 (expert opinion evidence), s 78 (lay opinion evidence) and s 77 (evidence admitted for a different purpose).

Expert Opinion Evidence

33. The jury may use expert opinion evidence:[163]

    - To understand other evidence in the case; or
    - As the basis for drawing an inference (Taylor v R (1978) 22 ALR 599; Farrell v R (1998) 194 CLR 286).

34. Where an expert adopts an industry text or journal as an authoritative source, the jury may use any information contained in the text or journal as facts in the case if:

    - They accept that the expert has adopted the document; and
    - They accept the expert's evidence about that document. (PQ v Australian Red Cross Society & Ors [1992] VR 19).

Lay Opinion Evidence

35. Lay opinion evidence[164] may help the jury to understand the matter or event about which the witness gave evidence (see, e.g. R v Leung (1999) 47 NSWLR 405).

Opinion Evidence Admitted for a Different Purpose

36. If evidence of an opinion is relevant and admissible for a purpose other than proving the existence of the fact which is the subject of the opinion, the exclusionary opinion rule (s 76) does not apply (Evidence Act 2008 s 77).[165]

37. In such cases, the evidence may also be used to prove the existence of the fact which is the subject of the opinion (Allstate Life Insurance Co v ANZ Banking Group Ltd (No 5) (1996) 64 FCR 73; Hughes Aircraft Systems International v Airservices Australia (1997) 80 FCR 276).

38. In some cases it will be undesirable for the evidence to be used in this way. In such circumstances it may be appropriate to use the discretion in s 136 to limit the use that may be made of such evidence (see, e.g. Murex Diagnostics Australia Pty Ltd v Chiron Corporation (1995) 62 FCR 424; Perpetual Trustee Company Ltd v George; Estate of Conacher (No 2) 28/11/97 NSW SC; Roach v Page (No 11) [2003] NSWSC 907; James v Launceston City Council (2004) 13 Tas R 89; [2004] TASSC 69).

[163] Evidence that is wholly or substantially based on specialised knowledge that the witness has obtained from training, study or experience (Evidence Act 2008 s 79).

[164] Evidence that is based on what the witness saw, heard or otherwise perceived about a matter or event, which is necessary to obtain an adequate account or understanding of the witness' perception of the matter or event (Evidence Act 2008 s 78).

[165] For example, opinion evidence may be admitted to establish the consistency of a witness' conduct, rather than the truth of his or her assertions.

Jury Directions

39. The need for a direction on opinion evidence depends on whether a direction is sought or whether there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving a direction in the absence of a request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required. The following sections describe the content of directions, if the judge gives directions on opinion evidence.

40. The content of the jury directions will depend on the nature of the evidence given and the ways in which the jury may use that evidence (see "Use of Opinion Evidence" above).

41. No guidance has yet been provided about the directions to be given in relation to lay opinion evidence. The remainder of this topic therefore only addresses directions to be given in relation to expert opinion evidence.

Directions About Expert Opinion Evidence

42. Expert opinion often involves unfamiliar and technical matters. Judicial directions should ensure that the jury can understand the evidence and apply it to the facts of the case (Velevski v R (2002) 187 ALR 233; R v Gemmill (2004) 8 VR 242).

43. The judge's directions on opinion evidence should explain the significance of the evidence in the context of the case, and give any special directions needed to enable the jury to assess and use the evidence that has been led (Taylor v R (1978) 22 ALR 599).

44. The judge should ensure that the jury understands that, generally, only an expert is permitted to give evidence of his or her opinion. Other witnesses are generally limited to giving evidence of their own observations (Taylor v R (1978) 22 ALR 599; Farrell v R (1998) 194 CLR 286; Ramsay v Watson (1961) 108 CLR 642).

45. Where an expert witness has given evidence about the "ultimate issue",[166] the judge should make it clear that it is the jury's role to determine the issue (Australian Law Reform Commission, Evidence (Interim), Report 26 (1985) vol.1 para 743. See also Idoport Pty Ltd v National Australia Bank Ltd (2000) 50 NSWLR 640).

46. It is for the jury to decide whether an opinion is credible and what weight it should be given (R v Anderson (2000) 1 VR 1; Velevski v R (2002) 187 ALR 233).

47. The judge should tell the jury that they are entitled to reject the evidence if they are not satisfied that the science or the testing is sufficiently accurate, reliable or dependable. The jury is not bound by the opinion of experts, and must not be overawed by the scientific appearance of their opinions (R v Pantoja (1998) 88 A Crim R 554; R v Karger (2002) 83 SASR 135; United States v Baller (1975) 519 Fed 2d 463; R v Gilmore [1977] 2 NSWLR 935; R v Duke (1979) 22 SASR 46; R v Kotzmann [1998] 2 VR 123; R v Parker VicCA 10/8/1995).

48. Where a witness has been cross-examined about the nature and quality of his or her expertise, the jury should be told that a witness' competency and credit are relevant matters to take into account when determining the weight to be given to his or her evidence (see, e.g. Polycarpou v Australian Wire Industries Pty Ltd (1995) 36 NSWLR 49).

49. The jury should be told that expert evidence is only as valuable as the facts supporting the evidence. That evidence only has probative value if the jury accepts the facts that form the basis of the evidence (R v Kotzmann [1998] 2 VR 123).

[166] As the ultimate issue rule has been abolished (Evidence Act 2008 s 80), such evidence may now be admissible. See "Abolition of Common Knowledge and Ultimate Issue Rules" above.

50. The jury should be directed to examine the basis on which the expert formed his or her opinion, and to determine whether the facts constituting the basis have been proven (Nguyen v R (2007) 173 A Crim R 557).

51. The judge should tell the jury to consider the following matters when they evaluate the evidence of experts:

    - The witness' demeanour;
    - The way the opinion is expressed;
    - The quality of the reasons for the opinion;
    - The facts offered by the expert in support of his or her conclusions;
    - The witness' response to cross-examination;
    - Whether the witness appeared to be impartial, or whether s/he was biased and overstated his or her evidence (R v Anderson (2000) 1 VR 1; Taylor v R (1978) 22 ALR 599).

Unanimous Expert Evidence

52. Where there is unanimous agreement amongst expert witnesses, the jury should be told that they are not bound by the experts' opinion. However, they may only reject that evidence if:

    - The facts underlying the opinion are not present;
    - The process of reasoning leading to the opinion is unsound; or
    - There is some factor that casts doubt on the validity of the opinion expressed (Taylor v R (1978) 22 ALR 599; R v Matusevich & Thompson [1976] VR 470; R v Matheson [1958] 1 WLR 474; R v Hilder (1997) 97 A Crim R 70; R v Klamo (2008) 18 VR 644).

Conflicting Expert Evidence

53. Where the evidence of expert witnesses conflicts, the jury should be told that they are entitled to prefer the evidence of one expert over another. The role of the jury is to select the evidence that they shall accept, and this includes expert evidence (Velevski v R (2002) 187 ALR 233; Chamberlain v R (No 2) (1983) 153 CLR 521; R v Gemmill (2004) 8 VR 242; R v GK (2001) 53 NSWLR 317; R v NCT (2009) 26 VR 247).

54. It is therefore not appropriate for the judge to direct the jury that one expert is superior to another. This intrudes on the role of the jury (R v Gemmill (2004) 8 VR 242).

55. In exceptional cases, the jury may be incapable of resolving a conflict between experts on matters of science. The judge should tell the jury that they must not accept disputed scientific evidence that is unfavourable to the accused unless there is a good reason to reject the defence evidence (Velevski v R (2002) 187 ALR 233).

56. Where the jury's decision about which expert to accept is likely to determine the accused's guilt or innocence, the judge may tell the jury that they may only accept the evidence of the expert who is adverse to the accused if they are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that his or her opinion is correct (R v Anderson (2000) 1 VR 1; R v Sodo (1975) 61 Cr App R 131).

57. A direction that the jury must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the prosecution expert is correct should not be given in all cases. Such a direction is only required when there are conflicting experts, and resolution of that conflict by the jury is likely to determine the case against the accused. In other cases the direction should not be given, as it will tend to isolate one piece of evidence and invite the jury to decide the case solely on the basis of that evidence (R v Middleton [2000] WASCA 213; R v Anderson (2000) 1 VR 1; R v Nicholas [1989] Tas R (NC) N24).

Expert Evidence About Witness Credibility or Reliability

58. Where expert evidence about a witness' reliability is given, the judge should clearly direct the jury that they must not allow the expert to usurp their function of assessing the credibility of witnesses (Farrell v R (1998) 194 CLR 286).

59. If the evidence of the expert is limited to suggesting that the witness may suffer a disorder that affects his or her reliability, the judge may comment on the limited probative value of that evidence (Farrell v R (1998) 194 CLR 286).

Expert Evidence About Mental Impairment

60. Expert evidence will usually be necessary to establish a defence under s 20 of the Crimes (Mental Impairment and Unfitness to be Tried) Act 1997.

61. In such cases, the judge should relate the expert evidence to the test for mental impairment (Taylor v R (1978) 22 ALR 599; Mizzi v R (1960) 105 CLR 659. See Mental Impairment).

62. While the jury is not bound by the expert evidence, the judge must ensure that they do not ignore unchallenged expert evidence and substitute their common sense view of the evidence (R v Wiese [1969] VR 953; R v Gemmill (2004) 8 VR 242).

63. The judge should warn the jury that, when assessing the expert evidence, they should not assume that the accused would reason in the same way as a person without a mental illness. Common assumptions about sane behaviour may be wrong, and the jury should carefully consider any expert evidence (R v Gemmill (2004) 8 VR 242; Taylor v R (1978) 22 ALR 599; R v Matusevich & Thompson [1976] VR 470; Mizzi v R (1960) 105 CLR 659; R v Weise [1969] VR 953).

Expert Evidence About Child Sexual Abuse

64. A person who has specialised knowledge about child development and child behaviour may give evidence relating to the development and behaviour of children generally, as well as about the development and behaviour of children who have been victims of sexual offences (or offences similar to sexual offences) (Evidence Act 2008 s 79(2)).

65. This evidence may be relevant to a range of matters in a trial, including testimonial capacity, the credibility of a child witness, the beliefs and perceptions held by a child, and the reasonableness of those beliefs and perceptions (Explanatory Memoranda to the Evidence Act 2008).

66. This evidence may also assist the jury to assess other evidence in the case, or to address misconceived notions about children and their behaviour (Explanatory Memoranda to the Evidence Act 2008).

67. Such evidence should usually only relate to the general behaviour and development of children who are victims of sexual offences. The evidence is designed to educate the jury and correct erroneous beliefs by showing that "counter-intuitive" behaviour does not detract from the complainant's credibility. However, it will rarely be appropriate for a witness to give opinion evidence on whether the complainant's behaviour makes it more likely that the complainant has been the victim of a sexual offence (MA v R (2013) 40 VR 564).

68. However, the admission of such evidence might invite the jury to improperly reason as follows:

    - Abuse of children elicits certain behavioural responses;
    - The complainant exhibited some or all of those behaviours;
    - Therefore the complainant is likely to be telling the truth about having been abused, or is likely to have been abused, or was abused (Australian Law Reform Commission, Uniform Evidence Law, Report 102 (2005) para 9.157).

69. It may therefore be appropriate in cases where such evidence is admitted to direct the jury not to reason in this way (Australian Law Reform Commission Report 102, Uniform Evidence Law, para 9.157).

4.13.1.1 Charge: Uncontested Expert Evidence

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge may be given where expert witnesses give opinion evidence about a matter on which they unanimously agree.[167]

See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

I must now give you directions about expert evidence.

[Insert names of expert witnesses] were asked by the [prosecution/defence] to give evidence about [describe issue] because they are experts in the field. [If appropriate, describe the experts' fields of expertise, qualifications and experience.]

In the course of giving evidence, these witnesses expressed their opinions about [describe issue and summarise experts' opinions].

Ordinarily, witnesses are not allowed to give their opinions in court. They must confine their evidence to their own observations. This is because it is you who are the judges of facts, and so usually it is only your opinion that is relevant.

However, the law says that people with specialised knowledge or training are allowed to give their opinions about matters within their field of expertise, if that may assist you in making your decision.

In this case, the evidence of [insert names of expert witnesses] may assist you in determining [explain permissible uses of the expert evidence and any limitations on use].

Role of Jury

You are not required to accept NOW's opinion. You are the judges of fact in this case, and even though NOW are experts in their fields, their opinions are merely pieces of evidence like any other, which you may accept or reject.

When assessing NOW's opinion, you should consider factors such as [describe any factors relevant to the assessment of NOW's evidence, such as his/her qualifications, objectivity, or comparison process. Summarise any evidence and/or arguments addressing these factors].

You will, however, appreciate that the [prosecution/defence] does not challenge NOW's evidence, nor his/her expertise.

[Where relevant add additional directions concerning particular types of expert evidence. See:

- 4.13.2.1 Charge: DNA Evidence
- 4.13.3.1 Charge: Fingerprint Evidence
- 4.13.4.1 Charge: Handwriting Evidence (Expert Witness)]

[If appropriate, summarise and explain any relevant prosecution and defence arguments in relation to the witnesses.]

4.13.1.2 Charge: Contested Expert Evidence

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge may be given where expert witnesses give conflicting evidence.

See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

[167] Although this charge has been designed for use where multiple witnesses give evidence about which they unanimously agree, it can also be used (with appropriate modifications) in cases where only one expert witness gives uncontested evidence.

I must now give you directions about expert evidence.

[Insert names of expert witnesses] were asked by the [prosecution/defence] to give evidence about [describe issue] because they are experts in the field. [If appropriate, describe the experts' fields of expertise, qualifications and experience.]

In the course of giving evidence, these witnesses expressed their conflicting opinions about [describe issue and summarise experts' opinions].

Ordinarily, witnesses are not allowed to give their opinions in court. They must confine their evidence to their own observations. This is because it is you who are the judges of facts, and so usually it is only your opinion that is relevant.

However, the law says that people with specialised knowledge or training are allowed to give their opinions about matters within their field of expertise, if that may assist you in making your decision.

In this case, [insert names of expert witnesses] evidence may assist you in determining [explain permissible uses of the expert evidence and any limitations on use].

It is for you to determine whose opinion, if any, to accept, and how to use that opinion. You are the judges of fact in this case, and even though these witnesses are experts in their field, their opinions are merely a piece of evidence like any other, which you may accept or reject.

When assessing evidence given by experts, you should consider factors such as the witnesses' qualifications, their demeanour, the way they expressed their opinions, and how they responded to cross-examination. You should also consider whether the witnesses appeared objective, or whether they seemed biased and overstated their evidence.

You should also examine the quality of the reasons offered for an opinion, and the facts that support that opinion. A witness's opinion is only valuable if the facts on which it is based are true.

[If there is a dispute about the factual bases of the experts' evidence, explain the dispute to the jury and summarise the relevant arguments.]

[If resolution of the conflict is likely to determine the accused's guilt, add the following shaded section.]

While it is for you to determine which evidence to accept, I remind you that it is for the prosecution to prove the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt. This means that you may only accept [insert name of prosecution witness] opinion that [describe opinion] if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that his/her opinion is correct.

[If two or more experts disagree over a matter of science, add the following shaded section.]

In this case part of the dispute between the witnesses is about scientific matters. [Summarise dispute.] If you find that you cannot resolve this conflict by considering the witnesses' evidence, then you must give the accused the benefit of your doubt, and reject [insert name of prosecution witness] evidence.You can only accept that evidence if you find there to be a good reason to reject [insert name of defence witness] evidence.

[If appropriate, summarise and explain any relevant prosecution and defence arguments in relation to the witnesses.]

4.13.1.3 Charge: Lay Opinion Evidence

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge may be given where a lay witness gives opinion evidence.

I must now give you directions about opinion evidence.

NOW was asked by the [prosecution/defence] to give evidence about [describe matter or event]. In the course of giving evidence, s/he expressed his/her opinion about [describe issue and summarise witness' opinion].

Ordinarily, witnesses are not allowed to give their opinions in court. They must confine their evidence to their own observations. This is because it is you who are the judges of facts, and so usually it is only your opinion that is relevant.

However, the law says that when a person gives evidence about something that s/he witnessed, s/he may give his/her opinion about that thing if it is necessary in order for you to properly understand what it was that s/he witnessed. That is the case here. [Explain how the opinion evidence may assist the jury to understand the witness' account.]

You should keep in mind, however, that [describe opinion] is only NOW's opinion. You are not required to accept it. You are the judges of fact in this case. NOW's opinion is merely a piece of evidence like any other, which you may accept or reject.

When assessing NOW's opinion, you should examine the quality of the reasons offered for NOW's opinion, and the facts that support that opinion. A witness's opinion is only valuable if the facts on which it is based are true.

You should also consider factors such as [describe any factors relevant to the assessment of NOW's evidence, such as his/her objectivity. Summarise any evidence and/or arguments addressing these factors].

4.13.2 DNA Evidence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

What is DNA Evidence?

1. "DNA evidence" refers to a type of expert evidence in which the DNA of a sample found at a crime scene (a "forensic sample") is compared with a DNA sample provided by the accused (a "reference sample").
2. As DNA evidence is a type of expert evidence, the principles outlined in General Principles of Expert Evidence apply (subject to any modifications noted below).
3. DNA may be examined and compared using:
    - "Nuclear DNA testing" which examines and compares the DNA contained in the nucleus of a cell. Nuclear DNA is unique to an individual (apart from identical twins).
    - "Mitochondrial DNA testing" which examines and compares the DNA contained in the mitochondria. This does not produce a unique result, as mitochondrial DNA is inherited entirely from the mother, and so is the same between siblings (R v Rye [2007] VSCA 247);
    - "Y-STR testing" which examines and compares the DNA contained on the Y chromosome. This is comparable to mitochondrial testing, as it is inherited entirely from the father, and so is the same between siblings (Tilley v The King [2023] SASCA 80, [81]).

What does DNA evidence establish?

4. The DNA strands in chromosomes are held together by base pairs. There are approximately three billion base pairs, and about three million of those vary between individuals (R v Noll [1999] 3 VR 704; R v Jarrett (1994) 62 SASR 443).
5. Due to the uniqueness of nuclear DNA, if all base pairs of two nuclear DNA samples were tested and matched, it would be possible to say that the samples came from the same person, or an identical twin.

6. However, DNA testing does not measure and compare every single base pair of the relevant samples. It only measures and compares the length of certain strings of base pairs at known positions called "loci" (R v GK (2001) 53 NSWLR 317; R v Pantoja (1996) 88 A Crim R 554).

7. In Victoria, at least 21 loci (singular, locus) are measured as a standard set. The loci that are measured contain sequences of DNA known as short tandem repeats, which consist of repeated sequences of DNA which are known to be highly variable between people. The number of short tandem repeats at each loci is referred to an allele, and alleles are inherited from the person's mother and father. The frequency of alleles at each loci has been measured.

8. By comparing the alleles present in a forensic sample with a reference sample, forensic scientists can give an opinion if the forensic sample could have come from the person who provided the reference sample. If the reference sample and forensic sample display different alleles at any locus, and that difference cannot be reasonably explained, then the person who provided the reference sample is excluded as a contributor to the forensic sample.

9. If the alleles in the reference sample match those in the forensic sample, then the person who provided the reference sample is not excluded.

10. Using information about the frequency of alleles at each loci within a particular population group, a suitably qualified expert can give evidence about the likelihood ratio. This involves comparing two alternative propositions: 1. That the person who provided the reference sample is the source of the DNA in the forensic sample; and 2. An unknown and unrelated person chosen at random from the relevance population is the source of the DNA in the forensic sample.

11. Expert witnesses may state their conclusions about the likelihood ratio in the following, equally mathematically correct, forms:

    - As a ratio of the number of people who would be expected to have the same DNA profile (e.g. 1 in 100);
    - As a ratio of the number of people who would not be expected to have the same DNA profile (e.g. 99 in 100);
    - As a percentage of the number of people who would be expected to have the same DNA profile (e.g. 1%);
    - As a percentage of the number of people who would not be expected to have the same DNA profile (e.g. 99%);
    - As the number of people in Australia who would be expected to have the same DNA profile; and
    - As the number of people in Australia who would not be expected to have the same DNA profile (see Aytugrul v R [2010] NSWCCA 272, [86] per McClelland CJ at CL).

12. As all of these values express the same information there is no reason to prefer one method of expression over another (provided the numbers are accurately calculated). Experts should express their conclusions in a way that the jury can readily comprehend (Aytugrul v R [2010] NSWCCA 272 per Simpson and Fullerton JJ (McClelland CJ at CL contra). See also R v GK (2001) 53 NSWLR 317; R v Doheny & Adams [1997] 1 Cr App R 369).

13. To avoid the risk that the jury may be overwhelmed by exceptionally high probabilities or likelihood ratios, witnesses may be permitted to present the statistical evidence concerning the probability of a match qualitatively rather than quantitatively, by describing the probability of a match with the accused as "strong", "very strong" or "extremely strong" (see Forbes v R (2009) 167 ACTR 1).

14. These frequencies are recorded in databases, which have been built up using previous genetic testing. A database (and the consequent results obtained from that database) will only be reliable if it contains a representative sample of the general community or, if the offender is from a specific ethnic group, the relevant ethnic community (R v Noll [1999] 3 VR 704; R v Pantoja (1996) 88 A Crim R 554).

Samples from More than One Person

15. Where a forensic sample contains DNA material from several people, an expert witness may give evidence on the probability of the profile if a particular person is a contributor to the sample rather than if the sample was the product of a group of randomly selected people.[168]

16. The expert may also give evidence on the likelihood of the DNA having come from one specified set of contributors (e.g., those alleged by the prosecution) rather than another (e.g., those alleged by the defence). This will allow the jury to assess the relative probability of the prosecution and defence hypotheses (R v Berry & Wenitong (2007) 17 VR 153).

Standard of Proof

17. Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, the only matters that must be proved beyond reasonable doubt are the elements and the absence of any relevant defences (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 61. See also Payne v R [2015] VSCA 291, [13]; DPP v Roder [2024] HCA 15, [15]).

18. However, in some cases, DNA evidence may be substantially the only evidence of one or more elements. In such cases, it may be appropriate for the judge to clearly identify for the jury the importance of the evidence. Judges should discuss the issue with counsel and hear submissions on what additional directions or comments are appropriate. One option is to refer to the DNA evidence and direct the jury that it must be satisfied that that evidence proves the element beyond reasonable doubt (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 61, Example).

Jury Directions

19. DNA evidence is not a class of evidence that calls for special directions in every case (R v Berry & Wenitong (2007) 17 VR 153; R v Karger (2002) 83 SASR 135).

20. Where DNA evidence is given, the judge must:

    - Ensure that the jury understands the issues and the evidence in the case; and
    - Give any directions that are necessary to ensure that the jury does not misuse the evidence.

21. Judges have traditionally accomplished these goals by giving a careful summary and explaining the limitations of the evidence (R v Berry & Wenitong (2007) 17 VR 153; R v Karger (2002) 83 SASR 135).

22. Following the Jury Directions Act 2015, a judge is not required to summarise the evidence, but must identify so much of the evidence the judge considers necessary to assist the jury to determine the issues in the trial (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 65, 66).

23. The need for directions on DNA evidence will depend on whether any directions are sought or whether there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving a direction in the absence of any request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required. See also 3.9 Judge's Summing Up on Issues and Evidence.

[168] The expert uses population statistics to determine the probability of each string length that is measured. Provided each string length is independent, these probabilities are multiplied together to determine the probability of all string lengths being detected in a random sample.

24. Ordinarily, expert evidence about DNA only needs to inform the jury of the relevant likelihood ratios and provide a basic explanation of what they mean. The language used should be as simple and comprehensible as possible, and the jury needs to focus on what the statistical results are and what those results do and do not tend to prove. It is not necessary to understand the underlying science of DNA profiling (Tuite v The Queen [2020] VSCA 318, [113]; Vyater v The Queen [2020] VSCA 32).

25. There are, however, some cases where a more detailed explanation of DNA evidence is required. For example, it may be necessary to explain:

    - The jury's role in determining whether a certain person is excluded or not excluded as a possible contributor to the forensic sample;
    - The jury's role in assessing the accuracy and reliability of the expert evidence; and
    - The consequences of finding that a person may have been a contributor to the forensic sample.

26. The judge may also need to address any fallacies put forward by the parties.

Assessing whether a person is excluded or not excluded

27. Where directions are required about whether the accused could be a contributor to the forensic sample, the judge should tell the jury that it is a question of fact for them whether the accused is excluded or not excluded as a possible contributor to the forensic sample (R v Pantoja (1996) 88 A Crim R 554; R v Karger (2002) 83 SASR 135).

28. This will usually be determined by the jury using the evidence given by the expert witnesses (R v Pantoja (1996) 88 A Crim R 554; R v Karger (2002) 83 SASR 135).

Was the Testing Accurate and Reliable?

29. Where directions are required about whether the testing was accurate and reliable, the judge should tell the jury that is a question of fact for them (R v Pantoja (1996) 88 A Crim R 554; R v Karger (2002) 83 SASR 135).

30. In some cases, this may require the jury to consider whether the evidence may have been affected by laboratory error (R v Karger (2002) 83 SASR 135).

31. In other cases, it may require the jury to consider the accuracy and reliability of the method used to generate the relevant evidence (see, e.g., Xie v The Queen [2021] NSWCCA 1).

32. The jury may also need to consider any limitations in the database used by the experts to assess the probability of the sample coming from someone other than the accused (R v Pantoja (1996) 88 A Crim R 554).

33. This may be particularly relevant where there is evidence that the offender is a member of a particular ethnic group that may have different genetic characteristics from the general community. The jury should be directed to consider these limitations and their effect on the statistical evidence (R v Pantoja (1996) 88 A Crim R 554).

What Are the Consequences of the Jury's Findings?

34. When directing the jury about the significance of DNA evidence, the judge should generally explain to the jury that evidence that the accused is a possible contributor to the forensic sample is not direct evidence that the accused committed the offence. It is only circumstantial evidence, and must be considered in light of the other evidence in the case (R v Karger (2002) 83 SASR 135; R v Vivona Vic CCA 12/9/94).

35. Precisely what the jury should be told about the use they can make of this circumstantial evidence will depend on the content of the evidence:

- Where there is evidence of the likelihood ratio, the jury should be told that (if accepted) the evidence establishes that the accused could be the source of the forensic sample, and indicates the likelihood that another person could also be responsible for the forensic sample (R v Karger (2002) 83 SASR 135; R v Vivona Vic CCA 12/9/94).
- When the evidence only demonstrates that the accused cannot be excluded from the possible contributors to the forensic sample (that is, there is no likelihood ratio, and the evidence is not exclusionary), the jury should be told that the evidence (if accepted) cannot establish the accused's guilt, and can only demonstrate that the accused cannot be excluded from the class of people who could be guilty (see R v Rye [2007] VSCA 247, [55]–[57]).
- Where there is evidence that accused is excluded as a possible contributor to the forensic sample, the jury should be told that the evidence (if accepted) establishes that the accused is not responsible for the forensic sample (R v GK (2001) 53 NSWLR 317; R v Pantoja (1996) 88 A Crim R 554).
- Where the evidence in the case has raised other possible explanations for the accused to be a contributor to the forensic sample (such as contamination, secondary transfer or innocent deposit), the jury should be told that it must consider those other explanations when deciding what weight to give the DNA evidence.

Warning Against Misuse of Evidence

36. Expert evidence on the likelihood ratio is apt to mislead the jury. In particular, it creates a risk that the jury will adopt the following erroneous reasoning (known as the "prosecutor's fallacy"):
    - Only one person in a million has a DNA profile that matches the forensic sample;
    - The accused has a DNA profile that matches the forensic sample;
    - Therefore there is a million to one probability that the accused is responsible for the forensic sample and is guilty (R v Doheny & Adams [1997] 1 Cr App R 369; R v Karger (2002) 83 SASR 135; R v GK (2001) 53 NSWLR 317).
37. This line of reasoning fails to recognise that even though only one person in a million has a DNA profile that matches the forensic sample, in a country the size of Australia (with over 25 million people), it is statistically likely that the DNA of at least 20 other people will also match that sample (R v GK (2001) 53 NSWLR 317; R v Doheny & Adams [1997] 1 Cr App R 369).
38. It is not necessary to warn against the prosecutor's fallacy in all cases. The judge should consider the need for a direction based on the following factors:
    - Whether a direction is requested;
    - The clarity of the witness' evidence and the witness' chain of reasoning;
    - The purpose for which the evidence has been led;
    - The circumstantial nature of the evidence;
    - The risk of the jury misusing the evidence;
    - The arguments raised in the case;
    - The magnitude of the likelihood ratio, especially where it exceeds the population of Australia (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16; R v Karger (2002) 83 SASR 135; Xie v The Queen [2021] NSWCCA 1, [307]–[318]).
39. If a direction is necessary, the judge should generally warn the jury against engaging in the prosecutor's fallacy when the DNA evidence is led, and again in the final directions (R v Doheny & Adams [1997] 1 Cr App R 369; R v Karger (2002) 83 SASR 135; R v GK (2001) 53 NSWLR 317; Latcha v R (1998) 127 NTR 1).

40. The judge may also warn the jury not to disregard the strength of the likelihood ratio. Even if DNA evidence is not capable of proving to a scientific certainty that the accused is the contributor, it may be strong circumstantial evidence (R v GK (2001) 53 NSWLR 317).

41. Where the likelihood ratio is sufficiently high, the jury should consider the fact that there is no evidence connecting any other (random) people with a matching DNA profile to the offence (R v GK (2001) 53 NSWLR 317; R v Doheny & Adams [1997] 1 Cr App R 369).

4.13.2.1 Charge: DNA Evidence

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

[In most cases, DNA evidence provides such a high likelihood ratio that jurors can confidently use it to decide that the DNA material comes from the accused rather than another person. Instead, the forensic contest concerns the circumstances in which the DNA material was deposited. In other words, the case is fought on the issue of transference, rather than identity. This direction is designed for a transference case where the DNA evidence concerns the likelihood that the accused is a contributor.

Where the evidence involves a particularly low likelihood ratio, a different direction is required, which alerts the jury to the limited ability of the evidence to support a conclusion of identity and warns the jury against any overreliance on objectively weak forensic science evidence.

Where the evidence is about the identity of a person other than the accused, the direction must be modified, based on the issues in dispute.

This charge is designed to be used in conjunction with Charge: Uncontested Expert Evidence.]

Limitations of Evidence

Even if you accept NOW's evidence, that does not necessarily mean that NOA must be guilty of the offence[s] charged.

[If the witness only provided the likelihood ratio, use the following shaded section]

You have heard NOW explain that the DNA evidence is estimated to be [identify likelihood ratio] times more likely to occur if the DNA originated from NOA than if it originated from an unknown and unrelated person randomly selected from the [identify relevant population group, e.g. Australian Caucasian"] population.[169]

[If the witness provided the verbal equivalent to the likelihood ratio, use the following shaded section]

You have heard NOW explain that the DNA was analysed and provides [identify verbal equivalent expression, e.g. "very strong support"] to the proposition that the DNA originated from NOA rather than an unknown and unrelated person randomly selected from the [identify relevant population group,

[169] Where there is a mixed profile, use the following direction instead: You have heard NOW explain that the DNA profile analysed is estimated to be [identify likelihood ratio] times more likely to occur if NOA contributed to the sample than if an unknown and unrelated person randomly selected from the [identify relevant population group, e.g. "Australian Caucasian"] population was the contributor.

e.g. Australian Caucasian"] population.[170]

The parties accept that it was NOA's DNA material which NOW identified on the [identify relevant item]. The real issue is when, how and why NOA's DNA material was left there.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments, including any opinion evidence about the likelihood of direct contact or secondary transfer].

You must consider these matters when you are deciding what weight to put on NOW's evidence.

As I told you earlier in my directions,[171] you can only convict the accused if you are satisfied that his/her/their guilt is the only reasonable conclusion to be drawn from the whole of the evidence. You must therefore consider whether the prosecution has satisfied you that NOA's DNA was deposited on the [identify relevant item] when [refer to circumstances of offence]. In other words, you must consider whether the prosecution has satisfied you that NOA's DNA was not deposited through some other means, such as [identify explanations for DNA evidence consistent with innocence].

4.13.3 Fingerprint Evidence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

What is Fingerprint Evidence

1. "Fingerprint evidence" refers to a type of expert evidence in which the characteristics and patterns of two sets of fingerprints (such as the ridges, furrows and minutiae points) are compared by an expert witness.
2. As fingerprint evidence is a type of expert evidence, the principles outlined in 4.13.1 General Principles of Opinion Evidence apply (subject to any modifications noted below).

What does Fingerprint Evidence Establish?

3. A fingerprint is a unique quality of an individual (R v Lawless [1974] VR 398; R v O'Callaghan [1976] VR 676; R v Parker [1912] VLR 152).
4. Due to the uniqueness of fingerprints, if the characteristics and patterns of two fingerprint samples are found to match at a sufficient number of points, it is possible to say that the samples came from the same person.

[170] Where there is a mixed profile, use the following direction instead: You have heard NOW explain that the DNA was analysed and provides [identify verbal equivalent expression, e.g. "very strong support"] to the proposition that NOA contributed to the sample rather than an unknown and unrelated person randomly selected from the [identify relevant population group, e.g. "Australian Caucasian"] population.

[171] See 3.6.1 Charge: Circumstantial evidence and Inferences. If this direction has not been given, this direction must be modified.

5. However, it will not always be possible to compare the characteristics and patterns of two samples at a sufficient number of points to state with certainty that they came from the same person.[172] In such cases, although the characteristics and patterns may match at the points at which they have been compared, one of the samples may have come from a different person who happens to have the same features at those points (but different features elsewhere in his or her prints).
6. In such cases, a "match" between the two samples only establishes that they could have come from the same person. That is, the evidence does not exclude the possibility that the same person was responsible for both samples.[173]
7. For fingerprint evidence to have any further probative force in such cases, evidence must also be given about the probability of a match with a random member of the population. See 4.13.2 DNA Evidence for a discussion of principles concerning such evidence.

Use of Expert Evidence

8. The identification of the characteristics and patterns of fingerprints is a matter calling for expert evidence, as the detection of similarities between sets of fingerprints is often beyond the capacity of a lay person (R v Lawless [1974] VR 398; R v O'Callaghan [1976] VR 676; Bennett v Police [2005] SASC 415 (Perry ACJ)).
9. An expert is not required to identify every similarity that s/he observed between the two sets of fingerprints. S/he may explain the process used to compare the fingerprints and state that, by using that process, s/he determined that the two sets of fingerprints matched. The lack of detail in the expert's evidence is merely a matter that affects the weight of the evidence (Bennett v Police [2005] SASC 167; Bennett v Police [2005] SASC 415).

Jury Use of Fingerprint Images

10. The images of the fingerprint samples may be admitted as exhibits. The jury may examine the exhibits to help them understand and evaluate the expert evidence (R v Lawless [1974] VR 398; R v O'Callaghan [1976] VR 676).
11. However, the images of the fingerprint samples do not need to be tendered in all cases. The expert's evidence of his or her examination of the fingerprints can provide the basis for his or her opinion (Bennett v Police [2005] SASC 167; Bennett v Police [2005] SASC 415).

Jury Directions

12. The need for a direction about fingerprint evidence depends on whether a direction is sought or whether there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving a direction in the absence of a request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.
13. If the judge directs the jury about fingerprint evidence, the following issues should usually be addressed:
    - The jury's role in determining whether or not there is a match between the samples;

---

[172] For example, where only a partial print has been found at a crime scene, or where the samples are not sufficiently clear.

[173] This is analogous to the situation in relation to DNA testing. See 4.13.2 DNA Evidence.

- The consequences of finding that the fingerprint samples match.

Is there a Match?

14. The judge should tell the jury that it is a question of fact for them whether there is a match between the fingerprint samples. The expert evidence is admitted only to assist the jury to make this determination (R v Lawless [1974] VR 398; R v O'Callaghan [1976] VR 676; R v Parker [1912] VLR 152).

15. In making this determination, the jury should consider whether the comparison was accurate and reliable (see 4.13.2 DNA Evidence).

What Are the Consequences of the Jury's Findings?

16. The judge should explain to the jury the consequences of finding that the samples match. This will differ depending on the evidence that has been presented.

17. If the characteristics and patterns of two fingerprint samples have been found to match at a sufficient number of points that it is possible to say with certainty[174] that the samples came from the same person, the jury should be directed that, if accepted, the evidence can be used to find that the fingerprints came from that person (see, e.g. R v Lawless [1974] VR 398; R v O'Callaghan [1976] VR 676). The consequences of that finding should also be explained.

18. If the characteristics and patterns of two fingerprint samples have not been found to match at a sufficient number of points that it is possible to say with certainty that the samples came from the same person, the judge should explain that the evidence only establishes that the prints could have come from the same person.[175]

19. If evidence of the probability of a match with a random member of the population is also given, the jury should be told that (if accepted) the evidence indicates the likelihood that another person could also be responsible for the forensic sample. See 4.13.2 DNA Evidence for further explanation of this issue.

4.13.3.1 Charge: Fingerprint Evidence

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge is for use in conjunction with 4.13.1.1 Charge: Uncontested Expert Evidence in cases where:

i) The fingerprint evidence inculpates the accused;

ii) That evidence is given by a single witness; and

iii) The features of the relevant fingerprint samples have been found to match at a sufficient number of points that it is possible to say with certainty that the samples came from the same person.[176]

See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

[174] Subject to any error in the comparison process.

[175] This is analogous to the situation in relation to DNA testing. See 4.13.2 DNA Evidence.

[176] See 4.13.3 Fingerprint Evidence for a discussion of this requirement.

If the features of the relevant fingerprint samples have not been found to match at a sufficient number of points that it is possible to say with certainty that the samples came from the same person, the charge will need to be modified. In such circumstances, 4.13.2.1 Charge: DNA Evidence may provide some assistance.

If the evidence exculpates the accused, or conflicting evidence is given by expert witnesses, the charge will also need to be modified. In such circumstances, 4.13.1 General Principles of Opinion Evidence may provide some assistance.

Use of Images

[If images of the two sets of fingerprints have been admitted as exhibits, add the following shaded section:]

To help you to understand and evaluate NOW's evidence, you have been given copies of the images s/he compared. [Identify relevant exhibits].

When you look at these exhibits, remember that you are not fingerprint experts. Comparing fingerprints is a task that calls for specialised skills. While you may look at the exhibits, you should be guided by NOW's evidence. You should not reject that evidence just because you cannot see the similarities s/he described.

Use of Evidence

If you accept NOW's opinion, you can use that evidence to find that [describe permissible use of the evidence, e.g. "the fingerprints found at the crime scene belonged to NOA].

However, you should keep in mind the fact that the fingerprint evidence is just one piece of circumstantial evidence, and must be considered in the light of the other evidence in the case. You will remember what I have told you about circumstantial evidence.[177]

[Summarise and explain any prosecution and defence arguments in relation to the fingerprint evidence that have not yet been addressed.]

4.13.4 Handwriting Evidence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

What is Handwriting Evidence?

1. "Handwriting evidence" refers to a type of expert evidence in which a sample of a person's handwriting is compared with the handwriting in a document about which authorship is disputed.
2. As handwriting evidence is a type of expert evidence, the principles outlined in 4.13.1 General Principles of Opinion Evidence apply (subject to any modifications noted below).

[177] If the judge has not given a direction on circumstantial evidence, this should be modified accordingly.

Handwriting Comparison Evidence

3. A handwriting expert may give evidence on the similarities and differences between a handwriting sample and a disputed document, and give an opinion on whether the sample and the document were written by the same person (Evidence Act 1958 s 148; R v Mazzone (1985) 43 SASR 330).

4. A non-expert witness who is familiar with the handwriting of the alleged author may also give evidence on whether s/he believes the disputed document was written by the alleged author. This is an exception to the rule prohibiting opinion evidence from non-expert witnesses (R v Mazzone (1985) 43 SASR 330; W v R (2006) 16 Tas R 1).

Provision of Original Documents to the Jury

5. The jury should generally be given original documents so that they can compare the handwriting. Copies may be used if providing original documents is not possible or necessary in the circumstances of the case (R v Burns & Collins (2001) 123 A Crim R 226).

Jury Directions

6. The authorship of disputed documents is a question of fact for the jury to determine (Adami v R (1959) 108 CLR 605; R v Knight (2001) 160 FLR 465; Jeans v Cleary [2006] NSWSC 647; R v Burns & Collins (2001) 123 A Crim R 226; R v Doney (2001) 126 A Crim R 271).

7. Consequently, the jury may itself compare the sample and disputed writings to determine whether the documents were written by the same person. This comparison may be undertaken even without the assistance of expert evidence (Adami v R (1959) 108 CLR 605; Grayden v R [1989] WAR 208; R v Knight (2001) 160 FLR 465; Jeans v Cleary [2006] NSWSC 647; R v Burns & Collins (2001) 123 A Crim R 226; R v Doney (2001) 126 A Crim R 271).

8. The need for any directions depends on whether a direction is sought or whether there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving a direction in the absence of a request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

9. Where expert evidence has been led, the judge should ensure that the jury does not allow the expert's opinion to dictate their conclusions. The jury must consider all of the evidence, including any circumstantial evidence that may support or cast doubt on the expert's opinion (Jeans v Cleary [2006] NSWSC 647; R v Doney (2001) 126 A Crim R 271; R v Leroy [1984] 2 NSWLR 441; Gawne v Gawne (1979) 2 NSWLR 449; Grayden v R [1989] WAR 208).

10. While the jury must not allow an expert's opinion to dictate their conclusions, they should be guided by the expert evidence (R v Leroy [1984] 2 NSWLR 441; Grayden v R [1989] WAR 208; R v Medina (1990) 3 WAR 21; R v Mazzone (1985) 43 SASR 330).

11. In some cases, the process of comparing handwriting samples will be particularly difficult. The judge may warn the jury about the need to exercise care, especially where no expert evidence has been led. This need may arise when there are significant differences between the writing samples, such as when one sample is a photocopy and the other is an original (see Grayden v R [1989] WAR 208).

12. If the authorship of the sample document is itself disputed, the judge should emphasise that the jury must be satisfied that the sample document was written by the alleged author. The authorship of the sample document is a question of fact that will affect the probative value of the evidence regarding the disputed document (R v Browne–Kerr [1990] VR 78).

13. The jury may be warned to act with caution when a non-expert witness compares the handwriting between two samples. This warning is not mandatory, but may be given as a matter of prudence (R v Burns & Collins (2001) 123 A Crim R 226; R v Leroy [1984] 2 NSWLR 441; Grayden v R [1989] WAR 208; Medina v The Queen (1990) 3 WAR 21).

14. If authorship of a disputed document is an essential link in a chain of reasoning leading to guilt, the jury may need to be directed that they must be satisfied of the author's identity beyond reasonable doubt (see, e.g. Grayden v R [1989] WAR 208; Shepherd v R (1990) 170 CLR 573). See 3.6 Circumstantial Evidence and Inferences for further information concerning the standard of proof in such cases.

4.13.4.1 Charge: Handwriting Evidence (Expert Witness)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge is for use in conjunction with 4.13.1.1 Charge: Uncontested Expert Evidence in cases where:

i) Handwriting evidence inculpates the accused;

ii) That evidence is given by a single witness who is a handwriting expert; and

iii) A direction about the evidence is requested, or there are substantial and compelling reasons to give a direction in the absence of a request. See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015.

If the evidence exculpates the accused, or conflicting evidence is given by expert witnesses, the charge will need to be modified. In such circumstances, see 4.13.1 General Principles of Opinion Evidence.

Use of Documents

To help you to understand and evaluate NOW's evidence, you have been given [copies of] the documents s/he compared. [Identify relevant exhibits.]

While you are free to make your own comparison of the handwriting in these documents, you should remember that you are not handwriting experts. You should therefore be guided by NOW's evidence, although you are free to reject his/her opinion. Ultimately, it is for you to determine who wrote [describe relevant document].

Use of Evidence

4.13.4.2 Charge: Handwriting Evidence (Non-Expert Witness)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge is for use in cases where:

i) Handwriting evidence inculpates the accused; and

ii) That evidence is given by a non-expert witness who is familiar with the alleged author's handwriting; and

iii) A direction about the evidence is requested, or there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving a direction in the absence of any request. See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015.

If the evidence exculpates the accused, or conflicting evidence is given by expert witnesses, the charge will need to be modified. In such circumstances, 4.13.1 General Principles of Opinion Evidence may provide some assistance.

I must now give you directions about the handwriting evidence that NOW gave. [Summarise evidence.]

NOW was permitted to give this evidence because of his/her familiarity with NOA's handwriting.[180] [Describe reason for familiarity.]

In the course of giving evidence, NOW expressed his/her opinion that [describe opinion, e.g. "NOA probably wrote document X"].

Ordinarily, witnesses are not allowed to give their opinions in court. They must confine their evidence to their own observations. This is because it is you who are the judges of facts, and so usually it is only your opinion that is relevant.

However, in limited circumstances the law allows people who have particular experience in an area to give their opinions, if it may assist you in making your decision. This is one of those circumstances.

In this case, NOW's evidence may assist you in determining [explain permissible uses of the expert evidence].

[179] If the judge has not given a direction on circumstantial evidence, this should be modified accordingly.

[180] This charge is based on the assumption that the comparison is being made with the accused's handwriting. If the comparison is with a different party's handwriting, the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

Role of Jury

You are not required to accept NOW's opinion. You are the judges of fact in this case, and even though NOW is familiar with NOA's handwriting, his/her opinion is merely a piece of evidence like any other, which you may accept or reject.

When assessing NOW's opinion, you should consider factors such as [describe any factors relevant to the assessment of NOW's evidence, such as his/her degree of familiarity with the accused's handwriting, objectivity, or responses to cross-examination. Summarise any evidence and/or arguments addressing these factors].

Use of Documents

[If control documents are not available, this section should be omitted.]

To help you to understand and evaluate NOW's evidence, you have been given [copies of] a document written by the accused and the [describe relevant document]. [Identify relevant exhibits.[181]]

You are free to make your own comparison of the handwriting in these documents. While you may be guided by NOW's evidence, you should be careful about doing so, as s/he is not a handwriting expert. Ultimately, it is for you to determine who wrote the [describe relevant document] by using your common sense and experience. However, I warn you that comparing handwriting is difficult, and you should not jump to conclusions.

Use of Evidence

If you accept NOW's opinion, you can use that evidence in deciding whether [describe permissible use of the evidence, e.g. "NOA wrote the letter"]. If you find that [describe permissible use of the evidence], then [describe consequences of finding a handwriting match].

You should keep in mind the fact that the handwriting evidence is just one piece of circumstantial evidence, and must be considered in the light of the other evidence in the case. You will remember what I have told you about circumstantial evidence.[182]

4.13.4.3 Charge: Handwriting Evidence (Jury Comparison)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge is for use in cases where:

i) Handwriting evidence inculpates the accused; and

ii) No expert witness has been called to compare handwriting samples, and the jury is asked to compare handwriting samples itself.

[181] If the authorship of the control document is disputed, this section should include a direction on the need to be satisfied that the control document was written by the accused. See 4.13.4.1 Charge: Handwriting Evidence (Expert Witness).

[182] If the judge has not given a direction on circumstantial evidence, this should be modified accordingly.

If the evidence exculpates the accused, or conflicting evidence is given by expert witnesses, the charge will need to be modified. In such circumstances, 4.13.1 General Principles of Opinion Evidence may provide some assistance

I must now give you directions about handwriting comparisons.

One of the issues for you to determine in this case is whether NOA wrote [describe relevant document].[183] [Summarise relevance of the issue, and prosecution and defence arguments on the issue.]

[Where authorship of the control document is not disputed, add the following shaded section.]

You have been given [a copy of] [describe relevant document]. [Identify relevant exhibit.] It is for you to determine whether NOA wrote that document.

To help you decide this, you have also been given a [copy of a] document written by the accused. [Identify relevant exhibit.]

The prosecution alleges that these two documents were written by the same person – NOA. The defence denies this, alleging that the handwriting differs.[184]

It is for you to decide if they were written by the same person. If you find that they were, you may conclude that it was NOA who wrote [describe relevant document].

You have been given [a copy of] [describe relevant document]. [Identify relevant exhibit.] It is for you to determine whether NOA wrote that document.

To help you decide this, you have also been given a [copy of a] document the prosecution alleges was written by the accused. [Identify relevant exhibit.]

The prosecution alleges that these two documents were written by the same person, and that person was NOA.[185] [Summarise prosecution evidence and/or arguments.]

The defence denies this, alleging that [describe control document] was not written by the accused. [Summarise defence evidence and/or arguments.] If this is the case, then even if you find that the handwriting in the documents is identical, you cannot conclude that it was NOA who wrote [describe relevant document].

For you to find that NOA wrote [describe relevant document], you must find both that s/he wrote [describe control document] and that the handwriting in the two documents is identical.

In making your determination, you may compare the handwriting samples yourself.

[If a party has raised the lack of expert evidence as an issue in the case, add the following shaded section.]

[183] This charge is based on the assumption that the handwriting comparison is being made with the accused's handwriting. If the comparison is with a different party's handwriting, the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[184] This charge is based on the assumption that the prosecution is alleging a match between the handwriting samples. If the prosecution alleges that the handwriting differs, it will need to be modified accordingly.

[185] This charge is based on the assumption that the prosecution is alleging a match between the handwriting samples. If the prosecution alleges that the handwriting differs, it will need to be modified accordingly.

I note that you have not had the benefit of any expert evidence to assist you with this task. Often in these sorts of cases, one of the parties will call an expert in handwriting comparison to give evidence on whether s/he believes the documents were written by the same person.

Without the assistance of expert evidence, you can only compare the documents using your common sense and experience. However, I warn you that comparing handwriting is difficult, and you should not jump to conclusions.

However, you should keep in mind the fact that the handwriting evidence is just one piece of circumstantial evidence, and must be considered in the light of the other evidence in the case. You will remember what I have told you about circumstantial evidence.[186]

4.14 Previous Representations (Hearsay, Recent Complaint and Prior Statements)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Admissibility and Use of Previous Representations

1. Evidence of a previous representation will only be admissible if it is relevant (Evidence Act 2008 s 55).
2. Even if evidence of a previous representation is relevant, it will generally not be admissible:
    - To prove the existence of a fact asserted in the representation (the "hearsay rule") (Evidence Act 2008 s 59); or
    - If it only affects the assessment of a witness's credibility ("the credibility rule") (Evidence Act 2008 ss 101A, 102).
3. However, there are a number of exceptions to both the hearsay rule[187] and the credibility rule,[188] which allow previous representations to be admitted in certain circumstances.
4. This topic addresses the directions that should be given when evidence of a previous representation is admitted:
    - To prove the existence of the facts asserted in the representation (a "hearsay purpose"); or
    - Because it is relevant for a purpose other than proof of an asserted fact (a "non-hearsay purpose").
5. Evidence which is admitted for a non-hearsay purpose may be used to prove the existence of a fact asserted in the representation (Evidence Act 2008 s 60).

[186] If the judge has not given a direction on circumstantial evidence, this should be modified accordingly.

[187] See the Notes to Evidence Act 2008 s 59 for a list of exceptions to the hearsay rule.

[188] See the Notes to Evidence Act 2008 s 102 for a list of exceptions to the credibility rule.

6. Similarly, evidence which is admitted for a hearsay purpose may (where relevant) be used by the jury when assessing a person's credibility (Evidence Act 2008 ss 101A, 102).

Content of the Charge

7. There is no direction that must be given whenever evidence of a previous representation is admitted. The judge must tailor the directions to the facts of the case.
8. Depending on the circumstances, judges may need to:
    - Tell the jury how they may use the evidence; or
    - Warn the jury about the potential unreliability of the evidence.
9. The need for any of these directions depends on whether a direction is sought or whether there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving a direction in the absence of any request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.
10. In directing the jury about these matters, it will not always be necessary for the judge to remind the jury of the words used in the previous representation. The degree of specificity with which the judge must refer to the content of a representation will depend upon the circumstances (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 65, 66; R v Demiri [2006] VSCA 64).

How May the Jury Use Evidence of a Previous Representation

11. The directions about the possible uses of previous representation evidence will depend on:
    - The nature of the evidence; and
    - Whether the judge has limited the use of the evidence under Evidence Act 2008 s 136.
12. This topic focuses on the directions that may be given when the following types of previous representations have been admitted:
    - Evidence of complaint (formerly "recent complaint" evidence);
    - Evidence of prior inconsistent statements; and
    - Evidence of prior consistent statements.

Admissibility of Complaint Evidence

13. Evidence that the complainant made a complaint about the alleged offending is most likely to be admitted under Evidence Act 2008 s 66. It may also be admissible under Evidence Act 2008 s 108.

Evidence Act 2008 s 66 – maker available

14. Evidence Act s 66 provides two alternative pathways for admitting evidence of a previous representation.
15. For both, the representation will only be admissible if the person who made the representation has been or is going to be called to give evidence (Evidence Act 2008 s 66(2)(a)).

Evidence Act 2008 s 66(2)(b)(i) – fresh in the memory

16. A previous representation is admissible under Evidence Act 2008 s 66(2)(b)(i) if the occurrence of the asserted fact was fresh in the memory of the speaker when he or she made the representation.
17. The court may consider all matters it regards as relevant when determining whether an occurrence is fresh in the memory of a person, including:
    - The nature of the event;
    - The age and health of the person;
    - The passage of time before the representation is made (Evidence Act 2008 s 66(2A)).

18. The High Court in Graham v R (1998) 165 CLR 606 held that the temporal connection between the occurrence of an asserted fact and the making of the representation is the primary factor in determining whether an occurrence is fresh in the memory. Under that decision, a representation must be recent, immediate, contemporaneous or nearly contemporaneous. Subsection (2A) was added to the Uniform Evidence Acts to limit the effect of this decision, so that the temporal connection is only one factor the court must consider (ALRC 102, [8.119]–[8.124]; R v XY (2010) 79 NSWLR 629).

19. Whether an event remains fresh in the memory is a question of fact and degree. The court should examine the content of the representation and the circumstances in which it was made to determine whether it was fresh in the speaker's memory (Skipworth v R [2006] NSWCCA 37; Gordon-King v R [2008] NSWCCA 335; R v XY (2010) 79 NSWLR 629).

20. While the period of time between the event in question and the making of the representation is relevant, other factors will also be relevant and may displace any concerns that arise from the passage of time. Courts have recognised that general information about some forms of offending conduct, such as sexual offences, is inherently likely to remain fresh in the memory of the complainant for an extended period of time, even if memory of details fade (LMD v R [2012] VSCA 164)

21. The fact that there is a conflict or inconsistency between the previous representation and later statements is not relevant to the court's determination of whether the event was fresh in the speaker's memory (Skipworth v R [2006] NSWCCA 37; Gordon-King v R [2008] NSWCCA 335; R v XY (2010) 79 NSWLR 629).

22. In cases involving repeated sexual offences, or similar conduct, the effect of subsequent offences may keep the memory of earlier offences fresh in the memory of the complainant (R v Le [2002] NSWCCA 49).

Evidence Act 2008 s 66 – child complainant

23. Under Evidence Act 2008 s 66(2)(b)(ii), evidence of a previous representation by the complainant[189] is admissible if the complainant is available to give evidence, and the complainant was under the age of 18 years at the time when the representation was made.

24. A narrower form of this exception was previously provided for by the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 377. That exception applied only to sexual offences, and did not apply unless the court was satisfied that the evidence was relevant to a fact in issue and sufficiently probative having regard to the nature and content of the representation and the circumstances in which it was made.

25. While s 66(2)(b)(ii) does not contain an express requirement that the evidence must be 'sufficiently probative', cases on the operation of that requirement may continue to be relevant to the operation of the exclusionary provisions in Evidence Act 2008 ss 135 and 137 (see, e.g. WSJ v R [2010] VSCA 339; Watson v R [2010] VSCA 189; Stark v R (2013) 45 VR 1; HSG v R [2011] VSCA 163). These cases identified that the lapse of time between the event and the representation, the degree of specificity of the representation and the existence of inconsistencies between the representation and the child's evidence are relevant to assessing the probative value. These considerations must, however, also be considered in light of the requirement from IMM v R (2016) 257 CLR 300 that probative value of evidence must be assessed by taking the evidence at its highest.

[189] Evidence Act 2008 s 66 uses 'victim' instead of 'complainant'. We have retained 'complainant' to maintain consistency across the Bench Book.

26. Evidence Act 2008 s 66(2)(b)(ii) will apply to any trial that has commenced on or after 1 October 2017. A trial commences when the accused is arraigned in the presence of the jury panel from which the trial jury is formed (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 210). This exception also applies to summary hearings held on or after 1 October 2017. While the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 does not specify when a summary hearing commences, the Act does distinguish between a summary hearing and the procedure before a summary hearing, the latter including a mention hearing and a contest mention hearing (compare Criminal Procedure Act 2009 Part 3.2 and Part 3.3).

27. The former exception, Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 377, continues to apply to trials and summary hearings that had already commenced on 1 October 2017.

Evidence Act 2008 s 108

28. Even where evidence is not admissible under Evidence Act 2008 s 66, it may become admissible under Evidence Act 2008 s 108 as a prior consistent statement where it is suggested that the witness's evidence has been fabricated, reconstructed, or is the result of a suggestion, and the court gives leave. Once the evidence is admitted, it may be used as evidence of a complaint (see Langbein v R [2008] NSWCCA 38; Gordon-King v R [2008] NSWCCA 335; R v XY (2010) 79 NSWLR 629).

Uses of Complaint Evidence

29. There are three ways in which complaint evidence can potentially be used by the jury:

    i) To prove the truth of the facts asserted in the complaint;

    ii) To assess the credibility of the witness (by showing that the witness' account of the events in question has been consistent); and

    iii) To rebut the argument that would otherwise arise that an absence of complaint suggests that the offending did not take place (R v GAR [2003] NSWCCA 224; R v BD (1997) 94 A Crim R 131; R v Lynch [1999] NSWCCA 32).

30. This differs from the position at common law, where the use of complaint evidence was limited to the jury's assessment of the complainant's credibility (see, e.g. R v Freeman [1980] VR 1).

31. Another difference from the common law position is that the jury may use the evidence without being satisfied that:

    - the words were spoken spontaneously and constituted a "complaint"; and
    - the complaint was made at the first reasonable opportunity (Evidence Act 2008 s 66; R v Harbulot [2003] NSWCCA 141).

32. In some cases the jury may take into account the mere fact that a complaint was made when assessing the complainant's credibility. In other cases it will be the consistency of the account presented in the complaint that the jury may use in their assessment (see, e.g. R v GAR [2003] NSWCCA 224 and R v Harbulot [2003] NSWCCA 141).

33. It is for the jury to decide what significance, if any, is to be attached to the evidence. The law does not oblige the jury to treat the evidence in any particular way (see R v Matthews [1999] 1 VR 534).

Uses of Prior Inconsistent Statements

34. A prior inconsistent statement is a "previous representation that is inconsistent with evidence given by the witness" (Evidence Act 2008 Dictionary).

35. This definition is not limited to verbal "statements". It covers any previous "representations", including representations that can be inferred from a person's conduct (R v Selsby [2004] NSWCCA 381; R v KNP (2006) 67 NSWLR 227).[190]

36. Evidence that a witness made a prior inconsistent statement may be admissible under Evidence Act 2008 ss 103 or 106. The cross-examination of a witness about a prior inconsistent statement is regulated by Evidence Act 2008 s 43.

37. When a party adduces a prior inconsistent statement the jury will have two inconsistent accounts from the same witness. It is for the jury to determine which account, if any, to believe (R v Thynne [1977] VR 98; Sainsbury v Allsop (1899) 24 VLR 725).

38. The jury may use evidence that a witness made a prior inconsistent statement when assessing a witness's credibility or reliability, if that evidence demonstrates that the witness is unable or unwilling to accurately recall relevant events (R v Hackett [2006] VSCA 138; R v NRC (No 2) [2001] VSCA 210; R v Thompson (2008) 21 VR 135; Driscoll v R (1977) 137 CLR 517; R v Salih (2005) 160 A Crim R 310).

39. A witness who makes a prior inconsistent statement is not necessarily lying. While dishonest witness are more likely to introduce inconsistencies into their stories, truthful witnesses may make mistakes about details (R v Salih (2005) 160 A Crim R 310).

40. The jury may also use evidence of a prior inconsistent statement to prove the truth of the facts asserted in the statement (Evidence Act 2008 s 60).

41. When a party adduces evidence of a prior statement that contains parts that are both consistent and inconsistent with the evidence given in court, the jury may use the evidence to assess the consistency or inconsistency of the witness' evidence. The jury may find that a prior inconsistent statement enhances the witness's credit by presenting a generally consistent narrative (R v Kehagias, Leone & Durkic [1985] VR 107; R v Titijewski [1970] VR 371; R v PFG [2006] VSCA 130).

Direction about the Uses of Prior Inconsistent Statements

42. A direction about prior inconsistent statements is not necessary in all cases. In some cases, counsel's arguments may have sufficiently identified the relevant principles for the jury and removed the need for a judicial direction (see R v Hartwick, Hartwick & Clayton (2005) 14 VR 125; R v BR [2005] VSCA 145).

43. While it is not strictly necessary, where the judge directs the jury about prior inconsistent statements, the better approach is to identify the two permissible uses of prior inconsistent statements (Pavitt v R (2007) 169 A Crim R 452; R v Abdallah [1999] NSWCCA 380; Raimondi v R [2013] VSCA 194).

44. However, where the alleged inconsistencies form an important part of the defence case, they must ordinarily be identified as part of the obligation to put the accused's case before the jury (R v Mark & Elmazovski [2006] VSCA 251; R v Salih (2005) 160 A Crim R 310; R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301 (Howie J); c.f. R v PFG [2006] VSCA 130; R v RH [2004] VSCA 231).

45. Similarly, if a party has sought a direction under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 14, the judge must give the requested direction unless there are good reasons for not doing so.

[190] For example, evidence that the complainant continued to voluntarily associate with the accused after the alleged commission of sexual offences may be said to be a representation by conduct that the accused did not commit an offence against the complainant (see R v Selsby [2004] NSWCCA 381; but c.f. R v ERJ [2010] VSCA 61 and discussion of reasons for delay in complaint and continued association with an offender).

46. In addition, if a party has applied for a direction under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32, the judge will need to consider whether, as a form of hearsay evidence, the prior inconsistent statement is evidence of a kind that may be unreliable. See Section 32 Unreliability Warning (below).

47. Where a prior inconsistent statement suggests a difference in the complainant's account of the offence charged that is relevant to the complainant's credibility or reliability, the trial judge will need to give a direction in accordance with Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54D. See Differences in a Complainant's Account.

48. When directing the jury about a prior inconsistent statement, the judge should avoid implying that the jury must choose between the two statements, or that the jury needs to apply a particular standard of proof to whether a statement was made. Where a prosecution witness makes a prior inconsistent statement, it is appropriate to direct the jury to consider whether the inconsistencies demonstrated raise a reasonable doubt about the witness' evidence (Raimondi v R [2013] VSCA 194).

49. Where a party introduces evidence of a prior inconsistent statement that is part of a larger statement, and the jury asks about the remainder of the statement, the judge should direct the jury not to speculate about the content of the rest of the statement, as they are only concerned with what has been admitted into evidence (R v Hackett [2006] VSCA 138).

Uses of Prior Consistent Statements

50. Evidence that a witness made a prior consistent statement may be admissible under Evidence Act 2008 s 108.

51. Evidence of a prior consistent statement can be used:

    - To explain why the witness has given an inconsistent account;[191] or
    - To rebut suggestions that the witness's evidence has been fabricated, reconstructed or is the result of a suggestion (Evidence Act 2008 s 108(3). See also R v Ali [2000] NSWCCA 177; R v Cassar & Ors [1999] NSWSC 352; R v Sood (Ruling No 2) [2006] NSWSC 732).

52. Circumstances in which evidence of prior consistent statements can be used include:

    - Where the opposing party suggests that a witness's evidence was invented in response to a particular incident. In such cases, evidence that the witness made a consistent statement that pre-dates the specified incident may be used to refute that suggestion (R v MDB [2005] NSWCCA 354; R v DJT [1999] NSWCCA 22. See also, in a common law context, R v Martin (No 2) (1997) 68 SASR 419; R v Cox & Sadler [2006] VSC 333).
    - Where the opposing party attacks the reliability of the witness's account, suggesting that it has been reconstructed rather than recollected. In such cases, evidence of a statement that was made contemporaneously with the alleged offence, and which demonstrates a consistent recollection of the alleged events, may be used to refute the attack (R v Sood (Ruling No 2) [2006] NSWSC 732).

53. While evidence of a prior consistent statement is admitted because it is relevant to the jury's assessment of the complainant's credibility, it may also be used to prove the truth of the facts asserted in the statement (Evidence Act 2008 s 60). This differs from the position at common law.

54. It will therefore only be correct to direct that jury that a prior consistent statement cannot be used to prove the truth of its contents if the judge limits the use of the evidence under Evidence Act 2008 s 136 (R v Singh-Bal (1997) 92 A Crim R 397). See Limiting the Use of Evidence under s 136 (below).

[191] For example, in R v Ali [2000] NSWCCA 177, the complainant reported the alleged offences to a school counsellor under a promise of confidentiality and later denied those allegations to workers from the Department of Community Services (DOCS). The complainant claimed that she made the false denials to DOCS out of fear that they would pass on the allegations to her mother.

55. The value of a prior consistent statement that is not independently verified is a matter for the jury. The lack of independent verification does not automatically weaken the probative value of the statement (R v DJT [1998] 4 VR 784).

Prior Consistent Statements admitted under s 108 and Complaint Evidence admitted under s 66(2)

56. When evidence of a prior statement is admitted under an exception to the hearsay rule (e.g. s 66(2)), the jury may also use it (if relevant) to assess the credibility of a witness, as the credibility rule will not apply (see Evidence Act 2008 s 101A(b)). Similarly, when evidence of a previous representation is admitted under Evidence Act 2008 s 108, the jury may also use the statement as hearsay evidence due to s 60, unless it is excluded or the use limited under ss 135–137.

57. The judge must identify the basis or bases for admitting the previous representation and how the jury may or may not use the evidence. Where issues are raised as to the reliability of the evidence of the prior statements, section 32 warnings may also be required (see below).

58. While judges and parties can and will refer to evidence of prior statements of an alleged victim admitted under s 66(2) as "complaints", they should not refer to evidence admitted under s 108(3) as "complaint" evidence in order to minimise the risk of confusion (R v DBG [2002] NSWCCA 328; Friend v R [2007] NSWCCA 41).

Need for a Direction about the Uses of Prior Consistent Statements

59. It is not always necessary to direct the jury about the uses of prior consistent statements. Without directions, the court may assume that the jury will use such statements in the same way as any other evidence in the trial, as jurors are not aware of the common law distinctions between the use of hearsay evidence and direct evidence (Pavitt v R (2007) 169 A Crim R 452; R v Abdallah [1999] NSWCCA 380).

60. However, while it is not strictly necessary, the better approach is for judges to identify the two permissible uses of prior consistent statements (Pavitt v R (2007) 169 A Crim R 452; R v Abdallah [1999] NSWCCA 380; Raimondi v R [2013] VSCA 194).

Limiting the Use of Evidence under s 136

61. Judges will need to direct the jury about any limitations placed on the use of the evidence under Evidence Act 2008 s 136 (WSJ v R [2010] VSCA 339).

62. A judge may limit the use of evidence if there is a danger that a particular use of the evidence might:

    - Be unfairly prejudicial to a party; or
    - Be misleading or confusing (Evidence Act 2008 s 136).

63. It will usually only be necessary to consider this matter when counsel applies for a s 136 order (Pavitt v R (2007) 169 A Crim R 452).

64. At common law, juries were generally prohibited from using hearsay evidence to prove the existence of the facts asserted in the representation, due to the potential unreliability of that evidence. It was the intention of the Evidence Act 2008 to change this position, and allow evidence that was admitted either as an exception to the hearsay rule, or for a non-hearsay purpose, to be used to prove the existence of asserted facts (see Evidence Act 2008 s 60).

65. Judges should therefore not automatically prevent previous representations that are admitted under the Evidence Act 2008 from being used to prove the existence of any asserted facts. To do so would be to constrain the legislation by reference to common law rules and distinctions which the legislature has discarded (Papakosmas v R (1999) 196 CLR 297; ISJ v R (2012) 38 VR 23).

66. While a judge may be more willing to exercise the power under Evidence Act 2008 s 136 to limit the hearsay use of evidence admitted under s 108, compared to limiting the hearsay use of evidence admitted under s 66 of the Evidence Act 2008, there is no obligation to do so (Pavitt v R (2007) 169 A Crim R 452).

67. When the party seeking to adduce the evidence relies on s 66, the judge should generally not confine the relevance of the evidence to credibility (ISJ v R (2012) 38 VR 23).

68. Before limiting the use of evidence to credit, the judge must consider whether the preconditions for admissibility in sections 108(3)(b) and 192 are met, as it is not appropriate to circumvent those conditions by admitting the evidence under s 66 and then limiting the use of the evidence under s 136. The need to ensure the evidence meets the conditions in ss 108(3)(b) and 192 applies regardless of whether the evidence is initially admitted as an exception to the hearsay rule or the credibility rule (ISJ v R (2012) 38 VR 23).

69. In determining whether to limit the use of previous representations, the judge should consider whether any warning under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32 regarding the dangers of relying on hearsay evidence (see below) would limit the risk of unfair prejudice (see R v BD (1997) 94 A Crim R 131).

70. If the judge limits the use of prior consistent statements, he or she should also consider whether to limit the use of prior inconsistent statements. Consistency will usually require the same treatment of both types of evidence (R v Ali [2000] NSWCCA 177).

Directions which are not required

71. Following the commencement of the Jury Directions and Other Acts Amendment Act 2017 on 1 October 2017, the following common law directions in relation to previous representations are no longer necessary:

    - A direction that repeating a previous representation does not make the original statement true (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44B; contra Papakosmas v R (1999) 196 CLR 297);
    - Where evidence of a complainant's previous complaint is given,
        - a direction that the evidence does not independently confirm the complainant's evidence of the alleged offence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44C; contra R v Stoupas [1998] 3 VR 645); and
        - where the previous complaint evidence is given in general terms, a direction not to substitute the evidence of the previous representation for evidence of a specific charge (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44D; contra R v HJS [2000] NSWCCA 205).

72. Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 44B–44E only abolish common law rules requiring these directions. Unlike other provisions of the Jury Directions Act 2015 (see, e.g. ss 40, 44G, 44J, 44M, 64D), a judge is still permitted to give these directions and there may be cases where such a direction should be given in the interests of ensuring a fair trial (Jacobs v The Queen [2019] VSCA 285, [90]).

Section 32 Unreliability Warning

73. Where evidence of a previous representation is admitted, a judge may need to warn the jury about the potential unreliability of that evidence under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32.

74. A s 32 warning may be required in relation to any evidence of a previous representation, including complaint evidence, prior inconsistent statements and prior consistent statements.

75. Section 32 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 closely follows the structure of Evidence Act 2008 s 165, as it applied to criminal trials. The most significant difference is that as part of the request, the party must identify the significant matters which make the evidence unreliable.

When is a s 32 Warning Required?

76. A judge must give a s 32 unreliability warning if:

    i) A party in a jury trial requests such a warning;

    ii) The evidence in question is "of a kind that may be unreliable";

    iii) The party making the request specifies the significant matters that may make the evidence unreliable; and

iv) There are no good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14, 32).

77. See 4.21 Unreliable Evidence Warning for information concerning the first and third requirements.

78. In relation to the second requirement, s 31 states that hearsay evidence (evidence in relation to which Part 3.2 of the Evidence Act 2008 applies) is "of a kind that may be unreliable".

79. This does not mean that a s 32 unreliability warning is required for all hearsay evidence that is admitted. Such a warning is only required if the judge finds that the specific evidence in the case is "of a kind that may be unreliable" (and the other requirements of s 32 have been met). In some circumstances, there may be no risk that the relevant evidence is unreliable and so s 14 does not require a warning (see, e.g. R v Clark (2001) 123 A Crim R 506; R v Fowler (2003) 151 A Crim R 166; R v Harbulot [2003] NSWCCA 141; Derbas v R [2007] NSWCCA 118. Cf R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301).

80. For example, evidence that the complainant made a complaint about a sexual offence is not inherently unreliable. The potential unreliability of such evidence will depend on the circumstances of the case (R v Harbulot [2003] NSWCCA 141).

81. This means that whenever evidence of a previous representation is admitted, judges must consider whether that particular piece of evidence is "of a kind that may be unreliable" (R v Clark (2001) 123 A Crim R 506; R v Fowler (2003) 151 A Crim R 166; R v Harbulot [2003] NSWCCA 141; Derbas v R [2007] NSWCCA 118. Cf R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301).

82. This is a test of "possibility". The question is whether the evidence is of a kind that "may be" unreliable (R v Flood [1999] NSWCCA 198).

83. A s 32 warning may be required for any evidence of a previous representation, even if:

- The evidence is admitted as an exception to the hearsay rule; or
- The same representation would not be hearsay if given as part of the witness's evidence in court (R v Fernando [1999] NSWCCA 66).

Content of the s 32 unreliability warning

84. A s 32 unreliability warning must:

i) Warn the jury that the evidence may be unreliable;

ii) Inform the jury of matters that may cause it to be unreliable; and

iii) Warn the jury of the need for caution in determining whether to accept the evidence and the weight to be given to it (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32(3)).

Warning the jury about potential unreliability

85. The judge must warn the jury that the evidence in question may be unreliable (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32(3)(a)).

86. A simple repetition of the language of s 32(3)(a) is likely to be sufficient to comply with this requirement (see, e.g. the direction approved in R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 502, [135]).

87. Where evidence of a prior inconsistent statement is admitted:

- The judge may warn the jury that the evidence may be unreliable due to its hearsay nature; and
- The judge should not warn the jury that the inconsistency makes the witness unreliable. The jury can usually assess the effect of a prior inconsistent statement on a witness' credibility without judicial assistance (Driscoll v R (1977) 137 CLR 517; R v Salih (2005) 160 A Crim R 310; R v BR [2005] VSCA 145; R v Juric (2002) 4 VR 411*; Relc v R* [2006] NSWCCA 383).

Informing the jury about sources of unreliability

88. The judge must inform the jury of the significant matters that may cause the evidence to be unreliable (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32(3)(b)(i)).

89. In informing the jury about the significant matters that may cause evidence of a previous representation to be unreliable, the judge should refer to the risk posed by the specific evidence given in the case. Depending on the circumstances, these may include:

    - That in repeating what the speaker said, the original words or their effect may not have been accurately recalled and repeated;
    - That any weaknesses of perception, memory, narration skill and sincerity of the speaker and the person reciting the representation may have been compounded;
    - That the representation was not made in the court environment and may have been subject to pressures that resulted in a false account being given;
    - That the representation was not made on oath or affirmation, and so may not have been truthful;
    - That the jury was unable to assess the credibility of the speaker at the time he or she made the representation, and so are unable to know whether or not he or she was being honest (see, e.g. R v Harbulot [2003] NSWCCA 141; R v Vincent [2002] NSWCCA 369; R v Nemeth [2002] NSWCCA 281; Brown v R [2006] NSWCCA 69).

90. The judge should identify any inconsistencies that exist between different representations that a person has made. These inconsistencies are a basis for suggesting that the evidence may be unreliable (R v Mayberry [2000] NSWCCA 531; R v TJF (2001) 120 A Crim R 209; c.f. R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 502 (Howie J)).

91. Judges may note that the memory of what a person has heard is sometimes less reliable than the memory of what he or she has seen (R v Nemeth [2002] NSWCCA 281).

92. While in relevant cases a judge may also mention that there has been no opportunity to cross-examine the maker of the statement, it is not sufficient for a judge to only mention this matter. Unlike the other matters listed above, lack of cross-examination only affects the potential to discover whether the evidence is unreliable and does not affect the inherent reliability of the evidence (R v Nemeth [2002] NSWCCA 281; Brown v R [2006] NSWCCA 69).

Warning the jury about the need for caution

93. A s 32 warning must alert the jury to the need for caution in determining whether to accept the evidence, and the weight to be given to it (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32(3)(c)).

94. The warning must alert the jury to the need to exercise caution, but it need not tell them how to exercise that caution (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 502).

95. See 4.21 Unreliable Evidence Warning for further information concerning this requirement.

Statutory Direction on Differences in a Complainant's Account in Sexual Offence Proceedings

96. In sexual offence cases where evidence of previous representations is led, the judge will need to consider whether there are gaps, inconsistencies or differences in the complainant's account. If so, the judge may need to give the jury statutory directions about those differences (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54D). See Differences in a Complainant's Account for further information.

4.14.1 Charge: Unreliability of Hearsay Evidence

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This is a generic charge that can be adapted for use in cases where:

i) Evidence of a previous representation has been admitted; and

ii) A party in a jury trial requests a warning under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32 or a warning is necessary under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 16; and

iii) The evidence in question is "of a kind that may be unreliable"; and

iv) There are no good reasons for not giving a warning.

Where the requirements of s 32 have been met, this warning should be inserted into the following charges where indicated:

4.14.4 Charge: Complaint Evidence;

4.14.2 Charge: Prior Inconsistent Statements;

4.14.3 Charge: Prior Consistent Statements.

Introduction

In this case you heard evidence that [insert details of the previous representation].

It is for you to determine whether NO3P[192] made the alleged statement. If you find that s/he did, you can use that fact to [identify the asserted facts in the statement and how those facts are relevant in the case. If necessary, also describe any limitations on the use of the evidence, following a ruling under s 136].

However, before you do so, I must warn you about the need for caution when considering NOW's evidence about that statement.

Matters that may cause unreliability

I must give you this warning because NOW's evidence was about a statement that was made out of court. It is the experience of the law that evidence of out-of-court statements may be unreliable, because [identify all of the risks of unreliability posed by the evidence in the case, such as:

[192] See the Notes to Evidence Act 2008 s 59 for a list of exceptions to the hearsay rule.

- NOW may not have accurately recalled or repeated NO3P's statement and may have changed its meaning;
- People sometimes cannot remember things they hear as well as they can remember things they see;
- It was not possible for you to assess NO3P's credibility at the time s/he made the representation, and so you cannot know whether or not s/he was being honest;
- The process of repeating a statement compounds any weaknesses of the people involved, such as imperfect perception, memory or sincerity. Errors can occur when the original statement is made, when it is heard or when it is repeated in court. This means that even if you accept NOW's evidence as truthful, it might not be an accurate representation of what happened – either because of problems in what NOW heard or remembered, or because NO3P's statement itself was not accurate or truthful.
- NO3P may have been subject to pressures that caused him/her to make a false statement, which you do not know about;
- The statement was not made in a court environment, and so NO3P was not under the same obligation to tell the truth as s/he would have been if s/he gave evidence in court.]

[The judge should also identify any other factors that may have a bearing on the reliability of the evidence in the case, such as:

- Any inconsistencies that exist between different representations that have been made; or
- The lack of opportunity to cross-examine the person who made the original statement.]

Warning

The law says that every jury must take this potential unreliability into account when considering evidence of an out-of-court statement. You must take it into account in determining whether you accept NOW's evidence at all, and if you do accept it, in deciding what weight to give to that evidence.

4.14.2 Charge: Prior Inconsistent Statements

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge is designed to be used in cases where:

i) Evidence of a prior inconsistent statement has been admitted under Evidence Act 2008 ss 103 or 106; and

ii) That evidence can be used for both a hearsay and non-hearsay purpose.

If the judge has limited the use of the evidence under Evidence Act 2008 s 136 the charge should be modified accordingly.

The judge should discuss the proposed charge with counsel before instructing the jury. See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when the direction is required.

Introduction

In this case you heard evidence that [insert details of evidence given in court]. In response, the [prosecution/defence] alleged that NOW had previously given a different version of events.[193] [Describe prior inconsistent statement and identify the alleged inconsistencies.]

If you accept that NOW made this statement, there are two ways you can use it.

First, you can use the contents of the statement as evidence in the case. For example, you could use NOW's statement that [describe part of the statement] as evidence that [describe relevant asserted fact].

Secondly, if you find that NOW's statement is inconsistent with his/her account in court, you may use the statement when assessing his/her credibility and reliability. You may find that the fact that NOW had previously given an inconsistent account means that the evidence s/he gave in court is less likely to be truthful or accurate. You may therefore be less willing to accept his/her evidence. It is for you to determine whether or not to draw this conclusion from any inconsistencies you find.

You should keep in mind the fact that a witness who gives inconsistent accounts is not necessarily lying. While dishonest witnesses are more likely to introduce inconsistencies in their stories, truthful witnesses may make mistakes about details.

If you do find that NOW's statement is inconsistent with his/her evidence in court, you will have two different accounts from the same witness. It is for you to determine which account, if any, to believe.

Differences in complainant's account

[In sexual offence matters, where the judge, after hearing submissions, considers there is evidence that suggests there is a gap, inconsistency or difference in the complainant's account of the offence charged that is relevant to the complainant's credibility or reliability, the judge must give a direction about that gap, inconsistency or difference. See 7.3.1.5.1 Charge: Differences in Complainant's Account.]

Section 32 Unreliability Warning

[In some cases it will be necessary to warn the jury about the potential unreliability of the evidence under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32. See 4.14.1 Charge: Unreliability of Hearsay Evidence for an example of such a warning.]

Last updated: 2 October 2017

4.14.3 Charge: Prior Consistent Statements

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge is designed to be used in cases where:

i) Evidence of a prior consistent statement has been admitted under Evidence Act 2008 s 108; and

ii) That evidence can be used for both a hearsay and non-hearsay purpose.

If the judge has limited the use of the evidence under Evidence Act 2008 s 136 the charge should be modified accordingly.

[193] If the inconsistent statement is adduced during cross-examination as an unfavourable witness under s 38 of the Evidence Act 2008, this may need to be modified accordingly.

The judge should discuss the proposed charge with counsel before instructing the jury. See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when the direction is required.

Introduction

When cross-examining NOW, the [defence/prosecution] [suggested/implied] that s/he had changed his/her evidence. [Summarise evidence and arguments concerning prior inconsistent statements or suggestions of fabrication or reconstruction.] In response, the [prosecution/defence] led evidence that [describe prior consistent statement].

If you accept that NOW made this statement, there are two ways you can use it.

First, you can use the contents of the statement as evidence in the case. For example, you can use NOW's statement that [describe part of the statement] as evidence that [describe relevant asserted fact].

Secondly, you can use this statement when assessing NOW's credibility. If you accept that the statement is consistent with NOW's evidence in court, you may find that this reinforces his/her credibility, because [summarise the way in which the evidence supports NOW's credibility, e.g. "it shows that s/he has given a consistent account since the alleged offence"].

Section 32 Unreliability Warning

[In some cases it will be necessary to warn the jury about the potential unreliability of the evidence under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32. See 4.14.1 Charge: Unreliability of Hearsay Evidence for an example of such a warning.]

Last updated: 29 June 2015

4.14.4 Charge: Complaint Evidence

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge is designed to be used in cases where:

i) Evidence of a complaint has been admitted under Evidence Act 2008 s 66 or Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 377; and

ii) That evidence can be used for both a hearsay and non-hearsay purpose.

If the judge has limited the use of the evidence under Evidence Act 2008 s 136 the charge should be modified accordingly.

The judge should discuss the proposed charge with counsel before instructing the jury. See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when the direction is required.

This charge must be adapted if evidence has been admitted under Evidence Act 2008 s 66 which does not take the form of a complaint.

Introduction

In this case you heard evidence that [insert details and timing of the complaint].

It is for you to determine whether NOC made the alleged complaint. If you find that s/he did, you can use the complaint in two ways.

First, you can use the contents of NOC's complaint as evidence in the case. For example, you can use NOC's statement that [describe part of the complaint] as evidence that [describe relevant asserted fact].

[Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44E abolishes common law rules requiring judges to give the direction in this shaded area, but the Act does not prohibit such a direction. See 4.14 Previous Representations (Hearsay, Recent Complaint and Prior Statements) for further information.]

When considering this evidence, it is important to remember that just because a person says something on more than one occasion, that does not mean that what s/he says is truthful or accurate. A false or inaccurate statement does not become true and accurate by virtue of being repeated.

Secondly, you can use NOC's complaint to assess his/her credibility. The fact that NOC made the complaint, and the content of that complaint, may show that his/her account of the events in question has been consistent. [Where relevant, add: In addition, the evidence may rebut an argument that the absence of complaint would suggest that the offences did not take place.]

In this case the prosecution submitted that the fact that NOC complained about the alleged incident in this manner makes it more likely that s/he is telling the truth here in court because [insert prosecution arguments]. The defence disputed this, contending [insert defence arguments].

Section 32 Unreliability Warning

[In some cases it will be necessary to warn the jury about the potential unreliability of the evidence under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32. See 4.14.1 Charge: Unreliability of Hearsay Evidence for an example of such a warning.]

Complaint Evidence is Not Corroborative

[Note: The following direction may be given if a witness other than the complainant gave evidence of the complaint. Under Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 44C and 44E, this direction is not mandatory, but is not prohibited. See 4.14 Previous Representations (Hearsay, Recent Complaint and Prior Statements) for further information.]

In this case, you [also] heard evidence of the complaint from NOW. It would be a mistake to treat this as evidence that is independent of the complainant. Although NOW gave evidence about the complaint in court, it was NOC who was the source of that evidence.

You may use this evidence in the ways I have just described, as evidence of the offence, or in your assessment of NOC's credibility, but you must not mistake it for independent evidence of the offence.

4.15 Silence in Response to People in Authority

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Scope

1. This topic addresses the directions which may be required when, prior to trial, a person exercises the right to remain silent when questioned or asked to supply information by a person in authority.
2. Similar issues are addressed in the following topics:
    - 4.16 Silence in Response to Equal Parties;
    - 4.10 Defence Failure to Call Witnesses.

Right to Remain Silent When Questioned by Authorities

3. The right to remain silent when questioned or asked to supply information by a person in authority is a fundamental rule of the common law (Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95).

4. This aspect of the right of silence is designed to prevent oppression by the police or other authorities of the State (Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95 (Brennan J); Harman v The State of Western Australia (2004) 29 WAR 380; [2004] WASCA 230).

No Adverse Inference May be Drawn

5. At common law it has been held that one consequence of this right is that no adverse inference can be drawn against the accused by reason of his or her failure to answer questions asked by a person in authority, or to supply information to such a person. To draw such an inference would be to erode the right or to render it valueless (Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95. See also Woon v R (1964) 109 CLR 529; R v McNamara [1987] VR 855).
6. This aspect of the right of silence has been given legislative form by Evidence Act 2008 s 89 (R v Tang (2000) 113 A Crim R 393). However, the common law continues to apply (R v Anderson [2002] NSWCCA 141; R v Stavrinos (2003) 140 A Crim R 594).
7. Although there are some minor differences in scope and content, s 89 and the common law largely overlap (R v Coe [2002] NSWCCA 385; R v Matthews NSW CCA 28/5/96).
8. The right to silence has been restricted in some ways by the Criminal Procedure Act 2009. See "Pre-trial Disclosure Requirements" below for further information.

Scope of the Prohibition Against Adverse Inferences

9. The statutory prohibition on drawing adverse inferences from a person's pre-trial silence applies to criminal proceedings in which:
    - A party or other person failed or refused to answer one or more questions, or to respond to a representation; and
    - The question or representation was put or made by an investigating official[194] who at that time was performing functions in connection with the investigation of the commission, or possible commission, of an offence (Evidence Act 2008 s 89(1)).
10. By comparison, the equivalent common law prohibition applies whenever a person is suspected, or believes on reasonable grounds that he or she is suspected, of having been a party to an offence (Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95).
11. As s 89 prohibits unfavourable inferences being drawn against a party where any person fails or refuses to answer a question asked by a relevant party, in some circumstances it can prevent an adverse inference from being drawn against a witness other than the accused (e.g. a defence witness who gave a statement to the police, but failed to mention something later raised in court) (see, e.g. Jones v R [2005] NSWCCA 443).
12. As there is significant overlap between the scope of s 89 and the common law, in most cases where a person exercises his or her pre-trial right of silence, adverse inferences will be prohibited on both grounds.

Content of the Prohibition Against Adverse Inferences

13. There are two main consequences of the pre-trial right to silence:

    i) Adverse inferences may not be drawn from the failure to answer questions asked by people in [194] An investigating official is defined in the Dictionary to the Act to be either a police officer, or a person appointed by or under an Australian law whose functions include the prevention or investigation of offences. People who are engaged in covert investigations under the orders of a superior are excluded.

authority; and

ii) Adverse inferences may not be drawn from previous silence about a defence raised at trial (Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95).

Failure to Answer Questions

14. Evidence Act 2008 s 89(1) provides that no unfavourable inferences can be drawn against a party from a person's failure or refusal to answer questions put by an investigating official, or to respond to the official's representations.

15. Section 89 prohibits all unfavourable inferences, including inferences of consciousness of guilt and inferences relevant to a party's credibility (Evidence Act 2008 s 89(4)). This reflects the common law (see, e.g. Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95).

Failure to Raise a Defence

16. Previous silence about a defence raised at the trial cannot provide a basis for inferring that the defence is a new invention or is rendered suspect or unacceptable (Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95; R v Stavrinos (2003) 140 A Crim R 594; Sanchez v R [2009] NSWCCA 171).[195]

17. This stems from the rule that it is never for an accused person to prove his or her innocence. To allow that an explanation might be judged false because it was not put forward before trial is, in effect, to allow the burden of proving guilt to be more readily discharged because the accused did not signal the precise basis of his or her innocence (Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95).[196]

18. The prohibition against drawing an inference of recent invention applies even if:

- The accused bears an evidential burden in relation to the defence;
- The accused was not specifically asked about the matter which is the subject of the defence, or was asked no questions at all;
- The accused answered questions about other matters;
- The defence was not raised at the committal proceedings; or
- The accused only raised the facts giving rise to the defence after the close of the prosecution case (Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95; Sanchez v R [2009] NSWCCA 171).

Previous Inconsistent Accounts

19. While Evidence Act 2008 s 89 and the common law both prohibit adverse inferences being drawn from silence, they do not prevent adverse inferences being drawn in cases where the accused has previously told a contrary story. The jury is entitled to draw whatever inferences are reasonably open from the responses actually made by the accused (Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95; R v Gonzales-Betes [2001] NSWCCA 226; Sanchez v R [2009] NSWCCA 171).

[195] This inference is prohibited by the common law. While it may also be prohibited by s 89, this issue has not yet been decided by an appellate court (see R v Coe [2002] NSWCCA 385).

[196] In R v Merlino [2004] NSWCCA 104 the NSW Court of Criminal Appeal seems to have suggested that there may be some circumstances in which an adverse inference can be drawn from the accused's failure to raise a defence at the point of arrest. However, this decision seems difficult to reconcile with the High Court's decision in Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95.

20. Thus, where the accused chooses to break his or her silence and give an explanation before trial that is inconsistent with the account given in evidence, the inconsistency may be used by the prosecution, both to attack the accused's credit and as demonstrating a consciousness of guilt (Jones v R [2005] NSWCCA 443; Van der Vegt v R [2016] NSWCCA 279, [13], [40]–[41]).

21. Similarly, where the accused gives an account which is inconsistent with the case presented at trial, and fails to withdraw that account until the time of trial, evidence of the accused's failure to withdraw the account is relevant and admissible. It can constitute a denial by conduct of the defence raised at trial (Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95). See also 4.14 Previous Representations (Hearsay, Recent Complaint and Prior Statements).

Selective Silence

22. No adverse inference can be drawn from the fact that the accused answered some questions but did not answer others (R v McNamara [1987] VR 855; R v Towers NSW CCA 7/6/93; Yisrael v District Court of New South Wales (1996) 87 A Crim R 63; R v Barrett (2007) 16 VR 240. See also Evidence Act 2008 s 89(1)(a)).

23. By answering some questions, the accused does not waive his or her right of silence. He or she does not assume any obligation to provide information to the police (R v Stavrinos (2003) 140 A Crim R 594).

24. The accused's selectiveness in answering questions therefore cannot demonstrate a consciousness of guilt (R v McNamara [1987] VR 855; R v Towers NSW CCA 7/6/93; Yisrael v District Court of New South Wales (1996) 87 A Crim R 63; R v Barrett (2007) 16 VR 240).

25. However, the answers the accused gives may be used, and can be considered as a whole, in the context of his or her refusal to answer other questions (Woon v R (1964) 109 CLR 529; Yisrael v District Court of New South Wales (1996) 87 A Crim R 63; R v Towers NSW CCA 7/6/93).

26. The jury can draw adverse inferences from the answers that were given, but cannot draw any inferences from the questions that were not answered (R v Barrett (2007) 16 VR 240).

27. As the accused is under no obligation to give notice of his or her defence prior to trial, a failure to proffer an explanation cannot be relied upon as a basis for an inference of guilt or as adversely affecting the credibility of a defence (R v Makin (1995) 120 FLR 9).

28. However, where the accused gives a detailed account of events to the police, the jury may be able to infer a consciousness of guilt from the conscious omission of certain details (R v Cuenco (2007) 16 VR 118; R v Russo (2004) 11 VR 1; De Marco 26/6/1997 CA Vic).[197] See 4.6 Incriminating Conduct (Post Offence Lies and Conduct) for further information.

Pre-trial Disclosure Requirements

29. In Victoria, some limitations have been placed on the right of silence by the pre-trial disclosure requirements of Part 5.5 of the Criminal Procedure Act 2009. For example:

    - If the prosecution has served on the accused a summary of its opening, the accused must serve on the prosecution (and file in court) a response to the summary, which identifies the acts, facts, matters and circumstances with which issue is taken and the basis on which issue is taken (s 183);

[197] As long as this inference is drawn from the accused's conscious omission of details from his or her account, rather than his or her failure to answer a question or respond to a representation, it appears not to breach Evidence Act 2008 s 89.

- If the prosecution has served on the accused a notice of pre-trial admissions, the accused must serve on the prosecution (and file in court) a response to the notice, which indicates which evidence set out in the notice is agreed and which evidence is in issue, and the basis on which issue is taken (s 183);
- If the accused intends to call a person as an expert witness at the trial, he or she must file a copy of the witness's statement with the court, and serve a copy on the prosecution, within a certain timeframe (s 189);
- If the accused intends to give or adduce evidence of an alibi, he or she must notify the DPP of that fact within a certain timeframe (s 190).

30. If the accused fails to comply with the pre-trial disclosure requirements contained in the Criminal Procedure Act 2009:

    i) He or she may be prevented from giving or calling certain evidence (see, e.g. ss 190, 233);

    ii) His or her response to the prosecution's opening address may be restricted (s 225(2)); or

    iii) The judge or a party may comment on the breach (s 237).[198]

31. Any comment made by the judge must be relevant, permitted by another Act or a rule of law and must not be unfairly prejudicial (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 237).

When Can Evidence of Silence Be Admitted?

32. Evidence that a person failed to respond to a person in authority, or failed to raise some defence or matter of explanation, will generally be inadmissible. Such evidence is usually not probative of any relevant fact or circumstance (in light of the fact that the accused has a right to remain silent, and no adverse inferences can be drawn from his or her exercise of that right) (Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95; Bruce v R (1987) 74 ALR 219; R v Ireland (1970) 126 CLR 321; R v McNamara [1987] VR 855. See also Evidence Act 2008 ss 56, 89(2)).

33. However, evidence that the accused exercised the right of silence can be admitted if there is a legitimate purpose for admitting the evidence (R v Reeves (1992) 29 NSWLR 109; R v Astill NSW CCA 8/7/92; R v Coyne [1996] 1 Qd R 512).

34. For example, evidence that the police put the prosecution's version of the facts to the accused, and gave him or her the opportunity to answer them, may be admitted to meet an anticipated criticism of the fairness of the investigating police officers' conduct (R v Reeves (1992) 29 NSWLR 109; R v Hartwick Vic CCA 20/12/95; Wilson v County Court of Victoria (2006) 14 VR 461).

35. In such circumstances, the accused's silence can only be used to counter the allegation of inadequate investigation. It cannot be used to demonstrate a consciousness of guilt or as the basis of a claim of recent invention (Wilson v County Court of Victoria (2006) 14 VR 461).

36. Evidence of the accused's pre-trial silence may also be admitted where the failure or refusal to answer a question is a fact in issue in the proceeding (e.g. where it is a criminal offence for the accused to refuse to respond to a question by an investigating official) (Evidence Act 2008 s 89(3)).

[198] See Chapter 5 of the Victorian Criminal Proceedings Manual for more information on the operation of pre-trial processes and the consequences of non-compliance.

37. Where the accused answers some questions but not others, it may be necessary to admit the whole record of interview to prevent a distorted or unreal version of the interrogation being placed before the jury (R v McNamara [1987] VR 855; Brain v R [2010] VSCA 172. See also R v Astill NSW CCA 8/7/92; R v Towers NSW CCA 7/6/93).

38. Evidence of the accused's pre-trial silence should not be admitted solely to prevent the jury from speculating about whether the accused had given any account of his or her actions when first challenged by the police (R v Hartwick Vic CCA 20/12/95. But see R v Familic (1994) 75 A Crim R 229; DPP v Butay [2001] VSC 346; R v Ivanovic [2003] VSC 403).

39. Even if evidence that the accused exercised his or her right of silence is admissible, it may be appropriate to exclude it under Evidence Act 2008 ss 135 or 137 (see, e.g. R v Astill NSW CCA 8/7/92).

When to Direct the Jury About Pre-trial Silence

40. As Evidence Act 2008 s 89 does not address the issue of when a jury should be directed about pre-trial silence, Part 3 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 applies (see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 10).

41. The need for a direction depends on whether a direction is sought or whether there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving a direction in the absence of any request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

42. At common law, whenever evidence was given which disclosed that the accused had exercised his or her pre-trial right of silence, the judge was required to direct the jury about the issue. If a direction was not given, the jury might mistakenly use that fact to the accused's detriment (King v R (1986) 15 FCR 427. See also R v Reeves (1992) 29 NSWLR 109; R v Astill NSW CCA 8/7/92; R v Familic (1994) 75 A Crim R 229; R v Matthews NSW CCA 28/5/96).

43. A direction on pre-trial silence was considered necessary even if it was not sought by counsel (R v Booty NSWCCA 19/12/94).

44. Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, the judge should consider the significance of the evidence of silence in the context of the trial when deciding whether to give the direction despite the absence of a request.

45. The direction should be given when the relevant evidence is first adduced (R v Reeves (1992) 29 NSWLR 109; R v Matthews NSW CCA 28/5/96; Sanchez v R [2009] NSWCCA 171).

46. While there is no rule to the effect that the direction must be repeated in the summing up, it will often be desirable and prudent to do so (Sanchez v R [2009] NSWCCA 171).

47. It is not sufficient to rely on counsel having addressed the issue. The right of silence is fundamental, and requires a direction that is given with judicial authority (R v Matthews NSW CCA 28/5/96).

Content of the Direction

48. When directing the jury on the accused's exercise of the right of silence, the judge must:

- Warn the jury against the impermissible use of that fact; and
- Explain any permissible uses of the evidence.

Warn the Jury Against Impermissible Use of the Evidence

49. A direction about impermissible uses of evidence of pre-trial silence must tell the jury:

- That the accused has a fundamental right to remain silent; and

- That they should not conclude that the accused is guilty, or draw any adverse inference against the accused, from the fact that he or she exercised that right (Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95; R v Reeves (1992) 29 NSWLR 109; King v R (1986) 15 FCR 427; R v Astill NSW CCA 8/7/92; R v Familic (1994) 75 A Crim R 229; R v Matthews NSW CCA 28/5/96).

50. No particular form of words is required when directing the jury about this issue. The judge is required to do no more than direct the jury as to the nature of the right and that no inference adverse to the accused can be drawn (R v Hodge [2002] NSWCCA 10).

51. It will usually be appropriate to also remind the jury that the accused was specifically cautioned by the police that he or she was not obliged to answer any questions, so as to avoid any suggestion of a familiarity by the accused with criminal investigation procedures (R v Reeves (1992) 29 NSWLR 109).[199]

52. Where the accused's account of events has been presented for the first time at trial, the judge must make it clear that no suggestion can be made that that account is an invention because it had not been presented earlier (R v Anderson [2002] NSWCCA 141).

53. If the accused's selective silence is revealed to the court, the jury must be directed not to draw an adverse inference from that fact (King v R (1986) 15 FCR 427).

Direct the Jury About Permissible Uses of the Evidence

54. Where evidence of the accused's pre-trial silence is admitted for a legitimate purpose (see "When Can Evidence of Silence Be Admitted?" above), the judge's directions on pre-trial silence should:

- Explain how that evidence may be used (e.g. to counter an allegation of inadequate investigation); and
- Direct the jury that they may only use the evidence for that purpose (see, e.g. Wilson v County Court of Victoria (2006) 14 VR 461).

Contested Silence

55. In some cases it will be unclear whether a person responded to official questioning or remained silent. For example:

- The accused may have made an ambiguous gesture (such as a shrug) in response to a police question, which could be interpreted as "I have nothing to say" (silence) or as "I have no explanation for what you have asked" (a response) (see, e.g. R v Astill NSW CCA 8/7/92);[200]
- The accused may claim that he or she responded to a particular question, but the police may deny that was the case (see, e.g. R v Tang (2000) 113 A Crim R 393).

56. If such evidence is admitted, the directions should:

- Explain the different possible findings to the jury;

[200] In many cases it will be appropriate to exclude such evidence, as the risk of prejudice to the accused will outweigh the probative value of the evidence. This will especially be the case where the jury is asked to determine the meaning of a gesture which they did not see (see, e.g. R v Astill NSW CCA 8/7/92).

- Tell the jury that it is for them to determine whether the person remained silent or gave a response; and
- Explain the consequences that follow each possible finding (R v Astill NSW CCA 8/7/92; R v Familic (1994) 75 A Crim R 229).

Correcting a Prosecution Breach of the Prohibition

57. The prosecution must not suggest that an adverse inference can be drawn against the accused by reason of his or her failure to answer questions asked by a person in authority, or to supply information to such a person (R v Stavrinos (2003) 140 A Crim R 594).
58. The prosecution also must not suggest that the right to silence is subject to exceptions that allow adverse inferences to be drawn in certain circumstances (R v Stavrinos (2003) 140 A Crim R 594).
59. Consequently, the prosecution ordinarily must not:
    - Ask a person why they declined to answer official questions or why they failed to raise a defence at an earlier time (R v Coe [2002] NSWCCA 385; R v Fraser [1988] 1 Qd R 182; R v Armstrong (1990) 54 SASR 207);
    - Invite the jury to ask themselves why an accused had remained silent (R v Stavrinos (2003) 140 A Crim R 594);
    - Suggest that the jury can evaluate the version of events put forward at trial (and discount it) by reference to the accused's earlier silence about it (R v Stavrinos (2003) 140 A Crim R 594).
60. Where the prosecution breaches this prohibition, the judge may be able to remedy the situation with a strong direction (see, e.g. R v Coe [2002] NSWCCA 385).
61. Such a direction should tell the jury:
    - That as the accused has a right of silence, they cannot use his or her exercise of that right against him or her;
    - To ignore the contrary suggestion made by the prosecution;
    - To put the issue and the evidence relating to the accused's pre-trial silence out of their minds; and
    - To clear from their minds whatever views they might have formed as a result of the evidence and address of the prosecution (R v Brown [2004] VSCA 59. See also R v Stavrinos (2003) 140 A Crim R 594).
62. These directions should be given when the improper suggestion is made, and again during summing up (R v Coe [2002] NSWCCA 385; R v Brown [2004] VSCA 59).

Prohibited Directions

63. The jury must not be invited to take the accused's pre-trial silence into account against him or her in any way (Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95; Evidence Act 2008 s 89).
64. This means that judges must not suggest:
    - That the exercise of the right of silence can provide a basis for inferring a consciousness of guilt;
    - That a defence raised at trial is a recent invention or is suspect because it had not previously been mentioned; or
    - That the jury can infer from the accused's silence about the facts giving rise to that defence that those facts are false (Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95).

65. The judge should not comment on the fact that a particular matter was not raised at the committal proceedings, or imply that there was a duty to raise matters at committal (Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95).

66. The judge also must not tell the jury:

    - That the accused's silence can be used to test the veracity of his or her evidence (Glennon v R (1994) 179 CLR 1);
    - That the accused's silence is relevant to the weight of the evidence given in court (Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95);
    - That the police "gave the accused the opportunity to explain" his or her whereabouts (as this may convey the impression that an innocent person would have willingly answered the questions and given the police an account of his or her movements at the relevant time) (King v R (1986) 15 FCR 427);
    - That the prosecution was deprived of an opportunity to investigate the defence raised, or to call evidence in disproof of that defence (as this suggests that the accused is under some duty to make timely disclosure to permit an investigation of his or her story by the prosecution) (Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95, but see Criminal Procedure Act 2009 ss 183, 233 and 237);
    - That the accused's failure to respond to certain questions was not the "sort of response one would expect" from a person telling the truth (Yisrael v District Court of New South Wales (1996) 87 A Crim R 63);
    - That if the accused had been telling the truth he or she would have responded to particular questions (Yisrael v District Court of New South Wales (1996) 87 A Crim R 63).

4.15.1 Charge: Failure to Answer Police Questions

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge may be given when evidence is disclosed that, prior to trial, the accused failed to answer one or more questions asked by the police.

It should be given when that evidence is first adduced, and may be repeated (with appropriate modifications) in the summing up.

The charge will need to be adapted if:

i) A party other than the accused exercised the right to silence;

ii) Questions were asked by an authority other than the police; or

iii) The question of whether the accused remained silent is contested.

Failure to Answer Police Questions

You have just heard evidence that NOA chose not to answer [some of] the questions asked by the police. That was his/her right, as the police told him/her when they sought to question him/her.

It would therefore be wrong for you to use his/her silence against him/her in any way. The fact that a person chooses not to answer police questions does not mean that s/he has something to hide, or is guilty of some offence. It cannot provide the basis for drawing any unfavourable inferences. To use an accused person's silence in such a way would be to undermine a fundamental right provided by the law.

[If evidence is disclosed that the accused failed to raise his or her defence at an earlier time, add the following shaded section.]

You also may not use against NOA the fact that s/he did not tell the police that [insert details of defence, e.g. "s/he acted in self-defence"]. That was also his/her right. As I have told you, it is for the prosecution to prove its case beyond reasonable doubt, and the accused is not required to provide the police with any information in order to prove his/her innocence.

This means that you must not conclude from the fact that NOA did not raise the defence at an earlier time that it was an invention, or draw any other inferences against the accused for failing to mention it. You must not even consider the fact that NOA did not tell the police about that defence when deciding whether the prosecution has proved its case beyond reasonable doubt.

[If the evidence of silence may be used for a legitimate purpose*, explain that purpose here. For example, if evidence of the accused's selective silence has been adduced, add the following shaded section.*]

Of course, you are free to use any answers that NOA did give the police when considering the case against him/her. However, you must not draw any conclusions from the fact that s/he chose not to answer some of their questions, or from his/her choice of which questions to answer. Evidence of the accused's silence has only been given in order to provide you with a complete picture of the police interview. It must not be used against the accused.

4.16 Silence in Response to Equal Parties

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Right of Silence Does Not Apply to Equal Parties

1. The right to remain silent when questioned or asked to supply information by a person in authority is a fundamental rule of the common law (Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95. See 4.15 Silence in Response to People in Authority).
2. That aspect of the right of silence is designed to prevent oppression by the police or other authorities of the State. It does not encompass silence towards people with whom the accused speaks on equal terms (Petty v R (1991) 173 CLR 95 (Brennan J); R v Alexander [1994] 2 VR 249; R v Brown [2004] VSCA 59).
3. It is therefore possible for an adverse inference to be drawn from the accused's silence in response to a question asked, or accusation made, by a person other than a police officer or authority figure (see, e.g. R v Salahattin [1983] VR 521; R v Alexander [1994] 2 VR 249; R v Gallagher [1998] 2 VR 671; R v Brown [2004] VSCA 59).

When Can an Adverse Inference be Drawn

4. An adverse inference can be drawn from a person's silence where a statement was made in his or her presence, and in the circumstances an answer would have been expected (Woon v R (1964) 109 CLR 529; R v Salahattin [1983] VR 521; R v Alexander [1994] 2 VR 249; R v Gallagher [1998] 2 VR 671; R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501).
5. In such circumstances, the jury may infer that by remaining silent, the person:

    i) Implicitly admitted the truth of the statement in whole or in part; or

    ii) Demonstrated a consciousness of guilt (Woon v R (1964) 109 CLR 529; R v Salahattin [1983] VR 521; R v Alexander [1994] 2 VR 249; R v Gallagher [1998] 2 VR 671; R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501).

6. This topic focuses on using the accused's silence for the first-mentioned purpose. See 4.6 Incriminating Conduct (Post Offence Lies and Conduct) for information concerning the latter use of the accused's silence.

7. Even where silence is used only for the first purpose (implicitly admitting the truth of the statement), such a use involves using conduct as an implied admission of having committed an offence charged or an element of an offence charged. It is therefore incriminating conduct within the meaning of Jury Directions Act 2015 s 18, and the prosecution must give a notice under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 19, and the judge must give directions in accordance with s 21, regardless of any request (see Stern v The King [2023] VSCA 57, [57]–[58]). The directions outlined in this chapter are designed to adapt the requirements of s 21 to the particular context of admissions by silence.

Admissibility

8. A statement made in the accused's presence will only be admissible if, in all the circumstances, it is open to the jury to conclude that:

    - The accused heard the statement and had the opportunity to respond;
    - The occasion was one in which the accused might reasonably have been expected to respond; and
    - By his or her silence the accused has substantially admitted the truth of the statement in whole or in part, or has shown a consciousness of guilt (R v Salahattin [1983] VR 521; R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501. See also R v Thomas [1970] VR 674; Barca v R (1975) 133 CLR 82; R v Gallagher [1998] 2 VR 671).

9. In most cases, evidence of the statement will be admitted solely to identify the subject matter of the accused's response (as the statement itself will have little probative value). However, unless a judge limits the use of the evidence under Evidence Act 2008 s 136, the statement may be used as evidence of the truth of the facts it can reasonably be supposed the speaker intended to assert (Evidence Act 2008 s 60).

10. Evidence of the accused's silence may be excluded under Evidence Act 2008 ss 135 or 137. It may be appropriate to do so where:

    - It is not clear precisely what the accused was admitting by his or her silence (see, e.g. R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501 (Buchanan JA)); or
    - The evidence has limited probative value (see, e.g. R v Gallagher [1998] 2 VR 671 (Callaway JA)).

Directions

11. As a form of incriminating conduct evidence, directions on silence to equal parties are mandatory and are not subject to the Part 3 request process. The judge must direct the jury that they may only treat the evidence as probative if it concludes that the conduct occurred and the only reasonable explanation of the conduct is that the accused believed he or she had committed the offence charged or an element of the offence charged. The judge must also direct that even if the jury finds the accused believed he or she committed the offence charged, it must still decide on the whole of the evidence whether the prosecution has proved the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 21).

12. Applying the principles in Jury Directions Act 2015 s 21 to the specific context of admissions by silence, the judge should instruct the jury about:

    - The nature of the statement made in the accused's presence, and the accused's response to that statement;
    - The expectation that the accused would respond to that statement;

- The inferences (if any) that could be drawn from the accused's failure to respond;
- The limited weight that it should give the evidence.

Nature of the Statement and Response

13. The jury must determine precisely what statement (if any) was made in the accused's presence (see, e.g. R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501; R v Salahattin [1983] VR 521).
14. Where the timing of the statement is important, the jury may also need to determine approximately when the statement was made (R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501).
15. The jury may also need to determine whether the statement contained an implicit allegation against the accused (e.g. that the accused had engaged in inappropriate sexual conduct with the complainant) (R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501).
16. Once the jury has determined the nature of the statement made, they will need to determine how the accused responded to that statement (i.e., whether or not he or she remained silent) (R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501).

Was a Response Expected?

17. The jury must determine whether the statement called for a response. An inference can only be drawn from the accused's silence if the circumstances were such that, in ordinary experience, the accused would have been expected to respond to the statement made in his or her presence (R v Salahattin [1983] VR 521; R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501; Sibanda v R (2011) 33 VR 67).
18. This is a question of human experience – of the probability that a person would react in a certain way in particular circumstances (R v Salahattin [1983] VR 521. See also R v Gallagher [1998] 2 VR 671; R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501; R v Alexander [1994] 2 VR 249; Sibanda v R (2011) 33 VR 67).
19. In determining this issue, the jury must consider all of the circumstances in the case. For example, it may be relevant:
    - That although the statement was made in the accused's presence, it was not made directly to the accused; or
    - That the accused was not invited to comment on the statement (see, e.g. R v Thomas [1970] VR 674; R v Salahattin [1983] VR 521).
20. The relationship between the relevant parties may also be relevant. There may have been something in the relationship or relative positions of the parties that precluded the accused from responding (R v Salahattin [1983] VR 521).

What Inference Can Be Drawn from the Accused's Silence?

21. If the jury finds that the accused failed to respond to a statement in circumstances where a person would ordinarily have been expected to respond, they must then determine what inference (if any) can be drawn from that fact (R v Salahattin [1983] VR 521; R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501).
22. One inference the jury may draw is that the accused, by his or her silence, admitted the truth of the whole or some part of the statement made in his or her presence (R v Salahattin [1983] VR 521; R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501).[201]

[201] The jury may also be able to infer a consciousness of guilt from the accused's silence. See 4.6 Incriminating Conduct (Post Offence Lies and Conduct) for further information.

23. To draw this inference, the jury must find that by remaining silent in the circumstances, the accused acknowledged the truth of the statement made in his or her presence. In other words, he or she adopted the statement, making it his or her own (Woon v R (1964) 109 CLR 529; R v Thomas [1970] VR 674).

24. The judge must direct the jury that they may only draw this inference if there is no other reasonable explanation for the accused's silence in the circumstances, and direct them about any other reasons the accused may have had for remaining silent in the circumstances. For example, the accused:

    - May not have heard the statement;
    - May not have understood the statement;
    - May not have had the opportunity to respond to the statement;
    - May have been physically, mentally or emotionally prevented from responding to the statement;
    - May have been confused by the statement or taken by surprise;
    - May have considered the allegation to be unworthy of an answer;
    - May have wished to conceal matters which are irrelevant to the case before the court;
    - May have lacked confidence in his or her ability to speak English fluently and in a manner capable of being understood; or
    - May have believed that he or she should speak only when directly spoken to (see, e.g. R v Thomas [1970] VR 674; R v Salahattin [1983] VR 521; R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501).

25. Even if the accused had no specific reason for failing to respond, it is for the jury to decide whether or not to infer that he or she had adopted the whole or part of the statement by his or her silence (R v Salahattin [1983] VR 521; R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501).

26. It may be appropriate to direct the jury that people react to allegations in different ways, and that care must be taken when drawing any inferences from the accused's silence.

27. The jury must determine precisely what the accused was admitting (if anything) by his or her silence (R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501).

28. To a large extent, this will depend on the nature of the statement made in the accused's presence. For example, if the statement did not (explicitly or implicitly) allege that the accused had committed the particular offence with which he was charged, then the accused cannot have admitted his or her guilt of that offence by remaining silent (see, e.g. R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501).

Direct the Jury About Possible Uses of the Admission

29. The judge must direct the jury about the ways in which they can use the accused's admission (R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501).

30. This will depend on precisely what the accused admitted by his or her silence. For example:

    - If the accused was specifically asked about the offence with which he or she is charged, and the jury finds that by remaining silent the accused admitted his or her guilt of that offence, the jury can use that admission as direct proof of the relevant offence;

- If the accused was asked a question which does not directly relate to the offence with which he or she is charged, such as "have you been sexually involved with the complainant?", and the jury finds that by remaining silent the accused admitted that he had been sexually involved with the complainant, the jury can only use that as an admission of an improper sexual interest towards the complainant. They cannot use the admission as direct proof of the offence charged (R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501).

31. Where an admission can only be used to demonstrate an improper sexual interest in the complainant, the judge may need to:
    - Instruct the jury about the limited ways in which evidence of improper sexual interest may be used (see 4.17 Tendency Evidence); and
    - Tell the jury that such evidence cannot be used in direct proof of the charged offence (R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501).
32. The judge should direct the jury that they may only use the admission in the relevant way if they are satisfied that it is true (R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501).

Other Directions

33. The judge must direct the jury that evidence from silence "has no great probative value" (R v Alexander [1994] 2 VR 249, 263; Stern v The King [2023] VSCA 57, [59]).
34. The judge may also need to warn the jury under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32 that evidence of admissions may be unreliable. See 4.21 Unreliable Evidence Warning for further information.
35. Where the judge limits the use of the evidence under Evidence Act 2008 s 136 (see above), the judge may need to direct the jury that:
    - The statement provides no evidence of the truth of the allegation made or of the facts asserted in the statement;
    - The evidence consists of the accused's reaction to the statement by way of silence;
    - The statement was admitted only because it introduced or explained the accused's conduct on hearing that statement;
    - If they do not find that the accused, by his or her silence, made an admission, they must wholly disregard the statement; and
    - If they find that the accused only accepted part of the statement made to him or her, then they must disregard the other parts of the statement (see, e.g. R v Grills (1910) 11 CLR 400; R v Thomas [1970] VR 674; Barca v R (1975) 133 CLR 82; R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501)
36. If the prosecution has improperly suggested that the jury can reason that the accused remained silent out of a consciousness of guilt, the judge may need to direct them not to do so (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 16, 23; R v MMJ (2006) 166 A Crim R 501).

4.16.1 Charge: Admissions by Silence

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge may be given when it is alleged that by failing to respond to a statement made by a person with whom s/he was on equal terms, the accused admitted the truth of part or all of that statement.

The direction should not be given when the admission is:

i) An admission that the accused committed an offence charged or an element of an offence charged; or

ii) An admission which negates a defence to an offence charged.

Failure to Respond to Equal Parties

I must now give you some directions about NOW's evidence that NOA remained silent when [identify statement made in accused's presence].

The prosecution has argued that you should infer from NOA's silence that s/he admitted [identify alleged admission]. You will recall what I have told you about inferences.[202]

While you may draw this inference from NOA's silence, you must find three matters before you do.

First, you must find that NOW actually made the statement alleged, and that NOA failed to respond to that statement. [Summarise any evidence and arguments on this issue.]

Second, you must find that the statement made by NOW would usually call for a response of some kind. This is a question of ordinary human experience. It requires you to determine whether you think that a person in NOA's circumstances would normally have been expected to respond to NOW's statement. It is only if you find that s/he would that you can draw any inference from NOA's silence. [Identify relevant circumstances and summarise evidence and arguments.]

Third, you must find that by remaining silent in the circumstances, NOA acknowledged the truth of NOW's statement that [identify relevant part of the statement]. In other words, s/he adopted that statement, making it his/her own.

This will only be the case if there is no other reasonable explanation for NOA's silence in the circumstances. You must not draw an inference if you think it is reasonably possible that NOA did not respond to NOW's statement for another reason.

In considering this issue, you should bear in mind that people react to allegations in different ways. You should therefore take care when drawing any inferences from the accused's silence.

[Summarise evidence and arguments concerning possible reasons for the accused's failure to respond, such as failing to hear or understand the statement. See 4.16 Silence in Response to Equal Parties for guidance.]

It is only if you find all three of these matters that you can infer that by remaining silent, NOA admitted [identify admission].

If you do draw this inference, you can use NOA's admission to [identify permissible uses of the admission. See 4.16 Silence in Response to Equal Parties for guidance]. However, you may only do so if you are accept that the admission was true. Even then, you should not give this evidence great weight. Even if you find that the accused's silence was an admission, you must still decide, based on all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proved the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt.

[If a s 165 Unreliability Warning is required, insert here. See 4.21 Unreliable Evidence Warning for further information.]

It is important to note that NOW's statement that [identify statement] is not itself evidence of the facts alleged in that statement. The evidence about those facts comes from NOA's reactions to the statement. This means that if you do not find that NOA admitted the truth of NOW's statement by remaining silent, then you must completely disregard the statement. [If relevant, add: Similarly, if you find that s/he only accepted part of the statement, then you must disregard the other parts.[203]]

[202] This charge is based on the assumption that the judge has already instructed the jury about inferences. It will need to be modified if that has not been done.

[203] This paragraph is based on the assumption that a judge has limited the use of the evidence under Evidence Act 2008 s 136. If this has not been done, it will need to be modified accordingly.

4.17 Tendency Evidence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Part 4, Division 2, of the Jury Directions Act 2015 regulates jury directions on 'other misconduct evidence'. This is defined as:
   (a) Coincidence evidence, as defined in the Evidence Act 2008;
   (b) Tendency evidence, as defined in the Evidence Act 2008;
   (c) Evidence of other discreditable acts and omissions of an accused that are not directly relevant to a fact in issue;
   (d) Evidence that is adduced to assist the jury to understand the context in which the offence charged or any alternative offence is alleged to have been committed (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 26).
2. This topic examines tendency evidence as a form of 'other misconduct evidence'.

What is "Tendency Evidence"?

3. "Tendency evidence" is evidence that is used to prove that a person has or had a tendency to:
   - Act in a particular way; or
   - Have a particular state of mind (Evidence Act 2008 s 97).
4. The following types of evidence may, in certain circumstances,[204] be used to prove that a person had such a tendency:
   - Evidence of a person's character;
   - Evidence of a person's reputation;
   - Evidence of a person's conduct; or
   - Evidence of a tendency that a person has or had (Evidence Act 2008 s 97).

How do "tendency evidence" and "coincidence evidence" differ?

5. Care must be taken to distinguish "tendency evidence" from "coincidence evidence" (R v Nassif [2004] NSWCCA 433; Gardiner v R [2006] NSWCCA 190; KJR v R [2007] NSWCCA 165).
6. "Tendency evidence" is evidence that allows the jury to reason that: > he did it before; he has a propensity to do this sort of thing; the likelihood is that he did it again on the occasion in issue (Hughes v The Queen (2017) 344 ALR 187 at [70] per Gageler J).
7. "Coincidence evidence" is evidence which uses the improbability of two or more events occurring coincidentally to prove that a person performed a particular act or had a particular state of mind (Evidence Act 2008 s 98).
8. While the evidence that constitutes "tendency evidence" and "coincidence evidence" may seem similar, the type of inferential reasoning used by the jury differs for each type of evidence:

---

[204] See "Admissibility of Tendency Evidence" below.

- In relation to coincidence evidence, the jury relies on the improbability of events occurring other than in the way suggested to infer the fact in issue ("coincidence reasoning");
- In relation to tendency evidence, the jury relies on the fact that a person has a tendency to act in a certain way to infer the fact in issue ("tendency reasoning") (R v Nassif [2004] NSWCCA 433).[205]

9. Judges must therefore separately determine whether to admit evidence as tendency evidence and whether to admit evidence as coincidence evidence. In doing so, they must consider how the parties seek to use the evidence, as that will determine which admissibility test applies and what directions the jury must be given (R v Nassif [2004] NSWCCA 433; Gardiner v R [2006] NSWCCA 190; KJR v R [2007] NSWCCA 165).
10. See 4.18 Coincidence Evidence for further information concerning coincidence evidence.

How do "tendency", "relationship" and "context" evidence differ?

11. "Tendency evidence" must also be distinguished from:
    - "Relationship Evidence": Evidence that demonstrates the nature of a relevant relationship, which may be used as circumstantial evidence of the accused's guilt (see, e.g., R v BJC (2005) 13 VR 407; Gipp v R (1998) 194 CLR 106; R v Vonarx [1999] 3 VR 618); and
    - "Context Evidence": Evidence that provides essential background information, which may help the jury to assess and evaluate the other evidence in the case in a true and realistic context (see, e.g., R v AH (1997) 42 NSWLR 702; R v Camilleri [1999] VSC 159; R v Sadler (2008) 20 VR 69).

Determining whether evidence is "tendency evidence"

12. It is important for judges to determine whether evidence is sought to be admitted and used as tendency evidence, coincidence evidence, relationship evidence and/or context evidence. That determination will affect the admissibility test to apply and the directions to be given.
13. As this can be a difficult task, at the start of the trial the judge should ask the prosecution to characterise the evidence in question and explain how it is alleged the evidence is relevant (see HML & Ors v R (2008) 235 CLR 334 per Hayne J).
14. The prosecution should clearly articulate how it says the jury should use the relevant evidence. If that use would involve tendency reasoning (see above), then the evidence must be treated as tendency evidence (Qualtieri v R [2006] NSWCCA 95; R v Li [2003] NSWCCA 407; R v AH (1997) 42 NSWLR 702; R v Ngatikaura [2006] NSWCCA 161; R v Cakovski (2004) 149 A Crim R 21).

Admissibility of Evidence Capable of Proving a Tendency

15. Evidence which may show that a person has a particular tendency may be admitted:
    - In order to prove that tendency; or
    - For another purpose.

[205] Thus, while tendency evidence and coincidence evidence are often referred to together (as though tendency evidence is invariably also coincidence evidence and vice versa), this is not correct. Sections 97 and 98 describe two different paths of reasoning (R v Nassif [2004] NSWCCA 433; Gardiner v R [2006] NSWCCA 190; KJR v R [2007] NSWCCA 165).

Admitting evidence in order to prove a tendency

16. The "tendency rule" states that evidence is generally[206] not admissible as tendency evidence (i.e., for the purposes of proving a tendency) unless:
    - The party seeking to adduce the evidence gave reasonable notice of its intention to do so; and
    - The court thinks that the evidence will have significant probative value (Evidence Act 2008 s 97).
17. In determining the probative value of tendency evidence, the court must examine whether the evidence is capable of rationally affecting the probability of the existence of a fact in issue to a significant extent. The facts in issue are the facts which establish the elements of the offence (Hughes v The Queen (2017) 344 ALR 187 at [16]).
18. The probative value of tendency evidence depends on the issues the evidence is used to prove. Where the evidence is used to prove the identity of the offender for a known offence, close similarity between the prior conduct and the offending is necessary. However, different considerations arise where the fact in issue is whether the alleged offending occurred. Where the defence suggests that prosecution witnesses have fabricated their allegations, proof that the accused has a tendency to engage in the conduct alleged is likely to be influential in determining whether the prosecution has excluded the possibility that the witnesses have fabricated their accounts or been mistaken (Hughes v The Queen (2017) 344 ALR 187 at [39]–[40]. See also Thrussell v R [2017] VSCA 386 at [53]).
19. In assessing whether evidence has significant probative value, the court must consider:
    - The extent to which the evidence supports the alleged tendency; and
    - The extent to which the alleged tendency makes the facts alleged to prove the charged offence more likely (Hughes v The Queen (2017) 344 ALR 187 at [41]).
20. While conduct which has been repeated on multiple occasions will often have greater probative value, evidence of a single occasion is capable, in appropriate cases, of meeting the tests for admission as tendency evidence. Any delay between instances of the alleged conduct will also be relevant when assessing the probative value of the evidence (Reeves v R (2013) 41 VR 275; GBF v R [2010] VSCA 135).
21. Where it is the prosecution who seeks to lead tendency evidence about the accused, the evidence will only be admissible if its probative value substantially outweighs any prejudicial effect that it may have on the accused (Evidence Act 2008 s 101).
22. The provisions concerning the admissibility of tendency evidence are a code which replaced the common law rules regarding propensity and similar fact evidence (Hughes v The Queen (2017) 344 ALR 187 at [31]; Velkoski v R (2014) 45 VR 680; R v Ellis (2003) 58 NSWLR 700; Murdoch v R (2013) 40 VR 451).
23. In determining whether tendency evidence has significant probative value, the possibility of collusion, collaboration or innocent infection is not relevant, unless those possibilities rise to a level where it would not be open to the jury rationally to accept the evidence (R v Bauer [2018] HCA 40 at [69]). Previous decisions holding that the possibility of collusion destroys the probative value of tendency evidence have been overruled (compare Velkoski v R (2014) 45 VR 680; Murdoch v R (2013) 40 VR 451; PNJ v R (2010) 27 VR 146; BSJ v R (2012) 35 VR 475).

[206] The tendency rule is subject to a number of exceptions and exclusions. See, e.g., Evidence Act 2008 ss 94, 97(2), 110, 111.

24. If judges decide to admit tendency evidence in circumstances where there is a risk of collusion, collaboration or innocent infection, the judge must warn that jury that it must find that the evidence from each witness was not affected by other witnesses before acting on the tendency evidence (Velkoski v R (2014) 45 VR 680; Murdoch v R (2013) 40 VR 451 at [134]; PNJ v R (2010) 27 VR 146; BSJ v R (2012) 35 VR 475).

Admitting evidence for another purpose

25. The "tendency rule" only governs the admission of evidence that is sought to be adduced as tendency evidence. It does not prevent the admission of evidence that may show that a person has a tendency (e.g., evidence of prior violent acts) for another purpose (e.g., to provide context for the offence) (see, e.g., R v Quach [2002] NSWCCA 519; Conway v R (2000) 98 FCR 204; FDP v R (2008) 74 NSWLR 645; R v Cornwell (2003) 57 NSWLR 82; R v Lock (1997) 91 A Crim R 356).

26. Such evidence does not need to comply with the tendency rule in order to be admitted. Instead, its admissibility is governed by the general test of relevance in Part 3.1 of the Evidence Act 2008, and the discretions contained in Part 3.11 of that Act (R v Quach [2002] NSWCCA 519; Conway v R (2000) 98 FCR 204; FDP v R (2008) 74 NSWLR 645; R v Cornwell (2003) 57 NSWLR 82; R v Lock (1997) 91 A Crim R 356).

27. While such evidence may be admitted for a non-tendency purpose, if it is not admissible under the tendency rule, it cannot be used to prove that a person has or had a relevant tendency (Evidence Act 2008 s 95).

28. This means that where evidence is admitted for another purpose, the jury may only use it as tendency evidence if it also satisfies the requirements of s97 and s101 (Evidence Act 2008 s 95; R v OGD (No 2) (2000) 50 NSWLR 433; KJR v R [2007] NSWCCA 165).

29. This issue can be important in trials involving multiple charges. In such trials, questions may arise as to whether evidence admitted to prove one charge can be used as tendency evidence to prove a matter relevant to one of the other charges. In answering this question, the court must determine whether that evidence would be admissible under the tendency rule if the charges were heard separately (R v Nassif [2004] NSWCCA 433; R v Ellis [2004] HCA Trans 488).

Uses of Tendency Evidence

30. Where evidence of a person's past behaviour is admissible under the tendency rule,[207] the jury may use that evidence to:

    - Infer that the person has or had a tendency to act in a particular way or have a particular state of mind; and
    - Infer that the person behaved in accordance with that tendency on another occasion (R v Cittadani [2008] NSWCCA 256; R v Harker [2004] NSWCCA 427. See also Jacara v Perpetual Trustees WA (2000) 106 FCR 51).

31. For example, if tendency evidence is led that proves that a person behaves in a violent manner when in a particular state of mind, the jury may use that evidence to find that that person acted in the same manner at the time of the alleged offence (R v Andrews [2003] NSWCCA 7; R v Li [2003] NSWCCA 407; c.f. R v Cakovski (2004) 149 A Crim R 21).

[207] This includes evidence that is actually admitted under the tendency rule, as well as evidence that is admitted for another purpose but which is admissible under that rule (see above).

Demonstrating an improper sexual interest

32. One common type of tendency evidence is "guilty passion" evidence. This consists of evidence that the accused has acted in a sexual way towards the complainant on one or more other occasions (Velkoski v R (2014) 45 VR 680; HML & Ors v R (2008) 235 CLR 334; R v Mckenzie-McHarg [2008] VSCA 206; R v AH (1997) 42 NSWLR 702; Rolfe v R [2007] NSWCCA 155; R v ELD [2004] NSWCCA 219; R v Greenham [1999] NSWCCA 8).[208]

33. "Guilty passion" evidence may be admitted as tendency evidence, to prove that the accused had an improper sexual interest in the complainant and a willingness to express that interest (HML & Ors v R (2008) 235 CLR 334; R v Mckenzie-McHarg [2008] VSCA 206; JLS v The Queen (2010) 28 VR 328; Rolfe v R [2007] NSWCCA 155;).

34. The probative value of "guilty passion" stems from the:

> ordinary human experience that, where a person is sexually attracted to another and has acted on that sexual attraction and the opportunity presents itself to do so again, he or she will seek to gratify his or her sexual attraction to that other person by engaging in sexual acts of various kinds with that person (R v Bauer [2018] HCA 40 at [51]).

35. Evidence can only be used to show a sexual interest in the complainant if it is admitted as tendency evidence. Where evidence is relevant and admissible for another purpose, it cannot be used to show a sexual interest unless the conditions for admission as tendency evidence are met (Evidence Act 2008 s 95; Ritchie v R [2018] VSCA 31 at [36]–[45]).

36. The tendency evidence that demonstrates the accused's sexual interest with the complainant does not need to constitute criminal acts (R v EF [2008] VSCA 213; R v McKenzie-McHarg [2008] VSCA 206).

37. Where the prosecution alleges a series of sexual acts over a period of time against a single complainant, both charged and uncharged acts may be admissible as tendency evidence to show the accused had a sexual interest in the complainant and was willing to act on that interest. Provided the conduct relied on as tendency evidence is not far removed in time, and is of similar gravity to the charged acts, it is not necessary for there to be special features or independent support for the tendency evidence (R v Bauer [2018] HCA 40 at [48]).

38. However, in the unusual case where there is only one uncharged act which is remote in time and of different gravity to the charged acts, then some special feature will be necessary to give that uncharged act significant probative value (IMM v The Queen (2016) 257 CLR 300 at [61]–[64]).

39. Although evidence of a single prior opportunistic incident will usually not be capable of supporting an inference that the accused had an improper sexual interest in the complainant (R v Young [1998] 1 VR 402), such evidence must be considered alongside the other evidence given in the case. The tendency evidence does not, by itself, need to prove the existence of a sexual interest (R v DD (2007) 19 VR 143).

Tendency Evidence and Multiple Sexual Complainants

40. Prior to Hughes v The Queen (2017) 344 ALR 187, Victorian jurisprudence had held that it was not permissible to speak in general terms about a sexual interest in multiple complainants. Instead, the focus was on the nature of the accused's conduct, rather than the accused's state of mind (Velkoski v R (2014) 45 VR 680, [173(f)], [234]).

[208] In some cases this is described as an improper sexual "relationship" with the complainant. However, it is not the relationship between the parties that is of relevance here. It is the accused's (often unilateral) attraction to, or interest in, the complainant that is of importance. The term "sexual relationship" is therefore avoided wherever possible.

41. In Hughes v The Queen (2017) 344 ALR 187, the majority rejected this limitation, noting that s 97(1) explicitly provides for tendency evidence to prove a state of mind; a sexual interest in young children is a particular state of mind; and, in cases involving charges of sexual offending against young children, proof of that state of mind may have significant probative value (at [32]).

42. Where there are multiple complainants, some feature of the alleged acts will be necessary to link the allegations together before the evidence can have significant probative value. This may stem from a special, particular or unusual feature, such as a brazen disregard of the risk of discovery (Hughes v The Queen (2017) 344 ALR 187; R v Bauer [2018] HCA 40 at [58]–[59]; Bauer v The Queen [2017] VSCA 176 at [62]; McPhillamy v The Queen [2018] HCA 52).

Directions About Tendency Evidence and Reasoning

43. The need for directions about tendency evidence and reasoning depends on whether a direction is sought and whether, despite the absence of any request, there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving the direction (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

44. Tendency evidence is a form of 'other misconduct evidence'. The content of the direction is specified in Jury Directions Act 2015 Part 4, Division 2.

Directions where tendency evidence adduced by prosecution

45. Where tendency evidence is adduced by the prosecution and a direction is necessary, the trial judge must:

    (a) Identify how the evidence is relevant to the existence of a fact in issue; and

    (b) Direct the jury not to use the evidence for any other purpose; and

    (c) Direct the jury that it must not decide the case based on prejudice arising from what it has heard about the accused; and

    (d) If the evidence only forms part of the case against the accused, inform the jury of this fact (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 27(2)).

46. In giving the direction, the judge does not need to:

    (a) Explain what the jury should consider in deciding whether to use the evidence as tendency evidence;

    (b) Identify impermissible uses of the evidence;

    (c) Refer to any other matter (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 27(3)).

47. The Jury Directions Act 2015 abolishes the common law obligations in relation to directions on tendency evidence. This includes the obligation to warn the jury against substitution reasoning[209] or reasoning that the accused is the kind of person likely to have committed the offences charged (see Alec v The King [2023] VSCA 208, [78] and compare R v Grech [1997] 2 VR 609. But c.f. Briggs v The King [2024] VSCA 80, [54]).

[209] A warning against substitution reasoning is a warning that the jury must not substitute evidence of other misconduct for the specific activity which is the subject of the offence charged. This can also be expressed as a warning that the offence charged can be proved only by evidence relating to it, and not by evidence of extraneous conduct (see R v Beserick (1993) 30 NSWLR 510, 516; R v Grech [1997] 2 VR 609, 614).

48. Judges should avoid using the term "uncharged acts" when describing tendency evidence, as it may invite speculation about why no charges were laid (HML & Ors v The Queen (2008) 235 CLR 334; R v McKenzie-McHarg [2008] VSCA 206).

49. The judge must explain to the jury how the tendency evidence is relevant in the case. This requires the judge to link the use of the evidence to the issues in the case. It is not sufficient for him or her merely to describe the evidence as giving rise to a tendency to act in a certain way (R v Li [2003] NSWCCA 407; R v Martin [2000] NSWCCA 332).

50. To assist with this task, it will usually be helpful to have the prosecutor describe each step along the path (or paths) of reasoning which the jury may follow to infer the accused's guilt from the evidence (HML & Ors v The Queen (2008) 235 CLR 334 per Hayne J).

51. If the tendency evidence may demonstrate the accused's sexual interest in the complainant, it is proper for the trial judge to tell the jury that they might use the evidence:

    - When assessing the other evidence and thereby determining the accused's guilt of the offences charged; and
    - To set the context in which the other evidence of the offences should be understood (R v BJC (2005) 13 VR 407).

52. The language of "guilty passion" is inappropriate and should not be used with the jury. The focus of the jury must be on whether the evidence proves that the accused had a sexual interest in the complainant and a willingness to act on that interest. Such evidence should be described as demonstrating a "sexual interest" (HML & Ors v The Queen (2008) 235 CLR 334; R v Ball [1911] AC 47; R v BJC (2005) 13 VR 407; R v Sadler (2008) 20 VR 69; Rolfe v R [2007] NSWCCA 155; Velkoski v R (2014) 45 VR 680).

53. Judges should also avoid use of the term "relationship evidence" to describe the respective positions of the parties and the unilateral actions of the accused (HML & Ors v The Queen (2008) 235 CLR 334 per Kiefel J; Frawley v R (1993) 69 A Crim R 208; R v Nieterink (1999) 76 SASR 56).

54. While tendency evidence can be used to demonstrate the accused had a sexual interest in the complainant and had acted on that interest, it cannot "be used in a more general way as demonstrating that an accused person was the sort of person who would commit the offences in question". Such reasoning is known as "impermissible propensity reasoning" (Briggs v The King [2024] VSCA 80, [52]).

Standard of proof

55. At common law it was once thought that tendency evidence adduced to show that the accused had a sexual interest in the complainant could not be used unless the jury was satisfied that the evidence proved that interest beyond reasonable doubt (R v Sadler (2008) 20 VR 69; DJV v R [2008] NSWCCA 272; DTS v R [2008] NSWCCA 329; JDK v R [2009] NSWCCA 76; R v MM (2000) 112 A Crim R 519). In relation to single complainant cases, this common law rule was abolished by R v Bauer [2018] HCA 40 at [80].

56. The requirement for proof of tendency evidence beyond reasonable doubt is also prohibited by the Jury Directions Act 2015. Under the Act, the only matters which must be proved beyond reasonable doubt are the elements of the offence and the absence of any defences. The judge may not direct the jury that any other matters need to be proved beyond reasonable doubt (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 61, 62). See Circumstantial Evidence and Inferences for further information.

57. No different principle applies between charged and uncharged acts relied on as tendency evidence. The question in each case will be whether the tendency is proved on the whole of the evidence and, if so, the tendency may be relied on in proof of the charges. In performing this exercise, it is not appropriate to invite the jury to apply any standard of proof to individual items of evidence relied on in proof of the tendency (JS v The Queen [2022] NSWCCA 145, [43]; DPP v Roder [2024] HCA 15, [26]–[28]).

Directions where tendency evidence adduced by the accused about a co-accused

58. Where tendency evidence is adduced by an accused about a co-accused, the prosecution or the co-accused may request a direction about that evidence.

59. In giving a direction about that evidence, the trial judge must

    (a) Identify how the evidence is relevant to the existence of a fact in issue; and

    (b) Direct the jury not to use the evidence for any other purpose; and

    (c) Direct the jury that it must not decide the case based on prejudice arising from what it has heard about the co-accused (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 28(2)).

60. In giving the direction, the judge does not need to:

    (a) Explain what the jury should consider in deciding whether to use the evidence as tendency evidence

    (b) Identify impermissible uses of the evidence

    (c) Refer to any other matter (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 28(3)).

Directions where evidence is not admissible as tendency evidence

61. Under the Jury Directions Act 2015 'other misconduct evidence' is defined as:

    (a) Coincidence evidence;

    (b) Tendency evidence;

    (c) Evidence of other discreditable acts and omissions of an accused that are not directly relevant to a fact in issue;

    (d) Evidence that is adduced to assist the jury to understand the context in which the offence charged or any alternative offence is alleged to have been committed (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 26).

62. The defence may ask the judge to warn the jury not to use other misconduct evidence which is not tendency evidence as tendency evidence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 29).

63. The judge may also warn the jury against the risk of misusing evidence as tendency evidence where the evidence does not fall within the definition of 'other misconduct evidence'.

64. A warning against using evidence as tendency evidence warns the jury not to infer from the evidence that the accused is the kind of person who is likely to have committed the offence charged, and to use that conclusion as evidence of guilt (R v ODG (No 2) (2000) 50 NSWLR 433; Martin v State of Tasmania [2008] TASSC 66; Qualtieri v R [2006] NSWCCA 95; R v Chan [2002] NSWCCA 217; R v Conway (2000) 98 FCR 204; Gipp v The Queen (1998) 194 CLR 106; R v ATM [2000] NSWCCA 475; FMT v R [2011] VSCA 165; R v M, BJ (2011) 110 SASR 1).

65. If uncharged acts are led as part of a multiple charge indictment, the judge should make it clear that the warning against tendency reasoning applies to both the charged and uncharged acts (see R v CF [2004] VSCA 212; R v DD (2007) 19 VR 143).

66. When giving a warning against tendency reasoning, the judge should not refer to the accused having a "propensity" or a "criminal propensity" or a "tendency". Instead, judges should describe the evidence as demonstrating a "pattern of behaviour" or, in sexual offence cases, a "sexual interest".

67. When evidence is admitted which discloses paedophilia, but which is not admitted as tendency evidence (because the requirements of ss97 and 101 have not been met), directions against tendency reasoning are especially important. This is because such evidence is highly prejudicial (see R v J (No 2) [1998] 3 VR 602; R v DCC (2004) 11 VR 129; R v T (1996) 86 A Crim R 293; R v DD (2007) 19 VR 143).

68. It may not be necessary to warn the jury against tendency reasoning when the accused is charged with a "course of conduct" offence (such as persistent sexual abuse), and the component acts are separately charged (KRM v The Queen (2001) 206 CLR 221). See also 7.3.23 Persistent Sexual Abuse of Child (From 1/7/17).

69. There also may not be any need to warn the jury against tendency reasoning when there is little or no risk that the jury will use the evidence to engage in such reasoning (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 29(2)). In some cases, a warning against tendency reasoning can increase the risk of the jury engaging in impermissible tendency reasoning and defence counsel may ask the judge not to give the direction (FDP v R (2008) 74 NSWLR 645; R v DH [2000] NSWCCA 360; R v Bastan [2009] VSCA 157.

Timing of the Charge

70. Short directions on the use of tendency evidence which are consistent with Jury Directions Act 2015 Part 4, Division 2, should be given at the time the evidence is led. Detailed directions may also be given in the final charge (see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 10; R v Grech [1997] 2 VR 609; R v Beserick (1993) 30 NSWLR 510; Qualtieri v R [2006] NSWCCA 95).

4.17.1 Charge: Tendency Evidence (General Charge)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge may be given where a direction has been requested regarding tendency evidence called by the prosecution.

A short direction based on this charge should be given at the time the evidence is led.

Use of Tendency Evidence

Members of the jury, part of the prosecution case is that NOA has demonstrated a tendency, or in other words, a pattern of behaviour, to [describe alleged tendency].

[Identify relevant tendency evidence.]

The prosecution argues that [summarise prosecution arguments on the use of tendency evidence]. In response, the defence says [summarise defence arguments on the use of tendency evidence].

If you find that NOA had a tendency to [describe relevant tendency], then you can use that to find that it is more likely that NOA committed [identify relevant offences].[210]

[210] In some cases, it will be necessary to identify intermediate steps through which the tendency evidence makes NOA's guilt more likely, such as by enhancing the credibility of the complainant.

You must keep this evidence in perspective. It is only one part of the prosecution's case.[211] It is not enough to convict the accused that you find [he/she] [identify the tendency evidence] or [identify the alleged tendency]. You can only find NOA guilty of a charge if you are satisfied of [his/her] guilt of that charge beyond reasonable doubt, based on the whole of the evidence.

As I have told you, you must not decide the case on the basis of feelings of sympathy or prejudice because of what you learn about the accused. The evidence has been led for the limited purpose of showing that [describe relevant tendency] and so is more likely to have committed the offence(s) charged. You must not use the evidence for any other purpose.

4.17.2 Charge: Tendency Evidence (Sexual Interest Evidence)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge may be given if evidence that the accused had an improper sexual interest in a single complainant has been admitted as tendency evidence. See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

A short direction based on this charge should be given at the time the evidence is led.

Permissible Uses of "Sexual Interest" Evidence

Members of the jury, part of the prosecution case is that NOA has demonstrated a sexual interest in the complainant and a willingness to act on that interest.[212]

[Identify relevant tendency evidence.]

The prosecution argues that [summarise prosecution arguments on the use of tendency evidence]. In response, the defence says [summarise defence arguments on the use of tendency evidence].

If you find that NOA had a sexual interest in the complainant and was willing to act on that interest, then you can use that to find that it is more likely that NOA committed [identify relevant offences].[213]

The prosecution also says that this evidence sets the scene in which the alleged offences took place. Without the evidence, there is a risk that NOC's evidence would be incomplete and may even be incomprehensible.[214]

[Explain how the provision of contextual information can assist the jury. Possibilities include helping the jury to understand:

[211] If the tendency evidence is the whole of the prosecution case, then this sentence should be omitted.

[212] This statement should be adapted based on the specific tendency alleged, including any circumstances which are said to form part of the circumstances in which the accused acts on the alleged tendency.

[213] In some cases, it will be necessary to identify intermediate steps through which the tendency evidence makes NOA's guilt more likely, such as by enhancing the credibility of the complainant.

[214] If the unhealthy sexual interest evidence is not relevant on a contextual basis, this section of the charge must be omitted.

- The complainant's alleged conduct or state of mind at the time of the offence, such as why s/he might have submitted to the accused's demands or did not complain about the alleged offending);
- The accused's alleged conduct or state of mind at the time of the offence, such as why s/he felt able to act in a particularly brazen manner);
- The circumstances of the alleged offence, such as to show that the complainant does not say that the offence occurred "out of the blue".]

You must keep this evidence in perspective. It is only one part of the prosecution's case.[215] It is not enough to convict the accused that you find [he/she] [identify the tendency evidence, e.g. "committed the uncharged acts"] or had acted on a sexual interest in NOC in the past. You can only find NOA guilty of a charge if you are satisfied of [his/her] guilt of that charge beyond reasonable doubt, based on the whole of the evidence.

As I have told you, you must not decide the case on the basis of feelings of sympathy or prejudice because of what you learn about the accused. The evidence has been led for the limited purpose of helping you understand the circumstances surrounding the alleged offending and to show that NOA had a sexual interest in NOC and a willingness to act on that interest, and so s/he is more likely to have committed the offence(s) charged. You must not use the evidence for any other purpose.

4.17.3 Charge: Tendency Evidence (General Defence Evidence)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge may be given where a direction has been requested regarding tendency evidence called by the defence.

A short direction based on this charge should be given at the time the evidence is led.

This charge should be adapted if the defence calls other forms of other misconduct evidence.

Use of Tendency Evidence

Members of the jury, you have heard evidence that NO3P[216] has demonstrated a tendency, or in other words, a pattern of behaviour, to [describe alleged tendency, e.g. "behave violently after drinking alcohol"].

[Identify relevant tendency evidence.]

The defence argues that [summarise defence arguments on the use of tendency evidence]. In response, the prosecution says [summarise defence arguments on the use of tendency evidence].

You must take this evidence into account when deciding whether the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that [identify relevant fact in issue].

4.17.4 Charge: Warning against Tendency Reasoning

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

I now need to give you a warning not to misuse some of the evidence.

---

[215] If the tendency evidence is the whole of the prosecution case, then this sentence should be omitted.

[216] Name of third person.

You will remember that the prosecution has led evidence that [identify relevant evidence].

As a matter of law, you must not use this evidence to reason that the accused has a shown a pattern of behaviour to commit crimes such as [identify relevant offence], or to [identify other relevant tendency].

This evidence is only relevant to prove [identify permissible use of the evidence].

You must decide the case only on the evidence of what NOA has done. Do not be tempted to reason that s/he's done something similar before, and so s/he is the kind of person who would commit this kind of offence. That would be unfair to the accused. You would be judging the case on the accused's history, rather than on the evidence of what s/he did or did not do on this occasion. Remember, you must not decide the case on the basis of feelings of sympathy or prejudice because of what you learn about the accused.

4.18 Coincidence Evidence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Part 4, Division 2 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 regulates jury directions on 'other misconduct evidence'. This is defined as:
   (a) Coincidence evidence, as defined in the Evidence Act 2008;
   (b) Tendency evidence, as defined in the Evidence Act 2008;
   (c) Evidence of other discreditable acts and omissions of an accused that are not directly relevant to a fact in issue;
   (d) Evidence that is adduced to assist the jury to understand the context in which the offence charged or any alternative offence is alleged to have been committed (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 26).
2. This topic examines coincidence evidence as a form of 'other misconduct evidence'.

What is "Coincidence Evidence"?

3. "Coincidence evidence" is evidence which uses the improbability of two or more events occurring coincidentally to prove that:
   - A person performed a particular act; or
   - A person had a particular state of mind (Evidence Act 2008 s 98).
4. The use of "coincidence evidence" relies on a process of inferential reasoning, in which the jury:
   - Infers from evidence of similarities between two or more events, and the circumstances in which the events occurred, that is improbable that the events occurred coincidentally; and
   - Infers from the improbability of such a coincidence the existence of a relevant fact in issue (Evidence Act 2008 s 98. See also R v DCC (2004) 11 VR 129).[217]

[217] See "Use of Coincidence Evidence" below for a discussion of some of the facts in issue that coincidence evidence can be used to prove.

5. One of the events relied upon may be an event the occurrence of which is a fact in issue in the proceeding (Evidence Act 2008 s 98).

How do "coincidence evidence" and "tendency evidence" differ?

6. Care must be taken to distinguish "coincidence evidence" from "tendency evidence" (R v Nassif [2004] NSWCCA 433; Gardiner v R [2006] NSWCCA 190; KJR v R [2007] NSWCCA 165).

7. "Tendency evidence" is evidence of a tendency that a person has or had, which the jury can use to infer a fact in issue (Evidence Act 2008 s 97).

8. While the evidence that constitutes "tendency evidence" and "coincidence evidence" may seem similar, the type of inferential reasoning used by the jury differs for each type of evidence:

    - In relation to coincidence evidence, the jury relies on the improbability of events occurring other than in the way suggested to infer the fact in issue ("coincidence reasoning");
    - In relation to tendency evidence, the jury relies on the fact that a person has a tendency to act in a certain way to infer the fact in issue ("tendency reasoning") (R v Nassif [2004] NSWCCA 433).[218]

9. Judges must therefore separately determine whether to admit evidence as coincidence evidence and whether to admit evidence as tendency evidence. In doing so, they must consider how the parties seek to use the evidence, as that will determine which admissibility test applies and what directions the jury must be given (R v Nassif [2004] NSWCCA 433; Gardiner v R [2006] NSWCCA 190; KJR v R [2007] NSWCCA 165).

10. See 4.17 Tendency Evidence for further information concerning tendency evidence.

How do "coincidence", "relationship" and "context" evidence differ?

11. "Coincidence evidence" must also be distinguished from:

    - "Relationship Evidence": Evidence that demonstrates the nature of a relevant relationship, which may be used as circumstantial evidence of the accused's guilt (see, e.g. R v BJC (2005) 13 VR 407; Gipp v R (1998) 194 CLR 106; R v Vonarx [1999] 3 VR 618); and
    - "Context Evidence": Evidence that provides essential background information, which may help the jury to assess and evaluate the other evidence in the case in a true and realistic context (see, e.g. R v AH (1997) 42 NSWLR 702; R v Camilleri [1999] VSC 159; R v Sadler (2008) 20 VR 69).

12. See 4.19 Other Forms of Other Misconduct Evidence for further information concerning relationship and context evidence.

Determining whether evidence is "coincidence evidence"

13. It is important for judges to determine whether evidence is sought to be admitted and used as coincidence evidence, tendency evidence, relationship evidence and/or context evidence. That determination will affect the admissibility test to apply and the directions to be given.

---

[218] Thus, while tendency evidence and coincidence evidence are often referred to together (as though tendency evidence is invariably also coincidence evidence and vice versa), this is not correct. Sections 97 and 98 describe two different paths of reasoning (R v Nassif [2004] NSWCCA 433; Gardiner v R [2006] NSWCCA 190; KJR v R [2007] NSWCCA 165).

14. As this can be a difficult task, at the start of the trial the judge should ask the prosecution to characterise the evidence in question and explain how it is alleged the evidence is relevant (see HML & Ors v R (2008) 235 CLR 334 (Hayne J)).

15. The prosecution should clearly articulate how it says the jury should use the relevant evidence. This will involve identifying the fact in issue and how the evidence is relevant to that fact in issue. If that use would involve coincidence reasoning (see above), then the evidence must be treated as coincidence evidence (see, e.g. Qualtieri v R [2006] NSWCCA 95; R v Li [2003] NSWCCA 407; R v AH (1997) 42 NSWLR 702; R v Ngatikaura [2006] NSWCCA 161; R v Cakovski (2004) 149 A Crim R 21; Jacobs v R [2017] VSCA 309, [15]).

Admissibility of Evidence of Similar Events

16. Evidence that two or more similar events occurred may be admitted:

    - In order to prove a fact in issue, due to the improbability that the events occurred coincidentally; or
    - For another purpose.

Admitting evidence to prove the improbability of coincidence

17. The "coincidence rule" states that evidence is generally[219] not admissible as coincidence evidence (i.e., for the purposes of proving a fact in issue due to the improbability of events occurring coincidentally) unless:

    - The party seeking to adduce the evidence gave reasonable notice of its intention to do so; and
    - The court thinks that the evidence will have significant probative value (Evidence Act 2008 s 98).

18. Where it is the prosecution who seeks to lead coincidence evidence about the accused, the evidence will only be admissible if its probative value substantially outweighs any prejudicial effect that it may have on the accused (Evidence Act 2008 s 101).

19. There does not need to be an exact parallel of circumstances (a "striking similarity") before two or more events may be admitted as coincidence evidence. Instead, the admissibility of coincidence evidence depends on the facts in issue, the nature and circumstances of the other acts, the degree of similarity between the events, the relationship between any relevant parties and all the circumstances of the case (PG v R [2010] VSCA 289; CW v R [2010] VSCA 288. See also S v R [2008] NSWCCA 330; AE v R [2008] NSWCCA 52; R v Ellis (2003) 58 NSWLR 700).

20. The provisions concerning the admissibility of coincidence evidence replace the common law rules regarding similar fact evidence (R v Ellis (2003) 58 NSWLR 700; CW v R [2010] VSCA 288).

21. Care should be taken when examining older cases on the scope of the coincidence rule. Before 2007, the coincidence rule in Uniform Evidence jurisdictions only applied to "related events", which were defined as events that were substantially and relevantly similar and where the circumstances were substantially similar. The new coincidence rule has broader application.[220]

---

[219] The coincidence rule is subject to a number of exceptions and exclusions. See, e.g. Evidence Act 2008 ss 94, 98(2).

[220] See Uniform Evidence Law: Report, ALRC Report 102, 11.19–11.25 for a discussion of the change and the reasons behind it.

Admitting evidence for another purpose

22. The "coincidence rule" only governs the admission of evidence that is sought to be adduced as coincidence evidence. It does not prevent evidence of similar events being admitted for another purpose (e.g. to provide context for the offence) (see, e.g. R v Quach [2002] NSWCCA 519; Conway v R (2000) 98 FCR 204; FDP v R (2008) 74 NSWLR 645; R v Cornwell (2003) 57 NSWLR 82; R v Lock (1997) 91 A Crim R 356).

23. Such evidence does not need to comply with the coincidence rule in order to be admitted. Instead, its admissibility is governed by the general test of relevance in Part 3.1 of the Evidence Act 2008,and the discretions contained in Part 3.11 of that Act (R v Quach [2002] NSWCCA 519; Conway v R (2000) 98 FCR 204; FDP v R (2008) 74 NSWLR 645; R v Cornwell (2003) 57 NSWLR 82; R v Lock (1997) 91 A Crim R 356).

24. While evidence of prior similar events may be admitted for a non-coincidence purpose, if that evidence is not admissible under the coincidence rule, it cannot be used to prove a fact in issue due to the improbability that the events occurred coincidentally (Evidence Act 2008 s 95).

25. This means that where evidence is admitted for another purpose, the jury may only use it as coincidence evidence if it also satisfies the requirements of ss 98–101 (Evidence Act 2008 s 95; R v OGD (No 2) (2000) 50 NSWLR 433; KJR v R [2007] NSWCCA 165).

26. This issue can be important in trials involving multiple charges. In such trials, questions may arise as to whether evidence admitted to prove one charge can be used as coincidence evidence to prove a matter relevant to one of the other charges. In answering this question, the court must determine whether that evidence would be admissible under the coincidence rule if the charges were heard separately (R v Nassif [2004] NSWCCA 433; R v Ellis [2004] HCA Trans 488).

Uses of Coincidence Evidence

27. Where evidence is admissible under the coincidence rule, that evidence can be used to prove a number of matters, including:

    - That an offence was committed;
    - That it was the accused who committed the offence;
    - That the accused was acting voluntarily;
    - That the accused had a particular state of mind; or
    - That several independent witnesses or complainants have given truthful evidence;
    - That several witnesses have made the same errors because of collusion (see, e.g. Makin v Attorney-General of New South Wales [1894] AC 57; Pfennig v R (1995) 182 CLR 461; DPP v Boardman [1975] AC 421; R v Anderson (2000) 1 VR 1; Wilson v R (1970) 123 CLR 334; R v Buckley (2004) 10 VR 215).

Coincidence Reasoning and Identity

28. Coincidence evidence may be used to establish the identity of the offender where the modus operandi used makes it likely that the same person is responsible for two or more particular offences (Pfennig v R (1995) 182 CLR 461; R v Straffen [1952] 2 QB 911; Thompson and Wran v R (1968) 117 CLR 313; R v Dupas (No 2) (2005) 12 VR 601).

29. In such cases, the evidence can only be used if the jury is satisfied that both offences were committed by the same person and that the accused committed one of the offences (Pfennig v R (1995) 182 CLR 461; Sutton v R (1984) 152 CLR 528).

30. For evidence of modus operandi to be admitted to establish the identity of the offender (due to a connection between the modus operandi used on other occasions and the modus operandi of the charged offence), that evidence must demonstrate more than the "stock in trade" of that type of offending (Sutton v R (1984) 152 CLR 528; R v Clune [1995] 1 VR 489; CW v R [2010] VSCA 288. See also R v Rajakaruna (2004) 8 VR 340; Thompson and Wran v R (1968) 117 CLR 313; CGL v DPP (2010) 24 VR 486; PNJ v DPP (2010) 27 VR 146).

Coincidence Reasoning and Credit

31. Coincidence evidence may be used to support the credibility of witnesses (see, e.g. R v Buckley (2004) 10 VR 215; R v DCC (2004) 11 VR 129; R v Papamitrou (2004) 7 VR 375; R v Rajakaruna (2004) 8 VR 340; R v Glennon (No 2) (2001) 7 VR 631).

32. This use of coincidence evidence relies on the improbability of independent witnesses making similar allegations against the accused. The jury may reason that the similarities are more than can be explained by coincidence, and so their evidence is mutually supporting (R v Buckley (2004) 10 VR 215; R v DCC (2004) 11 VR 129; R v Papamitrou (2004) 7 VR 375; R v Rajakaruna (2004) 8 VR 340; R v Glennon (No 2) (2001) 7 VR 631; Saoud v The Queen (2014) 87 NSWLR 481, [43]; Addo v The Queen (2022) 108 NSWLR 522, [67]–[69]; Page v The Queen [2015] VSCA 357).

33. In determining whether coincidence evidence has significant probative value, the possibility of collusion, collaboration or innocent infection is not relevant, unless those possibilities rise to a level where it would not be open to the jury rationally to accept the evidence (R v Bauer [2018] HCA 40, [69]). Previous decisions holding that the possibility of collusion destroys the probative value of coincidence evidence have been overruled (compare Velkoski v R [2014] VSCA 121; Murdoch v R (2013) 40 VR 451; PNJ v R (2010) 27 VR 146; BSJ v R (2012) 35 VR 475).

34. If judges decide to admit coincidence evidence in circumstances where there is a risk of collusion, collaboration or innocent infection, the judge must warn that jury that it must find that the evidence from each witness was not affected by other witnesses before acting on the coincidence evidence (Murdoch v R (2013) 40 VR 451, [134]; PNJ v R (2010) 27 VR 146; BSJ v R (2012) 35 VR 475).

35. Whether coincidence evidence can be used to support credit will depend in part on what facts are in issue in the trial. Where the fact in issue is the state of mind of an alleged victim or third party (such as whether a complainant consented to sexual penetration), it is not permissible to use the evidence of other complainants to draw an inference about a particular complainant's state of mind (see Jacobs v R [2017] VSCA 309; Phillips v R (2006) 225 CLR 303).

Directions About Coincidence Evidence and Reasoning

36. The need for a direction about coincidence evidence and reasoning will depend on whether a direction is sought and whether, despite the absence of any request, there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving the direction (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 12, 14, 15, 16, 17). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

37. Coincidence evidence is a form of 'other misconduct evidence'. The content of the direction is specified in Jury Directions Act 2015 Part 4, Division 2.

Directions where coincidence evidence adduced by prosecution

38. Where coincidence evidence is adduced by the prosecution and a direction is necessary, the trial judge must:

    (a) Identify how the evidence is relevant to the existence of a fact in issue; and

    (b) Direct the jury not to use the evidence for any other purpose; and

    (c) Direct the jury that it must not decide the case based on prejudice arising from what it has heard about the accused; and

(d) If the evidence only forms part of the case against the accused, inform the jury of this fact (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 27(2)).

39. In giving the direction, the judge does not need to:

(a) Explain what the jury should consider in deciding whether to use the evidence as coincidence evidence

(b) Identify impermissible uses of the evidence

(c) Refer to any other matter (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 27(3)).

40. The Jury Directions Act 2015 abolishes the common law obligations in relation to directions on coincidence evidence. This includes the obligation to warn the jury against substitution reasoning (compare R v Grech [1997] 2 VR 609).

41. The judge will need to explain the concept of "coincidence reasoning" to the jury. For examples on how this can be done, see R v Straffen [1952] 2 QB 911; Pfennig v R (1995) 182 CLR 461.

42. See "Uses of Coincidence Evidence" above for an outline of how coincidence evidence may be relevant to the existence of a fact in issue.

43. As part of directing the jury about coincidence reasoning, the judge must identify the similarities that are relied upon to support coincidence reasoning. This requires more than giving a short and generic summary of each of the occasions relied upon, and expecting the jury to pick out the relevant similarities from those summaries (Feng v The King [2023] VSCA 196, [63]).

44. Where evidence is admitted allowing different uses of coincidence reasoning, the judge must carefully direct the jury about how to keep those different types of reasoning separate (see Feng v The King [2023] VSCA 196, [64]).

45. The directions must also give effect to any restrictions on the admissibility and use of the evidence, directing the jury not to use the evidence for identified impermissible purposes (see Feng v The King [2023] VSCA 196, [65]–[67]).

46. The judge must not direct the jury to use coincidence evidence in a manner which is not relevant in the circumstances of the case. For example, judges must not invite the jury to use coincidence reasoning to determine whether the acts were voluntary and intentional when the only issue was whether the acts were committed at all (Murdoch v R (2013) 40 VR 451).

47. Similarly, where the probative value lies in the improbability of similar false accounts (see the fifth bullet at paragraph [27] above), it is not appropriate to direct the jury that the coincidence evidence can prove the identity of the offender, or that it was unlikely the accused's acts occurred by chance, where those matters are not in issue. It may also risk inviting the jury to reason that the accused has a tendency to commit acts in a particular manner, even if the evidence has not been admitted for a tendency purpose (Addo v The Queen (2022) 108 NSWLR 522, [84]–[88]).

48. Reasoning by reference to identity, or the accused's actions is, in that context, likely to involve tendency reasoning (Addo v The Queen (2022) 108 NSWLR 522, [84]–[88]).

49. To assist with this task, it will usually be helpful to have the prosecutor describe each step along the path (or paths) of reasoning which the jury may follow to infer the accused's guilt from the evidence (see, e.g. HML & Ors v R (2008) 235 CLR 334 (Hayne J)).

50. Judges should avoid using the term "uncharged acts" when describing coincidence evidence, as it may invite speculation about why no charges were laid (HML & Ors v R (2008) 235 CLR 334; R v McKenzie–McHarg [2008] VSCA 206).

51. As coincidence reasoning is a particular species of inferential reasoning, the judge should give a direction on inferences and relate the topic of inferences to the coincidence reasoning direction (R v Buckley (2004) 10 VR 215. See also 3.6 Circumstantial Evidence and Inferences).

52. The judge should not direct the jury that they must be satisfied that the evidence reveals a "striking similarity" or other such feature before they can use the evidence. The direction must focus on the purposes for which the evidence may be used and not the reasons for its admissibility (R v Papamitrou (2004) 7 VR 375).

Standard of proof

53. As coincidence evidence is circumstantial evidence, it generally does not need to be proved beyond reasonable doubt (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 61, 62).

54. An exception to this rule may exist where the evidence involves sequential reasoning from other charged offences. In Dempsey v The Queen, the prosecution involved two alleged instances of armed robbery. The jury was invited to use the similar method in which the offender lured the victims to the relevant location as coincidence evidence to prove the identity of the offender. The Court held that the jury could not use the method of committing the first offence as coincidence evidence showing that the accused committed the second offence unless the jury was satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused committed the first offence. The court noted any direction which allowed the jury to use the commission of the first offence as coincidence evidence without proof to the criminal standard would undermine the standard of proof required to convict in relation to the first offence (Dempsey v The Queen [2019] VSCA 224, [76]).

Directions where coincidence evidence adduced by the accused about a co-accused

55. Where coincidence evidence is adduced by an accused about a co-accused, the prosecution or the co-accused may request a direction about that evidence.

56. In giving a direction about that evidence, the trial judge must

    (a) Identify how the evidence is relevant to the existence of a fact in issue; and

    (b) Direct the jury not to use the evidence for any other purpose; and

    (c) Direct the jury that it must not decide the case based on prejudice arising from what it has heard about the co-accused (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 28(2)).

57. In giving the direction, the judge does not need to:

    (a) Explain what the jury should consider in deciding whether to use the evidence as coincidence evidence;

    (b) Identify impermissible uses of the evidence;

    (c) Refer to any other matter (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 28(3)).

Directions where evidence is not admissible as coincidence evidence

58. Where evidence is not admissible as coincidence evidence, but there is a risk that the jury will use the evidence to engage in coincidence reasoning, the judge may need to warn the jury not to do so (see R v OGD (No 2) (2000) 50 NSWLR 433; Martin v State of Tasmania [2008] TASSC 66; Qualtieri v R [2006] NSWCCA 95; R v Chan [2002] NSWCCA 217; R v Conway (2000) 98 FCR 204; Gipp v R (1998) 194 CLR 106; R v ATM [2000] NSWCCA 475).

59. If uncharged acts are led as part of a multiple charge indictment, the judge should make it clear that the warning against coincidence reasoning applies to both the charged and uncharged acts (see R v CF [2004] VSCA 212; R v DD (2007) 19 VR 143; [2007] VSCA 317).

60. There may not be any need to warn the jury against coincidence reasoning when there is little or no risk that the jury will use the evidence to engage in such reasoning. In some cases, a warning against coincidence reasoning can increase the risk of the jury engaging in impermissible coincidence reasoning (FDP v R (2008) 74 NSWLR 645; R v DH [2000] NSWCCA 360; R v Bastan [2009] VSCA 157).

61. The need for a direction against coincidence reasoning depends on whether the direction is sought and whether, despite the absence of any request, there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving the direction (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 12, 14, 16). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

Relationship with separate consideration warning

62. The warning against coincidence reasoning does not need to use different language to that used in the separate consideration warning, and does not need to be clearly distinct from that warning. The basic requirement is that the warning sufficiently protect against the risk of the jury using impermissible reasoning (see R v DCC (2004) 11 VR 129; R v LRG (2006) 16 VR 89).

63. A discrete warning against coincidence reasoning will not normally be required when a separate consideration warning is given, as the separate consideration warning will usually protect against such reasoning (KRM v R (2001) 206 CLR 221; R v Loguancio (2000) 1 VR 235; R v Ellul [2008] VSCA 106. See also 1.8.1 Charge: Separate Consideration – Multiple Accused and/or 1.8.2 Charge: Separate Consideration – Multiple Counts).

64. When both a warning against coincidence reasoning and a separate consideration warning are given, it will generally not be necessary to expressly relate the warnings. The separate consideration warning will usually adequately protect against the dangers of impermissible reasoning in relation to other charged acts. However, in some cases, it may be necessary to explicitly explain to the jury that the prohibition on coincidence reasoning applies to both charged and uncharged acts (R v PLK [1999] 3 VR 567; R v DCC (2004) 11 VR 129).

Warning Against Tendency Reasoning

65. When evidence is led as "coincidence evidence" and not as "tendency evidence", defence counsel may request a warning that the jury not use the evidence as tendency evidence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 29).

66. See 4.17 Tendency Evidence for information concerning the content of such a warning.

Timing of the Charge

67. Short directions on the use of coincidence evidence which are consistent with the Jury Directions Act 2015 Part 4 Division 2 should be given at the time the evidence is led. Detailed directions may also be given in the final charge (see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 10(2); R v Grech [1997] 2 VR 609; R v Beserick (1993) 30 NSWLR 510; Qualtieri v R [2006] NSWCCA 95).

4.18.1 Charge: Coincidence Evidence

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge may be given where a direction has been requested regarding coincidence evidence called by the prosecution.

A short direction based on this charge should be given at the time the evidence is led.

Members of the jury, the prosecution has led evidence that [identify relevant coincidence evidence].

Using Coincidence Evidence to bolster credit

[If the evidence is used to bolster the credit of witnesses or complainants, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution says that this evidence is relevant because it is most unlikely that several [witnesses/complainants], each of whom seems to be independent of the other, would give such similar accounts unless those accounts were both truthful and accurate. In other words, the prosecution says that it is most unlikely that several such [witnesses/complainants] would independently have told the same lie.

I direct you that it is open to you to reason in this way. However, before you can do so, you must first accept that such similarities as you find in the witness' evidence are not the product of any collusion on their part, or of innocent contamination.[221]

Using Coincidence Evidence to Prove a Voluntary Act

[If the evidence is used to prove that the accused acted voluntarily, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution say that this evidence is relevant to prove that the accused acted voluntarily when s/he [describe relevant act]. The prosecution argues that there is such a similarity between [describe relevant coincidence evidence] and the evidence of [identify relevant act] that it is most unlikely that the accused was not acting voluntarily when [describe relevant acts].

Using Coincidence Evidence to Rebut a Defence Argument

[If the evidence is used to rebut a defence argument, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution say that this evidence is relevant because it allows you to conclude that [describe relevant defence argument in the negative, e.g. "the deceased did not die of natural causes"]. The prosecution argues that there is such a similarity between this evidence and the evidence of [identify relevant evidence] that it is most unlikely that [describe relevant defence argument in the positive, e.g. that the deceased died of natural causes]. Remember that, while the accused raised this matter as a defence, the onus of proof rests on the prosecution.

Using Coincidence Evidence to Prove the Identity of the Offender

[If evidence of several separate offences is used to prove the identity of the offender, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution say the similarities between [identify similarly committed offence] and the [describe charged offence] are so great that you should find that the same person is responsible for each offence. The prosecution then say that if you find NOA committed [identify similarly committed offence], then you can use that to conclude that s/he also committed [identify charged offence].

[Identify relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments on whether the jury should use the coincidence evidence.]

[221] If evidence emerges of an opportunity for contamination between the witnesses, the judge may add that following sample direction:

You will recall that NOW1 said, during examination in chief, that he spoke to NOW2 about the allegations for 10 minutes on the day he went to the police station. In cross-examination, NOW1 admitted that the conversation may have taken half an hour. There is no suggestion that NOW1 and NOW2 have jointly fabricated their accounts. However, before you can use the existence of similarities in their accounts, you must exclude a reasonable possibility that NOW1 or NOW2 subconsciously changed his account, and introduced those similarities, because of that conversation.

You must keep this evidence in perspective. It is only one part of the prosecution's case.[222] As I have told you, you must not decide the case on the basis of feelings of sympathy or prejudice because of what you learn about the accused. The evidence has been led for the limited purpose of showing that [describe relevant purpose]. You must not use the evidence for any other purpose.

4.19 Other Forms of Other Misconduct Evidence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Part 4, Division 2 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 regulates jury directions on 'other misconduct evidence'. This is defined as:
   (a) coincidence evidence, as defined in the Evidence Act 2008;
   (b) tendency evidence, as defined in the Evidence Act 2008;
   (c) evidence of other discreditable acts and omissions of an accused that are not directly relevant to a fact in issue;
   (d) evidence that is adduced to assist the jury to understand the context in which the offence charged or any alternative offence is alleged to have been committed (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 26).
2. This topic examines the forms of 'other misconduct evidence' identified in paragraphs (c) and (d) above.
3. See 4.17 Tendency Evidence and 4.18 Coincidence Evidence for further information on the admissibility and uses of those other forms of 'other misconduct evidence'.

Evidence of discreditable acts which are indirectly relevant or which provides context

4. At common law, evidence of previous wrongdoing by the accused may be admissible as indirectly relevant to show that the accused's acts were for a guilty purpose, rather than an innocent purpose. This might include:
   - previous acts of drug trafficking by the accused (see, e.g. Harriman v R (1989) 167 CLR 590; R v Quach (2002) 137 A Crim R 345; Ivanoff v R [2015] VSCA 116);
   - previous acts of violence by the accused towards the complainant (R v PFD (2001) 124 A Crim R 418; R v Basten [2009] VSCA 157; Wilson v R (1970) 123 CLR 324).
5. These forms of evidence have been treated at common law as 'relationship evidence' falling outside the requirements of the tendency rule and the coincidence rule and may qualify as 'other misconduct evidence' under paragraph (c) of the definition.
6. In addition, evidence that provides the jury with essential background information that allows the jury to assess and evaluate the other evidence may be admissible at common law as 'context evidence' (see, e.g. R v AH (1997) 42 NSWLR 702).
7. Such evidence may help the jury assess and evaluate other evidence given in the case in a complete and realistic context. In particular, the evidence can be used:

[222] If the other misconduct evidence is the whole of the prosecution case, then this sentence should be omitted.

(a) to explain the complainant's conduct or state of mind. For example, such evidence may explain conduct that would otherwise seem surprising or unlikely, such as submitting to the accused's demands or failing to complain about the accused's actions (B v R (1992) 175 CLR 599; R v Beserick (1993) 30 NSWLR 510; Rodden v R [2008] NSWCCA 53; KTR v R [2010] NSWCCA 271).

(b) to explain the accused's conduct or state of mind. For example, the history between the accused and the complainant may explain why the accused felt able to act in a particularly brazen manner (R v Josifoski [1997] 2 VR 68; Gipp v R (1998) 194 CLR 106; c.f. Qualtieri v R [2006] NSWCCA 95, [121]). Similarly, previous exposure to the criminal law may demonstrate that the accused knew or was reckless about some matter, such as prescribed quantities for drug offences, dangers of accepting imports from unknown persons, or the $10,000 threshold for reportable transactions under the Cash Transactions Reports Act 1988 (Ivanoff v R [2015] VSCA 116; Lin v R [2018] VSCA 100).

(c) to explain the circumstances of the alleged offence. This may prevent the jury from forming a false impression that the complainant's allegations arose 'out of the blue'. That is, it may remove the implausibility that might otherwise be attributed to the complainant's account due to the way each party is said to have behaved if the conduct alleged were thought to be isolated events (R v Leonard (2006) 67 NSWLR 545, [48]–[52] (Hodgson JA); R v Loguancio (2000) 1 VR 235; KRM v R (2001) 206 CLR 221; B v R (1992) 175 CLR 599).

8. There is not yet any guidance on the meaning of the phrase 'other discreditable acts … that are not directly relevant'. The definition of 'other misconduct evidence' appears designed to have a wide scope and operate where there is a risk that the jury may misuse the evidence and decide the case based on the prejudicial quality of the evidence rather than its legitimate probative purpose (see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 27).

9. Based on the explanatory material, the section appears designed to cover the forms of evidence previously recognised at common law as 'relationship evidence' and 'context evidence' (see Jury Directions Bill 2015, Explanatory Memorandum, clause 26.

10. Where evidence would be considered 'relationship evidence' at common law but does not fit within the definition of 'other misconduct evidence', judges will need to develop suitable directions based on the submissions of the parties and the needs of the case and may be informed by Division 2 of Part 4 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 (see, for example, Lin v R [2018] VSCA 100; R v Iuliano [1971] VR 412; Wilson v R (1970) 123 CLR 334).

11. In doing so, judges must take care to avoid giving directions based only on the label applied to the evidence, rather than the issues in the case, the relevance of the evidence and any risk of misuse (see BBH v R (2012) 245 CLR 499 (Hayne J)).

Admissibility of 'Other Misconduct Evidence'

12. Under the Evidence Act 2008, evidence is admissible if it is relevant (directly or indirectly) to a fact in issue (Evidence Act 2008 s 56).

13. This will depend on the nature of the evidence and the issues in the case. For example, evidence of previous acts of violence when one of the parties is intoxicated may not be relevant to a case where there is no evidence of intoxication (R v Lubik [2010] VSC 465).

14. The court must refuse to admit evidence adduced by the prosecution if its probative value is outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to the accused (Evidence Act 2008 s 137).

15. The court may also exclude or limit the use of such evidence using the general discretions contained in Evidence Act 2008 ss 135–136.

16. The party tendering the evidence must precisely identify the uses of the evidence (see above), and demonstrate how the evidence is relevant to issues in the case (Gipp v R (1998) 194 CLR 106; Tully v R (2006) 230 CLR 234; HML & Ors v R (2008) 235 CLR 334).

17. Evidence of 'relationship' or 'context' is admissible under the Evidence Act 2008 provided it meets the test of relevance. The evidence does not need to satisfy the tendency rule or the coincidence rule (DPP v Martin [2016] VSCA 219, [105]–[106]; R v Murdoch (2013) 40 VR 451 (Redlich and Coghlan JJA; Priest JA contra)).

18. 'Context evidence' must be admitted only with great caution.[223] While such evidence may be relevant, it may only be minimally probative and may be highly prejudicial. A judge must carefully weigh the probative value of context evidence against the prejudicial effect of disclosing unlawful or disreputable conduct of the accused on other occasions (Tully v R (2006) 230 CLR 234; R v AN (2000) 117 A Crim R 176; R v Marsh [2000] NSWCCA 370).

19. However, in other cases, context evidence may be evidence of 'cogency or force', such that the exclusion of context evidence could ground an interlocutory appeal on the basis that the exclusion of the evidence substantially weakens the prosecution case (DPP v Martin [2016] VSCA 219, [116]–[117]).

20. The context and relationship evidence must not relate to a state of affairs which is too remote in time from the alleged offending. The court must consider the particular circumstances and the length of delay between the last observed event and the alleged offending (R v Iuliano [1971] VR 412; R v Lubik [2010] VSC 465; R v Tsingopoulos [1964] VR 676; Ellis v R (2010) 30 VR 428; R v Basten [2009] VSCA 157).

21. In general, it is more difficult for the Crown to establish that a single incident is relevant as context evidence, compared to multiple acts (compare CA v R [2017] NSWCCA 324, [79] and R v Young (1996) 90 A Crim R 80).

22. In some cases, evidence of 'relationship' or 'context' may be admissible for some charges and inadmissible for other charges. The judge must examine the relevance, probative value and prejudice separately for each charge to determine whether the evidence is relevant to a fact in issue (R v McNamara [2002] NSWCCA 248).

23. Evidence of prior convictions should generally not be admitted as relationship or context evidence. Due to the extreme prejudice attaching to such evidence, it is unlikely to be admissible on this basis even if it is indispensable to the prosecution case (Mokbel v R [2010] VSCA 354).

24. Evidence of other sexual activity between the complainant and the accused can be admissible as context evidence, provided it meets the tests of relevance and is not excluded under Evidence Act 2008 s 137 (DPP v Martin [2016] VSCA 219. See also R v Bauer [2018] HCA 40).

25. The fact that other misconduct evidence does not need to be proved to the criminal standard is not a relevant source of unfair prejudice for the purpose of determining the admissibility of the evidence (DPP v Martin [2016] VSCA 219, [113]).

26. In determining the relevance of other misconduct evidence led as context evidence, it will not be necessary to consider the accused's criminal responsibility. Issues such as doli incapax are not relevant to the admissibility of context evidence, because the relevance of the evidence must be assessed from the perspective of the victim, not the accused (DPP v Martin [2016] VSCA 219, [110]–[111]).

27. Where evidence is not led to enable tendency or coincidence reasoning, it is not subject to the admissibility requirements in Evidence Act 2008 ss 97, 98 or 101 (FDP v R (2008) 74 NSWLR 645). However, the evidence cannot be used to prove a tendency or a coincidence (Evidence Act 2008 s 95).

[223] It has been suggested that courts may have previously admitted context evidence too readily. For example, where there are multiple charges on the indictment in relation to the one complainant, the context of the offences may be sufficiently established by the evidence presented in relation to the charged offences (R v LRG (2006) 16 VR 89; Tully v R (2006) 230 CLR 234; R v GAE (2000) 1 VR 198).

Determining the Relevance of Evidence

28. It is important for judges to determine whether the evidence is sought to be admitted and used as 'relationship evidence', 'context evidence', tendency evidence' or 'coincidence evidence', and if so, how the evidence is relevant to the facts in issue. These determinations will affect the admissibility of the evidence, how the jury may use the evidence and the directions the judge may need to give.

29. As it can be difficult to differentiate between these types of evidence, at the start of the trial the judge should ask the prosecution to characterise the evidence in question and explain how it is alleged the evidence is relevant (see, e.g. HML & Ors v R (2008) 235 CLR 334 per Hayne J).

Directions About Other Misconduct Evidence

30. The need for any directions about other misconduct evidence will depend on whether a direction is sought or whether, despite the absence of any request, there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving the direction (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 12, 14, 16). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

31. Where 'other misconduct evidence' is admitted, the content of directions is specified in Jury Directions Act 2015 Part 4, Division 2. In other cases, the judge will need to tailor a direction to the needs of the case.

32. Under Jury Directions Act 2015 Part 4, Division 2, when giving directions on other misconduct evidence the trial judge must:

    (a) identify how the evidence is relevant to the existence of a fact in issue; and

    (b) direct the jury not to use the evidence for any other purpose; and

    (c) direct the jury that it must not decide the case based on prejudice arising from what it has heard about the accused; and

    (d) if the evidence only forms part of the case against the accused, inform the jury of this fact (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 27(2)).

33. In giving the direction, the judge does not need to:

    (a) explain what the jury should consider in deciding whether to use the evidence;

    (b) identify impermissible uses of the evidence;

    (c) refer to any other matter (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 27(3)).

34. It is not sufficient for the judge to simply say that the evidence provides the jury with the context for the offences or evidence of a relationship. The judge must explain how such information is relevant to the facts in issue (R v Nieterink (1999) 76 SASR 56).

35. Where evidence is led to show the context of the alleged offending, the judge should tell the jury that they may use the evidence to place the offences within a complete and realistic context. This may assist the jury to appreciate and evaluate other evidence in the case or make that evidence intelligible. Depending on the nature of the case, the evidence may do this by:

    - helping the jury understand the complainant's alleged conduct or state of mind;
    - helping the jury understand the accused's alleged conduct or state of mind; or
    - dispelling the erroneous impression that the conduct occurred 'out of the blue' (R v VN (2006) 15 VR 113; R v Vonarx [1999] 3 VR 618; R v Loguancio (2000) 1 VR 235; R v Dolan (1992) 58 SASR 501; Rodden v R [2008] NSWCCA 53).

36. Any directions that suggest that 'context evidence' may support a complainant's credibility must be carefully limited:

- the judge must describe the precise way in which the evidence may be used (e.g. to explain the complainant's failure to complain or protest, or to show that the complainant does not allege that the offences occurred 'out of the blue'); and
- the judge must not suggest that the evidence provides general support for the conclusion that the accused acted in a similar manner on the occasion alleged, as that would be a form of tendency reasoning (Qualtieri v R [2006] NSWCCA 95).

37. No particular form of words is required for the direction. It must be tailored to the demands of the case, and must be clear, precise and directed (R v Grech [1997] 2 VR 609; HML & Ors v R (2008) 235 CLR 334; R v McKenzie–McHarg [2008] VSCA 206).

38. Judges should avoid using the term 'uncharged acts' when describing other misconduct evidence, as it may invite speculation about why no charges were laid (HML & Ors v R (2008) 235 CLR 334; R v McKenzie–McHarg [2008] VSCA 206; DPP v Martin [2016] VSCA 219, [101]).

Standard of proof

39. As other misconduct evidence is circumstantial evidence, it will not need to be proved beyond reasonable doubt (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 61).

40. The Jury Directions Act 2015 expressly overrides common law to the contrary, including the rule attributed to R v Sadler (2008) 20 VR 69 (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 62).

41. Where evidence is relied on as context evidence, the judge should not give any instruction on the standard of proof (DPP v Martin [2016] VSCA 219, [113]).

42. Judges must not instruct the jury that they only need to be satisfied of the evidence on the balance of probabilities (R v Werry [2009] VSCA 94; R v FJB [1999] 2 VR 425; R v Loguancio (2000) 1 VR 235; Gipp v R (1998) 194 CLR 106).

Directions where other misconduct evidence adduced by the accused about a co-accused

43. Where 'other misconduct evidence' is adduced by an accused about a co-accused, the prosecution or the co-accused may request a direction about that evidence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 28).

44. In giving a direction about that evidence, the trial judge must

    (a) identify how the evidence is relevant to the existence of a fact in issue; and

    (b) direct the jury not to use the evidence for any other purpose; and

    (c) direct the jury that it must not decide the case based on prejudice arising from what it has heard about the co-accused (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 28(2)).

45. In giving the direct, the judge does not need to:

    (a) explain what the jury should consider in deciding whether to use the evidence as coincidence evidence;

    (b) identify impermissible uses of the evidence;

    (c) refer to any other matter (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 28(3)).

Warning Against Tendency Reasoning

46. When 'other misconduct evidence' which is not 'tendency evidence' is adduced, defence counsel may request a warning that the jury not use the evidence as tendency evidence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 29).

47. See 4.17 Tendency Evidence for information concerning the content of such a warning.

Timing of the Charge

48. Short directions on the use of relationship evidence which are consistent with Jury Directions Act 2015 Part 4, Division 2 should be given at the time the evidence is led. Detailed directions may then be given in the final charge (see, e.g. Jury Directions Act 2015 s 10(2); R v Beserick (1993) 30 NSWLR 510; R v Grech [1997] 2 VR 609; Qualtieri v R [2006] NSWCCA 95).

4.19.1 Charge: Other Forms of Other Misconduct Evidence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge may be given if 'other misconduct evidence within the meaning of s 26 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 is led and the evidence is not tendency evidence or coincidence evidence.

A short direction based on this charge should be given at the time the evidence is led.

Use of Other Misconduct Evidence

Members of the jury, the prosecution has led evidence that [list all relevant other misconduct evidence]. This evidence is not directly related to [the offence charged/any of the offences charged].

The prosecution says that this evidence is relevant because it shows [explain the relevance of the evidence. Examples of relevant purposes include:

- The complainant's alleged conduct or state of mind at the time of the offence, such as why s/he might have submitted to the accused's demands or did not complain about the alleged offending;
- The accused's alleged conduct or state of mind at the time of the offence, such as why s/he felt able to act in a particularly brazen manner;
- The circumstances of the alleged offence, such as to show that the complainant does not say that the offence occurred "out of the blue";
- The accused's intention or motive (e.g. by establishing that a state of animosity existed between the parties, thus making it less likely that the accused's acts were accidental);
- The nature of the accused's conduct on a particular occasion (e.g. by establishing a history of drug transactions between the accused and another person that were likely to continue, thus making it less likely that the accused's association with that person on a particular occasion was innocent);
- The complainant's state of mind at the time of the offence (e.g. by establishing that the complainant in a sexual offence case hated the accused, making it less likely that s/he would consent to sexual intercourse)].

You must keep this evidence in perspective. It is only one part of the prosecution's case.[224] As I have told you, you must not decide the case on the basis of feelings of sympathy or prejudice because of what you learn about the accused. The evidence has been led for the limited purpose of showing that [describe relevant purpose]. You must not use the evidence for any other purpose.

[224] If the other misconduct evidence is the whole of the prosecution case, then this sentence should be omitted.

4.19.2 Charge: Other forms of Other Misconduct Evidence (Evidence about a Co-Accused)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge may be given when the accused adduces other misconduct evidence about a co-accused.

A short direction based on this charge should be given at the time the evidence is led.

Use of Other Misconduct Evidence

Members of the jury, NOA1[225] has led evidence about NOA2[226] that [describe relevance of other misconduct evidence].

[Identify relevant other misconduct evidence.]

NOA1 argues that this evidence shows that [describe relevance of other misconduct evidence to a fact in issue and identify relevant defence arguments]. NOA2 responds that [describe NOA2's response, including relevant defence arguments]. The prosecution says that [describe relevant prosecution evidence and arguments].

This evidence has been led only for the purpose of [describe relevant purpose]. You must not use the evidence for any other purpose. As I have told you, you must not decide the case on the basis of feelings of sympathy or prejudice because of what you learn about NOA2.

Remember that while NOA1 has led this evidence, the onus of proof remains on the prosecution to prove its case against NOA1 and NOA2 beyond reasonable doubt. The fact that NOA1 has called this evidence does not mean that this shifts to NOA1 in any way.

4.20 Unfavourable Witnesses

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Common Law Has Been Abrogated

1. The common law concerning hostile witnesses has been abrogated by Evidence Act 20008 s 38 (R v Milat, NSWSC, 23/4/1996).
2. This means that it is no longer necessary for judges to differentiate between expected and unexpected evidence from a witness. Section 38 draws no such distinction (R v Milat, NSWSC, 23/4/1996).

A Party May Cross-Examine Its Own Witnesses

3. With the leave of the court, a party who calls a witness may cross-examine that witness about:
    - Evidence the witness gives that is unfavourable to the party;
    - Matters about which the witness may reasonably be supposed to have knowledge, and which it appears the witness is not making a genuine attempt to give evidence about; or [225] Name of accused who led other misconduct evidence about a co-accused.

[226] Name of co-accused.

- Whether the witness has, at any time, made a prior inconsistent statement (Evidence Act 2008 s 38).

4. Cross-examination under s 38 must be about one of the three matters listed above. A party cannot undertake wide-ranging cross-examination on any matter it wishes (R v Le (2002) 54 NSWLR 474; R v Hogan [2001] NSWCCA 292).
5. However, cross-examination under s 38 is not limited to directly questioning the witness about one of the three listed matters. A party may question the witness about topics related to the three listed matters (R v Le (2002) 54 NSWLR 474; R v Hogan [2001] NSWCCA 292).
6. A party may also (with the leave of the court) question the witness about matters relevant only to the witness' credibility, with a view to shaking the witness' credibility on the listed matters (Evidence Act 2008 s 38(3); R v Le (2002) 54 NSWLR 474).[227]

Leave of the Court is Required

7. A party may only cross-examine a witness under s 38 with the leave of the court (Evidence Act 2008 s 38(1)).
8. The court's leave is also required to question a witness about matters relevant only to the witness' credibility (Evidence Act 2008 s 38(3)).
9. Applications under s 38 may be made in the absence of the jury and in the absence of the witness (see Adam v R (2001) 207 CLR 96; R v Hogan [2001] NSWCCA 292).
10. In determining whether to grant leave, the court must take into account the matters specified in ss 38(6) and 192(2) of the Evidence Act 2008 (Stanoevski v R (2001) 202 CLR 115).
11. This topic addresses the directions the judge may give the jury when he or she grants leave under s 38. For information on when the judge should grant leave, and any limitations on cross-examination, see S Odgers, Uniform Evidence Law, [1.2.3240]–[1.2.3400].[228]

Jury Directions

12. There are three main directions a judge may give when a witness is cross-examined under s 38:

    i) A direction about his or her decision to grant leave under s 38;

    ii) A direction about prior inconsistent statements;

    iii) A warning about the unreliability of the evidence.

13. The need for any directions on an unfavourable witness will depend on whether a direction is sought or whether there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving a direction in the absence of any request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

[227] Any cross-examination about a witness's credibility must comply with the provisions in Part 3.7 of the Evidence Act 2008 ('Credibility').

[228] Under s 38(1)(a), a judge may grant leave where the witness gives evidence that is 'unfavourable' to a party. Evidence is 'unfavourable' for this purpose when it is 'not favourable'. This includes evidence of a witness who has genuinely forgotten the events in question (R v Lozano, NSWCCA, 10/6/97, R v Souleyman (1996) 40 NSWLR 712; R v McRae [2010] VSC 114).

Decision to grant leave

14. A judge does not always need to inform the jury of his or her decision to grant leave under s 38 (Lee v R [2009] NSWCCA 259).

15. If the judge chooses to comment on the grant of leave, he or she may explain that cross-examination under s 38 is an unusual process, in that the witness gives evidence in response to leading questions, rather than providing an account in evidence-in-chief in response to non-leading questions (R v Lam (Ruling No 9) [2005] VSC 283).

16. In explaining the decision to grant leave, the judge must be careful not to suggest that the decision involves an adverse reflection on the witness' credit (Lee v R [2009] NSWCCA 259).[229]

17. It is not necessary to inform the jury of the detail of the decision to grant leave (Lee v R [2009] NSWCCA 259).

18. In some cases, it may necessary to warn the jury not to speculate on the reasons why the witness gave unfavourable or inconsistent evidence and must not draw any inference adverse to the accused from the witness' behaviour (see R v Sekhon, Vic CA, 23/10/92).

Prior inconsistent statements

19. Where cross-examination under s 38 leads to evidence of a prior inconsistent statement being admitted, it may be appropriate to direct the jury about the use of that statement (see, e.g. R v Lam (Ruling No 9) [2005] VSC 283).

20. At common law, there was a particular need for directions on the weight of the evidence when the prior statement was more damaging to the accused than the witness' evidence in court (Morris v R (1987) 163 CLR 454; R v Perea (1986) 2 Qd R 431; R v Nguyen (1989) 2 Qd R 72).

21. A grant of leave under s 38 does not neutralise the witness' evidence or render it inherently worthless. The jury must decide what weight it will place on the witness' evidence in light of any inconsistent statements and any other matters that may affect the witness' reliability (R v Zorad [1979] 2 NSWLR 764; Morris v R (1987) 163 CLR 454).

22. See 4.14 Previous Representations (Hearsay, Recent Complaint and Prior Statements) for information concerning the circumstances in which a direction about prior inconsistent statements should be given, and the content of the direction.

Unreliability warning

23. While a judge may be required to give an unreliability warning about evidence admitted under s 38, the mere fact that leave to cross-examine a witness has been granted under s 38 does not mean that an unreliability warning must be given (Lee v R [2009] NSWCCA 259).

24. Unreliable evidence warnings are governed by Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32. A s 32 warning may be given if:

    i) The evidence in question is "of a kind that may be unreliable"; and

    ii) The party requesting the warning has identified the significant matters that may make the

[229] For example, while the judge may inform the jury that he or she has determined that the witness has given evidence that is unfavourable (as that will usually be obvious), it would be dangerous to tell the jury of the terms of s 38(1)(b) or (c).

evidence unreliable (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32).[230]

25. Where evidence of a prior inconsistent statement is admitted, the judge may need to warn the jury about the unreliability of hearsay evidence (see 4.14 Previous Representations (Hearsay, Recent Complaint and Prior Statements)).

26. Depending on the circumstances, an unreliable evidence warning may also be required on another ground (e.g. if the witness is criminally concerned in the events giving rise to the proceeding). See 4.21 Unreliable Evidence Warning for information about the grounds on which a warning may be required.

Limiting the Use of Evidence Under s 136

27. A judge may limit the use of evidence given under s 38 if there is a danger that a particular use of the evidence might be:
    - Unfairly prejudicial to a party; or
    - Misleading or confusing (Evidence Act 2008 s 136).

28. It will usually only be necessary to consider this matter when counsel applies for a s 136 order (Pavitt v R (2007) 169 A Crim R 452).

29. At common law, juries were generally prohibited from using hearsay evidence (such as a prior inconsistent statement) to prove the existence of the facts asserted in the representation, due to the potential unreliability of that evidence. It was the intention of the Evidence Act 2008 to change this position, and allow evidence that was admitted either as an exception to the hearsay rule, or for a non-hearsay purpose, to be used to prove the existence of asserted facts (see Evidence Act 2008 s 60).

30. Judges should therefore not automatically prevent previous representations that are admitted under the Evidence Act 2008 from being used to prove the existence of any asserted facts. To do so would be to constrain the legislation by reference to common law rules and distinctions which the legislature has discarded (Papakosmas v R (1999) 196 CLR 297).

31. In determining whether to limit the use of previous representations, the judge should consider whether any warning under s 32 regarding the dangers of relying on hearsay evidence (see above) would limit the risk of unfair prejudice (see R v BD (1997) 94 A Crim R 131).

32. If the judge decides to limit the use of evidence under Evidence Act 2008 s 136, he or she may instruct the jury about the effect of that decision (see Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14–16; Aslett v R [2006] NSWCCA 49; R v Robinson [2003] NSWCCA 188).

33. In contrast, if the judge does not limit the use of the evidence, there is generally no need to instruct the jury that it may use the evidence for a hearsay purpose. The jury will usually assume that it can use the evidence for a hearsay purpose without the need for a direction of law (R v Hilder (1997) 97 A Crim R 70).

4.20.1 Charge: Unfavourable Witnesses

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge is designed to be given in cases where:

[230] See 4.21 Unreliable Evidence Warning for further information concerning each of these requirements.

i) The prosecution has cross-examined one of its own witnesses under Evidence Act 2008 s 38;

ii) The witness has been cross-examined about a prior inconsistent statement (s 38(1)(c));

iii) Evidence of the prior inconsistent statement can be used for both a hearsay and non-hearsay purpose; and

iv) The evidence adduced in the cross-examination of the witness forms a significant part of the prosecution's case.

The charge will need to be modified if:

i) The cross-examination was solely about one of the matters listed in ss 38(1)(a) or (b), and did not relate to a prior inconsistent statement;

ii) It was the defence who cross-examined one of its witnesses; or

iii) The judge has used s 136 to limit the use of the statement to a non-hearsay purpose.

The judge should discuss the proposed charge with counsel before instructing the jury. See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when the direction is required.

Decision to Grant Leave

[The following two paragraphs may be adapted and given immediately after the witness has given evidence.]

You may have noticed that NOW gave evidence in a different manner from the other prosecution witnesses. Instead of providing an account in response to non-leading questions asked by the prosecution, his/her evidence was given in response to leading questions, as though the prosecution was cross-examining him/her. That is an unusual process, that was permitted due to a ruling I made.

You must not speculate on the reasons why this process was necessary in this case, or draw any inference adverse to the accused from this process. You must base your decision on the evidence you hear in court and must not allow different processes of questioning witnesses to distract you from the issues in the case and the need to assess the evidence objectively and impartially.

Prior Inconsistent Statement

One of the things NOW said in the evidence s/he gave in court was [insert details of inconsistent statement made in court]. However, the prosecution alleged that NOW had previously given a different version of events. [Describe prior statement and identify alleged inconsistencies.]

If you accept that NOW made this statement, there are two ways you can use it.

First, you can use the contents of the statement as evidence in the case. For example, you could use NOW's statement that [describe part of the statement] as evidence that [describe relevant asserted fact].

Secondly, if you find that NOW's statement is inconsistent with his/her account in court, you may use the statement when assessing his/her credibility and reliability. You may find that the fact that NOW had previously given an inconsistent account means that the evidence s/he gave in court is less likely to be truthful or accurate. You may therefore be less willing to accept his/her evidence. It is for you to determine whether or not to draw this conclusion from any inconsistencies you find.

You should keep in mind the fact that a witness who gives inconsistent accounts is not necessarily lying. While dishonest witnesses are more likely to introduce inconsistencies in their stories, truthful witnesses may make mistakes about details.

If you do find that NOW's statement is inconsistent with his/her evidence in court, you will have two different accounts from the same witness. It is for you to determine which account, if any, to believe.

[If the witness may have had a reason or motive for giving inconsistent evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In making your determination, you should take into account [identify relevant factors, e.g. "any reasons NOW may have to give inconsistent evidence" or "any motive NOW may have to conceal or misinterpret facts"].

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

Unreliability Warning

[In some cases it will be necessary to warn the jury about the potential unreliability of the evidence under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32. See 4.14.1 Charge: Unreliability of Hearsay Evidence for an example of such a warning.]

Need for Caution

[Where a full s 32 warning is not necessary, but the jury should be warned about the need for caution before acting on a previous representation, add the following shaded section.]

However, you should be cautious before acting on NOW's out-of-court statement, rather than the evidence s/he gave in court on [oath/affirmation].

4.21 Unreliable Evidence Warning

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. A party may request that the trial judge give a direction to the jury on evidence that may be unreliable, pursuant to Jury Directions Act 2015 s 12 (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32(1)). This direction is referred to in this Charge Book as a 'section 32 direction'.
2. Such a request must specify:
    - The significant matters which may make the evidence unreliable; or,
    - If the request relates to a child, the significant matters (other than solely the age of the child) which may make the evidence of the child unreliable (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32(2)).
3. If a party makes such a request, the trial judge must:
    - Warn the jury that the evidence may be unreliable
    - Inform the jury of the significant matters identified by the party (or the significant matters other than solely the age of the child, as the case requires) that the judge considers may cause the evidence to be unreliable
    - Warn the jury of the need for caution in determining whether to accept the evidence and the weight to be given to it (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32(3)).
4. The judge need not give this direction if he or she considers that there are good reasons for not giving the direction (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 15)
5. The parties and the trial judge must not warn or suggest to the jury that:
    - Children as a class are unreliable witnesses, or that children's evidence is inherently less reliable or credible than that of adults;
    - A particular child's evidence may be unreliable solely because of the age of the child; or
    - It may be dangerous to convict on the uncorroborated evidence of a witness because that witness is a child (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 33).
6. This topic addresses the general unreliability direction. For information on directions in relation to children, see 4.2 Child Witnesses.

When must a s 32 unreliability warning be given?

7. A s 32 unreliability warning usually must be given if:
    - A party in a jury trial requests such a warning; and
    - The evidence in question is "of a kind that may be unreliable".
8. However, a judge need not give such a warning if there are "good reasons" for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 15).
9. These issues are discussed in turn below.

There must be a request for a warning

10. Generally, a judge is only required to give an unreliability warning pursuant to s 32 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 if a party requests the warning (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32(1); Singh v DPP (NSW) (2006) 164 A Crim R 284, [38]).
11. Such a request must specify:
    - The significant matters which may make the evidence unreliable; or,
    - If the request relates to a child, the significant matters (other than solely the age of the child) which may make the evidence of the child unreliable (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32(2)).
12. A judge is also required to give this direction in the absence of a request where there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving a direction despite the absence of a request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 12, 14, 15, 16). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.

The evidence must be "of a kind that may be unreliable"

13. Section 32 applies to "evidence of a kind that may be unreliable". This is defined in s 31 to include the following kinds of evidence:
    - Hearsay evidence (s 31(a));[231]
    - Admissions (s 31(a));[232]
    - Evidence the reliability of which may be affected by age, ill health (whether physical or mental), injury or the like (s 31(b);[233]

---

[231] While evidence of a person's previous representations is generally not admissible to prove a fact asserted by the representation (Evidence Act 2008 s 59), there are a number of exceptions to this rule (Evidence Act 2008 ss 65–74). See 4.14 Previous Representations (Hearsay, Recent Complaint and Prior Statements) for further information.

[232] An "admission" is a previous representation made by a party to a proceeding (including the defendant in a criminal proceeding) that is adverse to the person's interest in the outcome of the proceeding (Evidence Act 2008, Dictionary "admission"). While admissions will often be inadmissible due to the hearsay and opinion rules, there are a number of exceptions listed in Evidence Act 2008 ss 81–83. See 4.5 Confessions and Admissions for further information.

[233] This category includes people of old age, people with psychiatric or similar conditions, and people who were affected by alcohol or drugs at the time of the relevant incident. It does not, however, include people of bad character (R v Chan [2002] NSWCCA 217).

- Evidence given by a witness who might reasonably be supposed to have been criminally concerned in the events giving rise to the trial (s 31(c));[234]
- Evidence given by a witness who is a prison informer (s 31(d));[235]
- Oral evidence of questioning by an investigating official (within the meaning of the Evidence Act 2008) of an accused where the questioning has not been acknowledged by the accused (s 31(e)).[236]

14. The types of evidence described in ss 31(a), (c)–(e) all correspond to types of evidence where a warning was required at common law. In addition, such evidence can be readily identified without any evaluative judgment by the trial judge. Therefore, where a request concerns one of those four categories, the judge should accept that the evidence "is of a kind that may be unreliable" (Hudson v R [2017] VSCA 122, [46]).
15. In contrast, evidence under s 31(b) requires the court to assess whether the reliability of the evidence "may be affected" by the considerations described (Hudson v R [2017] VSCA 122, [47]).
16. Where a request is made in relation to s 31(b), the requesting party must demonstrate that there is a reasonable possibility that the evidence is of a kind that a jury acting rationally may consider the evidence to be unreliable (Hudson v R [2017] VSCA 122, [47]; Allen v R (2013) 39 VR 629, [37]).
17. In New South Wales, the courts have adopted two different elaborations on the test for deciding whether the equivalent to s 31(b) applies. Under one approach, the judge must examine the evidence to decide whether the witness' reliability "may be affected" by one of the listed features. This is a test of possibility and does not require the judge to find that the evidence is unreliable (R v Flood [1999] NSWCCA 198).
18. Under the other approach, the judge should give a requested direction if the court has special knowledge about the deficiencies in the evidence which could not be expected of the general experience and understanding of the jury (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301).
19. Victorian courts have not needed to resolve this issue, and have instead adopted the test of whether is a reasonable possibility that the evidence is of a kind that a jury acting rationally may consider to be unreliable (Hudson v R [2017] VSCA 122, [47]; Allen v R (2013) 39 VR 629, [37]).

[234] This class of witnesses includes most witnesses previously covered by the rule of practice that required corroboration warnings in respect of "accomplices", as well as including witnesses with accomplice–like interests. While unclear, it may extend further (e.g. to include accessories after the fact) (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301; Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109). See 4.22 Criminally Concerned Witness Warnings for further information.

[235] A "prison informer" is a prisoner who gives evidence of an oral confession made to him or her by another prisoner. "Prison informers" differ from "prisoner witnesses" who are witnesses to events that occur in prison. A "prisoner witness" should not be treated as a "prison informer" (R v Ton (2002) 132 A Crim R 340 (NSWCCA), R v Ali (No.2) (2005) 13 VR 257). See 4.23 Prison Informer Warnings for further information.

[236] While evidence of a confession or admission made by a criminal suspect to an investigating official is inadmissible unless mandatory audio recording requirements are met (Crimes Act 1958 s 464H(1)), in exceptional circumstances a court may admit evidence of a confession or admission to an investigating official that does not meet these recording requirements (Crimes Act 1958 s 464H(2)). Jury Directions Act 2015 s 31(e) applies to evidence adduced in these exceptional circumstances, which is "oral evidence of questioning by an investigating official (within the meaning of the Evidence Act 2008) of an accused where the questioning has not been acknowledged by the accused".

Non-Listed Categories

20. The listed categories of evidence are not exhaustive. Section 32 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 also applies to any other evidence which is "of a kind that may be unreliable" (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301; R v Covill (2000) 114 A Crim R 111; Hudson v R [2017] VSCA 122, [40]).[237]

21. This phrase is likely to cover any of the kinds of evidence that were accepted as potentially unreliable by the common law, such as:

    - Evidence of a witness with an accomplice–like motive to lie (R v Ali [2002] VSCA 194);
    - Evidence from a prosecution witness who has received an indemnity from prosecution, or a sentencing benefit conditioned on his or her co-operation (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301; R v Calabro 12/11/1984 CCA Vic; R v Checconi (1988) 34 A Crim R 160; R v Powercor (Australia) Ltd [2005] VSCA 163; R v Smith & Turner (1995) 80 A Crim R 491; R v Heaney [1999] VSCA 169; R v Sharp [2005] VSCA 44; R v Strawhorn (2008) 19 VR 101);
    - Evidence of identification or description that would attract a common law warning but does not fall within the definition of "identification evidence" under the Evidence Act 2008 or the Jury Directions Act 2015 (R v Rose (2002) 55 NSWLR 701; Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109);
    - Evidence from a police informer (R v Reardon & Ors [2002] NSWCCA 203; R v Dellapatrona and Duffield (1993) 31 NSWLR 123);
    - Evidence of an alternative suspect (R v Faure [1993] 2 VR 497; R v Mitchell [2006] VSCA 289; R v Campbell 14/11/1994 CCA Vic);
    - Evidence based on memories asserted to have been recovered during hypnotherapy (R v WB (2009) 23 VR 319; [2009] VSCA 173; R v McFelin [1985] 2 NZLR 570; R v Horsfall (1989) 51 SASR 489; R v Jenkyns (1993) 32 NSWLR 712; R v Tillott (1995) 38 NSWLR 1);
    - Evidence based on the recollection of events alleged to have occurred many years earlier, where those memories may have been distorted by the passage of time (Longman v R (1989) 168 CLR 79; Robinson v R (1999) 197 CLR 162; Crampton v R (2000) 206 CLR 161);
    - Evidence of a witness who has a poor criminal record or who is otherwise part of the criminal milieu (R v Latina 2/4/1996 Vic CCA; R v Hickey (1995) 89 A Crim R 554);
    - Evidence of a witness who was alcohol or drug-affected at time of the events, whether voluntarily or by the alleged actions of the accused (R v Maple [1999] VSCA 52; Hudson v R [2017] VSCA 122);
    - Evidence of a witness who is hostile towards the accused (R v Faure [1993] 2 VR 497; R v Kotzmann [1999] 2 VR 123; R v Hickey (1995) 89 A Crim R 554);
    - Evidence of a witness with a proven history of dishonesty (R v Holt & Merriman (1996) 87 A Crim R 82; R v Hickey (1995) 89 A Crim R 554).

22. Evidence may also be "of a kind that may be unreliable" because of a combination of circumstances (Hudson v R [2017] VSCA 122, [40]).

23. The phrase "evidence of a kind that may be unreliable" is not limited to the kinds of evidence that were accepted as potentially unreliable by the common law. It may also cover other types of evidence (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301; R v Baartman [2000] NSWCCA 298).

[237] Subject to limitations on the application of the section to the evidence of children (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 33).

24. Although the phrase "evidence of a kind that may be unreliable" is a phrase of great generality, potentially capable of capturing all contested evidence (because all evidence is "potentially unreliable"), in NSW it has been read down by reference to the purposes of the unreliable witness warning. In that jurisdiction, s 165 of the Evidence Act 1995 (NSW) is the statutory equivalent of Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 31 and 32. New South Wales courts have held that the section is concerned only with sources of unreliability in respect of which the courts have developed special knowledge or experience, but which fall outside the experience of juries (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301; R v Baartman [2000] NSWCCA 298; Young & Ors v R [2015] VSCA 265).[238]

25. According to this line of authority, kinds of evidence that do not fall within this special knowledge category are not to be regarded as "evidence of a kind that may be unreliable", and so will not require a s 32 unreliability warning (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301; R v Baartman [2000] NSWCCA 298; Young & Ors v R [2015] VSCA 265).[239]

26. Where evidence does not fall within one of the categories accepted at common law or defined in s 31(a)–(e), it will be a question of judgment for the trial judge whether a warning is required. A warning will be necessary where the danger of the jury acting upon the evidence is real and substantial, and the potential unreliability of the evidence might not be fully perceived by the jury in the absence of a warning (Hudson v R [2017] VSCA 122, [52]; R v Baartman [2000] NSWCCA 298, [69]; Young & Ors v R [2015] VSCA 265; Wade v The Queen [2019] VSCA 168).

27. In assessing the risk that the jury will not appreciate the potential unreliability without a judicial warning, the court must consider both whether the jury can understand the individual bases of unreliability and the cumulative impact of the bases of unreliability (Hudson v R [2017] VSCA 122, [56]).

28. Assessing the risk that the jury will not appreciate the potential unreliability also requires the court to consider the context and significance of the evidence in question. For example, in Hudson v R, the Court pointed to the fact that the warning concerned the central Crown witness, the case depends on an assessment of the credibility and reliability of that witness and the witness had made prior inconsistent statements in his reporting to police, as factors that contributed to its conclusion that the unreliable evidence warning was required (see Hudson v R [2017] VSCA 122, [57]–[61]).

29. A s 32 warning is likely to significantly influence the jury's assessment of the witness in question. For this reason careful reflection is necessary before applying s 32 to evidence that falls outside the categories described in s 31(a)–(e) (RELC v R (2006) 167 A Crim R 484, [80]). However, it is erroneous to elevate this need for reflection to a test of requiring good reasons before giving a warning in relation to a non-listed category. Imposing such a test will mean the judge will fail to consider properly whether the evidence is of a kind that may be unreliable before moving to consider under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 14 whether there are good reasons for not giving a warning (Hudson v R [2017] VSCA 122, [43]).

30. The need for caution before applying s 32 to types of evidence which is not listed in s 31 may be overcome where the circumstances in question are closely analogous to an accepted category of unreliable evidence (R v Baartman [2000] NSWCCA 298, [70]).

[238] In R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301 Hulme and Howie JJ declined to follow earlier cases that had taken a less restricted view, including R v V (1998) 100 A Crim R 488 and R v Mayberry [2000] NSWCCA 531.

[239] In Uniform Evidence Law (12th Ed, 2016), Odgers expresses strong doubts about the validity of this interpretation: see [EA.165.450].

Categories of evidence that are not of an "unreliable kind"

31. Courts have identified a number of categories of evidence that should not generally attract a s 32 unreliability warning:

    - Evidence of a witness asserted to be biased;
    - Evidence of a witness asserted to have an interest in the result of proceedings;
    - Evidence of a witness alleged to have a motive to lie (other than an accomplice–like motive to lie) (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301, [37], [99]);[240]
    - Evidence of a conversation that occurred a substantial period before it was reported (R v Fowler (2003) 151 A Crim R 166);
    - Evidence that the witness was affected by drugs at the time of the events in question (Young & Ors v R [2015] VSCA 265, [72]).

32. While these matters should generally not attract a s 32 unreliability warning, they should usually be addressed by way of comments in the judge's summing up (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301, [37], [99]).[241]

33. At least in the case of children, the fact that evidence is unsworn is not a basis for finding that the evidence may be unreliable. The Evidence Act 2008 and the Jury Directions Act 2015 do not treat unsworn evidence as a kind that may be unreliable. There was also no requirement or rule of practice under the common law that judges warn the jury to take into account the differences between sworn and unsworn evidence when assessing reliability (R v GW (2016) 258 CLR 108, [55]–[57]).

34. An attack on a witness's honesty does not by itself bring the witness's evidence within s 32 (R v Fowler (2003) 151 A Crim R 166).

Good reasons for not warning the jury

35. The judge need not give a requested direction "if there are good reasons for not doing so" (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 14). For information on the matters a judge must consider when determining whether there are good reasons for not giving a requested direction, see 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015.

36. Section 14 sets up an exception to the general rule that the judge must give requested directions. It is erroneous to invert the rule and require good reasons before giving a s 32 direction (Hudson v R [2017] VSCA 122, [43]).

37. Some circumstances[242] in which it has been held that there may be good reasons for not giving an unreliability warning include:

[240] R v Stewart also identified the making of a prior inconsistent statement, or internal inconsistencies as factors that do not generally attract an unreliability warning. In Hudson v R [2017] VSCA 122, [58], the complainant's prior inconsistent statement was treated as a significant matter that contributed to requiring an unreliability warning.

[241] In each of these examples, a judicial warning may be unnecessary because the factor tending to show unreliability and the consequences of accepting that factor would commonly be within the understanding of the jury. It may be these are example of the "good reason for not warning" exception.

[242] For other potentially "good reasons" for not giving an unreliable evidence warning, see S Odgers, Uniform Evidence Law (12th Ed, 2016) [EA.165.240].

- Where, in the context of the trial and counsel's addresses, the effect of the relevant circumstance on the witness's reliability would have been obvious to the jury (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301 (Howie J in dissent, [151]); Bromley v R (1986) 161 CLR 315; R v Reardon & Ors [2002] NSWCCA 203; Elmaghraby v R [2016] VSCA 326, [23]–[25]);
- Where it was objectively unlikely that the sources of unreliability, if they existed, could have logically had any impact on the reliability of the evidence the witness gave (Elmaghraby v R [2016] VSCA 326, [26]);
- Where the giving of the warning would cause unfair prejudice a co-accused's case, such as where a co-accused's evidence suffers from the same alleged deficiencies as the impugned witness (Young & Ors v R [2015] VSCA 265);
- Where the judge instead gives tailored directions that were capable of alerting the jury to the reasons for the witness's potential unreliability (R v Covill (2000) 114 A Crim R 111, [29]; R v Flood [1999] NSWCCA 198, [16]);
- The potentially unreliable evidence was undisputed or unimportant (R v Reardon & Ors [2002] NSWCCA 203, [136]; R v Fowler (2003) 151 A Crim R 166);
- The "request" for a warning was made without enthusiasm and was not subsequently pressed (R v Reardon & Ors [2002] NSWCCA 203);
- The evidence fell within an accepted category of evidence of "a kind that may be unreliable", but in circumstances where no real issue of unreliability was raised (R v Flood [1999] NSWCCA 198; R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301; R v Fowler (2003) 151 A Crim R 166).

38. The structure of s 32 is designed to encourage judges to give unreliability directions where there is a reasonable possibility of unreliable evidence. Applying the good reasons exception depends on the circumstances of the case and requires judges to remember that the default position is that a direction should be given (Wade v The Queen [2019] VSCA 168, [39]).
39. A risk of confabulation is a matter that may not be fully appreciated by a jury in the absence of a judicial direction. This risk may persist even if the suggested causes of confabulation, or the evidence of confabulation, is thoroughly ventilated in cross-examination (Wade v The Queen [2019] VSCA 168, [37]–[38]).
40. Under equivalent provisions in the Evidence Act, courts have held that the fact that potentially unreliable evidence supports the defence may provide good reasons for not giving a warning (R v Salama [1999] NSWCCA 105; R v Rose (2002) 55 NSWLR 701. See also Anile v The Queen [2018] VSCA 235R, [206]–[207]).
41. The jury must not be warned about the interest of the accused in the outcome of the case (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44H; R v Haggag (1998) 101 A Crim R 593; R v Brown [1995] 1 Qd R 287).
42. Even if there are arguably good reasons for not complying with s 32, it will rarely be appropriate for a judge to decide not to comply with that provision if a warning is to be given in respect of other evidence with similar characteristics (RELC v R (2006) 167 A Crim R 484).
43. Where the judge determines that there are good reasons for not giving a warning, or for doing so in the terms other than those required by legislation or authority, he or she should generally state those reasons (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301, [46], [124]).

Content of the Warning

44. A s 32 unreliability warning must:

(a) Warn the jury that the evidence may be unreliable;

(b) Inform the jury:

(i) of the significant matters that may cause the evidence to be unreliable; or

(ii) if the direction concerns evidence given by a child, of the significant matters (other than just the age of the child) that the trial judge considers may make that child's evidence unreliable; and

(c) Warn the jury of the need for caution in determining whether to accept the evidence and the weight to be given to it (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32(3)).

45. These requirements are mandatory, subject to the qualification that the judge may decide not to give the warning if there are good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 15).

46. The judge is not required to adopt a particular form of words in giving a s 32 unreliable evidence warning (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 6).

47. However, it has been suggested that the three matters which the judge is required to warn about should be addressed in the same part of the charge, although splitting these directions would not necessarily constitute error (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301, [44], [154]).

48. It is common practice for all of these matters to be addressed when the evidence is admitted in the trial, as well as in the judge's summing up (S Odgers, Uniform Evidence Law (12th Ed, 2016), [EA.165.210]).

49. While no particular form of words is required for a s 32 unreliability warning, it must be properly expressed as a warning (Brown v R [2006] NSWCCA 69, [40]).

50. It is not sufficient for the judge to merely refer to a submission about the matter made by counsel when addressing the jury. The warning must come from the judge, with the authority of the judge being used to impress the significance of the matter on the jury (R v TJF [2001] NSWCCA 127; R v Yates [2002] NSWCCA 520; R v Sullivan [2003] NSWCCA 100).

51. In fairness to the party adducing the evidence, the judge should make it clear that the warning is given because of the nature of the evidence, and that he or she is not expressing a personal opinion about it (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301).

52. While a judge may emphasise that the law requires the direction to be given (KNP v R (2006) 67 NSWLR 227), he or she should not repeatedly indicate to the jury that the warning is always given where evidence of that nature is before the court. Such an approach runs the risk that the warning will not be effective in bringing home to the jury the caution with which they must treat the evidence (R v Roddom [2001] NSWCCA 168; R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301).

53. The precise content of the warning will depend upon the facts before the jury and counsel's addresses (R v Johnston (1998) 45 NSWLR 362 at 369; R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301, [87], [130]; Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109, [183]).

Warning the jury about potential unreliability

54. The judge must warn the jury that the evidence in question may be unreliable (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32(3)(a)).

55. A simple repetition of the language of s 32(3), incorporating the significant matters which may make the evidence unreliable, is likely to be sufficient to comply with this requirement (see, e.g. the direction approved in this respect in R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301, [135]).

56. It is not necessary to use any particular form of words in giving this warning. In some circumstances there may be good reason instead to give a direction that focuses on the issues of "deliberate falsehood", or "honestly mistaken evidence" (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 6; R v Fowler (2003) 151 A Crim R 166).

Informing the jury about significant sources of unreliability

57. The judge must inform the jury of significant matters that may cause the evidence to be unreliable (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32(3)).

58. This obligation differs from that which applied under Evidence Act 2008 s 165. Under that section, trial judges were required to "inform the jury of matters that may cause it to be unreliable". The provisions in the Jury Directions Act 2015 now include the qualifier significant.

59. The effect of this change in terminology means that, under the Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32(3), it is explicit that the trial judge is not required to inform the jury of all matters that may cause particular evidence to be unreliable. He or she is only obliged to inform the jury of significant matters which may cause the evidence to be unreliable.

60. The party requesting the direction must also specify the significant matters that may make the evidence unreliable. The role of the judge is to determine which of those matters are significant, and then direct the jury accordingly.

61. As part of this process, the judge should discuss with the party any other matters which the judge considers are significant and invite submissions on whether those matters should be identified in the warning (see Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 15, 16).

62. The Jury Directions Act 2015 offers no guidance as to when a matter will be "significant". The Oxford English Dictionary notes that the term means "sufficiently great or important to be worthy of attention; noteworthy".

63. While the requirement in s 32 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 is expressed as a duty to "inform the jury", this does not mean that the information can be treated as a mere comment. The judge must communicate this information with the full weight of judicial authority (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301, [117]).

64. The purpose of this direction is to inform the jury of matters which may be outside their general experience and understanding. Those matters need be stated only with such detail as is required to achieve that purpose (Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109, [182]).

65. While courts must exercise caution in construing s 32 by reference to the common law, the experience of the common law may guide the content of the information provided to the jury about potential sources of unreliability. That experience can reveal the significant matters that may cause the evidence to be unreliable (Robinson v R (2006) 162 A Crim R 88, [7]).

66. See the following topics for a discussion about the particular sources of unreliability posed by the respective kinds of evidence:

    - 4.14 Previous Representations (Hearsay, Recent Complaint and Prior Statements);
    - 4.5 Confessions and Admissions;
    - 4.22 Criminally Concerned Witness Warnings;
    - 4.23 Prison Informer Warnings.

Warning the jury about the need for caution

67. A s 32 warning must alert the jury to the need for caution in determining whether to accept potentially unreliable evidence, and the weight to be given to it (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32(3)(c)).

68. Repeating the words of s 32(3)(c) may be adequate to convey this need.

69. The warning must alert the jury to the need to exercise caution, but it need not tell them how to exercise that caution (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301, [166]).

Common law rules regarding unreliable evidence abolished

70. Previously, Evidence Act 2008 s 165 did not affect any other power of the judge "to give a warning to, or to inform, the jury" (Evidence Act 2008 s 165(5)).

71. Under that provision, the common law requirement to give a warning where the inherent unreliability of a witness created a perceptible risk of a miscarriage of justice survived, subject to some limitations (Singh v DPP (NSW) (2006) 164 A Crim R 284; R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301).

72. The Jury Directions Act 2015 has abolished this common law obligation. The Act is now the only source of obligations on a judge to direct a jury about evidence of a kind that may be unreliable (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 34).

Residual Duty to Warn

73. Under Jury Directions Act 2015, a judge must give a warning in the absence of a request if there are 'substantial and compelling' reasons to do so.

74. At common law, a warning in relation to unreliability was considered necessary where:

    - Evidence was given by a witness who is "inherently unreliable"; and
    - Such a warning was necessary and practical, in the circumstances of the case, to avoid a perceptible risk of miscarriage of justice (Bromley v R (1986) 161 CLR 315; R v Miletic [1997] 1 VR 593).

75. These principles may continue to provide guidance on the operation of the residual obligation to warn.

Witness Must be Inherently Unreliable

76. An unreliable witness warning was not required because of the mere possibility of a witness's error. Such a warning was only required where a witness was considered to be "inherently unreliable" (R v Brooks (1999) 103 A Crim R 234).

77. For a witness to be "inherently unreliable", there must a pre-existing proneness to (or likelihood of) unreliability, which is inherent in the general nature of the witness, or in his or her relationship to the accused, the victim or the events (R v Brooks (1999) 103 A Crim R 234; R v Kotzmann [1999] 2 VR 123).

78. A warning was therefore not required simply because:

    - There had been an attack on the credibility of a witness or a group of witnesses (R v Campbell 14/11/1994 CCA Vic);
    - There were inconsistencies or discrepancies in the evidence of a witness (R v Minaoui [2004] VSCA 126); or
    - The impugned witnesses had convictions or bear some characteristics which may, on one view of the evidence, render them unreliable (R v Campbell 14/11/1994 CCA Vic).

79. It was generally not possible to determine the necessity for an unreliable witness warning by reference to collections of categories of witnesses (R v Lowe 13/11/95 CA Vic).

80. Instead, the necessity for an unreliable witness warning was determined on a witness by witness basis (R v Minaoui [2004] VSCA 126).

81. The need for a warning was more likely to arise in a case where the factors which make the witness's evidence unreliable exist independently of what view the jury takes of the witness's evidence (R v Campbell 14/11/1994 CCA Vic).

Circumstances Relevant to Determining Witness Unreliability

82. Evidence of any of the following matters may be relevant to the assessment of whether a witness is "inherently unreliable":

- The witness is a prison informer (giving evidence of an oral confession) (Pollitt v R (1991) 174 CLR 558);
- The witness has an accomplice–like motive to lie (R v Ali [2002] VSCA 194);
- The witness has received an indemnity from the prosecution, or a sentencing or other benefit for co-operation (R v Calabro 12/11/1984 CCA Vic; R v Checconi (1988) 34 A Crim R 160; R v Powercor (Australia) Ltd [2005] VSCA 163; R v Smith & Turner (1995) 80 A Crim R 491; R v Heaney [1999] VSCA 169; R v Sharp [2005] VSCA 44; R v Strawhorn (2008) 19 VR 101);
- The witness is an alternative suspect (R v Faure [1993] 2 VR 497; R v Mitchell [2006] VSCA 289; R v Campbell 14/11/1994 CCA Vic);
- The witness has poor criminal record or is otherwise part of the criminal milieu (R v Latina 2/4/1996 Vic CCA; R v Hickey (1995) 89 A Crim R 554);
- The witness was drug-affected at time of the events (R v Maple [1999] VSCA 52);
- The witness is hostile towards the accused (R v Faure [1993] 2 VR 497; R v Kotzmann [1999] 2 VR 123; R v Hickey (1995) 89 A Crim R 554);
- The witness has a proven history of dishonesty (R v Holt & Merriman (1996) 87 A Crim R 82; R v Hickey (1995) 89 A Crim R 554);
- The witness has a cognitive impairment (including impaired memory) which may have affected his or her capacity to give reliable evidence (Bromley v R (1986) 161 CLR 315; R v Sharp [2005] VSCA 44; R v Challoner (2000) 110 A Crim R 102; R v Hickey (1995) 89 A Crim R 554; R v Maple [1999] VSCA 52).

83. At common law, the presence of any one or combination of these factors was not enough to indicate a warning was necessary. That assessment needed to be informed by all the circumstances of the case (See for example R v Morgan 13/8/1996 CCA Vic; R v Brooks (1999) 103 A Crim R 234; R v Sotiropoulos [1999] VSCA 115; R v Kotzmann [1999] 2 VR 123; R v Heaney [1999] VSCA 169; R v Campbell 14/11/1994 CCA Vic; R v Strawhorn (2008) 19 VR 101).

84. The first three circumstances outlined above are addressed in more detail below.

Examples of Potentially Unreliable Witnesses

Prison Informers Giving Evidence of Oral Confessions

85. While each case must be assessed on an individual basis, where a prison informer gives evidence of an oral confession made to him or her, there will usually be substantial and compelling reasons for giving an unreliable witness warning (see Pollitt v R (1991) 174 CLR 558).

86. There was no rule of law or practice requiring a warning to be given in such cases. However, at common law, it was only be in an exceptional case that a full unreliable witness warning was not necessary (Pollitt v R (1991) 174 CLR 558).

87. A prison informer's evidence of an oral confession was generally regarded as inherently unreliable for the following reasons:

- This evidence is easily concocted;
- Where this evidence is concocted, an accused's denial will ordinarily have no possibility of corroboration;
- Prison informers (if convicted criminals) are of bad character;
- The law acknowledges that the prison informer's position creates motives to fabricate such evidence, including:
    - the perception that they will derive some benefit in terms of sentence, treatment or release on parole; and

- by reason of a variety of common prison environment pressures which may not be apparent to a jury (Pollitt v R (1991) 174 CLR 558).

88. There is a difference between a "prison informer" who gives evidence of an oral confession made to him or her, and a "prisoner witness" who is a witness to events that occur in prison. A "prisoner witness" should not be treated as a "prison informer" (R v Ton (2002) 132 A Crim R 340 (NSWCCA); R v Ali (No.2) (2005) 13 VR 257).

89. An accomplice who, in order to receive favourable treatment, gives evidence of an oral confession made to him or her by the accused (becoming an "informer"), should commonly be treated in the same way as a prison informer (R v Tamme [2004] VSCA 44; Grey v R (2001) 184 ALR 593).

Witnesses with Similar Motives to Accomplices

90. An unreliable witness warning may be required for witnesses who are not accomplices, but nonetheless have an accomplice–like motivation to give false testimony exculpating themselves and inculpating the accused (R v Parsons (2004) 145 A Crim R 519; R v Mitchell [2006] VSCA 289; R v Ali (No.2) (2005) 13 VR 257).

91. While accessories after the fact may fall within this category (R v Parsons (2004) 145 A Crim R 519), it cannot be assumed that they have such a motivation. Historically, the law has declined to treat accessories after the fact as accomplices because their assumed interest lies in exculpating rather than implicating the accused. However, every case must be considered on its own facts (R v Ready and Manning [1942] VLR 85; R v Weiss (2004) 8 VR 388).

92. Witnesses with an accomplice–like motivation do not form a special category, and the need for a warning should be determined by reference to all of the circumstances of the case (R v Ali (No.2) (2005) 13 VR 257).

93. If it is suggested that a non-accomplice, who has not been charged with an offence, has an accomplice–like motive to lie (so as to shift blame from themselves), the fact that they have not been charged will militate against the giving of a warning (R v Parsons (2004) 145 A Crim R 519).

Indemnified and Co-operating Witnesses

94. Warnings are often requested in respect of indemnified witness and witnesses who have received a benefit for co-operation (R v Calabro 12/11/1984 CCA Vic; R v Checconi (1988) 34 A Crim R 160; R v Powercor (Australia) Ltd [2005] VSCA 163; R v Smith & Turner (1995) 80 A Crim R 491).

95. Many indemnified or co-operating witnesses will be accomplices who attract the need for an accomplice warning.

96. At common law, there was no rule that an unreliable witness warning must be given for every non-accomplice who is indemnified or co-operating. These cases must be assessed on their individual circumstances (R v Powercor (Australia) Ltd [2005] VSCA 163; R v Smith & Turner (1995) 80 A Crim R 491).

97. In some circumstances an indemnity will create no risk of unreliability. In other cases, any risks that are created will be sufficiently obvious to the jury that there will be no need for a warning (R v Powercor (Australia) Ltd [2005] VSCA 163; R v Smith & Turner (1995) 80 A Crim R 491).

98. Where there is evidence that a critical witness was indemnified or benefited from co-operation, the circumstances in which the evidence was given, and their consequences may need to be fully explained to the jury. This explanation may be required even if no unreliable witness warning is required (R v Checconi (1988) 34 A Crim R 160).

99. This explanation may describe:

    - The terms of the indemnity or undertaking to co-operate; and
    - The statutory consequences for the witness if he or she does not fulfil the terms of an undertaking to co-operate

Children and Cognitively Impaired Witnesses are not Presumptively Unreliable

100. Historically the law regarded child witnesses as an inherently unreliable class of witness and a corroboration warning was required for their evidence as a rule of practice (DPP v Hester [1973] AC 296).

101. By contrast, the law never regarded cognitively impaired witnesses as inherently unreliable, and there was never any rule of practice that a corroboration warning should be given in every case involving such a witness. Instead, the law required simply that such a warning should be given where necessary in the particular circumstances of the case (Bromley v R (1986) 161 CLR 315).

102. Judges are now prohibited by statute from warning, or suggesting to the jury in any way, that the law regards children as an unreliable class of witness (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 33).

103. Judges may give a warning if it is directed to particular features of the evidence, rather than stereotypical assumptions about the class of witness in issue (R v WEB (2003) 7 VR 200; R v NRC [1999] 3 VR 537).

104. See 4.2 Child Witnesses for further discussion of directions about evidence from children.

Warning Must be Necessary to Avoid a Risk of Miscarriage of Justice

105. An unreliable witness warning should only be given where it is necessary and practical, in the circumstances of the case, to avoid a perceptible risk of miscarriage of justice (Bromley v R (1986) 161 CLR 315; R v Miletic [1997] 1 VR 593).

106. A perceptible risk is one that is real or of substance, as opposed to a risk that is insignificant or theoretical (R v Miletic [1997] 1 VR 593).

107. A warning may be given when:

- The danger in acting upon the evidence is real and substantial; and
- The conduct of the trial and evidence are such that the jury may not have fully perceived the danger, or the jury's attention may have been diverted from the danger (Bromley v R (1986) 161 CLR 315).

The Warning Must Address Concealed Dangers

108. A warning will only be necessary where there is a possibility that either the unreliability of the evidence, or the full significance of that unreliability, will not be apparent to the jury (R v Sharp [2005] VSCA 44; R v Miletic [1997] 1 VR 593; R v Maple [1999] VSCA 52; R v Brooks (1999) 103 A Crim R 234; R v Williams [2007] VSCA 208; R v Strawhorn (2008) 19 VR 101).

109. In other words, the warning is only necessary if it presents a concealed trap that has been identified by judicial experience, but which will not be within the experience and understanding of jurors (R v Miletic [1997] 1 VR 593; R v Maple [1999] VSCA 52; R v Strawhorn (2008) 19 VR 101).

110. Even if the relevant dangers are likely to be "outside the experience" of most jurors, if those dangers have been clearly placed before the jury and explained in detail by counsel, a warning may not be necessary (R v Strawhorn (2008) 19 VR 101).

Reasons for Not Giving a Warning

111. An unreliable witness warning should not be given where, because of short-comings in the evidence, it would be an invitation to speculate about matters not in evidence (R v Minaoui [2004] VSCA 126).

112. Where there is substantial supporting evidence, it will be a legitimate forensic decision to seek no warning, and there are less likely to be substantial and compelling reasons to give the direction (R v Sotiropoulos [1999] VSCA 115).

113. The need for a warning may be vitiated where the relevant evidence is not vital to the prosecution case, but rather is directed more to context and detail (R v Sotiropoulos [1999] VSCA 115).

A Warning Should be Given Only When Truly Necessary

114. At common law, it was considered that the unreliable witness warning was reserved for special cases (R v Latina 2/4/1996 Vic CCA; R v Weiss (2004) 8 VR 388).

115. Such a warning was only be given where truly necessary because:

- It tends to blur the division of responsibility between the judge as the arbiter of the law and the jury as the tribunal of fact (R v Weiss (2004) 8 VR 388); and
- A person compelled to give evidence in a court of law should not be publicly branded as an unreliable witness unless that is truly necessary for the attainment of justice (R v Holt & Merriman (1996) 87 A Crim R 82).

116. The Court of Appeal has therefore shown a strong reluctance to find that it was necessary for a trial judge to give an unreliable witness warning where:

- The circumstances suggesting unreliability were fully exposed in the evidence and addresses; or

117. Those circumstances were otherwise fully understandable on a common-sense basis (R v Morgan 13/8/1996 CCA Vic; R v Brooks (1999) 103 A Crim R 234; R v Sotiropoulos [1999] VSCA 115; R v Kotzmann [1999] 2 VR 123; R v Latina 2/4/1996 Vic CCA; R v Challoner (2000) 110 A Crim R 102; R v Sharp [2005] VSCA 44; R v Strawhorn (2008) 19 VR 101).

118. The need to give warnings in respect of some witnesses in a trial is not a basis for giving a warning for a witness in the same trial who would not otherwise require a warning. The warnings that are given do not elevate the value of the evidence given by witnesses who are not the subject of warnings (R v Strawhorn (2008) 19 VR 101).

Interpretation of s 32 by reference to the common law and Evidence Act 2008 s 165

119. When construing Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32, care should be taken in referring to its common law predecessors. However, cases which consider the statutory predecessor to s 32, s 165 of the Evidence Act 2008, will continue to be of assistance, due to the similarities between the provisions.

120. Despite the need for caution in respect of common law authorities, the experience of the common law may provide guidance as to the risks of unreliability posed by different forms of evidence, and the directions necessary to respond to those risks (Papakosmas v R (1999) 196 CLR 297; R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301, [2]–[9], [70]; Robinson v R [2006] NSWCCA 192).

Supporting evidence

121. With the exception of perjury offences, any previously persisting requirement that evidence be corroborated is now abolished (Evidence Act 2008 s 164).

122. The rules of law or practice that previously required directions concerning the absence of corroboration, including directions about the dangers of acting on uncorroborated evidence, have also been abolished (Evidence Act 2008 s 164(3)).

123. Further, Evidence Act 2008 s 164(4) prohibits a trial judge from warning the jury that it is dangerous to act on uncorroborated evidence in a criminal proceeding. It also prohibits trial judges from directing a jury about the absence of corroboration.

124. As part of the obligation to identify relevant evidence, judges commonly invite the jury to consider whether there is evidence that can independently support the impugned evidence, and to identify potentially supporting evidence, as was done as part of corroboration directions at common law.

125. However, it is not appropriate to invite the jury to look for supporting evidence when the warning concerns exculpatory evidence, especially when the warning concerns exculpatory evidence from an accomplice (Anile v The Queen [2018] VSCA 235R, [206]–[207]).

126. In a criminal proceeding for perjury or related offences, the judge must direct the jury that it may find the accused guilty only if it is satisfied that the evidence which proves guilt is corroborated (Evidence Act 2008 s 164(5)).

4.21.1 Charge: Unreliable Evidence Warning

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This is a generic charge that can be adapted for use in cases where:

i) A party has requested a Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32 unreliability warning; and

ii) The evidence in question is "of a kind that may be unreliable"; and

iii) No specific warning addressing the dangers presented by that type of evidence has been included in the Charge Book (see below).

This charge may be adapted where the witness is a child. See Child Witnesses for guidance.

Introduction

I have already told you the general rules for assessing witnesses' evidence. I must now warn you about the need for caution when considering the evidence of NOW. I must give you this warning because [identify bases of unreliability, e.g. "NOW's evidence may have been affected by her history of drug use"].

Significant matters that may cause unreliability

My warning to you is as follows. It is the experience of the law that the evidence of a witness [identify basis of unreliability, e.g. "who was drug affected at the time of the events"] may be unreliable. This unreliability can arise due to [list significant reasons for potential unreliability, e.g. "the effects drug use can have on the user's perceptions and recollections"].

[If necessary, explain the grounds of potential unreliability in further detail, and relate to the facts and arguments in the case.]

Warning

The law says that every jury must take this potential unreliability into account when considering the [type of evidence given by NOW/evidence of a witness such as NOW]. You must take it into account in determining whether you accept NOW's evidence at all, and if you do accept it, in whole or in part, in deciding what weight to give to that evidence.

Supporting evidence

[If there is evidence capable of "supporting" the witness's evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In considering whether it is safe to rely upon NOW's evidence, you should have regard to any supporting evidence led in this trial that you accept. By "supporting evidence" I mean evidence from a source that is independent of NOW, and that tends to show the truth of NOW's evidence of the accused's guilt.

In this case the prosecution relied upon [insert number] items of evidence as supporting NOW's evidence. These were [identify evidence capable of supporting the unreliable witness's evidence].

[If there is a danger that the jury might mistakenly believe certain evidence to be supportive, add the following darker shaded section.]

There was other evidence given in this case that you might have thought at first glance could support NOW's evidence. This includes the evidence [broadly identify non-supporting evidence].

I direct you that this other evidence is not capable of supporting NOW's account, because [explain why the evidence is not capable of supporting, e.g. "it does not come from an independent source".]

[If the issue of mutual support has arisen, and there is a possibility of joint fabrication, add the following darker shaded section.]

You will see that the prosecution relies upon the evidence of [two/a number of] [allegedly] unreliable witnesses to support each other. The law accepts that unreliable witnesses can support each other in this way.

However, you may only accept their evidence as mutually supporting if you accept that their accounts are truly independent of each other. That is, you must accept that they did not put their heads together and fabricate their evidence.

4.22 Criminally Concerned Witness Warnings

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Under s 32 of the Jury Directions Act 2015, a judge may be required to warn the jury about the potential unreliability of evidence if that evidence has been given by a witness who might reasonably be supposed to have been "criminally concerned" in the events giving rise to that proceeding.
2. A "criminally concerned witness" warning is a particular form of an unreliable evidence warning. This topic should therefore be read in conjunction with Unreliable Evidence Warning.

Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32 Unreliability Warning

When must a s 32 unreliability warning be given?

3. A judge must give a s 32 unreliability warning if:
    - A party in a jury trial requests such a warning;
    - The evidence in question is "of a kind that may be unreliable"; and
    - There are no good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32).
4. See Unreliable Evidence Warning for information concerning the first and third requirements.
5. In relation to the second requirement, Jury Directions Act 2015 s 31(c) states that evidence given by a witness in a criminal proceeding who "might reasonably be supposed to have been criminally concerned in the events giving rise to the trial" is evidence "of a kind that may be unreliable".

Who is a "criminally concerned" witness?

6. To fall within the scope of s 31(c), a witness may have been criminally concerned in the relevant events in any way. He or she does not need to be facing the same charges as the accused, or to have been charged with any criminal offence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 31(c)).

7. However, the witness must have been "criminally concerned" in the relevant events. Section 31(c) does not apply to witnesses who had some innocent involvement in the events giving rise to the proceeding.

8. It is therefore doubtful that s 31(c) would apply to witnesses who were legitimately involved in the events giving rise to the proceeding, but who engaged in collateral crime (e.g. police officers who investigate an offence, but who steal property from the crime scene) (R v Lonie & Groom [1999] NSWCCA 319, [63]).

9. The category of witnesses covered by s 31(c) includes most[243] of the witnesses who were previously covered by the rule of practice that required corroboration warnings in respect of "accomplices" (R v Lonie & Groom [1999] NSWCCA 319).

Accessories after the fact

10. It is not clear whether accessories after the fact (e.g. people who conceal an offence) fall within the scope of s 31(c) (Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109, [203]; R v Clark (2001) 123 A Crim R 506, [53]).

11. This may depend on the interpretation given to the phrase "the events giving rise to the trial". If it is held that this phrase only covers events that occurred prior to the completion of the offences alleged against the accused, then accessories after the fact will not fall within the scope of s 31(c) (R v Clark (2001) 123 A Crim R 506 [70] (Heydon JA)).

12. Even if it is decided that accessories after the fact are not covered by s 31(c), this does not mean that a s 32 unreliability warning need not be given. Such a warning may still be required if the evidence is "of a kind that may be unreliable". See the discussion of "Non-Listed Categories" in Unreliable Evidence Warning.

13. When a judge is considering whether or not a warning is necessary, special attention should be paid to the accessory witness's possible interest in the outcome of the proceedings:

    - In many cases, accessories after the fact will have no special interest in falsely blaming the accused. Where this is the case, their evidence may not be "of an unreliable kind" (see R v Clark (2001) 123 A Crim R 506, [66]–[69]; GAR v R (No 2) [2010] NSWCCA 164, [101]. For the common law position see R v Ready & Manning [1942] VLR 85; R v Carranceja & Asikin (1989) 42 A Crim R 402; R v Parsons (2004) 145 A Crim R 519; R v Heaney [1999] VSCA 169; R v Sharp [2005] VSCA 44).
    - However, in some cases accessories after the fact may have the same motivations for blaming the accused as an accomplice, and their evidence may be regarded as potentially unreliable (see, e.g. the common law case of R v Parsons (2004) 145 A Crim R 519).

[243] While it is clear that "true accomplices" (those who were participants in the accused's alleged offence) fit within s 31(c), some secondary categories of "accomplice" may not. For example, it seems likely that accomplices in respect of uncharged offences that have been led in evidence against the accused, or receivers of stolen goods (if they give evidence against the alleged thief of those goods), do not fall within the scope of s 31(c), despite being classified as "accomplices" at common law by Davies v DPP [1954] AC 378.

Determining whether the accused is "criminally concerned"

14. Where a s 32 unreliability warning is requested, and the question of whether or not a witness "might reasonably be supposed to have been criminally concerned" in the relevant events (and thus falls within the scope of s 31(c)) is in issue, that matter must initially be determined by the trial judge as a question of fact (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301, [125]; R v Taranto [1999] NSWCCA 396).

15. For a witness to fall within the scope of s 31(c), the judge does not need to find that he or she actually was criminally concerned in the relevant events, either on the balance of probabilities or beyond reasonable doubt. The judge only needs to find that there is evidence capable of raising a "reasonable supposition" that the witness was tainted in this way (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 31(c)).

16. A judge who finds that the factual conditions for the warning are not met, and thus refuses a request for a warning under s 31(c), should give reasons for that refusal (unless it is obvious that the witness does not fall within the suggested category) (R v Taranto[1999] NSWCCA 396).

17. Even if the judge decides that the witness was not criminally concerned in the relevant events, this does not mean that a s 32 unreliability warning need not be given. Such a warning may still be required if the evidence is "of a kind that may be unreliable."[244] See the discussion of "Non-Listed Categories" in Unreliable Evidence Warning.

Being a criminally concerned witness is not conclusive

18. In rare and exceptional cases, a judge may have good reasons for not giving a warning despite the fact that the witness is a 'criminally concerned witness' (see R v Clark (2001) 123 A Crim R 506 (Heydon JA)).

19. Where a criminally concerned witness gives evidence for the defence exculpating the accused, it is unlikely to be evidence "of a kind that may be unreliable" in the sense addressed by s 32. If the witness does not implicate the accused, the danger that the witness is shifting his or her own blame to the accused in order to diminish his or her own culpability does not arise (R v Ayoub [2004] NSWCCA 209 at 216. See also Anile v The Queen [2018] VSCA 235R, [206]).

Content of the s 32 unreliability warning

20. A s 32 unreliability warning must:

    - Warn the jury that the evidence may be unreliable;
    - Inform the jury of the significant matters that may cause it to be unreliable;
    - If the direction concerns evidence giving by a child, inform the jury of the significant matters (other than the solely the child's age) that may make the evidence unreliable; and

[244] Examples of similar kinds of evidence which may require a Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32 unreliability warning due to being "of a kind that may be unreliable" include:

Evidence of a witness with an accomplice–like motive to lie (see, e.g. R v Ali [2002] VSCA 194);

Evidence from a police informer (see, e.g. R v Reardon & Ors [2002] NSWCCA 203; R v Dellapatrona and Duffield (1993) 31 NSWLR 123);

Evidence of an alternative suspect (see, e.g. R v Faure [1993] 2 VR 497; R v Mitchell [2006] VSCA 289; R v Campbell 14/11/1994 CCA Vic);

Evidence of a witness who has a poor criminal record or who is otherwise part of the criminal milieu (see, e.g. R v Latina 2/4/1996 Vic CCA; R v Hickey (1995) 89 A Crim R 554).

- Warn the jury of the need for caution in determining whether to accept the evidence and the weight to be given to it (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32(3)).

21. See Unreliable Evidence Warning for information concerning the first and last requirements.

22. In informing the jury about the significant matters that may cause s 31(c) evidence to be unreliable (the second (and third, in the case of child witnesses) requirement), the judge should refer to the matters identified by the party requesting the direction which are significant (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32(3)).

23. The risk factors identified in the common law accomplice warning can provide guidance for judges and practitioners on risks which may be significant (Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109, [164]–[166], [217]).[245]

24. The principal danger addressed by the common law accomplice warning was the natural tendency of an accomplice to minimise his or her role in a criminal episode, and to exaggerate the role of others, including the accused (Jenkins v R (2004) 211 ALR 116).

25. Prior to the introduction of the UEA, judges in New South Wales also used to warn juries that it was the court's experience that accomplices who give a false version of events to police may feel locked into that version, and for that reason feel bound to relate the same version when giving evidence. This warning remains part of the model Evidence Act 1995 s 165(1)(d) warning in New South Wales, on which s 31(c) is based. Whether a judge needs to direct the jury on this matter will depend on whether it is identified in the request as a significant matter (see the directions endorsed in R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301, [135]).

26. The fact that the witness was involved in criminal activity may be relevant to his or her credit, and it may be appropriate to direct juries about this. However, if the jury is otherwise aware of the impact of this factor on the witness's credibility, there will be no need to refer to it in the s 32 warning (Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109, [164]).

27. Judges are not required to inform the jury that people who are involved in the commission of an offence may make false claims about the involvement of others out of motives of revenge or antipathy. The existence of this possibility will be obvious to any jury (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301, [128]; R v Wood [2001] NSWCCA 228).

28. Jury Directions Act 2015 s 31(c) does not use the term "accomplice", and it should not be used in jury directions. The use of that word may convey to the jury that the judge believes that the witness is an accomplice of the accused and, therefore, that the judge has formed the view that the accused is guilty (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301, [21] & [126]).

29. While the judge may invite the jury to look for other evidence to support the evidence of a criminally concerned witness, the judge must not tell the jury that, if they find the witness's evidence to be supported, they are entitled to treat it like the evidence of any other witness. A criminally concerned witness remains a person with a potential motive to lie, and his or her evidence remains potentially unreliable (Sonnet v R (2010) 30 VR 519; R v Parsons (2004) 145 A Crim R 519).

Indemnities and sentencing benefits

30. It will often be the case that a witness who was criminally concerned in the relevant events will give evidence in return for receiving a sentencing benefit or an indemnity from prosecution (either in general or in relation to specific charges). This fact may affect the reliability of his or her evidence.

[245] It may be "inappropriate" to refer to a risk factor recognised at common law where that factor clearly does not arise in the circumstances of the case.

31. In Victoria, the common law recognised that it would sometimes be appropriate for these additional matters to be raised in the accomplice warning. However, as the risks these considerations created would often be sufficiently apparent from the evidence and counsel's addresses, this was not seen to be mandatory in every case (R v Weiss (2004) 8 VR 388).

32. In New South Wales, the current tendency is to require judges to incorporate an explanation of the detail and consequences of any benefit given to a co-operating witness within the Evidence Act 1995 (NSW) s 165 warning. One rationale for this is the requirement that the s 165 warning inform the jury of all the matters that may cause evidence to be unreliable (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301; Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109; R v Sullivan [2003] NSWCCA 100).

33. However, it has been recognised that not every indemnity will be a "matter that may cause evidence to be unreliable". For example, there may be no need to make reference to an indemnity that protects the witness from prosecution for unimportant crimes (see R v Clark (2001) 123 A Crim R 506, [37]; R v Powercor (Australia) Ltd [2005] VSCA 163; R v Smith & Turner (1995) 80 A Crim R 491).

34. Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, it is likely that courts will adopt a flexible approach based on the views of the parties. Where a party does not identify the indemnity or sentencing benefit as a significant matter, the judge may ask whether this direction is required.

The jury's role in determining the need for caution

35. In many cases it will be accepted without issue that the witness in question falls within the scope of Jury Directions Act 2015 s 31(c). In such cases the judge should simply warn the jury that his or her evidence may be unreliable, inform them of the significant matters that may cause it to be unreliable, and warn them of the need for caution in determining whether to accept the evidence and the weight to be given to it (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32).

36. However, in some cases it will not be clear whether or not the witness actually does fall within the s 31(c) category. In such cases, the judge must determine if it "might reasonably be supposed" that the witness was criminally concerned in the events giving rise to the proceeding. If so, and if the prosecution or defence counsel requests a direction, a s 32 unreliability warning should generally be given.[246]

37. At common law, a direction made in this circumstance would have been conditional upon the jury being satisfied that the witness was an accomplice. It is possible that a warning under s 31(c) should be subject to a similar condition. That is, it is possible that the jury should be warned that they need only have regard to the warning if they are satisfied that the witness was (or alternately, "might be", or "might reasonably be supposed to be") criminally concerned in the events giving rise to the proceeding.

38. There is no authoritative guidance on this issue.[247] However, it is doubtful that this approach would be consistent with the policy of s 32 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 and its statutory predecessor, s 165 of the Evidence Act 2008. Following this approach would reintroduce a requirement similar to the common law requirement to direct on the identification of accomplices. It would also reintroduce complexities about onuses and standards of proof, and the distraction of a collateral issue.

39. The preferable approach is to permit the need for the direction to turn solely on the judge's assessment under s 31(c). Thus even in cases where the witness's status is in issue, the jury should be warned in the simple terms described above.

[247] In R v Taranto [1999] NSWCCA 396 Hidden J stated in passing at [38] "Whether the witness was in fact criminally concerned in the relevant events, of course, would be a matter for the jury to determine."

Residual Duty to Warn

40. Under Jury Directions Act 2015, a judge must give a warning in the absence of a request if there are 'substantial and compelling' reasons to do so.

41. Prior to the introduction of the Jury Directions Act 2015 there were two common law bases upon which a warning might have been required in such circumstances:

    - There was a rule of practice requiring an accomplice warning to be given in certain circumstances; and
    - There was general duty to give any warning necessary to avoid a perceptible risk of miscarriage of justice.

42. It seems likely that the rule of practice concerning accomplices (which required judges to warn the jury about the dangers of convicting on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice) has been abrogated by Evidence Act 2008 s 164(4) (which prohibits judges from warning the jury that it is dangerous to act on uncorroborated evidence or give a warning to the same or similar effect).

43. Under the second basis, the common law recognised that a warning may be necessary and practical to avoid a perceptible risk of a miscarriage of justice (Bromley v R (1986) 161 CLR 315; R v Miletic [1997] 1 VR 593; Robinson v R (2006) 162 A Crim R 88, [10]).

44. The need for this warning was not determined by reference to categories of witness. It was only required when:

    - The witness was inherently unreliable (R v Brooks [1999] VSCA 5; R v Kotzmann [1999] 2 VR 123);
    - There was a possibility that the unreliability of the evidence, or the full significance of that unreliability, may not be apparent to the jury (R v Sharp [2005] VSCA 44; R v Miletic [1997] 1 VR 593; R v Strawhorn (2008) 19 VR 101; [2008] VSCA 101); and
    - The factors calling for the warning were sufficient to overcome the court's reluctance to give a warning that tends to trespass upon the jury's function as the tribunal of fact (R v Latina 2/4/1996 Vic CCA; R v Weiss (2004) 8 VR 388).

45. The circumstances in which a common law warning was required closely resemble the circumstances in which a s 32 unreliability warning is required (see above). This was noted by the court in Robinson, which observed that the equivalent section under the Evidence Act 2008 gave effect to the principles stated in Bromley v R (1986) 161 CLR 315 (Robinson v R (2006) 162 A Crim R 88, [10]–[13]).

46. Judges must therefore consider the need to warn the jury about the potential unreliability of evidence, even if the parties have not requested such a warning.

4.22.1 Charge: Criminally Concerned Witnesses

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge may be used where:

i) A party has requested a s 32 unreliability warning; and

ii) The witness in question might reasonably be supposed to be criminally concerned in the events giving rise to the trial; and

iii) The evidence in question is "of a kind that may be unreliable".

Introduction

I have already told you the general rules for assessing witnesses' evidence. I must now warn you about the need for caution when considering the evidence of NOW.

I must give you this warning because of the evidence [suggesting] that NOW [was/may have been] criminally concerned in the events giving rise to these proceedings.[248]

[Briefly describe the basis upon which the witness was asserted to be criminally concerned in the relevant events.]

Matters that may cause unreliability

My warning to you is as follows. It is the experience of the law that the evidence of witnesses who were criminally concerned in the events before the court may be unreliable. This is because [inform jury of the significant matters which make the evidence potentially unreliable, such as:

- There is a risk that such witnesses will seek to shift the blame for the offending, in whole or in part, from themselves onto others. In the process, the witnesses may construct untruthful stories, which tend to excuse the guilty and incriminate the innocent.
- The evidence of such witnesses may seem plausible because of the witness's detailed knowledge of the circumstances in which the crime was committed. This plausibility may add undeserved weight to what the witness says about the part played by the accused.
- Such witnesses may initially give a false version of events to the police, and may then feel locked in to that account. The risk of the witness feeling locked in may be increased where [as here] the witness committed to the initial version in a document that could attract criminal penalties if admitted to be false.
- Such witnesses may make false claims about the involvement of others out of motives of revenge or feelings of dislike or hostility.
- People who are involved in criminal activities may be of bad character, and may therefore be considered to be less trustworthy than other people.]

Associated cautions

Sentencing benefit

[If the witness has received a sentencing benefit, and, in the circumstances of the case, this is a significant matter which may cause the evidence to be unreliable, add the following shaded section.]

The reliability of NOW's evidence may also be affected by the fact that, in return for assisting the prosecution in these proceedings, s/he received a less severe sentence than s/he otherwise would have.

[Summarise evidence relevant to the witness's undertaking to the prosecution and the sentencing benefit received.]

I must inform you that, while it is common and proper for judges to give sentencing benefits to co-operating witnesses, the receipt of a benefit is a circumstance that you must take into account in assessing the reliability of a benefiting witness.

This is because the desire to receive a sentencing benefit may motivate a witness to give false evidence in order to qualify for a reduction in his or her own sentence.

In addition, once a sentencing benefit has been received, it may provide a strong incentive for a

[248] If the accused disputes that an offence was committed at all, care should be taken to avoid any appearance of prejudgment of that issue.

witness to stand by a false, mistaken or misleading account. This is because the Director of Public Prosecutions can go to the Court of Appeal and seek to take back that benefit if s/he considers that the witness has failed wholly or partly to fulfil his or her undertaking to assist the prosecution.

Indemnity from prosecution

[If the witness has received an indemnity from prosecution, and, in the circumstances of the case, this is a significant matter which may cause the evidence to be unreliable, add the following shaded section.]

The reliability of NOW's evidence may also be affected by the fact that, in return for assisting the prosecution in these proceedings, s/he was granted an indemnity from prosecution.

This means, according to the indemnity document you have received as exhibit [identify exhibit] that the Director of Public Prosecutions has undertaken that s/he will not prosecute NOW for his/her participation in the offences that are the subject matter of this trial. The only condition placed on that indemnity is that NOW must give evidence truthfully and frankly, withholding nothing of relevance.

[Summarise evidence relevant to the indemnity.]

I must inform you that, while there are often good reasons for prosecutorial authorities to indemnify co-operating witnesses, the witness's interest in the receipt of an indemnity is a circumstance that you must take into account in assessing the reliability of an indemnified witness.

This is because the desire to avoid prosecution may motivate a witness to give false evidence in order to qualify for the indemnity.

[Inform the jury of any other risks that arise from the indemnity in the circumstances of the case, having regard to counsel's arguments and the form of the indemnity. For example:

In addition, once an indemnity has been received, it may provide a strong incentive for a witness to stand by a false, mistaken or misleading account. This is because of the risk to the witness of losing the benefit of the indemnity if he or she does not maintain the original account.]

Warning

The law says that every jury must take the potential unreliability of the evidence a witness who was criminally concerned in the events before the court [and who has received a sentencing benefit/indemnity from prosecution] into account when considering that evidence.

You must take this potential unreliability into account in determining whether you accept NOW's evidence at all, and if you do accept it, in whole or in part, in deciding what weight to give to that evidence.

Supporting evidence

[If there is evidence capable of "supporting" the witness's evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In considering whether it is safe to rely upon NOW's evidence, you should have regard to any supporting evidence led in this trial that you accept. By "supporting evidence" I mean evidence from a source that is independent of NOW, and that tends to show the truth of NOW's evidence of the accused's guilt.

In this case the prosecution relied upon [insert number] items of evidence as supporting NOW's evidence. These were [identify evidence capable of supporting the unreliable witness's evidence].

[If there is a risk that the jury might mistakenly believe certain evidence to be supportive, add the following darker shaded section.]

There was other evidence given in this case that you might have thought at first glance could support NOW's evidence. This includes the evidence [broadly identify non-supporting evidence].

I direct you that this other evidence is not capable of supporting NOW's account, because [explain why the evidence is not capable of supporting, e.g. "it does not come from an independent source".]

[If the issue of mutual support has arisen, and there is a possibility of joint fabrication, add the following darker shaded section.]

You will see that the prosecution relies upon the evidence of [two/a number of] [allegedly] unreliable witnesses to support each other. The law accepts that unreliable witnesses can support each other in this way.

However, you may only accept their evidence as mutually supporting if you accept that their accounts are truly independent of each other. That is, you must accept that they did not put their heads together and fabricate their evidence. Otherwise, you must not rely on their evidence as providing any support for each other's accounts.

4.23 Prison Informer Warnings

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. A judge may be required to warn the jury about the potential unreliability of evidence that has been given by a "prison informer".
2. The duty to warn the jury about the potential unreliability of such evidence may arise under s 32 of the Jury Directions Act 2015.
3. This topic examines the need for a warning under s 32 and the content of such a warning.
4. A "prison informer" warning is a particular form of an unreliable evidence warning. This topic should therefore be read in conjunction with 4.21 Unreliable Evidence Warning.

Section 32 Unreliability Warning

When must a s 32 unreliability warning be given?

5. A judge must give a s 32 unreliability warning if:
    - A party in a jury trial requests such a warning;
    - The evidence in question is "of a kind that may be unreliable"; and
    - There are no good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32).
6. See Unreliable Evidence Warning for information concerning the first and third requirements.
7. In relation to the second requirement, Jury Directions Act 2015 s 31(d) states that evidence may be "of a kind that may be unreliable" if it is given by a "prison informer".

Who is a "prison informer"?

8. The term "prison informer" is not defined in the Jury Directions Act 2015. In cases considering the statutory predecessor to s 31(d), Evidence Act 2008 s 165(1)(e), the term was given its common law meaning (see, e.g. R v Ton (2002) 132 A Crim R 340, [34], [70]).

9. At common law, a "prison informer" is a prisoner who gives evidence of an oral confession or admission made by another prisoner while in custody (Pollitt v R (1991) 174 CLR 558; R v Ton (2002) 132 A Crim R 340, [34]).

10. The following witnesses were identified at common law as falling outside the "prison informer" category:

    - Prisoners who witness events that occur in prison ("prisoner witnesses") (R v Ton (2002) 132 A Crim R 340 (NSWCCA); R v Ali (No.2) (2005) 13 VR 257);
    - Prisoners who give exculpatory evidence of a confession or admission made by a person other than the accused (R v Ayoub [2004] NSWCCA 209);
    - Former prisoners who, after their release from prison, give evidence of a confession or admission made by the accused in prison (Marlow & Kelly v R (2001) 129 A Crim R 51 (Tas SC)).

11. Even though the witnesses listed above may not be "prison informers" (and thus not fall within the scope of s 31(d)), if their evidence is "of a kind that may be unreliable" a s 32 unreliability warning may nevertheless be required.[249] See the discussion of "Non-Listed Categories" in 4.21 Unreliable Evidence Warning for further information.

Being a prison informer is not conclusive

12. In rare and exceptional cases, a judge may have good reasons for not giving a warning despite the fact that the witness is a "prison informer" (R v Clark (2001) 123 A Crim R 506 (Heydon JA); Pollitt v R (1991) 174 CLR 558; R v Clough (1992) 28 NSWLR 396).

Content of the s 32 unreliability warning

13. A Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32 unreliability warning must:

    - Warn the jury that the evidence may be unreliable;
    - Inform the jury of matters that may cause it to be unreliable; and
    - Warn the jury of the need for caution in determining whether to accept the evidence and the weight to be given to it (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32).

14. See Unreliable Evidence Warning for information concerning the first and third requirements.

15. In informing the jury about the matters that may cause s 31(d) evidence to be unreliable (the second requirement), the judge should, where appropriate, refer to the risk factors identified in the common law cases (see below) (Robinson v R (2006) 162 A Crim R 88, [7]).[250]

16. In doing so, care must be taken if the accused is also a prisoner. In such cases the judge must avoid undermining the benefit of the presumption of innocence by portraying the accused as an unreliable witness (R v Ton (2002) 132 A Crim R 340 (NSWCCA); R v Robinson (No. 2) (1991) 180 CLR 531).

Risk factors identified at common law

17. At common law, a prison informer's evidence was regarded as inherently unreliable for the following reasons:

---

[249] This may be the case if, for example, that type of witness has a motive to distance him or herself from blame, by slanting his or her evidence to blame others (see, e.g. R v Ali (No.2) (2005) 13 VR 257).

[250] It may be "inappropriate" to refer to a risk factor recognised at common law where that factor clearly does not arise in the circumstances of the case.

- Prison informers (if convicted criminals) are of bad character;
- Evidence of an oral confession or admission is easily concocted;
- Prisoners may have a motive to concoct evidence if they believe that, in return for giving evidence, they are going to receive a benefit in terms of sentence, treatment or release on parole;
- The pressures of the prison environment may also create a motive to concoct evidence; and
- Where evidence is concocted, there will usually be no possibility of corroborating the accused's denial (Pollitt v R (1991) 174 CLR 558; R v Clough (1992) 28 NSWLR 396).

18. In addition, in some cases a prison informer may actually receive a benefit from giving evidence against the accused. This may affect the reliability of his or her evidence (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301; Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109; R v Sullivan [2003] NSWCCA 100).
19. Any identifiable benefit a prison informer has received or will receive from testifying will usually be a 'significant matter that may make the evidence unreliable' (see R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301; Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109; R v Sullivan [2003] NSWCCA 100).
20. A prison informer warning must be adapted to address the true dangers of the situation (Pollitt v R (1991) 174 CLR 558; Orman v R [2010] VSCA 246R).
21. It will normally not be sufficient to simply direct the jury to look for evidence from some other acceptable source which implicates the accused. Even if such evidence exists (which it usually will), its mere existence does not address the dangers posed by relying on the evidence of prison informers (Pollitt v R (1991) 174 CLR 558; Orman v R [2010] VSCA 246R).

Supporting evidence and informers

22. At common law, judges were generally required to warn the jury about the dangers of convicting on the uncorroborated or unsupported evidence of a prison informer (Pollitt v R (1991) 174 CLR 558).
23. It is now the case that a judge must not warn the jury about the dangers of convicting on the uncorroborated evidence of a prison informer (Evidence Act 2008 s 164(4)).
24. If a "supporting evidence" warning is to be of real use in this context, it must direct the jury to look for evidence which confirms the fact that the accused made a confession or admission to the witness (Pollitt v R (1991) 174 CLR 558).
25. An example of this would be evidence that establishes that the disputed material in the alleged confession is accurate, and that that material would not have been known to the witness if the alleged confession had not been made (Pollitt v R (1991) 174 CLR 558; R v Kuster (2008) 21 VR 407).
26. It is only in exceptional cases that a fellow prisoner can support the evidence of a prison informer (Pollitt v R (1991) 174 CLR 558).

Other directions about confessions and admissions

27. A s 32 prison informer warning is a warning about the reliability of alleged confessions or admissions.
28. In some cases, the jury may also need to be directed about the circumstances in which they can use evidence of alleged confessions or admissions (see 4.5 Confessions and Admissions).[251]
29. If a judge directs the jury on the use of a confession or admission allegedly made to a prison informer, it will often be appropriate to incorporate the s 32 warning into that direction.

[251] The jury may need to be told that they may only use an alleged confession or admission if they are satisfied that it was made by the accused, and that its substance is truthful (Burns v R (1975) 132 CLR 258).

Residual Duty to Warn

30. Under Jury Directions Act 2015, a judge must give a warning in the absence of a request if there are 'substantial and compelling' reasons to do so.

31. This may occur where neither party has requested a warning pursuant to s 32, but the judge considers that there are 'substantial and compelling' reasons for giving the warning (R v Stewart (2001) 52 NSWLR 301, [86],[94]; Singh v DPP (NSW) (2006) 164 A Crim R 284, [39]]; Kanaan v R [2006] NSWCCA 109, [130]; Robinson v R (2006) 162 A Crim R 88, [5]).

32. At common law, it was considered that a warning was required whenever a prison informer had given oral evidence of a confession or admission and that it was only in exceptional cases that a warning was not required (Pollitt v R (1991) 174 CLR 558).

4.23.1 Charge: Confession to Prison Informer

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This warning should be given where a "prison informer" has given evidence of an alleged oral confession or admission made by the accused whilst in custody, and a warning is required under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 32.

This warning incorporates a direction on confessions and admissions. For discussion of the content of that direction, see Confessions and Admissions.

If the accused is also a prisoner, great care should be taken to avoid saying anything that may undermine the presumption of innocence by portraying the accused as an unreliable witness.

Confessions to Prison Informers

In this case, you heard NOW's evidence that NOA confessed[252] that s/he had [describe the content of the confession].

Before you can use this evidence, you must accept two matters.

First, you must accept that the accused actually made the alleged confession in the terms described by NOW. That is, you must accept that NOA [insert relevant details, e.g. 'said to NOW "I killed NOV"'].

Secondly, you must accept that the accused's alleged confession was truthful. This requires you to accept that when NOA [insert relevant details, e.g. 'said "I killed NOV"'], s/he meant to confess to the crime of NOO,[253] and that that confession was honest.

In this case, the prosecution argued that NOA made the alleged confession, and that that confession was truthful. [Describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments.]

The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant defence arguments, e.g. "that NOA never made the confession" or "that while NOA did confess, his/her confession was not truthful because s/he was only boasting about having committed the offence"]. [Summarise relevant defence evidence.]

---

[252] This charge is drafted for use in cases involving confessions. If the case involves admissions, the terminology used throughout the charge should be modified.

[253] Name of Offence.

It is for you to determine, based on all of the relevant evidence, whether NOA did confess in the way NOW said s/he did, and whether that confession was truthful.

[If the evidence of the prison informer is the only evidence of one or more elements, add the following shaded section.]

You will remember my directions that the prosecution must prove its case beyond reasonable doubt. In this case, the only evidence that [identify relevant elements or facts in issue] is the evidence that [describe evidence of admission]. It follows that you cannot be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that [identify relevant elements or relevant facts in issue] unless you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, of the two matters I have described; that NOA made this confession and that it was true.

Warning

In considering NOW's evidence of NOA's alleged confession you must take into account the warning I will now give you. I must give you this warning because NOW is what is called a "prison informer".

The experience of the courts is that the evidence of a prison informer may be unreliable for a number of reasons.

Reasons for Unreliability

[Include any of the following matters that are significant in the circumstances of the case and which have been identified by the party when requesting the direction]

Bad character

The first reason for this unreliability relates to the character of prison informers. Prison informers are convicted criminals who were serving a sentence of imprisonment when the alleged confession was made. This means that they may be regarded as being of bad character. As people who are of bad character are generally thought to be less trustworthy than other people, you are entitled to be more cautious about accepting their evidence than you otherwise would be.

Motive to lie

The second reason why the evidence of prison informers is often unreliable is because prison informers often have a motive to distort the truth or to fabricate evidence.

This motive can arise due to the pressures of the prison environment, or due to a belief that, in return for giving evidence, they will obtain some kind of benefit from the authorities.

There was evidence in this case that [describe evidence of prison pressures, or of any actual or anticipated benefit to the informer in respect of sentencing, conditions of custody, or release on parole. If the witness stands to lose a particular benefit if s/he does not co-operate, explain this risk].

In addition, counsel for the accused argued that [refer to significant matters that should be taken into account despite the absence of evidence].

Ease of fabrication

The third reason why the evidence of prison informers is often unreliable relates to the ease with which an oral confession can be fabricated. While it can be easy for a prison informer to fabricate evidence of an oral confession, it can be much more difficult for an accused person to produce evidence to challenge a fabricated confession. [Describe evidence and arguments relating to the informer's capacity to fabricate evidence in the circumstances of this case.]

Warning

The law says that every jury must take the potential unreliability of a prison informer's evidence into account when considering that evidence.

You must take this potential unreliability into account in determining whether you accept NOW's evidence at all, and if you do accept it, in whole or in part, in deciding what weight to give to that evidence.

Supporting evidence

[If there is evidence capable of supporting the informer's evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In considering whether it is safe to rely upon NOW's evidence, you should have regard to any supporting evidence led in this trial that you accept.

By supporting evidence I mean evidence from a source that is independent of NOW, and which tends to show either that NOA actually made the alleged confession, or that NOA's alleged confession was truthful.[254]

In this case the prosecution relied upon [insert number] items of evidence as providing independent support for NOW's evidence. These were [identify evidence capable of supporting the evidence of the informer].

[If there is a risk that the jury might mistakenly believe certain evidence to be independent supporting evidence, add the following darker shaded section.]

There was other evidence given in this case that you might have thought at first glance could provide independent support for NOW's evidence. This includes [broadly identify non-supporting evidence].

I direct you that this other evidence is not capable of independently supporting NOW's account, because [explain why the evidence is not capable of supporting the witness, e.g. "it does not come from an independent source"].

[If the issue of mutual corroboration has arisen, and there is a possibility of joint fabrication, add the following darker shaded section.]

You will see that the prosecution relies upon the evidence of [two/a number of] potentially unreliable witnesses to support each other. The law accepts that such witnesses can support each other in this way.

However, you may only accept their evidence as supporting if you accept that their accounts are truly independent of each other. That is, you must accept that they did not put their heads together and fabricate their evidence. Otherwise, you must not rely on their evidence as providing the necessary support for each other's accounts.

If you find that there was independent supporting evidence, it may assist you in concluding that NOW is telling the truth. If you find that there was no [acceptable] supporting evidence, you should be less ready to act on NOW's evidence of that confession.

I remind you that you must exercise great caution before relying on the evidence of a prison informer.

This does not mean that you cannot rely on NOW's evidence, and find that NOA confessed in the way NOW described. Instead, it means you should not do so unless you have subjected the evidence to close and careful scrutiny and, having regard to the dangers that I have described, you accept its truth, and accept that it is safe to convict upon it, despite its potentially unreliable source.

[254] If only one of these matters in issue (for example, if the content of a conversation is conceded, but its characterisation as a confession is contested) then this charge should be adapted to reflect only the matter in issue.

"Markuleski Direction" prohibited in Victoria

1. In NSW it has been held that the case law on inconsistent verdicts (e.g. Jones v R (1997) 191 CLR 439) makes it desirable to supplement the separate consideration direction in "word against word" cases[255] with a direction that the jury should take into account any unfavourable assessment they have made of the complainant's credibility in relation to one count when assessing his or her evidence in relation to any other counts (R v Markuleski (2001) 52 NSWLR 82; R v RAT (2000) 111 A Crim R 360; R v Robinson (2000) 111 A Crim R 388. See also R v GAR [2003] NSWCCA 224).
2. In Victoria, such a direction is not allowed. Any rule of common law under which such a direction could be given has been abolished (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 44F–44G, as amended in 2017).

4.25 Alibi

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Introduction

1. An alibi is evidence that the accused was at another place at the time of the alleged offending. Such evidence is more particular than a bare denial of being at the place of the alleged offending (DPP v Debs [2002] VSC 79, [15]).
2. Victorian criminal practitioners have traditionally been cautious about running alibi defences (Dun v The Queen [2019] VSCA 43, [22]).
3. The admissibility of alibi evidence is regulated, in part, by the Criminal Procedure Act 2009. An accused must obtain leave of the court in order to give evidence of an alibi personally, or to call evidence in support of an alibi, if the accused has not given notice of alibi within 14 days of being committed for trial or, if that does not apply, within 14 days of receiving a copy of the indictment (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 ss 190(1), (2). See also DPP v Debs [2002] VSC 79, [11]–[12]).
4. The court must grant leave if it appears that the accused was not informed of the requirement to give notice (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 190(7)).
5. Ordinarily, the prosecution cannot lead evidence of a notice of alibi (DPP v Debs [2002] VSC 79, [18]).
6. Evidence rebutting an alibi is relevant and admissible as part of the prosecution case (Killick v The Queen (1981) 147 CR 565; R v Rich (Ruling No 13) [2008] VSC 520, [18]).
7. Where the prosecution had been informed of the alibi, the prosecution must generally call evidence rebutting the alibi before it closes its case. It is generally not appropriate to wait until after the accused has called evidence and seek to lead the evidence in rebuttal (Killick v The Queen (1981) 147 CR 565). While this rule does not apply if the prosecution learns of the alibi for the first time after it closes its case, Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 190 means that this situation will rarely arise.

[255] A "word against word" case is a case in which the only direct evidence of the commission of the offences is that of the complainant.

Directions about alibi evidence

8. Directions about alibi evidence are designed to deal with the risk that the jury will mistakenly think that:
    - the accused has the onus of proving the alibi; and
    - if the jury rejects the alibi, they will immediately conclude that the accused raised a false alibi to conceal his or her guilt (R v J (No 2) [1998] 3 VR 602; R v Juric (2002) 4 VR 411, [39]).
9. At common law, it was thought that these problems "will almost inevitably arise". However, there was no general rule the jury must be directed about these dangers. Instead, a direction was only required if there is an appreciable danger of the jury misunderstanding how the burden of proof operates (R v J (No 2) [1998] 3 VR 602; Dun v The Queen [2019] VSCA 43, [23]; R v Merrett [2007] VSCA 1, [17], [27]). Under the Jury Directions Act 2015, the need for a direction depends on whether a direction is sought and whether, despite the absence of any request, there are substantial and compelling reasons for giving the direction (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 12, 14, 16; Chaouk v The Queen [2022] VSCA 151). See 3.1 Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.
10. In Dun v The Queen [2019] VSCA 43, [22], the Court of Appeal outlined that an alibi direction may tell the jury that:
    - The accused has adduced evidence which, if accepted, shows that at the time the relevant offence was committed, he or she was elsewhere.
    - When an accused person puts forward evidence of alibi, the burden of proving the accused's guilt remains with the prosecution.
    - This means that the prosecution assume a burden of disproving the alibi. If the prosecution fails to satisfy you beyond reasonable doubt that the alibi evidence should be rejected, then you must acquit the accused.
    - If the prosecution satisfies you beyond reasonable doubt that the alibi evidence should be rejected, it does not follow that you necessarily must convict the accused. The burden remains with the prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt each element of the offence (see also R v Liewes, Unreported, 10 April 1997, Victorian Court of Appeal; King v The Queen (1986) 15 FCR 427; R v J (No 2) [1998] 3 VR 602).
11. Another form of alibi direction was quoted with approval by Ferguson CJ and Maxwell P in Pell v The Queen [2019] VSCA 186:

    > The Crown must establish beyond reasonable doubt that the accused was at X at the relevant time. The Crown cannot do so if there is any reasonable possibility that he was at Y at that time, as asserted by the alibi evidence. The Crown must therefore remove or eliminate any reasonable possibility that the accused was at Y at the relevant time, and also persuade you, on the evidence on which the Crown relies, that beyond reasonable doubt he was at X at that time (quoting R v Kanaan (2005) 64 NSWLR 527, 559 [135])

12. In some cases, it will be appropriate to direct the jury that rejection of an alibi cannot be used to support other evidence of guilt. Whether such a direction is necessary will depend on how the case is conducted and whether there is any risk of the jury misusing the alibi evidence (Sindoni v The Queen (2011) 211 A Crim R 187, [86]–[89]). In deciding whether there is such a risk, the court may take into account whether the alibi evidence was introduced by the defence, or by the prosecution in its obligation to call all relevant evidence, along with whether there was any risk of the jury thinking that the accused had induced the witnesses to give false evidence (see Chaouk v The Queen [2022] VSCA 151).

13. In other cases, evidence rebutting an alibi may also be relevant to show the accused deliberately created a false alibi. In that situation, the judge will need to consider whether the jury can use the creation of a false alibi as incriminating conduct evidence. This may depend on whether there is evidence to support a conclusion that the alibi was deliberately fabricated, rather than being a product of mistake by witnesses. The jury can only use fabrication of alibi against the accused where they are satisfied that the only reason for the fabrication is to deceive the jury (Killick v The Queen (1981) 147 CR 565; R v Juric (2002) 4 VR 411, [39]–[41]; R v Chan, Unreported, 12 March 1998, Victorian Court of Appeal; King v The Queen (1986) 15 FCR 427). See also 4.6 Incriminating Conduct (Post Offence Lies and Conduct).

14. The risk of the jury misusing their rejection of alibi evidence is enhanced where the jury is directed to look for evidence to support the complainant's evidence, where there is a long delay between the alleged offending and the trial or where there is other evidence relied on as lies constituting incriminating conduct evidence (R v J (No 2) [1998] 3 VR 602).

15. The need for an alibi direction will depend, in part, on whether the alibi covers the whole of the period of offending. Where the alibi does not cover the complete period of offending, there is a greater risk that the direction will be unnecessary and confusing (Dun v The Queen [2019] VSCA 43, [25]; R v Liewes, Unreported, 10 April 1997, Victorian Court of Appeal).

4.25.1 Charge: Alibi

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Note: This direction is designed for cases where the judge needs to direct the jury about both the risk of the jury reversing the onus of proof and the risk of treating the rejection of an alibi a basis for a conclusion of guilt. If the jury could use rejection of an alibi as evidence of incriminating conduct, this direction must be modified and further directions given in accordance with Jury Directions Act 2015 Part 4, Division 1.

I am now going to turn to the evidence on NOA's movements.

You heard evidence from [identify alibi witnesses] that, at the time of the alleged offending, NOA was [identify alibi]. Lawyers refer to this evidence as an alibi.

There are two directions you must follow about this alibi evidence.

First, you must remember that the prosecution bears the burden of proving NOA's guilt and alibi evidence does not change this. The defence does not have to prove the accused was elsewhere at the time of the alleged offending. The prosecution must prove the accused committed the offence and that the alibi does not cause you to have a reasonable doubt. In other words, the prosecution must eliminate any reasonable possibility that the alibi is true.

Second, if you reject the alibi evidence, that does not mean the accused is guilty. Rejecting an alibi does not add to the prosecution's case. It merely removes one barrier to you being satisfied the prosecution has proved the accused's guilt beyond reasonable doubt.

The prosecution must still satisfy you beyond reasonable doubt of each and every element of the offence charged. Rejection of the alibi will not fill any gaps in the prosecution's case. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the alibi evidence should be rejected, put it aside, then ask yourselves am I satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the elements of the offence are proved. If the answer is no, you must acquit the accused.[256]

[256] If the jury can use rejection of an alibi as incriminating post offence conduct, this paragraph should be modified or omitted.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments about the alibi evidence.]

5 Complicity

5.1 Overview

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Types of Complicity

1. A person may be liable for the criminal acts of another where they:
    - Agree to pursue a criminal enterprise with that person; or
    - Assist or encourage another person to commit an offence.
2. A person also commits an offence where they knowingly assist a person who has committed a serious indictable offence to avoid apprehension, prosecution, conviction or punishment.

Statutory Complicity (Victoria)

3. Crimes Act 1958 section 324 provides that a person is guilty of an offence as a secondary party when he or she is "involved in the commission of the offence". That phrase is exhaustively defined in section 323 as applying where a person:

    (a) intentionally assists, encourages or directs the commission of the offence;

    (b) intentionally assists, encourages or directs the commission of another offence where the person was aware that it was probable that the offence charged would be committed in the course of carrying out the other offence; or

    (c) enters into an agreement, arrangement or understanding with another person to commit the offence; or

    (d) enters into an agreement, arrangement or understanding with another person to commit another offence where the person was aware that it was probable that the offence charged would be committed in the course of carrying out the other offence

4. Paragraph (a) corresponds to the principles of aiding, abetting, counselling and procuring at common law and paragraph (c) corresponds to the principles of joint criminal enterprise. Paragraph (b) and (d) create extended forms of those offences, based on the accused being aware of the probability that a different offence would be committed in the course of carrying out the primary offence.
5. These statutory forms of complicity only apply to offences committed on or after 1 November 2014.
6. For more information on these four forms of complicity, see 5.2 Statutory Complicity (From 1/11/14) (From 1/11/14).

Common Law Complicity

Agreement to Pursue a Criminal Enterprise

7. At common law, when two or more people agree to pursue a criminal enterprise, each person will be liable for the criminal acts of the others to the agreement (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316; R v Stewart; R v Schofield [1995] 3 All ER 159; R v Tangye (1997) 92 A Crim R 545; Johns v R (1980) 143 CLR 108; R v McAuliffe (1995) 1883 CLR 108; Hartwick, Clayton and Hartwick v R (2006) 231 ALR 500).

8. Although many different terms were used to describe an agreement to pursue a criminal enterprise,[257] there were two distinct ways in which a person could be liable for taking part in such an enterprise:

    i) By taking part in a "joint criminal enterprise". This requires the accused to have agreed to pursue a criminal enterprise, to have participated in that enterprise in some way, and for a party other than the accused to have committed an offence within the scope of the agreement (see 5.3 Joint Criminal Enterprise (Pre-1/11/14)).

    ii) Where the offence committed was not planned by the accused, but was an "extension" of the common purpose of the parties. This required the accused to have agreed to pursue a criminal enterprise, for the accused to foresee the possibility that another party to the agreement would commit an offence other than those within the scope of the agreement, and for a party other than the accused to have committed the foreseen offence in the course of carrying out the agreement (see 5.4 Extended Common Purpose (Pre-1/11/14)).

Accessorial Liability

9. The common law also punished an accessory, who was a person who was linked in purpose with the person who committed the offence, and acted to bring about or render more likely the commission of the offence (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473; R v Russell [1933] VLR 59; R v Wong [2005] VSC 96; R v Phan (2001) 53 NSWLR 480). See 5.5 Aiding, Abetting, Counselling or Procuring (Pre-1/11/14).

10. An accessory may assist or encourage the person who commits the offence by:

    (a) Counselling or procuring the principal offender prior to that person committing the offence; or

    (b) Aiding or abetting the principal offender at the time that person commits the offence.

11. There is no need to prove the existence of an agreement between the accessory and the principal offender. The lack of an agreement is what distinguishes aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring from other forms of complicity (R v Lam & Ors (Ruling No 20) (2005) 159 A Crim R 448; R v Lowery & King (No 2) [1972] VR 560).

---

[257] Some of the terms used in the cases are "common purpose", "common design", "common enterprise", "joint enterprise", "joint criminal enterprise", "concert", "acting in concert" and "a plan" (R v McAuliffe (1995) 1883 CLR 108; R v PDJ (2002) 7 VR 612; R v Lao & Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129). In Likiardopoulos v R [2010] VSCA 344 and Arafan v R (2010) 31 VR 82, the Court of Appeal acknowledged the recurring problems of nomenclature in this area.

Assisting an Offender

12. A person commits an offence where they knowingly act to assist a person who has committed a serious indictable offence avoid apprehension, prosecution, conviction or punishment. This is the offence of being an "Accessory" (Crimes Act 1958 s 325). See 5.6 Assist Offender.

13. Unlike other forms of complicity, this is a discrete substantive offence that is committed after the principal offence is complete. It will therefore not be relevant in the majority of cases concerning complicit liability. It is included here for historical reasons, as a person who commits this offence was previously called an "Accessory after the fact".

Commonwealth complicity

14. Sections 11.2 (complicity and common purpose) and 11.2A (joint commission) of the Criminal Code (Cth) provide forms of derivative liability for Commonwealth offences.

15. Before the Criminal Code commenced, section 5 of the Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) deemed a person who aided, abetted, counselled, or procured the commission of the Commonwealth offence to have committed that offence. Section 5 also applied to any person who was knowingly concerned in or party to a Commonwealth offence being committed. Common law principles applied to establish liability under section 5.

16. Under section 11.2 of the Criminal Code, a person is taken to have committed an offence where their conduct aids, abets, counsels or procures the commission of an offence by another person.

17. The section codified the law of complicity for Commonwealth offences. It extends beyond the common law to cover circumstances where a person is reckless about a different offence being committed than the one they intended. For further information on the operation of s 11.2, see 5.7 Commonwealth Complicity (s 11.2).

18. Section 11.2A of the Criminal Code (Cth) provides for joint commission of Commonwealth offences and broadly corresponds to common law principles of joint criminal enterprise and extended joint criminal enterprise.

19. Section 11.2A applies to offences committed after 20 February 2010. Common law principles of joint criminal enterprise applied to offences committed before the Code was enacted; however, before section 11.2A was introduced, the Code lacked any provision extending criminal liability in circumstances involving an agreement to commit an offence. As such, this form of liability did not exist for Commonwealth offences between the Code's enactment in 1995 and its amendment in 2010 (Handlen v R; Paddison v R (2011) 245 CLR 282, [1]; see also Explanatory Memorandum, Crimes Amendment (Serious and Organised Crime) Bill 2009, Item 4).

20. Under section 11.2A, a person is taken to have committed a joint offence where:

    (a) they enter into an agreement with other(s) intending to commit an offence, and the conduct of one or more parties in accordance with the agreement constitutes an offence of the same type as that agreed to; or

    (b) they enter into an agreement with other(s) intending to commit an offence, being aware of a substantial risk that another party to the agreement would commit the offence charged in the course of carrying out the agreement, and it is unjustifiable to take that risk in the circumstances known to them.

21. For further information on the operation of s 11.2A, see 5.8 Commonwealth Joint Commission (s 11.2A).

Only Introduce Necessary Categories

22. The different types of complicity can be confusing for juries. Each category should be treated separately, and should only be introduced into a trial if it is necessary (R v Lao & Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129; R v Stokes & Difford (1990) 51 A Crim R 25).

23. If the prosecution has only sought to attribute responsibility to the accused in one particular way (e.g. as principals acting in concert), and the trial has proceeded entirely on that basis, the judge should not introduce the possibility of convicting the accused on a different basis (e.g. as aiders and abettors) in his or her summing up. This denies the accused the opportunity to meet the case against them, and will ordinarily result in a miscarriage of justice (R v Abbouchi & Allouche [2008] VSCA 171; R v Falcone [2008] VSCA 225; Arafan v R (2010) 31 VR 82).

24. The judge must clearly explain the differences between the different categories. The jury must be satisfied that the actions of the accused meet all the elements of one category. It is not permissible to run the types of complicit liability together (R v Totivan & Dale Vic CA 15/8/1996).

25. It will only be necessary to introduce the issue of complicity if the prosecution seeks to attribute the conduct of a principal offender to a co-offender, or if the identity of the principal offender is unknown (R v Tangye (1997) 92 A Crim R 545; Clough v R (1992) 28 NSWLR 396. See also R v Coombe Vic CCA 10/2/98).

26. Where the principal offender may be found guilty of a lesser charge, the jury may need to be directed about any viable bases of accessorial liability for those alternative verdicts (see, e.g. R v Nguyen [2010] VSCA 23).[258]

Order of Charge

27. The jury should consider whether an agreement to pursue a criminal enterprise has been established before they consider the issue of accessorial liability (R v Franklin (2001) 3 VR 9).

5.2 Statutory Complicity (From 1/11/14)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. This topic applies to offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1 November 2014. For offences alleged to have been committed before that date, see:
    - 5.3 Joint Criminal Enterprise (Pre-1/11/14)
    - 5.4 Extended Common Purpose (Pre-1/11/14); or
    - 5.5 Aiding, Abetting, Counselling or Procuring (Pre-1/11/14).

"Involved in the Commission of an Offence"

2. Sections 323 to 324C of the Crimes Act 1958 provide a statutory codification of the principles of complicity. It replaces and abolishes common law doctrines such as acting in concert, joint criminal enterprise, common purpose, extended common purpose and aiding, abetting, counselling and procuring (Crimes Act 1958 s 324C).

[258] The "viable" bases of accessorial liability may vary for each verdict. For example, while complicity on the bases of acting in concert or extended common purpose may be viable in relation to a verdict of murder, in some cases these forms of complicity may not be viable in relation to a verdict of manslaughter (see, e.g. R v Nguyen [2010] VSCA 23).

3. Instead, a person who is "involved in the commission of an offence is taken to have committed the offence and is liable to the maximum penalty for that offence" (Crimes Act 1958 s 324(1)).
4. A person is "involved in the commission of an offence" if he or she:
   (a) intentionally assists, encourages or directs the commission of the offence; or
   (b) intentionally assists, encourages or directs the commission of another offence where the person was aware that it was probable that the offence charged would be committed in the course of carrying out the other offence; or
   (c) enters into an agreement, arrangement or understanding with another person to commit the offence; or
   (d) enters into an agreement, arrangement or understanding with another person to commit another offence where the person was aware that it was probable that the offence charged would be committed in the course of carrying out the other offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 323(1)).
5. Subsection (a) replaces the common law doctrine of aiding, abetting, counselling and procuring, while subsection (c) replaces the common law doctrine of joint criminal enterprise. Subsections (b) and (d) replace the principles of extended common purpose with a new form of liability based on recklessness for secondary offences, which extend liability under subsections (a) and (c) respectively.

Primary and Derivative Liability

6. Consistent with the common law, different forms of liability are involved depending on which limb of s 324 is invoked.
7. Liability under s 323(1)(a) and (b) is derivative, whereas s 323(1)(c) and (d) create a form of primary liability arising from a type of agency (R v Rohan [2024] HCA 3, [36]; DPP v Gebregiorgis (2023) 71 VR 361, [58]).
8. In the case of s 323(1)(c) and (d), "[t]he things done… which are necessary to constitute the crime are attributed to all parties to the agreement and they are all equally guilty of the crime regardless of the part played by each in its commission. … [Section] 323(1)(c) should not be understood as permitting or requiring the parties to an agreement to commit the crime to be treated differently according to who did what" (R v Rohan [2024] HCA 3, [36]).
9. As discussed under Mentally Impaired Parties below, it is likely that the defence of mental impairment operates to excuse the principal offender's liability but does not affect the operation of derivative liability.
10. In contrast, defences such as self-defence or duress are inconsistent with derivative liability. Where the jury finds, in the trial of the secondary party, that the principal offender acted under duress or in self-defence, then the jury must find the secondary party not guilty of committing the offence. This does not prevent other bases of liability, such as conspiracy or incitement to commit the offence, where those inchoate offences are appropriate.
11. Where liability is derivative, if the secondary party and the principal offender are tried together, and the evidence against them is the same, the secondary party generally cannot be found guilty unless the principal offender is also found guilty (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316).
12. However, different verdicts between a principal offender and a secondary party will not always be inconsistent in a setting of derivative liability. For example, there may be sufficient evidence to prove that the secondary party assisted someone to commit the principal offence, but insufficient evidence to establish the identity of the principal offender (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316; R v King (1986) 161 CLR 423).
13. Evidence that another person has been convicted is not admissible against the accused (R v Kirkby [2000] 2 Qd R 57; Evidence Act 2008 s 91).

14. In some cases, the jury may be satisfied that the accused either committed the offence himself or herself or is liable as a secondary party, but cannot determine which. In that situation, the jury is entitled to convict the accused (Crimes Act 1958 s 324B).

15. This principle extends to the scenario where there are several accused tried together and the jury cannot determine which was the principal offender and which secondary offenders (see R v Lowery & King (No 2) [1972] VR 560; R v Phan (2001) 53 NSWLR 480; R v Clough (1992) 28 NSWLR 396; R v Mohan [1967] 2 AC 187).

Intentionally assisting, encouraging or directing

16. Under subsection (a) of the definition of "involved in the commission of an offence", the prosecution must prove that the accused either:

    - Intentionally assisted;
    - Intentionally encouraged; or
    - Intentionally directed the commission of the offence.

Assistance, encouragement and direction

17. The words "assists" and "encourages" reflect the common law complicity liability of "aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring" an offence, which was defined as intentionally assisting or encouraging the principal offender to commit that offence (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473).

18. At common law, it was not necessary (or sufficient) to show that the accused exerted control over the principal offender. In cases of assisting or encouraging, the principal offender would have acted voluntarily, breaking the causal link between the accused's alleged control of the principal offender and the commission of the offence (R v Franklin (2001) 3 VR 9). It is likely that this is equally true for complicity under the Crimes Act 1958.

19. The accused also does not need to have reached an agreement with the principal offender about the commission of the crime, which is a separate pathway to complicity liability covered by Crimes Act 1958 ss 323(1)(c) and (d). This was also true of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring at common law, where the accused merely needed to have provided encouragement or assistance to the principal offender (R v Oberbilig [1989] 1 Qd R 342; R v Nguyen [2010] VSCA 23).

20. Subsection (a) of the definition of involvement removes the distinctions which existed at common law between liability as an accessory before the fact and as a principal in the second degree. The jury will instead look at all of the accused's conduct, leading up to and at the time of the alleged offence to determine whether the accused intentionally assisted, encouraged or directed the commission of the offence.

21. The definition also omits the third form of aiding and abetting at common law, which consisted of intentionally conveying assent to and concurrence in the commission of the crime. As explained by Ormiston JA in R v Makin (2004) 8 VR 262, this was likely a form of encouragement, and so it did not need to be separately described (see also R v Phan (2001) 53 NSWLR 480; R v Al Qassim [2009] VSCA 192).

22. Where it is alleged that the accused "assisted" the principal offender, it is not necessary to prove that the principal offender was aware of the accused's assistance (R v Lam & Ors (Ruling No 20) (2005) 159 A Crim R 448).

23. Similarly, where it is alleged that the accused "encouraged" the principal offender, it is not necessary to prove that the primary offence was in fact encouraged (Crimes Act 1958 s 323(2)). See Effect of encouragement need not be determined below. While the Act does not contain a similar provision concerning the effectiveness of "assistance" or "direction", it may be assumed that it was because such a provision was not necessary (R v Novakovic [2019] VSC 339, [113]).

Presence at the commission of the crime

24. The Crimes Act 1958 abolishes any common law requirement that a secondary party must be physically present at the time of the commission of the offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 323(3)(a)). Physical presence is merely relevant as evidence to support a finding of assistance, encouragement or direction.

25. Mere presence at a crime is not sufficient by itself to found liability (R v Al Qassim [2009] VSCA 192; R v Makin (2004) 8 VR 262; R v Lam [2008] VSCA 109; R v Nguyen [2010] VSCA 23; Al-Assadi v R [2011] VSCA 111).

26. This is because, to be liable, a person must have assisted, encouraged or directed the principal offender in some way. A person who is simply present at the commission of a crime will usually not have offered such assistance or encouragement (see R v Makin (2004) 8 VR 262).

27. In some cases, however, the accused may assist or encourage the commission of a crime by being present. For example, by choosing to be present at the crime scene, the accused may provide moral support to the principal offender, or demonstrate a willingness to assist if required. Similarly, if the criminal offending was designed to be a public spectacle (such as an illegal prize fight), and drew support from the presence of observers, the accused's presence may be seen as having provided encouragement to the principal offender (R v Lowery & King (No 2) [1972] VR 560; R v Conci [2005] VSCA 173; R v Panozzo [2007] VSCA 245; R v Coney (1882) 8 QBD 534).

28. For the accused's presence to constitute assistance or encouragement, he or she must have done something more than simply be at the scene of the crime. The accused must, at some point, have said or done something which showed that he or she was linked in purpose with the principal offender, and thus contributed to the crime (R v Al Qassim [2009] VSCA 192; R v Nguyen [2010] VSCA 23).

29. The accused must have done something of a kind that can reasonably be seen as intentionally adopting and contributing to what was taking place in his or her presence (Al-Assadi v R [2011] VSCA 111).

30. Where it is alleged that the accused assisted or encouraged by being present at the scene of the crime, the judge should therefore tell the jury that mere presence is not sufficient. The judge should make clear that something more is required (R v Al Qassim [2009] VSCA 192; Al-Assadi v R [2011] VSCA 111).

31. The judge should clearly identify the additional matters beyond mere presence said to constitute assistance or encouragement (R v Al Qassim [2009] VSCA 192).

32. In determining whether the accused's presence assisted or encouraged the commission of the offence, the accused's conduct relating to the offence should be viewed as a whole. Things that the accused said or did prior to the commission of the offence may warrant the conclusion that the accused's presence made him or her complicit in the offence, by helping or encouraging the principal offender to commit the crime (R v Al Qassim [2009] VSCA 192).

Effect of encouragement need not be determined

33. Crimes Act 1958 s 323(2) provides that:

> In determining whether a person has encouraged the commission of an offence, it is irrelevant whether or not the person who committed the offence in fact was encouraged to commit the offence.

34. This preserves the position which existed at common law that it was not necessary to prove that the principal offender was aware of the accused's encouragement, nor was it necessary to prove that the principal offender was actually encouraged by the accused's words or actions (see R v Lam & Ors (Ruling No 20) (2005) 159 A Crim R 448).

35. However, it is likely that in "encouragement" cases the prosecution must still prove that the encouragement was communicated to the principal offender in circumstances such that s/he could have been aware of that encouragement (See R v Lam & Ors (Ruling No 20) (2005) 159 A Crim R 448).

Failure to Act

36. Ordinarily, the fact that the accused failed to act in a particular way will not be sufficient to prove that s/he assisted or encouraged the principal offender to commit the crime (R v Russell [1933] VLR 59).

37. However, where the accused is under a legal or ethical duty to act, a failure to do so may be evidence of encouragement or assent to the offending (see, e.g. R v Russell [1933] VLR 59; Ex parte Parker: Re Brotherson (1957) SR(NSW) 326).

38. The Crimes Act 1958 recognises, in section 323(3), that a person may be involved in the commission of an offence by "act or omission".

39. A duty to act may arise where the accused is in loco parentis to the victim (R v Russell [1933] VLR 59; R v Clarke and Wilton [1959] VR 645).

40. Where a person has a duty to act, s/he may be seen to have assisted or encouraged the principal offender if s/he fails to offer any protest to his/her conduct, or fails to offer any effective dissent (R v Russell [1933] VLR 59).

Intention

41. The prosecution must prove that D intentionally assisted, encouraged or directed the commission of the offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 323(1)(a)).

42. The accused's state of mind must be assessed at the time s/he gave the relevant assistance, encouragement or direction rather than at the time of the offence (White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342).

43. As at common law, proof of an intention to assist or encourage requires the prosecution to prove that the accused knew of, or believed in, the essential circumstances that establish the principal offence (R v Rohan [2024] HCA 3, [39], [68]; Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473).

44. The "essential circumstances" of an offence are the facts that will go to satisfying the elements of the offence (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473; Rohan v The King [2022] VSCA 215, [82]).

45. For mens rea offences, the "essential circumstances" include the principal offender's state of mind (R v Stokes & Difford (1990) 51 A Crim R 25; R v Lam & Ors(Ruling No 20) (2005) 159 A Crim R 448; R v Phan (2001) 53 NSWLR 480).[259]

46. For an offence such as murder, the accused must intend and know or believe that the principal will engage in conduct that will kill or cause at least really serious injury to the deceased (R v Novakovic [2019] VSC 339, [289], [291]; DPP v Gebregiorgis (2023) 71 VR 361, [57]).

47. In the case of murder, this means the prosecution must prove:

    - The secondary party knew or believed the principal offender was going to perform an act directed at the deceased with the intent necessary for murder; that is, an intent to kill or cause really serious injury;
    - With that knowledge or belief, the secondary party intentionally encouraged the principal to perform that act with the intent necessary for murder;

[259] For strict liability offences, while the accused must know the essential circumstances of the offence, s/he does not need to have any awareness of the principal offender's state of mind (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473).

- That act caused the death (DPP v Gebregiorgis (2023) 71 VR 361, [57]).

48. In a case where the accused assists the principal, believing the principal possesses an intention to cause really serious injury and also believing the principal will not cause that result, the accused will not be guilty of murder (R v Novakovic [2019] VSC 339, [296]).

49. The jury must consider what the accused knew at the time s/he assisted, encouraged or directed the principal offender, rather than at the time the principal offender committed the offence (R v Stokes & Difford (1990) 51 A Crim R 25).

50. The accused does not need to know that the principal offence is a criminal offence. It is sufficient if s/he intentionally assisted, encouraged or directed the conduct which constituted that offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 323(3)(b). See also Johnson v Youden [1950] 1 KB 544; Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473).

51. For the purpose of attributing criminal liability, an employee's knowledge cannot necessarily be imputed to an employer (Ferguson v Weaving [1951] 1 KB 814).

52. The accused must have actual knowledge or belief of the essential circumstances. It is not sufficient that he or she should have known of those circumstances, or failed to inquire about them (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473).

53. However, the failure of a person to make inquiries about the circumstances may be evidence that he or she was aware of the relevant facts (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473).

54. The accused must have intended to assist, encourage or direct the principal offender to commit the offence charged.[260] It is therefore not sufficient for the prosecution to prove that:

    - The accused had a general intention to assist crime (R v Clarkson [1971] 3 All ER 344; Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473; R v Tamme [2004] VSCA 165); or
    - That the accused intended to assist or encourage a significantly different offence (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473; Chai v R (2002) 187 ALR 436; R v Conci [2005] VSCA 173).

55. Even if the principal offence is one that does not require the principal offender to have had a particular state of mind when it was committed (i.e., a strict liability offence), the accused must still be shown to have intended to assist, encourage or direct the principal offender to commit that offence (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473; R v Tamme [2004] VSCA 165; R v Dardovski 18/5/1995 Vic CCA).

56. This may mean the prosecution must prove a higher state of knowledge in relation to a party charged on the basis of complicity than a person charged as a principal offender. For example, certain offences require proof that the conduct was committed against a child, without requiring proof that the principal offender was aware that the person was a child (see, e.g. Crimes Act 1958 s 49A, sexual penetration of a child under 12). A person cannot be convicted of intentionally assisting the commission of such offences unless the prosecution proves that the secondary party knew or believed that the person was a child (Rohan v The King [2022] VSCA 215, [82]–[83]).

57. However, for an offence like murder, it is sufficient that the secondary party acted with knowledge or belief that the principal had any of the states of mind necessary for murder. Liability under complicity for murder is not limited to a case where the secondary knows or believes that the principal intends to kill; knowledge or believe that the principal intends to cause really serious injury is also sufficient (DPP v Gebregiorgis (2023) 71 VR 361, [57]).

[260] However, see Divergence (below) for a discussion of liability on the basis of assisting, encouraging or directing a different offence from the one charged.

58. The operation of s 324B is complicated in cases where the prosecution relies on s 323(1)(a) and the prosecution must prove a higher state of knowledge of a secondary offender than the principal offender. As explained above, s 324B provides that the trier of fact may convict on the basis of being satisfied that the accused either committed the offence either as principal or as a secondary party, but cannot determine which. Where proof of commission as a secondary party requires a higher state of knowledge, s 324B is not available unless the prosecution proves that higher state of knowledge. As a practical matter, this means the prosecution must prove the higher state of knowledge if there is a possibility the jury might consider the accused to have been a secondary party under s 323(1)(a) rather than the principal. This should encourage the prosecution to clearly identify whether the accused is charged as principal or a secondary party under s 323(1)(a) (Rohan v The King [2022] VSCA 215, [61]–[64]). This issue does not arise, however, where the prosecution relies on complicity due to an agreement under s 323(1)(c) or (d), as there is no need to prove a higher state of mind than for the completed offence (see R v Rohan [2024] HCA 3).

Agreement, Arrangement or Understanding

59. Subsection (c) of the definition of "involved in the commission of an offence" covers the situation where the accused "enters into an agreement, arrangement or understanding with another person to commit the offence" (Crimes Act 1958 s 323(1)(c)).

60. This replaces the common law principles such as acting in concert, common purpose and joint enterprise (R v Rohan [2024] HCA 3, [36], [66]).

61. Offending as part of a group requires proof of three elements:

    i) That two or more people reached an agreement to do certain acts or omissions necessary to commit an offence;

    ii) That, in accordance with the agreement, one or more parties to the agreement performed all of the acts necessary to commit the offence charged, in the circumstances necessary for the commission of that offence; and

    iii) That the accused had the state of mind required for the commission of the relevant offence at the time of entering into the agreement (Crimes Act 1958 ss 323(1)(c), 324(1)–(2)); R v Rohan [2024] HCA 3, [34]; DPP v Gebregiorgis (2023) 71 VR 361, [61]).

62. For a time, it was thought that there was an additional element, that the accused performed an overt act as part of the agreement. This requirement existed at common law for joint criminal enterprise, but was not mentioned by the High Court in R v Rohan when identifying what needed to be proved under s 323(1)(c) (R v Rohan [2024] HCA 3, [31]. See also DPP v Gebregiorgis (2023) 71 VR 361, [61] and compare R v Semaan & Ors (Ruling 7) [2016] VSC 170).

Formation of agreement

63. For the first element to be met, the prosecution must prove:

    - That the accused reached an agreement, arrangement or understanding with others to do certain acts or omissions necessary to commit an offence; and
    - That the agreement, arrangement or understanding remained in existence at the time the offence was committed (R v Clarke & Johnstone [1986] VR 643; R v Lao & Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129).

64. As at common law, the agreement need not be express but may also be an "arrangement or understanding". It may be inferred from the surrounding circumstances or the conduct of the parties (R v Rohan [2024] HCA 3, [29]; R v Tangye (1997) 92 A Crim R 545; R v Clarke and Wilton [1959] VR 645; R v Jensen and Ward [1980] VR 196; Guthridge v R (2010) 27 VR 452).

65. The agreement must be to commit the criminal offence charged. This element will not be satisfied if the accused agreed to pursue some form of wrongdoing that is not criminal, or to pursue a different offence (see R v Taufahema (2007) 228 CLR 232).[261]

66. The content of the agreement should be identified by reference to the specifically agreed future acts or omissions (see R v Rohan [2024] HCA 3, [33]).

67. The parties do not need to have precisely agreed on the scope of the agreement. This element will be satisfied if they shared an agreement, arrangement or understanding to commit a particular criminal act, even if they disagreed on the purpose of that act (Gillard v R (2003) 219 CLR 1; R v Zappia (2002) 84 SASR 206; c.f. Collie, Kranz & Lovegrove v R (1991) 56 SASR 302).[262]

68. Where the prosecution alleges an agreement, arrangement or understanding between more than two accused, it may not be necessary to prove that all of the accused were parties to the same agreement. It may be sufficient for the prosecution to prove that there are relationships between the various accused which form a chain of agreements over a common subject matter (see, e.g. R v Lao & Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129).

Timing of agreement

69. The agreement need not have been formed far in advance of the offence. It may have been formed moments before the offence was committed (R v Tangye (1997) 92 A Crim R 545; R v Jensen and Ward [1980] VR 196; Guthridge v R (2010) 27 VR 452).

70. The fact that two people spontaneously decided to pursue the same course of action does not necessarily prove that they were acting pursuant to an agreement to commit a particular crime (R v Taufahema (2007) 228 CLR 232).

71. Two or more people may form an agreement that gives one of them the right to decide whether to commit a criminal act on any given occasion. Such an agreement will make all of the parties liable, even though they are not certain when the act will be committed (Miller v R (1980) 32 ALR 321).

Mentally Impaired Parties

72. At common law, a person who was mentally impaired because s/he did not realise that his/her acts were wrongful may still have been able to participate in an agreement to commit an offence. This allowed a court to find that such an agreement existed in determining the liability of secondary parties, as long the mentally impaired person was able to understand the nature and quality of the act to be performed (Matusevich v R (1977) 137 CLR 633; Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316).

73. Although it is not entirely clear, the better view appears to be that the same result follows under the Crimes Act 1958. The nature of the special verdict of not guilty because of mental impairment makes it consistent with a finding that the offence was committed.

74. The doctrine of innocent agent may also apply if the accused persuades a mentally impaired person to commit an offence (Matusevich v R (1977) 137 CLR 633).

[261] However, see Divergence (below) for a discussion of liability on the basis of an agreement, arrangement or understanding to commit a different offence from the one charged.

[262] The courts have noted that this can produce an agreement that is narrower than the purpose of any given party (Gillard v R (2003) 219 CLR 1; R v Zappia (2002) 84 SASR 206; c.f. Collie, Kranz & Lovegrove v R (1991) 56 SASR 302).

Cancellation or Completion of Agreement

75. The prosecution must prove that the agreement had not been called off before the offence was completed (R v Heaney & Ors [1992] 2 VR 531).

76. In some cases, the acts agreed to by the parties may be completed without achieving the intended purpose of the agreement. In this situation, a party to the agreement will not be liable for the later completion of that purpose by any of the other parties to the agreement (unless s/he agreed to such a variation of the original agreement) (R v Heaney & Ors [1992] 2 VR 531).

Commission of the agreed offence

77. The prosecution must prove that the person who performed the relevant criminal act had the state of mind necessary for the agreed offence (DPP v Gebregiorgis (2023) 71 VR 361, [62]).

78. In the context of group offending, the prosecution must also prove that the commission of the offence occurred in accordance with, or within the scope of, the agreement, arrangement or understanding.

Conduct outside the scope of the agreement

79. At common law, an issue often arose whether the crime committed was within the scope of the agreement formed between the parties (see, e.g. R v Jensen and Ward [1980] VR 196; R v PDJ (2002) 7 VR 612; R v Anderson [1966] 2 QB 110; R v Heaney & Ors [1992] 2 VR 531).

80. The scope of the agreement must be determined by considering the subjective beliefs of the participants at the time the agreement was formed, or at the time the parties agreed to vary the original agreement (R v Johns (1980) 143 CLR 108; R v McAuliffe (1995) 183 CLR 108).

81. The scope of the agreement includes any contingencies that are planned as part of the agreed criminal enterprise (R v Becerra (1976) 62 Cr App R 212).

82. The liability of the accused is based on his/her authorisation (express or implied) of the criminal acts. Even if the accused did not believe that those acts were likely to be committed, s/he will be liable if they were within the scope of the agreement (Johns v R (1980) 143 CLR 108; Chan Wing-Siu v R [1985] AC 186; Britten v R (1988) 49 SASR 47).

83. In some cases, the parties will have differed in their understanding of how the agreed crime was to be carried out, leading to arguments that the accused had not agreed to participate in the particular offence that was committed. In such cases, the jury must consider whether the use of the means adopted placed the offence outside the scope of the agreement, or alternatively, whether the use of those means was no more than an incident of carrying out the common agreement (Varley v R (1976) 12 ALR 347; R v Heaney & Ors [1992] 2 VR 531).

84. Where the agreement involves the use of violence, the jury may need to consider whether the perpetrator acted outside the scope of the agreement by unexpectedly using a weapon. This will depend on the facts of the case, the understanding of the parties, and the difference between the weapon used and the manner of violence intended (see Varley v R (1976) 12 ALR 347; R v Anderson [1966] 2 QB 110; Markby v R (1978) 140 CLR 108; Wooley v R (1989) 42 A Crim R 418; R v Heaney & Ors [1992] 2 VR 531).

85. Under the Crimes Act 1958, the focus is on whether the accused agreed, arranged or had an understanding with another person to commit the offence charged. If the offence committed varies from the offence agreed, then the case may be one of divergence (see below) and dealt with under subsections (b) or (d) of the definition, as appropriate.

Accused's mental state

86. As at common law, the prosecution must prove that at the time of entering the agreement, the accused had the state of mind required for the commission of the offence (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316; Likiardopoulos v R (2010) 30 VR 654).

87. This is different to the requirement that applies under s 323(1)(a) that the accused knew the essential circumstances of the offence, described above under the heading 'Intention'. This means the prosecution does not need to prove any greater level of knowledge or intention on the part of the person complicit by agreement than for the principal offender. In particular, for offences such as Crimes Act 1958 s 49A and Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981 s 71B, there is no need to prove that the accused knew, intended or was aware that the intended victim was a child (see R v Rohan [2024] HCA 3, [33]).

88. The parties to the agreement do not need to have realised that their acts would be criminal. This element will be satisfied if they agreed to perform acts which, in fact, are criminal (Crimes Act 1958 s323(3)(b); Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316; R v Cox & Ors [2005] VSC 255).

Divergence

89. Subsections (b) and (d) of the definition of "involved in the commission of an offence" address the situation where there is divergence between the offence originally assisted, encouraged, directed or agreed to, and the offence carried out.

90. In those situations, the accused will be liable for the new offence if he or she:

    - intentionally assisted, encouraged or directed a foundational offence; or
    - entered into an agreement arrangement or understanding to commit a foundational offence, and was aware that it was probable that the offence charged would be carried out in the course of committing the other offence (Crimes Act 1958 ss 323(1)(b), (d)).

91. Subsection (d) is more limited than the common law doctrine of extended common purpose. Under that doctrine, it was sufficient for the prosecution to prove that the accused foresaw the possibility that the other offence would be carried out (Johns v R (1980) 143 CLR 108; McAuliffe v R (1995) 183 CLR 108; Hartwick, Clayton and Hartwick v R [2006] HCA 58; R v Hartwick, Clayton and Hartwick (2005) 14 VR 125).

92. On the other hand, subsection (b) extends liability compared to the common law of "aiding, abetting, counselling and procuring", which did not include liability for a different offence that the accused knew would probably occur during the course of the assisted or encouraged offence.

93. The nature of the foundational offence may affect how the jury should be directed about the requirement that the charged offence be committed in the course of carrying out the foundational offence. In R v Novakovic, Croucher J noted that in some cases it may be appropriate to require the jury to consider whether the foundational offence was committed. In others, it will be sufficient to direct the jury to consider whether the charged offence was committed in the course of carrying out the foundational offence (R v Novakovic [2019] VSC 339, [10], [341], footnote 19).

94. It is likely, as a matter of statutory interpretation, that the word "probable" is an ordinary English word and it is a matter for the jury to give the word meaning. If necessary, a judge may suggest that "likely" is an acceptable synonym (see, e.g. Crabbe v R (1985) 156 CLR 464). If the jury requires further guidance, it may be permissible to explain that the word "probable" is used in contrast to what is merely "possible". When directing the jury, the judge should not equate the word "probable" with a "balance of probabilities" test.

Withdrawal

95. A person is not involved in the commission of an offence if he or she withdraws from the offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 324(2)). The Act does not codify the law of withdrawal, and the common law on this topic is preserved (Crimes Act 1958 Notes to s 324(2) and s 324C).

96. At common law, a person is not responsible for the acts of other parties to an agreement if s/he withdrew from the agreement prior to its completion (R v Lowery & King (No 2) [1972] VR 560). Under the Crimes Act 1958, withdrawal may be relevant to both group offending and also to complicity on the basis of assisting, encouraging or directing an offence.

97. The withdrawal must ordinarily have been expressly communicated to the other members of the enterprise. However, in exceptional circumstances it may be possible for an accused to have implicitly withdrawn from the agreement (White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342).[263]

98. The withdrawal must be accompanied by all action the accused can reasonably take to undo the effect of his/her previous encouragement or assistance. This may include informing the police (White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342; R v Tietie (1988) 34 A Crim R 438; R v Jensen and Ward [1980] VR 196).

99. An accused who seeks to withdraw from an agreement must make a timely and effective withdrawal. An accused will not escape liability merely by leaving the scene shortly before the offence is completed, or by attempting to withdraw when it is too late to stop the offence (White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342; R v Whitehouse [1941] 1 DLR 683; R v Rook [1993] 1 WLR 1005).

100. Similarly, a person is not taken to have withdrawn from an agreement merely because s/he has private feelings of regret, or wishes that s/he could stop the offence (R v Lowery & King (No 2) [1972] VR 560).

101. Where the accused has set in motion a chain of events leading to the commission of an offence, any attempts to withdraw from participation must be capable of effectively stopping the offending (White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342).

102. In some cases, the accused may reasonably believe that once s/he withdraws from the agreement, the other members will not pursue the original criminal act. In those circumstances, the accused may not need to take any additional steps beyond countermanding his/her original instructions or agreement (R v Truong NSW CCA 22/06/1998).

103. It is usually more difficult to withdraw from an agreement at the time of the offending than beforehand. Withdrawal at the time of the offending will usually require greater conduct to undo the effect of the previous agreement (see R v Becerra (1976) 62 Cr App R 212).

104. It is not necessary to consider the issue of withdrawal using principles of causation. While a principal who continues to offend despite the timely withdrawal from the agreement by other parties may be treated as an intervening cause, it is not necessary to do so. Such an approach is likely to lead to confusion (White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342; R v Tietie (1988) 34 A Crim R 438; R v Menniti [1985] 1 Qd R 250).

105. The issue of withdrawal only needs to be addressed if the defence has pointed to some evidence that shows that the accused unequivocally countermanded or revoked his/her previous agreement. The prosecution will then bear the onus of disproving this withdrawal (White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342; R v Croft [1944] KB 295; R v Rook [1993] 1 WLR 1005).

Availability of statutory complicity

106. A person may be liable for being involved in the commission of an offence in relation to both indictable and summary offences (Crimes Act 1958 s 324(1)).

[263] For example, where there is a spontaneous agreement to assault another person, an accused may be able to withdraw by ceasing to fight and walking away without expressly communicating to others involved in the assault (R v Mitchell and King (1998) 163 JP 75; R v O'Flaherty, Ryan and Toussaint [2004] 2 Cr App R 20).

107. At common law, it was recognised that secondary liability could be impliedly excluded for some offences (Mallan v Lee (1949) 80 CLR 198; Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473).

108. For offences committed on or after 1 November 2014, the question will be whether Crimes Act 1958 s 324 is impliedly excluded.

109. The section only expressly excludes one class of offence. Under section 324(3), liability is not imposed "on a person for an offence that, as a matter of policy, is intended to benefit or protect that person" (Crimes Act 1958 s 324(3)).

110. For example, a person under the age of 16 is not able to be involved with the commission of the offence of sexual penetration of him/herself (see, e.g. R v Whitehouse [1977] QB 868).

111. In addition, the beneficiary of a family violence restraining order cannot be prosecuted for assisting or encouraging the contravention of that order (see Family Violence Protection Act 2008 s 125).

112. The law recognises that a person cannot attempt to conspire or attempt to be a secondary party to an offence (whether under the principles of statutory complicity or common law complicity) (Franze v R (2014) 46 VR 856).

113. Conversely, it is possible for a person to be a secondary party to an attempted offence. This occurs, for example, when the person enters into an agreement to complete an offence and that agreement only produces an attempt at the contemplated offence. The distinction lies between a joint attempt, which is legally possible, and an attempt to agree, which is not (Franze v R (2014) 46 VR 856).

5.2.1 Charge: Statutory Complicity (Assisting, Encouraging or Directing)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This Charge has been designed for use in cases where the accused is charged with being involved in the commission of an offence under Crimes Act 1958 section 323(1)(a).

This charge is written on the basis that the prosecution alleges assistance, encouragement and direction as cumulative or alternative bases of liability. If only one of these bases is relevant, the charge should be adjusted accordingly.

NOA has been charged with the offence of NOO.[264] However, it has not been alleged that s/he personally committed the acts that make up that offence. Instead, the prosecution has alleged that s/he committed NOO by assisting, encouraging or directing [insert name of principal offender/s] to commit that offence. I must therefore direct you about when a person will be held responsible for assisting, encouraging or directing someone else to commit an offence.

In order to find NOA guilty of committing NOO by assisting, encouraging or directing, the prosecution must prove the following [three/four] elements:[265]

One – that NOA knew or believed someone was going to commit the offence of NOO. Throughout these directions, I will call the person who committed that offence the "principal offender".

Two – that, with that knowledge or belief, NOA intentionally assisted, encouraged or directed the principal offender to commit NOO.

[264] Name of Offence.

[265] If withdrawal is relevant, there are four elements. Otherwise, there are three elements.

Three – that the principal offender [identify acts necessary to commit NOO].

[If withdrawal is relevant, add the following shaded section.]

Four – that the accused did not effectively withdraw his/her assistance or encouragement prior to the offence being committed.

Before you can find NOA guilty of NOO, you must be satisfied that all of these elements have been proven beyond reasonable doubt.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Knowledge or belief

The first element the prosecution must prove is NOA knew or believed the principal offender was going to commit the offence of NOO.

The prosecution says that the principal offender was NO3P.

A person commits NOO when s/he:

[Describe all of the elements of the offence, explain those elements, and relate them to the facts.]

This means the prosecution must prove that NOA knew or believed that NO3P was going to [reiterate elements of the offence].

[If NOA may have committed the offence him/herself, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, you may not be sure whether NOA either [describe relevant offence] himself/herself, or assisted, encouraged or directed NO3P to do so. You do not need to resolve this question to reach your verdict. The law says that if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that NOA either committed the offence himself/herself, or assisted, encouraged or directed another person to commit the offence, you may find him/her guilty of NOO.

Assistance, Encouragement or Direction

The second element the prosecution must prove is that, with this knowledge or belief, NOA intentionally assisted, encouraged or directed the principal offender to commit NOO.

In this case, the prosecution argue that NOA assisted, encouraged or directed NO3P by [identify relevant prosecution evidence and arguments]. The defence deny this, and say [identify relevant defence evidence and arguments].

[If the prosecution argued that the accused assisted or encouraged the offender by his/her presence alone, add the following shaded section.]

You will note that in this case the prosecution did not allege that NOA said or did anything at the time of the offence to assist or encourage the principal offender. They alleged that s/he assisted or encouraged the principal offender simply by being present.

The law recognises that a person can intentionally assist or encourage the commission of an offence by being present at the commission of the offence. However, for this to be the case, you must find that NOA intended his/her presence at the crime scene to have encouraged or assisted the principle offender to commit NOO. It is not sufficient for him/her simply to have been there at the relevant time.

In determining whether NOA intended his/her presence at the commission of the offence to assist or encourage, you should view his/her conduct as a whole. You should look at his/her conduct before and at the time of the alleged offence, and consider whether s/he was linked in purpose with the principle offender in some way, and so contributed to the offence.

If you find that NOA was simply present when the offence was committed, then this element will not be met. However, if you are satisfied that NOA's presence at the commission of the offence was intended to assist or encourage the principal offender to commit the crime, then this element will be met.

[If not already done, identify the matters said to constitute assistance or encouragement.]

You do not need to be satisfied that NOA's words or actions caused the principal offender to commit the crime. A person can assist, encourage or direct someone to commit an offence even if that other person already intended to commit that offence.

You also do not need to be satisfied that the principal offender was actually assisted, encouraged or directed by NOA's conduct. As long as NOA makes an effort to assist, encourage or direct him/her, in circumstances in which the principal offender could have been assisted, encouraged or directed, then this element will be met. In other words, this element looks at what NOA did. You do not need to consider what effect this had on NO3P.

I also emphasise that NOO consists of more than just [identify physical elements of NOO]. For this element, the prosecution must prove that NOA intentionally assisted, encouraged or directed NO3P to perform those acts with the intent necessary for NOO. That is, [remind jury of fault elements of NOO].

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA assisted, encouraged or directed the principal offender to commit NOO that this second element will be met.

Causation

The third element is that NO3P [identify physical elements of NOO].

[Identify evidence and arguments that NO3P performed the physical elements of NOO.]

Withdrawal

[If withdrawal of the accused's assistance or encouragement is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused did not effectively withdraw his/her assistance, encouragement or direction prior to the offence being committed.

The law says that if a person is going to avoid liability by taking back his/her previous assistance, encouragement or direction, his/her withdrawal must be timely and effective. That is, s/he must do everything that s/he can reasonably do to undo the effect of his/her previous assistance, encouragement or direction, with enough time for his/her actions to be effective.

Whether the accused has taken all reasonable steps to undo the effect of his/her previous assistance, encouragement or direction is a question for you. You must apply your common sense and experience. For example, in some cases it will be enough for the accused to take back any tools he or she has provided for the commission of the crime, and to make it clear that if the principal offender commits the offence, s/he does so without the accused's approval or support. In some cases it may even be necessary for the accused to inform the police of the planned offence. It is important to emphasise that it is not for the defence to prove that the accused did everything reasonably possible to withdraw his/her previous assistance, encouragement or direction. It is the prosecution who must prove that the accused did not withdraw in a timely and effective manner.

In this case, the prosecution argued that the accused had not done everything s/he reasonably could to withdraw his/her previous assistance, encouragement or direction. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing that NOA's withdrawal was timely and effective. [Insert defence evidence and/or arguments.]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not already done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Defences

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert relevant directions.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of committing NOO by providing assistance, encouragement or direction, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA knew or believed that NO3P was going to commit NOO; and

Two – that, with that knowledge or belief, NOA intentionally assisted, encouraged or directed the principal offender to commit NOO; and

Three – that NO3P [identify acts necessary to commit NOO];

[If withdrawal is relevant, add the following shaded section.]

and Four – that NOA did not effectively withdraw his/her earlier assistance, encouragement or direction.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of NOO by providing assistance, encouragement or direction.

5.2.2 Charge: Statutory Complicity (Assisting, Encouraging or Directing with Recklessness)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This Charge has been designed for use in cases where the accused is charged with being involved in the commission of an offence under Crimes Act 1958 section 323(1)(b).

This charge is written on the basis that the prosecution alleges assistance, encouragement and direction as cumulative or alternative bases of liability. If only one of these bases is relevant, the charge should be adjusted accordingly.

The law says that if a person assists, encourages or directs another person to commit offence A, while aware that it is probable that offence B will be committed in the course of committing or attempting to commit offence A, then he or she may be responsible for offence B.[266]

[266] The judge may include the following example if it would assist: "For example, suppose a person, Mr Smith, wants to help another person, Mr Jones, rob a bank. Mr Smith is aware that Mr Jones has a vendetta against security guards and that, if any security guards are present, then he will probably shoot them. Mr Smith doesn't want any security guards shot, but he does want to help Mr Jones rob the bank. Mr Smith provides Jones with a car to use in his bank robbery. The bank robbery goes ahead, there is a security guard present and Mr Jones shoots him dead. In that situation, both Mr Smith and Mr Jones will be guilty of murder."

In this case, NOA has been charged with the offence of [insert charged offence]. However, it has not been alleged that s/he personally committed the acts that make up that offence. Instead, the prosecution has alleged that s/he committed [insert charged offence] by assisting, encouraging or directing [insert name/s of principal offender/s] to commit [insert assisted offence] while aware that it was probable that [insert name/s of principal offender/s] would commit [insert charged offence].

In order to find NOA guilty of committing [insert charged offence] by assisting, encouraging or directing, the prosecution must prove the following [four/five] elements:[267]

One – that NOA knew or believed someone was going to commit the offence of [insert assisted offence]. Throughout these directions, I will call the person who committed that offence the "principal offender".

Two – that with that knowledge or belief, NOA intentionally assisted, encouraged or directed the principal offender to commit [insert assisted offence].

Three – that the principal offender [identify acts necessary to commit the charged offence].

Four – that the accused was aware that it was probable that [insert charged offence] would be committed in the course of carrying out [insert assisted offence].

[If withdrawal is relevant, add the following shaded section.]

and Five – that the accused did not effectively withdraw his/her assistance or encouragement prior to the offence being committed.

Before you can find NOA guilty of [insert charged offence], you must be satisfied that all of these elements have been proven beyond reasonable doubt.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Knowledge or belief

The first element the prosecution must prove is that NOA knew or believed the principal offender was going to commit the offence of [insert assisted offence].

The prosecution says that the principal offender was NO3P.

A person commits [name of assisted offence] when s/he:

[Describe all of the elements of the offence, explain those elements, and relate them to the facts.]

This means the prosecution must prove that NOA knew or believed that NO3P was going to [reiterate elements of the assisted offence].

Assistance, Encouragement or Direction

The second element the prosecution must prove is that, with this knowledge or belief, the accused intentionally assisted, encouraged or directed the principal offender to commit [insert assisted offence].

The prosecution does not argue that NOA intentionally assisted, encouraged or directed NO3P to commit [insert charged offence]. Instead, the prosecution argues that s/he assisted, encouraged or directed NO3P to commit a different offence, [insert assisted offence].

In this case, the prosecution argue that NOA provided this assistance, encouragement or direction by [identify relevant prosecution evidence and arguments]. The defence deny this, and say [identify relevant defence evidence and arguments].

[267] If withdrawal is relevant, there are five elements. Otherwise, there are four elements.

[If the prosecution argued that the accused assisted or encouraged the offender by his/her presence alone, add the following shaded section.]

You will note that in this case the prosecution did not allege that NOA said or did anything at the time of the offence to assist or encourage the principal offender. They alleged that s/he assisted or encouraged the principal offender simply by being present.

The law recognises that a person can intentionally assist or encourage the commission of an offence by being present at the commission of the offence. However, for this to be the case, you must find that NOA intended his/her presence at the crime scene to have encouraged or assisted the principal offender to commit [insert assisted offence]. It is not sufficient for him/her simply to have been there at the relevant time.

In determining whether NOA intended his/her presence at the commission of the offence to assist or encourage, you should view his/her conduct as a whole. You should look at his/her conduct before and at the time of the alleged offence, and consider whether s/he was linked in purpose with the principal offender in some way, and so contributed to the offence.

If you find that NOA was simply present when the offence was committed, then this element will not be met. However, if you are satisfied that NOA's presence at the commission of the offence intentionally assisted or encouraged the principal offender to commit the crime, then this element will be met.

[If not already done, identify the matters said to constitute assistance or encouragement.]

You do not need to be satisfied that NOA's words or actions caused the principal offender to commit the crime. A person can assist, encourage or direct someone to commit an offence even if that other person already intended to commit that offence.

You also do not need to be satisfied that the principal offender was actually assisted, encouraged or directed by NOA's conduct. As long as NOA makes an effort to assist, encourage or direct him/her, in circumstances in which the principal offender could have been assisted, encouraged or directed, then this element will be met. In other words, this element looks at what NOA did. You do not need to consider what effect this had on NO3P.

I also emphasise that [insert assisted offence] consists of more than just [identify physical elements of assisted offence]. For this element, the prosecution must prove that NOA intentionally assisted, encouraged or directed NO3P to perform those acts with the intent necessary for [insert assisted offence]. That is, [remind jury of fault elements of assisted offence].

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA assisted, encouraged or directed the principal offender to commit [insert assisted offence] that this second element will be met.

Causation

The third element is that NO3P [identify physical elements of charged offence].

[Identify evidence and arguments that NO3P performed the physical elements of the charged offence.]

Aware of probability

The fourth element the prosecution must prove is that, at the time s/he assisted, encouraged or directed NO3P to commit [insert assisted offence], s/he was aware that it was probable that [insert charged offence] would be committed in the course of carrying out [insert assisted offence].

In other words, the prosecution must prove that NOA realised, at the time s/he assisted, encouraged or directed NO3P to commit [insert assisted offence], that it was probable that NO3P would [identify elements of charged offence]. These are the [insert number of elements] matters which the prosecution needed to prove in relation to the third element, along with proof that NOA believed it was probable that the principal offender would [reiterate fault elements of charged offence which are not mentioned in the third element].

[If further direction on the meaning of "probable" is required, add the following shaded section.]

The word "probable" is an ordinary English word. It would not be enough for NOA to have been aware that [insert charged offence] was merely "possible" in the course of carrying out [insert assisted offence]. Rather s/he must have been aware that [insert charged offence] was "probable" or "likely".

There is an important difference between this element and the third element. The third element looks at what happened following NOA's assistance, encouragement or direction. Has the prosecution proved that a person [identify physical elements of charged offence]? In contrast, this element looks at what NOA realised at the time s/he provided the assistance, encouragement or direction. Has the prosecution proved that s/he was aware that it was probable that someone would commit [insert charged offence]?

There is also an important difference between this element and the second element. The second element looks at whether NOA assisted, encouraged or directed others to commit [insert assisted offence]. For this fourth element, you are looking at a different offence. Has the prosecution proved that s/he realised that it was probable that someone would commit [insert charged offence] in the course of carrying out [insert assisted offence]?

[Identify relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Withdrawal

[If withdrawal of the accused's assistance or encouragement is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused did not effectively withdraw his/her assistance, encouragement or direction prior to the offence being committed.

The law says that if a person is going to avoid liability by taking back his/her previous assistance, encouragement or direction, his/her withdrawal must be timely and effective. That is, s/he must do everything that s/he can reasonably do to undo the effect of his/her previous assistance, encouragement or direction, with enough time for his/her actions to be effective.

Whether the accused has taken all reasonable steps to undo the effect of his/her previous assistance, encouragement or direction is a question for you. You must apply your common sense and experience. For example, in some cases it will be enough for the accused to take back any tools he or she has provided for the commission of the crime, and to make it clear that if the principal offender commits the offence, s/he does so without the accused's approval or support. In some cases it may even be necessary for the accused to inform the police of the planned offence.

It is important to emphasise that it is not for the defence to prove that the accused did everything reasonably possible to withdraw his/her previous assistance, encouragement or direction. It is the prosecution who must prove that the accused did not withdraw in a timely and effective manner.

In this case, the prosecution argued that the accused had not done everything s/he reasonably could to withdraw his/her previous assistance, encouragement or direction. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing that NOA's withdrawal was timely and effective. [Insert defence evidence and/or arguments.]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not already done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Defences

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert relevant directions.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of committing [insert charged offence] by providing assistance, encouragement or direction, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA knew or believed that NO3P was going to commit [insert assisted offence]; and

Two – that, with that knowledge or belief, NOA intentionally assisted, encouraged or directed the principal offender to commit [insert assisted offence]; and

Three – that NO3P [identify acts necessary to commit charged offence]; and Four – that NOA was aware that it was probable that [insert charged offence] would be committed in the course of carrying out [insert assisted offence]; and Five – that NOA did not effectively withdraw his/her earlier assistance, encouragement or direction.

[If withdrawal is relevant, add the following shaded section.]

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of [insert charged offence] by providing assistance, encouragement or direction.

5.2.3 Charge: Statutory Complicity (Agreement, Arrangement or Understanding)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This Charge has been designed for use in cases where the accused is charged with being involved in the commission of an offence under Crimes Act 1958 section 323(1)(c).

This charge refers to the accused entering into an "agreement". If the case is conducted on the basis of an "arrangement" or "understanding" then the charge should be modified accordingly.

NOA has been charged with the offence of NOO.[268] However, it has not been alleged that s/he committed that offence alone.[269] Instead, the prosecution has alleged that s/he committed it together with [insert names of co-offenders].

The law says that if a person agrees to commit an offence, then he or she may be responsible for that offence.

In order to find NOA guilty of committing NOO, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements:

[268] Name of Offence.

[269] If complicity is alleged as an alternative to acting as a sole offender, this sentence will need to be modified accordingly.

One – the accused agreed with other people[270] to perform the acts necessary to commit NOO, and that the agreement remained in existence when the offence of NOO was committed.

Two – that a party to the agreement performed the acts necessary to commit NOO.

Three – that, when NOA agreed to commit NOO, s/he [identify mens rea for NOO].

Before you can find NOA guilty of NOO, you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proven all three of these elements beyond reasonable doubt.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Agree to Commit NOO

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused agreed with other people to perform the acts necessary to commit NOO, and that this agreement remained in existence when the offence of NOO was committed.

There are two parts to this element. First, you must be satisfied that the accused agreed with at least one other person to perform the acts necessary to commit NOO.

The acts necessary to commit NOO are [identify relevant acts, based on the substantive offence].

People can make an agreement expressly. You can also infer that people made an agreement from the surrounding circumstances. You will recall what I have told you about inferences.[271]

[If the content of the agreement, or the parties' understanding of the content, is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

NOA must have agreed to perform the acts necessary to commit NOO. This element will not be satisfied if the accused agreed to pursue some other form of activity that is not criminal, or a different offence. However, you do not need to find that NOA and [identify relevant co-offenders] knew they were agreeing to commit a crime. This element will be satisfied as long as they agreed to do something which was, in fact, criminal.

Similarly, you do not need to find that all of the parties had the same purpose or intention when forming that agreement, or were all aware of the consequences of their actions. You do not even have to find that they all agreed on the precise terms of the agreement. For this element to be satisfied, you only need to find that they agreed to commit the particular criminal offence of NOO together.

An example is where two people agree to commit a bank robbery together, with one of them to buy the gun and give it to the other, who will use it at the bank to steal the money. If they carry out this plan, they would both be equally guilty of the crime of armed robbery.[272]

As part of this element, you must consider the scope of their agreement. What was within their plan, and what contingencies were part of the plan? The law recognises that people can agree to commit an offence, even if that was not their primary purpose. So, even if the parties were hoping to avoid committing NOO, and did not think it was likely, if they agreed to commit NOO if certain circumstances arose, then you should treat it as being within the scope of the agreement.

[270] This charge is based on cases involving multiple co-offenders. If there is only one co-offender, some of the sentences throughout the charge will need to be modified.

[271] This charge is based on the assumption that the judge has already instructed the jury about inferences. It will need to be modified if that has not been done.

[272] If the offence charged is armed robbery, a different example should be used.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that [specify parties] agreed to commit NOO. They alleged that this agreement was made [insert prosecution evidence about the formation of the agreement].

[If the defence denies that there was an agreement to commit an offence, add the following shaded section.]

The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

[If the defence does not deny that there was an agreement, but is contesting liability on other grounds, add the following shaded section.]

The defence does not deny that NOA agreed to perform the acts necessary to commit NOO, but argues [outline defence arguments, e.g. "that the accused had withdrawn from that agreement by the time the offence was committed"].

The second part of this element requires the prosecution to prove that the agreement remained in existence when the offence was committed. If there is a possibility that the agreement had been called off before the offence was committed, or that NOA had withdrawn from that agreement, then this first element will not be met.

[If withdrawal from the agreement is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the defence argued that, [while/even if] NOA had agreed to commit NOO, s/he had withdrawn from that agreement by the time the offence was committed. It is for the prosecution to prove that s/he had not done so.

The law says that if a person is going to withdraw from an agreement to commit an offence, his/her withdrawal must be timely and effective. That is, s/he must do everything that s/he can reasonably do to undo the effect of the previous agreement with enough time for his/her actions to be effective.

Whether the accused has taken all reasonable steps to undo the effect of the previous agreement is a question for you. You must apply your common sense and experience. For example, in some cases it will be enough for the accused to take back any tools he or she has provided for the commission of the crime, and to make it clear to the other parties that if they continue with the offence, they do so without his or her approval or support. In some cases it may even be necessary for the accused to inform the police of the plan.

It is important to emphasise that it is not for the defence to prove that the accused did everything reasonably possible to withdraw from the agreement. It is the prosecution who must prove that the accused did not withdraw from the agreement in a timely and effective manner.

In this case, the prosecution argued that the accused had not done everything s/he reasonably could to withdraw from the agreement. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing that NOA's withdrawal was timely and effective. [Insert defence evidence and/or arguments.]

[If it is alleged that the agreement, arrangement or understanding had been cancelled or completed*, add the following shaded section.*]

In this case, the defence argued that, while NOA did agree to commit NOO, that agreement had been [completed/cancelled] by the time the offence of NOO was committed. [Insert defence evidence and/or arguments.] The prosecution disputed this, alleging that the agreement remained in existence at the relevant time. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.]

It is important to emphasise that it is not for the defence to prove that the agreement had been [completed/cancelled]. It is the prosecution who must prove that the agreement had not been [completed/cancelled] by the time the offence was committed.

[If the continuing existence of the agreement, arrangement or understanding is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, it is not disputed that, if NOA had agreed to commit NOO, that agreement remained in existence at the time the offence was committed. The main issue is [outline main issue[s], e.g. "whether or not there was such an agreement"].

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused agreed to commit NOO, and that the agreement remained in existence when the offence of NOO was committed, that this first element will be met.

Commission of NOO

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that, in accordance with their agreement, one or more parties to the agreement performed the acts necessary to commit NOO.

These are the same acts I told you about as part of the first element. To be clear, the prosecution must prove that a party to the agreement [identify relevant acts].

In this case the prosecution alleged that [describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Accused's Mental State

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused, when s/he agreed to commit NOO, [identify mens rea for NOO].

In this case, the prosecution alleged that [describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Uncertainty about whether accused committed offence as principal or secondary party

[If NOA may have committed the offence him/herself, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, you may not be sure whether NOA [describe relevant acts] himself/herself, or whether another party to the agreement did so. You do not need to resolve this question to reach your verdict. The law says that if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that NOA either committed the offence himself/herself, or agreed with another person to commit the offence, you may find him/her guilty of NOO.

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not already done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Defences

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert relevant directions.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of NOO, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused agreed with other people to perform the acts necessary to commit NOO, and that the agreement remained in existence when the offence of NOO was committed.

Two – that the parties to the agreement, between them, performed the acts necessary to commit NOO.

Three – that, when s/he agreed to commit NOO, s/he [identify mens rea for NOO].

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of committing NOO.

5.2.4 Charge: Statutory Complicity (Agreement, Arrangement or Understanding with Recklessness)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Note: This charge has not yet been updated in response to R v Rohan [2024] HCA 3. It must be used with caution and may need to be modified.

This Charge has been designed for use in cases where the accused is charged with being involved in the commission of an offence under Crimes Act 1958 section 323(1)(d).

This charge refers to the accused entering into an "agreement". If the case is conducted on the basis of an "arrangement" or "understanding" then the charge should be modified accordingly.

In this case, NOA has been charged with the offence of [insert charged offence]. However, it has not been alleged that s/he committed that offence alone.[273] Instead, the prosecution has alleged that s/he committed it together with [insert names of co-offenders].

The prosecution case is that NOA and [identify relevant co-offenders] agreed to commit [insert agreed offence] and, in the course of [committing/attempting to commit] that offence, [identify relevant co-offender(s)] committed [insert agreed offence].

In order to find NOA guilty of committing [insert charged offence], the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements:

One – the accused agreed with other people[274] to perform the acts necessary to commit [insert agreed offence], and that the agreement remained in existence when the offence of [insert charged offence] was committed.

Two – that a party to the agreement committed [insert charged offence] in the course of carrying out the agreement to perform the acts necessary to commit [insert agreed offence].

Three – that, when NOA agreed to perform the acts necessary to commit [insert agreed offence], s/he [identify mens rea for agreed offence].

Four – that, when NOA agreed to perform the acts necessary to commit [insert agreed offence], s/he was aware that it was probable that [insert charged offence] would be committed in the course of attempting to carry out the agreement.

Before you can find NOA guilty of [insert charged offence], you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proven all four of these elements beyond reasonable doubt.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

[273] If complicity is alleged as an alternative to acting as a sole offender, this sentence will need to be modified accordingly.

[274] This charge is based on cases involving multiple co-offenders. If there is only one co-offender, some of the sentences throughout the charge will need to be modified.

Agreement to Commit Offence

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused agreed with other people to perform the acts necessary to commit [insert agreed offence], and that the agreement remained in existence when the offence of [insert charged offence] was committed.

There are two parts to this element. First, you must be satisfied that the accused agreed with at least one other person to perform the acts necessary to commit [insert agreed offence].

A person can agree to commit an offence expressly, or you may infer that s/he agreed to commit [insert agreed offence] from the surrounding circumstances. You will recall what I have told you about inferences.[275]

[If the content of the agreement, or the parties' understanding of the content, is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

NOA must have agreed to perform the acts necessary to commit [insert agreed offence]. This element will not be satisfied if the accused agreed to pursue some other form of activity that is not criminal. However, you do not need to find that NOA and [identify relevant co-offenders] knew they were agreeing to commit a crime. This element will be satisfied as long as they agreed to do something which was, in fact, criminal.

Similarly, you do not need to find that all of the parties had the same purpose or intention when forming that agreement, or were all aware of the consequences of their actions. You do not even have to find that they all agreed on the precise terms of the agreement. For this element to be satisfied, you only need to find that they agreed to commit the particular criminal offence of [insert agreed offence] together.

An example is where two people agree to commit a bank robbery together, with one of them to buy the gun and give it to the other, who will use it at the bank to steal the money. Each of the two people would have agreed to perform the acts necessary to commit armed robbery.[276]

It is not necessary that the parties agreed to commit [insert charged offence]. For the prosecution to establish liability on this basis, the prosecution must prove that NOA and others agreed to commit [insert agreed offence].

In this case, the prosecution alleged that [specify parties] agreed to perform the acts necessary to commit [insert agreed offence]. They alleged that this agreement was made [insert prosecution evidence about the formation of the agreement].

[If the defence denies that there was an agreement to commit an offence, add the following shaded section.]

The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

[If the defence does not deny that there was an agreement, but is contesting liability on other grounds, add the following shaded section.]

The defence does not deny that NOA agreed to perform the acts necessary to commit [insert agreed offence], but argues [outline defence arguments, e.g. "that the accused had withdrawn from that agreement by the time the offence was committed"].

[275] This charge is based on the assumption that the judge has already instructed the jury about inferences. It will need to be modified if that has not been done.

[276] If the agreed or charged offence is armed robbery, a different example should be used.

The second part of this element requires the prosecution to prove that the agreement remained in existence when the offence was committed. If there is a possibility that the agreement had been called off before the offence was committed, or that NOA had withdrawn from that agreement then this first element will not be met.

[If withdrawal from the agreement is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the defence argued that, [while/even if] NOA had agreed to commit [insert agreed offence], s/he had withdrawn from that agreement by the time the offence was committed. It is for the prosecution to prove that s/he had not done so.

The law says that if a person is going to withdraw from an agreement to commit an offence, his/her withdrawal must be timely and effective. That is, s/he must do everything that s/he can reasonably do to undo the effect of the previous agreement with enough time for his/her actions to be effective.

Whether the accused has taken all reasonable steps to undo the effect of the previous agreement is a question for you. You must apply your common sense and experience. For example, in some cases it will be enough for the accused to take back any tools he or she has provided for the commission of the crime, and to make it clear to the other parties that if they continue with the offence, they do so without his or her approval or support. In some cases it may even be necessary for the accused to inform the police of the plan.

It is important to emphasise that it is not for the defence to prove that the accused did everything reasonably possible to withdraw from the agreement. It is the prosecution who must prove that the accused did not withdraw from the agreement in a timely and effective manner.

In this case, the prosecution argued that the accused had not done everything s/he reasonably could to withdraw from the agreement. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing that NOA's withdrawal was timely and effective. [Insert defence evidence and/or arguments.]

[If it is alleged that the agreement had been cancelled or completed, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the defence argued that, while NOA did agree to commit [insert agreed offence], that agreement had been [completed/cancelled] by the time the offence of [insert charged offence] was committed. [Insert defence evidence and/or arguments.] The prosecution disputed this, alleging that the agreement remained in existence at the relevant time. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.]

It is important to emphasise that it is not for the defence to prove that the agreement had been [completed/cancelled]. It is the prosecution who must prove that the agreement had not had been [completed/cancelled] by the time the offence was committed.

[If the continuing existence of the agreement is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, it is not disputed that, if there was an agreement to commit [insert agreed offence], that agreement remained in existence at the time [insert charged offence] was committed. The main issue is [outline main issue[s], e.g. "whether or not there was such an agreement"].

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused agreed to commit [insert agreed offence], and that the agreement remained in existence when the offence of [insert charged offence] was committed, that this first element will be met.

Commission of Charged Offence

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that, in the course of performing the acts necessary to commit [insert agreed offence], a party to the agreement committed [insert charged offence].

There are also two parts to this element. First, you must be satisfied that a party to the agreement committed [insert charged offence]. This means that you must find that all of the following matters have been proven beyond reasonable doubt:

[Describe all of the elements of [insert charged offence], explain those elements, and relate them to the facts.]

The second part of this element requires the prosecution to prove that a party to the agreement committed [insert charged offence] in the course of carrying out the agreement to perform the acts necessary to commit [insert agreed offence].

In this case the prosecution alleged that [describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is only if you are satisfied that the parties committed [insert charged offence], and that they committed this offence in the course of carrying out the agreement to perform the acts necessary to commit [insert agreed offence], that this second element will be met.

Accused's Mental State

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused had the state of mind necessary to commit [insert agreed offence] when s/he entered into the agreement.

That is, the prosecution must prove that NOA [describe relevant mens rea element] when s/he entered into the agreement.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA had the necessary state of mind. [Describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Aware of probability

The fourth element the prosecution must prove is that, when NOA agreed to perform the acts necessary to commit [insert agreed offence], s/he was aware that it was probable that someone would commit [insert charged offence] in the course of carrying out that agreement.

This element therefore looks at NOA's state of mind when s/he agreed to perform the acts necessary to commit [insert agreed offence]. To prove this element, the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that s/he was aware that it was probable that, in the course of carrying out the agreement, someone would commit [insert charged offence].

In other words, the prosecution must prove that NOA realised, at the time s/he made the agreement, that it was probable that a person would [identify elements of charged offence]. These are the same [insert number of elements] matters which the prosecution needed to prove in relation to the third element.

[If further direction on the meaning of "probable" is required, add the following shaded section.]

The word "probable" is an ordinary English word. It would not be enough for NOA to have been aware that [insert charged offence] was merely "possible" in the course of carrying out [insert agreed offence]. Rather s/he must have been aware that [insert charged offence] was "probable" or "likely".

There is an important difference between this element and the second element. The second element looks at what happened in the course of carrying out the agreement. Has the prosecution proved that a party to the agreement committed [insert charged offence]? In contrast, this element looks at what NOA was aware of at the time s/he made the agreement. Has the prosecution proved that s/he was aware that it was probable that someone would commit [insert charged offence]?

There is also an important difference between this element and the first element. The first element looks at whether NOA, together with others, agreed to perform the acts necessary to commit [insert agreed offence]. What did NOA and the others agree? For that element, you are not looking at whether NOA agreed to commit [insert charged offence]. For this fourth element, you are looking only at what was in NOA's mind. Was s/he aware that it was probable that someone would commit [insert charged offence]?

[Identify relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not already done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Defences

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert relevant directions.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of [insert charged offence], the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA agreed to perform the acts necessary to commit [insert agreed offence], and that the agreement remained in existence when the offence of [insert charged offence] was committed; and

Two – That a party to the agreement committed [insert charged offence] in the course of carrying out the agreement to perform the acts necessary to commit [insert agreed offence];[277] and

Three – That, when NOA agreed to perform the acts necessary to commit [insert agreed offence], s/he [insert mens rea of agreed offence]; and

Four – That, when NOA agreed to perform the acts necessary to commit [insert agreed offence], s/he was aware that it was probable that [insert charged offence] would be committed in the course of carrying out the agreement.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of committing [insert charged offence].

5.3 Joint Criminal Enterprise (Pre-1/11/14)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. This topic examines the common law principle of joint criminal enterprise. On 1 November 2014, that principle was abolished by the Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014. For offences committed on or after 1 November 2014, see 5.2 Statutory Complicity (From 1/11/14).
2. When two or more people commit an offence by pursuing a joint criminal enterprise, each person will be liable for the criminal acts of the others (R v Clarke & Johnstone [1986] VR 643; Gillard v R (2003) 219 CLR 1; R v Cox & Ors [2005] VSC 255).
3. To establish liability by way of pursuing a joint criminal enterprise, the prosecution must prove:

    i) That two or more people reached an agreement to pursue a joint criminal enterprise that remained in existence at the time the offence was committed;

    ii) That the accused participated in that joint enterprise in some way;

    iii) That, in accordance with the agreement, one or more parties to the agreement performed all of the acts necessary to commit the offence charged, in the circumstances necessary for the commission of that offence; and

[277] This summary will need to be modified to include the phrase "in the necessary circumstances" if one or more elements of the crime require the physical acts to be committed under certain conditions (e.g. for sexual penetration to be committed in the absence of the complainant's consent).

iv) That the accused had the state of mind required for the commission of the relevant offence at the time of entering into the agreement (R v Clarke & Johnstone [1986] VR 643; Johns v R (1980) 143 CLR 108; McAuliffe v R (1995) 183 CLR 108; R v Taufahema (2007) 228 CLR 232; Likiardopoulos v R (2010) 30 VR 654; Arafan v R (2010) 31 VR 82).

4. Liability under this basis is direct and is not affected by the prosecution accepting pleas to lesser offences from other parties to the enterprise (Likiardopoulos v R (2012) 247 CLR 265).

Difference Between Joint Criminal Enterprise and "Acting in Concert"

5. Previously, it was thought that "Joint Criminal Enterprise" and "Acting in Concert" were discrete forms of liability. The difference was said to be that "Concert" required proof of presence while "Joint Criminal Enterprise" required proof of participation. It is now recognised that the difference is only one of nomenclature and that there is no requirement to prove that an accused is present through the whole of the offending (Likiardopoulos v R (2012) 247 CLR 265; McAuliffe v R (1995) 183 CLR 108. See also R v Morgan [1994] 1 VR 567; R v Franklin (2001) 3 VR 9; R v Lao & Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129; R v Tangye (1997) 92 A Crim R 545; R v Cavkic [2005] VSC 182; Johns v R (1980) 143 CLR 108. C.f Likiardopoulos v R (2010) 30 VR 654; Smith, Garcia & Andreevski v R [2012] VSCA 5).

Agreement to Pursue a Joint Enterprise to Commit a Crime

6. For the first element to be met, the prosecution must prove:
    - That the accused reached an agreement with others to pursue a joint criminal enterprise; and
    - That the agreement remained in existence at the time the offence was committed (R v Clarke & Johnstone [1986] VR 643; R v Lao & Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129).
7. The agreement need not be express. It may be inferred from the surrounding circumstances (R v Tangye (1997) 92 A Crim R 545; R v Clarke and Wilton [1959] VR 645; R v Jensen and Ward [1980] VR 196; Guthridge v R (2010) 27 VR 452).
8. This element will also be met if there is an understanding or arrangement between the parties that amounts to an agreement (R v Tangye (1997) 92 A Crim R 545; R v Clarke and Wilton [1959] VR 645; R v Jensen and Ward [1980] VR 196; R v Lowery & King (No 2) [1972] VR 560; R v Nguyen [2010] VSCA 23).

Content of the Agreement

9. The agreement must be to commit a criminal offence. This element will not be satisfied if the accused agreed to pursue some form of wrongdoing that is not criminal (R v Taufahema (2007) 228 CLR 232).
10. The parties to the agreement do not need to have realised that their acts would be criminal. This element will be satisfied if they agreed to perform acts which, in fact, are criminal (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316; R v Cox & Ors [2005] VSC 255).
11. The parties only need to have agreed to pursue a criminal enterprise. They do not need to have had the same intention, nor do they need to have had the same awareness of the consequences of those acts (R v Matusevich & Thompson [1976] VR 470).

12. The parties do not need to have precisely agreed on the scope of the agreement. This element will be satisfied if they shared an understanding of a criminal act, even if they disagreed on the purpose of that act (Gillard v R (2003) 219 CLR 1; R v Zappia (2002) 84 SASR 206; c.f. Collie, Kranz & Lovegrove v R (1991) 56 SASR 302).[278]

13. Where the prosecution alleges a criminal enterprise between more than two accused, it may not be necessary to prove that all of the accused were parties to the same agreement. It may be sufficient for the prosecution to prove that there are relationships between the various accused which form a chain of agreements over a common subject matter (see, e.g. R v Lao & Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129).

14. The prosecution must precisely identify the offence to be pursued, as this may influence the course of the trial and the inferences that may be drawn about the scope of the agreement (R v Taufahema (2007) 228 CLR 232).

Timing of the Agreement

15. The agreement need not have been formed far in advance of the offence. It may have been formed moments before the offence was committed (R v Tangye (1997) 92 A Crim R 545; R v Jensen and Ward [1980] VR 196; Guthridge v R (2010) 27 VR 452).

16. The fact that two people spontaneously decided to pursue the same course of action does not necessarily prove that they were acting pursuant to an agreement to commit a particular crime (R v Taufahema (2007) 228 CLR 232).

17. Two or more people may form an agreement that gives one of them the right to decide whether to commit a criminal act on any given occasion. Such an agreement will make all of the parties liable, even though they are not certain when the act will be committed (Miller v R (1980) 32 ALR 321). See also 5.4 Extended Common Purpose (Pre-1/11/14).

Mentally Impaired Parties

18. A person who is mentally impaired because s/he does not realise that his/her acts are wrongful may still be able to participate in an agreement to commit a criminal act, as long as s/he is able to understand the nature and quality of the act to be performed (Matusevich v R (1977) 137 CLR 633; Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316).

19. The doctrine of innocent agent may also apply if the accused persuades a mentally impaired person to commit an offence (Matusevich v R (1977) 137 CLR 633).

Cancellation or Completion of Agreement

20. The prosecution must prove that the agreement had not been called off before the offence was completed (R v Heaney & Ors [1992] 2 VR 531).

21. In some cases, the acts agreed to by the parties may be completed without achieving the intended purpose of the agreement. In this situation, a party to the agreement will not be liable for the later completion of that purpose by any of the other parties to the agreement (unless s/he agreed to such a variation of the original agreement) (R v Heaney & Ors [1992] 2 VR 531).

[278] The courts have noted that this can produce an agreement that is narrower than the purpose of any given party (Gillard v R (2003) 219 CLR 1; R v Zappia (2002) 84 SASR 206; c.f. Collie, Kranz & Lovegrove v R (1991) 56 SASR 302).

Withdrawing From an Agreement

22. A person is not responsible for the acts of other parties to an agreement if s/he withdrew from the agreement prior to its completion (R v Lowery & King (No 2) [1972] VR 560).

23. The withdrawal must ordinarily have been expressly communicated to the other members of the enterprise. However, in exceptional circumstances it may be possible for an accused to have implicitly withdrawn from the agreement (White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342).[279]

24. The withdrawal must be accompanied by all action the accused can reasonably take to undo the effect of his/her previous encouragement or assistance. This may include informing the police (White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342; R v Tietie (1988) 34 A Crim R 438; R v Jensen and Ward [1980] VR 196).

25. An accused who seeks to withdraw from an agreement must make a timely and effective withdrawal. An accused will not escape liability merely by leaving the scene shortly before the offence is completed, or by attempting to withdraw when it is too late to stop the offence (White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342; R v Whitehouse [1941] 1 DLR 683; R v Rook [1993] 1 WLR 1005).

26. Similarly, a person is not taken to have withdrawn from an agreement merely because s/he has private feelings of regret, or wishes that s/he could stop the offence (R v Lowery & King (No 2) [1972] VR 560).

27. Where the accused has set in motion a chain of events leading to the commission of an offence, any attempts to withdraw from participation must be capable of effectively stopping the offending (White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342).

28. In some cases, the accused may reasonably believe that once s/he withdraws from the agreement, the other members will not pursue the original criminal act. In those circumstances, the accused may not need to take any additional steps beyond countermanding his/her original instructions or agreement (R v Truong NSW CCA 22/06/1998).

29. It is usually more difficult to withdraw from an agreement at the time of the offending than beforehand. Withdrawal at the time of the offending will usually require greater conduct to undo the effect of the previous agreement (see R v Becerra (1976) 62 Cr App R 212).

30. It is not necessary to consider the issue of withdrawal using principles of causation. While a principal who continues to offend despite the timely withdrawal from the agreement by other parties may be treated as an intervening cause, it is not necessary to do so. Such an approach is likely to lead to confusion (White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342; R v Tietie (1988) 34 A Crim R 438; R v Menniti [1985] 1 Qd R 250).

31. The issue of withdrawal only needs to be addressed if the defence has pointed to some evidence that shows that the accused unequivocally countermanded or revoked his/her previous agreement. The prosecution will then bear the onus of disproving this withdrawal (White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342; R v Croft [1944] KB 295; R v Rook [1993] 1 WLR 1005).

Jury Directions

32. As this area of law is complex, the judge should usually give an example when explaining the first element to the jury (R v Tangye (1997) 92 A Crim R 545).

---

[279] For example, where there is a spontaneous agreement to assault another person, an accused may be able to withdraw by ceasing to fight and walking away without expressly communicating to others involved in the assault (R v Mitchell and King (1998) 163 JP 75; R v O'Flaherty, Ryan and Toussaint [2004] 2 Cr App R 20).

Participation in the Joint Enterprise

33. For the second element to be met, the prosecution must prove that the accused participated in the joint enterprise in some way (R v Clarke & Johnstone [1986] VR 643; R v Lao & Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129; Likiardopoulos v R (2010) 30 VR 654; Arafan v R (2010) 31 VR 82).

34. This requires the accused to take some steps to further the criminal enterprise (R v Clarke & Johnstone [1986] VR 643; R v Lao & Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129; Likiardopoulos v R (2010) 30 VR 654; Arafan v R (2010) 31 VR 82).

35. It is thus not sufficient for the prosecution to simply prove that there was an agreement reflecting a common purpose. While proof of an agreement may be sufficient to prove conspiracy to commit an offence (see 6.1 Conspiracy to Commit an Offence (Victoria)), liability through joint criminal enterprise requires proof that the accused actually participated in the enterprise (Arafan v R (2010) 31 VR 82. See also Likiardopoulos v R (2010) 30 VR 654; R v Clarke & Johnstone [1986] VR 643).

36. It is not necessary that the accused acted illegally in furtherance of the criminal enterprise. A person may participate in a criminal enterprise by taking legal actions, such as purchasing property (see, e.g. R v Clarke & Johnstone [1986] VR 643; Arafan v R (2010) 31 VR 82).

Performance of the Necessary Acts

37. For the third element to be met, the prosecution must prove that:

    - In accordance with the agreement;
    - One or more of the parties to the agreement;
    - Performed all of the acts necessary to commit the offence charged;
    - In the circumstances necessary for the commission of that offence[280] (R v Clarke & Johnstone [1986] VR 643; Johns v R (1980) 143 CLR 108; McAuliffe v R (1995) 183 CLR 108; R v Taufahema (2007) 228 CLR 232).

38. The actions of all members of a joint criminal enterprise will be attributed to all other members of that enterprise (R v Clarke & Johnstone [1986] VR 643; Gillard v R (2003) 219 CLR 1).

39. The accused will only be liable for offences that were within the scope of the agreement. The jury must therefore determine whether the agreement extended to the commission of the offence charged (McAuliffe v R (1995) 183 CLR 108; R v PDJ (2002) 7 VR 612; R v Johns (1980) 143 CLR 108).

Acts Must have been Within the Scope of the Agreement

40. In some cases, in the course of pursuing the agreed crime a different offence will be committed. For the accused to be liable for that offence, the prosecution must prove that it was within the scope of the agreement (R v Jensen and Ward [1980] VR 196; R v PDJ (2002) 7 VR 612; R v Anderson [1966] 2 QB 110; R v Heaney & Ors [1992] 2 VR 531).

41. The scope of the agreement must be determined by considering the subjective beliefs of the participants at the time the agreement was formed, or at the time the parties agreed to vary the original agreement (R v Johns (1980) 143 CLR 108; R v McAuliffe (1995) 183 CLR 108).

[280] For example, in a rape case, the prosecution must prove that the complainant was not consenting at the time of the penetration. This is a "necessary circumstance" of the offence (rather than an action to be performed by the offenders).

42. If the participants' beliefs about the scope of the agreement differed, its scope will be confined to those beliefs that all of the participants shared (see, e.g. Gillard v R (2003) 219 CLR 1; R v Zappia (2002) 84 SASR 206).[281]

43. The scope of the agreement includes any contingencies that are planned as part of the agreed criminal enterprise (R v Becerra (1976) 62 Cr App R 212).

44. The liability of the accused is based on his/her authorisation (express or implied) of the criminal acts. Even if the accused did not believe that those acts were likely to be committed, s/he will be liable if they were within the scope of the agreement (Johns v R (1980) 143 CLR 108; Chan Wing-Siu v R [1985] AC 186; Britten v R (1988) 49 SASR 47).

45. In some cases the parties will have differed in their understanding of how the agreed crime was to be carried out, leading to arguments that the accused had not agreed to participate in the particular offence that was committed. In such cases, the jury must consider whether the use of the means adopted placed the offence outside the scope of the agreement, or whether the use of those means was no more than an unexpected incident of carrying out the common agreement (Varley v R (1976) 12 ALR 347; R v Heaney & Ors [1992] 2 VR 531).

46. Where the agreement involves the use of violence, the jury may need to consider whether the perpetrator acted outside the scope of the agreement by unexpectedly using a weapon. This will depend on the facts of the case, the understanding of the parties, and the difference between the weapon used and the manner of violence intended (see Varley v R (1976) 12 ALR 347; R v Anderson [1966] 2 QB 110; Markby v R (1978) 140 CLR 108; Wooley v R (1989) 42 A Crim R 418; R v Heaney & Ors [1992] 2 VR 531).

Accused's Mental State

47. The fourth element requires the prosecution to prove that the accused had the state of mind required for the commission of the relevant offence (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316; Likiardopoulos v R (2010) 30 VR 654).

48. The law is not entirely clear on when the accused must have this required state of mind. The better view appears to be that the accused must have the required state of mind at the time s/he entered into the agreement (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316; Hui Chi-Ming v R [1992] 1 AC 34; R v O'Flaherty, Ryan & Toussaint [2004] 2 Cr App R 20).

49. This is because the joint criminal enterprise principles only attribute criminal acts to the parties to the agreement, not criminal intentions. The jury must therefore separately assess the state of mind of each accused (R v Stewart; R v Schofield [1995] 3 All ER 159; Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316; R v Clarke & Johnstone [1986] VR 643; but c.f. R v Jensen & Ward [1980] VR 194).

50. In homicide cases, this can allow the jury to convict one party of murder and another party of manslaughter (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316; R v Howe [1987] AC 417; R v Stewart; R v Schofield [1995] 3 All ER 159).

51. Under this view of the law, the state of mind at the time of forming the agreement is deemed to continue unless the accused withdraws from the agreement. It is not enough that the accused has private feelings of regret or wishes that s/he could stop the offence (R v Lowery & King (No 2) [1972] VR 560; R v Becerra (1976) 62 Cr App R 212).

[281] If certain offences were in the contemplation of individual parties, but not within the shared beliefs of all of the parties, then those individuals may be liable under the doctrine of Extended Common Purpose.

Defences

52. The prosecution must disprove any defences that are open on the evidence (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316).

53. Defences must be separately disproved for each accused (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316).

54. This may legitimately lead to a result whereby one party to the agreement is found not guilty of an offence (e.g. due to self defence), while another party is found guilty of the same offence (e.g. because s/he could not rely on self-defence) (see, e.g. Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316).

Joint Criminal Enterprise and Attempt

55. The law recognises that a person cannot attempt to conspire or attempt to be a secondary party to an offence (whether under the principles of statutory complicity or common law complicity) (Franze v R (2014) 46 VR 856).

56. Conversely, it is possible for a person to be a secondary party to an attempted offence. This occurs, for example, when the person enters into an agreement to complete an offence and that agreement only produces an attempt at the contemplated offence. The distinction lies between a joint attempt, which is legally possible, and an attempt to agree, which is not (Franze v R (2014) 46 VR 856).

5.3.1 Charge: Joint Criminal Enterprise

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge only applies to offence committed before 1 November 2014.

NOA has been charged with the offence of NOO.[282] However, it has not been alleged that s/he committed that offence alone.[283] Instead, the prosecution has alleged that s/he committed it together with [insert names of co-offenders]. I must therefore direct you about what is called "joint criminal enterprise".

The law says that if two or more people are part of a "joint criminal enterprise" to commit an offence, then they will all be equally guilty of that offence, regardless of the role they played. This is one of the situations in which the law holds a person responsible for the actions of other people.

In order to find NOA guilty of committing NOO by a joint criminal enterprise, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements:

One – the accused made an agreement with other people[284] to pursue a joint criminal enterprise, and that the agreement remained in existence when the offence of NOO was committed.

Two – that the accused participated in the joint criminal enterprise in some way.

Three – that, in accordance with that agreement, the parties to the agreement between them performed all of the acts necessary to commit NOO.

[282] Name of Offence.

[283] If joint criminal enterprise is alleged as an alternative to acting as a sole offender, this sentence will need to be modified accordingly.

[284] This charge is based on cases involving multiple co-offenders. If there is only one co-offender, some of the sentences throughout the charge will need to be modified.

Four – that the accused had the state of mind necessary to commit NOO at the time of entering the agreement.

Before you can find NOA guilty of NOO by joint criminal enterprise, you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proven all four of these elements beyond reasonable doubt.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Agreement to Pursue a Joint Criminal Enterprise

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused made an agreement with other people to pursue a joint criminal enterprise, and that the agreement remained in existence when the offence of NOO was committed.

There are two parts to this element. First, you must be satisfied that the accused came to an understanding or arrangement amounting to an agreement with at least one other person to pursue a joint criminal enterprise.

Such an agreement, understanding or arrangement may be expressly stated, or it may be inferred from the surrounding circumstances. You will recall what I have told you about inferences.[285]

[If the content of the agreement, or the parties' understanding of the content, is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

The agreement must have been to commit a criminal enterprise. This element will not be satisfied if the accused agreed to pursue some other form of wrongdoing that is not criminal. However, you do not need to find that the parties to the agreement knew that the relevant enterprise would be criminal. This element will be satisfied as long as they agreed to do something which was, in fact, criminal.

Similarly, you do not need to find that all of the parties had the same purpose or intention when forming that agreement, or were all aware of the consequences of their actions. You do not even have to find that they all agreed on the precise terms of the agreement. For this element to be satisfied, you only need to find that they agreed to commit a particular criminal act together.

An example of such an agreement would be where two people agree to commit a bank robbery together, with one of them to buy the gun and give it to the other, who will use it at the bank to steal the money. If they carry out this plan, they would both be equally guilty of the crime of armed robbery.[286]

In this case, the prosecution alleged that [specify parties] made an agreement to [specify foundational crime]. They alleged that this agreement was made [insert prosecution evidence about the formation of the agreement].

[If the defence denies that there was an agreement to pursue a joint criminal enterprise, add the following shaded section.]

The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

[If the defence does not deny that there was an agreement, contesting liability on other grounds, add the following shaded section.]

---

[285] This charge is based on the assumption that the judge has already instructed the jury about inferences. It will need to be modified if that has not been done.

[286] If the offence charged is armed robbery, a different example should be used.

The defence does not deny that such an agreement was made, but argues [outline defence arguments, e.g. "that the accused had withdrawn from that agreement by the time the offence was committed"].

The second part of this element requires the prosecution to prove that the agreement remained in existence when the offence was committed. If there is a possibility that the agreement had been called off prior to that time, or that NOA had withdrawn from that agreement, then this first element will not be met.

[If withdrawal from the agreement is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the defence argued that, [while/even if] NOA had made an agreement to pursue a joint criminal enterprise, s/he had withdrawn from that agreement by the time the offence was committed. It is for the prosecution to prove that s/he had not done so.

The law says that if a person is going to withdraw from an agreement to pursue a joint criminal enterprise, his/her withdrawal must be timely and effective. That is, s/he must do everything that s/he can reasonably do to undo the effect of his/her previous agreement and participation, in sufficient time for his/her actions to be effective.

Whether the accused has taken all reasonable steps to undo the effect of his/her previous agreement is a question for you. You must apply your common sense and experience. For example, in some cases it will be sufficient for the accused to take back any tools he or she has provided for the commission of the crime, and to make it clear to the other parties that if they continue with the offence, they do so without his or her approval or support. In other cases it may be necessary for the accused to inform the police of the plan.

It is important to emphasise that it is not for the defence to prove that the accused did everything reasonably possible to withdraw from the agreement. It is the prosecution who must prove that the accused did not withdraw from the agreement in a timely and effective manner.

In this case, the prosecution argued that the accused had not done everything s/he reasonably could to withdraw from the agreement. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing that NOA's withdrawal was timely and effective. [Insert defence evidence and/or arguments.]

[If it is alleged that the agreement had been cancelled or completed, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the defence argued that, while NOA did make an agreement to pursue a joint criminal enterprise, that agreement had been [completed/cancelled] by the time the offence of NOO was committed. [Insert defence evidence and/or arguments.] The prosecution disputed this, alleging that the agreement remained in existence at the relevant time. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.]

It is important to emphasise that it is not for the defence to prove that the agreement had been [completed/cancelled]. It is the prosecution who must prove that the agreement had not had been [completed/cancelled] by the time the offence was committed.

[If the continuing existence of the agreement is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, it is not disputed that, if there was an agreement to pursue a joint criminal enterprise, that agreement remained in existence at the time the offence was committed. The main issue is [outline main issue[s], e.g. "whether or not there was such an agreement"].

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused made an agreement with other people to pursue a joint criminal enterprise, and that the agreement remained in existence when the offence of NOO was committed, that this first element will be met.

Participation

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused participated in the joint criminal enterprise in some way.

That is, the accused must have done something to contribute to that enterprise. It is not enough that s/he merely agreed that it should be carried out.

For this element to be satisfied, you need to find that NOA performed some conduct, either legal or illegal, that in some way contributed to the commission of the crime. It does not matter how important or unimportant those acts were to the completion of the enterprise, as long as s/he did something to assist.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA participated in the agreement by [insert prosecution evidence about NOA's participation]. The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Performance of the Necessary Acts

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that, in accordance with their agreement, understanding or arrangement, the parties between them performed all of the acts necessary to commit NOO.

There are also two parts to this element. First, you must be satisfied that all of the necessary acts were committed by parties to the agreement. This means that you must find that all of the following matters have been proven beyond reasonable doubt:

[Describe all of the elements of the offence other than the accused's mental state, explain those elements, and relate them to the facts.]

You do not need to find that each party to the agreement committed each of these acts. Even if they each only played a minor role, this part of the second element will be satisfied as long as all of the necessary acts were committed between the parties to the agreement.

The second part of this element requires the prosecution to prove that the commission of this offence was within the scope of the parties' agreement. That is, NOA and [identify co-offenders] must have agreed to commit the acts that constitute that offence. NOA will not be guilty of committing NOO by joint criminal enterprise if that offence was outside the bounds of what s/he had agreed to.

To determine what acts were within the scope of the agreement, you must consider the beliefs the parties held at the time they made that agreement. Whatever acts they all believed would or could be committed in the course of carrying out that agreement are to be treated as being within its scope.

[If the offence committed may not have been the primary purpose of the criminal enterprise, add the following shaded section.]

You will notice that I referred to acts that "would or could" be committed in the course of carrying out the agreement. This reflects the fact that the scope of an agreement includes any contingencies that are planned as part of that agreement. It is not limited to the acts the parties are definitely planning to carry out. So even if the parties were hoping to avoid committing a particular act, and did not think it was likely to be necessary, if there was a plan to perform that act if certain circumstances arose, then it should be treated as being within the scope of the agreement.

In this case the prosecution alleged that [describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is only if you are satisfied that the parties performed all of the acts necessary to commit NOO, and that the commission of this offence was within the scope of the parties' agreement, that this third element will be met.

Accused's Mental State

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused had the state of mind necessary to commit NOO when s/he entered into the agreement.

In this case, that means that NOA must have [describe and explain the relevant state of mind for the substantive offence].

NOA him/herself must have had that state of mind. It will not be sufficient for the prosecution to prove that one of the other parties to the agreement had that state of mind at the time of entering into the agreement.

[If withdrawal is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

As I explained to you earlier, in order to withdraw from a criminal agreement, a person must do everything that s/he can reasonably do to undo the effect of his/her previous agreement. It is not enough that NOA may have privately regretted the agreement or hoped that the offence would not proceed. Even if you find that NOA did have private regrets, you will still find this fourth element established if NOA had the state of mind necessary to commit NOO when s/he entered into the agreement. It is only if s/he made an effective withdrawal from the agreement that this "change of heart" could be relevant to this fourth element.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA had the necessary state of mind. [Describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Defences

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert relevant directions.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of NOO by joint criminal enterprise, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA was a party to an agreement to pursue a joint criminal enterprise, and that the agreement remained in existence when the offence of NOO was committed; and

Two – That NOA participated in the joint criminal enterprise in some way; and

Three – That, in accordance with the agreement, the parties between them performed all of the acts necessary to commit NOO;[287] and Four – That NOA had the state of mind necessary to commit NOO when s/he entered into the agreement.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of committing NOO by a joint criminal enterprise.

5.3.2 Checklist: Joint Criminal Enterprise

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused made an agreement with other people to pursue a joint criminal enterprise, and that agreement remained in existence when the offence was committed; and [287] This summary will need to be modified to include the phrase "in the necessary circumstances" if one or more elements of the crime require the physical acts to be committed under certain conditions (e.g. for sexual penetration to be committed in the absence of the complainant's consent).

2. The accused participated in the joint criminal enterprise; and

3. In accordance with the agreement, the parties to the agreement between them performed all the acts necessary to commit the offence; and

4. The accused had the state of mind necessary to commit the offence.

Criminal Agreement

1.1 Did the accused make an agreement with other people to pursue a joint criminal enterprise?

If Yes, then go to Question 1.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by pursuing a joint enterprise

1.2 Did that agreement remain in existence at the time the offence was committed?

Consider – Have the prosecution proved that the accused did not withdraw from the agreement in a timely and effective manner? Have they established that the accused had not done everything reasonably possible to withdraw from the agreement?[288]

If Yes, then go to Question 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by pursuing a joint enterprise

Participation

2. Did the accused participate in the joint criminal enterprise in some way?

Consider – Did the accused contribute to the commission of the offence?

If Yes, then go to Question 3.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by pursuing a joint enterprise

Performance of Agreement

3.1 Did the parties to the agreement between them, or a party to the agreement, other than the accused, perform all of the acts needed to commit the offence?[289]

If Yes, then go to Question 3.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by pursuing a joint

[288] This paragraph should be deleted if withdrawal from the agreement is not in issue.

[289] If a separate checklist outlining the elements of the offence is provided to the jury, it may be desirable to include a cross-reference to that checklist here, noting which elements of the offence must be proven for this element to be met.

enterprise

3.2 Was the offence within the scope of the agreement?

Consider – What beliefs did the parties hold at the time they made the agreement? Did they believe that the offence would or could be committed in the course of carrying out the agreement?

If Yes, then go to Question 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by pursuing a joint enterprise

---

State of Mind

4. Did the accused have the state of mind necessary to commit the offence, at the time s/he entered into the agreement?[290]

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of the offence charged (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1.1, 1.2, 2, 3.1 and 3.2)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by pursuing a joint enterprise

5.4 Extended Common Purpose (Pre-1/11/14)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. This topic examines the common law principle of extended common purpose. On 1 November 2014, that principle was abolished by the Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014. For offences committed on or after 1 November 2014, see Statutory Complicity.
2. The doctrine of "extended common purpose" applies to cases in which two or more parties reach an agreement to commit a crime (the "foundational crime"), and in the course of pursuing that agreement, one or more of the parties commit a different crime (the "charged offence"). The doctrine holds that any party to the agreement who foresaw the possibility that the charged offence would be committed when the agreement was carried out will be liable for that crime (Johns v R (1980) 143 CLR 108; McAuliffe v R (1995) 183 CLR 108; Hartwick, Clayton & Hartwick v R (2006) 231 ALR 500; R v Hartwick, Clayton & Hartwick (2005) 14 VR 125).
3. This is a form of liability for reckless participation in a criminal enterprise (R v Powell; R v English [1997] 3 WLR 959). The liability of the accused is based on his/her continued participation in the criminal enterprise, despite foreseeing the risk that other crimes would be committed as part of that enterprise (Gillard v R (2003) 219 CLR 1; R v Panozzo [2007] VSCA 245).
4. To establish liability by way of extended common purpose, the prosecution must prove:

   i) That two or more people reached an agreement to commit a crime (the foundational crime)

---

[290] If a separate checklist outlining the elements of the offence is provided to the jury, it may be desirable to include a cross-reference to that checklist here, noting which elements of the offence must be proven for this element to be met.

that remained in existence at the time the charged offence was committed;

ii) That in the course of carrying out the agreement, one or more of the parties to the agreement, other than the accused, committed the charged offence; and

iii) That the accused foresaw the possibility that one or more parties to the agreement would commit the charged offence when the agreement was carried out (McAuliffe v R (1995) 183 CLR 108; Hartwick, Clayton & Hartwick v R (2006) 231 ALR 500; R v Hartwick, Clayton & Hartwick (2005) 14 VR 125; R v Taufahema (2007) 228 CLR 232; R v Jones (2006) 161 A Crim R 511).

Agreement to Commit a Crime

5. For the first element to be met, the prosecution must prove:
    - That the accused reached an agreement with others to commit a crime; and
    - That the agreement remained in existence at the time the charged offence was committed (Hartwick, Clayton & Hartwick v R (2006) 231 ALR 500; R v Taufahema (2007) 228 CLR 232; [2007] HCA 11).
6. For information concerning this element (which is identical to the first element of joint criminal enterprise), see 5.3 Joint Criminal Enterprise (Pre-1/11/14).

Performance of the Necessary Acts

7. For the second element to be met, the prosecution must prove that, in the course of carrying out the agreement, one or more of the parties to the agreement, other than the accused, committed the offence charged (McAuliffe v R (1995) 183 CLR 108; Hartwick, Clayton & Hartwick v R (2006) 231 ALR 500; R v Hartwick, Clayton & Hartwick (2005) 14 VR 125; R v Taufahema (2007) 228 CLR 232; [2007] HCA 11; R v Jones (2006) 161 A Crim R 511).
8. The principles of extended common purpose should generally not be used if the charged offence was also the foundational crime. In that situation, a different form of complicity should be used instead (R v Stokes & Difford (1990) 51 A Crim R 25. See 5.2 Statutory Complicity (From 1/11/14) (From 1/11/14) or 5.3 Joint Criminal Enterprise (Pre-1/11/14) to determine the most appropriate form of complicity to use in such a case).
9. In some cases, it is permissible to direct using extended common purpose principles, even if the charged offence was the foundational crime (R v Mills, Sinfield & Sinfield (1985) 17 A Crim R 411; R v Mills (1986) 68 ALR 455).

Foresight of Accused

10. The third element requires the accused to have foreseen the possibility that one or more of the parties to the agreement would commit the charged offence when the agreement was carried out (McAuliffe v R (1995) 183 CLR 108; Hartwick, Clayton & Hartwick v R (2006) 231 ALR 500; R v Hartwick, Clayton & Hartwick (2005) 14 VR 125; R v Taufahema (2007) 228 CLR 232; [2007] HCA 11; R v Jones (2006) 161 A Crim R 511).
11. The accused does not need to have intended that the charged offence be committed. The prosecution only needs to prove that s/he foresaw the commission of the charged offence as a possible result of carrying out the criminal enterprise (Hartwick, Clayton & Hartwick v R (2006) 231 ALR 500).
12. The accused will be liable for crimes that s/he foresaw as possible. S/he does not need to have considered the commission of the charged offence to have been probable (Hartwick, Clayton & Hartwick v R (2006) 231 ALR 500).

13. The judge may tell the jury that the accused must have foreseen that the charged offence might result. If it is necessary to explain this further, it is permissible to tell the jury that this means that there was a real or substantial possibility that it would result (R v Hartwick, Clayton & Hartwick (2005) 14 VR 125).

14. It is not necessary to elaborate on the meaning of "possible" in every case (R v Hartwick, Clayton & Hartwick (2005) 14 VR 125).

15. The accused must not only have foreseen the possibility that the perpetrator would commit the relevant acts, but also that s/he might act with the requisite state of mind[291] and in the absence of any defences (Hartwick, Clayton & Hartwick v R (2006) 231 ALR 500; R v Hartwick, Clayton & Hartwick (2005) 14 VR 125; McAuliffe v R (1995) 183 CLR 108).

16. This form of liability considers the foresight of an individual accused. It is not necessary to prove that the offence was within the joint contemplation of the parties or was an agreed contingency (McAuliffe v R (1995) 183 CLR 108).

5.4.1 Charge: Extended Common Purpose

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge only applies to offences committed before 1 November 2014.

NOA has been charged with the offence of NOO.[292] However, it has not been alleged that s/he committed that offence him/herself.[293] Instead, the prosecution has alleged that NO3P[294] committed that offence, but that NOA should be held responsible for NO3P's actions. I must therefore give you some directions about when someone can be held responsible for the acts of another person.

The law says that if the accused makes an agreement with other people to pursue a criminal enterprise, and in the course of pursuing that enterprise one of the other people commits an offence which was not part of the agreement, the accused should be held responsible for that offence if s/he foresaw that it could happen. This is called the law of "extended common purpose". It makes the accused liable for continuing to participate in a criminal enterprise, despite foreseeing the risk that the offence would be committed.

In order to find NOA guilty of committing NOO by extended common purpose, there are 3 elements, all of which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt. I will list them for you and then explain each one in detail.

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused made an agreement with other people[295] to commit a criminal act, and that the agreement remained in existence when the offence of NOO was committed.

---

[291] If the charged offence has an objective fault element (e.g. manslaughter), the accused does not need to have foreseen any particular state of mind (Gillard v R (2003) 219 CLR 1; R v PDJ (2002) 7 VR 612).

[292] Name of Offence.

[293] If joint criminal enterprise is alleged as an alternative to acting as a sole offender, this sentence will need to be modified accordingly.

[294] Name of 3rd party (the alleged offender).

[295] This charge is based on cases involving multiple co-offenders. If there is only one co-offender, some of the sentences throughout the charge will need to be modified.

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that, in carrying out the agreement, a party to the agreement committed NOO.

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused foresaw the possibility that another party to the agreement would commit NOO when the agreement was carried out.

Before you can find NOA guilty of committing NOO by extended common purpose, you must be satisfied that all three of these elements have been proven beyond reasonable doubt.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Agreement to Commit Criminal Acts

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused made an agreement with other people to commit a criminal act, and that the agreement remained in existence when the offence of NOO was committed.

There are two parts to this element. First, you must be satisfied that the accused came to an understanding or arrangement amounting to an agreement with at least one other person to commit a criminal act together.

Such an agreement, understanding or arrangement may be expressly stated, or it may be inferred from the surrounding circumstances. You will recall what I have told you about inferences.[296]

[If the content of the agreement, or the parties' understanding of the content, is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

The agreement must have been to commit a criminal act. This element will not be satisfied if the accused agreed to pursue some other form of wrongdoing that is not criminal. However, you do not need to find that the parties to the agreement knew that the relevant act would be criminal. This element will be satisfied as long as they agreed to do something which was, in fact, criminal.

Similarly, you do not need to find that all of the parties had the same purpose or intention when forming that agreement, or were all aware of the consequences of their actions. You do not even have to find that they all agreed on the precise terms of the agreement. For this element to be satisfied, you only need to find that they agreed to commit a particular criminal act together.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that [specify parties] made an agreement to [specify foundational crime]. They alleged that this agreement was made [insert prosecution evidence about the formation of the agreement].

[If the defence denies that there was an agreement to commit a criminal act, add the following shaded section.]

The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

[If the defence does not deny that there was an agreement, contesting liability on other grounds, add the following shaded section.]

The defence does not deny that such an agreement was made, but argues [outline defence arguments, e.g. "that the accused did not foresee that NO3P would commit NOO"].

[296] This charge is based on the assumption that the judge has already instructed the jury about inferences. It will need to be modified if that has not been done.

The second part of this element requires the prosecution to prove that the agreement remained in existence when the offence was committed. If there is a possibility that the agreement had been called off prior to that time, or that NOA had withdrawn from that agreement, then this first element will not be met.

[If withdrawal from the agreement is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the defence argued that, [while/even if] NOA had made an agreement to commit a criminal act, s/he had withdrawn from that agreement by the time the offence was committed. It is for the prosecution to prove that s/he had not done so.

The law says that if a person is going to withdraw from an agreement to commit a criminal act, his/her withdrawal must be timely and effective. That is, s/he must do everything that s/he can reasonably do to undo the effect of his/her previous agreement, in sufficient time for his/her actions to be effective.

Whether the accused has taken all reasonable steps to undo the effect of his/her previous agreement is a question for you. You must apply your common sense and experience. For example, in some cases it will be sufficient for the accused to take back any tools he or she has provided for the commission of the crime, and to make it clear to the other parties that if they continue with the offence, they do so without his or her approval or support. In other cases it may be necessary for the accused to inform the police of the plan.

It is important to emphasise that it is not for the defence to prove that the accused did everything reasonably possible to withdraw from the agreement. It is the prosecution who must prove that the accused did not withdraw from the agreement in a timely and effective manner.

In this case, the prosecution argued that the accused had not done everything s/he reasonably could to withdraw from the agreement. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing that NOA's withdrawal was timely and effective. [Insert defence evidence and/or arguments.]

[If it is alleged that the agreement had been cancelled or completed, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the defence argued that, while NOA did make an agreement to commit a criminal act, that agreement had been [completed/cancelled] by the time the offence of NOO was committed. [Insert defence evidence and/or arguments.] The prosecution disputed this, alleging that the agreement remained in existence at the relevant time. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.]

It is important to emphasise that it is not for the defence to prove that the agreement had been [completed/cancelled]. It is the prosecution who must prove that the agreement had not been [completed/cancelled] by the time the offence was committed.

[If the continuing existence of the agreement is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, it is not disputed that, if there was an agreement to commit a criminal act, that agreement remained in existence at the time the offence was committed. The main issue is [outline main issue[s], e.g. "whether or not there was such an agreement"].

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused made an agreement with other people to commit a criminal act, and that the agreement remained in existence when the offence of NOO was committed, that this first element will be met.

Commission of the Offence

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that, when carrying out the agreement, understanding or arrangement, a party committed an offence.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NO3P committed the offence of NOO in the course of carrying out the agreement. So for this element to be met, you must be satisfied that NO3P committed all of the acts necessary for the commission of NOO with the necessary mental state.

I must therefore [direct/remind] you about those matters. A person commits NOO if s/he:

[Describe and explain all the elements of the offence charged, including any necessary state of mind and any relevant defences, and relate to the facts.]

If you are satisfied, based on all of the evidence,[297] that NO3P committed the offence of NOO, then this second element will be met.

Foresight of Accused

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that NOA foresaw the possibility that a party to the agreement would commit NOO. That is, s/he realised that someone might commit that offence in the course of carrying out the agreement.

For this element to be met, NOA does not need to have intended that NOO be committed, nor does s/he have to have thought that it was likely or probable that someone would commit that offence. It is sufficient if s/he thought it was possible.

In particular, s/he must have foreseen the possibility that:

[Again describe all the elements of the offence charged, including the relevant mental state and any defences.]

In reaching your conclusion, you will need to draw an inference about NOA's state of mind. You will recall what I have told you about inferences.[298]

The prosecution argued that NOA did foresee the possibility that NOO would be committed when the agreement was carried out. [Describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied that, arguing [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of NOO by extended common purpose, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA was a party to an agreement to commit a criminal act, and that the agreement remained in existence when the offence of NOO was committed; and

Two – That, in the course of carrying out the agreement, a party to the agreement committed the offence; and

Three – That NOA foresaw the possibility that, in the course of carrying out the agreement, a party to the agreement would commit the offence of NOO.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of committing NOO by extended common purpose.

[297] If the accused is being tried with the primary offender, and the evidence admissible for each co-accused differs, the judge may need to remind the jury to only consider the evidence that is admissible against this accused.

[298] This charge is based on the assumption that the judge has already instructed the jury about inferences. It will need to be modified if that has not been done.

5.4.2 Checklist: Extended Common Purpose

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused made an agreement with other people to commit a criminal act, and that agreement remained in existence when the offence was committed; and
2. While carrying out the agreement, a party to the agreement committed the offence charged; and
3. The accused foresaw the possibility that one of the parties to the agreement would commit that offence.

Criminal Agreement

1.1 Did the accused make an agreement with other people to commit a criminal act?

If Yes, then go to Question 1.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by extended common purpose

1.2 Did that agreement remain in existence at the time the offence was committed?

Consider – Have the prosecution proved that the accused did not withdraw from the agreement in a timely and effective manner? Have they established that the accused had not done everything reasonably possible to withdraw from the agreement?[299]

If Yes, then go to Question 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by extended common purpose

---

Commission of Offence

2. Did a party to the agreement commit the offence charged while carrying out the agreement?[300]

If Yes, then go to Question 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by extended common purpose

---

Foresight of Accused

3. Did the accused foresee the possibility that a party to the agreement would commit the offence

---

[299] This paragraph should be deleted if withdrawal from the agreement is not in issue.

[300] If a separate checklist outlining the elements of the offence is provided to the jury, it may be desirable to include a cross-reference to that checklist here.

charged?[301]

Consider – The accused does not need to have thought it was likely or probable that the offence would be committed. He or she only needs to have thought that it was possible that a party to the agreement would commit that offence in the course of carrying out the agreement.

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of the offence charged (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1.1, 1.2, 2)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by extended common purpose

5.5 Aiding, Abetting, Counselling or Procuring (Pre-1/11/14)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. This topic examines the principle of aiding, abetting, counselling and procuring prior to 1 November 2014. On 1 November 2014, those principles were replaced by the Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014. For offences committed on or after 1 November 2014, see 5.2 Statutory Complicity (From 1/11/14).

General Principles

Liability of a Person who Aids, Abets, Counsels or Procures

2. A person may be tried as a principal offender if s/he aids, abets, counsels or procures the commission of an indictable offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 323).[302]

3. A person who aids, abets, counsels or procures the commission of an offence commits that substantive offence. S/he does not commit a distinct offence of being an accessory (R v Wong [2005] VSC 96).

Meaning of "Aid, Abet, Counsel or Procure"

4. In Australia, the words "aid, abet, counsel or procure" may be read collectively, to describe a person who assists or encourages someone to commit an offence (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473; R v Wong [2005] VSC 96; Likiardopoulos v R (2010) 30 VR 654; [2010] VSCA 344; Arafan v R (2010) 31 VR 82; [2010] VSCA 356; R v Russell [1933] VLR 59; but c.f. Attorney-General's Reference (No 1 of 1975) [1975] QB 773).

[301] If a separate checklist outlining the elements of the offence is provided to the jury, it may be desirable to include a cross-reference to that checklist here, noting the need for the accused to have foreseen each of those elements.

[302] The situation in relation to summary offences is slightly different. Unlike Crimes Act 1958 s 323, which provides that a person who aids, abets, counsels or procures the commission of an indictable offence may be tried, indicted or presented and punished as a principal offender, Crimes Act 1958 s 324 provides that such a person will be liable to the same punishment as a principal offender. Despite this difference, many of the principles outlined in this commentary will be relevant to summary offences.

5. This requires the accused to be linked in purpose with the person who commits the offence (the "principal offender"), and to act to bring about or render more likely the commission of the offence (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473; R v Russell [1933] VLR 59; R v Wong [2005] VSC 96; R v Phan (2001) 53 NSWLR 480).

6. The prosecution does not need to prove that there was any agreement between the accused and the principal offender. The lack of an agreement is what distinguishes aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring from other forms of complicity (e.g. Acting in Concert, Joint Criminal Enterprise, Extended Common Purpose) (R v Lam & Ors (Ruling No 20) (2005) 159 A Crim R 448; R v Lowery & King (No 2) [1972] VR 560; R v Nguyen [2010] VSCA 23; Arafan v R (2010) 31 VR 82; [2010] VSCA 356).

Not Available for All Offences

7. Liability for aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring will be available in relation to all offences, unless specifically excluded or excluded as a matter of necessary implication (Mallan v Lee (1949) 80 CLR 198; Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473).

8. This type of liability will not necessarily be excluded by the fact that a particular offence may only be committed by a prescribed class of offenders. A person may aid, abet, counsel or procure an offence even s/he is incapable of committing that offence as the principal offender (Mallan v Lee (1949) 80 CLR 198; R v Goldie; Ex parte Picklum (1937) 59 CLR 254).

9. However, this type of liability may not be available where the accused is a member of a class the legislation is designed to protect (see, e.g. R v Whitehouse [1977] QB 868).[303]

10. This type of liability may also not be available where there is a separate and specific offence that deals with accessorial liability for a given offence (see, e.g. Ellis v Guerin [1925] SASR 282).

Elements

11. To establish liability by way of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring, the prosecution must establish:

    i) That the principal offence was committed;

    ii) That the accused knew the essential circumstances that establish the principal offence; and

    iii) That the accused intentionally assisted or encouraged the principal offender to commit that offence (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473).

12. The second and third elements may overlap. A person generally cannot intentionally assist or encourage a person to commit an offence unless s/he is aware of the essential facts that constitute the offence (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473).

13. The judge must clearly explain all of the principles involved in proving this form of liability, and relate them to the evidence. It is not sufficient to simply direct the jury that the accused must have intentionally aided, abetted, counselled or procured the commission of the offence (R v Abbouchi & Allouche [2008] VSCA 171).

[303] For example, a person under the age of 16 is not able to aid or abet the offence of sexual penetration of him/herself (see, e.g. R v Whitehouse [1977] QB 868). By contrast, in the absence of express provisions to the contrary, the beneficiary of a restraining order may be prosecuted for aiding and abetting the breach of that order (see, e.g. Keane v Police (1997) 69 SASR 481, but note Family Violence Protection Act 2008 s 125).

Commission of the Principal Offence

14. The first element requires the prosecution to prove, using evidence admissible against the accused, that the principal offence was committed (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473; R v Hewitt [1997] 1 VR 301; R v Demirian [1989] VR 97; R v Jensen and Ward [1980] VR 194; R v Tamme [2004] VSCA 165).

15. This requires the prosecution to prove that the principal offender committed the relevant criminal acts with the necessary criminal intention (R v Jensen and Ward [1980] VR 194).

16. If the accused and the principal offender are tried together, and the evidence against them is the same, the accused generally cannot be found guilty unless the principal offender is also found guilty (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316).

17. However, different verdicts between a principal offender and an accessory will not always be inconsistent. For example, there may be sufficient evidence to prove that the accessory assisted someone to commit the principal offence, but insufficient evidence to establish the identity of the principal offender (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316; R v King (1986) 161 CLR 423; Likiardopoulos v R (2010) 30 VR 654; [2010] VSCA 344).

18. If the accused and the principal offender are not tried together:

    - The prosecution does not need to prove that someone has been convicted as the principal offender (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473); and
    - Evidence that another person has been convicted is not admissible against the accused (R v Kirkby [2000] 2 Qd R 57; Evidence Act 2008 s 91);
    - It is not an abuse of process for the prosecution to charge the accused with aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring an offence which is more serious than the one to which the principal offender pleaded guilty (or was convicted at trial) (Likiardopoulos v R (2010) 30 VR 654; [2010] VSCA 344; Hui Chi-ming v R [1992] 1 AC 34).

19. In some cases, the prosecution may not be able to prove which of several co-accused performed the relevant criminal acts. In such a case, the jury may convict all of the co-accused of the offence if satisfied, by evidence admissible against each co-accused, that one (or more) of them committed the offence and the others were accessories. The jury does not need to decide which of them was the principal offender and which were accessories (R v Lowery & King (No 2) [1972] VR 560).

Knowledge

20. The second element requires the prosecution to prove that the accused knew of, or believed in, the essential circumstances that establish the principal offence (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473).

21. The "essential circumstances" of an offence are the facts that will go to satisfying the elements of the offence (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473; Likiardopoulos v R (2010) 30 VR 654; [2010] VSCA 344).

22. For mens rea offences, this includes knowledge of, or belief in, the principal offender's state of mind (R v Stokes & Difford (1990) 51 A Crim R 25; R v Lam & Ors (Ruling No 20) (2005) 159 A Crim R 448; Likiardopoulos v R (2010) 30 VR 654; [2010] VSCA 344; R v Phan (2001) 53 NSWLR 480; c.f. R v Le Broc (2000) 2 VR 43).[304]

[304] For strict liability offences, while the accused must know the essential circumstances of the offence, s/he does not need to have any awareness of the principal offender's state of mind (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473).

23. Where the offence requires a particular result to have been caused (e.g. death or serious injury), the accused does not need to know that this result will be achieved. It is sufficient if s/he knew that the principal offender was going to commit the acts which ultimately caused that result, and that s/he knew the principal offender would have the requisite state of mind when committing those acts (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473; R v Stokes & Difford (1990) 51 A Crim R 25; Likiardopoulos v R (2010) 30 VR 654; [2010] VSCA 344).

24. The jury must consider what the accused knew at the time s/he assisted or encouraged the principal offender, rather than at the time the principal offender committed the offence (R v Stokes & Difford (1990) 51 A Crim R 25).

25. The accused must have actual knowledge or belief of the essential circumstances. It is not sufficient that s/he should have known of those circumstances, or failed to inquire about them (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473).

26. However, the failure of a person to make inquiries about the circumstances may be evidence that s/he was aware of the relevant facts (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473).

27. The accused does not need to know that the principal offence is a criminal offence. It is sufficient if s/he is aware of all the facts that constitute the offence (Johnson v Youden [1950] 1 KB 544; Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473).

28. An employee's knowledge cannot necessarily be imputed to an employer (Ferguson v Weaving [1951] 1 KB 814).

Assistance or Encouragement

29. The third element requires the accused to have intentionally assisted or encouraged the principal offender to commit the offence charged (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473).

30. For this to be the case, the accused must have been linked in purpose with the principal offender, and spoken words or performed acts designed to bring about the commission of the offence (R v Tamme [2004] VSCA 165; R v Wong [2005] VSC 96).

31. It is not necessary (or sufficient) to show that the accused exerted control over the principal offender. In cases of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring, the principal offender will have acted voluntarily, breaking the causal link between the accused's alleged control of the principal offender and the commission of the offence (R v Franklin (2001) 3 VR 9).

32. The accused also does not need to have reached an agreement with the principal offender about the commission of the crime. S/he merely needs to have provided encouragement or assistance to the principal offender (R v Oberbilig [1989] 1 Qd R 342; R v Nguyen [2010] VSCA 23).

33. Where it is alleged that the accused "assisted" the principal offender, it is not necessary to prove that the principal offender was aware of the accused's assistance (R v Lam & Ors (Ruling No 20) (2005) 159 A Crim R 448).

34. Where it is alleged that the accused "encouraged" the principal offender, it is also not necessary to prove that the principal offender was aware of the accused's encouragement, nor is it necessary to prove that s/he was actually encouraged by the accused's words or actions (R v Lam & Ors (Ruling No 20) (2005) 159 A Crim R 448).

35. However, in "encouragement" cases the prosecution must prove that the encouragement was communicated to the principal offender in circumstances such that s/he could have been aware of that encouragement (R v Lam & Ors (Ruling No 20) (2005) 159 A Crim R 448).

36. When considering this element, a distinction is sometimes drawn between assistance or encouragement which is offered before the offending ("counselling or procuring"), and assistance or encouragement offered at the time of the offending ("aiding or abetting").[305] These are discussed in turn below.

37. The jury are not, however, required to unanimously agree on the exact form of assistance. The jury only need to be collectively satisfied that the accused aided, abetted, counselled or procured the offence (R v Wong [2005] VSC 96).

Counselling or Procuring (Assistance Before the Offence)

38. The accused may provide assistance or encouragement prior to the commission of the relevant offence by either:

    (a) Urging, advising or soliciting the principal offender to commit the offence ("procuring"); or

    (b) Encouraging or supporting the principal offender to commit the offence ("counselling") (Chai v R (2002) 187 ALR 436; Stuart v The Queen (1976) 134 CLR 426; R v Oberbilig [1989] 1 Qd R 342).

39. A person will not have "counselled" the principal offender by merely suggesting that the offence be committed. S/he must have done more than simply instigate its commission (Hutton v R (1991) 56 A Crim R 211).

40. An accessory may "counsel" the principal offender by supplying equipment used in the offending (R v Lam & Ors (Ruling No 20) (2005) 159 A Crim R 448; National Coal Board v Gamble [1959] 1 QB 11).

41. It is not necessary to show that the assistance or encouragement caused the offending. The accused may counsel the principal offender to commit an offence that s/he intended to commit even without the accused's assistance or encouragement (Howell v Doyle [1952] VLR 128).[306]

Aiding or Abetting (Assisting at the Time of the Offence)

42. There are three ways in which a person may aid or abet the principal offender at the time of the offending:

    i) By intentionally helping the principal offender to commit the offence;

    ii) By intentionally encouraging the principal offender to commit the offence; or

    iii) By intentionally conveying to the principal offender that s/he assents to and concurs in the commission of the offence (R v Lowery & King (No 2) [1972] VR 560; R v Dardovski Vic CCA 18/5/1995).

43. As with counselling or procuring, the focus here is on whether the accused assisted or encouraged the principal offender in some way. To this end, conveying assent (the third method of aiding or abetting) is seen as an indirect form of encouragement (R v Makin (2004) 8 VR 262).

44. For the accused to have aided or abetted the principal offender, s/he must have actually provided encouragement or assistance in some form. It is not sufficient that s/he secretly held an intention to assist, but did not actually provide any assistance or encouragement (R v Allan [1965] 1 QB 130).

[305] If assistance was provided after the offence was committed, see 5.6 Assist Offender.

[306] In Attorney-General's Reference (No 1 of 1975) [1975] QB 773 there is a suggestion that the word "procure" requires a causal connection. Given that Australia treats the four words of "aid, abet, counsel or procure" as descriptive of a single idea, it is not likely that this causal connection is required in Victoria.

45. However, the accused's conduct does not need to have caused the offending in any way. An aider or abettor generally does not physically participate in the offending (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316; R v Lam & Ors (Ruling No 20) (2005) 159 A Crim R 448).

46. In cases where the prosecution cannot prove which of several possible co-accused was the principal offender, it will be sufficient to prove that the co-accused all assisted or encouraged each other in some way (R v Phan (2001) 53 NSWLR 480; R v Clough (1992) 28 NSWLR 396; R v Mohan [1967] 2 AC 187).

Conveying Assent

47. As noted above, a person can aid or abet the principal offender by conveying assent to, and concurrence in, the commission of the offence (R v Lowery & King (No 2) [1972] VR 560; R v Dardovski Vic CCA 18/5/1995).

48. This test will not be satisfied by simply proving that the accused was present at the commission of the crime, and assented to and concurred in its commission. The prosecution must prove that the accused's acquiescence or assent amounted to assistance or encouragement in some way (R v Phan (2001) 53 NSWLR 480; R v Al Qassim [2009] VSCA 192).

49. This requires the prosecution to prove that the accused, directly or indirectly, expressed a willingness to assist the principal offender if required (R v Makin (2004) 8 VR 262).

50. The accused does not need to have actually provided assistance for this test to be satisfied. The focus of this test is on the accused's willingness to assist the principal offender if required (R v Makin (2004) 8 VR 262).

51. The accused's willingness to assist may be inferred from the way in which s/he conveyed his/her assent to commission of the crime (R v Makin (2004) 8 VR 262; R v Phan (2001) 53 NSWLR 480).

52. It is not necessary to consider the principal offender's response to the accused's offer of assistance. The issue is simply whether the accused conveyed his or her support (R v Makin (2004) 8 VR 262).

Presence at the Commission of the Crime

53. While historically an aider or abettor had to be present at the commission of the crime, this is no longer the case. A person may aid and abet a crime even if s/he is not physically present at the time it is committed (R v Morgan [1994] 1 VR 567; R v Wong [2005] VSC 96. See also Arafan v R (2010) 31 VR 82; [2010] VSCA 356).

54. Conversely, a person may be present at the commission of the crime, and not be an aider and abettor. Mere presence at a crime is not sufficient by itself to found liability (R v Al Qassim [2009] VSCA 192; R v Makin (2004) 8 VR 262; R v Lam (2008) 185 A Crim R 453; R v Nguyen [2010] VSCA 23; Arafan v R (2010) 31 VR 82; [2010] VSCA 356; Al-Assadi v R [2011] VSCA 111).

55. This is because, to be liable, a person must have assisted or encouraged the principal offender in some way. A person who is simply present at the commission of a crime will usually not have offered such assistance or encouragement (R v Makin (2004) 8 VR 262).

56. In some cases, however, the accused may assist or encourage the commission of a crime by being present. For example, by choosing to be present at the crime scene, the accused may provide moral support to the principal offender, or demonstrate a willingness to assist if required (R v Lowery & King (No 2) [1972] VR 560; R v Conci [2005] VSCA 173; R v Panozzo [2007] VSCA 245).

57. For the accused's presence to constitute assistance or encouragement, he or she must have done something more than simply be at the scene of the crime. The accused must, at some point, have said or done something which showed that he or she was linked in purpose with the principal offender, and thus contributed to the crime (R v Al Qassim [2009] VSCA 192; R v Nguyen [2010] VSCA 23).

58. The accused must have done something of a kind that can reasonably be seen as intentionally adopting and contributing to what was taking place in his or her presence (Al-Assadi v R [2011] VSCA 111).

59. Where it is alleged that the accused aided or abetted by being present at the scene of the crime, the judge should therefore tell the jury that mere presence is not sufficient. It should be made clear that something more is required (R v Al Qassim [2009] VSCA 192; Al-Assadi v R [2011] VSCA 111).

60. The judge should clearly identify the additional matters said to constitute assistance or encouragement (R v Al Qassim [2009] VSCA 192).

61. In determining whether the accused's presence aided or abetted the principal offender, the accused's conduct relating to the offence should be viewed as a whole. Things that the accused said or did prior to the commission of the principle offence may warrant the conclusion that the accused's presence made him or her complicit in the offence, by helping or encouraging the principal offender to commit the crime, or conveying assent to and concurrence in the commission of that crime (R v Al Qassim [2009] VSCA 192).

62. It may be possible for the jury to infer from the accused's intentional presence at the crime that he or she aided or abetted the principal offender. For example, if the criminal offending was designed to be a public spectacle (such as an illegal prize fight), and drew support from the presence of observers, the accused's presence may be seen as having provided encouragement to the principal offender (See R v Coney (1882) 8 QBD 534).

Intention to Assist

63. The third element requires the prosecution to not only prove that the accused assisted or encouraged the commission of the crime in some way, but that s/he intended to do so (R v Stokes & Difford (1990) 51 A Crim R 25; R v Lam & Ors (Ruling No 20) (2005) 159 A Crim R 448).

64. The accused's state of mind must be assessed at the time s/he gave the relevant support or assistance, rather than at the time of the offence (White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342).

65. The state of mind the prosecution must prove in relation to an accessory differs from the state of mind required for the principal offender:

    - For the principal offender, the prosecution must prove that, at the time of the offence, s/he acted with the state of mind necessary for that offence;
    - For the accessory, the prosecution must prove that, at the time s/he offered assistance or encouragement to the principal offender, s/he intended to assist or encourage him/her (R v Stokes & Difford (1990) 51 A Crim R 25; R v Lam & Ors (Ruling No 20) (2005) 159 A Crim R 448).

66. The accused must have intended to encourage or assist the principal offender to commit offence charged. It is therefore not sufficient for the prosecution to prove that:

    - The accused had a general intention to assist crime (R v Clarkson [1971] 3 All ER 344; Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473; R v Tamme [2004] VSCA 165); or
    - That the accused intended to assist or encourage a significantly different offence (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473; Chai v R (2002) 187 ALR 436; R v Conci [2005] VSCA 173).[307]

[307] The accused may be liable if the offence committed only varied slightly from the offence the accused intended to assist or encourage (e.g. murder rather than manslaughter) (see e.g. R v Stokes & Difford (1990) 51 A Crim R 25).

67. Where criminal liability attaches to conduct that produces a particular result (e.g. death or serious injury), it is not necessary that the accused intended to produce that result. It is only necessary that s/he intended to assist or encourage the conduct that ultimately produced that result (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473).

68. Even if the principal offence is one that does not require the principal offender to have had a particular state of mind when it was committed (i.e., a strict liability offence), the accused must still be shown to have intended to encourage or assist the principal offender to commit that offence (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473; R v Tamme [2004] VSCA 165; R v Dardovski Vic CCA 18/5/1995).

69. In cases where it is alleged that the accused provided assistance or encouragement by conveying approval of the offending (see above), the prosecution must prove that, by conveying that approval, the accused intended to assist or encourage the principal offender (R v Makin (2004) 8 VR 262; R v Phan (2001) 53 NSWLR 480).

70. Where it is suggested that the accused's presence at the crime assisted or encouraged its commission, it is for the jury to assess whether his/her presence was intended to have this effect (R v Beck (1989) 43 A Crim R 135; R v Lam & Ors (Ruling No 20) (2005) 159 A Crim R 448).

71. The accused's conduct prior to the commission of the offence may be evidence of whether s/he intended to provide encouragement or assistance at the time of the offence (R v Lam & Ors (Ruling No 20) (2005) 159 A Crim R 448).

72. In some cases, the accused's conduct after the offending may also be evidence of his/her state of mind at an earlier time (R v Ngo [2002] VSCA 188; R v Kitchin [2001] VSCA 66).

Failure to Act

73. Ordinarily, the fact that the accused failed to act in a particular way will not be sufficient to prove that s/he assisted or encouraged the principal offender to commit the crime (R v Russell [1933] VLR 59).

74. However, where the accused is under a legal or ethical duty to act, a failure to do so may be evidence of encouragement or assent to the offending (see, e.g. R v Russell [1933] VLR 59; Ex parte Parker: Re Brotherson (1957) SR (NSW) 326).

75. A duty to act may arise where the accused is in loco parentis to the victim (R v Russell [1933] VLR 59; R v Clarke and Wilton [1959] VR 645).

76. Where a person has a duty to act, s/he may be seen to have assisted or encouraged the principal offender if s/he fails to offer any protest to his/her conduct, or fails to offer any effective dissent (R v Russell [1933] VLR 59).

Withdrawing Assistance or Encouragement

77. A person who aids, abets, counsels or procures the commission of an offence may avoid liability if s/he expressly withdraws his/her assistance or encouragement before the offence is committed (White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342; R v Croft [1944] KB 295).

78. The withdrawal must be accompanied by all action the accused can reasonably take to undo the effect of his/her previous encouragement or assistance. This may include informing the police (White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342; R v Tietie (1988) 34 A Crim R 438; R v Jensen and Ward [1980] VR 196).

79. It is usually more difficult for an accused to withdraw at the time of the offence, as this will usually require greater conduct on the accused's behalf to undo the effect of his/her previous assistance or encouragement (see R v Becerra (1976) 62 Cr App R 212).

80. For further information about withdrawal, see the section on Withdrawal of Agreement in 5.3 Joint Criminal Enterprise (Pre-1/11/14).

Terminology

81. A judge should not refer to aiding and abetting as a "less formal" method of proving involvement in a crime than acting in concert. Such an expression may suggest that the inference of guilt might be more easily drawn (R v Abbouchi & Allouche [2008] VSCA 171).

82. A judge should also not refer to the accused being "simply" an aider and abettor (rather than a principal acting in concert). The word "simply" in this context carries the connotation of a less significant involvement inherent in the role, and a diminished seriousness in the finding by the jury that the accused was implicated in this way (R v Abbouchi & Allouche [2008] VSCA 171).

5.5.1 Charge: Counselling and Procuring

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge only applies to offence committed before 1 November 2014.

This charge should be used where the accused is alleged to have assisted or encouraged the principal offender prior to the offending.

NOA has been charged with the offence of NOO.[308] However, it has not been alleged that s/he personally committed the acts that make up that offence. Instead, the prosecution has alleged that s/he committed NOO by assisting or encouraging [insert names of co-offenders] to commit that offence. I must therefore direct you about when a person will be held responsible for assisting or encouraging someone else to commit an offence.

The law says that if someone "counsels or procures" another person to commit an offence, then they will be equally guilty of that offence, regardless of the fact that they did not commit the crime themselves. This is one of the situations in which the law holds a person responsible for the actions of other people.

In order to find NOA guilty of committing NOO by counselling or procuring, the prosecution must prove the following [three/four] elements:[309]

One – that someone committed the offence of NOO. Throughout these directions, I will call the person who committed that offence the "principal offender".

Two – that the accused knew of, or believed in, the essential circumstances needed to establish NOO.

Three – that the accused intentionally assisted or encouraged the principal offender to commit NOO.

[If withdrawal is relevant, add the following shaded section.]

Four – that the accused did not effectively withdraw his/her assistance or encouragement prior to the offence being committed.

Before you can find NOA guilty of NOO by counselling or procuring, you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proven all of these elements beyond reasonable doubt.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

---

[308] Name of Offence.

[309] If withdrawal is relevant, there are four elements. Otherwise, there are three elements.

Commission of Offence

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that someone committed the offence of NOO.

In this case, this requires you to be satisfied that all of the following matters have been proven beyond reasonable doubt:

[Describe all of the elements of the offence, explain those elements, and relate them to the facts.]

Knowledge

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that NOA knew all the essential circumstances needed to establish the offence of NOO, or believed that those essential circumstances existed.

The "essential circumstances" that are needed to establish NOO are the [insert number] matters that I just explained to you in relation to the first element. So for this second element to be met, NOA must have known or believed that:

[Summarise all of the elements[310] of the principal offence.]

For this element to be satisfied, you must find that NOA him/herself actually knew of, or believed in, all of these circumstances at the time s/he [describe the alleged conduct constituting the counselling or procuring]. It is not sufficient for you to find that s/he should have known those circumstances.

The prosecution alleged that NOA had the necessary knowledge or belief. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

Intentional Assistance or Encouragement

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intentionally assisted or encouraged the principal offender to commit NOO. In this case, it is alleged that NOA did this by what is called "counselling or procuring".

A person counsels or procures the commission of an offence if s/he urges, advises or solicits the principal offender to commit that offence, or encourages or supports him or her to commit it. This can be done by words, action or both.

For this element to be met, you do not need to be satisfied that NOA's words or actions caused the principal offender to commit the crime. A person can counsel or procure someone to commit an offence even if that other person already intended to commit that offence.

You also do not need to be satisfied that the principal offender was actually assisted or encouraged by NOA's behaviour. As long as NOA endeavoured to assist or encourage him/her, in circumstances in which the principal offender could potentially have been assisted or encouraged, then this element will be met.

However, you must be satisfied that NOA intentionally counselled or procured the commission of NOO. That is, you must be satisfied that, by saying or doing what s/he did, NOA intended to assist or encourage the principal offender to commit that offence.

[If the relevant offence requires a particular result to have been caused add the following shaded section.]

This does not mean that you have to find that NOA intended [describe the relevant result, e.g. "that NOV

---

[310] If one of the elements of the relevant offence is a particular result (e.g. that the act cause death or serious injury), the judge should make it clear that the accused did not need to know that that result would be achieved. It is sufficient if s/he knew that the principal offender was going to commit the acts which ultimately caused that result, with the necessary state of mind.

die"]. This element will be satisfied if you find that the accused intended to assist or encourage the principal offender to commit the conduct that ultimately caused that result.

In this case, it was alleged that NOA counselled or procured the principal offender to commit NOO by [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA intentionally assisted or encouraged the principal offender to commit NOO, by counselling or procuring the commission of that offence, that this third element will be met.

Withdrawal

[If withdrawal of the accused's assistance or encouragement is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused did not effectively withdraw his/her assistance or encouragement prior to the offence being committed.

The law says that if a person is going to avoid liability by taking back his/her previous assistance or encouragement for a criminal act, his/her withdrawal must be timely and effective. That is, s/he must do everything that s/he can reasonably do to undo the effect of his/her previous assistance or encouragement, in sufficient time for his/her actions to be effective.

Whether the accused has taken all reasonable steps to undo the effect of his/her previous assistance or encouragement is a question for you. You must apply your common sense and experience. For example, in some cases it will be sufficient for the accused to take back any tools he or she has provided for the commission of the crime, and to make it clear that if the principal offender commits the offence, s/he does so without the accused's approval or support. In other cases it may be necessary for the accused to inform the police of the planned offence.

It is important to emphasise that it is not for the defence to prove that the accused did everything reasonably possible to withdraw his/her previous assistance or encouragement. It is the prosecution who must prove that the accused did not withdraw in a timely and effective manner.

In this case, the prosecution argued that the accused had not done everything s/he reasonably could to withdraw his/her previous assistance or encouragement. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing that NOA's withdrawal was timely and effective. [Insert defence evidence and/or arguments.]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not already done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of committing NOO by counselling or procuring, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that someone committed NOO; and

Two – that NOA knew of, or believed in, the essential circumstances needed to establish NOO; and Three – that NOA intentionally assisted or encouraged the principal offender to commit NOO, by counselling or procuring the commission of that crime.

[If withdrawal is relevant, add the following shaded section.]

and Four – that NOA did not effectively withdraw his/her earlier assistance or encouragement.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of NOO by way of counselling or procuring.

5.5.3 Charge: Aiding and Abetting

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge only applies to offences committed before 1 November 2014.

This charge should be used where the accused is alleged to have assisted or encouraged the principal offender at the time of the offending.

NOA has been charged with the offence of NOO.[312] However, it has not been alleged that s/he personally committed the acts that make up that offence. Instead, the prosecution has alleged that s/he committed NOO by assisting or encouraging [insert names of co-offenders] to commit that offence. I must therefore direct you about when a person will be held responsible for assisting or encouraging someone else to commit an offence.

The law says that if someone "aids or abets" another person to commit an offence, then they will be equally guilty of that offence, regardless of the fact that they did not commit the crime themselves. This is one of the situations in which the law holds a person responsible for the actions of other people.

In order to find NOA guilty of committing NOO by aiding or abetting, the prosecution must prove the following [three/four] elements:[313]

One – that someone committed the offence of NOO. Throughout these directions, I will call the person who committed that offence the "principal offender".

Two – that the accused knew of, or believed, in the essential circumstances needed to establish NOO.

Three – that the accused intentionally assisted or encouraged the principal offender to commit NOO.

[If withdrawal is relevant, add the following shaded section.]

Four – that the accused did not effectively withdraw his/her assistance or encouragement prior to the offence being committed.

Before you can find NOA guilty of NOO by aiding or abetting, you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proven all of these elements beyond reasonable doubt.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Commission of Offence

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that someone committed the offence of NOO.

In this case, this requires you to be satisfied that all of the following matters have been proven beyond reasonable doubt:

[Describe all of the elements of the offence, explain those elements, and relate them to the facts.]

---

[312] Name of Offence.

[313] If withdrawal is relevant, there are four elements. Otherwise, there are three elements.

Knowledge

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that NOA knew all the essential circumstances needed to establish the offence of NOO, or believed that those essential circumstances existed.

The "essential circumstances" that are needed to establish NOO are the [insert number] matters that I just explained to you in relation to the first element. So for this second element to be met, NOA must have known or believed that:

[Summarise all of the elements[314] of the principal offence.]

For this element to be satisfied, you must find that NOA him/herself actually knew of, or believed in, all of these circumstances at the time s/he [describe the alleged conduct constituting the aiding or abetting]. It is not sufficient for you to find that s/he should have known those circumstances.

The prosecution alleged that NOA had the necessary knowledge or belief. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

Intentional Assistance or Encouragement

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intentionally assisted or encouraged the principal offender to commit NOO. In this case, it is alleged that NOA did this by what is called "aiding or abetting".

A person "aids or abets" the principal offender if s/he either:

- Intentionally helps him/her to commit the offence; or
- Intentionally encourages him/her, by words or presence, to commit the offence; or
- Intentionally conveys to him/her, by words or presence and behaviour, that s/he supports the commission of the offence.

A person can aid or abet an offence by words, action or both.

[If conveying assent is relevant, add the following shaded section.]

To have aided or abetted by conveying support for the commission of the offence, the accused must have done more than simply agreed with what the principal offender was doing. You must find that s/he attempted to communicate his/her support to the principal offender in a way that the principal offender could have been aware of, and that s/he indicated his/her willingness to assist the principal offender if required.

However, you do not have to find that the principal offender was aware of NOA's offer of assistance, or was actually encouraged by it. It is sufficient if NOA attempted to communicate his/her support and willingness to assist.

You do not need to be satisfied that NOA's words or actions caused the principal offender to commit the crime. A person can assist or encourage someone to commit an offence even if that other person already intended to commit that offence.

[314] If one of the elements of the relevant offence is a particular result (e.g. that the act cause death or serious injury), the judge should make it clear that the accused did not need to know that that result would be achieved. It is sufficient if s/he knew that the principal offender was going to commit the acts which ultimately caused that result, with the necessary state of mind.

You also do not need to be satisfied that the principal offender was actually assisted or encouraged by NOA's behaviour. As long as NOA endeavoured to assist or encourage him/her, in circumstances in which the principal offender could potentially have been assisted or encouraged, then this element will be met.

However, you must be satisfied that NOA intentionally aided or abetted the commission of NOO. That is, you must be satisfied that, by saying or doing what s/he did, NOA intended to help, encourage or convey support to the principal offender to commit that offence.

[If the relevant offence requires a particular result to have been caused, add the following shaded section.]

This does not mean that you have to find that NOA intended [describe the relevant result, e.g. "that NOV die"]. It will be sufficient if you find that s/he intended to assist or encourage the principal offender to commit the conduct that ultimately caused that result.

In this case, it was alleged that NOA aided or abetted the principal offender to commit NOO by [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

[If the prosecution argued that the accused assisted or encouraged the offender by his/her presence, add the following shaded section.]

You will note that in this case the prosecution did not allege that NOA said or did anything at the time of the offence to indicate his/her encouragement or support of the principle offender. They alleged that s/he assisted or encouraged the principle offender simply by being present.

This element can be satisfied by virtue of the accused having been present at the commission of the offence. However, for this to be the case, you must find that NOA intended his/her presence at the crime scene to have encouraged or assisted the principle offender to commit NOO. It is not sufficient for him/her simply to have been there at the relevant time.

In determining whether NOA intended to provide assistance or encouragement by his/her presence at the commission of the offence, you should view his/her conduct as a whole. You should look at his/her conduct before and at the time of the alleged offence, and consider whether s/he was linked in purpose with the principle offender in some way, and so contributed to the offence.

If you find that NOA was simply present when the offence was committed, then this element will not be met. However, if you are satisfied that NOA's presence at the commission of the offence made him/her complicit in that offence – because by being present s/he intentionally helped or encouraged the primary offender to commit the crime, or conveyed support for the commission of the offence – then this element will be met.

[If not already done, identify the matters said to constitute assistance or encouragement.]

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA intentionally assisted or encouraged the principal offender to commit NOO that this third element will be met.

Withdrawal

[If withdrawal of the accused's assistance or encouragement is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused did not effectively withdraw his/her assistance or encouragement prior to the offence being committed.

The law says that if a person is going to avoid liability by taking back his/her previous assistance or encouragement for a criminal act, his/her withdrawal must be timely and effective. That is, s/he must do everything that s/he can reasonably do to undo the effect of his/her previous assistance or encouragement, in sufficient time for his/her actions to be effective.

Whether the accused has taken all reasonable steps to undo the effect of his/her previous assistance or encouragement is a question for you. You must apply your common sense and experience. For example, in some cases it will be sufficient for the accused to take back any tools he or she has provided for the commission of the crime, and to make it clear that if the principal offender commits the offence, s/he does so without the accused's approval or support. In other cases it may be necessary for the accused to inform the police of the planned offence.

It is important to emphasise that it is not for the defence to prove that the accused did everything reasonably possible to withdraw his/her previous assistance or encouragement. It is the prosecution who must prove that the accused did not withdraw in a timely and effective manner.

In this case, the prosecution argued that the accused had not done everything s/he reasonably could to withdraw his/her previous assistance or encouragement. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing that NOA's withdrawal was timely and effective. [Insert defence evidence and/or arguments.]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not already done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of committing NOO by aiding or abetting, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that someone committed NOO; and

Two – that NOA knew of, or believed in, the essential circumstances needed to establish NOO; and Three – that NOA intentionally assisted or encouraged the principal offender to commit NOO, by either helping him/her, encouraging him/her, or conveying his/her support.

[If withdrawal is relevant, add the following shaded section.]

and Four – that NOA did not effectively withdraw his/her earlier assistance or encouragement.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of NOO by way of aiding or abetting.

5.5.4 Checklist: Aiding and Abetting

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. Someone committed the offence charged; and
2. The accused knew of, or believed in, the essential circumstances needed to establish that offence; and
3. The accused intentionally assisted or encouraged the principal offender to commit that offence.

Commission of the Offence

1. Did someone commit the offence charged?

Consider – Has the prosecution proven all of the elements of that offence?

If Yes, then go to Question 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of aiding or abetting the offence charged

Knowledge of Essential Circumstances

2. Did the accused know of, or believe in, the essential circumstances needed to establish that offence?

Consider – When s/he assisted or encouraged the principal offender to commit the offence charged, did the accused know of, or believe in, all of the matters considered in question 1?[315]

If Yes, then go to Question 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of aiding or abetting the offence charged

Assistance or Encouragement

3. Did the accused intentionally assist or encourage the principal offender to commit that offence?

3.1 Did the accused intentionally help the principal offender to commit that offence?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of the offence charged (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1 and 2)

If No, then go to Question 3.2

3.2 Did the accused intentionally encourage the principal offender to commit that offence?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of the offence charged (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1 and 2)

If No, then go to Question 3.3

3.3 Did the accused intentionally convey to the principal offender by words or presence and behaviour that s/he supported the commission of that offence?

Consider – Did the accused attempt to communicate his/her support to the principal offender, and indicate his/her willingness to assist if required?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of the offence charged (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1 and 2)

---

[315] If one of the elements of the relevant offence is a particular result (e.g. that the act cause death or serious injury), the judge should make it clear that the accused did not need to know that that result would be achieved. It is sufficient if s/he knew that the principal offender was going to commit the acts which ultimately caused that result, with the necessary state of mind.

If No, then the accused is not guilty of aiding or abetting the offence charged

5.6 Assist Offender

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. The offence of assisting an offender is created by Crimes Act 1958 s 325.
2. The offence is available as an alternative to all serious indictable offences (Crimes Act 1958 s 325(2)).
3. It is for the trial judge to determine whether or not to leave this offence to the jury. This determination does not need to be made until the close of the evidence (Crimes Act 1958 s 325(2); R v Taylor & Ors 22/6/1989 Vic CCA).

Elements

4. The offence has the following five elements:

    i) A person (the "principal offender") committed a serious indictable offence (the "principal offence");

    ii) The accused performed a positive act after the completion of that offence;

    iii) When the accused performed that act, s/he knew or believed that the principal offender had committed the principal offence, or any other serious indictable offence;

    iv) The accused acted with the purpose of impeding the apprehension, prosecution, conviction or punishment of the principal offender; and

    v) The accused had no lawful authority or reasonable excuse for his/her actions (Crimes Act 1958 s 325).

Serious Indictable Offence

5. The first element requires the prosecution to prove that the principal offender committed a "serious indictable offence" (Crimes Act 1958 s 325; R v Morton [2001] VSC 16).
6. A "serious indictable offence" is defined as an indictable offence that "is punishable on first conviction with imprisonment for life or for a term of five years or more" (Crimes Act 1958 s 325(6)).
7. The principal offender does not need to have committed the offence personally. His/her liability may be derivative, or the result of a legal doctrine, such as acting in concert (R v Welsh [1999] 2 VR 62).
8. A record of conviction of the principal offender is prima facie evidence that the principal offence was committed. It is not, however, necessary or sufficient. An accused may lead evidence to rebut the record of conviction (R v Dawson [1961] VR 773; R v Welsh [1999] 2 VR 62; R v Kirkby [2000] 2 Qd R 57).
9. If the principal offender and the accused are tried at the same time, the judge must give a separate consideration direction to the jury. S/he must make it clear that evidence that is admissible only against the principal offender (such as out of court admissions that were not made in the presence of the accused) cannot be used to establish, for the purpose of the offence of assisting an offender, that the principal offence has been committed (R v Welsh [1999] 2 VR 62) See 1.8 Separate Consideration for further information.

Accused's Actions

10. The second element requires the prosecution to prove that the accused performed a positive act (Crimes Act 1958 s 325; R v Taylor & Ors 22/6/1989 Vic CCA; R v Hurley & Murray [1967] VR 526; R v Ready & Manning [1942] VLR 85).

11. The accused's act must have been performed after the principal offence was completed (R v Taylor & Ors 22/6/1989 Vic CCA).[316]

12. The accused simply needs to have performed a positive act. His/her act does not need to have actually assisted the principal offender (R v Tevendale [1955] VLR 95; R v Levy [1912] 1 KB 158).

13. Concealing evidence, or laying a false trail, may be a positive act (R v Levy [1912] 1 KB 158; R v Taylor & Ors 22/6/1989 Vic CCA).

14. However, the accused does not perform a positive act if s/he only instructs others not to give evidence, or refuses to give evidence him/herself (R v Ready & Manning [1942] VLR 85; Ready & Manning v R [1942] ALR 138).

15. Failing to inform the police of the principal offender's whereabouts is not a positive act. However, it can be relevant, in conjunction with other acts of assistance, to demonstrate that the accused intended to assist the principal offender (R v Hurley & Murray [1967] VR 526).

Knowledge or Belief

16. The third element requires the prosecution to prove that, when the accused performed the relevant act, s/he knew or believed that the principal offender had committed the principal offence, or any other serious indictable offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 325).

17. The accused does not need to have known the precise offence that the principal offender committed. It is sufficient for him/her to have known, or believed, that the principal offender had committed some serious indictable offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 325; R v Taylor & Ors 22/6/1989 Vic CCA; c.f. R v Stone [1981] VR 737; R v Tevendale [1955] VLR 95; Middap v R (1992) 63 A Crim R 434).

18. The accused must have had the requisite state of knowledge at the time s/he performed the relevant act. This element will not be satisfied if s/he acquired the necessary knowledge after completing the act (R v Kawicki (1995) 82 A Crim R 191).

Purpose

19. The fourth element requires the prosecution to prove that the accused performed the relevant act for the purpose of impeding the apprehension, prosecution, conviction or punishment of the principal offender (Crimes Act 1958 s 325; R v Hurley & Murray [1967] VR 526; Middap v R (1992) 63 A Crim R 434).

20. It is not sufficient for the accused to have performed that act knowing that its probable result would be to impede the apprehension, prosecution, conviction or punishment of the principal offender. S/he must have been motivated by a subjective desire to impede the principal offender's apprehension, prosecution, conviction or punishment (R v Hurley & Murray [1967] VR 526).

[316] This means that this element will not be satisfied in cases where the accused acts between the time of the principal offender's causal acts and the time when the offence is finally committed (e.g. in a murder case, between the time the victim is stabbed and the time s/he dies). The accused's actions must be committed after the completion of the principal offence (i.e. after the victim's death).

21. It will usually only be necessary to explain the difference between desiring a result, and acting with the knowledge that that result will probably occur, if the defence argues that the accused did not subjectively desire the foreseen consequences of his/her action (Middap v R (1992) 63 A Crim R 434).

22. It is best to avoid directing the jury that the accused must "intend" to impede the apprehension, prosecution, conviction or punishment of the principal offender, as the word "intend" is ambiguous, covering both knowledge of probable consequences and a desire for those consequences (R v Hurley & Murray [1967] VR 526).

23. The accused's conduct does not need to have been solely motivated by a desire to protect the principal offender. This element may be satisfied even if s/he had other motivations for acting, such as seeking to conceal his/her own wrongdoing (Middap v R (1992) 63 A Crim R 434; R v Tevendale [1955] VLR 95).

24. While a desire to protect the principal offender does not need to have been the accused's sole purpose for acting, the jury must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that it was at least one his/her motivations. If the jury are unable to exclude the possibility that the accused was solely motivated by another desire (e.g. to conceal his/her own involvement in the crime), then this element will not be met (R v Taylor & Ors 22/6/1989 Vic CCA; R v Jones (1948) 33 Cr App R 230; Middap v R (1992) 63 A Crim R 434).[317]

25. The accused must have had this purpose at the time s/he performed the relevant act. This element will not be satisfied if this desire arose after s/he had completed the act (R v Kawicki (1995) 82 A Crim R 191).

26. It is not necessary to show that the accused was successful in impeding the apprehension, prosecution, conviction or punishment of the principal offender (R v Dawson [1961] VR 773).

Lawful Authority or Excuse

27. The prosecution must disprove any defences that are open on the evidence (R v Hurley & Murray [1967] VR 526; Middap v R (1992) 63 A Crim R 434).

28. A married person cannot be convicted of assisting his/her spouse (Crimes Act 1958 s 338).

5.6.1 Charge: Assist Offender

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

I must now direct you about the crime of assisting an offender. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove five elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that someone committed a serious criminal offence. Throughout these directions, I will call the person who committed that offence the "principal offender".

Two – that, after that offence was committed, the accused performed some act.

Three – that, when the accused performed that act, s/he knew or believed that the principal offender had committed a serious criminal offence.

[317] This means that, if the accused's purpose is to be inferred from the circumstances, the inference that the accused was at least partly motivated by a desire to protect the principal offender must be the only available inference (R v Taylor & Ors 22/6/1989 Vic CCA; R v Jones (1948) 33 Cr App R 230; Middap v R (1992) 63 A Crim R 434). See 3.6 Circumstantial Evidence and Inferences for further information.

Four – that the accused acted with the purpose of impeding the apprehension, prosecution, conviction or punishment of the principal offender.

Five – that the accused had no lawful authority or reasonable excuse for his/her actions.

Before you can find NOA guilty of assisting an offender you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proved all five of these elements beyond reasonable doubt.

I will now explain each of these elements in detail.

Serious Criminal Offence

The first element the prosecution must prove is that the principal offender committed a serious criminal offence.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NO3P committed NOO.[318] The law says that NOO is a serious criminal offence. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, it is alleged that NO3P committed the offence of NOO. The law says that NOO is a serious criminal offence. This element will therefore be met if you are satisfied that NO3P committed NOO.

This requires you to be satisfied that all of the following matters have been proven beyond reasonable doubt:

[Describe all of the elements of the offence, explain those elements, and relate them to the facts.]

[If evidence of the principal offender's conviction has been led and contested, add the following darker shaded section.]

In order to prove this element, the prosecution provided evidence that NO3P was convicted of NOO by another jury. While you may use this fact as evidence that NO3P did commit the offence of NOO, it is not conclusive. You must make your own assessment of the evidence in this case, and consider whether, based on all the evidence you have heard, you are satisfied that NO3P actually did commit the offence of NOO.

Accused's Action

The second element the prosecution must prove is that, after the offence of NOO was completed, the accused performed some act.

In this case it is alleged that NOA [describe relevant act]. This element will only be met if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he performed this act, and that this occurred after the offence of NOO was completed.

[Describe relevant prosecution and defence evidence and/or arguments.]

Knowledge or Belief

The third element the prosecution must prove is that, when the accused [describe relevant act], s/he knew or believed that the principal offender had committed a serious criminal offence.

---

[318] Name of Offence.

[If it is alleged that NOA believed that NO3P had committed a different offence from that which s/he had committed, add the following shaded section.]

It does not matter if NOA believed that NO3P had committed a different offence from the one s/he actually committed. All that is required for this element is that NOA believed that NO3P had committed some serious criminal offence.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that, when NOA [describe relevant act], s/he knew or believed that NO3P had committed [describe relevant offence]. [Describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Purpose

The fourth element the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted with the purpose of impeding the apprehension, prosecution, conviction or punishment of the principal offender. That is, NOA [describe relevant act] because s/he wanted to prevent NO3P from being caught by the police and brought to trial.

[If the defence argued that, the effect of impeding apprehension was not desired, add the following shaded section.]

It is not sufficient for NOA to have known that his/her acts would probably impede NO3P's apprehension, prosecution, conviction or punishment. For this element to be met, s/he must have actively desired that result.

This does not need to have been NOA's only motivation for acting in that way. However, for this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was at least one of his/her motivations. If you are unable to exclude the possibility that NOA was solely motivated by another desire, then this element will not be met.

In this case, the prosecution argued that the purpose of NOA's actions was to impede NO3P's apprehension, prosecution, conviction or punishment. [Describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Reasonable excuse

The fifth element the prosecution must prove is that the accused had no lawful authority or reasonable excuse for his/her actions.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

This element is not in dispute in this case. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is in issue, explain any relevant defences or justifications and relate to the facts.]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of assisting an offender, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NO3P committed NOO; and

Two – That after the completion of that offence, NOA performed some act; and

Three – That when NOA performed that act, s/he knew or believed that NO3P had committed a serious criminal offence; and

Four – That NOA acted with the purpose of impeding NO3P's apprehension, prosecution, conviction or punishment; and Five – That NOA had no lawful authority or reasonable excuse for his/her actions.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of assisting an offender.

5.7 Commonwealth Complicity (s 11.2)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

General Principles

1. Criminal Code s 11.2(1) provides that:

> (1) A person who aids, abets, counsels or procures the commission of an offence by another person is taken to have committed that offence and is punishable accordingly.

2. Section 11.2 does not create an offence, but extends criminal responsibility for an offence to a person who aids, abets, counsels or procures another person ('the principal offender') to commit the offence (Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v Davies [2015] FCA 1017 [28]).
3. The provisions of s 11.2 therefore do not specify elements of an offence. Rather, they specify statutory conditions which must be proved before a person can be found guilty of committing the principal offence. These conditions operate in a similar manner to Criminal Code s 11.5 (Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v Davies [2015] FCA 1017 [30]; R v LK (2010) 241 CLR 177 [131]–[133]). See 6.2 Conspiracy (Commonwealth) for further information.

Liability

4. To establish liability for an offence through s 11.2, the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that:

   i) The principal offender committed the offence (s 11.2(2)(b))

   ii) The conduct of the accused in fact aided, abetted, counselled or procured the commission of the offence by the principal offender (s 11.2(2)(a))

   iii) The accused intended that his or her conduct would aid, abet, counsel or procure the commission:

   - of any offence (including its fault elements) of the type committed by the principal offender (s 11.2(3)(a)); or

- of an offence, while being reckless about the principal offender committing the offence charged (including its fault elements) (s 11.2(3)(b))

Principal Offender Committed Offence

5. The first matter the prosecution must prove is that the principal offender committed the alleged offence (Criminal Code s 11.2(2)(b)).

6. This requires the prosecution to prove that the principal offender committed the relevant physical elements and had the relevant fault elements for the substantive offence (Criminal Code ss 3.1, 11.2(2)(b); R v Nolan (2012) 83 NSWLR 534 [46]; Habib v Commonwealth (2010) 183 FCR 62 [22]).

7. Under s 11.2(5), it is not necessary for the principal offender to have been prosecuted or found guilty before an accused may be found guilty of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of an offence.

8. This is consistent with the common law approach. For further information, see 5.5 Aiding, Abetting, Counselling or Procuring (Pre-1/11/14).

9. The prosecution may have difficulty proving liability through s 11.2 where the principal offender could not be convicted of the substantive offence for some reason. This may occur where the principal offender is not criminally responsible for an offence by way of mental impairment (Criminal Code s 7.3). In such circumstances, where the prosecution seeks to rely on extended criminal responsibility, it may be more appropriate to rely on ss 11.2A (joint commission) or 11.3 (commission by proxy) (Matusevich v The Queen (1977) 137 CLR 633; Osland v The Queen (1998) 197 CLR 316; R v Iliovski; R v Shnider [2002] VSCA 172; R v Gill [2005] VSCA 321).

10. For further information on s 11.2A, see 5.8 Commonwealth Joint Commission (s 11.2A) and 5.10 Commission by Proxy (Commonwealth offences).

Conduct that Aids, Abets, Counsels or Procures

11. The second matter the prosecution must prove is that the accused's conduct in fact aided, abetted, counselled or procured the commission of the offence by the principal offender (Criminal Code s 11.2(2)(a)).

12. The words 'aids, abets, counsels or procures' are not defined in the Code. They are to be given their established legal meaning (R v Campbell (2008) 73 NSWLR 272 [155]; Handlen v R (2011) 245 CLR 282 [6]; R v Jo [2012] QCA 356 [35]; Franze v R [2014] VSCA 352 [124]).

13. Historically, the common law considered those who counsel or procure an offence to be accessories before the fact, while those who aid or abet an offence were considered principals in the second degree (Franze v R [2014] VR 856 [106]). This distinction has never applied under the Code (Handlen v R (2011) 245 CLR 282 [6]), and the language of accessories before or after the fact is no longer used at common law. It is now accepted that the words 'aid, abet, counsel or procure' may be read collectively to describe a person who assists or encourages someone to commit an offence (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473; R v Wong (2005) 202 FLR 1; Likiardopoulos v R [2010] VSCA 344; Arafan v R (2010) 31 VR 82; R v Russell [1933] VLR 59; but c.f. Attorney-General's Reference (No 1 of 1975) [1975] QB 773).

14. This assistance or encouragement requires the accused to be linked in purpose with the principal offender, and to act to bring about or render more likely the commission of the offence (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473; R v Russell [1933] VLR 59; R v Wong (2005) 202 FLR 1; R v Phan (2001) 53 NSWLR 480; Handlen v R (2011) 245 CLR 282 [6]).

15. On that view, when considering liability under s 11.2, a jury is not required to specifically identify the accused as an aider, abettor, counsellor or procurer. They need only decide whether the accused's conduct demonstrates that s/he was linked in purpose with the principal, and their actions brought about or made more likely the offence (Pong Su (Ruling No 21) [2005] VSC 96 [35]). Where possible, however, if the alleged conduct could most simply be classified as one or two of the four terms and the parties are agreeable, it is suggested that the judge direct the jury using only the relevant terminology (i.e. referring only to one or a few of either aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring, rather than all four).

16. In Pong Su (Ruling No 13) [2005] VSC 96, Kellam J considered that the prosecution was not required to prove that a person accused of aiding and/or abetting under s 11.2 was actually present at the scene of a crime. Later in the same proceeding, he indicated that if he was incorrect on that point, 'constructive' presence would suffice (Pong Su (Ruling No 21) [2005] VSC 96 [62]; see also R v Nolan (2012) 83 NSWLR 534 [44])). This approach places more emphasis on the accused's conduct of providing assistance or encouragement to the principal offender at the time of the offending, acknowledging that the assistance could be provided from a distance.

17. This approach aligns with developments in the common law, in which actual presence is no longer required (R v Morgan [1994] 1 VR 567; R v Wong (2005) 202 FLR 1; see also Arafan v R [2010] VSCA 356). For details about the relevance of presence at common law, see 'Presence at the Commission of the Crime' in 5.5 Aiding, Abetting, Counselling or Procuring (Pre-1/11/14).

18. Section 4.1 of the Code defines conduct to include an act, an omission to perform an act, or a state of affairs.

19. For details about what conduct might constitute aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring, see 'Assistance or Encouragement' in 5.5 Aiding, Abetting, Counselling or Procuring (Pre-1/11/14).

20. It is not possible for an accused to be liable for aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring an offence they became involved in at a time when the offence had ended. For example, an accused who becomes involved in a drug importation scheme only after the drugs have been substituted for flour cannot be liable for aiding or abetting the offence, even though they could have been liable had the substitution not taken place. In such a situation, it would be appropriate for the accused to be charged with attempted importation or attempted possession (R v Nolan [2012] NSWCCA 126 [37], [51]).

21. The prosecution does not need to prove that there was any agreement between the accused and the principal offender. The lack of an agreement is what distinguishes liability under s 11.2 with the form of complicity established under s 11.2A (R v Lam & Ors (Ruling No 20) (2005) 159 A Crim R 448; R v Lowery & King (No 2) [1972] VR 560; R v Nguyen [2010] VSCA 23; Arafan v R [2010] VSCA 356).

Causation and Commonwealth Complicity

22. Section 11.2(2)(a) requires that the accused's conduct in fact aided, abetted, counselled or procured the commission of the offence. The meaning and effect of those words 'in fact' is a matter of debate.

23. At common law, the prosecution does not need to prove that the principal offender was actually assisted or encouraged by the accused. Requiring proof that the accused was actually assisted or encouraged would "impose an impossible burden upon the prosecution, who would rarely be in a position to place evidence before a jury as to the effect of the secondary participant's conduct on the principal offender's state of mind" (R v Lam (2008) 185 A Crim R 453, 464).

24. In Criminal Law Officers Committee, Model Criminal Code Chapter 2: General Principles of Criminal Responsibility, Final Report (1992) 87, the committee noted that the requirement of causation was a "vexed question" and did not seek to enter into that debate. This may suggest that the inclusion of the words 'in fact' were not intended to change the common law (see also New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Complicity, Report No 129 (2010), 40, 50).

25. It has been suggested that the use of 'in fact' relates to the common law requirement that an accused have demonstrated that they assented to the principal offender's actions in a way that encourages their performance (Commonwealth Attorney-General's Department, The Commonwealth Criminal Code: A Guide for Practitioners (March 2002) 251). Whether the principal offender knows of the accused's assent will depend on the alleged conduct. If the accused is alleged to have procured the principal offender to commit an offence, then the principal would be expected to have known of the accused's conduct. However, if the accused's conduct aided the principal by, for example, leaving a weapon out for them to find, then it may not be necessary to show that the principal knew it was the accused who left the weapon.

26. The approach adopted in this Charge Book is to require proof of a causal connection between the accused's conduct and the offence. This is adopted as a course of prudence, as it best accords with the words of the Act. In cases where causation is likely to be difficult to show, it will be for the parties to make submissions on why the court should adopt a different approach.

Intention

27. For a person to have committed an offence under s 11.2(1), they must have intended that their conduct would aid, abet, counsel or procure the commission of an offence by another person, and either:

    i) An offence of that type was committed by the other person (s 11.2(3)(a)); or

    ii) The accused was reckless about the commission of the offence actually committed by the other person (s 11.2(3)(b)).

28. The reference to 'reckless' in s 11.2(3)(b) does not indicate that recklessness is available as an alternative fault element to establish Commonwealth complicity. The relevant fault element is intention. This aligns with common law complicity (Pong Su (Ruling No 12) 159 A Crim R 300 [47]).

29. Section 5.2 of the Code defines intention and identifies that a person can have intention with respect to conduct, a circumstance or a result. The drafting of s 11.2 suggests that the relevant form of intention is intention with respect to result. That is, the prosecution must show that the accused meant for their conduct to assist in the commission of an offence, or that he or she was aware that the offending would occur in the ordinary course of events (Criminal Code s 5.2(3)). This is so regardless of whether the prosecution relies on s 11.2(3)(a) or s 11.2(3)(b) to establish an accused's complicity.

30. To establish that a person intended for their conduct to have assisted the commission of an offence, the prosecution must establish that the accused knew all of the facts that would make the activity he or she was assisting with a criminal offence; i.e. knew the facts that establish the elements of the offence (Ansari v R (2007) 70 NSWLR 89 [80]).

31. Establishing intention for s 11.2 is likely to involve drawing an inference and will draw on common law principles relating to intention to assist. For details, see under 'Intention to Assist' on 5.5 Aiding, Abetting, Counselling or Procuring (Pre-1/11/14).

32. Section 11.2(3) is subject to s 11.2(6), which states that any special liability provisions that apply to an offence also apply for the purposes of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring an offence. This means that the prosecution will not need to establish intention in respect of any matter that is subject to a special liability provision (R v Franze (Ruling No 1) [2013] VSC 229 [17]). For further information, see below under 'Substantive offences and special liability provisions'.

33. Where an accused is charged with multiple counts of aiding and abetting, there must be evidence to establish the relevant intention with respect to each charge (R v Poulakis (No 2) [2015] ACTSC 190 [6]).

Type of Offence

34. Section 11.2(3)(a) explains that one way for a person to be guilty under s 11.2(1) is that the accused intended for his or her conduct to aid, abet, counsel or procure the commission of any offence of the type the other person committed.

35. This limb of s 11.2 also applies where the accused intended to assist in the commission of the offence committed (see Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v Davies [2015] FCA 1017 [35]).

36. The prosecution must prove that an accused intended their conduct would bring about or make more likely the commission of any offence 'of the type' that the other person committed. This suggests it is not necessary for the prosecution to prove the accused intended the specific offence would be committed.

37. There have not yet been any reported cases examining the meaning or limits of the words 'of the type' in the Code. Under English common law, someone could be found liable as an accessory if they intended that 'a crime of the type in question was intended'; they did not necessarily need to have known all details of the specific crime (R v Bainbridge (1960) 1 QB 129, 134). For example, while it would be necessary to prove that an accused who provided new vehicle registration plates to another person intended to assist the other person to steal a motor vehicle, it would not be necessary to prove that the accused intended to assist in the theft of a specific vehicle (Ancuta v R (1990) 49 A Crim R 307). It is not clear whether this is also the Australian common law position, though Bainbridge has not been disapproved (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473, 481, 505; Ancuta v R (1990) 49 A Crim R 307, 313).

38. This approach may provide some guidance as to the meaning of 'type' in s 11.2. It is also supported by the Explanatory Memorandum which accompanied the introduction of s 11.2A of the Code. Section 11.2A(2)(a) provides that an offence will be committed in accordance with an agreement 'if the conduct of one or more parties ... makes up the physical elements consisting of conduct of an offence ... of the same type as the offence agreed to.' The Explanatory Memorandum states that 'of the same type' was included to ensure the requirement was broad enough to cover situations where the exact offence agreed to was not actually committed. The example provided was a group who agree to commit a specific drug offence, but the quantity or type of drug actually involved differs from the agreement (Explanatory Memorandum, Crimes Legislation Amendment (Serious and Organised Crime) Bill 2009, 134). Although s 11.2A was enacted after s 11.2, principles of statutory construction include the presumption that words and phrases are to be interpreted consistently within a piece of legislation.

39. Where the prosecution relies on this basis of complicity, the judge will first need to determine whether the matter of type is a pure question of law, or whether the judge's role is to determine whether it is open to the jury to find that the two offences are of the same 'type'. As a matter of prudence, this Charge Book takes the latter approach, and leaves it to the jury to determine whether two offences are of the same 'type'. Parties will, however, need to provide submissions to both the judge and the jury that identify why the two offences are said to be of the same 'type'.

Recklessness as to the offence committed

40. Section 11.2(3)(b) provides another way for a person to be guilty under s 11.2(1), where the accused intended that his or her conduct would aid, abet, counsel or procure the commission of any offence and was reckless about the commission of the offence actually committed.

41. It will always be necessary for the prosecution to prove that the accused intended that his or her conduct would assist in the commission of an offence (Pong Su (Ruling No 12) 159 A Crim R 300).

42. A person is reckless when they are aware of a substantial risk that a result or circumstance will occur, and it is unjustifiable for them to take that risk given the circumstances known to them (Criminal Code s 5.4).

43. In the context of s 11.2(3)(b), when the offence charged is not the one which the accused intended to assist with, the prosecution needs to demonstrate that the accused was aware of a substantial risk that their conduct would lead to the principal committing the offence charged, and it was unjustifiable for the accused to take that risk. This requires that the prosecution prove, in relation to each element of the completed offence, that the accused was aware of a substantial risk that this element would occur and it was unjustifiable to take that risk.

44. The jury must determine whether it is unjustifiable to take a risk on the facts known to the accused (Criminal Code ss 5.4(1)(b), 5.4(2)(b)). However, the accused does not need to have believed that it was unjustifiable to take the risk. The test is objective not subjective.

45. The question of whether a risk is unjustifiable requires the jury to make a moral or value judgment relating to the accused's advertent disregard of risk (R v Saengsai-Or (2004) 61 NSWLR 135).

46. The jury must assess the likelihood of the risk eventuating, and determine whether the risk is one that should not have been taken (Lustig v R (2009) 195 A Crim R 310).

47. This aspect of s 11.2 extends liability compared to the common law of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring, which required proof of specific intent. It was not sufficient at common law that an accused should have known the essential circumstances which made up an offence that they are alleged to have aided, abetted, counselled or procured (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473). Common law aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring did not include liability for a different offence that the accused was reckless about occurring when they were aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of another offence.

Withdrawal

48. A person cannot be found guilty under s 11.2 if, before the offence was committed:

    - they terminated their involvement; and
    - took all reasonable steps to prevent the offence being committed (Criminal Code s 11.2(4)).

49. The accused bears the evidential burden of providing evidence suggesting a reasonable possibility that they terminated their involvement in the agreement and took all reasonable steps to prevent the commission of the offence (Criminal Code s 13.4).

50. If the accused meets the evidential burden, the prosecution will then have to prove that the accused did not effectively terminate their involvement.

51. At common law, withdrawal requires the accused to take all action he or she can reasonably take to undo the effect of his or her previous encouragement or assistance, which can include informing the police (see White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342; R v Tietie (1988) 34 A Crim R 438; R v Jensen and Ward [1980] VR 196).

52. In contrast, the second limb of withdrawal under the Code is to take 'all reasonable steps to prevent the commission of the offence' (Criminal Code s 11.2(4)(b)).

53. There do not appear to be any reported cases on the scope and operation of this requirement. The New South Wales Law Reform Commission suggests that the following matters are relevant to the requirement of 'reasonable steps':

    - The significance of the assistance or encouragement previously given;
    - The seriousness of the offence in question and its likely consequences;
    - Whether or not the accused can be satisfied, on reasonable grounds, by the principal offender's response that the offence will not occur;
    - Any element of risk or duress posed by the principal offender;

- The accused's age and maturity (New South Wales Law Reform Commission, Complicity, Report No 129 (2010) 56).

54. While these considerations have not been endorsed by a court, they are provided as guidance for trial judges on the operation of s 11.2(4).

55. For further details on principles of withdrawal at common law, see under 'Withdrawing From an Agreement' in 5.5 Aiding, Abetting, Counselling or Procuring (Pre-1/11/14) and 5.3 Joint Criminal Enterprise (Pre-1/11/14).

Substantive offences and special liability provisions

56. Any special liability provisions that apply to an offence also apply for the purposes of determining whether a person is guilty of committing the offence by s 11.2 of the Code (Criminal Code s 11.2(6)).

57. The same principle applies for the purpose of attempt, incitement and conspiracy (Criminal Code ss 11.1(6A), 11.4(4A), 11.5(7A))

58. 'Special liability provision' is defined as:

    (a) A provision that provides that, in a prosecution for an offence, it is not necessary to prove that the defendant knew a particular thing; or

    (b) A provision that provides that, in a prosecution for an offence, it is not necessary to prove that the defendant knew or believed a particular thing (Criminal Code Dictionary).

    (c) Fault elements such as knowledge, recklessness and negligence are not 'special liability provisions'.

59. In addition, strict liability, as defined in Criminal Code s 6.1, does not fit within the definition of special liability provision. Therefore, where strict liability applies, the common law rule that an accused must know the essential facts for a joint offence will continue to apply, and the prosecution must prove awareness of those facts (R v Ansari (2007) 70 NSWLR 89, [84]).

60. An example of how a special liability provision operates can be seen in the offence of importing a commercial quantity of a border controlled drug. Section 307.5(2) of the Code establishes absolute liability for possessing commercial quantities of an unlawfully imported border controlled drug or plant. When a person is charged with joint commission an offence against s 307.5(1), s 11.2A(6) means that there will be no need for the prosecution to prove the accused agreed or intended that the importation involve a specific quantity of drug (Franze v R [2014] VSCA 352 [150]–[153]).

Complicity and Attempt

61. It is not an offence to attempt to commit an offence against s 11.2 (Criminal Code s 11.1(7)). However, liability under s 11.2 extends to attempted offences. For example, where a person aids, abets, counsel or procures the principal offender to import a border controlled drug, but the importation is interrupted before the offence can be completed, s 11.2 will extend liability for the attempted importation to the person who provided assistance (Franze v R [2014] VSCA 352 [3]).

Uncertainty about role of accused: Principal offender or accessory

62. Section 11.2(7) states that if the jury is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that an accused is guilty of a particular offence whether because they were complicit in its commission or are otherwise guilty, but the jury cannot determine which, they may nevertheless find the accused guilty of that offence.

63. This picks up the common law principle that, where the prosecution is not able to prove which of several co-accused performed the relevant criminal acts, the jury may convict all of the co-accused of the offence if satisfied, by evidence admissible against each co-accused, that one (or more) of them committed the offence and the others were accessories. The jury does not need to decide which of them was the principal offender and which were accessories (R v Lowery & King (No 2) [1972] VR 560).

5.7.1 Charge: Commonwealth Complicity Type of Offence Not in Issue

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This Charge has been designed for use in cases where the accused is charged with being involved in the commission of an offence via Criminal Code (Cth) s 11.2(1), where it is accepted that the offence committed was of the same type as the offence the accused intended to aid, abet, counsel or procure. This will occur either:

i) where the offence committed was the intended offence or

ii) where the offence committed was somehow different to the offence intended, but the parties agree that it was of the same 'type'.

This Charge is not intended for use when there is a question about whether the offence committed is the same 'type' as the offence the accused intended to aid, abet, counsel or procure, or when the prosecution relies on an accused having been reckless about the offence committed.

This charge refers only to aiding or abetting. If the accused's alleged conduct is properly classified as counselling or procuring, the charge should be adapted accordingly.

NOA has been charged with the offence of NOO. However, it has not been alleged that s/he personally committed the acts that make up that offence. Instead, the prosecution has alleged that s/he committed NOO by aiding or abetting NO3P to commit that offence. I must therefore direct you about when a person will be held responsible for aiding or abetting someone else to commit an offence.

In order to find NOA guilty of NOO by aiding or abetting its commission, the prosecution must prove the following [three/four] elements:[319]

One – that someone committed the offence of NOO. Throughout these directions, I will call the person who committed that offence the "principal offender".

Two – that NOA actually aided or abetted the principal offender to commit NOO.

Three – that NOA intended that his/her conduct would aid or abet the principal offender to commit NOO.[320]

[If withdrawal is relevant, add the following shaded section.]

Four – that NOA did not effectively terminate his/her involvement prior to the offence being committed.

[319] If termination is relevant, there are four elements. Otherwise, there are three elements.

[320] If there is a question about whether the offence committed is of the same type as the offence NOO intended to aid or abet, refer to 5.7.3 Charge: Commonwealth Complicity – type of offence in issue.

Before you can find NOA guilty of NOO, you must be satisfied that all of these elements have been proven beyond reasonable doubt.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Offence committed

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that someone committed the offence of NOO.

In this case, this requires you to be satisfied that all of the following matters have been proven beyond reasonable doubt:

[Describe all of the elements of the offence, explain those elements, and relate them to the facts.]

[If NOA may have committed the offence him/herself, add the following shaded section.]

Now, you may not be sure whether NOA either committed NOO himself/herself, or assisted NO3P to do so. You do not need to resolve this question to reach your verdict. The law says that if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that NOA either committed the offence himself/herself, or aided or abetted another person to commit the offence, you may find him/her guilty of NOO.

Aid, Abet, Counsel or Procure

Caution! Part of this direction concerns the meaning of the words 'in fact'. The law on this issue is unclear. See 5.7 Commonwealth Complicity (s 11.2) for guidance.

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused in fact aided or abetted the principal offender to commit an offence like NOO.

A person aids or abets the principal offender if s/he:

[insert the following bullet points as appropriate]

- helps him/her to commit the offence; or
- encourages him/her to commit the offence; or
- conveys to him/her that s/he supports the commission of the offence.

A person can aid or abet an offence by words, action or both.

[If counselling/procuring is being alleged, insert the following bullet points as appropriate]

A person counsels or procures an offence if s/he:

- urges, advises or solicits the principal offender to commit the offence; or
- encourages or supports the principal offender to commit the offence; or

A person can counsel or procure an offence by words, action or both.

In this case, the prosecution argue that NOA aided or abetted the offending by [identify relevant prosecution evidence and arguments]. The defence deny this, and argue [identify relevant evidence and arguments].

As part of this element, you also need to consider whether NOA's actions actually aided or abetted NO3P's offending. This means you must consider what effect NOA's actions had on whether NOO was committed.

[Insert relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA actually aided or abetted NO3P to commit NOO that this second element will be met.

Intention

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that NOA intentionally aided or abetted the principal offender to commit NOO.

To prove this, the prosecution must first show that at the time s/he [identify the conduct of NOA that is alleged as having aided or abetted the offending], s/he meant for that conduct to assist or encourage NO3P to commit NOO, or s/he was aware that NOO would occur in the ordinary course of events.

The prosecution must show that NOA knew all the essential facts needed to establish NOO, or believed that those essential facts existed. This is because a person cannot intentionally aid or abet an offence unless s/he knows the essential facts giving rise to that offence.

The "essential facts" that are needed to establish NOO are the [insert number] matters that I just explained to you in relation to the first element. So for this first step to be met, NOA must have known or believed that:

[Summarise all of the elements of the principal offence as they relate to NO3P's conduct, subject to any special liability provisions that apply.]

Another way this element could be satisfied is if you find that NOA was aware that their conduct would bring about the commission of NOO in the ordinary course of events.

The prosecution alleged that NOA had this intention. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

[If the prosecution argue that the accused aided or abetted the offender by his/her presence alone, add the following shaded section.]

You will note that in this case the prosecution did not allege that NOA said or did anything at the time of the offence to assist or encourage NO3P. They alleged that it was NOA's presence at the time that NO3P committed NOO that aided or abetted NO3P.

The law recognises that a person can intentionally aid or abet the commission of an offence by being present when the offence is committed. However, for this to be the case, you must find that NOA intended his/her presence at the crime scene to have aided or abetted NO3P to commit NOO. It is not sufficient for him/her simply to have been there at the relevant time, or to have simply been passing by.

In determining whether NOA intended his/her presence at the commission of the offence to aid or abet NOO, you should view his/her conduct as a whole, before and at the time of the alleged offence, and consider whether s/he was linked in purpose with NO3P in some way, such that his/her presence assisted or encouraged NO3P.

If you find that NOA's presence was not intended to have aided or abetted NO3P, then this element will not be met. However, if you are satisfied that NOA had that intention, then this element will be met.

[If not already done, identify the matters said to constitute aiding or abetting NOO.]

Withdrawal

[If termination of the accused's involvement is in issue, add the following shaded section.[321]]

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused did not effectively terminate his/her involvement prior to the offence being committed.

The law says that, for a person not to be taken to have committed the offence, s/he must terminate his/her involvement and take all reasonable steps to prevent the offence being committed. His/her termination must be timely and effective.

Whether the accused has taken all reasonable steps to prevent the commission of the offence is a question for you. You must apply your common sense and experience. For example, in some cases it will be enough for the accused to take back any tools he or she has provided for the commission of the crime, and to make it clear that if the principal offender commits the offence, s/he does so without the accused's approval or support. In some cases it may be necessary for the accused to inform the police of the planned offence.

It is not for the defence to prove that NOA terminated his/her involvement in NOO in a timely and effective manner. It is the prosecution who must prove that NOA did not take all reasonable steps to prevent NOO being committed.

The prosecution argued that NOA had not taken all reasonable steps to prevent NOO. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing that NOA terminated his/her involvement in a timely and effective manner. [Insert relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not already done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Defences

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert relevant directions.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of committing NOO by aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the principal offender to commit NOO, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that someone committed NOO; and

Two – that the accused in fact aided or abetted NO3P to commit NOO; and

Three – that the accused intended for their conduct to aid or abet the principal offender to commit NOO;

[If termination is relevant, add the following shaded section.]

and Four – that NOA did not effectively terminate his/her earlier involvement.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of NOO by aiding or abetting its commission.

[321] To reflect the different statutory language, this element of the charge is different to the termination element for a charge under s 11.2A (joint commission).

3. The accused intended to assist or encourage the principal offender to commit the offence; and

4. The accused did not effectively terminate his/her involvement before the offence was committed.[323]

Offence committed

1. Did someone commit the offence charged?[324]

Consider – Has the prosecution proven all elements of that offence?

If Yes, then go to Question 2.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of aiding or abetting the offence charged

---

Actual assistance or encouragement

2.1 Did the accused do something that helped the principal offender to commit the offence?

If Yes, then go to Question 3.1

If No, then go to Question 2.2

2.2. Did the accused do something that encouraged the principal offender to commit the offence?

If Yes, then go to Question 3.1

If No, then go to Question 2.3

2.3. Did the accused do something that conveyed to the principal offender, by words or presence or behaviour, that s/he supported the commission of the offence?

If Yes, then go to Question 3.1

---

[322] If counselling/procuring is being alleged, adjust the language in this checklist accordingly.

[323] This should be deleted if termination is not in issue.

[324] If the jury has received a separate checklist outlining the elements of the offence, it may be desirable to include a cross-reference to that checklist here, noting which elements of the offence must be proven for this element to be met.

If No, then the accused is not guilty of aiding or abetting the offence charged

*Consider – What effect did the accused's words, presence or behaviour have on the principal offender?

Intention

3.1 At the time the accused assisted or encouraged the principal offender, did s/he know, or believe in, the essential circumstances that make up the offence?

If Yes, then go to Question 4.1

If No, then go to Question 3.2

3.2 At the time the accused assisted or encouraged the principal offender, was s/he aware that their conduct would bring about the commission of the offence in the ordinary course of events?

If Yes, then go to Question 4.1[325]

If No, then the accused is not guilty of aiding or abetting the offence charged

Termination

4.1 Did the accused terminate his or her involvement in a timely manner, before the offence was committed?

Consider – How long before the offence was committed did the accused withdraw his/her assistance/encouragement?

If Yes, then go to Question 4.2

If No, then the accused is guilty of aiding or abetting the offence charged (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2, and 3)

4.2 Did the accused take all reasonable steps to prevent the offence being committed?

Consider – What steps did the accused take? In the circumstances, were those all the steps s/he could reasonably take?

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by pursuing a joint enterprise

If No, then the accused is guilty of aiding or abetting the offence charged (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2, and 3)

5.7.3 Charge: Commonwealth Complicity Type of Offence in Issue

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

[325] If termination is not in issue, the checklist ends here, and this should be adjusted to note that a Yes means that the accused is guilty of the offence charged.

This Charge has been designed for use in cases where the accused is charged with being involved in the commission of an offence via Criminal Code (Cth) s 11.2(1), where there is an issue about whether the offence committed was of the same type as the offence the accused intended to aid, abet, counsel or procure, or the charge is based on the accused having been reckless about the offence actually committed.

For other forms of complicity for Commonwealth offences, see:

i) Charge: Commonwealth Complicity – Type of offence not in issue

ii) Charge: Commonwealth Joint Commission – Accordance with Agreement

iii) Charge: Commonwealth Joint Commission – Course of Agreement

This charge refers to two different offences. The charged offence is the offence which is charged on the indictment. The intended offence is the offence the prosecution identifies as the one which the accused intended to aid, abet, counsel or procure. This will be identified by the prosecution during the course of the trial.

This charge refers only to aiding or abetting. If the accused's alleged conduct is properly classified as counselling or procuring, the charge should be adapted accordingly.

NOA has been charged with the offence of [insert charged offence]. However, it has not been alleged that s/he personally committed the acts that make up that offence. Instead, the prosecution has alleged that s/he committed [insert charged offence] by aiding or abetting NO3P to commit that offence. I must therefore direct you about when a person will be held responsible for aiding or abetting someone else to commit an offence.

In order to find NOA guilty of NOO by aiding or abetting its commission, the prosecution must prove the following [three/four] elements:[326]

One – that someone committed the offence of NOO. Throughout these directions, I will call the person who committed that offence the "principal offender".

Two – that NOA actually aided or abetted the principal offender to commit NOO.

Three – that NOA had the necessary state of mind when aiding or abetting the principal offender to commit [insert intended offence].

[If termination is relevant, add the following shaded section.] and Four – that NOA did not effectively terminate his/her involvement prior to the offence being committed.

Before you can find NOA guilty of [insert charged offence], you must be satisfied that all of these elements have been proven beyond reasonable doubt.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Commission of Offence

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that someone committed [insert charged offence].

In this case, this requires you to be satisfied that all of the following matters have been proven beyond reasonable doubt:

[Describe all of the elements of the charged offence, explain those elements, and relate them to the facts.]

---

[326] If termination is relevant, there are four elements. Otherwise, there are three elements.

[If NOA may have committed the offence him/herself, add the following shaded section.]

Now, you may not be sure whether NOA either committed [insert charged offence] himself/herself, or assisted NO3P to do so. You do not need to resolve this question to reach your verdict. The law says that if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that NOA either committed the offence himself/herself, or aided or abetted another person to commit the offence, you may find him/her guilty of [insert charged offence].

Aid, Abet, Counsel or Procure

Caution! Part of this direction concerns the meaning of the words 'in fact'. The law on this issue is unclear. See 5.7 Commonwealth Complicity (s 11.2) for guidance.

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused in fact aided or abetted NO3P to commit [insert charged offence].

A person aids or abets the principal offender if s/he:

[insert the following bullet points as appropriate]

- helps him/her to commit the offence; or
- encourages him/her to commit the offence; or
- conveys to him/her that s/he supports the commission of the offence.

A person can aid or abet an offence by words, action or both.

[If counselling/procuring is being alleged, insert the following bullet points as appropriate]

A person counsels the principal offender or procures an offence if s/he:

- urges, advises or solicits him/her to commit the offence; or
- encourages or supports him/her to commit the offence; or

A person can counsel or procure an offence by words, action or both.

In this case, the prosecution argue that NOA aided or abetted the offending by [identify relevant prosecution evidence and arguments]. The defence deny this, and say [identify relevant evidence and arguments].

As part of this element, you also need to consider whether NOA's actions actually aided or abetted NO3P's offending. This means you must consider what effect NOA's actions had on whether NOO was committed. [Insert relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA actually aided or abetted NO3P to commit [insert charged offence] that this second element will be met.

State of mind

Caution! Part of this direction concerns the meaning of the words 'of the type'. The law on this issue is unclear. See 5.7 Commonwealth Complicity (s 11.2) for guidance.

The third element looks at NOA's state of mind. There are three parts to this element.[327]

The prosecution does not argue that NOA intended to aid or abet [insert charged offence]. Instead, the prosecution argues that s/he intended to aid or abet NO3P to commit a different offence, [insert intended offence].

To prove this, the prosecution must first show that at the time NOA [identify the conduct of NOA that is alleged as having aided or abetted the offending], s/he meant to aid or abet NO3P to commit [insert intended offence]. They must show that NOA knew all the essential facts needed to establish [insert intended offence], or believed that those essential facts existed. This is because a person cannot intentionally aid or abet an offence unless s/he knows the essential facts of that offence.

[Summarise all of the elements of the intended offence, subject to any special liability provisions that apply, relating those to the facts alleged.]

You must find that NOA him/herself actually knew of, or believed in, all of these circumstances at the time s/he [describe the conduct alleged to have aided or abetted]. It is not enough for you to find that s/he should have known those circumstances.

The prosecution alleged that NOA had the necessary knowledge or belief. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

If you are satisfied that NOA knew of these essential circumstances, you must then consider whether s/he intended to aid or abet the commission of [insert intended offence].

[If the prosecution argued that the accused aided or abetted the offender by his/her presence alone, add the following shaded section.]

You will note that in this case the prosecution did not allege that NOA said or did anything at the time of the offence to assist or encourage NO3P. They alleged that it was NOA's presence at the time that NO3P committed [intended offence] that aided or abetted NO3P.

The law recognises that a person can intentionally aid or abet the commission of an offence by being present when the offence is committed. However, for this to be the case, you must find that NOA intended his/her presence at the crime scene to have aided or abetted NO3P to commit [insert intended offence]. It is not sufficient for him/her simply to have been there at the relevant time, or to have simply been passing by.

In determining whether NOA intended his/her presence to aid or abet [insert intended offence], you should view his/her conduct as a whole, before and at the time of the alleged offence, and consider whether s/he was linked in purpose with NO3P in some way, such that his/her presence assisted or encourage NO3P.

If you find that NOA's presence was not intended to have aided or abetted NO3P, then this element will not be met. However, if you are satisfied that NOA had that intention, then this element will be met.

[If not already done, identify the matters said to constitute aiding or abetting NOO.]

[327] If it is not open to the jury to find that the intended offence and the charged offence are of the same type, this direction must be modified. In such a case, there will only be two parts to the third element: intention to aid or abet the intended offence and recklessness about the commission of the charged offence.

Second, you must consider the relationship between [insert intended offence] and [insert charged offence]. The law says that if you find that [insert intended offence] is of the same type as [insert charged offence], then this third element only requires proof that NOA intended that his/her conduct would aid or abet NO3P to commit [insert intended offence]. Otherwise, there is an additional requirement which I will explain in a moment.

It is a question for you to decide whether [insert intended offence] is of the same type as [insert charged offence]. The law does not specify what you must consider to decide this question. The prosecution says that these two offences are of the same type because [identify relevant prosecution evidence and arguments]. Defence say you should reject this, arguing [identify relevant evidence and arguments].[328]

Remember, the prosecution must satisfy you beyond reasonable doubt that [insert intended offence] and [insert charged offence] are of the same type. If you are satisfied, then you do not need to consider the third part of this element, which I explain shortly. If you are not satisfied – that is, if you find that the two offences are not of the same type – then you must go on to consider the third part of this element.[329]

The third part of this element is that NOA was reckless about the commission of [insert charged offence].

To prove this, the prosecution must show that NOA was aware of a substantial risk that NO3P would [identify elements of charged offence]. These are the same [insert number of elements] matters which the prosecution needed to prove in relation to the first element.[330]

The prosecution must also show that it was unjustifiable for NOA to take that risk in the circumstances known to him/her.

There is an important difference between this element and the first element. The first element looks at what happened following NOA's conduct to aid or abet an offence. Has the prosecution proved that a person committed [insert charged offence]? In contrast, this element looks at what NOA knew or was aware of at the time the prosecution contends that s/he aided or abetted NO3P. Has the prosecution proved that s/he was aware of a substantial risk that NO3P would commit [insert charged offence] and that it was unjustified to take that risk?

[Identify relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Withdrawal

[If termination of the accused's involvement is in issue, add the following shaded section.][331]

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused did not effectively terminate his/her involvement prior to the offence being committed.

The law says that, for a person not to be taken to have committed the offence, s/he must terminate his/her involvement and take all reasonable steps to prevent the offence being committed. His/her

---

[328] The jury may ask for examples of offences that may be 'same type'. 5.7 Commonwealth Complicity includes two examples, but these may not be appropriate in all cases. Consider providing a case-specific example.

[329] If the jury asks what to do if they disagree, internally, about whether an offence is the same type, instruct them to consider the third part of the state of mind element (recklessness).

[330] This statement must be modified if any of the physical elements of the completed offence are subject to a special liability provision.

[331] To reflect the different statutory language, this element of the charge is different to the termination element for a charge under s 11.2A (joint commission).

termination must be timely and effective.

Whether the accused has taken all reasonable steps to prevent the commission of [insert charged offence] is a question for you. You must apply your common sense and experience. For example, in some cases it will be enough for the accused to take back any tools he or she has provided for the commission of the crime, and to make it clear that if the principal offender commits the offence, s/he does so without the accused's approval or support. In some cases it may be necessary for the accused to inform the police of the planned offence.

It is not for the defence to prove that NOA terminated his/her involvement in NOO in a timely and effective manner. It is the prosecution who must prove that NOA did not take all reasonable steps to prevent NOO being committed.

The prosecution argued that NOA had not taken all reasonable steps to prevent NOO. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing that NOA terminated his/her involvement in a timely and effective manner. [Insert relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not already done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Defences

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert relevant directions.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of committing NOO by aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the principal offender to commit NOO, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that someone committed [insert charged offence]; and

Two – that the accused actually aided or abetted NO3P to commit [insert charged offence]; and

Three – that NOA had the necessary state of mind when aiding or abetting the principal offender to commit [insert intended offence].

[If termination is relevant, add the following shaded section.]

and Four – that NOA did not effectively terminate his/her earlier involvement.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of [insert charged offence].

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. Someone committed the offence charged; and

2. The accused actually assisted or encouraged the principal offender to commit the offence;[332] and

3. When the accused assisted or encouraged the principal offender to commit the offence, s/he had the necessary state of mind; and

4. The accused did not effectively terminate his/her involvement before the offence was committed.[333]

Consider – Has the prosecution proven all elements of that offence?

If Yes, then go to Question 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of aiding or abetting the offence charged

2.1 Did the accused do something that helped the principal offender to commit the offence?

If Yes, then go to Question 3.1

If No, then go to Question 2.2

2.2. Did the accused do something that encouraged the principal offender to commit the offence?

If Yes, then go to Question 3.1

If No, then go to Question 2.3

2.3. Did the accused do something that conveyed to the principal offender, by words or presence or behaviour, that s/he supported the commission of the offence?

If Yes, then go to Question 3.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of aiding or abetting the offence charged

[332] If counselling/procuring is being alleged, adjust the language in this checklist accordingly.

[333] This should be deleted if termination is not in issue.

If Yes, then go to Question 3.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of aiding or abetting the offence charged

3.2 Did the accused intend to assist or encourage the principal offender to commit an offence of the same type as the offence that s/he has been charged with aiding or abetting?

If No, then the accused is not guilty of aiding or abetting the offence charged

Termination

4.1 Did the accused terminate his or her involvement in a timely manner, before the offence was committed?

Consider – How long before the offence was committed did the accused withdraw his/her assistance/encouragement?

If Yes, then go to Question 4.2

If No, then the accused is guilty of aiding or abetting the offence charged (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2, and 3)

Consider – What steps did the accused take? In the circumstances, were those all the steps s/he could [335] If there is an issue about whether the intended offence and the charged offence are 'of the same type', it may be desirable to provide a document showing the elements of the intended offence, so that the jury can clearly see what it is that that the accused allegedly intended.

[336] If termination is not in issue, the checklist ends here, and this should be adjusted to note that a Yes means that the accused is guilty of the offence charged.

5.8 Commonwealth Joint Commission (s 11.2A)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

General Principles

1. Criminal Code s 11.2A(1) provides that:

> (1) If:
>
> (a) a person and at least one other party enter into an agreement to commit an offence; and
> (b) either:
> (i) an offence is committed in accordance with the agreement ...; or
> (ii) an offence is committed in the course of carrying out the agreement ...;
> the person is taken to have committed the joint offence ... and is punishable accordingly.

2. Section 11.2A does not create an offence, but extends criminal responsibility to all those who enter into an agreement to commit an offence (Franze v R [2014] VSCA 352 [97]). It codifies the law of joint criminal enterprise (s 11.2A(1)(b)(i)) and extended common purpose (s 11.2A(1)(b)(ii)) (see R v Franze (Ruling No 2) (2013) 37 VR 101 [20]; Masri v R [2015] NSWCCA 243 [1]).
3. Section 11.2A applies to offences committed after 20 February 2010. It was introduced with the Crimes Legislation Amendment (Serious and Organised Crime) Act 2010 (Cth) after it was recognised that, prior to the amendment, the Code lacked any provision extending criminal liability in circumstances involving an agreement to commit an offence (Handlen v R; Paddison v R (2011) 245 CLR 282 [1]).

Liability

4. Section 11.2A of the Code provides two forms of liability for joint commission. The first form of liability is an analogue to joint criminal enterprise. The prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that:

   i) The accused entered into an agreement with at least one other person to commit an offence (the joint offence)

   ii) The accused and at least one other party to the agreement intended that the joint offence would be committed under the agreement

   iii) The joint offence was committed in accordance with the agreement (ss 11.2A(1), (2), (4); Tartaglia v The Queen (2022) 367 FLR 149).

5. This form of liability is referred to in this topic as joint commission of an offence in accordance with an agreement.
6. The second form of liability is a statutory analogue to extended common purpose and covers the situation where there is divergence between the agreement and the committed offence. Proof of this form of liability requires the prosecution to show, beyond reasonable doubt, that:

    i) The accused entered into an agreement with at least one other person to commit an offence (the foundational offence)

    ii) The accused and at least one other party to the agreement intended that an offence would be committed under the agreement

    iii) The accused was reckless about the commission of a different offence (the charged offence) that another party in fact committed in the course of carrying out the agreement (ss 11.2A(1), (3), (4)).

7. This form of liability is referred to in this topic as joint commission of an offence in the course of carrying out an agreement.
8. An accused may be found guilty of jointly committing an offence even if they were not present while any of the conduct constituting the offence charged was engaged in (Criminal Code s 11.2A(7)(b)).

Joint Commission of an offence in accordance with an agreement

Agreement to Commit an Offence

9. The first matter the prosecution must prove is that the accused and at least one other party entered into an agreement to commit an offence (Criminal Code s 11.2A(1)(a)).
10. The agreement must be entered into before or at the same time as the acts or omissions constituting the charged offence (Criminal Code s 11.2A(5)(b)).
11. Other than specifying that the agreement may be a non-verbal understanding (Criminal Code s 11.2A(5)(a)), the Code does not define 'agreement'. The scope of the term is likely to be informed by common law principles in relation to joint criminal enterprise. For details, see 'Agreement to Pursue a Joint Enterprise to Commit a Crime' in 5.3 Joint Criminal Enterprise (Pre-1/11/14).
12. This is consistent with the common law position (see McAuliffe v The Queen (1995) 183 CLR 108).
13. The agreed criminal conduct must be capable of definition with some degree of certainty (R v Franze (Ruling No 1) (2013) 37 VR 101; Weng v R [2013] VSCA 221, [71]).

Parties with a mental impairment

14. At common law, it was possible for a person who could not understand that his or her actions were wrong to still be part of an agreement to commit an offence. That person's actions could be attributed to other parties to the agreement, even though the person with the impairment may not be criminally liable for the offence because he or she was suffering from a mental impairment (Matusevich v The Queen (1977) 137 CLR 633; Osland v The Queen (1998) 197 CLR 316).
15. In Matusevich, Aicken J (Stephen, Mason, Murphy JJ agreeing) noted that careful directions would be required in such a situation. The jury would need to consider whether the party alleging a mental impairment understood the nature and quality of what he or she did to contribute to the agreement. If he or she did not have that understanding, there could be no joint commission, because there could be no agreement. However, if he or she could understand the nature of their activity but could not understand that it was wrong, he or she could nevertheless form an agreement.

16. In some cases, it may be more appropriate for the prosecution to place a charge under s 11.3 of the Code, commission by proxy.

Intention

17. The second matter the prosecution must prove is that the accused and at least one other party to the agreement intended that an offence would be committed under the agreement.

18. Section 5.2 of the Code defines intention and identifies that a person can have intention with respect to conduct, a circumstance or a result. The drafting of s 11.2A(4) suggests that the relevant form of intention is intention with respect to result. That is, the prosecution must show that the accused meant to bring about the commission of an offence when they entered into the agreement, or were aware that this would occur in the ordinary course of events (Criminal Code s 5.2(3)).

19. Section 11.2A(4) speaks of intention to commit an offence, and is not expressly limited to the offence charged or agreed on. The broad language used is likely due to the fact that the same sub-section applies to intention for offences committed both in accordance with and in the course of carrying out the agreement.

20. At common law, the accused was required to have the state of mind relevant to the agreed offence (R v Clarke & Johnstone [1986] VR 643; Johns v R (1980) 143 CLR 108; McAuliffe v R (1995) 183 CLR 108; R v Taufahema [2007] HCA 11; Likiardopoulos v R [2010] VSCA 344; Arafan v R [2010] VSCA 356). By including a separate element of intention in s 11.2A, it appears that this aspect of the common law does not apply.

21. The most likely interpretation in the context of offences committed in accordance with the agreement is that the accused (and another party to the agreement) must have intended to commit an offence of the same type as the joint offence. This accords with the language of s 11.2A(2)(a).

22. Section 11.2A(4) is subject to s 11.2A(8), which states that any special liability provisions that apply to an offence also apply for the purposes of joint commission. This means that the prosecution will not need to establish intention in relation to any physical elements of the offence that are subject to a special liability provision (R v Franze (Ruling No 1) [2013] VSC 229 [17]). For further information, see 'Substantive offences and special liability provisions' below.

Offence Committed in Accordance with Agreement

23. The third matter the prosecution must prove is that the offence was committed in accordance with the agreement (Criminal Code s 11.2A(1)(b)(i)).

24. Section 11.2A(2) explains that an offence is committed in accordance with the agreement if:

    (a) the conduct of one or more of the parties in accordance with the agreement makes up the physical elements of an offence (the joint offence) of the same type as the offence agreed to; and

    (b) to the extent that a physical element of the joint offence consists of a result of conduct, that result arises from the conduct engaged in; and

    (c) to the extent that a physical element of the joint offence consists of a circumstance, the conduct engaged in, or a result of the conduct engaged in, occurs in that circumstance.

25. In the context of s 11.2A(2), conduct can either be an act or an omission to perform an act (Criminal Code s 4.1).

26. The prosecution will need to prove all physical elements of the offence charged. It will not be sufficient for the prosecution to demonstrate that only some of the physical elements have been completed. If some of the physical elements are incomplete, the prosecution should rely on attempting to commit the relevant offence.

27. The prosecution must also prove that the offence was committed in accordance with the agreement. It must have come within the scope of the parties' agreement (R v Jensen and Ward [1980] VR 196; R v PDJ (2002) 7 VR 612; R v Anderson [1966] 2 QB 110; R v Heaney & Ors [1992] 2 VR 531). Determining whether the offence was within the scope of the agreement will likely rely on common law principles. For further information, see 'Acts Must have been Within the Scope of the Agreement' in 5.3 Joint Criminal Enterprise (Pre-1/11/14).

Type of Offence

28. An offence is committed in accordance with the agreement if the offence committed is of the 'same type' as that which was agreed to (Criminal Code s 11.2A(2)(a)).

29. There have not yet been any reported cases examining the meaning of 'same type' in s 11.2A. For guidance on what it may include, see 5.7 Commonwealth Complicity (s 11.2).

Accused's Participation

30. At common law, offending as part of a group required proof of an additional element that the accused participated in the joint enterprise in some way. The prosecution was required to prove that the accused took a step or steps toward committing the agreed offence (R v Clarke & Johnstone [1986] VR 643; R v Lao & Nguyen (2002) 5 VR 129; Likiardopoulos v R [2010] VSCA 344; Arafan v R [2010] VSCA 356).

31. Several judgments have assumed that this is also a requirement under the Code, though such statements have been obiter (see, e.g. Romolo v The Queen [2018] NSWCCA 3, [52]; R v Franze (No 2) (2013) 37 VR 101, [20]; Inegbedion v The Queen [2013] NSWCCA 291, [52]).

32. Most recently, the South Australian Court of Appeal considered the issue as part of a ground of appeal and held that there is no separate requirement of proving participation as part of offending under s 11.2A. The Court considered there was no textual basis for importing such a requirement, and the principles of statutory interpretation applicable to codes do not support approaching s 11.2A as though it was simply a restatement of the common law. The Court also observed that the conspiracy provisions in s 11.5 do require proof of an overt act as part of a conspiracy, and if Parliament had wanted to include a similar requirement for s 11.2A, it could have done so (Tartaglia v The Queen (2022) 367 FLR 149, [51]–[61])..

Joint Commission of an offence in the course of carrying out an agreement

33. Section 11.2A(3) provides for the situation where, in the course of carrying out an agreement to commit one offence, a different offence is committed. In this situation, the accused is guilty of the charged offence if:

    i) He or she entered into an agreement with at least one other person to commit an offence (the foundational offence)

    ii) He or she and at least one other party to the agreement intended that an offence would be committed under the agreement

    iii) He or she was reckless about the commission of a different offence (the charged offence) that another party in fact committed in the course of carrying out the agreement (ss 11.2A(1), (3), (4)).

Agreement to Commit an Offence

34. As with joint commission in accordance with an agreement, the first matter the prosecution must prove is that the accused and at least one other party entered into an agreement to commit an offence (the foundational offence) (Criminal Code s 11.2A(1)(a)).

35. The same principles as those discussed above in relation to joint commission in accordance with an agreement apply here.

Intention

36. The second matter the prosecution must prove is that the accused and at least one other party to the agreement must have intended that an offence would be committed under the agreement.

37. Section 5.2 of the Code defines intention and identifies that a person can have intention with respect to conduct, a circumstance or a result. The drafting of s 11.2A(4) suggests that the relevant form of intention is intention with respect to result. That is, the prosecution must show that the accused meant to bring about the commission of an offence when they entered into the agreement, or be aware that this would occur in the ordinary course of events (Criminal Code s 5.2(3)).

38. Section 11.2A(4) speaks of intention to commit an offence, and is not expressly limited to the offence charged or agreed on. This could mean that the intention relates to either the foundational or charged offence. The broad language used is likely due to the fact that the same sub-section applies to intention for offences committed both in accordance with and in the course of carrying out the agreement.

39. In the absence of case authority, this Charge Book adopts the view that, to establish intention in relation to joint commission of an offence committed in the course of an agreement, the accused (and another party to the agreement) must have intended to commit an offence of the same type as the foundational offence, which accords with the language of s 11.2A(2)(a). This is because recklessness is the relevant form of fault with respect to the charged offence.

40. Section 11.2A(4) is subject to s 11.2A(8), which states that any special liability provisions that apply to an offence also apply for the purposes of joint commission. This means that the prosecution will not need to establish intention in relation to any physical elements of the foundational offence that are subject to a special liability provision (see R v Franze (Ruling No 1) [2013] VSC 229 [17]). For further information, see below under 'Substantive offences and special liability provisions'.

Offence Committed in the Course of Carrying out Agreement

41. The third matter the prosecution must prove is that the accused was reckless about the commission of a different offence (the charged offence) that another party in fact committed in the course of carrying out the agreement (Criminal Code s 11.2A(1)(b)(i)).

42. There are two aspects of this. First, the prosecution must prove that the charged offence was committed; and second, they must prove that the accused was reckless about the commission of the charged offence.

Offence committed

43. At common law, proving an offence was committed via extended common purpose required the prosecution to demonstrate that one or more parties to the agreement performed the acts necessary to commit the offence charged, and had the necessary mental state. Nothing in the text of s 11.2A suggests that Commonwealth joint commission intends to depart from that position.

44. This Charge Book adopts the view that, consistently with common law, to establish that an offence was committed in accordance with an agreement under s 11.2A(3) the prosecution must demonstrate that all of the physical elements of the offence charged were committed, and that the principal offender(s) had the necessary fault elements for that offence.

45. It is not necessary for the principal offender(s) to have been prosecuted or found guilty before an accused may be found guilty of the joint offence (Criminal Code s 11.2A(7)(a)).

Recklessness as to the offence committed

46. The prosecution must also prove that the accused was reckless about the commission of the charged offence; the offence that was actually committed.

47. A person is reckless when they are aware of a substantial risk that a result or circumstance will occur, and it is unjustifiable for them to take that risk given the circumstances known to them (Criminal Code s 5.4).

48. At common law, the accused must have foreseen the possibility of the offence charged occurring (Miller v R [2016] HCA 30 [4]). This differs from the recklessness provision in s 11.2A(3), which requires awareness of a substantial risk. In this respect the Code departs from the common law.

49. In the context of s 11.2A(3), the prosecution needs to demonstrate that the accused was aware of a substantial risk that the principal offender would commit the offence charged while carrying out the agreement, and it was unjustifiable for the accused to take that risk.

50. The jury must determine whether it is unjustifiable to take a risk on the facts known to the accused (s 5.4(1)(b)). However, the accused does not need to have believed that it was unjustifiable to take the risk. The test is objective not subjective.

51. The question of whether a risk is unjustifiable requires the jury to make a moral or value judgment relating to the accused's advertent disregard of risk (R v Saengsai-Or (2004) 61 NSWLR 135).

52. The jury must assess the likelihood of the risk eventuating, and determine whether the risk is one that should not have been taken (Lustig v R (2009) 195 A Crim R 310).

Withdrawal

53. A person cannot be found guilty under s 11.2A if, before any conduct constituting part of the charged offence was committed:

    - they terminated their involvement; and
    - took all reasonable steps to prevent the conduct from being engaged in (Criminal Code s 11.2A(6)).

54. The accused bears the evidential burden of pointing to evidence that suggests a reasonable possibility that they terminated their involvement in the agreement and took all reasonable steps to prevent the conduct constituting an offence to be engaged in (s 13.4).

55. If the accused meets the evidential burden, the prosecution will then have to prove that the accused did not effectively terminate their involvement.

56. At common law, withdrawal requires the accused to take all action the accused can reasonably take to undo the effect of his or her previous encouragement or assistance, and this can include informing the police (see White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342; R v Tietie (1988) 34 A Crim R 438; R v Jensen and Ward [1980] VR 196).

57. In contrast, withdrawal under the Code must occur before any aspect of the offending has taken place, and the second limb is to take 'all reasonable steps to prevent the conduct from being engaged in' (s 11.2A(6)(b)).

58. There do not appear to be any reported cases on the scope and operation of this requirement. The Explanatory Memorandum suggests that what will constitute 'reasonable steps' will differ depending on the case, but could include:

    - Discouraging other parties to the agreement;
    - Alerting the proposed victim;
    - Withdrawing goods necessary for committing the crime; and
    - Giving a timely warning to law enforcement before the offence is committed (Explanatory Memorandum, Crimes Legislation Amendment (Serious and Organised Crime) Bill 2009, 138).

59. While these considerations have not been endorsed by a court, they are provided as guidance for trial judges on the operation of s 11.2A(6).

60. Establishing whether the accused has effectively terminated their involvement may draw on common law principles about withdrawing from a joint criminal enterprise. For details, see 'Withdrawing From an Agreement' in 5.3 Joint Criminal Enterprise (Pre-1/11/14).

Substantive offences and special liability provisions

61. Any special liability provisions that apply to the offence charged also apply for the purposes of determining whether a person is guilty of committing the offence through s 11.2A (s 11.2A(8)).

62. The same principle applies for the purpose of attempt, incitement and conspiracy (Criminal Code ss 11.1(6A), 11.4(4A), 11.5(7A)).

63. 'Special liability provision' is defined as:

    (a) A provision that provides that absolute liability applies to one or more (but not all) of the physical elements of an offence; or

    (b) A provision that provides that, in a prosecution for an offence, it is not necessary to prove that the defendant knew a particular thing; or

    (c) A provision that provides that, in a prosecution for an offence, it is not necessary to prove that the defendant knew or believed a particular thing (Criminal Code Dictionary).

64. Fault elements such as knowledge, recklessness and negligence are not 'special liability provisions'.

65. In addition, strict liability, as defined in Criminal Code s 6.1, does not fit within the definition of special liability provision. Therefore, where strict liability applies, the common law rule that an accused must know the essential facts for a joint offence will continue to apply, and the prosecution must prove awareness of those facts (R v Ansari (2007) 70 NSWLR 89, [84]).

66. An example of how a special liability provision operates can be seen in the offence of importing a commercial quantity of a border controlled drug. Section 307.5(2) of the Code establishes absolute liability for possessing commercial quantities of an unlawfully imported border controlled drug or plant. When a person is charged with joint commission an offence against ss 307.5(1), 11.2A(6) means that there will be no need for the prosecution to prove the accused agreed or intended that the importation involve a specific quantity of drug (Franze v R [2014] VSCA 352 [150]–[153]).

Complicity and Attempt

67. It is not an offence to attempt to commit an offence against s 11.2A (Criminal Code s 11.1(7)). However, liability under s 11.2A extends to attempted offences. For example, where a person enters into an agreement with another person to import a border controlled drug but the importation is interrupted, s 11.2A enables the person to be charged with attempted importation (Franze v R [2014] VSCA 352 [3]).

5.8.1 Charge: Commonwealth Joint Commission Accordance with Agreement

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This Charge has been designed for use in cases where the accused is charged with being involved in the commission of an offence via Criminal Code (Cth) section 11.2A(1)(b)(i)).

For other forms of complicity for Commonwealth offences, see:

i) Charge: Commonwealth Complicity – Type of offence in issue

ii) Charge: Commonwealth Complicity – Type of offence not in issue

iii) Charge: Commonwealth Joint Commission – Course of Agreement

NOA has been charged with the offence of NOO. However, it has not been alleged that s/he committed that offence alone. Instead, the prosecution has alleged that s/he committed it by agreement with [insert names of co-offenders].

The law says that if a person agrees to commit an offence, then he or she may be responsible for committing that offence.

In order to find NOA guilty of NOO, the prosecution must prove the following [three/four] elements:[338]

One – the accused agreed with other people to commit NOO.

Two – that NOA and NO3P intended that an offence would be committed under the agreement.

Three – that, in accordance with that agreement, the parties to the agreement between them performed all of the acts necessary to commit NOO.

[If termination is relevant, add the following shaded section.]

Four – that NOA did not effectively terminate his/her involvement prior to the offence being committed.

Before you can find NOA guilty of NOO, you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proven all [three/four] of these elements beyond reasonable doubt.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Agree to Commit NOO

Caution! Part of this direction concerns the meaning of the words 'of the same type'. The law on this issue is unclear. See 5.8 Commonwealth Joint Commission (s 11.2A) for guidance.

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused agreed with other people to commit NOO.

A person can agree to commit an offence expressly, or you may infer that s/he agreed to commit an offence from the surrounding circumstances. You will recall what I have told you about inferences.[339]

[If the content of the agreement, or the parties' understanding of the content, is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

NOA must have agreed to commit an offence [if relevant, add: of the same type as] NOO. This element will not be satisfied if the accused agreed to pursue some other form of activity that is not criminal. However, you do not need to find that NOA and [identify relevant co-offenders] knew they were agreeing to commit a crime. This element will be satisfied as long as they agreed to do something which was actually criminal.

Similarly, you do not need to find that all of the parties had the same purpose when forming that agreement, or were all aware of the consequences of their actions. You do not even have to find that [338] If termination is relevant, there are four elements. Otherwise, there are three elements.

[339] This charge is based on the assumption that the judge has already instructed the jury about inferences. It will need to be modified if that has not been done.

they all agreed on the precise terms of the agreement. For this element to be satisfied, you only need to find that they agreed to do something which was actually criminal together.

An example is where two people agree to commit a bank robbery together, with one of them to buy the gun and give it to the other, who will use it at the bank to steal the money. If they carry out this plan, they would both be equally guilty of the crime of armed robbery.

[If the prosecution relies on NOO being of the same type as the offence agreed to, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution has argued that the acts performed under the agreement together make up NOO, and that this is an offence of the same type as the offence agreed to. What does it mean to be an offence of the same type as the agreed offence? The prosecution say that if NOA did not agree to NOO, then s/he agreed to [identify other offences said to be of the same type]. The prosecution says that these offences are of the same type as NOO because [identify relevant prosecution evidence and arguments]. Defence say you should reject this, arguing [identify relevant evidence and arguments]. It is a matter for you, using logic and common sense, whether [identify offences said to be of the same type] are offences of the same type as NOO. If you are satisfied that they are, then you may find this element proved if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA agreed to commit [identify offences said to be of the same type].

[If the timing of the agreement is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that it does not matter whether the agreement was made before, or at the same time, as NOA and [identify co-offenders] started committing NOO. For example, if a person were in the process of robbing a bank when he/she called on someone to help him/her unlock a safe, the person he/she called knew that the caller was robbing a bank, that person could be liable for the robbery even though he/she agreed to help after some of the work had already been done.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that [specify parties] agreed to commit NOO. They alleged that this agreement was made [insert prosecution evidence about the formation of the agreement].

[If the defence denies that there was an agreement to commit an offence, add the following shaded section.]

The defence denied this, arguing [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

This first element will only be met if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused agreed to commit [if relevant, add: an offence of the same type as] NOO.

Mental State

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused and NO3P intended that [insert if relevant: an offence like] NOO would be committed under the agreement. S/he must have intended the agreement to bring about NOO, or have been aware that NOO would occur in the ordinary course of events.

[Identify physical elements of NOO, subject to any special liability provisions that apply.]

It is only if you are satisfied that NOA intended that these elements would be committed under the agreement that this second element will be met.

Joint Offence Committed

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that, in accordance with their agreement, the parties between them performed all of the acts necessary to commit NOO.

There are two parts to this element. First, you must be satisfied that all of the necessary acts were committed by parties to the agreement. This means that you must find that all of the following matters have been proven beyond reasonable doubt:

[Describe all of the physical elements of the offence, explain those elements, and relate them to the facts.]

You do not need to find that each party to the agreement committed all of these acts. Even if they each only played a minor role, this part of the third element will be satisfied as long as all of the necessary acts were committed between the parties to the agreement.

The second part of this element requires the prosecution to prove that the commission of this offence was within the scope of the parties' agreement. That is, NOA and NO3P must have agreed to commit the acts that constitute that offence. NOA will not be guilty of committing NOO if that offence was outside the bounds of what s/he had agreed to.

To determine what acts were within the scope of the agreement, you must consider the beliefs the parties held at the time they made the alleged agreement. Whatever acts they all believed would or could be committed in the course of carrying out that agreement are to be treated as being within its scope.

[If the offence committed may not have been the primary purpose of the agreement, add the following shaded section.]

You will notice that I referred to acts that "would or could" be committed in the course of carrying out the agreement. This reflects the fact that the scope of an agreement includes any contingencies that are planned as part of that agreement. It is not limited to the acts the parties are definitely planning to carry out. So even if the parties were hoping to avoid committing a particular act, and did not think it was likely to be necessary, if there was a plan to perform that act if certain circumstances arose, then it should be treated as being within the scope of the agreement.

In this case the prosecution alleged that [describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is only if you are satisfied that the parties collectively performed all of the acts necessary to commit NOO, and that the commission of this offence was within the scope of the parties' agreement, that this third element will be met.

Withdrawal

[If termination of the accused's involvement is in issue, add the following shaded section.[340]]

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused did not effectively terminate his/her involvement prior to the performance of any aspect of NOO.

The law says that, for a person not to be liable as someone who agreed to commit an offence, then s/he must terminate his/her involvement and take all reasonable steps to prevent the offence being committed. His/her termination must be timely and effective.

Whether the accused has taken all reasonable steps to prevent the offence is a question for you. You must apply your common sense and experience. For example, in some cases it will be enough for the accused to take back any tools he or she has provided for the commission of the crime. In some cases it may be necessary for the accused to inform the police of the agreement.

It is not for the defence to prove that s/he terminated his/her involvement in NOO in a timely and effective manner. It is the prosecution who must prove that NOA did not take all reasonable steps to prevent any part of NOO being committed.

In this case, the prosecution argued that the accused had not taken all reasonable steps to prevent NOO. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing that NOA

[340] To reflect the different statutory language, this element of the charge is different to the termination element for a charge under s 11.2 (complicity).

terminated his/her involvement in a timely and effective manner. [Insert relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not already done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Defences

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert relevant directions.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of NOO, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused agreed with other people to commit an offence.

Two – that NOA and NO3P intended that an offence would be committed under the agreement

Three – that, in accordance with that agreement, the parties to the agreement between them performed all of the acts necessary to commit NOO.

[If termination is relevant, add the following shaded section.] and Four – that NOA did not effectively terminate his/her earlier involvement prior to the offence being committed.

5.8.2 Checklist: Commonwealth Joint Commission Accordance with Agreement

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused made an agreement with other people to commit an offence, and

2. The accused and at least one other party to the agreement intended that an offence would be committed; and

3. In accordance with the agreement, the parties between them performed all of the acts needed to commit the offence; and

4. The accused did not effectively terminate his/her involvement before the offence was committed.[341]

Agreement

1. Did the accused make an agreement with other people to commit the offence charged?[342]

---

[341] This should be deleted if termination is not in issue.

[342] This checklist will need to be adapted if there is an issue about whether the offence charged is the same type of offence as the offence agreed to.

If Yes, then go to Question 2.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by way of joint commission

Intention

2.1 Did the accused intend that an offence would be committed under the agreement?

Consider – Was the accused aware the offence would occur in the ordinary course of events?

If Yes, then go to Question 2.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by way of joint commission

2.2 Did one other party to the agreement intend that an offence would be committed under the agreement?

If Yes, then the go to Question 3.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by way of joint commission

Offence committed in accordance with agreement

3.1 Did the parties to the agreement commit all of the necessary acts to complete the offence?[343]

If Yes, then go to Question 3.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by way of joint commission

3.2. Was the offence within the scope of the parties' agreement?

Consider – What beliefs did the parties hold at the time they made the agreement? Did they believe that the offence would or could be committed in the course of carrying out the agreement?

If Yes, then go to Question 4.1[344]

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by way of joint commission

---

[343] If the jury has received a separate checklist outlining the elements of the offence, it may be desirable to include a cross-reference to that checklist here, noting the elements of the offence must be proven for this element to be met.

[344] If termination is not in issue, the checklist ends here, and this should be adjusted to note that a Yes means that the accused is guilty of the offence charged.

Termination

4.1 Did the accused terminate his or her involvement in the agreement before any part of the offence was committed?

If Yes, then go to Question 4.2

If No, then the accused is guilty of committing the offence charged by way of joint commission (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2 and 3)

4.2 Did the accused take all reasonable steps to prevent the offence from being committed?

Consider – What steps did the accused take? In the circumstances, were those all the steps s/he could reasonably take?

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by way of joint commission

If No, then the accused is guilty committing the offence charged by way of joint commission (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2 and 3)

5.8.3 Charge: Commonwealth Joint Commission Course of Agreement

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This Charge has been designed for use in cases where the accused is charged with being involved in the commission of an offence via Criminal Code (Cth) section 11.2A(1)(b)(ii)).

For other forms of complicity for Commonwealth offences, see:

i) Charge: Commonwealth Complicity – Type of offence in issue

ii) Charge: Commonwealth Complicity – Type of offence not in issue

iii) Charge: Commonwealth Joint Commission – Accordance with Agreement

NOA has been charged with the offence of [insert charged offence]. However, it has not been alleged that s/he committed that offence alone. Instead, the prosecution has alleged that NO3P committed that offence, but that NOA should be held responsible for NO3P's actions.

In order to find NOA guilty of [insert charged offence], the prosecution must prove the following [four/five] elements:[345]

One – the accused agreed with other people to commit an offence – [insert agreed offence].

Two – that the accused and NO3P intended that [insert agreed offence] would be committed under the agreement.

Three – that a party to the agreement committed [insert charged offence] in the course of carrying out the agreement.

Four – that NOA was reckless about whether [insert charged offence] would be committed in the course of carrying out the agreement.

[345] If termination is relevant, there are five elements. Otherwise, there are four elements.

[If termination is relevant, add the following shaded section.]

Five – that NOA did not effectively terminate his/her involvement prior to the offence being committed.

Before you can find NOA guilty of [insert charged offence], you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proven all [four/five] of these elements beyond reasonable doubt. I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Agree to Commit Offence

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused agreed with other people to commit [insert agreed offence]. This is a different offence to [insert charged offence]. You must be satisfied that the accused agreed to commit [insert agreed offence].

A person can agree to commit an offence expressly, or you may infer that s/he agreed to commit the offence from the surrounding circumstances. You will recall what I have told you about inferences.[346]

[If the content of the agreement, or the parties' understanding of the content, is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

NOA must have agreed to commit an [insert agreed offence]. This element will not be satisfied if the accused agreed to pursue some other form of activity that is not criminal. However, you do not need to find that NOA and [identify relevant co-offenders] knew they were agreeing to commit a crime. This element will be satisfied as long as they agreed to do something which was, in fact, criminal.

Similarly, you do not need to find that all of the parties had the same purpose or intention when forming that agreement, or were all aware of the consequences of their actions. You do not even have to find that they all agreed on the precise terms of the agreement. For this element to be satisfied, you only need to find that they agreed to commit a criminal offence together.

An example of two people agreeing to commit an offence is where two people agree to commit a bank robbery together, with one of them to buy the gun and give it to the other, who will use it at the bank to steal the money. Each of the two people would have agreed to commit the particular offence of armed robbery.

[If the timing of the agreement is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that it does not matter whether the agreement was made before, or at the same time, as NOA and [identify co-offenders] started offending. For example, if a person were in the process of robbing a bank when he/she called on someone to help him/her unlock a safe, the person they called could be liable for the robbery even though he/she agreed to help after some of the work had already been done.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that [specify parties] agreed to commit [insert agreed offence]. They alleged that this agreement was made [insert prosecution evidence about the formation of the agreement].

[If the defence denies that there was an agreement to commit an offence, add the following shaded section.]

The defence denied this, arguing [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused agreed to commit an offence that this first element will be met.

---

[346] This charge is based on the assumption that the judge has already instructed the jury about inferences. It will need to be modified if that has not been done.

Mental State

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused and at least one other party to the agreement intended that [insert agreed offence] would be committed under the agreement. They must have intended the agreement to bring about NOO, or have been aware that NOO would occur in the ordinary course of events.

[Identify physical elements of agreed offence, subject to any special liability provisions that apply.]

It is only if you are satisfied that NOA intended to enter into an agreement to commit [insert agreed offence] that this second element will be met.

Commission of Charged Offence

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that, in the course of carrying out the agreement, a party to the agreement committed [insert charged offence].

There are also two parts to this element. First, you must be satisfied that a party to the agreement committed [insert charged offence]. This means that you must find that all of the following matters have been proven beyond reasonable doubt:

[Describe all of the elements of the charged offence, explain those elements, and relate them to the facts.]

The second part of this element requires the prosecution to prove that a party to the agreement committed [insert charged offence] in the course of carrying out the agreement.

In this case the prosecution alleged that [describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments tying the offending to the agreement]. The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is only if you are satisfied that NO3P committed [insert charged offence], and that s/he committed this offence in the course of carrying out the agreement with NOA, that this third element will be met.

Recklessness

The fourth element the prosecution must prove is that, when NOA agreed to commit an offence, s/he was reckless about whether [insert charged offence] would be committed in the course of carrying out the agreement.

To satisfy this element, the prosecution must prove that NOA was aware of a substantial risk that NO3P would [identify elements of charged offence]. These are the same [insert number of elements] matters which the prosecution needed to prove in relation to the second element.

The prosecution must also show that it was unjustifiable for him/her to take that risk in the circumstances known to him/her. Whether taking such a risk is unjustifiable is a question of fact for you to determine. It does not matter whether NOA thought the risk was justified.

There is an important difference between this element and the second element. The second element looks at what happened in the course of carrying out the agreement. Has the prosecution proved that NO3P committed [insert charged offence]? In contrast, this element looks at what NOA was aware of at the time s/he made the agreement. Has the prosecution proved that s/he was aware of a substantial risk that someone would commit [insert charged offence]?

[Identify relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Withdrawal

[If termination of the accused's involvement is in issue, add the following shaded section.[347]]

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused did not effectively terminate his/her involvement prior to the performance of any aspect of [insert charged offence].

The law says that, for a person not to be liable as someone who agreed to commit an offence, then s/he must terminate his/her involvement and take all reasonable steps to prevent the offence being committed. His/her termination must be timely and effective.

Whether the accused has taken all reasonable steps to prevent the offence is a question for you. You must apply your common sense and experience. For example, in some cases it will be enough for the accused to take back any tools he or she has provided for the commission of the crime. In some cases it may be necessary for the accused to inform the police of the agreement.

It is not for the defence to prove that s/he terminated his/her involvement in NOO in a timely and effective manner. It is the prosecution who must prove that NOA did not take all reasonable steps to prevent any part of [insert charged offence] being committed.

In this case, the prosecution argued that the accused had not taken all reasonable steps to prevent [insert charged offence]. [Insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing that NOA terminated his/her involvement in a timely and effective manner. [Insert relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not already done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Defences

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert relevant directions.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of [insert charged offence], the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused agreed with other people to commit an offence.

Two – that NOA and NO3P intended that an offence would be committed under the agreement

Three – that, in accordance with that agreement, the parties to the agreement between them performed all of the acts necessary to commit NOO.

Four – that NOA was reckless about whether NOO would be committed in the course of carrying out the agreement.

[If termination is relevant, add the following shaded section.]

and Five – that NOA did not effectively terminate his/her earlier involvement prior to the offence

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused made an agreement with other people to commit an offence, and the agreement was still in place when [insert charged offence] was committed; and

2. The accused and at least one other party to the agreement intended that an offence would be committed under the agreement; and

3. A party to the agreement committed the offence charged while carrying out the agreement; and

4. The accused was reckless about whether the offence would be committed in the course of the agreement; and

5. The accused did not effectively terminate his/her involvement before the offence charged was committed.[348]

Agreement

1. Did the accused make an agreement with other people to commit an offence?

If Yes, then go to Question 2.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by way of joint commission

Intention

2.1 Did the accused intend that an offence would be committed under the agreement?

Consider – Was the accused aware that an offence would occur in the ordinary course of events?

If Yes, then go to Question 2.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by way of joint commission

2.2 Did one other party to the agreement intend that an offence would be committed under the agreement?

If Yes, then go to Question 3.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by way of joint commission

[348] This should be deleted if termination is not in issue.

Offence committed

3.1 Did a party to the agreement commit all of the necessary acts to complete the charged offence?[349]

If Yes, then go to Question 3.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by way of joint commission

3.2. Did that person commit the charged offence while carrying out the agreement?

If Yes, then go to Question 4.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by way of joint commission

Recklessness

4.1 Was the accused aware of a substantial risk that the charged offence would be committed while the agreement was being carried out?

If Yes, then go to Question 4.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by way of joint commission

4.2 Was it unjustifiable for the accused to take that risk?

If Yes, then go to Question 5.1[350]

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by way of joint commission

Termination

5.1 Did the accused terminate his or her involvement in the agreement before any part of the charged offence was committed?

If Yes, then go to Question 6.2

If No, then the accused is guilty of committing the offence charged by way of joint commission (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

---

[349] If the jury has received a separate checklist outlining the elements of the offence, it may be desirable to include a cross-reference to that checklist here, noting which elements of the offence must be proven for this element to be met.

[350] If termination is not in issue, the checklist ends here, and this should be adjusted to note that a Yes means that the accused is guilty of the offence charged.

5.2 Did the accused take all reasonable steps to prevent the offence from being committed?

Consider – What steps did the accused take? In the circumstances, were those all the steps s/he could reasonably take?

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of committing the offence charged by way of joint commission

If No, then the accused is guilty committing the offence charged by way of joint commission (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

5.9 Innocent Agent (Victorian Offences)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. In some cases a person will intentionally cause the physical elements of an offence to be committed by someone who will him/herself be innocent of that offence (an "innocent agent"). In such cases, the person who caused the innocent agent to act in that way will be guilty as a principal offender. The actions of the innocent agent will be attributed to him/her (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316; R v Hewitt [1997] 1 VR 301; R v Cogan & Leak [1976] QB 217*; White v Ridley* (1978) 140 CLR 342).
2. The accused's conduct in an innocent agent case will often be similar to that of a person who assists, encourages or directs the commission of an offence (see 5.2 Statutory Complicity (From 1/11/14)). However, the accused's liability in innocent agent cases is primary rather than derivative because the agent is not criminally responsible for the relevant conduct (R v Hewitt [1997] 1 VR 301).
3. The innocent agent doctrine is not concerned with a formal relationship of principal and agent. For that reason, it is sometimes referred to as the doctrine of "innocent instrument" (White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342) or "non-responsible agent" (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316 (McHugh J)).
4. To establish liability by way of the innocent agent doctrine, the prosecution must prove that:
    i) The accused intentionally caused a person to perform the acts which constitute the offence charged, in the circumstances necessary for the commission of that offence;
    ii) At the time the person performed those acts, the accused had the state of mind necessary to commit the offence; and
    iii) The agent is innocent of the offence (R v Hewitt [1997] 1 VR 301; R v Cogan & Leak [1976] QB 217; Matusevich v R (1977) 137 CLR 633; White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342).
5. The accused may commit an offence using an innocent agent even if, for some legal reason, the accused could not commit the offence him/herself (see, e.g. R v Cogan & Leak [1976] QB 217).

Causing the Agent to Perform the Acts Constituting the Offence

6. There are three aspects to the first element:
    i) The innocent agent must have performed all of the acts necessary for the offence to be committed, in the necessary circumstances;[351] and

ii) The accused's conduct must have caused the innocent agent to perform the relevant acts; and

iii) The accused's conduct must have been intentional.

7. The innocent agent does not need to have had the state of mind necessary for the commitment of the offence. It is the accused who must have had the requisite mental state (see below).

8. The accused does not need to be present when the offence is committed (White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342; Matusevich v R (1977) 137 CLR 633).

9. It is a question of fact for the jury whether the accused's conduct "caused" the innocent agent to perform the relevant acts. This should be assessed in a common sense manner (R v Hewitt [1997] 1 VR 301).

10. The prosecution does not need to establish that the accused's acts deprived the innocent agent of his/her free will. An accused may, for example, induce the agent to perform the physical acts by some form of deception (R v Hewitt [1997] 1 VR 301; White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342).

11. The innocent agent doctrine does not apply where the agent acts with the intention of implicating the principal in the charged offence (e.g. where the innocent agent is an undercover police officer). Such an agent does not act as the instrument of the principal, and so his/her acts cannot be attributed to the principal (R v Pinkstone (2004) 219 CLR 444).

Withdrawing From a Plan to Use an Innocent Agent

12. An accused may withdraw from a plan to use an innocent agent to commit an offence by issuing a timely countermand to the agent. This operates in the same way as the principles of withdrawal applicable to Statutory Complicity (see White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342 and 5.2 Statutory Complicity (From 1/11/14) for further information).

13. In some cases, the withdrawal must be accompanied by all acts the accused can reasonably take to undo the effect of his/her previous encouragement or assistance and require the accused to inform the agent that, if s/he proceeds with the agreed course of action, s/he will be committing a criminal offence (White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342).

Accused's Mental State

14. The second element examines the accused's state of mind. At the time the innocent agent performed the necessary acts (see above), the accused must have had the state of mind necessary to commit the relevant offence (R v Hewitt [1997] 1 VR 301; R v Cogan & Leak [1976] QB 217*; Matusevich v R* (1977) 137 CLR 633; White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342).

Agent Must be Innocent

15. The third element requires the prosecution to prove that the agent is innocent of the charged offence. If the agent is criminally responsible for the offence, the prosecution must rely on a different form of complicity (R v Hewitt [1997] 1 VR 301; R v Pinkstone (2004) 219 CLR 444; R v Franklin (2001) 3 VR 9; Latorre v R [2012] VSCA 280, [44]–[57]).

[351] "Necessary circumstances" may include facts requires for an offence that are not performed by the offender. For example, the complainant's lack of consent in rape.

16. The requirement that the agent be innocent is not concerned with an absence of moral responsibility or fault. It is only concerned with whether or not the agent is legally responsible for the conduct. For this reason, the innocent agent is sometimes called a non-responsible agent or an innocent instrumentality (Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316; R v Hewitt [1997] 1 VR 301).

17. An agent can be innocent for this purpose if the agent is not legally responsible for his/her actions due to a mental impairment (Matusevich v R (1977) 137 CLR 633).

5.9.1 Charge: Innocent Agent

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

NOA has been charged with the offence of NOO.[352] However, it has not been alleged that s/he committed that offence him/herself. Instead, the prosecution has alleged that s/he committed it by using an "innocent agent".

The law says that if the accused intentionally causes another person to commit criminal acts, the accused may be legally responsible for those acts, even if the person who committed them – the so-called "innocent agent" – is not. This is one of the situations in which the law holds a person responsible for the actions of other people.

To prove that NOA is guilty of NOO,[353] the prosecution must prove 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused intentionally caused another person to perform the acts that constitute the offence of NOO.

Two – at the time those acts were committed, the accused had the state of mind necessary to commit that offence.

Three – the person who committed those acts is innocent of that offence.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Acts of the Agent

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intentionally caused another person to perform all of the acts necessary to commit NOO, [in the necessary circumstances].[354]

In this case, that means that NOA caused NO3P to:

[Describe and explain all the elements of the offence charged, other than those relating to the offender's mental state, and relate to the facts.]

To find that NOA intentionally caused NO3P to commit these acts, you do not need to find that s/he deprived NO3P of his/her free will. It will be sufficient if s/he encouraged or persuaded him/her to perform these acts in some way. You should approach this question in a common sense manner.

---

[352] Name of Offence.

[353] If an alternative form of complicity is also argued, add "by using NO3P as an innocent agent".

[354] The phrase "in the necessary circumstances" should be added in cases where one or more elements of the crime require the physical acts to be committed under certain conditions (e.g. for sexual penetration to be committed in the absence of the complainant's consent).

The prosecution argued that NOA intentionally caused NO3P to commit the offence of NOO by [describe relevant evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA did intentionally cause NO3P to commit the relevant acts.

State of Mind

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that, at the time NO3P committed the relevant acts, NOA had the state of mind necessary to commit the offence.

In this case, that means that NOA must have [describe the relevant state of mind of the offence charged].

The prosecution argued that NOA had this state of mind at the relevant time. [Describe relevant evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Innocence of Agent

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that NO3P is innocent of NOO for some reason.

In this case, the prosecution argued that NO3P is innocent of NOO because [describe relevant evidence and/or argument, along with any relevant directions of law on the basis of the agent's innocence]. The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant evidence and/or arguments].

[If the prosecution relies on a form of complicity as an alternative, add the following shaded section.]

If you are unable to find that NO3P is innocent of NOO, you will need to consider an alternative basis of liability called [identify relevant form of complicity]. I will explain this basis of liability later.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find that NOA committed NOO,[355] the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA intentionally caused NO3P to perform the acts constituting the offence of NOO;[356] and

Two – That, when those acts were committed, NOA had the state of mind needed to commit NOO; and Three – That NO3P is innocent of committing NOO.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of committing NOO.

---

[355] If an alternative form of complicity is also argued, add "by using NO3P as an innocent agent".

[356] This summary will need to be modified to include the phrase "in the necessary circumstances" if one or more elements of the crime require the physical acts to be committed under certain conditions (e.g. for sexual penetration to be committed in the absence of the complainant's consent).

5.10 Commission by Proxy (Commonwealth Offences)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. Section 11.3 of the Criminal Code states:

> A person who:
> (a) has, in relation to each physical element of an offence, a fault element applicable to that physical element; and
> (b) procures conduct of another person that (whether or not together with conduct of the procurer) would have constituted an offence on the part of the procurer if the procurer had engaged in it; > is taken to have committed that offence and is punishable accordingly.

2. In contrast to other forms of complicity in Division 11 of the Criminal Code, s 11.3 does not refer to the operation of special liability provisions (compare Criminal Code s 11.1(6A), 11.2(6), 11.2A(8), 11.4(4A), 11.5(7A)).
3. However, given that s 11.3(a) refers to "a fault element applicable to that physical element", it is likely that any relevant special liability provisions will apply to determine the applicable fault elements.
4. Commission by proxy varies from its common law equivalent, innocent agency, in several respects. For information on innocent agency at common law, see 5.9 Innocent Agent (Victorian offences).
5. First, there is no requirement that the proxy is innocent of the completed offence. Commission by proxy operates in conjunction with, rather than as an alternative to, other forms of complicity (see Crimes Legislation Amendment (Serious and Organised Crime Bill 2009, Explanatory Memorandum, Item 4).
6. Second, s 11.3(b) requires that the conduct of the proxy be conduct that would have constituted an offence if the accused had engaged in the conduct. This excludes the operation of the principle where the accused is legally incapable of committing the offence charged (see, e.g. R v Cogan & Leak [1976] QB 217). For example, where an offence only applies to conduct by a Commonwealth public official (see, e.g. Criminal Code ss 139.2, 142.2), s 11.3 cannot be used where only the proxy, and not the accused, is a Commonwealth public official (I Leader-Elliot, The Commonwealth Criminal Code: A Guide for Practitioners, Australasian Institute of Judicial Administration, 2002, 267).
7. While this provision has been in operation since 1995, there have been no reported judgments examining how it operates. Judges should therefore seek submissions on how the principles apply in cases where it arises.

5.10.1 Charge: Commission by Proxy

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge should be inserted into a charge for the substantive offence after the judge lists the elements and before the judge explains the elements.

The judge will then need to adapt the directions on the elements of the offence, depending on the type of element in question.

If a physical element of consisting of conduct is in issue, the question will be "Did NOA cause NO3P to do this?"

If a physical element consisting of circumstance or result is in issue, the question will be "Did this circumstance or result exist (if relevant, in relation to NOA)?"

If a fault element is in issue, the question will be "Did NOA have this fault element?"

In this case, the prosecution has not alleged that NOA committed the offence him/herself. Instead, the prosecution has alleged that s/he committed it by using a proxy, NO3P.

The law says that if the accused causes another person to commit criminal acts, the accused is legally responsible for those acts.

So when I direct you about the elements, you will notice that the question for some elements is whether NOA caused NO3P to engage in certain conduct.

6 Conspiracy, Incitement and Attempts

6.1 Conspiracy to Commit an Offence (Victoria)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. It is an offence for two or more legal persons to conspire to commit a criminal offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 321; Ahern v R (1988) 165 CLR 87).
2. This is a form of inchoate liability, like attempt and incitement (Board of Trade v Owen [1957] AC 602; R v Mbonu (2003) 7 VR 273).
3. Conspiracy under Crimes Act s 321 is an indictable offence, regardless of whether or not the offence the accused conspires to commit is indictable.[357]
4. This topic also applies to a conspiracy charged under s 79 of the Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981. A conspiracy under that Act must be a conspiracy to commit an offence under that Act (see, e.g. R v Pepe (2000) 2 VR 412).

Elements

5. Conspiracy to commit an offence has 3 elements:

    i) The accused and at least one other person entered into an agreement to pursue a criminal offence (the "principal offence");

    ii) The parties intended to form that agreement; and

    iii) The parties intended that the principal offence would be committed.

    Each of these elements is addressed in turn below.

[357] This can be compared with conspiracy under Drugs, Poisons and Controlled Substances Act 1981 s 79, which will be a summary offence if the offence that the accused conspires to commit is a summary offence.

Agreement to Commit a Criminal Offence

6. For the first element to be met, the prosecution must prove that:
    - The accused and at least one other person entered into an agreement; and
    - The parties agreed to pursue a course of conduct that involved at least one of them committing the principal offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 321).

Formation of the Agreement

7. The prosecution must establish that there was a common agreement between the parties to the conspiracy (Gerakiteys v R (1984) 153 CLR 317; R v Coles [1984] 1 NSWLR 726).
8. Agreement is an essential element of conspiracy. People who pursue a common intention to commit a crime will not be guilty of conspiracy if there is no agreement between them (R v Barbouttis (1995) 37 NSWLR 256; R v Moran & Mokbel [1999] 2 VR 87; Macdonald v The King [2023] NSWCCA 250, [23]).
9. It is not sufficient for the parties to have merely shared assumptions about future events. The prosecution must prove that the parties formed an agreement to work towards the principal offence (R v Jones [2000] NSWCCA 186; R v Trudgeon (1988) 39 A Crim R 252).
10. It is also not sufficient for the parties to have expected that, once certain conditions were satisfied, one of them would commit the principal offence. The parties must have agreed to pursue that offence (R v Trudgeon (1988) 39 A Crim R 252; R v Moran & Mokbel [1999] 2 VR 87).
11. The parties do not need to have entered a formal or written agreement (Nirta v R (1983) 79 FLR 190).
12. The agreement must have been communicated to the other conspirators (R v Scott (1978) 68 Cr App R 164).
13. The prosecution does not need to prove that the agreement came into existence at a specified time. The jury may infer the existence of the agreement from a course of conduct (Nirta v R (1983) 79 FLR 190; R v Minuzzo and Williams [1984] VR 417; R v Orton [1922] VLR 469; Gerakiteys v R (1984) 153 CLR 317).

Content of the Agreement

14. The agreement must have been to pursue a course of conduct that would involve the commission of the principal offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 321).
15. The prosecution must prove that the course of conduct agreed upon would involve the commission of the principal offence, rather than some different offence, or an unspecified or undecided offence (R v McCaul and Palmer [1983] 2 VR 419; R v Thomas CCA Vic 29/09/1980; R v Moran & Mokbel [1999] 2 VR 87).
16. It is not necessary to prove that the agreement involved specification of the precise means or method by which the principal offence would be committed (Macdonald v The King [2023] NSWCCA 250, [23], [25]).
17. It is also not necessary to prove that the agreement involved mutual benefit to the various conspirators, or, in contractual terms, consideration flowing from each party. Similarly, it is not necessary to prove that each party to the conspiracy would be responsible for carrying out some overt act (Macdonald v The King [2023] NSWCCA 250, [47]).
18. Where the prosecution is based on a conspiracy to traffick in a specified drug, but the evidence establishes that the agreement related to a different drug, the conspiracy will not have been proven (DPP v Johnson & Ors (Ruling No. 7) [2007] VSC 579).
19. This element will usually not be met in cases where the evidence only establishes that the accused agreed to commit an offence of a certain class (such as a violent offence). In such cases, the jury will often be unable to exclude the possibility that the agreement was to commit a different offence within that class, rather than the principal offence (R v McCaul and Palmer [1983] 2 VR 419; R v Thomas CCA Vic 29/09/1980).

20. The agreement does not need to have specified who the particular victim would be, or how the offence would be carried out. There merely needs to have been an agreement to commit the principal offence (R v Gill and Henry (1818) 2 B and Ald 204; R v Caldwell (2009) 22 VR 93).

21. Where an agreement contemplated multiple criminal acts, the jury must unanimously find that it included an agreement to commit the principal offence (Nirta v R (1983) 79 FLR 190).

22. The content of the agreement can be inferred from the accused's conduct (Nirta v R (1983) 79 FLR 190; R v Minuzzo and Williams [1984] VR 417; R v Orton [1922] VLR 469; Gerakiteys v R (1984) 153 CLR 317).

23. It is not necessary that each party to the conspiracy actively participate in the commission of the planned offence (Rolls v R; Sleiman v R (2011) 34 VR 80; [2011] VSCA 401).

24. The requirement that one of the parties must agree to pursue a course of conduct that involves the commission of an offence includes committing the offence as a secondary party (Bui v R; Hargrave v R [2011] VSCA 404). For example, there is a conspiracy to murder where A and B agree that B would hire C, a stranger to the agreement, to kill D.

Intention to Form an Agreement

25. The second element requires the parties to have intended to form the agreement at the time the agreement was made (R v Moran & Mokbel [1999] 2 VR 87; R v Thomson (1965) 50 Cr App R 1; Peters v R (1998) 192 CLR 493).

26. Evidence that the accused had acted as if s/he had made an agreement may provide evidence of an intention to form an agreement, but is not conclusive. It can be rebutted by other evidence (Peters v R (1998) 192 CLR 493; R v Thomson (1965) 50 Cr App R 1; R v O'Brien [1954] SCR 666).[358]

Intent to Commit the Criminal Offence

27. The third element requires the accused, and at least one other party to the agreement, to have intended that the principal offence would be committed (Crimes Act 1958 s 321(2)).

28. Recklessness is not a sufficient state of mind for conspiracy (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473).

29. The parties must have intended that the principal offence be committed, not some other offence (R v Gemmell (1985) 1 CRNZ 496; Peters v R (1998) 192 CLR 493).

30. Where the prosecution is based on a conspiracy to traffick in a specified drug, but the evidence establishes that the parties intended to traffick in a different drug, the conspiracy will not have been proven. It is not sufficient for the prosecution to prove that the accused had a generalised intention to traffick in drugs of that nature (DPP v Johnson & Ors (Ruling No. 7) [2007] VSC 579).

31. It is not necessary for the parties to have shared the same motive for wanting the principal offence to be committed, as long as they both intended that that offence would be committed (Yip Chiu-Cheung v R [1994] 3 WLR 514).

32. The accused's intention to commit the principal offence must be judged subjectively. This element will not be satisfied unless the prosecution can prove that the accused himself or herself actually intended that offence to be committed (R v Thomson (1965) 50 Cr App R 1).

[358] This differs from contract law, where such a claim is not permitted.

33. It is therefore permissible for the accused to argue that, while s/he objectively appeared to agree to the commission of the principal offence, s/he privately did not support its commission.[359] It is for the prosecution to disprove such a claim, beyond reasonable doubt (R v Thomson (1965) 50 Cr App R 1).

Intention or Belief in Facts and Circumstances

34. The accused, and at least one other party to the agreement, must also have intended or believed that any fact or circumstance that was an element of the principal offence would exist at the time the offence was expected to take place (Crimes Act 1958 s 321; Bennett v R (1998) 144 FLR 311).

35. The accused must have had more than a mere suspicion that the relevant facts or circumstances would exist. S/he must have had actual knowledge or personal belief in the existence of any facts necessary to make the proposed conduct criminal (see, e.g. R v Barbouttis & Ors (1995) 37 NSWLR 256; R v Schipanski (1989) 17 NSWLR 618; Pereira v DPP (1989) 82 ALR 217; Bennett v R (1998) 144 FLR 311).

36. The requirement that the accused intend or believe in the existence of any necessary facts or circumstances does not require agreement as to matter of law. This includes matter of law which involve the legal characterisation of certain acts. For example, in Macdonald v The King [2023] NSWCCA 250, the Court held that while the principal offence of misconduct in public offence required that the conduct be serious and merit criminal punishment, it was not necessary show that the conspirators agreed the conduct was serious and merited criminal punishment (see [77]–[81]).

37. It is not necessary to explain this requirement in every case. It only needs to be addressed if it is an issue in the case (see, e.g. R v Massie [1999] 1 VR 542).

Accused's Knowledge

38. These three elements will only be satisfied if the accused knew that the agreement either:

    - Constituted the formation of a scheme to commit a criminal offence; or
    - Brought him/her into an existing scheme (R v Griffiths [1966] 1 QB 589; Aston & Burnell v R (1987) 44 SASR 436).

39. While the parties must have known there was a plan to commit the principal offence, they do not need to have known the specific details of how that offence would be committed (Aston & Burnell v R (1987) 44 SASR 436).

40. The accused also does not need to have known the identity of the other parties to the agreement. The identity of co-conspirators is not an element of the offence. A person may be convicted of conspiring with a person or persons unknown (R v Coles [1984] 1 NSWLR 726; Gerakiteys v R (1984) 153 CLR 317; R v Howes [1971] 2 SASR 293; Aston & Burnell v R (1987) 44 SASR 436; Ex parte Coffey: Re Evans [1971] 1 NSWLR 434).

41. While the accused does not need to have known the identity of his or her co-conspirators, s/he must have known of their existence, been in agreement with them about the scope of the conspiracy, and shared a common design or purpose (Aston & Burnell v R (1987) 44 SASR 436; R v Coles [1984] 1 NSWLR 726; Ex parte Coffey: Re Evans [1971] 1 NSWLR 434).

42. The accused's liability depends on the scope of his or her actual agreement. A person should not be assumed to have agreed to commit an offence on the basis that it is likely s/he knew s/he was playing his or her part in a large criminal enterprise (R v Trudgeon (1988) 39 A Crim R 252).

[359] This differs from contract law, where such a claim is not permitted.

43. Evidence that the accused was only involved in the conspiracy to a limited extent may, in some cases, be used as evidence that the accused was not aware of the full scope of the agreement. However, such evidence is not conclusive, and the jury must consider the extent of the accused's agreement, rather than his/her participation in the conspiracy (Gerakiteys v R (1984) 153 CLR 317; R v Griffiths [1966] 1 QB 589).

No Need for Overt Acts

44. It is not necessary to show that the accused actively participated in giving effect to the agreement by performing any overt acts (Nirta v R (1983) 79 FLR 190; R v Bijkerk (2000) 111 A Crim R 443; R v Caldwell (2009) 22 VR 93; but c.f. Commonwealth Criminal Code s 11.5).

45. However, the performance of such acts may be used as evidence of the existence of the agreement, or the intentions of the parties (Nirta v R (1983) 79 FLR 190; R v Bijkerk (2000) 111 A Crim R 443; R v Caldwell (2009) 22 VR 93).

46. The relationship between any given overt act and the conspiracy alleged whould be clearly spelt out (R v Caldwell (2009) 22 VR 93; R v Theophanous (2003) 141 A Crim R 216).

Conspiracy and Impossibility

47. A person may be convicted of conspiracy even if facts existed which made the commission of the principal offence impossible (Crimes Act 1958 s 321(3); R v Barbouttis (1995) 37 NSWLR 256; R v Kapeliotis & Mari (1995) 122 FLR 461).

48. However, conspiracy is not committed if the accused erroneously believed s/he was conspiring to commit a crime. The crime that the parties conspired to commit must have been a real offence, not an imaginary one (see, e.g. R v Sirat (1986) 83 Cr App R 41).

Identification of the Conspiracy

49. In a conspiracy case, each accused is entitled to particulars of the people with whom it is alleged he or she conspired, and particulars of the scope of the conspiracy alleged (R v Caldwell (2009) 22 VR 93).

50. The prosecution must provide those particulars in the course of the opening address, at the very latest. They cannot simply open with the overt acts of which particulars have been given, leaving it to the end of the evidence to select from among them the conspiracy that seems to be the strongest (R v Caldwell (2009) 22 VR 93).

51. The prosecution must prove that the conspiracy was in the terms alleged in the indictment. The jury cannot convict the accused of a conspiracy that is different from the one alleged (Gerakiteys v R (1984) 153 CLR 317; R v Coles [1984] 1 NSWLR 726; R v Ongley (1940) 57 WN (NSW) 116; DPP v Johnson & Ors (Ruling No. 7) [2007] VSC 579; R v Caldwell (2009) 22 VR 93).

52. It is therefore important to determine:

    - The precise scope of any conspiracies alleged; and
    - Whether it is alleged that there was a single conspiracy between all of the relevant parties, or a set of different conspiracies (Gerakiteys v R (1984) 153 CLR 317).

Scope of the Conspiracy

53. Where a presentment alleges an agreement to commit two or more specific offences, each offence probably constitutes an essential element of the conspiracy. This means that, in such cases, the prosecution will need to prove that the conspiracy extended to all the offences for the charge to be made out (R v Caldwell (2009) 22 VR 93. See also R v Roberts [1998] 1 Cr App R 441).

54. Similarly, where a count of conspiracy to defraud alleges an agreement to achieve two or more distinct objectives, each of the objectives is an essential element which must be proved. The charge will not be made out by proof of just one of those objectives (R v Caldwell (2009) 22 VR 93).

55. Where particular victims are named in the presentment, the judge will need to determine whether the prosecution is alleging that there was a conspiracy to commit an offence against those specific people, or whether those people were named simply to supply sufficient particulars of the conspiracy alleged.

    - If it alleged that the conspiracy was to commit an offence against those specific people, the prosecution will need to prove that there was an agreement to commit the relevant offence against all of the named parties (see, e.g. R v Maria [1957] St R Qd 512, cited in R v Caldwell (2009) 22 VR 93).
    - If it is alleged that the conspiracy was simply to commit the relevant offence, with the names supplied to provide particulars of the conspiracy alleged, and to mark out its boundaries, the prosecution will not need to prove that the accused agreed to commit the offence against all of the named parties. Even if the accused did not intend to commit an offence against one or more of the named parties (or did not know the identity of all of the parties involved), the conspiracy will be established if they agreed to commit the relevant offence (R v Caldwell (2009) 22 VR 93. See also *R v Ongley (*1940) 57 WN (NSW) 116; R v Deakin (1972) 56 Cr App R 841).

Single Conspiracy or Multiple Conspiracies

56. For there to have been a single conspiracy, all of the parties to the agreement must have been aware of the scope of that agreement, and agreed to pursue the same offence (Gerakiteys v R (1984) 153 CLR 317; R v Griffiths [1966] 1 QB 589).

57. Where the scope of the parties' agreement varies, it will instead be necessary to allege multiple conspiracies. The nature of the conspiracies alleged will depend on the circumstances:

    - In some cases, there may be a series of related conspiracies, which all emanate from a central figure. The scope of these related conspiracies may vary, based on the knowledge and belief of the parties (Gerakiteys v R (1984) 153 CLR 317; R v Griffiths [1966] 1 QB 589).
    - In other cases, the conspiracies may operate like a chain, with each participant only aware of the adjacent parties and their particular role in the conspiracy (R v Meyrick (1930) 21 Cr App R 94; R v Griffiths [1966] 1 QB 589).

58. When a new party joins an existing conspiracy, an issue arises as to whether there is still a single (but expanded) conspiracy, or whether there are now two conspiracies. The answer depends upon the new party's knowledge and intentions:

    - If the new party is fully aware of the scope of the existing conspiracy, and agrees that the principal offence should be committed, there will be just one conspiracy.
    - If the new party is only aware of, and agrees to, part of the original conspiracy, there will be two conspiracies: a broad conspiracy between the original conspirators, and a narrower conspiracy which includes the new party (Gerakiteys v R (1984) 153 CLR 317; O'Connell v R (1844) 11 Cl & Fin 155).

59. While the jury cannot convict the accused of a conspiracy that is different from the one alleged by the prosecution, they can convict him/her of a conspiracy that is narrower – provided that it is not substantially different to the allegation s/he was required to meet (Gerakiteys v R (1984) 153 CLR 317).

Special Cases

Spouses

60. Ordinarily, spouses may not be convicted of conspiring together to commit any crimes other than murder or treason (Crimes Act 1958 s 339).

61. However, spouses can be found guilty of conspiracy to commit an offence if they extend their agreement to include a third party (R v Chrastny [1991] 1 WLR 1381).

Companies

62. A company may be party to an agreement if the directors are party to the agreement (R v McDonnell [1966] 1 QB 233).

63. However, a 'sole person' company cannot form an agreement with its director (R v McDonnell [1966] 1 QB 233).

64. A director is capable of conspiring to defraud a company of which s/he later becomes the directing mind (R v Maher (1986) 83 FLR 332).

Police

65. It is possible to form a conspiracy with an undercover police officer, even if that officer only intends to commit the offence to gather evidence for a criminal prosecution (Yip Chiu-Cheung v R [1994] 3 WLR 514).

66. However, the officer must intend to commit the principal offence. There will be no conspiracy if the officer does not intend the offence to be carried out (R v Anderson [1986] AC 27).

67. A police officer who agrees to pursue a criminal offence will have entered into an agreement, even if s/he was under orders from a superior officer to do so (R v Ong [2007] VSCA 206).

Conspiracy and Attempts

68. Apart from the offence of "attempting to pervert the course of justice", a person may not be charged with conspiracy to commit an "attempted" crime (Crimes Act 1958 s 321R; R v Aydin [2005] VSCA 87).

Consistency of Verdicts

69. The jury does not always need to reach the same verdict for each member of an alleged conspiracy (Crimes Act 1958 s 321B; R v Darby (1982) 148 CLR 668).

70. The jury may reach different verdicts if there are differences in the admissible evidence against the various accused (R v Darby (1982) 148 CLR 668).[360]

71. Different verdicts are only impermissible if there is no factual basis on which the jury may convict one accused without convicting the other (R v Darby (1982) 148 CLR 668; Mickelberg v R (1989) 167 CLR 259).

[360] If there are significant differences in the evidence that is admissible against the various accused, it is preferable that the judge order separate trials, so that the jury does not need to reconcile their verdicts (R v Darby (1982) 148 CLR 668).

72. In some cases, it will be appropriate to direct the jury that if they acquit one alleged member of the conspiracy, they must acquit the other member(s). However, the judge must not direct the jury that if they convict one accused, they must convict the other accused (R v Aydin [2005] VSCA 87).

Withdrawal

73. As the offence of conspiracy is complete at the time the agreement is formed, later withdrawal from a conspiracy is not a defence (Woss v Jacobsen (1985) 11 FCR 243; Savvas v R (1995) 183 CLR 1; R v Caldwell (2009) 22 VR 93).

6.1.1 Charge: Conspiracy to Commit an Offence (Victoria)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge has been drafted for trials involving a single accused. The charge will need to be adapted if multiple accused are tried together.

Charge

Conspiracy to commit NOO[361] is a crime. In order to find the accused guilty of this crime, there are 3 elements, each of which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt. I will list them for you and then explain each one in detail.

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused made an agreement with at least one other person to commit the offence of NOO.[362] Throughout these directions I will call the people who it is alleged entered into that agreement, including the accused, the "parties".

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intended to make that agreement.

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the parties intended that the offence of NOO would be committed.

Before you can find NOA guilty of conspiracy to commit NOO you must be satisfied that all three of these elements have been proven beyond reasonable doubt.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Agreement

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused made an agreement with at least one other person to commit NOO. This requires you to be satisfied of two matters beyond reasonable doubt.

[361] Name of Offence.

[362] This charge is designed for the simple case in which the whole purpose of the alleged agreement was to commit the principal offence. If instead the agreement was to pursue a more complex course of conduct, which included the commission of the principal offence, the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

First, you must be satisfied that NOA and [identify alleged co-conspirators] actually made an agreement to commit certain acts. It is not enough for them to have independently decided to commit those acts, or to have simply expected those acts would be committed. They must have agreed to pursue those acts.

Second, you must be satisfied that, under that agreement, a person was supposed to commit the offence of NOO. A person commits NOO when s/he [include elements of the principal offence. See 7 Victorian Offences].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA formed an agreement with [identify alleged co-conspirators] to [describe alleged object of conspiracy]. [Summarise relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing that [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied that an agreement was formed between NOA and [identify alleged co-conspirators], in the terms alleged by the prosecution.[363] If you are not satisfied that there was such an agreement, or that the agreement was in those terms, then this element will not be met.

Intention to Agree

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that, at the time the agreement was made, the accused intended to enter into that agreement. This requires you to be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA really meant to make that agreement, and did not just appear to agree with the other alleged parties.

The prosecution alleged that that was the case here. [Describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Intention to Commit the Criminal Offence

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that, when the parties made the agreement, they intended that the offence of NOO would be committed.

[If there are particular facts or circumstances the parties must have believed in to commit the offence, add the following shaded section.]

You must also be satisfied that the parties intended or believed that [describe relevant facts or circumstances, e.g. "NOV would not be consenting"] at the time the offence was to be committed.

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied that NOA and [identify alleged co-conspirators] definitely meant for the offence of NOO to be committed. It is not sufficient for them to have thought that maybe that offence should be committed, or to have intended to commit some other offence.

The prosecution argued that the parties did intend to commit NOO when they made the agreement. [Describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Accused's Knowledge

When determining the case against the accused, you will need to consider precisely what s/he knew at the time s/he made the alleged agreement.

---

[363] In some cases it may be necessary to direct the jury that they can convict the accused of a conspiracy which is narrower than that alleged by the prosecution. In such cases, the alternative findings which are available to the jury should be explained.

The law says that the accused must have known that s/he was [forming/being brought into] a scheme to commit a criminal offence.

S/he must also have known the nature of the offence planned. That is, s/he must have known that it involved [briefly summarise relevant elements of the principal offence, e.g. "sexually penetrating the victim without her consent"].

However, s/he does not need to have known the specific details of how that offence was going to be carried out. [Where relevant, add: Nor does s/he need to have known the identity of the proposed victim(s).] It is sufficient for him/her to have known that the offence of NOO would be carried out, and to have intentionally agreed to pursue that offence.

[Where it is possible that the accused did not know the identity of some of the alleged co-conspirators, add the following shaded section.]

The accused also does not need to have known the identity of the other parties to the agreement. However, s/he does need to have known that there were other parties to the agreement, and to have been in agreement with them about the commission of the offence.

[If it is alleged that the accused's agreement should be inferred from his/her involvement in a criminal enterprise, add the following shaded section.]

In making your determination, it is important that you focus on precisely what each party actually knew about and agreed to. You should not assume that a person has agreed to commit an offence simply because s/he knew that it was likely that s/he was playing a part in a criminal enterprise that involved the commission of that offence. To convict the accused of conspiracy, you must find that s/he intentionally agreed to pursue that offence.

No Need for Overt Acts

You also do not need to find that the parties took any steps to carry out their agreement. The offence of conspiracy is committed when people intentionally agree to commit an offence, regardless of whether they act on that agreement.

You may, however, use evidence that the parties attempted to carry out the agreement as evidence that there was an agreement and as evidence of the terms of the agreement. For example, the prosecution says that [describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence reject this, saying [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of conspiracy to commit NOO, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA and [identify alleged co-conspirators] made an agreement to commit NOO; and

Two – That the accused intended to make that agreement; and Three – That the parties intended that the offence of NOO would be committed.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of conspiracy to commit NOO.

Inconsistent Verdicts

[If there is no factual basis on which the jury can convict one accused without convicting a co-accused, add the following shaded section.]

It is important to note that the evidence concerning this offence is identical in relation to both NOA and [identify co-accused]. This means that if you have decided that [identify co-accused] is not guilty of conspiracy to commit NOO, you must also find NOA not guilty of that offence.

6.1.2 Checklist: Conspiracy to Commit an Offence (Victoria)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused made an agreement with at least one other person to commit an offence (the "principal offence"); and
2. The accused intended to make that agreement; and
3. The parties intended that the principal offence would be committed.

Agreement

1. Did the accused make an agreement with at least one other person to commit the principal offence?

1.1 Did the accused and at least one other person make an agreement to commit certain acts?

If Yes, then go to Question 1.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of conspiracy to commit the principal offence

1.2 Under that agreement, was a person supposed to commit the principal offence?

Consider – What are the elements of the principal offence?

If Yes, then go to Question 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of conspiracy to commit the principal offence

Intention to Agree

2. At the time the agreement was made, did the accused intend to enter into that agreement?

If Yes, then go to Question 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of conspiracy to commit the principal offence

Intention

3. When the parties made the agreement, did they intend that the principal offence would be committed?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of conspiracy to commit the principal offence (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1.1, 1.2 and 2)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of conspiracy to commit the principal offence

6.2 Conspiracy (Commonwealth)

Click here to obtain a word version of this document

Application and interpretation

1. In relation to Commonwealth offences, the law of conspiracy is governed by s 11.5 of the Criminal Code.
2. The Criminal Code imports the common law concept of conspiracy, subject to explicit statutory modification (R v LK & RK (2010) 241 CLR 177 at [72] per French CJ; Ansari v R (2010) 241 CLR 299 at [21]).

Elements of Conspiracy to Commit an Offence

3. The elements of conspiracy are found in Criminal Code s 11.5(1). There is a single physical element and a default fault element of intention (R v LK & RK (2010) 241 CLR 177 at [131]–[132], [141]; R (Cth) v Baladjam (No 4) [2008] NSWSC 726 at [138]; R v Ansari (2007) 70 NSWLR 89 at [63]).
4. The prosecution must therefore prove:
   (a) The accused conspired with another person to commit an offence punishable by imprisonment for more than 12 months or a fine of 200 penalty units or more; and
   (b) The accused intended to conspire with that person in the manner alleged (Criminal Code s 11.1(1); R v LK & RK (2010) 241 CLR 177 at [131]–[132]).
5. In addition to the elements, there are three further matters which are "conditions of a finding of guilt" (R v LK & RK (2010) 241 CLR 177 at [140]). These are stated in Criminal Code s 11.5(2):
   (a) The person must have entered into an agreement with one or more other persons; and
   (b) The person and at least one other party to the agreement must have intended that an offence would be committed pursuant to the agreement; and
   (c) The person or at least one other party to the agreement must have committed an overt act pursuant to the agreement (Criminal Code s 11.5(2)).
6. The first two of these matters explain the meaning of "conspired", while the overt act is a further matter that must be proved to the criminal standard, but has no associated fault element (R v LK & RK (2010) 241 CLR 177 at [141]; Quaid v R [2011] WASCA 141 at [168] per Buss JA).

First element: Conspiracy to commit a non-trivial offence

7. The first element the prosecution must prove is that the accused conspired with another person to commit an offence punishable by imprisonment for more than 12 months or by a fine of 200 penalty units or more (Criminal Code s 11.5(1); R v Ansari (2007) 70 NSWLR 89 at [63]; R v LK & RK (2010) 241 CLR 177 at [131]–[132]).
8. This requires proof of agreement and the subject matter of the agreement (R v Ansari (2007) 70 NSWLR 89 at [63]; Standen v R [2015] NSWCCA 211 at [394]–[395]).

Formation of agreement

9. The prosecution must establish that there was a common agreement between the parties to the conspiracy (Gerakiteys v R (1984) 153 CLR 317; R v Coles [1984] 1 NSWLR 726).

10. Agreement is an essential element of conspiracy. People who pursue a common intention to commit a crime will not be guilty of conspiracy if there is no agreement between them (R v Barbouttis (1995) 37 NSWLR 256; R v Moran & Mokbel [1999] 2 VR 87).

11. It is not sufficient for the parties to have merely shared assumptions about future events. The prosecution must prove that the parties formed an agreement to work towards the principal offence (R v Jones [2000] NSWCCA 186; R v Trudgeon (1988) 39 A Crim R 252; R v Moran & Mokbel [1999] 2 VR 87).

12. The date of entry into the conspiracy is generally not an essential fact. Unless there would be unfairness to an accused, a jury can find that the accused joined the conspiracy later than the date alleged by the prosecution (see Damoun v R [2015] NSWCCA 109 at [28]. See also Nirta v R (1983) 79 FLR 190; R v Minuzzo and Williams [1984] VR 417; R v Orton [1922] VLR 469; Gerakiteys v R (1984) 153 CLR 317).

13. The parties do not need to have entered a formal or written agreement (Nirta v R (1983) 79 FLR 190).

14. The agreement must have been communicated to the other conspirators (R v Scott (1978) 68 Cr App R 164).

15. An agreement is a state of affairs for the purpose of the Code. A conspiracy exists and continues to exist while the agreement remains in existence. For this reason, the provisions of the Code can apply to criminalise pre-existing agreements, which remain in existence after amendment to the conspiracy provisions of the Code (Agius v R (2013) 248 CLR 601 at [47], [49]).

16. Thus, each day a party adheres to the agreement is another day on which the offence of conspiracy is committed (Agius v R (2013) 248 CLR 601 at [43]).

17. The focus of the offence is therefore on the existence of an agreement, rather than the entry into an agreement (Agius v R (2013) 248 CLR 601 at [58] per Gageler J).

18. Section 11.5(2)(b) of the Criminal Code means that the offence is not committed if the other party or parties were only pretending to make an agreement with no intention of carrying it out. This replicates the common law position (R v Ansari (2007) 70 NSWLR 89 at [60]. See also Peters v R (1998) 192 CLR 493 at [62]).

Subject matter of agreement

19. The prosecution must prove that that the conspiracy was in the terms alleged in the indictment. The jury cannot convict the accused of a conspiracy that is different from the one alleged (Gerakiteys v R (1984) 153 CLR 317; R v Coles [1984] 1 NSWLR 726; R v Ongley (1940) 57 WN (NSW) 116; DPP v Johnson & Ors (Ruling No. 7) [2007] VSC 579; R v Caldwell (2009) 22 VR 93).

20. The prosecution must prove that the course of conduct agreed upon would involve the commission of the principal offence, rather than some different offence, or an unspecified or undecided offence (R v McCaul and Palmer [1983] 2 VR 419*; R v Thomas* CCA Vic 29/09/1980; R v Moran & Mokbel [1999] 2 VR 87).

21. Where the prosecution is based on a conspiracy to traffick in a specified drug, but the evidence establishes that the agreement related to a different drug, the conspiracy will not have been proven (DPP v Johnson & Ors (Ruling No. 7) [2007] VSC 579).

22. Where the evidence only establishes an agreement to commit an offence of a certain class, the jury will often be unable to exclude the possibility that the agreement was to commit a different offence to the one charged which is also within the same general class (R v McCaul and Palmer [1983] 2 VR 419; R v Thomas CCA Vic 29/09/1980).

23. The agreement does not need to have specified who the particular victim would be, or how the offence would be carried out. There merely needs to have been an agreement to commit the principal offence (R v Gill and Henry (1818) 2 B and Ald 204; R v Caldwell (2009) 22 VR 93).

24. Each accused is entitled to particulars of the people with whom it is alleged he or she conspired, and particulars of the scope of the conspiracy alleged (R v Caldwell (2009) 22 VR 93).

25. The prosecution must provide those particulars in the course of the opening address, at the very latest. They cannot simply open with the overt acts of which particulars have been given, leaving it to the end of the evidence to select from among them the conspiracy that seems to be the strongest (R v Caldwell (2009) 22 VR 93).

26. It is therefore important to determine:

    - The precise scope of any conspiracies alleged; and
    - Whether it is alleged that there was a single conspiracy between all of the relevant parties, or a set of different conspiracies (Gerakiteys v R (1984) 153 CLR 317).

Scope of the Conspiracy

27. Where the charge alleges an agreement to commit two or more specific offences, each offence probably constitutes an essential element of the conspiracy. This means that, in such cases, the prosecution will need to prove that the conspiracy extended to all instances of the offence for the charge to be made out (R v Caldwell (2009) 22 VR 93 at [71]. See also R v Roberts [1998] 1 Cr App R 441).

28. Similarly, where a charge of conspiracy to defraud alleges an agreement to achieve two or more distinct objectives, each of the objectives is an essential element which must be proved. The charge will not be made out by proof of just one of those objectives (R v Caldwell (2009) 22 VR 93 at [71]).

29. Where particular victims are named in the indictment, the judge will need to determine whether the prosecution is alleging that there was a conspiracy to commit an offence against those specific people, or whether those people were named simply to supply sufficient particulars of the conspiracy alleged:

    - If it alleged that the conspiracy was to commit an offence against those specific people, the prosecution will need to prove that there was an agreement to commit the relevant offence against all of the named parties (see, e.g., R v Maria [1957] St R Qd 512, cited in R v Caldwell (2009) 22 VR 93).
    - If it is alleged that the conspiracy was simply to commit the relevant offence, with the names supplied to provide particulars of the conspiracy alleged, and to mark out its boundaries, the prosecution will not need to prove that the accused agreed to commit the offence against all of the named parties. Even if the accused did not intend to commit an offence against one or more of the named parties (or did not know the identity of all of the parties involved), the conspiracy will be established if they agreed to commit the relevant offence (R v Caldwell (2009) 22 VR 93. See also R v Ongley (1940) 57 WN (NSW) 116; R v Deakin (1972) 56 Cr App R 841).

Single Conspiracy or Multiple Conspiracies

30. Where a single conspiracy is charged, the prosecution must prove that all of the parties to the agreement were aware of the scope of that agreement, and agreed to pursue the same offence (Gerakiteys v R (1984) 153 CLR 317; R v Griffiths [1966] 1 QB 589).

31. Where the scope of the parties' agreement varies, the prosecution must instead allege multiple different conspiracies. The nature of the conspiracies alleged will depend on the circumstances:

    - In some cases, there may be a series of related conspiracies, which all emanate from a central figure. The scope of these related conspiracies may vary, based on the knowledge and belief of the parties (Gerakiteys v R (1984) 153 CLR 317; R v Griffiths [1966] 1 QB 589).
    - In other cases, the conspiracies may operate like a chain, with each participant only aware of the adjacent parties and their particular role in the conspiracy (R v Meyrick (1930) 21 Cr App R 94; R v Griffiths [1966] 1 QB 589).

32. When a new party joins an existing conspiracy, an issue arises as to whether there is still a single (but expanded) conspiracy, or whether there are now two conspiracies. The answer depends upon the new party's knowledge and intentions:

    - If the new party is fully aware of the scope of the existing conspiracy, and agrees that the principal offence should be committed, there will be just one conspiracy.
    - If the new party is only aware of, and agrees to, part of the original conspiracy, there will be two conspiracies: a broad conspiracy between the original conspirators, and a narrower conspiracy which includes the new party (Gerakiteys v R (1984) 153 CLR 317; O'Connell v R (1844) 11 Cl & Fin 155).

33. While the jury cannot convict the accused of a conspiracy that is different from the one alleged by the prosecution, they can convict him/her of a conspiracy that is narrower – provided that it is not substantially different to the allegation s/he was required to meet (Gerakiteys v R (1984) 153 CLR 317).

Intention that offence be committed

34. The requirement that the accused must have "conspired with another person to commit an offence" does not mean that the parties to the conspiracy must intend to personally commit the intended offence. A charge of conspiracy will remain available where the accused conspires with another person that a third party who is not part of the conspiracy will commit the intended offence (Ansari (2007) 70 NSWLR 89 at [9]; R (Cth) v Baladjam (No 4) [2008] NSWSC 726 at [150]–[151]).

Conspiracy and knowledge of essential facts

35. A person cannot form an agreement to commit an offence unless he or she knows or believes in the existence of facts which would make the agreed conduct an offence (Quaid v R [2011] WASCA 141 at [174] per Buss JA; R v LK & RK (2010) 241 CLR 177 at [72] per French CJ and [117] per Gummow, Hayne, Crennan, Kiefel and Bell JJ).

36. The prosecution must prove that the accused and at least one other party to the conspiracy held the knowledge of the essential facts at the same time (Standen v R [2015] NSWCCA 211 at [409]).

37. However, because conspiracy is a continuing offence, it is not necessary to prove that this shared knowledge was held on a precise date. Rather, the prosecution can prove that the accused and at least one other person were participants in the agreement to commit an offence in the period alleged in the indictment and that they held the necessary intention, knowledge or belief in at the same time (Standen v R [2015] NSWCCA 211 at [418], [424]).

38. The accused must have had more than a mere suspicion that the relevant facts or circumstances would exist. S/he must have had actual knowledge or personal belief in the existence of any facts necessary to make the proposed conduct criminal (see, e.g., R v Barbouttis & Ors (1995) 37 NSWLR 256; R v Schipanski (1989) 17 NSWLR 618; Pereira v DPP (1989) 82 ALR 217; Bennett v R (1998) 144 FLR 311).

39. It is not necessary to explain this requirement in every case. It only needs to be addressed if it is an issue in the case (see, e.g., R v Massie [1999] 1 VR 542).

40. The accused also does not need to have known the identity of the other parties to the agreement. The identity of co-conspirators is not an element of the offence. A person may be convicted of conspiring with a person or persons unknown (R v Coles [1984] 1 NSWLR 726; Gerakiteys v R (1984) 153 CLR 317; R v Howes [1971] 2 SASR 293; Aston & Burnell v R (1987) 44 SASR 436; Ex parte Coffey: Re Evans [1971] 1 NSWLR 434).

41. While the accused does not need to have known the identity of his or her co-conspirators, s/he must have known of their existence, been in agreement with them about the scope of the conspiracy, and shared a common design or purpose (Aston & Burnell v R (1987) 44 SASR 436; R v Coles [1984] 1 NSWLR 726; Ex parte Coffey: Re Evans [1971] 1 NSWLR 434).

Conspiracy and intention to commit agreed offence

42. As part of proof of the first element, the prosecution must show that the accused and at least one other party to the agreement intended that an offence would be committed pursuant to the agreement (Criminal Code s 11.5(2)(b)). This is subject to the operation of any special liability provision (Criminal Code s 11.5(7A)).

43. This rule applies even where the substantive offence includes fault elements short of intention, such as recklessness. The offence of conspiracy is not committed where the parties are reckless as to whether an offence would be committed as a result of the agreement (see Ansari v R (2007) 70 NSWLR 89 at [33], [67]).

44. Intention that the offence be committed requires proof that the accused and at least one other person intended that acts be performed which, if carried out in accordance with the agreement, would amount to commission of the offence (Ansari v R (2010) 241 CLR 299 at [61]).

45. While the majority of the High Court in Ansari explicitly rejected the suggestion that the accused and another party to the conspiracy must intend that each physical element and its associated fault element would exist, this conclusion was reached in the context of a case where one of the fault elements was recklessness and the conspiracy involved a party to the conspiracy committing the offence (see also Papadimitriou v R [2011] WASCA 140 at [94]).

46. Later cases have shown that where a party to the conspiracy would commit the completed offence, the appropriate direction is that the prosecution must prove that the accused and another party to the conspiracy intended that all the physical elements of the completed offence would exist (see Papadimitriou v R [2011] WASCA 140 at [94]; Standen v R [2015] NSWCCA 211 at [394]).

47. In contrast, where the agreement involves the physical commission of the offence by a third party who is not party to the agreement, French CJ and the New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal have held that the conspiracy may be proved by showing that the accused intended the third party to act with the state of mind necessary for the commission of the offence, even if that state of mind is one of recklessness (see R v LK & RK (2010) 241 CLR 177 at [75] per French CJ; Ansari v R (2010) 241 CLR 299 at [26], [37]; R v Ansari (2007) 70 NSWLR 89 at [87]–[88]. See also Quaid v R [2011] WASCA 141 at [260] per Hall J).

48. Any special liability provision that applies to an offence also applies to a conspiracy to commit that offence (Criminal Code s 11.5(7A)).

49. 'Special liability provision' is defined as:

    (a) A provision that provides that absolute liability applies to one or more (but not all) of the physical elements of an offence; or

    (b) A provision that provides that, in a prosecution for an offence, it is not necessary to prove that the defendant knew a particular thing; or

    (c) A provision that provides that, in a prosecution for an offence, it is not necessary to prove that the defendant knew or believed a particular thing (Criminal Code Dictionary).

50. Fault elements such as knowledge, recklessness and negligence are not 'special liability provisions'.

51. In addition, strict liability, as defined in Criminal Code s 6.1, does not fit within the definition of special liability provision. Therefore, where strict liability applies, the common law rule that an accused must know the essential facts for an offence of conspiracy will continue to apply, and the prosecution must prove awareness of those facts (R v Ansari (2007) 70 NSWLR 89 at [84]).

52. An example of how a special liability provision operates can be seen in a conspiracy to import a commercial quantity of a border controlled drug. In such a case, the combined effect of Criminal Code ss 11.5(7A) and 307.1(3) is that absolute liability applies in relation to the quantity (Le v R [2016] VSCA 100; Quaid v R [2011] WASCA 141 at [176] per Buss JA; DPP v Kola [2024] HCA 14, [23], [26]).

53. In DPP v Kola, the High Court observed:

> an obvious tension between the prosecution being required to prove that the accused was a party to an agreement to import a commercial quantity of a border controlled drug but not being required to prove that the accused knew or believed that the amount to be imported pursuant to the agreement would be a commercial quantity. … The resolution follows from recognising the difference between the intended scope of the agreement to which the accused was a party and any subjective belief or knowledge of the accused as to what the anticipated performance of that agreement would entail ([2024] HCA 14, [27]).

54. The High Court explained the difference between the scope of the agreement and the subjective knowledge or belief of the accused with a series of examples:

> If two passengers on a commercial aircraft agree to import cocaine by secreting the drug in one of their (small) pockets, then the weight of the drug that would be imported pursuant to that agreement would not be a commercial quantity. If one of the passengers, without recourse to the other, places 3 kg of cocaine in their suitcase, then the other passenger is not culpable for conspiracy to import a commercial quantity of the drug as the placement of cocaine in the suitcase was not undertaken pursuant to their agreement. The scope of their agreement did not extend that far. However, if the two passengers agree to import as much cocaine as will fit into a particular suitcase and that amount is not less than 2 kg, then they will each be culpable, even if it is not proved that they knew that the amount that was, or could be, placed in the suitcase was, or would be, not less than 2 kg. In that case, the scope of their agreement is such that the weight of the border controlled drug that would have been imported if the agreement to commit the offence was successfully executed is a commercial quantity. Moreover, the passenger will still be culpable even if they mistakenly but reasonably believed that the amount that was, or would be, placed in the suitcase would not be, or could not be, 2 kg or more. Such a belief is irrelevant in relation to a physical element that attracts absolute liability (DPP v Kola [2024] HCA 14, [29]).

55. This directs attention to the objectively intended outcome of the specific activity planned as part of the conspiracy, without the prosecution needing to prove any subjective knowledge or awareness of that objectively intended outcome.

56. When directing the jury about the quantity element on an offence like conspiracy to import a commercial quantity of a border controlled drug, the judge must address the risk of the jury convicting simply on the basis that the accused was party to an agreement to import a border controlled drug, and the alleged co-conspirators set about importing a commercial quantity without reference to the accused (DPP v Kola [2024] HCA 14, [35]).

57. There is no fixed method of directing the jury which addresses this risk. Instead, the judge must explain the law in a manner that relates it to the facts of the case and the issues to be decided. This will require explaining that the prosecution must prove that the scope of the agreement the accused joined was to import a commercial quantity, that the prosecution need not prove the accused intended to import a commercial quantity and the distinction between these two matters (DPP v Kola [2024] HCA 14, [37]–[38]).

58. Where an offence involves circumstances of aggravation which are not elements of the offence, proof of conspiracy does not involve proof of those circumstances of aggravation, or agreement as to those circumstances (Keung v R [2008] NSWCCA 193 at [36]).

Second element: Intention to conspire

59. The second element is that the accused intended to conspire with another person to commit an offence (Criminal Code s 11.5(1)).

60. This requires proof that the accused meant to conspire, in accordance with the first element (Criminal Code s 5.2).

61. Evidence that the accused had acted as if s/he had made an agreement may provide evidence of an intention to form an agreement, but is not conclusive. It can be rebutted by other evidence (Peters v R (1998) 192 CLR 493; R v Thomson (1965) 50 Cr App R 1; R v O'Brien [1954] SCR 666).[364]

Addition matter for proof: Overt act

62. To prove a conspiracy to commit an offence, the prosecution must prove that a party to the conspiracy committed an overt act pursuant to the agreement (Criminal Code s 11.5(2)(c)).

63. While this is not an element of the offence, it is a requirement for conviction. It must be proved to the criminal standard of beyond reasonable doubt (R v LK & RK (2010) 241 CLR 177 at [141]).

64. As an essential matter for proof by the prosecution, the jury must be unanimious about the existence of a particular overt act (R v Lake [2007] QCA 209 at [67]).

65. The Code does not define the term 'overt act'. According to the ordinary meaning of the phrase, it refers to a plainly apparent act. Thus, the prosecution must prove that a party to the alleged conspiracy did something which it is plainly apparent as having been committed as part of the agreement.

66. In order for an act to qualify, it must be carried out with the intention of advancing the conspiracy (DPP v Fattal [2013] VSCA 276 at [21]).

67. The overt act may be committed by the accused, or any other party to the conspiracy. It is not necessary to prove that each party commits an overt act to crystalise his or her involvement in a conspiracy (R v Lake [2007] QCA 209 at [52], [62]).

68. Similarly, it is not necessary that each party to the conspiracy planned to actively participate in the commission of the planned offence (Rolls v R; Sleiman v R (2011) 34 VR 80).

Conspiracy and Impossibility

69. As under Victorian law, a person may be found guilty of conspiracy to commit an offence even if facts exist which made it impossible to commit the contemplated offence (Criminal Code s 11.5(3)(a)).

70. However, it is likely that, as at common law, the agreement must be to commit a real offence, not an imaginary one (see, e.g., R v Sirat (1986) 83 Cr App R 41).

Defences

Inconsistency

71. Under Criminal Code s 11.5(4)(a), a person cannot be found guilty of conspiracy to commit an offence if:

---

[364] This differs from contract law, where such a claim is not permitted.

all other parties to the agreement have been acquitted of the conspiracy and a finding of guilt would be inconsistent with their acquittal.

Person for whose benefit or protection the offence exists

72. Criminal Code s 11.5(4)(b) provides that a person cannot be found guilty of conspiracy to commit an offence if:

    He or she is a person for whose benefit or protection the offence exists.

73. A similar provision exists in Crimes Act 1958 s 324(3) for statutory complicity. In relation to Victorian law, this provision ensures that a person under the age of 16 cannot be found guilty of being a party to the offence of sexual penetration of him/herself (see, e.g., R v Whitehouse [1977] QB 868).

Withdrawal

74. The Criminal Code provides a defence of withdrawal. This defence is available where:
    (a) Before the commission of an overt act pursuant to the agreement;
    (b) The person withdrew from the agreement; and
    (c) Took all reasonable steps to prevent the commission of the offence (Criminal Code 11.5(5)).
75. The requirement to take all reasonable steps to prevent commission of the offence invites attempt to what steps were available and whether those steps were reasonable. In some cases, it may require ceasing association with the co-conspirators and may also require informing the police, at least anonymously (see Visser v R [2015] VSCA 168 at [80]).
76. If there are no reasonable steps available, then no steps are required (Miller v Miller (2011) 242 CLR 446 at [104]).
77. This differs from the common law position, where the offence is complete when the agreement is formed and so there is no opportunity for withdrawal (see Woss v Jacobsen (1985) 11 FCR 243; Savvas v R (1995) 183 CLR 1; R v Caldwell (2009) 22 VR 93).
78. However, in relation to joint activity, both the common law and statute recognises a defence of withdrawal where a person communicates the withdrawal and takes all reasonable steps to undo the effect of his or her previous assistance or encouragement. See Statutory Complicity for more information on this form of withdrawal.

Differences between Commonwealth conspiracy and common law conspiracy

79. The common law principles regarding conspiracy inform the meaning of s 11.5 of the Criminal Code, except as expressly modified by the text of the Code (Agius v R (2013) 248 CLR 601 at [32]; R v LK & RK (2010) 241 CLR 177 at [59], [72], [93]).
80. There are five key differences between the Code and the common law (see Keung v R [2008] NSWCCA 193 at [35]; Dickson v R (2010) 241 CLR 491; R v Ansari (2007) 70 NSWLR 89 at [66], [83]–[84]).
81. First, the Code contains a requirement that the offence in question be punishable by imprisonment of at least 12 months or a fine of 200 penalty units. In contrast, the common law offence of conspiracy is available in relation to all offences.
82. Second, the Code does not apply to an agreement to commit a lawful act by unlawful means.
83. Third, the parties must have performed an overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy (Criminal Code s 11.5(2)(c)).

84. Fourth, a person may escape liability under the Code if he or she withdraws from the conspiracy before the commission of any overt acts (Criminal Code s 11.5(5)).

85. Fifth, as a result of subsection (7A), the accused does not need to be aware of any facts of the completed offence for which absolute liability applies (Criminal Code s 11.5(7A)).

86. As a result of these differences, there is a direct inconsistency between the conspiracy provisions in the Criminal Code and conspiracy provisions under the Crimes Act 1958. As a result, where the conspiracy involves a conspiracy to engage in conduct which is covered by both Commonwealth and State law, section 109 of the Australian Constitution operates to render State law inoperative to the extent of the inconsistency (Dickson v R (2010) 241 CLR 491).

87. One example of this inconsistency is where a person is charged with conspiracy to steal goods. If the goods are Commonwealth property, then the prosecution must use a charge of conspiracy under the Criminal Code and cannot charge a person with conspiracy to commit theft under the Crimes Act 1958 (Dickson v R (2010) 241 CLR 491).

Dismissal of conspiracy charges in the interests of justice

88. Section 11.5(6) of the Criminal Code gives judges a broad discretion to dismiss a charge of conspiracy if 'it thinks that the interest of justice require it to do so'. This matches the provision that previously existed in Crimes Act 1914 (Cth) s 86(7).

89. This provision gives statutory recognition to frequently expressed judicial concerns about the appropriateness of bringing conspiracy charges in certain circumstances, especially where a substantive offence has been committed and there is a sufficient and effective charge available (R (Cth) v Baladjam (No 4) [2008] NSWSC 726 at [38], [48]. See also R v Hoar (1981) 148 CLR 32).

90. In general, selection of charges is a matter for the prosecution and the exercise of prosecutorial discretion is unreviewable. While s11.5(6) is an incursion into that general state of affairs, the court must keep the general rule in mind when exercising the power to dismiss conspiracy charges under the Code (R v Elomar [2014] NSWCCA 303 at [493]).

91. The provision provides a broad judicial discretion. While no list of considerations can be complete, relevant matters may include:

    - The likely complexity of the trial;
    - The presence of evidentiary difficulties;
    - The risk in a joint trial that an accused may be prejudiced by the admission of evidence admissible only against certain other accused;
    - Whether there may be sentencing difficulties due to the conspiracy charge;
    - Whether other potential sources of injustice might result from proceeding with a conspiracy charge;
    - The need to respect prosecutorial discretion in the laying of charges;
    - Whether proceeding with a conspiracy charge would constitute an abuse of process, such as where conspiracy is charged following or parallel to charges for the completed offence;
    - Whether there is an overlap of elements of the substantive offence and the alleged overt acts of the conspiracy;
    - Whether severance is a more appropriate remedy than dismissal;
    - Whether a substantive charge would properly capture the scope of the accused's conduct, or whether a conspiracy charge more appropriately captures the planned conduct for multiple separate criminal acts as part of an ongoing criminal organisation (R v Dowding [2000] VSC 439 at [20]; R (Cth) v Baladjam (No 4) [2008] NSWSC 726 at [38], [47]; R v Hoar (1981) 148 CLR 32; Shepherd v R (1988) 37 A Crim R 303 at 309-310; Standen v DPP (Cth) [2011] NSWCCA 187).

92. In exercising this discretion, the judge may also need to consider Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 195, which provides that a charge for a conspiracy to commit an offence and the commission of that offence must be tried separately, unless the court considers that it would be in the interests of justice for the charges to be tried together.

93. When considering the operation of Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 195, the court must look at the details of the allegations, and not merely whether the conspiracy involves an offence against the same provision as a substantive charge on the same indictment (R v Jacobson (Ruling No 2) [2014] VSC 368 at [58]).

Requirement for DPP consent

94. Proceedings for an offence of conspiracy under the Criminal Code must not be commenced without the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions (Criminal Code s 11.5(8)).

95. A Director's consent to prosecute may be in general term. However, if the consent refers to a precise offence, it will not authorise a prosecution for different conduct (R v Morrison [2010] QSC 446; Traveland Pty Ltd v Doherty (1982) 63 FLR 41 at 48).

96. Where there are differences between the indictment and the consent, it will be a question for the court whether those differences alter the substance of the allegation so that the offence charged is not the one which the Director approved. This is determined by examining the nature of the charges, rather than the proposed evidence (see Traveland Pty Ltd v Doherty (1982) 63 FLR 41 at 48; Gilmour v Midways Springwood Pty Ltd (1980) 49 FLR 36).

97. For example, the indictment may identify fewer named co-conspirators than the Director's consent. Unless the absence of those named co-conspirators alters the nature of the conspiracy alleged, such a change will not produce a conclusion that the proceeding was commenced without consent (see R v Morrison [2010] QSC 446 at [25]

98. The Code contains an exception which allows a person to be arrested, charged, remanded or bailed for an offence of conspiracy before the Director gives the necessary consent (Criminal Code s 11.5(8)).

99. This exception likely modifies the general rule that applies in Victorian criminal procedure that a proceeding commences when the charge-sheet is filed (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 5. See also Judiciary Act 1903 ss 79, 80).

100. While it is not entirely certain, it appears likely that the common law on commencement of proceedings applies and so the consent must be obtained no later than the arraignment of the accused on the trial indictment (see R v B (2008) 76 NSWLR 533 at [87], [96]–[97]; R v Evans [1964] VR 717. See also Judiciary Act 1903 s 80).

Defences, procedures, limitations and qualifying provisions

101. Criminal Code s 11.5(7) provides that:

> Any defences, procedures, limitations or qualifying provisions that apply to an offence apply also to the offence of conspiracy to commit that offence.

102. This applies to matters which are extrinsic to the elements of the offence, rather than the requirement that the prosecution prove all elements of the offence (R v Onuorah (2009) 76 NSWLR 1 at [35]).

Complicity, Duplicity and Multiple Acts

103. As at common law, a charge of conspiracy under s 11.5 of the Criminal Code may allege a conspiracy to engage in multiple acts of criminality (R (Cth) v Baladjam (No 4) [2008] NSWSC 726 at [96]; R v B (2008) 76 NSWLR 533 at [22]).

104. However, where the alleged conspiracy does not involve offences of a similar character, the judge may need to intervene to preserve the fairness of the trial process (R (Cth) v Baladjam (No 4) [2008] NSWSC 726 at [112]). See also 'Dismissal of conspiracy charges in the interests of justice' above.

105. Where an agreement contemplated multiple criminal acts, the jury must unanimously find that it included an agreement to commit the principal offence which is charged in the indictment (Nirta v R (1983) 79 FLR 190).

106. In addition, section 400.12 of the Criminal Code allows the prosecution to aggregate multiple discrete acts of money laundering into a single charge. This provision is equally applicable to a charge of conspiracy to commit an offence to which s 400.12 applies (Tan v R (2011) 35 VR 109 at [44]).

6.2.1 Charge: Conspiracy (Commonwealth)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge is designed for cases where the parties agree that a member of the conspiracy will commit the substantive offence. The direction must be modified if the conspiracy contemplates a third party committing the substantive offence.

I must now direct you about the crime of conspiracy to commit NOO. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following three elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – The accused conspired with another person to commit NOO;

Two – The accused intended to conspire with that other person to commit NOO;

Three – The accused or another party to the conspiracy committed an 'overt act' to advance the agreement.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail

Conspiracy

The first element looks at what the accused did. The prosecution must prove that the accused conspired with another person to commit NOO. This requires you to be satisfied of three matters beyond reasonable doubt.

First, the prosecution must prove that NOA and [identify alleged co-conspirator(s)] entered into an agreement. Was there an agreement between the accused and at least one other person?

Second, you must look at the content of the agreement. Was it an agreement to commit NOO? For this part of the element, the prosecution must prove that there was an agreement to:

[identify and explain all physical elements of the substantive offence]

Third, the accused and at least one other party to the agreement must have intended that NOO be committed. This means that they must have intended that:

[identify all physical elements of the substantive offence, except for any elements which are subject to a special liability provision. See 6.2 Conspiracy (Commonwealth) for guidance]

[If there are any elements subject to a special liability provision, add the following shaded section]

You will have noticed a difference in what I said the prosecution must prove about the scope of the agreement, and the intentions of the accused and at least one other party. To prove this offence, the prosecution must prove there was an agreement to [identify relevant special liability element], but they do not need to prove the parties intended that [identify relevant special liability element]. Let me explain the difference. To prove there was an agreement to [identify relevant special liability element], the prosecution must prove the agreement related to the [identify factual basis for the relevant element] and not to some other [insert relevant term, e.g. substance / container / object]. But the prosecution does not have to prove the parties knew, believed or intended that the [identify factual basis for the relevant element] was [identify relevant special liability element].

[If there any no relevant special liability provisions, add the following shaded section]

In other words, the prosecution must prove both that the accused agreed to the planned offence and intended the planned offence be committed.

When considering this element, you must consider precisely what NOA knew at the time he allegedly agreed to commit NOO.

You must be satisfied that NOA knew he was [forming / joining] an agreement to commit a criminal offence. S/he must have known the nature of the offence planned. However, s/he did not need to know details of how the offence was going to be carried out. [Where relevant, add: S/he also does not need to have known the identity of the proposed victims].

[Where it is possible that the accused did not know the identity of some of the alleged co-conspirators, add the following shaded section]

NOA did not need to know the identity of the other parties to the agreement. However, s/he must know that there were other parties. He must have agreed with them to commit the offence. It is impossible to form an agreement with yourself.

[If it is alleged that the accused's agreement should be inferred from his/her involvement in a criminal enterprise, add the following shaded section]

In making your decision, you must consider what each party knew and agreed to. Do not assume that a person agreed to commit an offence simply because s/he knew it was likely s/he was part of a criminal enterprise that involved the commission of NOO. To convict the accused of conspiracy to commit NOO, you must find s/he intentionally agreed to commit NOO.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments of prosecution and defence]

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied that there was an agreement between NOA and [at least one of] [identify alleged co-conspirators], in the terms alleged by the prosecution. You must also be satisfied that NOA and another co-conspirator intended to commit NOO. If you are not satisfied of any of the three matters I have identified, then this element will not be met.

Intention to Agree

The second element is that NOA intended to enter the agreement. You must be satisfied that NOA really meant to make the agreement and did not just appear to agree.

The prosecution argued that NOA meant to make the agreement. [Refer to relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

An Overt Act

The third element is that a party to the agreement committed an 'overt act' to advance the agreement.

The first element looked at whether there was an agreement. This element looks at what was done as part of the agreement.

In this case, the prosecution has identified [number] of overt acts they say were performed as part of the agreement. These are [identify alleged overt acts].

In relation to each of these alleged overt acts, ask yourself two questions.

One – Am I satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that this act occurred?

Two – Am I satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that this act was performed with the intention of advancing the agreement?

In other words, one – did the act occur and two – why was the act performed?

Remember, an overt act can be committed by any party to the agreement. The prosecution does not have to prove that NOA committed the overt act.

To prove this element, you must all agree that a particular overt act was performed as part of the agreement. It is not enough that half of you are satisfied about [insert one overt act] and half of you are satisfied about [insert another overt act]. You must all agree.

[Refer to relevant prosecution and defence evidence and/or arguments]

Withdrawal

[If the evidence raises the defence of withdrawal, add the following shaded section]

The law allows a person to withdraw from a conspiracy and avoid conviction in certain circumstances. The defence argues that these circumstances exist in this case.

The accused does not need to prove that s/he withdrew from the conspiracy. As I have told you, the prosecution must prove all matters beyond reasonable doubt. The prosecution must therefore prove that NOA did not withdraw from the conspiracy.

There are three parts to withdrawal.

One – The accused withdrew from the agreement;

Two – The accused took all reasonable steps to prevent the commission of the offence;

Three – The withdrawal was complete before the commission of an overt act as part of the agreement.

The prosecution will prove that NOA did not withdraw from the conspiracy if it can disprove one or more of these three matters.

The prosecution argues that [identify relevant arguments and evidence]. The defence disputes this, and argues that [identify relevant arguments and evidence].

Summary

To summarise, you can only convict NOA of conspiracy to commit NOO if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – NOA conspired with another person to commit NOO;

Two –NOA intended to conspire with another person to commit NOO;

Three – NOA or another party to the conspiracy committed an 'overt act' to advance the agreement.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of conspiracy to commit NOO.

Inconsistent verdicts

[If there is a risk of inconsistent verdicts, add the following shaded section]

It is important to note that the evidence concerning this offence is identical for both NOA and [identify co-accused]. If you decide that [identify co-accused] is not guilty of conspiracy to commit NOO, you must also find NOA not guilty of that offence.

6.3 Incitement (Victoria)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Inciting a person to pursue a course of conduct that will, if acted upon, involve the commission of an offence by the person incited and/or the inciter is an indictable offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 321G).[365]
2. This is a form of inchoate liability, like attempt and conspiracy (see, e.g. Board of Trade v Owen [1957] AC 602).
3. Incitement is an indictable offence, regardless of whether or not the incited offence is indictable (Crimes Act 1958 s 321G).
4. Incitement is a substantive offence, and is committed upon completion of the inciting conduct, regardless of whether the incitement is successful. This distinguishes incitement from accessorial liability (see, e.g. R v Massie [1999] 1 VR 542; Dimozantos v R (1993) 178 CLR 122).

Elements

5. Incitement has two elements:

   i) The accused incited a person to pursue a course of conduct that would, if acted upon, involve the commission of an offence (the "principal offence"); and

   ii) At the time of the inciting conduct, the accused intended that the principal offence would be committed.

   Each of these elements is addressed in turn below.

Inciting Conduct

6. For the first element to be met, the prosecution must prove that:
   - The accused incited a person to pursue a particular course of conduct; and
   - If the proposed course of conduct had have been followed, an offence would have been committed by the accused,[366] the person incited, or both the accused and the person incited (Crimes Act 1958 s 321G).
7. To "incite" includes commanding, requesting, proposing, advising, encouraging or authorising (Crimes Act 1958 s 2A).

[365] The common law offence of incitement has been abolished (Crimes Act 1958 s 321L).

[366] The accused will incite a person to pursue a course of conduct that involves the commission of an offence by the accused (and not the person incited) where the person incited would be the innocent agent of the accused (Criminal Law Working Group, Report on Incitement, 1982).

8. A command or request that is made conditional on some further event can still be incitement, even if the accused has no control over that other event (R v Massie [1999] 1 VR 542; R v Zhong [2003] VSCA 56).

9. However, in some cases a command or request may be subject to so many conditions, or be dependent on such unlikely events, that there is not an incitement (R v Zhong [2003] VSCA 56).

10. While the incitement needs to have come to the knowledge of the person incited, it does not need to have had any particular effect on him/her. S/he does not need to have formed an intention to commit the principal offence, nor taken any steps to commit that offence, for this element to be met (R v Dimozantos (1991) 56 A Crim R 345; R v Massie [1999] 1 VR 542; R v Zhong [2003] VSCA 56).

11. It is not necessary for the accused to have originated the idea of inciting the criminal conduct. The idea could have originated with a third person, or even with the person to be incited (R v Massie [1999] 1 VR 542).

12. There is an unresolved issue whether it is permissible to charge an offence of "incitement to incite". One example where this could be relevant is where it is alleged that A encouraged B to either hire or encourage C to kill D. The Court of Appeal considered this issue in Najibi v R [2016] VSCA 177 and held that it was not necessary to finally decide, because the prosecution case did not, in truth, involve an alleged incitement to incite. However, in obiter, the Court indicated that in its preliminary view, it was likely that there was no prohibition on a charge of "incitement to incite" (at [153]–[160]).

Intention of Accused

13. The second element requires the accused to have intended that the principal offence be committed (Crimes Act 1958 s 321G(2)(a)).

14. If the intended conduct will not be an offence unless it is committed with a particular state of mind, then the accused must intend that the person who would commit the principal offence have that state of mind (Criminal Law Working Group, Report on Incitement, 1982).

15. Where the principal offence requires the principal offender to have caused a particular result (e.g. the victim's death), the prosecution must prove that the accused intended the principal offender to bring about that result. This is required even if the intention to bring about that result is not necessary to convict the principal offender of the principal offence (R v Massie [1999] 1 VR 542).[367]

Intention or Belief in Facts and Circumstances

16. The accused must also intend or believe that any fact or circumstance that is an element of the offence will exist at the time the offence is expected to take place (Crimes Act 1958 s 321G).

17. This requirement concerns facts or circumstances that are themselves elements of the principal offence. It does not require the accused to have intended or believed that the specific facts or circumstances which are required, in a particular case, to prove the elements of the principal offence, would be in existence at the relevant time (R v Wilson [2004] VSCA 120; R v Massie [1999] 1 VR 542).

[367] For example, in a murder case, the prosecution does not need to prove that the principal offender intended the victim to die. It is sufficient to prove that s/he intended for the victim to be really seriously injured (but s/he in fact died). However, in an incitement to commit murder case, the prosecution must prove that the accused intended the principal offender to cause the victim's death. If s/he only intended the victim to suffer really serious injury, then s/he should instead be convicted of incitement to intentionally cause serious injury (see, e.g. R v Massie [1999] 1 VR 542).

18. It is not necessary to explain this requirement in every case. It only needs to be addressed if it is an issue in the case (R v Massie [1999] 1 VR 542).

Intention where the accused is also the principle offender

19. An accused's culpability can be based on inciting an innocent agent to pursue a course of conduct that will involve the commission of an offence by the accused (Crimes Act 1958 s 321G(1)(b)).

20. In such a case, this element will be met if the accused has the necessary mental state. It is no defence that the person incited did not share that mental state (Criminal Law Working Group, Report on Incitement, 1982; Crimes Act 1958 s 321G(1)(b). See also Osland v R (1998) 197 CLR 316; R v Hewitt [1997] 1 VR 301; R v Cogan & Leek [1976] QB 217; Matusevich v R (1977) 137 CLR 633; White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342).

Incitement and Impossibility

21. A person may be convicted of incitement even if facts existed which made the commission of the principal offence impossible (Crimes Act 1958 s 321G).

22. However, incitement is not committed if the accused erroneously believed s/he was inciting a crime. The crime incited must have been a real offence, not an imaginary one (R v Sirat (1986) 83 Cr App R 41).

Jury Directions and Statutory Language

23. It is generally unnecessary and undesirable to repeat the language of s 321G to the jury verbatim (R v Massie [1999] 1 VR 542).

24. The judge should only explain so much of s 321G as is relevant to the case (R v Massie [1999] 1 VR 542).

25. In a simple case, it is unnecessary to direct the jury concerning the requirement that the accused incite someone to "pursue a course of conduct". It is sufficient to direct the jury that the accused must incite a person to commit a crime (R v Massie [1999] 1 VR 542).

6.3.1 Charge: Incitement (Victoria)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge has been written for cases in which the accused incites another person to commit an offence. The charge will need to be modified for situations where the accused incites a person to pursue a course of conduct that involves the commission of an offence by the inciter.

Inciting a person to commit NOO[368] is a crime.[369] In order to find the accused guilty of incitement to commit NOO, the prosecution must prove 2 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused incited a person to commit the offence of NOO.

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intended the offence of NOO to be committed.

[368] Name of Offence.

[369] Crimes Act 1958 s 321G.

Before you can find NOA guilty of incitement to commit NOO you must be satisfied that both of these elements have been proven beyond reasonable doubt. I will now explain these elements in detail.

Inciting Conduct

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused incited a person to commit a crime.

A person can "incite" someone to do something in a variety of ways. For example, s/he can [insert appropriate definitions, such as instruct, command, encourage, request, authorise, propose or advise] them to do it.

In this case it is alleged that NOA "incited" NO3P to commit the offence of NOO. A person commits NOO when s/he [describe and explain the relevant elements of the principal offence. See 7 Victorian Offences for the elements of the primary offence].

It is for you to determine whether NOA incited NO3P to commit NOO. In making this determination, you do not need to consider the effect of NOA's conduct on NO3P. As long as NOA incited NO3P to [describe the course of conduct that would constitute the principal offence], it does not matter whether that incitement was successful or not. In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA incited NO3P to commit NOO by [describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence disputed this, arguing [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intended the offence of NOO to be committed. This requires you to be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA intended that NO3P [describe relevant conduct and necessary state of mind of NO3P, e.g. "intentionally kill NOV without lawful excuse" or "intentionally sexually penetrate NOV without his/her consent"].

[If there are particular facts or circumstances the accused must have believed in to commit the offence, add the following shaded section.]

You must also be satisfied that NOA intended or believed that [describe relevant facts or circumstances, e.g. "NOV would not be consenting"] at the time the offence was to be committed.

The prosecution submitted that this element has been met in this case. [Describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence responded [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of incitement to commit NOO, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA incited NO3P to commit NOO; and

Two – that NOA intended that NOO would be committed.

If you find that either of these elements have not been satisfied beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of incitement to commit NOO.

Two elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused incited a person to commit the principal offence; and
2. The accused intended the principal offence to be committed.

Incitement

1. Did the accused incite a person to commit the principal offence?

Consider – "Inciting" an offence includes commanding, requesting, proposing, advising, encouraging or authorising it.

Consider – The incitement does not need to have been successful.

If Yes, then go to Question 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of incitement to commit the principal offence

Intention

2. Did the accused intend the principal offence to be committed?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of incitement to commit the principal offence (as long as you have also answered Yes to question 1)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of incitement to commit the principal offence

6.4 Attempt (Victoria)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Attempting to commit an indictable offence is an indictable offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 321M).[370]
2. Attempt is a form of inchoate liability, like conspiracy and incitement (see, e.g. Board of Trade v Owen [1957] AC 602).
3. Attempting to commit an indictable offence has 2 elements:
   i) The accused intended to commit an indictable offence; and
   ii) The accused attempted to commit that offence.

Each of these elements is addressed in turn below.

---

[370] The common law offence of attempt has been abolished (Crimes Act 1958 s 321S).

Intention to Commit an Indictable Offence

4. The first element requires the accused to have intended to commit an indictable offence ("the principal offence") (Crimes Act 1958 s 321N; Britten v Alpogut [1987] VR 929; DPP v Stonehouse [1978] AC 55).

5. The accused must have intended to commit the principal offence and not some other offence (Knight v R (1992) 175 CLR 495; McGhee v R (1995) 183 CLR 82; Trade Practices Commission v Tubemakers of Australia Ltd (1983) 47 ALR 719).

6. This requires the accused to have intended to perform the physical elements of the principal offence (McGhee v R (1995) 183 CLR 82).

7. Where the principal offence requires the accused to have caused a particular result (e.g. the victim's death), the prosecution must prove that the accused intended to bring about that result. This is required even if the intention to bring about that result is not necessary to convict the accused of the principal offence (Knight v R (1992) 175 CLR 495; McGhee v R (1995) 183 CLR 82; Trade Practices Commission v Tubemakers of Australia Ltd (1983) 47 ALR 719).[371]

8. Intention requires more than an expectation that a particular result is likely. For this element to be met, the accused must have acted with the purpose of bringing about the attempted result (Trade Practices Commission v Tubemakers of Australia Ltd (1983) 47 ALR 719).

9. Recklessness and negligence are not sufficient states of mind for the crime of attempt (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473; Alister & Ors v R (1984) 154 CLR 404).

Intention or Belief in Facts and Circumstances

10. The accused must also intend or believe that any fact or circumstance that is an element of the offence will exist at the time the offence is expected to take place (Crimes Act 1958 s 321N).

11. This requirement concerns facts or circumstances that are themselves elements of the principal offence. It does not require the accused to have intended or believed that the specific facts or circumstances which are required, in a particular case, to prove the elements of the principal offence, would be in existence at the relevant time (R v Wilson [2004] VSCA 120).

Act of Attempt

12. The second element requires the accused to have attempted to commit the principal offence. For this element to be satisfied, the accused's conduct must have been:

    (a) More than merely preparatory to the commission of the offence; and

    (b) Immediately and not remotely connected with the commission of the offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 321N(1)).

13. While various tests have been developed to assist in the interpretation of this element (see, e.g. R v Barker (1924) NZGLR 393; R v De Silva [2007] QCA 301; R v Haas [1964] Tas SR 1; R v Nicholson (1994) 14 Tas R 351), no definitive test beyond the words of the statute has been endorsed in Victoria.

[371] For example, in a murder case, the prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended the victim to die. It is sufficient to prove that the accused intended for him/her to be really seriously injured (but s/he in fact died). However, in an attempted murder case, the prosecution must prove that the accused intended the victim to die. If s/he only intended the victim to suffer really serious injury, then s/he should instead be convicted of attempting to intentionally cause serious injury (see, e.g. Knight v R (1992) 175 CLR 495).

14. The dividing line between mere preparation and completed attempt is thus not the subject of clear guidance, and every case will depend on its facts (Partington v Williams (1975) 62 Cr App R 220; R v Williams; Ex parte the Minister for Justice and Attorney-General [1965] Qd SR 86; Nicholson v R (1994) 14 Tas R 351).

15. At a general level, an attempt is sometimes described as the beginning of the commission of the crime (R v De Silva [2007] QCA 301).

16. The point at which the accused moves beyond mere preparation, and starts the commission of the crime, is generally indeterminate. Two tests that have been developed to try to help determine when this may happen are:

    - The 'last act test'. This requires the accused to have performed all of the acts that s/he needed to do in order to complete the offence (R v De Silva [2007] QCA 301; R v Barker (1924) NZGLR 393); and
    - The 'unequivocal act test'. This requires the accused's conduct, in all the circumstances, to be unequivocally referable to an intention to complete the principal offence (R v Nicholson (1994) 14 Tas R 351; R v Barker (1924) NZGLR 393).

17. It has been held that while the unequivocal act test can be a useful guide for determining whether the accused's conduct has moved beyond mere preparation, it is not a prescriptive rule (R v Nicholson (1994) 14 Tas R 351).

Defences to Attempt

18. The prosecution must disprove any defences that are raised on the evidence (Fingleton v R (2005) 227 CLR 166; Zecevic v DPP (1987) 162 CLR 645; Pemble v R (1971) 124 CLR 107).

19. While provocation may be a partial defence to murder,[372] it is not a defence to attempted murder (McGhee v R (1995) 183 CLR 82).

Attempt and Impossibility

20. The offence of attempt is not limited to conduct that, if it had not been interrupted, would have resulted in the commission of the crime (Britten v Alpogut [1987] VR 929).

21. For example, a person may be convicted of attempting to commit an offence even if facts existed which made the commission of the principal offence impossible (Crimes Act 1958 s 321N; Britten v Alpogut [1987] VR 929; R v Cogley [1989] VR 799).

22. However, an attempt is not committed if the accused erroneously believed s/he was committing a crime. The crime attempted must have been a real indictable offence, not an imagined crime (Britten v Alpogut [1987] VR 929).

Attempt and Inchoate liability

23. The law recognises that a person cannot attempt to conspire or attempt to be a secondary party to an offence (whether under the principles of statutory complicity or common law complicity) (Franze v R (2014) 46 VR 856).

24. Conversely, it is possible for a person to be a secondary party to an attempted offence. This occurs, for example, when the person enters into an agreement to complete an offence and that agreement only produces an attempt at the contemplated offence. The distinction lies between a joint attempt, which is legally possible, and an attempt to agree, which is not (Franze v R (2014) 46 VR 856).

6.4.1 Charge: Attempt (Victoria)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

When directing a jury about attempt, adapt the relevant offence direction from Part 7: Victorian Offences and add the following instruction as part of the relevant conduct element.

Attempt

The law says that for a person to be guilty of attempting to commit a crime, you must be satisfied that NOA did something that was more than mere preparation for the commission of that offence, but was immediately and not remotely connected with its commission.

When a person commits an offence, s/he will often perform various acts leading up to its commission. For example, s/he may make the initial decision to commit the offence, and may plan how s/he will carry it out. In some cases s/he may purchase the necessary tools or weapons.

It for you to determine, using your common sense, whether NOA's conduct moved beyond merely preparing to commit the offence.

The prosecution argued that this element has been met in this case. [Describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing that [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Impossible Attempts

[If the accused could not have completed the offence for any reason, add the following shaded section.]

In this case you have heard evidence that NOA could not have committed NOO because [insert reason for the impossibility of the completion of the offence, e.g. "the gun was not loaded"]. This fact is not relevant to your determination.

The law does not excuse a person who attempts to commit an offence, but fails due to incompetence or because of factors outside his/her knowledge or control. This means that, as long as the two elements of this offence are satisfied, the accused will be guilty of attempted NOO, even if s/he was attempting to do something that was impossible.

6.4.2 Charge: Attempted Rape (Victoria) (1/1/08–30/06/15)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

This charge is provided to show how an offence direction can be modified into an attempt direction.

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of attempted rape. That crime has the following 4 elements.

One – The accused attempted to sexually penetrate the complainant in the way alleged.

Two – The accused did this intentionally.

Three – The complainant did not consent to the intended sexual penetration.

Four – the accused had one of the following three states of mind about the complainant's consent

(a) The accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting, or

(b) The accused was aware that the complainant might not be consenting, or

(c) The accused was not giving any thought to whether the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

Before you can find NOA guilty of attempted rape you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proved all four of these elements beyond reasonable doubt.

I will now explain each of these elements in detail.

Sexual Penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused attempted to sexually penetrate the complainant in the way alleged. [If in issue, add: The prosecution must also prove that the accused did this act consciously, voluntarily, and deliberately.[373]]

To understand this element, I will first explain when the law says that a person commits an attempt and then I will explain what the law means by sexual penetration.

Attempt

The law says that for a person to be guilty of attempting to commit a crime, you must be satisfied that NOA did something that was more than mere preparation for the commission of that offence, but was immediately and not remotely connected with its commission.

When a person commits an offence, s/he will often perform various acts leading up to its commission. For example, s/he may make the initial decision to commit the offence, and may plan how s/he will carry it out. In some cases s/he may purchase the necessary tools or weapons.

It is for you to determine, using your common sense, whether NOA's conduct moved beyond merely preparing to commit the offence.

The prosecution argued that this element has been met in this case. [Describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments.] The defence denied this, arguing that [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Act of sexual penetration

I will now explain the words sexual penetration. The law defines the term sexual penetration to include a number of different acts. In this case the prosecution must prove that NOA introduced [identify item or body part, e.g. "his penis"] to any extent into NOC's [vagina/anus/mouth].

[If relevant add:

- An act of sexual penetration is complete even if NOA's [identify item or body part] did not go all the way into NOC's [vagina/anus/mouth]. Even slight penetration is enough.
- Sexual penetration requires actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation.]

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that NOA attempted to introduce [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of NOC's vagina.

[373] Described in the instructions within this charge as the "voluntariness" requirement.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

According to the law, the introduction of an object or body part other than the penis into the [vagina/anus] of a complainant does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the attempted insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

In this case [insert relevant evidence or competing arguments about proof of sexual penetration].

The act was conscious, voluntary and deliberate

[If the evidence or arguments have placed voluntariness in issue, add the shaded section.]

As I have directed you, the prosecution must prove that the accused attempted to sexually penetrate the complainant consciously, voluntarily, and deliberately.

This requirement is in issue here because [describe the evidence or arguments that place voluntariness in issue].

You must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the attempted sexual penetration was intentional.[374]

[If intention is not in issue, add the shaded section.]

This element is not in issue here. [If appropriate, explain further, e.g.

- The accused admits that s/he intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant.
- If you are satisfied that the accused [consciously, voluntarily and deliberately] sexually penetrated the complainant, you should have no trouble finding that s/he did so intentionally.]

[374] Because rape is an offence of basic intent (the intent to commit the physical act of penetrating the complainant) proof of the intent will rarely be separated from proof of the act, and "intention" will rarely be an independent issue. Instead, mental state issues related to the act of penetration should generally be addressed by voluntariness directions. This will be the case if the issue is negation of intent by involuntariness, unconsciousness or accident. If different "intention" issues arise, this charge should be adapted.

Consent

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant was not consenting to the intended sexual penetration.

The law says that consent means free agreement. So the prosecution must prove that NOC did not freely agree to being sexually penetrated by NOA [at the time in question].

The law identifies a number of circumstances where the complainant is deemed not to freely agree, or consent, to sexual penetration. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because she or he is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep, unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of freely agreeing;

(e) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(f) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act or the identity of the person;

(g) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting. However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

[If there is evidence the complainant did not indicate agreement, add the following shaded section if relevant.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to the attempted sexual penetration at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

[Where evidence is given about the absence of physical resistance, lack of physical injury or past consensual sex, add the following shaded section if relevant to the facts in issue.]

The law also says that you are not to regard the complainant as having freely agreed just because:

● [if relevant] the complainant did not protest or physically resist the accused;

● [if relevant] the complainant did not sustain physical injury;

● [if relevant] the complainant agreed to engage in another sexual act on that occasion with the accused or with any other person, or that s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act with the accused or another person on an earlier occasion.

However, these are relevant factors for you to consider. You must consider the action or lack of action of NOC, together with all the surrounding circumstances, in order to decide whether the prosecution has proven beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not consent to the intended sexual penetration.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to be sexually penetrated, you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done, or not said and done at the time of the alleged penetration, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about [his/her] state of mind at that time.

In this case, [insert evidence and competing arguments relevant to proof that the complainant was not consenting].

It is important that you remember that it is not for the accused to prove to you that the complainant consented. For this third element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not consent.

State of Mind of the Accused

The fourth element relates to the accused's state of mind about the complainant's consent. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of attempted sexual penetration the accused:

- was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting to the intended sexual penetration; or
- was not giving any thought to whether the complainant was not or might not be consenting to the intended sexual penetration.[375]

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these states of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find this element not proven, and you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.[376]

Belief in consent

[If evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting, add one of the directions in 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of attempted rape the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA attempted to sexually penetrate NOC in the way alleged; and

Two – that NOA intended to sexually penetrate NOC; and Three – that NOC did not consent to the intended sexual penetration; and Four – that at the time of the attempted sexual penetration NOA either:

---

[375] It will only be necessary to direct the jury on the second state of mind, 'not giving any thought to whether the complainant was consenting', in rare cases.

[376] If this element is not in issue, it will generally be sufficient to state that conclusion at this point and elaborate no further.

- was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting to the intended sexual penetration; or
- was not giving any thought to whether the complainant was not or might not be consenting to the intended sexual penetration.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of attempted rape.

7 Victorian Offences

7.1 General Directions

7.1.1 Voluntariness

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

The Voluntariness Requirement

1. The existence of a voluntary act or omission is an essential element of a crime. The accused must not be convicted for an act or omission which was independent of his or her will (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64*; R v Falconer* (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v Marijancevic (2009) 22 VR 576).
2. Unless it is expressly excluded by statute, the voluntariness requirement applies to every offence (Bratty v AG for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386; R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; He Kaw Teh (1985) 157 CLR 523; Jiminez v R (1992) 173 CLR 572).
3. This includes offences which do not require proof of mens rea (see, e.g. R v Carter [1959] VR 105; Edwards v Macrae (1991) 25 NSWLR 89).
4. Where the relevant fault element is negligence, the negligent act or omission must have been committed voluntarily (R v Martin (1983) 9 A Crim R 376; R v Tajber (1986) 13 FCR 524).
5. The cause of any involuntariness is irrelevant. A person whose actions are involuntary cannot be found guilty of an offence (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; Jiminez v R (1992) 173 CLR 572).

When is an Act or Omission "Voluntary"?

Acts

6. An act is committed voluntarily if it is subject to the control and direction of the accused's will (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30).
7. For an act to be voluntary, the accused does not need to have intended to attain the result caused by doing that act. It is sufficient that he or she was conscious of the nature of the act committed, and chose to do an act of that nature (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v Williamson (1996) 67 SASR 428).
8. A person who is not conscious or aware of what he or she is doing acts involuntarily. However, the key issue is the lack of the exercise of will, not the lack of consciousness or knowledge (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205 (Barwick CJ). See also R v Schaeffer (2005) 13 VR 337).
9. It is therefore possible for a person to act involuntarily even though he or she is conscious and has some awareness of what is happening (R v Radford (1985) 42 SASR 266; R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30). See 8.8 Automatism for further information.

10. The accused does not need to have appreciated the wrongfulness of his or her conduct for it to have been voluntary. However, the level of the accused's awareness and understanding of his or her actions is a factor to be taken into account in determining whether he or she acted voluntarily (R v Morrison (2007) 171 A Crim R 361).

11. The fact that a person's thought processes were affected by a mental illness does not mean that he or she acted involuntarily. There is a distinction between an unwilled act and a willed act that is the product of a diseased mind (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205 (Barwick CJ); R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30. See also R v Harm (1975) 13 SASR 84).

12. An act is not to be regarded as involuntary simply because:

    - The accused cannot remember it;
    - The accused could not control his or her impulse to do it;
    - It was unintentional or its consequences were unforeseen (Bratty v AG for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386; R v Radford [1985] 42 SASR 266; R v King (2005) 155 ACTR 55. See also Nolan v R WA CCA 22/5/97).

13. Although it is sometimes said that acts committed under duress are "involuntary" or "unwilled", it is incorrect to treat duress as related to the voluntariness requirement. A person who acts under duress deliberately chooses to perform some act (although under constrained circumstances), and thus acts "voluntarily" in the sense outlined in this commentary (see, e.g. R v Palazoff (1986) 43 SASR 99).

Omissions

14. Although it is often stated that a person can only be held criminally responsible for voluntary omissions (see, e.g. Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30), it is not clear when an omission should be considered to be involuntary.

Types of Involuntary Acts

15. There are at least five types of acts that may raise issues of voluntariness:

    - Involuntary muscular movements, such as spasms, convulsions and reflex actions;
    - Acts performed whilst asleep;
    - Accidental actions;
    - Acts performed in a state of automatism;
    - Acts performed in a state of gross intoxication.

16. This topic only addresses the first two types of involuntary actions. See 7.1.4 Accident, 8.8 Automatism and 8.7 Common Law Intoxication for information concerning the other types of involuntary actions.

Involuntary muscular movements

17. An act which results from a muscular movement that occurs without any control by the mind is involuntary (Bratty v AG for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386; Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205).

18. It is clear that this includes:

    - Spasms and convulsions (Bratty v AG for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386; Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205);

- Actions which a person is physically compelled to do by an external force;[377] and
- "Reflex action" in the strict neurological sense (i.e., a predictable and nearly instantaneous movement in response to a stimulus) (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205 (Windeyer J)).

19. However, the term "reflex action" is also used to denote the probable but unpredictable reaction of a person when startled. It is unclear whether such a reaction is relevantly "involuntary":
    - In some cases the court seems to have accepted that such an instinctive reaction is involuntary (see, e.g. R v Ugle (2002) 211 CLR 171);
    - In other cases it has been suggested that an act is not to be treated as involuntary simply because the mind worked quickly and impulsively (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205 (Windeyer J); Murray v R (2002) 211 CLR 193 (Gaudron J)).
20. If the latter position is accepted, it will not be sufficient to tell the jury to acquit if they find that the accused acted reflexively. They will need to decide whether that reflex action was itself an unwilled act (Murray v R (2002) 211 CLR 193 (Gaudron J)).

Acts performed while asleep

21. A person cannot be held criminally responsible for an action committed while asleep. Such acts are necessarily involuntary (Jiminez v R (1992) 173 CLR 572; Kroon v R (1990) 55 SASR 476).
22. However, the accused may be held criminally responsible for acts committed prior to falling asleep, such as driving while fatigued and aware of a real risk of falling asleep (see, e.g. Jiminez v R (1992) 173 CLR 572; Kroon v R (1990) 55 SASR 476. See also Maher v Russell Tas SC 22/11/93).[378]
23. For information concerning actions committed whilst sleepwalking, see 8.8 Automatism.

Which Act Must be Voluntary?

24. It is the "deed which would constitute the crime" that must be performed voluntarily (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205 (Barwick CJ)).
25. Precisely which act (or omission) must be committed voluntarily will differ depending on the offence in question. For example:
    - In relation to murder, it is the "act that caused the death" (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30);
    - In relation to manslaughter by unlawful and dangerous act, it is the "unlawful and dangerous act that exposed the victim to an appreciable risk of serious injury" (R v Haywood [1971] VR 755; R v Williamson (1996) 67 SASR 428).

Acts and Consequences

26. It is the act which must be voluntary, not its consequences (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v King (2005) 155 ACTR 55; R v Abdul-Rasool (2008) 18 VR 586).
27. Thus, in relation to murder, the accused does not need to have voluntarily caused the death. It is sufficient if he or she voluntarily committed the death-causing act (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v Ugle (2002) 211 CLR 171; Murray v R (2002) 211 CLR 193).

[377] Physically compelled acts must be distinguished from acts performed under the mental compulsion of threats. As noted above, while the defence of duress may be available to a person who commits such acts, the acts are not involuntary in the sense outlined in this topic (R v Palazoff (1986) 43 SASR 99).

[378] In such circumstances, the issues of causation and contemporaneity will need to be carefully addressed (see, e.g. Jiminez v R (1992) 173 CLR 572).

28. While in most cases it will not be difficult to identify which act must be voluntary (R v Williamson (1996) 67 SASR 428), occasionally there may be a dispute about precisely what constitutes the "act" and what constitutes the "consequences". For example, where the accused is charged with murdering another person by striking them with a stick, it could be argued that:

    - The "act" is wielding the stick, and the "consequence" is the stick striking the victim and causing his or her death; or
    - The "act" is striking the victim, and the "consequence" is causing his or her death (see Kolian v R (1968) 119 CLR 47).

29. The law in this area is not settled, with some judges holding that it is the bodily action alone (e.g. wielding the stick) which must be voluntary, and others looking more broadly at the aspect of the offence which creates the liability to punishment (e.g. striking the victim) (see, e.g. Vallance v R (1961) 108 CLR 56; Kaporonovski v R (1973) 133 CLR 209; Kolian v R (1968) 119 CLR 47; R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v Williamson (1996) 67 SASR 428; Murray v R (2002) 211 CLR 193; R v Ugle (2002) 211 CLR 171; R v Winter [2006] VSCA 144).

30. It has been suggested that neither view should be rigidly adhered to, and that the matter should be resolved on a case by case basis (Kaporonovski v R (1973) 133 CLR 209 (Walsh J); R v Williamson (1996) 67 SASR 428).

31. However, judges have been urged to avoid an overly refined analysis when addressing this issue (Murray v R (2002) 211 CLR 193 (Gummow and Hayne JJ); R v Katarzynski [2005] NSWCCA 72).

Causal Acts

32. Where an offence requires proof that the accused's actions caused a particular result, it is the causal act that must be voluntary (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; Kolian v R (1968) 119 CLR 47; R v Katarzynski [2005] NSWCCA 72).

33. For example, in relation to murder it is the act that caused the victim's death that must have been voluntary (see, e.g. Kolian v R (1968) 119 CLR 47; R v Winter [2006] VSCA 144).

34. In particular, where the case involves a scuffle over a weapon, the prosecution must prove that the particular use of the weapon to inflict the death-causing or injury-causing wound was voluntary. For example, in Herodotou v The Queen, to prove that the act was voluntary, the prosecution needed to prove that the accused intended to inflict the particular stab wound which caused death, given the evidence that the accused and the deceased had been grappling over a knife (Herodotou v The Queen [2018] VSCA 253, [123]–[124]).

35. Where there is a dispute about which act caused the requisite result, it is for the jury to determine (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205 (Barwick CJ); R v Demirian [1989] VR 97; Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378; R v Katarzynski [2005] NSWCCA 72). See 7.1.2 Causation for guidance on this issue.

36. In such cases, the jury's determination of the voluntariness issue may differ depending on what they find to be the causal act. For example, where it is alleged that the accused murdered the victim by shooting him or her, and the jury accepts that the trigger was pulled involuntarily:

    - They must acquit the accused if they find that the causal act was firing the gun;
    - They may convict the accused if they find that the causal act was drawing the gun in the circumstances in which it was drawn (e.g. cocked and loaded, with no safety catch applied), which the accused did voluntarily (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205 (Barwick CJ). See also Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378; Murray v R (2002) 211 CLR 193; R v Katarzynski [2005] NSWCCA 72; Koani v R [2017] HCA 42).

37. Consequently, where there are multiple possible causal acts in issue, it is important that the judge identify the different possibilities and explain the consequences of the jury's findings (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205 (Barwick CJ, Menzies J); Murray v R (2002) 211 CLR 193 (Callinan J); White v Ridley (1978) 140 CLR 342; Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378 (Mason CJ); R v Katarzynski [2005] NSWCCA 72; Koani v R [2017] HCA 42).

Knowledge of Circumstances

38. In most cases, an act may be voluntary even if the accused is unaware of fundamental facts that will determine his or her culpability. Knowledge of the circumstances in which an act is committed is generally a component of intention not volition (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64).

39. For example, where the accused is charged with murder, the accused does not need to have known that the victim would be shot to make the discharge of the gun a voluntary act (see, e.g. Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205).[379]

40. However, some acts require a certain level of knowledge. For example, if it is held that the act that must have been voluntary in a particular case was stabbing the victim, this requirement will only be met if the accused knew there was a knife in his or her hand (R v Williamson (1996) 67 SASR 428; R v Winter [2006] VSCA 144. See also Kolian v R (1968) 119 CLR 47; Duffy v R (1981) WAR 72).

The Evidentiary Presumption of Voluntariness

41. Ordinarily, the prosecution does not need to address the issue of voluntariness. Instead, they may rely on the evidentiary presumption that an act done by an apparently conscious person was done voluntarily (the "evidentiary presumption of voluntariness") (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30. See also Bratty v AG for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386; Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; R v Radford [1985] 42 SASR 266; Bush v R (1993) 43 FCR 549; Hawkins v R (1994) 179 CLR 500; MG v R (2010) 29 VR 305).[380]

42. The evidentiary presumption of voluntariness reflects the ordinary and universal experience that a person's will ordinarily accompanies his or her actions (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; [1990] HCA 49).

43. The evidentiary presumption of voluntariness is a provisional presumption only. Unlike the presumption of sanity,[381] it does not put the legal burden on the defence. The burden of proving voluntariness always remains on the prosecution (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; Bratty v AG for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386 (Lord Denning); Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205 (Barwick CJ); R v Radford [1985] 42 SASR 266; R v Marijancevic (2009) 22 VR 576).

44. Thus, if the evidentiary presumption of voluntariness is displaced, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the relevant act or omission was voluntary (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v Marijancevic (2009) 22 VR 576).

45. For the evidentiary presumption of voluntariness to be displaced, there must be sufficient evidence from which it may reasonably be inferred that the relevant act was involuntary (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; Bratty v AG for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386 (Lord Denning); Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205 (Barwick CJ); R v Youssef (1990) 50 A Crim R 1; R v Marijancevic (2009) 22 VR 576).

46. The mere fact that the accused has made a credible assertion of a lack of memory is not sufficient to displace the presumption (R v O'Connor (1980) 146 CLR 64 (Barwick CJ)).

47. See 7.1.4 Accident, 8.8 Automatism and 8.7 Common Law Intoxication for information concerning some of the circumstances in which the presumption will be displaced.

[379] The accused's lack of knowledge will, however, be relevant to the question of whether he or she intended to cause death or really serious injury.

[380] The evidentiary presumption of voluntariness is sometimes called the "presumption of mental capacity" (see, e.g. Bratty v AG for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386; Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205).

[381] See 8.4 Mental Impairment.

When Must the Jury be Directed about Voluntariness?

48. For most offences,[382] it will only be necessary to direct the jury about voluntariness if the evidentiary presumption of voluntariness has been displaced (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; Bratty v AG for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386; Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; R v Marijancevic (2009) 22 VR 576; Cvetkovic v R [2010] NSWCCA 329).

49. As there ordinarily will not be sufficient evidence to displace the presumption, it will usually not be necessary to give a direction on voluntariness (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v Fowler [1999] VSCA 135; R v Le Broc (2000) 2 VR 43; R v Chang (2003) 7 VR 236).

50. Where the presumption has been displaced:

    - The jury must be specifically directed about voluntariness (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; R v Ugle (2002) 211 CLR 171; Murray v R (2002) 211 CLR 193; R v Marijancevic (2009) 22 VR 576. But see R v Tucker (1984) 36 SASR 135); and
    - A direction must be given even if not requested or sought by either party (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; MG v R (2010) 29 VR 305).

Content of the Charge

51. Where a voluntariness direction is required, the judge must:

    - Specifically direct the jury that one element of the offence that the prosecution must prove is that the relevant act (or omission) was voluntary;
    - Explain the meaning of that element; and
    - Relate the law to the evidence (R v Tait [1973] VR 151; Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; MG v R (2010) 29 VR 305).

Give a separate voluntariness direction

52. When voluntariness is in issue, the jury must be specifically directed about it (R v Ugle (2002) 211 CLR 171; Stevens v R (2005) 227 CLR 319 (Kirby and Callinan JJ); MG v R (2010) 29 VR 305).

53. It is not sufficient to direct the jury that the accused's acts must have been intentional. The judge must draw to the jury's attention any matters which can show that the prosecution has not proven the relevant act was voluntary (R v Ugle (2002) 211 CLR 171; Murray v R (2002) 211 CLR 193 (Callinan J); Stevens v R (2005) 227 CLR 319 (Kirby and Callinan JJ); MG v R (2010) 29 VR 305. But see R v Tucker (1984) 36 SASR 135).[383]

54. As the issue of voluntariness is logically anterior to issues such as whether the act was committed in self-defence, or whether it was done with the requisite intention, it should be addressed first (R v Ugle (2002) 211 CLR 171; Stevens v R (2005) 227 CLR 319 (Kirby and Callinan JJ)).

Define voluntariness

55. The judge must explain the legal meaning of "voluntariness" to the jury (R v Tait [1973] VR 151).

---

[382] For some offences, such as murder, the jury should always be directed about voluntariness. Where this is the case, the issue of voluntariness is addressed in the commentary for that offence.

[383] Although a judge should direct the jury about voluntariness and intention separately, where the issue of voluntariness is factually subsumed by the issue of intention an omission to direct the jury about voluntariness may not give rise to a substantial miscarriage of justice (see, e.g. MG v R (2010) 29 VR 305; Coulson v R [2010] VSCA 146).

56. This requires the judge to explain to the jury that the relevant act must have been the product of the accused's will (R v Tait [1973] VR 151).

57. No set form of words is essential (R v Tait [1973] VR 151).

58. It is not necessary to tell the jury that "the mind must accompany the act", although that may be an appropriate direction in some cases (R v Tait [1973] VR 151).

59. The words "conscious" and "deliberate" may be used to help the jury to assess and understand whether the relevant act was voluntary (R v Schaeffer (2005) 13 VR 337. See also Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; R v Winter [2006] VSCA 144).

60. If the word "deliberate" is used, the judge must:

    - Make clear that it refers to deliberately committing the act in question, rather than deliberately causing a particular result;
    - Not suggest that a "deliberate" act differs from a "voluntary" act. While the word "deliberate" may be used to help explain the concept of voluntariness, it is not a separate requirement;
    - Not define the term "deliberate" by reference to whether the result of that act was reasonably foreseeable (R v Schaeffer (2005) 13 VR 337).[384]

61. To avoid confusing the issue of voluntariness with that of intention, judges should not use the word "intentional" to describe the voluntariness requirement (R v Marijancevic (2009) 22 VR 576. See also Kolian v R (1968) 119 CLR 47 (Barwick CJ); MG v R (2010) 29 VR 305).

Identify the relevant act

62. Where there are multiple possible acts in issue, it is important that the judge carefully identify the act that must have been voluntary (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205 (Barwick CJ, Menzies J); Murray v R (2002) 211 CLR 193 (Callinan J); Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378 (Mason CJ)).

63. In some cases the question of which act must have been committed voluntarily will be a factual issue for the jury to resolve. This will be the case, for example, in a murder trial involving multiple possible causes of death. In such a case, it is for the jury to determine:

    - What acts were done by the accused;
    - Which of those acts they consider to have caused the death;[385] and
    - Whether the act they consider to have caused the death was committed voluntarily (Murray v R (2002) 211 CLR 193 (Gaudron and Kirby JJ); Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205 (Barwick CJ); Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378 (Mason CJ); R v Katarzynski [2005] NSWCCA 72)

64. Where there are multiple possible causal acts in issue, it is important that the judge clearly identify the different possibilities and explain the consequences of the jury's findings (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205 (Barwick CJ, Menzies J); Murray v R (2002) 211 CLR 193 (Callinan J); Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378 (Mason CJ)).

Explain any knowledge requirements

65. In some cases the judge must tell the jury that they need to be satisfied that the accused had knowledge of certain facts in order to find that he or she acted voluntarily (see, e.g. R v Williamson (1996) 67 SASR 428; R v Winter [2006] VSCA 144).

---

[384] See 7.1.4 Accident for further information.

[385] See 7.1.2 Causation for assistance with this issue.

66. For example, where the accused is charged with murder by stabbing, and claims that he did not know he was holding a knife when he punched the victim, the jury must be directed that in order to find that the stabbing was voluntary, they must be satisfied that the accused knew he was holding a knife (see, e.g. R v Williamson (1996) 67 SASR 428; R v Winter [2006] VSCA 144. See also Duffy v R (1981) WAR 72).

Relate the law to the evidence

67. The judge must relate the law to the evidence (R v Tait [1973] VR 151; Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; MG v R (2010) 29 VR 305).

68. The jury may take into account the sequence of acts leading up to the act in question (e.g. choosing to carry a knife) in determining whether the relevant act was voluntary (R v Ugle (2002) 211 CLR 171 (Callinan J); Murray v R (2002) 211 CLR 193 (Callinan J)).

Do not tell the jury about the presumption of voluntariness

69. The jury should not be told that there is a presumption that an act done by a person who is apparently conscious is done voluntarily (Murray v R (2002) 211 CLR 193 (Gummow and Hayne JJ); Middleton v R [2000] WASCA 213; R v Marijancevic (2009) 22 VR 576).

70. The jury also should not be told to only consider the issue of voluntariness if they are satisfied that there is at least a reasonable possibility the accused's actions were involuntary. It is for the judge to determine whether there is a sufficient evidentiary basis for the issue of voluntariness to be considered. Once such a basis has been established, it is for the jury to decide whether the prosecution have proved beyond reasonable doubt that the relevant act was voluntary (R v Marijancevic (2009) 22 VR 576).

7.1.1.1 Charge: Voluntariness

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used where there is sufficient evidence to displace the evidentiary presumption of voluntariness,[386] and the voluntariness requirement is not addressed in the relevant offence charge.

If it is alleged that the accused's actions were "accidental", care must be taken to ensure that the argument relates to voluntariness rather than intention. See 7.1.4 Accident for assistance.

The charge has been designed as an additional element to insert after the conduct element, with the numbering of subsequent elements to be altered accordingly.

With suitable modifications, it may instead be incorporated into the directions about the conduct element, as an additional matter the prosecution must prove (see, e.g. the first element of the rape charges).

[386] See 7.1.1 Voluntariness for guidance.

Voluntariness

The [insert number] element the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused's act of [describe act, e.g. "driving"] was a voluntary act.[387]

The law says that an act is committed voluntarily if it is subject to the control and direction of a person's will.

Some examples of involuntary acts include:

- Acts committed by an unconscious person, such as a sleepwalker or a person rolling over in bed;
- Some acts that are committed accidentally, such as when a person trips over and breaks something he or she is holding;[388] and
- Acts committed in certain mental states where the mind loses control of the body's actions, such as may occur when a person suffers from concussion.

In each of these examples, the person's actions are involuntary because they are unwilled. The person has exercised no control or direction over his or her bodily movements.

[If it is alleged that the accused caused a particular result, add the following shaded section.]

The focus of this element is on NOA's conduct, not the consequences of that conduct. Thus, NOA does not need to have intended to [describe result, e.g. "injure NOV"] for his/her actions to have been voluntary. It is sufficient that his/her act of [describe act, e.g. "driving"] was willed.

[In rare cases where the accused needs to have known a particular fact for his/her acts to have been voluntary, add the following shaded section.]

Some actions cannot be done voluntarily unless the person is aware of certain facts when doing them. For example, a person cannot shoot someone voluntarily if s/he is not aware that he or she is holding a gun.

In this case, to find that NOA's act of [describe act, e.g. "stabbing"] was voluntary, you must find that s/he knew [describe relevant matter, e.g. "that s/he was holding a knife when s/he hit NOV].

[Where relevant, the remainder of this charge should be replaced by 8.7.1 Charge: Intoxication and 7.1.1 Voluntariness.]

The defence has argued that NOA's act of [describe act, e.g. "driving"] was not voluntary because [identify reason for alleged involuntariness, e.g. "s/he was asleep at the time"].

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

If the prosecution cannot prove that NOA [describe act, e.g. "drove"] voluntarily, then you must find him/her not guilty of [identify offence].

[387] Judges must take care to precisely identify which act must have been committed voluntarily. In some cases this will be a matter for the jury to determine. See "Which Act Must be Voluntary?" in 7.1.1 Voluntariness for guidance.

[388] If it is alleged that the accused's actions were "accidental", care must be taken to ensure that the argument relates to voluntariness rather than intention. See 7.1.4 Accident for assistance.

7.1.2 Causation

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

When is it Necessary to Address Causation?

1. Most offences criminalise the performance of certain acts, regardless of the consequences of those acts (e.g. rape, theft, trafficking in a drug of dependence). It will generally not be necessary to address the issue of causation when directing the jury about such offences.
2. However, some offences require the accused's actions to have led to a particular result. For example, before a person is convicted of murder, their actions must have caused the victim to die. It is in relation to these result-oriented offences that causation may be an issue.
3. While most of the law in this area has been developed in the context of homicide offences, the principles are of broader application. They will, for example, apply to the offences specified in ss 16–18 and 24 of the Crimes Act 1958, which require the accused's acts to have caused injury or serious injury.

When Does Conduct "Cause" a Result?

4. For an accused's conduct to have "caused" a result, it must have "contributed significantly" to that result, or been a "substantial and operating cause" of it (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378; R v Rudebeck [1999] VSCA 155; R v Stein (2007) 18 VR 376; R v Withers [2009] VSCA 306*; R v Aidid* (2010) 25 VR 593).
5. The act must be one that an ordinary person would hold, as a matter of common sense, to be a cause of the result. The mere fact that the accused's conduct contributed causally to a result, or was a necessary cause of the result, is not sufficient (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378).
6. The accused may be liable for "causing" a result even if his or her conduct was not the direct or immediate cause of that result (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378; R v Withers [2009] VSCA 306*; R v Aidid* (2010) 25 VR 593).
7. The accused does not need to be the sole cause of the result. A person can be criminally liable for something that has multiple causes, even if he or she is not responsible for all of those causes (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378; R v Stein (2007) 18 VR 376; R v Withers [2009] VSCA 306*; R v Aidid* (2010) 25 VR 593).
8. The accused can "cause" a result by act or omission (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378).

Which Conduct Must Cause the Result?

9. It is generally not necessary for the jury to determine which of the accused's acts caused the relevant result, as long as they are satisfied that that result was caused by one of the accused's acts.
10. However, in some cases it will be necessary for the jury to determine which particular act caused the relevant result, before they can find the accused guilty. For example, if there are multiple possible causal acts, and the accused's mental state may have differed when s/he committed those acts, the jury will need to determine which of those acts caused the result – so that they can ascertain whether the accused held the appropriate mental state when s/he committed that particular act (Arulthilakan v R; Mkoka v R (2003) 203 ALR 259; R v McLachlan [1999] 2 VR 553).
11. Similarly, the jury will need to determine which specific act caused the requisite result if the accused may have involuntarily committed one or more of the relevant acts. In such a case, for the accused to be found guilty, the jury will need to be satisfied that s/he voluntarily committed an act that they find caused the criminal result (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; R v Butcher [1986] VR 43). See 7.1.1 Voluntariness for further information.

12. Where the offence is one of specific intent (such as murder), the jury must be satisfied that the accused acted with an intent to cause a particular result through that act. It is not sufficient that the accused engaged in the causal act while incidentally possessing the relevant state of mind. For an example of where this principle arose, see Koani v R [2017] HCA 42, where the accused may have shot the deceased due to his negligent handling of a shotgun, and the High Court held that the prosecution could not prove intentional murder by combining the accused's negligence with an intention to kill.

13. In some cases the terms of the offence will specify the type of conduct which must have caused the relevant result. For example, the offence of "culpable driving caused by gross negligence" contrary to s 318(2)(b) of the Crimes Act 1958 requires the death of the victim to have been caused by a grossly negligent act. It is not enough that the accused was driving in a grossly negligent manner at the time of the death, if that gross negligence was not a substantial and operating cause of the death (R v Feketa (1982) 10 A Crim R 287; R v Heron [2003] VSCA 76).[389]

Complicating Factors

Intervening Acts

14. Difficulties in proving causation may arise if another act or event intervenes between the commission of the accused's conduct and the criminal result. In such situations, the accused remains liable if his or her conduct is still a substantial operating cause of the result when it occurs. This is because his or her acts or omissions can still properly be said to be the cause of the act, even if some other cause is also operating (R v Evans & Gardiner (No 2) [1976] VR 523; R v Smith (1983) 76 Cr App R 279*; R v Aidid* (2010) 25 VR 593).

15. However, the accused will not be liable if his or her conduct is merely the setting in which another cause operates. In such circumstances, the result cannot properly be said to have been caused by the accused's conduct (R v Evans & Gardiner (No 2) [1976] VR 523; R v Smith (1983) 76 Cr App R 279).

Acts of the Victim

16. Difficulties in proving causation may also arise if there is evidence that the victim's own actions were a cause of the result. For example, the victim may injure him or herself while attempting to flee the accused.

17. In such cases, the accused's conduct will still be considered to be a legal cause of the result if the victim's acts were a "natural consequence" of that conduct (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378 (Mason CJ, Deane and Dawson JJ); R v Aidid (2010) 25 VR 593).

18. Where victims are injured or killed while responding to a threat created by the accused, their actions will only be a "natural consequence" of the accused's conduct if their fear of the accused was well-founded, and their response to the threat was "reasonable" (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378 (Brennan, Deane, Dawson, Toohey and Gaudron JJ); R v Aidid (2010) 25 VR 593. But see McHugh J and Mason CJ; R v Lee (2005) 12 VR 249).

Failure to Intervene

19. Difficulties in proving causation may also arise where the consequences of the accused's conduct could have been averted by the reasonable intervention of either the victim or a third-party.

[389] It should be noted that culpable driving alleged contrary to ss 318(2)(c) & (d) of the Crimes Act 1958 does not require proof of this same causal nexus: R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26.

20. Australian courts have declined to articulate a special test for these cases. The question for determination is whether or not the accused's original act or omission remains a substantial, operating cause of the result (R v Evans & Gardiner (No 2) [1976] VR 523).

Content of the Charge

21. Where causation is straightforward, it may be sufficient simply to instruct the jury that the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused's conduct caused the relevant result (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378, R v Le Broc (2000) 2 VR 43, R v Ince [2001] VSCA 214).

22. It will generally be necessary to elaborate upon this direction in more complex cases, such as:

    (a) Where the result would not have occurred if the victim or a third party had not committed an intervening act; or

    (b) Where the result could have been prevented if the victim or a third party had taken action to avoid the consequences of the accused's conduct; or

    (c) Where one or more of the possible causal acts may have been involuntary (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378; Koani v R [2017] HCA 42).

23. Directions about intervening acts should ordinarily be made by reference to the facts of the case, rather than being couched in abstract terms (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378).

24. If it is necessary to direct the jury about the intervening acts of the victim, the jury should generally not be told that the victim's acts need to be foreseeable. Such a direction is likely to confuse the issue (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378. But see R v Aidid (2010) 25 VR 593).

25. If detailed directions are given, they should be balanced with an instruction that the question of causation is not a philosophical or a scientific question. It is a question to be determined by the jury by applying their common-sense to the facts as they find them, keeping in mind that the purpose of the inquiry is to attribute legal responsibility in a criminal matter (Campbell v R [1981] WAR 286; Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378; R v Withers [2009] VSCA 306).

26. If a "but for" test is to be incorporated into the directions on causation, care should be taken to ensure that it does not undermine the "substantial cause" direction, thus leading the jury to consider that a negligible cause might suffice (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378; Arulthilakan v R; Mkoka v R (2003) ALR 259).

Causation and Accessorial Liability

27. Where culpability is alleged to arise by some form of extended accessorial liability, it will generally be necessary to adapt the causation charge. See Part 5: Complicity for further information.

7.1.2.1 Charges: Causation

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Causation

For many offences it will be unnecessary to give any direction in respect of causation (see 7.1.2 Causation). Where some direction is required, in most cases a very basic direction will be sufficient. Such directions are incorporated into the charges for offences which commonly require them.

Additional Charges

Multiple Possible Causes or Combined Causes

In this case you have heard evidence that [insert relevant result] [was/may have been] caused by [multiple possible/a combination of] causes. [Insert relevant evidence.]

The law says that for NOA's act[s] to have caused [insert relevant result], it does not need to have been the only cause of that result. You may find that his/her act[s] caused [identify relevant result] if [it was/they were] a substantial or significant cause of that result.

You should approach this question in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

Intervening Acts/Failure to Intervene

In this case you have heard evidence that [identify relevant result] did not follow immediately from the alleged act[s] of the accused, and that [describe intervening acts] may have occurred in between.

The law says that for NOA's act[s] to have caused [insert relevant result], [it does/they do] not need to have been the only cause of that result, or the direct or immediate cause. You may find that his/her act[s] caused [identify relevant result] if [it was/they were] a substantial or significant cause of that result.

In making this determination, you need to decide whether it was the accused's act[s] which caused [insert relevant result], or whether [that act/those acts] merely provided the setting for the later act[s] of [insert intervening act] which in truth caused the result. If his/her acts only provided the setting, then s/he did not cause the result, and you must find him/her not guilty of [insert offence].

You should approach this question in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

Indirect Cause

This direction has been drafted for use in cases in which the victim could be seen to have caused the ultimate result while attempting to escape the violence of the accused. While it could be adapted for use in other cases where the accused could be seen to have indirectly caused the relevant result, care should be taken in doing so.

This charge should not be given where a simpler "intervention" direction can be given (see above). It should also not be given where NOA purposively compelled NOV to commit the causal conduct.

In this case you have heard evidence suggesting that [identify result] was only indirectly caused by the acts of the accused. [Insert relevant evidence.]

The law says that for an accused's act[s] to have caused [insert relevant result], [it does/they do] not need to have been the direct or immediate cause of that result. You may find that his/her act[s] caused [identify relevant result] if [it was/they were] a substantial or significant cause of that result.

However, you can only find the accused responsible for the indirect results of his/her acts if the prosecution can prove two matters to you, beyond reasonable doubt.

First, the prosecution must prove that NOA's acts caused [identify the ultimate result, e.g. "NOV's death"]. In this case, that means that NOA's acts were a substantial or significant cause of [identify immediate causal event, e.g. "NOV fleeing NOA's violence"], which in turn caused [identify the ultimate result, e.g. "NOV's death"].

You should approach this question in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

Secondly,[390] the prosecution must prove that NOV acted out of a well-founded or reasonable fear of NOA, and that NOV's acts of self-preservation were a natural consequence of NOA's conduct.

Here, the evidence was [describe evidence relevant to reasonableness of NOV's response]. It is for you to determine if NOV's reaction was reasonable and well-founded. If you find that NOV over-reacted to NOA's conduct, then you must find that the accused was not responsible for [identify result], and find him/her not guilty of [insert offence].

7.1.3 Recklessness

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. In Victoria, an accused is said to have been reckless if they acted in the knowledge that a particular harmful consequence would probably result from their conduct, but they decided to continue their actions regardless of that consequence (DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2021] HCA 26; DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2020] VSCA 181; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585).
2. This definition applies to all Victorian offences involving recklessness (R v Nuri [1990] VR 641; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585; R v Kalajdic [2005] VSCA 160; DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2021] HCA 26; DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2020] VSCA 181).
3. Recklessness requires foresight on the part of the accused (of the probable consequences of his or her actions) and indifference as to whether or not those consequences occur (R v Nuri [1990] VR 641).
4. When explaining recklessness, judges may tell the jury that the accused must have been aware that his or her conduct would probably cause the relevant consequence, but decided to go ahead anyway. The words "but decided to go ahead anyway" do not make proof that the accused was indifferent to the consequences of his or her conduct an element of the offence. Instead, the purpose of the words is to distinguish recklessness from intention. Judges may modify or omit the words "but decided to go ahead anyway" if the words could mislead or confuse the jury (see Ignatova v R [2010] VSCA 263; R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464; R v Sofa Vic CA 15/10/1990; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585; R v Wilson [2005] VSCA 78).
5. The word "probable" means likely to happen (R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464).
6. The word "might" should not be used in relation to recklessness. It is a misdirection to say that recklessness is established when the accused knew that particular consequences "might" occur. Recklessness means that the accused knew that those consequences would probably occur (R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585).
7. It is not necessary to prove that the accused acted recklessly in relation to the actual victim, as long as the accused had acted recklessly in relation to the risk of their behaviour causing injury to some person (La Fontaine v R (1976) 136 CLR 62; R v Bacash [1981] VR 923).
8. Use of the word "reckless" should be avoided in charging the jury in murder trials, as it is liable to confuse them. Instead, the jury should be directed that the accused must have foreseen that death or really serious injury was a probable consequence of their actions (La Fontaine v R (1976) 136 CLR 62).

[390] This part of the direction will have to be substantially modified if applied to offences not addressing escape–based harm.

Commonwealth offences

9. For offences against the Commonwealth Criminal Code, recklessness is defined in s 5.4:

> (1) A person is reckless with respect to a circumstance if:
> (a) he or she is aware of a substantial risk that the circumstance exists or will exist; and
> (b) having regard to the circumstances known to him or her, it is unjustifiable to take the risk.
> (2) A person is reckless with respect to a result if:
> (a) he or she is aware of a substantial risk that the result will occur; and
> (b) having regard to the circumstances known to him or her, it is unjustifiable to take the risk.
> (3) The question whether taking a risk is unjustifiable is one of fact.
> (4) If recklessness is a fault element for a physical element of an offence, proof of intention, knowledge or recklessness will satisfy that fault element (Criminal Code s 5.4).

7.1.3.1 Charge: Recklessness

For you to be satisfied that the accused's actions were reckless, the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that when NOA [insert details of relevant actions], [he/she] knew that [his/her] actions would probably cause [insert details of relevant consequence], but [he/she] went ahead with [his/her] actions anyway.

It is not enough for NOA to have known that [insert details of relevant consequence] might possibly occur. For this element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOA knew that [insert details of relevant consequence] would probably result from [his/her] actions.

7.1.4 Accident

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. In the Code jurisdictions there is a specific defence of "accident", which excuses the accused from responsibility for events which are the unintended, unforeseeable consequences of a willed act (see, e.g. Kaporonovski v R (1973) 133 CLR 209; R v Van Den Bemd (1994) 179 CLR 137). There is no such defence in Victoria (R v Fowler [1999] VSCA 135).
2. However, where a person commits an act "accidentally", one or more of the elements of the charged offence may not be met. It is this type of "accident" that is the focus of this topic.

Meaning of "Accident"

3. The word "accident" is ambiguous. It is sometimes used to refer to an involuntary act, and sometimes used to refer to an unintentional act (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205 (Barwick CJ); R v Fowler [1999] VSCA 135; Stevens v R (2005) 227 CLR 319).

4. As the necessary directions will differ depending on the way in which the term "accident" is used in a case, it is essential that judges clarify what is meant by the term whenever it is used.

Involuntary Acts

5. In some cases, an act which is committed independently of the accused's will is described as an "accident" (e.g. where the accused trips over and "accidentally" bumps into someone) (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205 (Barwick CJ); R v Fowler [1999] VSCA 135; R v Schaeffer (2005) 13 VR 337).
6. As the existence of a voluntary act is an essential element of a crime, the accused must not be convicted for such "accidental" acts (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64*; R v Falconer* (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v Fowler [1999] VSCA 135).[391]
7. Where this type of "accident" is in issue, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the relevant act was voluntary (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64; R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30; R v Fowler [1999] VSCA 135).
8. See 7.1.1 Voluntariness for further information concerning the voluntariness requirement.

Unintentional Acts

9. In some cases, the word "accident" is used to refer to an outcome that the accused did not intend to cause. For example, where the accused shoots a gun intending only to scare the victim, but unintentionally kills him or her, the killing may be said to be "accidental" (see, e.g. Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205 (Barwick CJ); R v Fowler [1999] VSCA 135; R v Schaeffer (2005) 13 VR 337).
10. In such cases, the claim is not that the accused acted involuntarily (e.g. in the example provided above, it is not disputed that the accused fired the gun voluntarily). The claim is that the accused did not intend to cause the outcome that resulted from his or her actions (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205 (Barwick CJ); R v Fowler [1999] VSCA 135).
11. The accused's guilt in such cases will depend on what offence he or she is charged with. For instance, in the example provided above:
    - The accused must be acquitted of murder (as he or she did not intend to cause death or really serious injury);
    - The accused may be convicted of manslaughter (if the jury finds that he or she caused the victim's death by an unlawful and dangerous act) or assault (as he or she intended to create an apprehension of immediate and personal violence).

When Must the Jury be Directed about Accident?

12. It is not necessary to direct the jury about accident simply because it has been suggested that an act or outcome was accidental. A direction is only required where there is some evidence of accident on which a reasonable jury could act (Mancini v DPP [1942] AC 1; Bratty v AG for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386; R v Fowler [1999] VSCA 135; R v Chang (2003) 7 VR 236).
13. Judges must therefore determine whether it is open on the evidence for the jury to find:
    - That the relevant act was involuntary; or

---

[391] While the accused must not be convicted for such accidental acts, he or she may be held criminally responsible for acts committed immediately prior to the accident (see, e.g. Jiminez v R (1992) 173 CLR 572; Kroon v R (1990) 55 SASR 476).

- That the accused did not have the intention required for proof of the relevant offence (see, e.g. R v Fowler [1999] VSCA 135).

14. The judge only needs to direct the jury about whichever matter is in issue. For example, where it is alleged that the accused's acts were "accidental" in the sense of being unintentional, there is no need to focus on the issue of voluntariness (R v Edwards [2005] VSCA 92).
15. However, the fact that the issue of voluntariness may logically be subsumed within the issue of intention does not relieve the judge of the duty to direct the jury about voluntariness where it is in issue (Stevens v R (2005) 227 CLR 319 (Kirby and Callinan JJ)).
16. In some cases, the judge may need to direct the jury about both voluntariness and intention (see, e.g. R v Schaeffer (2005) 13 VR 337).
17. Where the evidence leaves open the possibility that the accused's acts were accidental (in either sense), the trial judge must give a direction, even if defence counsel has not raised the matter or requested a direction (R v Fowler [1999] VSCA 135; Stevens v R (2005) 227 CLR 319).

Content of the Charge

18. The issue of accident is most appropriately integrated into the judge's charge on voluntariness or intention. It should not be treated as a separate defence (R v Schaeffer (2005) 13 VR 337).
19. Care must be taken not to reverse the onus of proof by suggesting that it is for the accused to establish the "defence" of accident. The onus always remains on the prosecution to prove voluntariness and intention beyond reasonable doubt (R v Cascone Vic CA 4/6/98).
20. If the word "accidental" has been used by the parties or the judge, care must be taken to explain how it has been used (i.e., to refer to involuntary and/or unintentional acts) (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205 (Barwick CJ); R v Schaeffer (2005) 13 VR 337).
21. The judge must not direct the jury to acquit the accused if they find that the result caused by the accused's action was not intended or foreseen, and would not reasonably have been foreseen by an ordinary person. Such a direction is only appropriate in the Code jurisdictions (R v Schaeffer (2005) 13 VR 337; R v Fowler [1999] VSCA 135).
22. Where accident is open on the evidence, but not raised by defence counsel, a detailed exposition of the issue may not be required (see, e.g. R v Fowler [1999] VSCA 135 (Batt JA)).
23. See 7.1.1 Voluntariness for information about charging the jury on the issue of voluntariness.

7.1.5 Course of Conduct Charges

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Background

1. In July 2015 course of conduct charges were introduced as a mode of charging sexual offences and certain other relevant offences.
2. A course of conduct charge is a single charge for a single offence, which incorporates multiple incidents of the same offence committed on more than once occasion over a specified period (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 Schedule 1, clause 4A(1),(2),(6)).
3. The 'course of conduct charge' is modelled on a similar charge available in the UK (Rule 14.2 of the Criminal Procedure Rules 2010 (UK)).
4. This form of charge was introduced to deal with repeat and systematic sexual offending. As a rule of criminal procedure, it is a method of pleading a charge, rather than a discrete offence (Clifton v The Queen [2021] VSCA 111, [24]; compare Crimes Act 1958 s 49J – Persistent sexual abuse of a child under 16).

Operation of course of conduct charges

5. Course of conduct charges are available only for 'relevant offences'. The list of relevant offences focuses on those for which the rules of duplicity and particularisation can sometimes interfere with effective prosecution, such as repeated acts of sexual abuse and other high volume offences.
6. A relevant offence is defined as:
    - a sexual offence, as defined in section 3 of the Crimes Act 1958 with reference to the offences under the following Subdivisions of Division 1 of Part 1:
    - (8A) – Rape and sexual assault,
    - (8B) – Incest,
    - (8C) – Sexual offences against children,
    - (8D) – Sexual offences against persons with a cognitive impairment,
    - (8E) – Other sexual offence,
    - (8EAA) – Sexual servitude, or
    - under any corresponding previous enactment (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 Schedule 1, Note to clause 4A(1)).
    - any offence under the following provisions of the Crimes Act 1958:
    - division 2 of Part I – Theft and similar or associated offences; excluding sections 75 (Robbery), 75A (Armed robbery), 76 (Burglary), 77 (Aggravated burglary), 78 (Unlawfully taking control of an aircraft), 80 (Removal of articles from places open to the public) and 91 (Going equipped for stealing etc);
    - division 2AA of Part I – Identity crime;
    - division 2A of Part I – Money laundering;
    - division 2B of Part I – Cheating at gambling; and
    - subdivision (6) of Division 3 of Part I – Computer offences.
7. A single charge sheet may contain both a course of conduct charge and an alternative ordinary charge of the offence covered by the course of conduct charge (Criminal Procedure Act 2009, Schedule 1, clause 5(3)). The alleged date of commission of the alternative charge must be within the period to which the course of conduct charge relates.
8. However, a charge–sheet or indictment must not contain both a course of conduct charge and a charge for an offence against s 47A of the Crimes Act 1958 (persistent sexual abuse of a child under the age of 16) in the alternative (Criminal Procedure Act 2009, Schedule 1, clause 5(5)).
9. The consent of the DPP is required before a charge–sheet containing a course of conduct charge is filed or signed (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 Schedule 1, clause 4A(12)).

Requirements of course of conduct charges

10. A course of conduct charge is only available if:
    (a) each incident constitutes an offence under the same provision; and
    (b) for a charge for a sexual offence, each incident relates to the same complainant; and
    (c) the incidents take place on more than one occasion over a specified period; and

(d) the incidents taken together amount to a course of conduct having regard to their time, place or purpose of commission and any other relevant matter (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 Schedule 1, clause 4A(2)(a)–(d)).

11. The requirement that the incidents take place on more than one occasion means that there must be a 'clear separation in time or circumstances between the acts' (Tognolini v The Queen (2011) 32 VR 104; [2011] VSCA 113).

12. The 'specified period' identified under clause 4A(2)(c) is a particular and not an element (DPP v Jarvis [2018] VSCA 173).

13. In cases where evidence emerges which refers to offending which may have occurred outside the specified period, the judge will need to consider whether prosecution should have leave to amend the indictment to expand the period specified. A court may grant leave to amend particulars if it does not cause injustice to the accused. In most cases, where the evidence led does not match the particulars, the court will grant leave to amend the particulars (DPP v Jarvis [2018] VSCA 173, [13]. See also Criminal Procedure Act 2008 s 165).

14. If the court does not grant leave to amend the particulars, it will be necessary to decide whether:

- to direct the jury that the evidence from outside the period can only be used as relationship or context evidence;
- to direct the jury that the evidence from outside the period must be disregarded; or
- if there is no evidence of multiple offences within the specified period, to grant a no-case submission (DPP v Jarvis [2018] VSCA 173, [25]–[27]).

15. More than one type of act may be alleged in a course of conduct charge to prove an element of the offence, provided the offence charged remains the same. In relation to sexual offences specifically, an 'act' in this context includes sexual penetration as defined by s 37D and sexual touching within the meaning of Subdivision (8A) (rape and sexual assault) of the Crimes Act 1958 (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 Schedule 1, clause 4A(3),(4)). The section includes the example of a course of conduct charge for a sexual offence which may allege acts of digital penetration as well as acts of penetration with an object.

16. Course of conduct charges are designed to enable the prosecution of a series of offending where the specific details of any one instance of the offending cannot be disclosed in enough detail to prove that individual offence. Clause 4A(9) states that:

> … to prove a course of conduct charge, it is not necessary to prove an incident of the offence with the same degree of specificity as to date, time, place, circumstance or occasion as would be required if the accused were charged with an offence constituted only by that incident.

17. Specifically, it is not necessary to prove:

(a) any particular number of incidents of the offence or the dates, times, places, circumstances or occasions of the incidents; or

(b) that there were distinctive features differentiating any of the incidents; or

(c) the general circumstances of any particular incident (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 Schedule 1, clause 4A(10)).

18. In a prosecution for a course of conduct charge it is not necessary that the complainant's evidence can be distilled into individual incidents or occasions. The course of conduct provisions are designed to reduce the level of specificity required by the common law. A course of conduct charge is not defective, and an accused trial is not unfair, where the prosecution leads evidence that the accused regularly committed the alleged offence over a period, even if there are no differentiating features of separate occasions (Harlow v The Queen [2018] VSCA 234, [61]–[67]).

Similar international schemes

19. The Victorian 'course of conduct' charge is modelled on similar systems in England and New Zealand, which may provide some guidance on the operation of this new Victorian provision.

20. In England, rule 14.2(2) of the Criminal Procedure Rules 2010 states:

> More than one incident of the commission of the offence may be included in a count if those incidents taken together amount to a course of conduct having regard to the time, place or purpose of commission.

21. Paragraph 14A.10–14A.13 of the UK Criminal Practice Directions [2013] EWCA Crim 1631 provides the following guidance on the use of this device:

> The circumstances in which such a count may be appropriate include, but are not limited to, the following:
> (a) the victim on each occasion was the same, or there was no identifiable individual victim as, for example, in a case of the unlawful importation of controlled drugs or of money laundering;
> (b) the alleged incidents involved a marked degree of repetition in the method employed or in their location, or both;
> (c) the alleged incidents took place over a clearly defined period, typically (but not necessarily) no more than about a year;
> (d) in any event, the defence is such as to apply to every alleged incident without differentiation. Where what is in issue differs between different incidents, a single "multiple incidents" count will not be appropriate, though it may be appropriate to use two or more such counts according to the circumstances and to the issues raised by the defence.
> For some offences, particularly sexual offences, the penalty for the offence may have changed during the period over which the alleged incidents took place. In such a case, additional "multiple incidents" counts should be used so that each count only alleges incidents to which the same maximum penalty applies.
> In other cases, such as sexual or physical abuse, a complainant may be in a position only to give evidence of a series of similar incidents without being able to specify when or the precise circumstances in which they occurred. In these cases, a 'multiple incidents' count may be desirable. If on the other hand, the complainant is able to identify particular incidents of the offence by reference to a date or other specific event, but alleges that in addition there were other incidents which the complainant is unable to specify, then it may be desirable to include separate counts for the identified incidents and a 'multiple incidents' count or counts alleging that incidents of the same offence occurred 'many' times. Using a 'multiple incidents' count may be an appropriate alternative to using 'specimen' counts in some cases where repeated sexual or physical abuse is alleged. The choice of count will depend on the particular circumstances of the case and should be determined bearing in mind the implications for sentencing set out in R v Canavan; R v Kidd; R v Shaw [1998] 1 W.L.R. 604, [1998] 1 Cr. App. R. 79, [1998] 1 Cr. App. R. (S.) 243.

22. Despite being available since 2010, there is little jurisprudence on the operation of this provision. It is, however, clear that the jury must be satisfied that the accused pursued a course of conduct. This requires proof of the accused engaging in the relevant conduct on multiple occasions. If the jury is only satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused committed the offence on a single occasion, then the 'course of conduct' charge is not proved (see A v R [2015] EWCA Crim 177).

23. Under the Criminal Procedure Act 2011 (NZ) section 20, the prosecution can charge a 'representative charge' where:

    (a) multiple offences of the same type are alleged; and

(b) the offences are alleged to have been committed in similar circumstances over a period of time; and

(c) the nature and circumstances of the offences are such that the complainant cannot reasonably be expected to particularise dates or other details of the offences.

24. In New Zealand, the prosecution should only use a representative charge where it is unable to provide the particulars necessary to identify an alleged offence at common law. The accused is entitled to have each specific allegation separately tested under the criminal process (KAW v R [2012] NZCA 520).

25. The New Zealand Court of Appeal has provided the following guidance on when a representative charge is appropriate:

(a) if the evidence is sufficiently detailed that the prosecution can charge specific acts (without overloading the indictment), that should be done;

(b) representative charges are appropriate where there is a pattern of repeated behaviour and the complainant cannot distinguish the dates or details of the events;

(c) repetitive acts which can be distinguished from each other should be charged separately (KAW v R [2012] NZCA 520).

26. Relevant points of distinction can include:

- the location of the alleged offending;
- the nature of the conduct engaged in on each occasion;
- the availability of different defences in relation to each occasion (KAW v R [2012] NZCA 520; Gamble v R [2012] NZCA 91).

27. In Victoria, the 'course of conduct' provisions in Criminal Procedure Act 2009 Schedule 1 do not include a requirement that the alleged offences have been committed 'in similar circumstances'. Rather, the incidents must be connected by the time, place or purpose of their commission, and any other relevant matter, such that they amount to a course of conduct (clause 4A(2)(d)). It may be possible to distinguish different incidents from each other, for example, because they happened at different locations, but nevertheless find they formed a course of conduct owing to the time or purpose of their commission.

28. Judges will need to determine whether the principles which have developed in the UK and New Zealand also apply in relation to the Victorian provisions.

Proving a 'course of conduct'

29. The prosecution must prove that the incidents of the accused's conduct, taken together, amount to a course of conduct having regard to their time, place or purpose and any other relevant matter (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 Schedule 1, clause 4A(2)(d) and (8)).

30. This requirement to prove that the incidents amount to a course of conduct operates in addition to the need to prove that the incidents occurred on more than one occasion. It is wrong for a prosecutor to suggest that the offence is proved only by proving that the offending occurred on more than one occasion (Clifton v The Queen [2021] VSCA 111, [36]–[39]).

31. It is also wrong for a prosecutor to suggest that course of conduct charges are 'easy … to prove'. Such a submission can erode the burden and standard of proof, and undermine the need for the jury to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the conduct amounts to a course of conduct (Clifton v The Queen [2021] VSCA 111, [41]–[43])

32. A course of conduct charge conceives the offence as a single charge of a general course of conduct rather than as a number of individual acts. This may mean that a course of conduct can be proved by generalised evidence of multiple occasions, such as evidence in the form of what would typically or routinely occur. In such cases, the jury may be able to find a course of conduct without being satisfied of the details of any individual occasion (Criminal Law Review, Review of Sexual Offences, Consultation Paper (2013), Part 12).

33. As long as the prosecution proves a course of conduct by the accused, it is not necessary to prove a particular number of incidents of the offending, distinctive features of any individual incidents or the general circumstances of any particular incident (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 Schedule 1, clause 4A(10)). The incidents of the offence may all involve the same kind of offending, in the same place, at the same time of day, or in similar circumstances, and there is no need to focus on an unusual occasion.

34. Since neither the general circumstances nor any distinctive or unusual features of a particular occasion need to be proved, course of conduct charges attempt to circumvent the limitation of having to bring evidence to prove the occurrence of each occasion specifically (as described by McHugh J in KRM v The Queen (2001) 206 CLR 221).

35. According to the report by the Department of Justice which led to the development of the legislation, the course of conduct charge specifically responds to the problem where the complainant describes what the accused 'would' do, that is, what would typically or routinely occur as part of the alleged offending (Criminal Law Review, Review of Sexual Offences, Consultation Paper (2013), Part 12, [12.2.1]). Under the general law, 'it is not possible as a matter of law for generalised evidence of multiple occasions to supply proof beyond reasonable doubt of a specific occasion' (see REE v R [2010] VSCA 124; R v SLJ (2010) 24 VR 372). But, it appears that evidence of a generalised course of conduct – what the accused would ordinarily do – will be sufficient to prove a course of conduct charge, if accepted by the jury beyond reasonable doubt.

36. One other offence which requires a course of conduct is stalking (Crimes Act 1958 s 21A).

37. In relation to stalking, a course of conduct requires a pattern of conduct which evidences a continuity of purpose. This requires the conduct to occur on more than one occasion or to occur in a protracted manner on a single occasion. That mere fact that conduct occurs on more than one occasion is not enough by itself to establish a course of conduct for the purpose of stalking; there must still be a continuity of purpose (Berlyn v Brouskos (2002) 134 A Crim R 111; RR v R [2013] VSCA 147).

38. However, in contrast to stalking, clause 4A(8) makes it clear that determining whether there is a course of conduct must take into account the time, place or purpose of commission and any other relevant matters. This suggests that it would be wrong to import the "continuity of purpose" requirement from stalking into course of conduct charges, as that would elevate purpose over the other factors identified in the Act.

39. A course of conduct can be proven having regard to the time, place or purpose of the incidents, or any other relevant matter (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 Schedule 1, clause 4A(9)). These factors may be used to show a regularity to the offending, for example, that it happened every month, or when the complainant was left alone with the accused after school, or at a particular place over and again, or because of a regular purpose, such as sexual gratification or the exercise of power over the victim. Other relevant matters may include evidence of similarity or regularity in the accused's method of offending (Explanatory Memorandum, Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offence and Other Matters) Bill 2014).

40. The more occasions of offending, the more likely a course of conduct is to be found, particularly where the incidents form a regular or systematic pattern of offending. Conversely, if there are only two or three occasions of offending, the complainant is more likely to be able to remember the specific details of each incident so that they can each be charged separately and a course of conduct charge will not be necessary or appropriate (Explanatory Memorandum, Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offence and Other Matters) Bill 2014).

41. In this way the course of conduct charge was intended to be most effective in precisely the type of situations where specific incidents of an offence can be most difficult for a complainant to provide, that is, where it involves systematic or repeated commission of the offence in question (Criminal Law Review, Review of Sexual Offences, Consultation Paper (2013), Part 12).

Comparison to the general criminal law

42. The concept of a course of conduct is similar to a 'continuous' offence, such as that of drug trafficking by, for example, continuously running a drug trafficking business (Giretti v R (1986) 24 A Crim R 112). This approach recognises the conduct as a whole, including its regularity and repetition, and allows the cumulation of separate acts if the prosecution can prove the underlying course of conduct.

Course of conduct and unanimity

43. The operation of the requirement of unanimity in relation to the new course of conduct charge has not yet been determined.

44. In relation to the offence of stalking, Victorian courts have confirmed on several occasions that the jury only needs to be unanimous about the conclusion that the accused has engaged in a course of conduct and it is not necessary to be unanimous about the particular acts which make up that course of conduct (see R v Hoang (2007) 16 VR 369; Worsnop v R (2010) 28 VR 187).

45. Similarly, New Zealand courts have held, in relation to their representative charge scheme, that the jury does not need to be unanimous about the particular transaction or event on which liability is based or the specific offences represented by the charges (Ahsin & Rameka v R [2014] NZSC 153, [206] and footnote 117; c.f. KAW v R [2012] NZCA 520 (suppressed)).

46. The following factors indicate that unanimity is not required as to the particular incidents making up a course of conduct:

    - a course of conduct charge can be proved without proving any incidents of the offence with the same degree of specificity as to date, time, place, circumstances or occasion as would be required if the accused were charged only with that incident of the offence (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 Schedule 1, clause 4A(9));
    - it is not necessary to prove any particular number of incidents of the offence or the dates, times, places, circumstances or occasions of the incidents; that there were distinctive features differentiating any of the incidents; or the general circumstances of any particular incident (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 Schedule 1, clause 4A(10));
    - the necessary particulars need not include particulars of any specific incident of the offence, including its date, time, place, circumstances or occasion and need not distinguish any specific incident from any other (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 Schedule 1, clause 4A(11)); and
    - course of conduct charges are aimed at more effectively prosecuting the kind of offences where complainants are less likely to remember specific details. A course of conduct can be proved by generalised evidence of multiple occasions, such as evidence in the form of what would typically or routinely occur rather than evidence of the details of any individual occasions (Criminal Law Review, Review of Sexual Offences, Consultation Paper (2013), Part 12).

47. The factors listed above, along with the principles developed in relation to stalking, and the approach taken in New Zealand in relation to its representative charge scheme, indicate that, as a general rule, the jury does not need to be unanimous about the specific acts which form the course of conduct. Until there is any further authority on the matter judges should assume that no direction about unanimity is required.

7.1.5.1 Charge: Course of Conduct Charges

Course of conduct charge

Warning! These provisions have not been subject to any appellate consideration, including the significance of the period specified on the indictment and the matters that must be considered to determine whether conduct amounts to a course of conduct. Judges should seek submissions from parties on these and other relevant matters.

In this case, the prosecution charged NOA with committing [insert relevant offence] as a course of conduct.

I will first give you directions about [insert relevant offence] and then explain what it means, in law, to commit that offence as a course of conduct.

[Adapt and insert directions on relevant offence.]

Proof of a course of conduct charge

To prove that NOA committed NOO as a course of conduct, the prosecution must also prove that the incidents of the offending by NOA within the specified period on the indictment, taken together, amount to a course of conduct.

To decide whether this is proved, you must consider the time, place or purpose of the commission of the offences, and any other relevant matters.

[Add the following shaded section only if the prosecution rely on the time of the incidents to show a course of conduct.]

In relation to time, this may refer to both the period over which the incidents are alleged to have occurred as well as the timing of the incidents. Here, the evidence is that this conduct occurred [regularly/refer to relevant evidence] over a period of [X days, weeks, months or years]. [Refer to relevant prosecution and defence arguments.]

[Add the following shaded section only if the prosecution rely on the place of the incidents to show a course of conduct.]

In relation to place, if the incidents are alleged to have occurred in the same place, that may be an important factor in deciding if a course of conduct has been established. However, if the incidents are alleged to have occurred at different places, that does not mean that the incidents taken together cannot form a course of conduct. You must consider place along with the time and purpose of the commission of the incidents and any other relevant matter. For example, you might find that if the incidents are said to have happened regularly, time will be a more important factor than the place where the incidents are alleged to have occurred. [Refer to relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

[Add the following shaded section only if the prosecution rely on the purpose of offences to show a course of conduct. Note that this is unlikely to be relevant for sexual offences.]

In relation to the purpose for which the offences are said to have been committed, if the purpose is the same or similar across the incidents, that is likely to be an important factor. [Refer to relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

[Add the following shaded section if the prosecution rely on any other relevant matters to show a course of conduct.]

In relation to other relevant matters, in this case [Refer to any other relevant matters. Refer also to prosecution and defence evidence and arguments].

You must decide whether the accused engaged in conduct that constitutes NOO more than once within the period specified on the indictment and whether those incidents amount to a course of conduct.

[If the timeframe specified in the indictment is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

Although you do not need to be satisfied about the actual dates that each incident relied upon occurred, you must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the incidents that you find constitute the course of conduct all fall within the timeframe alleged in the indictment. The indictment specifies a timeframe of [insert specified period].

[Refer to relevant prosecution and defence evidence and argument.]

[If the complainant in a sexual offence case gives evidence of what would 'usually' or 'routinely' occur, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that a course of conduct can be proved by evidence from a complainant about what would normally occur without giving evidence of the details of any individual incident or incidents. The law says that you can conclude from such generalised evidence that NOA engaged in a course of conduct. You will remember what I said earlier about drawing conclusions.

[If there is an issue about the imprecision of the number of incidents, add the following shaded section.]

You do not need to be satisfied of the exact number of incidents of the offending, or of the circumstances of any one individual incident, in order to find a course of conduct.

[If the evidence included allegations of multiple offences committed within the one incident, add the following shaded section.]

You must be satisfied that there is more than one incident. It is not enough for the prosecution to prove that NOA committed NOO more than once during a short, isolated occasion.

[If the relevant offence comprised different types of acts on different occasions, add the following shaded section.]

As I have already told you, NOO may be committed in different ways. [Insert summary of different acts alleged to have constituted the offence, for example, digital penetration one on occasion and by penetration with an object on another.] As long as the accused committed NOO more than once, it does not matter that the acts making up that offence were different from one incident to another.

[If there is offending relating to more than one complainant and involves a sexual offence, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution submits you should be satisfied that NOA committed the offence of NOO with NOC on more than one occasion, and not some other person. [Refer to relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

In deciding whether prosecution has proved that NOA committed NOO as a course of conduct, you do not need to unanimously agree that specific incidents occurred. This means that seven of you might be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that incidents one, two and three occurred and constituted a course of conduct, and five of you might be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that there was a course of conduct due to incidents four, five and six. In that situation, you would still have a unanimous decision that there was a course of conduct.

You can each accept or reject different parts of the evidence in reaching your verdict. You must be unanimous in your verdict, whether guilty or not guilty, not in how you reach that conclusion.

Ultimately, what the prosecution must prove is that between [insert relevant dates], NOA [insert statement of offence, e.g. 'intentionally took part in an act of sexual penetration with a child under 16, NOV'] as a course of conduct.

[Refer to relevant parts of the prosecution and defence case.]

[If this element is not in issue, add the shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that, if the alleged incidents occurred, they amounted to a course of conduct by the accused. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proved if you find that NOA committed the conduct alleged.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of committing NOO as a course of conduct, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

- [Insert elements of relevant offence] and
- The incidents of the offending, taken together, amount to a course of conduct by the accused.

If you find that any of these elements has not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of committing [insert relevant offence] as a course of conduct.

7.2 Homicide

7.2.1 Intentional or Reckless Murder

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Forms of Murder

1. There are three ways in which murder can be committed:

   i) The accused can cause the victim's death while intending to kill or cause really serious injury, or being reckless as to that result;[392]

   ii) The accused can unintentionally cause the victim's death in the course or furtherance of certain violent crimes; and

   iii) The accused can unintentionally cause the victim's death in order to escape arrest.

2. This topic addresses the first category of murder outlined above.

Overview of Elements

3. Murder is a crime at common law. It has the following four elements, each of which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

   i) The accused committed acts which caused the victim's death;

[392] This type of murder will simply be referred to as "murder".

ii) The accused committed those acts voluntarily;[393]

iii) The accused committed those acts while:

- intending to kill someone or cause them really serious injury; or
- [if reckless murder has been left to the jury] knowing that it was probable that death or really serious injury would result.

iv) The accused did not have a lawful justification or excuse for those acts (such as self-defence, provocation, duress or sudden or extraordinary emergency).

4. Each of these elements is addressed in turn below.

Acts which Caused the Victim's Death

5. The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed acts which caused the victim's death. There are three aspects to this element:

i) The accused must have committed the relevant acts;

ii) Those acts must have caused someone to die; and

iii) The victim must have been a human being.

Accused must have Committed the Relevant Acts

6. For the accused to be found guilty of murder, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he committed the act or acts which are alleged to have caused the victim's death.
7. In most cases it will be clear which act or acts were the cause of death, and so little time will need to be spent addressing this issue (other than directing the jury that before they can convict the accused, they must be satisfied that s/he committed the relevant act or acts) (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205).
8. Specific directions may be required where the death may have been caused by one or more acts in a series of acts. See 7.1.2 Causation.
9. Where additional directions are appropriate, the jury should be directed about the different ways the causal act can be identified, and instructed that it is for them to determine:
    - What acts caused the victim's death (see below); and
    - Whether the accused committed the relevant act or acts (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205).

Acts That Caused Someone to Die

10. The accused's acts must have caused the victim's death. That is, his/her acts must have "contributed significantly" to the death, or been a "substantial and operating cause" of it (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378; R v Rudebeck [1999] VSCA 155).

[393] Although this element is often said to require the accused's acts to be "conscious and voluntary", consciousness is simply one aspect of the broader voluntariness requirement (see, e.g. Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205). This issue is addressed in more detail below.

11. The acts must be such that an ordinary person would hold them, as a matter of common sense, to be a cause of the death. The mere fact that the accused's conduct contributed causally to the death, or was a necessary cause of it, is not sufficient (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378).
12. The accused's acts do not need to be the sole cause of the death. A person can be criminally liable for a death that has multiple causes, even if he or she is not responsible for all of those causes (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378).
13. Previously, the law held that a delay of more than "a year and a day" between the accused's acts and the victim's death meant that the accused's acts could not be regarded as a cause of that death. That limitation has been abolished (Crimes Act 1958 s 9AA), and now applies only to offences alleged to have been committed before 19 November 1991.
14. In many cases it will be unnecessary for the judge to do more than simply identify causation as an element of the offence. However, more detailed directions should be given if:
    - Causation was a live issue in the trial; or
    - An undirected jury might consider causation to be a live issue.
15. The cases where causation will be a live issue will include those where:
    - There were multiple possible causes of the death;
    - The death was delayed;
    - There were intervening acts between the accused's actions and the victim's death; or
    - The accused is alleged to have caused the death indirectly (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378).
16. Causation is a question of fact for the jury and, where it is in issue, it is for the jury to determine what act or acts caused death. The judge must not impermissibly confine the jury's role in determining the act which caused death (Koani v R [2017] HCA 42, [39]).
17. See 7.1.2 Causation for further information about this issue.

Victim a Human Being

18. The accused must have caused the death of a "human being" (R v Hutty [1953] VLR 338).
19. "Death" is defined to mean the irreversible cessation of circulation of blood in the body, or the irreversible cessation of all function of the brain (Human Tissue Act 1982 s 41).
20. An unborn child is not classified as a "human being" for the purposes of murder and manslaughter (R v Hutty [1953] VLR 338).
21. A child is treated as being "born" (and thus a "human being") when "he or she is fully born in a living state". This occurs when the child is "completely delivered from the body of its mother and it has a separate and independent existence in the sense that it does not derive its power of living from its mother" (R v Hutty [1953] VLR 338).
22. Any evidence of independent existence will be sufficient for a child to be classified as a "human being" for the purposes of the law (R v Iby (2005) 63 NSWLR 278).
23. The mere fact that a child is still attached by the umbilical cord does not mean it is to be regarded as unborn (R v Hutty [1953] VLR 338).
24. While killing an unborn child will not be murder or manslaughter, it may be child destruction (Crimes Act 1958 s 10).

Voluntary Acts

25. The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the acts which caused the death were voluntary (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205).

26. The issue of "voluntariness" concerns, at least, the accused's conscious control of his or her bodily movements (He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523).

27. The terms "deliberate" and "willed" are sometimes used to describe the voluntariness requirement (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205).

28. In murder trials it is orthodox to describe this element as requiring that the relevant acts be "conscious and voluntary", or "conscious, voluntary and deliberate". See R v Schaeffer (2005) 13 VR 337.

29. While a judge may use these terms to help explain the voluntariness requirement to the jury (R v Schaeffer (2005) 13 VR 337), they do not need to be used in every case. The use of such alternative terms, and the extent to which they need to be explored, will depend on the circumstances of the case.

30. If the term "conscious" is used care should be taken to ensure that it is not equated with voluntary action. The fact that an accused was conscious at the time of an act does not necessarily mean that act was committed voluntarily (see, e.g. R v Edwards [2005] VSCA 92).

31. Knowledge of the circumstances that give an offence its criminal character is generally a component of intention, not volition. Thus an act remains voluntary even if it is performed in ignorance of fundamental facts that will determine culpability (R v O'Connor (1979) 146 CLR 64).

32. While the jury should always be directed to consider this element, where voluntariness is not in issue it need not be examined in detail (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205).

33. Terms such as "accidental", "unintentional", "involuntary" and "unwilled" all possess a degree of ambiguity. They can be used to signify either that:

    - The accused acts were not voluntary (addressing the second element); or
    - That the accused lacked the requisite intention to commit the crime (addressing the third element) (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205).

    If such terms are used by counsel, the judge should take care to ascertain precisely which element is being addressed, and charge the jury accordingly.

Mental States: Intention and Recklessness

34. The third element that the prosecution must prove is that when the accused committed the acts that caused the victim's death, s/he either:

    - Intended to kill someone or cause them really serious injury ("intentional murder"); or
    - Knew that it was probable that death or really serious injury would result from those acts ("reckless murder") (R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464).

35. The accused does not need to have intended to kill or injure the person who actually died, or to have been reckless about killing or injuring that particular person. It is sufficient if they had the necessary level of intention or recklessness in respect of some person, whether or not that was the person who was ultimately killed (La Fontaine v R (1976) 136 CLR 62).[394]

[394] This is known as the doctrine of "transferred malice".

Reckless murder

36. It is not appropriate to direct a jury about reckless murder in every case. The jury should only be directed about "reckless murder" where the evidence can properly support a conclusion that the accused acted recklessly (Pemble v The Queen (1971) 124 CLR 107; R v Barrett (2007) 16 VR 240; Aiton v The Queen (1993) 68 A Crim R 578, 587–590).[395]

37. One of the risks that arise from leaving reckless murder to the jury is that the jury may inadvertently treat the mens rea requirement as involving an objective rather than subjective analysis. This risk is likely heightened when the case also raises issues of voluntariness, manslaughter or self-defence (Herodotou v The Queen [2018] VSCA 253, [136]–[138]).

38. In the context of murder, to commit an act "recklessly" is to commit that act knowing that someone will probably die or suffer really serious injury (R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464).

39. The word "probable" means "likely to happen". It can be contrasted with something that is merely "possible" (R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464).

40. To have acted recklessly, the accused must actually have known that death or really serious injury would probably result from his or her acts. It is not sufficient for that danger to have been obvious to the reasonable person, or to the members of the jury (Pemble v The Queen (1971) 124 CLR 107; R v TY (2006) 12 VR 557; R v Barrett (2007) 16 VR 240).

41. The jury may use the fact that a reasonable person would have appreciated the probability of death or really serious injury to infer that the accused had such an awareness (Pemble v The Queen (1971) 124 CLR 107).

42. However, where such reasoning is open the jury must be warned not to conclude that the accused foresaw the probability of death or really serious injury simply because a reasonable person would have appreciated that probability (Pemble v The Queen (1971) 124 CLR 107; R v TY (2006) 12 VR 557).

43. Use of the word "reckless" should be avoided when charging the jury in murder trials, as it is liable to be confusing (La Fontaine v R (1976) 136 CLR 62).

44. Similarly, the word "might" should not be used. Recklessness is not established when the accused knew that particular consequences "might occur". The accused must have known that those consequences "would probably occur" (R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585).

45. "Probable" is not a mathematical term. The accused does not need to have mathematically weighed the probability of death or really serious injury occurring, and the jury should not attempt to translate the accused's knowledge into terms of mathematical probability (Boughey v The Queen (1986) 161 CLR 10).

46. It will generally be sufficient if:

    (a) The jury is directed to consider whether the accused knew that death or really serious injury was the probable or likely consequence of his or her acts; and

    (b) Reference is made to the distinction between what is probable or likely on the one hand, and what is only possible on the other (R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464; Boughey v The Queen (1986) 161 CLR 10; R v Faure [1999] 2 VR 537).

[395] See R v Hegarty [2011] VSC 111 for a detailed discussion about the types of situations in which a direction on reckless murder may be appropriate.

47. If a jury is to be directed on both reckless murder and involuntary manslaughter (whether by unlawful and dangerous act or by criminal negligence), it is vital that the directions draw an appropriate contrast between the mental states required for the two offences (Pemble v The Queen (1971) 124 CLR 107; R v TY (2006) 12 VR 557). See Manslaughter by Unlawful and Dangerous Act for further information.

48. Where recklessness is to be found by inference, the trial judge must identify the relevant evidence, and the inferences which can legitimately be drawn from that evidence (Pemble v The Queen (1971) 124 CLR 107; R v TY (2006) 12 VR 557).

49. The jury should be directed that the accused's circumstances are relevant to their determination of his or her state of mind. These circumstances may include age, educational and social background, emotional state and state of sobriety (Pemble v The Queen (1971) 124 CLR 107; R v Barrett (2007) 16 VR 240).

Really serious injury

50. For the third element to be satisfied, the accused does not need to have intended that someone die, or known that death would probably result from their actions. It is sufficient if s/he intended to cause someone serious non-fatal harm, or knew that such harm would probably result.

51. In Victoria, the degree of harm that must be intended is "really serious injury".

52. The phrase "really serious" should be used to properly indicate the gravity of the required intent (Wilson v R (1992) 174 CLR 313; R v Perks (1986) 41 SASR 335; R v Schaeffer (2005) 13 VR 337; R v Barrett (2007) 16 VR 240).

53. It appears to be necessary that the "really serious injury" intended or risked should be a bodily injury. This includes unconsciousness (R v Rhodes (1984) 14 A Crim R 124), but may not include purely psychological injuries.

54. The meaning of "really serious injury" is a matter for the jury to determine. It is unwise to elaborate on its meaning. The law gives only very general assistance to juries in this regard. While some injuries are manifestly too slight and some injuries clearly sufficient to answer the legal test, there remains an infinite variety of situations in which a jury might reasonably take either view (R v Rhodes (1984) 14 A Crim R 124).

55. There is no requirement that the harm intended be a life–threatening harm (R v Cunningham [1982] AC 566.)

Defences to murder

56. Conduct that would otherwise be murder can be excused or justified by a number of discrete defences, including self-defence, provocation (for homicides committed before 23 November 2005), intoxication, duress and sudden or extraordinary emergency. Each of these defences is examined in detail in Part 8: Victorian Defences.

57. The issue of intoxication may also be of relevance when considering the accused's mental state. See 8.7 Common Law Intoxication and 8.5 Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14) for further information.

Order of the Charge

58. In murder trials it is commonly necessary to direct juries about available alternative verdicts, such as manslaughter.[396] It may also be necessary to direct the jury about a number of different defences or excuses, such as self-defence and provocation. The interrelationship between these issues means that the order in which they are addressed can affect the clarity of the charge.

59. For offences alleged to have been committed prior to 23 November 2005,[397] it is recommended that judges approach these topics in the following order:

    - The elements of murder;
    - Self-defence (to murder);
    - Voluntary manslaughter (provocation);
    - The elements of involuntary manslaughter;
    - Self defence (to manslaughter).

60. For offences alleged to have been committed on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014,[398] it is recommended that judges approach these topics in the following order:

    - The elements of murder;
    - Murder self-defence (s 9AC);
    - Defensive homicide (s 9AD);
    - The elements of manslaughter; and
    - Manslaughter self-defence (s 9AE).

61. For offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1 November 2014, it is recommended that judges approach these topics in the following order:

    - The elements of murder;
    - Self-defence (to murder) (s 322K);
    - The elements of manslaughter; and
    - Self-defence (to manslaughter) (s 322K).

[396] See 3.10 Alternative Verdicts for guidance concerning the requirement to leave alternative verdicts to the jury.

[397] On 23 November 2005 the Crimes (Homicide) Act 2005 came into effect, introducing two statutory self-defence provisions (Crimes Act 1958 ss 9AC and 9AE) and a new offence of Defensive Homicide (s 9AD), as well as abolishing provocation. See 8.2 Statutory Self-defence (Pre-1/11/14) and Defensive Homicide for further information.

[398] On 1 November 2014 the Crimes Amendment (Abolition of Defensive Homicide) Act 2014 came into effect, introducing a single statutory self-defence provision for all offences (Crimes Act 1958 s 322K), and abolishing the previous statutory murder self-defence, manslaughter self-defence and the offence of Defensive Homicide. See 8.1 Statutory Self-defence (From 1/11/14) for further information.

Jurisdiction

62. If the victim dies in Victoria, the matter may be tried in a Victorian court, regardless of whether or not the causal acts occurred in Victoria (Crimes Act 1958 s 9).

7.2.1.1 Charge: Intentional Murder

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used if reckless murder is not left to the jury.

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of murder. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused caused the victim's death.

Two – the accused's acts[399] were conscious, voluntary and deliberate.

Three – that at the time the accused did the acts that caused the victim's death, s/he intended to kill or cause really serious injury

Four – the accused killed the victim without lawful justification or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Cause of death

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused caused the victim's death.[400]

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts] and doing so caused NOV's death. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is in issue, add the following shaded section and the relevant additional sections.]

To determine if this element has been proven, you must first determine what acts NOA committed. You must then determine whether [any of] those acts caused NOV's death.[401]

[If the cause of death is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that [insert relevant causal acts] caused NOV's death. However, the defence contends that NOA did not commit those acts. For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

---

[399] As most cases of murder involve a number of acts by the accused, the term "acts" is used throughout this charge. If there is only one relevant act, this will need to be changed.

[400] If alternative forms of accessorial liability are in issue, this section will have to be modified. See Part 5: Complicity for further information.

[401] In some cases the jury may also need to determine whether the victim was a living human being when the relevant acts were committed: see 7.2.1 Intentional or Reckless Murder.

[If cause of death is in issue because of multiple possible causes (whether combined or competing), add the shaded section.]

[If the cause of death is disputed due to intervening acts, a failure to intervene, or the victim's own conduct, use the shaded sections below instead.]

In this case you have heard evidence that NOV's death [resulted/may have resulted] from a number of [describe basis of uncertainty, e.g. possible, competing, inconsistent etc.] causes. [Insert relevant evidence and causal explanations.]

The law says that for NOA's acts to have caused NOV's death, they do not need to have been the only cause of that result, or the direct or immediate cause. You may find that his/her acts caused the death if they were a substantial or significant cause of that result.

You should approach this question in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

[If causation is an issue because of intervening acts, or a failure to intervene, add the following shaded section.]

In this case you have heard evidence that NOV's death did not immediately follow the alleged acts of the accused, and that [describe intervening acts] [may have] occurred in between.

The law says that for NOA's acts to have caused NOV's death, they do not need to have been the only cause of that result, or the direct or immediate cause. You may find that his/her acts caused the death if they were a substantial or significant cause of that result.

In making this determination, you need to decide whether it was the accused's acts which caused the death, or whether those acts merely provided the setting for the later acts of [insert intervening acts], which were the true cause of death. If NOA's acts only provided the setting, then s/he did not cause the death, and you must find him/her not guilty of murder.

You should approach this question in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

[If the victim's own acts could have caused his or her own death, add the following shaded section.]

This direction has been drafted for use in cases in which the victim could be seen to have caused his or her own death while attempting to escape the violence of the accused. While it could be adapted for use in other cases where the accused may have indirectly caused the death, care should be taken in doing so.

This charge should not be given where a simpler "intervention" direction can be given (see above). It should also not be given where NOA purposively compelled NOV to commit the causal act.

In this case you have heard evidence suggesting that NOV's death was only indirectly caused by the acts of the accused. [Insert relevant evidence.]

The law says that for an accused's acts to have caused the victim's death, they do not need to have been the direct or immediate cause of that result. This element can be met even if NOA indirectly caused NOV's death.

However, you can only find the accused responsible for the indirect results of his/her acts if the prosecution can prove two matters to you, beyond reasonable doubt.

First, the prosecution must prove that NOA's acts caused NOV's death. In this case, that means that the prosecution must prove that NOA's acts were a substantial or significant cause of [identify immediate causal event, e.g. "NOV fleeing NOA's violence"], which in turn caused NOV's death.

You should approach the question of whether NOA caused NOV's death in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

Secondly,[402] the prosecution must also prove that the victim acted out of a well-founded or reasonable fear of the accused, and that the victim's acts of self-preservation were a natural consequence of the accused's conduct.

Here, the evidence was [describe evidence relevant to the reasonableness of NOV's response]. It is for you to determine if NOV's reaction was reasonable and well-founded. If you find that NOV over-reacted to NOA's conduct, then this element will not be satisfied, and you must find NOA not guilty of murder.

Voluntariness

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused's causal acts were conscious, voluntary and deliberate. These words each have a special meaning in law, which I will briefly explain.

The term "conscious" excludes the acts of an unconscious person, such as a sleepwalker, or a person rolling over in bed.

The term "voluntary" directs you to the requirement that the act which killed the deceased must be a "willed" act, that is, one resulting from the control by the accused of his/her own actions. This excludes the acts of a person operating in one of a number of rare mental states where the mind loses control of the body's actions.

The term "deliberate" excludes accidental acts, such as the consequences of falling over or fumbling an item.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant causal acts, e.g. "pointed and discharged the gun"] s/he did so consciously, voluntarily and deliberately, so you should have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If voluntariness is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case the defence argued[403] that the prosecution has failed to prove that the accused's causal acts were [select term(s), e.g. conscious, voluntary, deliberate].

The defence submitted that these acts were committed [describe and discuss the relevant form of involuntary conduct raised as an issue in the trial, such as accident; reflex acts; physically compelled acts; acts performed in an automatic state]. The prosecution denied that this was the case. [Insert relevant prosecution arguments and/or evidence.]

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was acting consciously, voluntarily and deliberately when s/he committed the acts that you find caused NOV's death. If you are not satisfied that this was the case, then you must find NOA not guilty of murder.

[If the jury must determine voluntariness by reference to its findings on causation, add the shaded section.]

[402] This part of the direction will have to be substantially modified if used in cases not involving escape–based harm.

[403] If the defence did not raise the issue of voluntariness, but it arises on the evidence, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

I have instructed you that it is for you to determine which if any act(s) of the accused caused NOV's death. If you find that [describe narrow view of causal acts] was the common-sense cause of death, then it is the deliberateness[404] of that act that you must consider. If you find that [describe broader view of causal acts] was the common-sense cause of death, then it is the deliberateness of those acts that you must consider.

State of Mind of the Accused

The third element relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that at the time the accused did the acts that you find caused the victim's death, s/he intended to kill NOV or cause him/her really serious injury.[405]

When I say "really serious injury", I am not using a technical legal phrase. These are ordinary English words, and it is for you to determine what this phrase means to you as jurors.

In this case the prosecution submitted NOA acted with intent [insert relevant intent and describe relevant evidence and/or arguments]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to decide whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused had this intention. If s/he did, then this third element will be met.

Timing

[If the jury must consider different mental states associated with different causal acts, use this shaded section.]

For this element to be satisfied, the accused must have intended to kill NOV or cause him/her really serious injury at the time that s/he committed the act or acts that you find caused NOV's death.

As I have mentioned, in this case the cause of NOV's death is disputed. The prosecution contends that [insert relevant causal acts] caused NOV's death, and that NOA had the necessary mental state when s/he committed those acts. However, the defence submits that [insert relevant causal acts] was the cause of NOV's death, and that at that point in time NOA did not have the necessary state of mind because [insert relevant evidence and/or submissions].

Before you can determine whether this third element has been satisfied, you must therefore first decide precisely which act or acts caused NOV's death. You must then determine whether NOA held a required mental state at the time that s/he committed that act or those acts.

Inferring states of mind

[If proof of the accused's mental state depends on the drawing of inferences, add the following shaded section.]

As I have stated, the prosecution contends that you should infer from the evidence that NOA had the appropriate state of mind at the relevant time.

---

[404] This issue is most likely to arise where accident is the issue. If another form of involuntariness is in issue this charge should be adapted.

[405] This section of the charge has been drafted for use in cases where the accused's actions were directed towards the victim. If the jury could find that the accused intended to harm someone else references to the victim should be replaced with "some person", and the following paragraph should be added: "The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to kill or injure NOV him/herself. This element will be satisfied if NOA intended to kill or cause really serious injury to any person."

A person's intention at the time s/he commits an offence may be inferred from what s/he said and did, and also from what s/he failed to say and do. You should look at all of NOA's proven actions before, at the time of, and after the alleged offence. All of these things may help you to determine what NOA's intention was when s/he committed the acts you have decided caused NOV's death.

In particular, the prosecution has asked you to consider [describe evidence]. The defence has asked you to consider [describe evidence].

You will remember what I told you about inferences earlier[406] In this context, those directions mean that you can only infer that NOA intended to kill NOV or cause him/her really serious injury if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that it is the only inference open from the facts you have found. If any evidence causes you to have reservations about drawing such an inference, the benefit of your doubts should go to the accused.

Absence of Lawful Justification or Excuse

Even if the first three elements are proven, the law states that a person is not guilty of murder if the killing was done with a lawful justification or excuse, such as in self-defence or under duress.

[If no such issue is raised on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

There is no question in this case of any such lawful justification or excuse, so that aspect can be disregarded.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert directions from the relevant topics here (see Part 8: Victorian Defences).]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of murder the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA committed acts which caused NOV's death; and

Two – that NOA's acts were conscious, voluntary and deliberate; and

Three – that NOA intended to kill NOV or cause him/her really serious injury; and

Four – that NOA had no lawful justification or excuse for killing NOV.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of murder.

7.2.1.2 Checklist: Intentional Murder (without Self-Defence)

[406] This charge is based on the assumption that the judge has already instructed the jury about inferences. It will need to be modified if that has not been done.

This checklist can be used if it is alleged that the accused committed murder, recklessness is not open on the evidence, manslaughter is not available as an alternative verdict, and no substantive defences are open on the evidence.

Murder

Before you can convict the accused of murder, there are four elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused caused the victim's death; and
2. The accused's acts were conscious, voluntary and deliberate; and
3. The accused intended to kill or cause really serious injury; and
4. The accused killed the victim without lawful justification or excuse.

Cause of Death

1. Has the prosecution proved that the accused caused the victim's death?

Consider – Were the accused's actions a substantial or significant cause of the victim's death?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Murder

Conscious, Voluntary and Deliberate Acts

2. Has the prosecution proved that the accused's actions that caused the victim's death were conscious, voluntary and deliberate?

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Murder

Intention

3. Has the prosecution proved that at the time the accused did the acts that caused the victim's death, s/he intended to kill or to cause really serious injury?

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Murder

Defences

4. Has the prosecution proved that the accused acted with no lawful justification or excuse?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Murder (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Murder

7.2.1.3 Charge: Intentional and Reckless Murder

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used if both intentional and reckless murder are left to the jury. If only reckless murder is issue, adapt this charge accordingly.

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of murder. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused caused the victim's death.

Two – the accused's acts were conscious, voluntary and deliberate.[407]

Three – that at the time the accused did the acts that caused the victim's death, s/he either:

- Intended to kill or cause really serious injury; or
- Knew that his/her acts would probably cause a death or really serious injury.

Four – that the accused killed the victim without lawful justification or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Cause of death

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused caused the victim's death.[408]

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts] and doing so caused NOV's death. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is in issue, add the following shaded section and the relevant additional sections.]

To determine if this element has been proven, you must first determine what acts NOA committed. You must then determine whether [any of] those acts caused NOV's death.[409]

[If the cause of death is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that [insert relevant causal acts] caused NOV's death. However, the defence contends that NOA did not commit those acts. For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If cause of death is in issue because of multiple possible causes (whether combined or competing), add the shaded section.]

[407] As most cases of murder involve a number of acts by the accused, the term "acts" is used throughout this charge. If there is only one relevant act, this will need to be changed.

[408] If alternative forms of accessorial liability are in issue, this section will have to be modified. See Part 5: Complicity for further information.

[409] In some cases the jury may also need to determine whether the victim was a living human being when the relevant acts were committed: see 7.2.1 Intentional or Reckless Murder.

[If the cause of death is disputed due to intervening acts, a failure to intervene, or the victim's own conduct, use the shaded sections below instead.]

In this case you have heard evidence that NOV's death [resulted/may have resulted] from a number of [describe basis of uncertainty, e.g. possible, competing, inconsistent etc.] causes. [Insert relevant evidence and causal explanations.]

The law says that for NOA's acts to have caused NOV's death, they do not need to have been the only cause of that result, or the direct or immediate cause. You may find that his/her acts caused the death if they were a substantial or significant cause of that result.

You should approach this question in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

[If causation is an issue because of intervening acts, or a failure to intervene, add the following shaded section.]

In this case you have heard evidence that NOV's death did not immediately follow the alleged acts of the accused, and that [describe intervening acts] [may have] occurred in between.

The law says that for NOA's acts to have caused NOV's death, they do not need to have been the only cause of that result, or the direct or immediate cause. You may find that his/her acts caused the death if they were a substantial or significant cause of that result.

In making this determination, you need to decide whether it was the accused's acts which caused the death, or whether those acts merely provided the setting for the later acts of [insert intervening acts], which were the true cause of death. If NOA's acts only provided the setting, then s/he did not cause the death, and you must find him/her not guilty of murder.

You should approach this question in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

[If the victim's own acts could have caused his or her own death, add the following shaded section.]

This direction has been drafted for use in cases in which the victim could be seen to have caused his or her own death while attempting to escape the violence of the accused. While it could be adapted for use in other cases where the accused may have indirectly caused the death, care should be taken in doing so.

This charge should not be given where a simpler "intervention" direction can be given (see above). It should also not be given where NOA purposively compelled NOV to commit the causal act.

In this case you have heard evidence suggesting that NOV's death was only indirectly caused by the acts of the accused. [Insert relevant evidence.]

The law says that for an accused's acts to have caused the victim's death, they do not need to have been the direct or immediate cause of that result. This element can be met even if NOA indirectly caused NOV's death.

However, you can only find the accused responsible for the indirect results of his/her acts if the prosecution can prove two matters to you, beyond reasonable doubt.

First, the prosecution must prove that NOA's acts caused NOV's death. In this case, that means that the prosecution must prove that NOA's acts were a substantial or significant cause of [identify immediate causal event, e.g. "NOV fleeing NOA's violence"], which in turn caused NOV's death.

You should approach this question in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

Secondly,[410] the prosecution must also prove that the victim acted out of a well-founded or reasonable fear of the accused, and that the victim's acts of self-preservation were a natural consequence of the accused's conduct.

Here, the evidence was [describe evidence relevant to the reasonableness of NOV's response]. It is for you to determine if NOV's reaction was reasonable and well-founded. If you find that NOV over-reacted to NOA's conduct, then this element will not be satisfied, and you must find NOA not guilty of murder.

Voluntariness

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused's causal acts were conscious, voluntary and deliberate. These words each have a special meaning in law, which I will briefly explain.

The term "conscious" excludes the acts of an unconscious person, such as a sleepwalker, or a person rolling over in bed.

The term "voluntary" directs you to the requirement that the act which killed the deceased must be a "willed" act, that is, one resulting from the control by the accused of his/her own actions. This excludes the acts of a person operating in one of a number of rare mental states where the mind loses control of the body's actions.

The term "deliberate" excludes accidental acts, such as the consequences of falling over or fumbling an item.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant causal acts, e.g. "pointed and discharged the gun"] s/he did so consciously, voluntarily and deliberately, so you should have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If voluntariness is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case the defence argued[411] that the prosecution has failed to prove that the accused's causal acts were [select term(s), e.g. conscious, voluntary, deliberate].

The defence submitted that these acts were committed [describe and discuss the relevant form of involuntary conduct raised as an issue in the trial, such as accident; reflex acts; physically compelled acts; acts performed in an automatic state.] The prosecution denied that this was the case. [Insert relevant prosecution arguments and/or evidence.]

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was acting consciously, voluntarily and deliberately when s/he committed the acts that you find caused NOV's death. If you are not satisfied that this was the case, then you must find NOA not guilty of murder.

[If the jury must determine voluntariness by reference to its findings on causation, add the shaded section.]

I have instructed you that it is for you to determine which if any act(s) of the accused caused NOV's death. If you find that [describe narrow view of causal acts] was the common-sense cause of death, then it is the deliberateness[412] of that act that you must consider. If you find that [describe broader view of causal acts] was the common-sense cause of death, then it is the deliberateness of those acts that you must consider.

---

[410] This part of the direction will have to be substantially modified if used in cases not involving escape–based harm.

[411] If the defence did not raise the issue of voluntariness, but it arises on the evidence, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

State of Mind of the Accused

The third element relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that at the time the accused did the acts that caused the victim's death, s/he either:

- Intended to kill NOV or cause him/her really serious injury; or
- Knew that as a result of his/her acts NOV would probably die or suffer really serious injury.[413]

When I say "really serious injury", I am not using a technical legal phrase. These are ordinary English words, and it is for you to determine what this phrase means to you as jurors.

The two mental states I just mentioned are alternatives. This element will be satisfied as long as the prosecution can prove one of them beyond reasonable doubt. I will now examine each in turn.

Intention to kill or cause really serious injury[414]

This element can be satisfied if the prosecution can prove that the accused intended to kill the victim, or to cause him/her really serious injury.

In this case the prosecution submitted that this was the case. [Insert relevant evidence and/or arguments.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to decide whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused had this intention. If s/he did, then this third element will be met.

Knowledge of a probable result

A second way this element can be satisfied is by proof that the accused committed the relevant acts knowing that death or really serious injury would probably result. That is, NOA knew that death or really serious injury were likely to result from his/her acts.

It is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that death or really serious injury might result from his/her actions. S/he must have known that those consequences were probable.

[412] This issue is most likely to arise where accident is the issue. If another form of involuntariness is in issue this charge should be adapted.

[413] This section of the charge has been drafted for use in cases where the accused's actions were directed towards the victim. If the jury could find that the accused intended to harm someone else, or was reckless about harming someone else, references to the victim should be replaced with "some person", and the following paragraph should be added: "The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to kill or injure NOV him/herself, or knew that NOV would probably die or suffer really serious injury. This element will be satisfied if NOA intended to kill or cause really serious injury to any person, or knew that it was probable that somebody would be killed or really seriously injured by his or her acts."

[414] If the prosecution only alleges reckless murder, without presenting intentional murder as an alternative basis, this charge will need to be modified.

In determining this part of the test, you must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew of the risk of death or really serious injury. It is not enough that you or a reasonable person would have recognised those risks in the circumstances.

In this case, the following evidence is relevant to your assessment of NOA's state of mind: [identify relevant evidence and the inferences to be drawn from that evidence].

Timing

[If the jury must consider different mental states associated with different causal acts, use this shaded section.]

For this element to be satisfied, the accused must have intended to kill NOV or cause him/her really serious injury or known that NOV would probably die or suffer really serious injury at the time that s/he committed the act or acts that you find caused NOV's death.

As I have mentioned, in this case the cause of NOV's death is disputed. The prosecution contends that [insert relevant causal acts] caused NOV's death, and that NOA had the necessary mental state when s/he committed those acts. However, the defence submits that [insert relevant causal acts] was the cause of NOV's death, and that at that point in time NOA did not have the necessary state of mind because [insert relevant evidence and/or submissions].

Before you can determine whether this third element has been satisfied, you must therefore first decide precisely which act or acts caused NOV's death. You must then determine whether NOA held a required mental state at the time that s/he committed that act or those acts.

Inferring states of mind

[If proof of the accused's mental state depends on the drawing of inferences, add the following shaded section.]

As I have stated, the prosecution contends that you should infer from the evidence that NOA had the appropriate state of mind at the relevant time.

A person's intention at the time s/he commits an offence may be inferred from what s/he said and did, and also from what s/he failed to say and do. You should look at all of NOA's proven actions before, at the time of, and after the alleged offence. All of these things may help you to determine what NOA's intention was when s/he committed the acts you have decided caused NOV's death.

In particular, the prosecution has asked you to consider [describe evidence]. The defence has asked you to consider [describe evidence].

You will remember what I told you about inferences earlier[415] In this context, those directions mean that you can only infer that NOA intended to kill NOV or cause him/her really serious injury or infer that s/he knew that such harm was probable, if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that it is the only inference open from the facts you have found. If any evidence causes you to have reservations about drawing such an inference, the benefit of your doubts should go to the accused.

[If the jury might infer knowledge of risk relevant to recklessness by an objective test, add the shaded section.]

In determining NOA's awareness of risk, you [can/have been asked to] draw inferences from the risk that [you/the reasonable person] would have foreseen in the accused's situation. I must warn you that although this is a legitimate step in reasoning towards a conclusion about NOA's state of mind, you must not treat those factors as decisive of the issue. It is not enough that you or any other person would have recognised those risks in the circumstances. You must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew of the risk of death or really serious injury.

[415] This charge is based on the assumption that the judge has already instructed the jury about inferences. It will need to be modified if that has not been done.

Absence of Lawful Justification or Excuse

Even if the first three elements are proven, the law states that a person is not guilty of murder if the killing was done with a lawful justification or excuse, such as in self-defence or under duress.

[If no such issue is raised on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

There is no question in this case of any such lawful justification or excuse, so that aspect can be disregarded.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert directions from the relevant topics here (see Part 8: Victorian Defences).]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of murder the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA committed acts which caused NOV's death; and

Two – that NOA's acts were conscious, voluntary and deliberate; and

Three – that NOA EITHER

- Intended to kill NOV or cause him/her really serious injury; or
- Acted knowing that it was probable that NOV would die or suffer really serious injury; and

Four – that NOA had no lawful justification or excuse for killing NOV.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of murder.

7.2.1A Statutory Murder

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

5. Section 3A of the Crimes Act 1958 states:

> (1) A person who unintentionally causes the death of another person by an act of violence done in the course or furtherance of a crime the necessary elements of which include violence for which a person upon first conviction may, under or by virtue of any enactment, be sentenced to level 1 imprisonment (life) or to imprisonment for a term of 10 years or more shall be liable to be convicted of murder as though he had killed that person intentionally.
> (2) The rule of law known as the felony-murder rule (whereby a person who unintentionally causes the death of another by an act of violence done in the course or furtherance of a felony of violence is liable to be convicted of murder as though he had killed that person intentionally) is hereby abrogated.

6. This is a deeming provision which creates a statutory fiction. It treats a person who commits the offence in the specified circumstances as though the person had killed the victim intentionally (DPP v Perry (2016) 50 VR 686, [35]–[36]).

7. The effect of s 3A is to provide a form of murder (often called statutory murder) which is most likely relevant where the accused cannot otherwise be convicted of murder due to an absence of intention.

8. Section 3A does not, however, create a discrete offence that may be distinguished from common law murder. Statutory murder is a legal alternative to murder. There is a single offence of murder, and s 3A provides an alternative means to prove that offence.[416] The implications of this rule for directing a jury which is asked to consider both common law murder and statutory murder is considered in Statutory murder and murder, below.

9. Statutory murder has four elements:

   i) The accused committed an act of violence;

   ii) That act of violence caused the death of a person;

   iii) The act of violence was committed in the course or furtherance of a serious crime the necessary elements of which include violence; and

   iv) The act of violence was conscious, voluntary and deliberate (see R v Galas (2007) 18 VR 205, [28]; DPP v Perry (2016) 50 VR 686, [8], [39]; Zaim v R [2011] VSCA 80, [43]).

10. It is currently unclear whether there is a further element that the prosecution must prove the death was unintentional. The approach currently adopted in this Charge Book is that it is not necessary to prove that the killing was unintentional, but there are conflicting decisions on the issue (see DPP v Perry (2016) 50 VR 686, [42] and compare DPP v Hansen [2020] VSCA 307, [67]; Zaim v The Queen [2011] VSCA 80, [3]; R v Galas (2007) 18 VR 205, 213 [28]. See also Wilio v The King [2023] VSCA 88, [35]–[44]).

An act of violence

11. The term "violence" is not limited to physical force. It also includes threats and menaces to induce fear or terror or to intimidate in order to remove resistance (R v Butcher [1986] VR 43; R v Galas (2007) 18 VR 205, [31]; Rich v R (2014) 43 VR 558, [258]).

---

[416] Duca v The Queen [2020] VSCA 209, [41], [54], [74]; Mitchell v The Queen [2023] HCA 5, [36].

12. Whether an act is an "act of violence" is primarily a question of fact. However, in some cases there may be a question of law whether the act is capable of being considered an act of violence (Arulthilakan v R (2003) 203 ALR 259, [23]).

13. It is not necessary to show that the accused intended that the act be an act of violence (R v CMM [2001] SASC 21).

Causing death

14. The second element is that the accused's act of violence caused the death of a person.

15. For this purpose, the causal act is not limited to the final act of the accused which causally contributed to the deceased's death. There does not need to be a single cause of death. This principle is often important in cases of murder under s 3A because the final act may have been involuntary. For example, pointing a gun at a person during a robbery may be an act of violence that causes death, even if the person pulls the trigger involuntarily (see Ryan v R (1969) 121 CLR 205, 231 (Taylor and Owen JJ) and 233 (Menzies J); R v Butcher [1986] VR 43, 54–6; R v Galas (2007) 18 VR 205, [53]–[54]).

16. The person who is killed must be a different person from the person who committed the relevant causal act. Statutory murder does not apply to the case where an accused's accomplice kills him or herself (IL v The Queen (2017) 262 CLR 268).

17. However, this prohibition does not extend to the case where one co-offender dies at the hand of another. For example, where the accused has shot and, by accident, killed their co-offender during an armed robbery, the accused may be convicted of murder on the basis of s 3A (Wilio v The King [2023] VSCA 88, [46]–[66]).

18. The principles of causation are discussed in more detail in Causation and 7.2.1 Intentional or Reckless Murder.

Death caused in course or furtherance of serious crime of violence

19. The third element is that the act of violence was committed in the course or furtherance of a serious crime the necessary elements of which include violence.

20. This second crime is referred to as the 'foundational offence' (DPP v Perry (2016) 50 VR 686at [34]).

21. For the purpose of this element, a serious crime is one punishable, for a first offence, by level 1 imprisonment (life) or to imprisonment for a term of 10 years or more (Crimes Act 1958 s 3A).

22. For the purpose of this commentary, the term "serious crime of violence" is used as shorthand for "a serious crime the necessary elements of which include violence".

23. Whether an offence qualifies as a serious crime of violence is a question of law for the trial judge (see R v Galas (2007) 18 VR 205, [23]–[28]).

24. Offences which have been found to be serious crimes of violence include:

    - Armed robbery (R v Butcher [1986] VR 43; R v Galas (2007) 18 VR 205, [26]; R v JLE [2011] VSC 669);
    - Robbery (R v Butcher [1986] VR 43; DPP v MM [2009] VSC 336; Zaim v R [2011] VSCA 80);
    - Reckless conduct endangering life (R v Kelly [2013] VSC 144, [19]);
    - Rape (DPP v Beard [1920] AC 479; R v Butcher [1986] VR 43).

25. It is an open question whether intentionally causing serious injury is a crime the necessary elements of which include violence (see R v Armstrong & Ors [2014] VSC 256, [10]; Haver v DPP [2013] VSC 622, [33]–[36]. See also DPP v Hansen [2020] VSCA 307, [13], where it was not disputed that intentionally causing injury could qualify as a foundational offence).

26. Under the common law "felony murder" rule, escaping from jail was considered to be a crime of violence (R v Ryan & Walker [1966] VR 553). Whether it is a crime of violence, the escape offence in Crimes Act 1958 s 479C is not a serious offence for this purpose, as the maximum penalty is 5 years imprisonment.

27. To prove that the act was committed in the course or furtherance of the foundational offence, the prosecution must prove that the accused intended to commit the foundational offence. This includes having the mens rea necessary for the foundational offence (R v R (1995) 63 SASR 417 at 424–5 (Perry J)).

28. The foundational offence does not need to be complete at the time of the violent act. This means that acts of violence in the course of, for example, an armed robbery, may qualify for the purpose of this element, even if the armed robbery is aborted before it is complete (R v Galas (2007) 18 VR 205, [34]).

29. It is not necessary for the accused to be separately charged with the serious crime of violence which is relied upon for this element (R v Galas (2007) 18 VR 205, [34]).

Conscious, voluntary and deliberate act

30. The prosecution must prove that the relevant act of violence which caused the death was conscious, voluntary and deliberate (R v Galas (2007) 18 VR 205).

31. This will often be a different act to the act that would be relied upon to prove intentional murder.

32. In R v Galas (2007) 18 VR 205, the deceased was killed in the course of an armed robbery while the accused was restraining the decreased hands while holding a loaded firearm. The Court of Appeal held that there was insufficient evidence for the jury to find that the firing of the gun was a voluntary and deliberate act for the purpose of murder. However, the Court also noted that it remained open for the jury to find that the act of threatening the deceased with a loaded gun while attempting to restrain the deceased's hands was the relevant causal act for the purpose of statutory murder and was conscious, voluntary and deliberate (R v Galas (2007) 18 VR 205, [53]–[54]).

Unintentional

33. While Crimes Act 1958 s 3A refers to a person who "unintentionally causes the death of another person", it is not necessary for the prosecution to prove that the killing was unintentional (DPP v Perry (2016) 50 VR 686, [42]; c.f. DPP v Hansen [2020] VSCA 307, [67]).

34. As a result, if the elements of the offence are proved the jury may find the accused guilty of statutory murder "irrespective of whether any conclusion can be drawn as to whether the killing was, or was not, intentional" (DPP v Perry (2016) 50 VR 686, [43]).

35. This has overridden earlier decisions which stated that it was an element of the offence that the killing was unintentional (c.f. R v Galas (2007) 18 VR 205; Zaim v R [2011] VSCA 80, [3]).

Statutory murder and complicity

36. The liability of a secondary party for statutory murder is mostly likely to require a court to apply the provisions of ss 323(1)(b) or (d), as subparagraphs (a) and (c) 'seem … to have no sensible application to statutory murder' (DPP v Hansen [2020] VSCA 307, [32]).

37. This means the prosecution will need to show that the accused either intentionally assisted, encouraged or directed the foundational offence, or entered into an agreement, arrangement or understanding with another person to commit the foundational offence, while being aware that it was probable that the secondary offence (statutory murder) would be committed in the course of carrying out the foundational offence (DPP v Hansen [2020] VSCA 307, [33], [39]; Crimes Act 1958 ss 323(1)(b), (d)).

38. Proof that the accused was aware that it was probable that statutory murder would be committed requires the prosecution to show that the accused was aware that it was probable that:
    - An act of violence beyond the scope of the foundational crime would be committed; and
    - That act of violence would cause death (DPP v Hansen [2020] VSCA 307, [43], [46], [47]).
39. The need to prove these matters places a high burden on the prosecution (DPP v Hansen [2020] VSCA 307, [44]).

Statutory murder and murder

40. While statutory murder may loosely be termed an alternative to murder, the fact that they are two pathways to a single offence means that a judge may take a verdict on statutory murder even if the jury cannot agree on its verdict for common law murder (Duca v The Queen [2020] VSCA 209, [41]).
41. The practice in Victoria is that murder and statutory murder are both charged on the indictment, so that the court and the defence are on notice that the prosecution seeks to invoke s 3A (see Duca v The Queen [2020] VSCA 209, [42]–[53]; R v Ng (No 2) [2002] VSC 561, [13]; DPP v Chounlamountry [2016] VSC 509, [47]).
42. While it has not been expressly determined at an appellate level, it appears likely that a jury asked to consider both common law murder and statutory murder cannot return a verdict on either form of murder unless it is unanimous about that verdict for that form of murder (see Duca v The Queen [2020] VSCA 209, [1], [21], [23] and R v Ng (No 2) [2002] VSC 561, [13]. See also R v Walsh (2002) 131 A Crim R 299; R v Leivers and Ballinger [1997] 1 Qd R 649).

Statutory murder and manslaughter

43. There is no principle of law that prevents a judge leaving manslaughter to the jury as an alternative where the accused is charged with statutory murder (R v Galas (2007) 18 VR 205, [66]).
44. It is not necessary that an "unlawful and dangerous act" for the purpose of manslaughter is also a violent act (R v Galas (2007) 18 VR 205, [66]).

7.2.1A.1 Charge: Statutory Murder

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge is designed for cases where murder under Crimes Act 1958 s 3A is left as an alternative to intentional murder. For cases where statutory murder is left as the sole basis of liability, the charge must be adapted.

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of murder.

The prosecution relies on two paths to prove the accused's guilt of murder. I will call the two paths "intentional murder" and "statutory murder".[417] I will first explain the path of "intentional murder" and then I will explain "statutory murder".

[417] If the prosecution has charged statutory murder as a separate charge on the indictment, the judge may add the following: "Intentional murder refers to charge 1 on the indictment, and statutory murder refers to charge 2 on the indictment".

[Insert and adapt directions from Charge: Intentional Murder.]

That is everything to say about "intentional murder". I will now move to "statutory murder".

To prove statutory murder, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – The accused committed an act of violence;

Two – The act of violence caused the victim's death.

Three – The act of violence was committed in the course or furtherance of a serious crime of violence.

Four – The act of violence was conscious, voluntary and deliberate.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Act of violence

The first element the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed an act of violence. There are two parts to this question.

First, the prosecution must prove that the accused [identify relevant act of violence].

Second, you must decide whether [identify relevant act] is an act of violence.

For this purpose, violence is not limited to physical force. It includes threats or conduct designed to put a person in fear, so that they do not resist some conduct or demand.

[Identify how the prosecution and defence put their case on this issue.]

You may only find this element proved if you are satisfied that NOA [insert relevant act] and that this was an act of violence.

Cause of death

The second element the prosecution must prove is that the accused's act of violence caused the victim's death.[418]

The law says you must approach this question in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for NOV's death.

The law also says that for NOA's acts to have caused NOV's death, they do not need to have been the only cause of that result, or the direct or immediate cause. You may find that his/her acts caused the death if they were a substantial or significant cause of that result.

The prosecution say that [identify relevant act of violence] caused NOV's death because [identify relevant prosecution evidence and arguments]. The defence dispute this, and say [identify relevant defence evidence and arguments].

[If the relevant causal act differs between intentional and statutory murder, add the following shaded section.]

You will have noticed that the prosecution relies on different conduct for intentional murder and statutory murder. For intentional murder, the accused's relevant conduct was [refer to relevant causal act for intentional murder]. In contrast, for statutory murder, the relevant conduct was [refer to relevant causal act for statutory murder]. During your deliberations you must keep these two acts separate.

---

[418] If alternative forms of accessorial liability are in issue, this section will have to be modified. See Part 5: Complicity for further information.

You may only find this element proved if you are satisfied that [insert relevant act] caused NOV's death.

Serious crime of violence

The third element the prosecution must prove is that the act of violence was committed in the course or furtherance of a serious crime of violence.

In this case, the prosecution say that the act was committed as part of [identify relevant foundational offence, e.g. "an armed robbery"].

I direct you as a matter of law that [identify relevant foundational offence] is a serious crime of violence.

The question you must consider is whether the act of violence was committed in the course or furtherance of [identify foundational offence].

A person commits [identify foundational offence] when he or she [insert and adapt directions on relevant foundational offence. Directions must explain any area of dispute in law or fact on whether the act was committed in the course or furtherance of that offence].

[Refer to how the prosecution and defence put their case on this element.]

Voluntariness

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused's act of violence was conscious, voluntary and deliberate. These words each have a special meaning in law, which I will briefly explain.

The term "conscious" excludes the acts of an unconscious person, such as a sleepwalker, or a person rolling over in bed.

The term "voluntary" directs you to the requirement that the act which killed the deceased must be a "willed" act, that is, one resulting from the control by the accused of his/her own actions. This excludes the acts of a person operating in one of a number of rare mental states where the mind loses control of the body's actions.

The term "deliberate" excludes accidental acts, such as the consequences of falling over or fumbling an item.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant act of violence, e.g. "pointed the gun to threaten NOV"] s/he did so consciously, voluntarily and deliberately, so you should have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If voluntariness is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case the defence argued that the prosecution has failed to prove that the accused's causal acts were [select term(s), e.g. conscious, voluntary, deliberate].

The defence submitted that these acts were committed [describe and discuss the relevant form of involuntary conduct raised as an issue in the trial, such as accident; reflex acts; physically compelled acts; acts performed in an automatic state.] The prosecution denied that this was the case. [Insert relevant prosecution arguments and/or evidence.]

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was acting consciously, voluntarily and deliberately when s/he committed the acts that you find caused NOV's death. If you are not satisfied that this was the case, then you must find NOA not guilty of murder.

[If the relevant causal act differs between intentional and statutory murder, add the shaded section.]

Remember, the prosecution relies on different conduct for intentional murder and statutory murder. For intentional murder, the accused's relevant conduct was [refer to relevant causal act for intentional murder]. In contrast, for statutory murder, the relevant conduct was [refer to relevant causal act for statutory murder]. When you are deliberating you must keep these two acts separate. You might find that one act was [select relevant term: unconscious, involuntary, not deliberate] and find that the other act was conscious, voluntary and deliberate.

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of statutory murder the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – The accused committed an act of violence;

Two – The act of violence caused the victim's death.

Three – The act of violence was committed in the course or furtherance of a serious crime of violence.

Four – The act of violence was conscious, voluntary and deliberate.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of statutory murder.

Taking verdicts

[The following direction should be given if the prosecution relies on both common law murder and statutory murder.]

In this case there is but one offence of murder alleged. In the indictment it is expressed in two ways:

(1) Murder at common law; and

(2) Statutory murder.

When you are asked for your verdict on the offence of murder you will be asked:

Do you find the accused guilty or not guilty of murder?

If your answer to that question is 'guilty', you will then be asked:

Is your verdict of guilty to murder pursuant to common law or statute?

You will then be asked:

And is that the verdict of you all?

This last question reflects the imperative that, if your verdict is 'guilty of murder', it must be a unanimous verdict of either murder at common law or statutory murder.

7.2.2 Manslaughter by Unlawful and Dangerous Act

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Scope

1. This topic only addresses manslaughter by unlawful and dangerous act. For information concerning other forms of manslaughter, see:

    - 7.2.3 Negligent Manslaughter;
    - 8.12 Provocation;[419] and
    - 8.13 Suicide Pact.

The Elements

2. Manslaughter is a common law offence. One of its forms is manslaughter by an unlawful and dangerous act causing death. This form of manslaughter has the following four elements, each of which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

    i) That the accused committed an act that caused the death of another person;

    ii) That the relevant act was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately;

    iii) That the relevant act was "unlawful"; and

    iv) That the relevant act was "dangerous".

The act caused the victim's death

3. The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed an act that caused the victim's death (R v Stein (2007) 18 VR 376; R v Summers [1990] 1 Qd R 92; Aidid v R (2010) 25 VR 593).

4. For offences committed on or after 1 November 2014, the Crimes Act 1958 s 4A provides that:

    (4) A single punch or strike may be the cause of a person's death even if the injury from which the person dies is not the injury that the punch or strike itself caused to the person's head or neck but another injury resulting from an impact to the person's head or neck, or to another part of the person's body, caused by the punch or strike.

    Example

    If a person punches another person to the head, and that other person falls, hits their head on the road, and dies from the injury resulting from their head hitting the road, the punch may be the cause of their death.

5. Crimes Act 1958 s 4A(4) is not a deeming provision, but recognises that the cause of death, for the purpose of manslaughter, may include injuries sustained as a consequence of the accused's punch or strike. This does not change existing principles of causation.

6. For information concerning causation, see 7.1.2 Causation and 7.2.1 Intentional or Reckless Murder.

[419] While provocation has been abolished as a partial defence to murder (Crimes Act 1958 s 3B), it remains available as a partial defence for offences alleged to have been committed prior to 23 November 2005.

The act was conscious, voluntary and deliberate

7. The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the relevant act was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; R v Haywood [1971] VR 755; R v Winter [2006] VSCA 144; R v Williamson (1996) 67 SASR 428).
8. While the prosecution must prove that the accused acted voluntarily, they do not need to prove that the accused intended to cause death or really serious injury (R v Haywood [1971] VR 755; R v Vollmer [1996] 1 VR 95).
9. For information on this element, see 7.2.1 Intentional or Reckless Murder.

The act was unlawful

10. The third element the prosecution must prove is that the relevant act was 'unlawful'.
11. To be unlawful, the act must have involved a breach of the criminal law (Wilson v R (1992) 174 CLR 313; Pemble v R (1971) 124 CLR 107).
12. However, it seems that not all breaches of the criminal law are classified as "unlawful" for the purpose of this element. Although not clear,[420] it appears that only offences requiring proof of mens rea fall within that category (R v Nguyen(Ruling No 2) [2010] VSC 442).
13. Offences dependent on negligence or gross negligence therefore may not qualify as "unlawful". Deaths resulting from such offences may need to be determined under the principles of Negligent Manslaughter instead (see Boughey v R (1986) 161 CLR 10; Andrews v DPP [1937] AC 576. See also R v Powell [2002] 1 NZLR 666).
14. As acts that give rise to civil liability are not a breach of the criminal law, they are not unlawful for the purpose of this element (R v Lamb [1967] 2 QB 981).
15. While the offence most commonly relied upon to prove unlawfulness is assault, other offences that have been relied upon include attempted assault, attempted robbery, burglary, unlawful administration of drugs and discharging a firearm in a public place (see Withers v R (No 2) [2010] VSCA 151).

Defences

16. An act will not be "unlawful" if the accused had a defence to the relevant offence. The jury will therefore need to consider any relevant defences, such as consent, duress or self-defence (Boughey v R (1986) 161 CLR 10; R v Lamb [1967] 2 QB 981).
17. It should be noted that while consent may ordinarily be available as a defence to the relevant offence (e.g. assault), it may not be available where death occurs. For example, consent is not available as a defence when death occurs during sado-masochistic sexual activities (R v Stein (2007) 18 VR 376; R v Emmett 18/6/1999 Vic CA; R v McIntosh [1999] VSC 358). See 7.4.8 Common Law Assault for further information.
18. Consent will not be available as a defence to a fight that takes place in a public place, if that fight constitutes an affray (see Aidid v R (2010) 25 VR 593).

[420] The outer limits of what is classified as an "unlawful act" are uncertain. In R v Pullman (1991) 25 NSWLR 89, Hunt CJ (Campbell and Newman JJ concurring) held that a breach of a statutory or regulatory prohibition alone is not sufficient to constitute an unlawful act, and the act must be unlawful for some reason other than the breach. However, in R v Borkowski [2009] NSWCCA 102, Simpson J (McClelland CJ at CL and Howie J not deciding) expressed reservations about that distinction, given the need for the act to be both unlawful and dangerous.

19. The fact that consent may not be relevant to a charge of unlawful and dangerous act manslaughter does not mean that it will be irrelevant to a charge of negligent manslaughter (R v Cato [1976] 1 WLR 110).

20. For general information on defences, such as self-defence and duress, see Part 8: Victorian Defences.

Charging the Jury About Unlawfulness

21. In charging the jury about this element, the judge must:

    - Identify the alleged unlawful act; and
    - Instruct the jury on the findings of fact it must make before it may find that act to have been "unlawful" (Pemble v R (1971) 124 CLR 107; Wilson v R (1992) 174 CLR 313).[421]

22. The prosecution must prove all of the elements of the offence that they allege made the accused's act unlawful (e.g. assault). As that includes proving that the accused had the mental state required for that offence (e.g. an intention to apply force), the test for manslaughter is not wholly objective (R v Lamb [1967] 2 QB 981; R v Haywood [1971] VR 755. See also R v Stein (2007) 18 VR 376).

23. The prosecution does not need to prove that the unlawful act was directed against the victim (R v Mitchell [1983] QB 741).

The act was dangerous

24. The fourth element the prosecution must prove is that the relevant act was "dangerous".

25. The test for "dangerousness" is objective. It requires the jury to find that a reasonable person in the position of the accused, performing that act, would have realised that he or she was exposing the deceased to an appreciable risk of serious injury (Wilson v R (1992) 174 CLR 313; R v Holzer [1968] VR 481. See also R v Klamo (2008) 18 VR 644).

26. The test of an appreciable risk of serious injury describes the minimum proof required to establish manslaughter. Proof that the act created a greater risk, such as an appreciable risk of death, does not preclude a finding that the act was dangerous (R v Fragomeli [2008] SASC 96).

27. It is not sufficient for the jury to find that the reasonable person would have realised that the unlawful act was likely to expose the deceased to an appreciable risk of serious injury. They must find that the reasonable person would have realised that he or she was exposing the deceased to such a risk (R v Gould [2009] VSCA 130).

28. The jury does not need to find that the reasonable person would have thought that serious injury was "certain" or "probable". They only need to find that the reasonable person would have realised there was an "appreciable risk" of such injury (R v Holzer [1968] VR 481).

29. For offences committed on or after 1 December 2014, Crimes Act 1958 s 4A contains a deeming provision in relation to certain forms of dangerous conduct. See 'Single punch or strike as dangerous act' below.

"Serious injury"

30. The reasonable person in the position of the accused must have realised that he or she was exposing the deceased to an appreciable risk of "serious injury" (Wilson v R (1992) 174 CLR 313; R v Schaffer (2005) 13 VR 337; R v McCullagh (No 3) [2007] VSCA 293).

[421] As an act will not be "unlawful" if the accused had a defence to the relevant offence, this includes charging the jury about any available defences.

31. "Serious injury" is an ordinary English term. It is for the jury to determine, as a question of fact, whether there was an appreciable risk of "serious" injury, rather than any lesser degree of injury (R v Welsh & Flynn Vic CCA 16/10/1987; R v Ferrari [2002] VSCA 186).

32. The statutory definition of serious injury[422] does not apply to manslaughter, which is a common law offence (R v Vollmer [1996] 1 VR 95).

33. The jury should assess the meaning of the term "serious injury", and the question of whether the accused realised that he or she was exposing the deceased to an appreciable risk of such injury, using logic, common sense and experience (Aidid v R (2010) 25 VR 593).

34. While serious injury may include physical injury caused by shock in response to a frightening experience, an emotional disturbance is not sufficient to constitute a serious injury (R v Dawson (1985) 81 Cr App R 150).

35. As the phrase "serious injury" differs from (but is very similar to) the phrase "death or really serious injury", which is used in the murder context, it is especially important to distinguish between the two phrases when murder and manslaughter are both left to the jury (Wilson v R (1992) 174 CLR 313; R v Schaffer (2005) 13 VR 337; R v McCullagh (No 3) [2007] VSCA 293; DPP v Singleton (2010) 29 VR 351).[423]

36. For further information on the meaning of serious injury, see 7.4.2 Intentionally Causing Serious Injury.

The accused's mental state is not relevant

37. As the test for dangerousness is objective, the prosecution does not need to prove that the accused realised that his or her act was dangerous (R v Holzer [1968] VR 481; Nydam v R [1977] VR 430; R v Stein (2007) 18 VR 376; R v Vollmer [1996] 1 VR 95).

38. In assessing whether the act was dangerous, the jury must not consider the accused's mental state, or any matters that may have affected the accused's reasoning or judgment (R v Wills [1983] 2 VR 201; R v Lavender (2005) 222 CLR 67).[424]

39. This means that the jury must not consider matters such as the accused's emotional state, whether he or she was under the influence of drugs or alcohol at the relevant time, or the accused's subjective, mistaken belief that an action was safe (R v Wills [1983] 2 VR 201; R v Ball [1989] Crim LR 730).

The "reasonable person in the position of the accused"

40. The test for dangerousness requires the jury to consider what risk the reasonable person in the position of the accused would have realised he or she was creating. They must determine how the reasonable person would have assessed the situation as perceived by the accused (R v Cornelissen [2004] NSWCCA 449).

[422] See Crimes Act 1958 s 15.

[423] While the need to avoid the phrase "really serious injury" arises due to the risk of confusion between the tests for murder and manslaughter, the meaning of dangerousness does not vary depending on whether or not manslaughter is left as an alternative to murder. References in R v Lavender (2005) 222 CLR 67 to the test being a risk of "really serious injury" were not intended to change the law from Wilson v R (1992) 174 CLR 313 (DPP v Singleton (2010) 29 VR 351; [2010] VSC 428).

[424] The accused's state of mind may, however, be relevant for certain defences, such as self-defence and emergency (see R v Edwards [2009] SASC 233).

41. In making this determination, the reasonable person should be considered to be the same age as the accused, and to have any specialised knowledge and experience that the accused had (e.g. knowledge of the recommended dosage for medication) (R v Edwards [2008] SASC 303; R v Taylor (1983) 9 A Crim R 358).

42. However, the reasonable person does not share the accused's gender and should not be considered to be suffering from any injuries that affected the accused at the relevant time, such as concussion (Stingel v R (1990) 171 CLR 312; R v Edwards [2008] SASC 303).

43. The reasonable person should not be endowed with greater knowledge of the peculiarities or weaknesses of the victim (e.g. coronary artery disease) than that possessed by the accused at the time of committing the unlawful act, or that the accused acquired in the course of the criminal enterprise (R v Dawson (1985) 81 Cr App R 150; R v Stein (2007) 18 VR 376; R v Watson [1989] 1 WLR 684).

Explaining the meaning of dangerousness to the jury

44. The judge must ordinarily explain the meaning of the term "dangerous" to the jury. Without such an explanation there is a risk that the jury may consider that conduct is dangerous if it creates an appreciable risk of injury, rather than serious injury (Wilson v R (1992) 174 CLR 313).

45. However, there is no need to explain the meaning of "dangerous" if this element is not in dispute (e.g. if the dispute only relates to the identity of the person who performed clearly dangerous acts) (See R v Panozzo [2007] VSCA 245).

46. The judge must make it clear that the purpose of considering whether a reasonable person would have realised that the conduct would create an appreciable risk of serious injury is so that the jury can determine whether the conduct was "dangerous" (R v Zikovic (1985) 17 A Crim R 396).

Single punch or strike as dangerous act

47. Crimes Act 1958 section 4A was introduced by the Sentencing Amendment (Coward's Punch Manslaughter and Other Matters) Act 2014, which commenced operation on 1 November 2014.

48. The section states:

> (1) This section applies to a single punch or strike that–
> (a) is delivered to any part of a person's head or neck; and
> (b) by itself causes an injury to the head or neck.
> (2) A single punch or strike is to be taken to be a dangerous act for the purposes of the law relating to manslaughter by an unlawful and dangerous act.
> (3) For the purposes of subsection (2), it is irrelevant that the single punch or strike is one of a series of punches or strikes.
> ...
> (5) Nothing in this section limits the circumstances in which a punch or strike may be an unlawful and dangerous act for the purposes of the law relating to manslaughter by an unlawful and dangerous act.
> (6) In this section-
> injury has the same meaning as in Subdivision (4);
> strike means a strike delivered with any part of the body.

49. The effect of this provision is that, as a matter of law, a single punch or strike to a person's head or neck and which, by itself, causes injury to the head or neck, is deemed to be a dangerous act.

50. Under subsection (3), the single punch or strike may be one of a series of punches or strikes. Where the prosecution wishes to rely on the deeming provision in subsection (2), it will need to identify a single punch or strike, delivered in the course of the confrontation, which it relies on as the dangerous act. It cannot rely on the cumulative effect of multiple punches or strikes for this purpose.

51. Depending on the issues in the case, the judge may need to leave the question of dangerousness on two bases:

    - If the jury are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the accused's conduct included a punch or strike to the victim's head or neck which caused injury to the head or neck, then that punch or strike is deemed as a matter of law to be a dangerous act;
    - Otherwise, the jury must assess the whole of the accused's conduct to decide whether it is satisfied that the conduct was dangerous.

The Judge Must Identify the Relevant Acts

52. The judge must not leave the jury at large to decide whether the accused committed some unlawful and dangerous act that caused the victim's death. The judge must identify the act[s] the prosecution relies upon to prove the offence (R v Stein (2007) 18 VR 376).

Explain the Difference Between Reckless Murder and Manslaughter

53. Where manslaughter by unlawful and dangerous act is left as an alternative to reckless murder, the judge must clearly explain the difference between:

    - The subjective test for reckless murder, which requires the jury to find that the accused knew that it was probable that death or really serious injury would result from his or her acts; and
    - The objective "dangerousness" test for manslaughter, which requires the jury to find that a reasonable person would have realised that he or she was exposing the deceased to an appreciable risk of serious injury (R v TY (2006) 12 VR 557; R v Barrett (2007) 16 VR 240; Pemble v R (1971) 124 CLR 107 (Barwick CJ)).

54. Failing to provide a clear explanation of the difference may create a risk that the jury will substitute the dangerousness direction for the meaning of recklessness (R v TY (2006) 12 VR 557; R v Barrett (2007) 16 VR 240; Pemble v R (1971) 124 CLR 107 (Barwick CJ)).[425]

55. The judge should warn the jury not to reason that the accused must have been aware that his or her actions would cause death or really serious injury because a reasonable person in the situation of the accused would have appreciated that risk (R v TY (2006) 12 VR 557; R v Barrett (2007) 16 VR 240; Pemble v R (1971) 124 CLR 107 (Barwick CJ)).

Accessorial Liability

56. The ordinary principles of accessorial liability are capable of applying to manslaughter (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473; R v Chai (2002) 187 ALR 436; Markby v R (1978) 140 CLR 108).

[425] The risk of confusion between recklessness and dangerousness is particularly acute where the directions on the two topics are separated by intervening matters, such as evidentiary directions and adjournments (R v TY (2006) 12 VR 557).

57. Where the prosecution relies on the principles of joint criminal enterprise or on a person entering into an agreement, arrangement or understanding contrary to Crimes Act 1958 s 323 to establish unlawful and dangerous act manslaughter, the unlawful and dangerous act must be within the scope of the agreement or understanding. (R v Hartwick, Hartwick& Clayton (2005) 14 VR 125; Gillard v R (2003) 219 CLR 1; R v Chai (2002) 187 ALR 436; R v Andreevski [2010] VSC 568). For more information on the application of these doctrines see Statutory Complicity and Joint Criminal Enterprise.

58. If the prosecution relies on the doctrine of extended common purpose based on the existence of an agreement to commit a lesser offence that is not dangerous, the prosecution must prove that the accused foresaw the possibility that a co-offender would commit the relevant unlawful and dangerous act (R v Hartwick, Hartwick& Clayton (2005) 14 VR 125; R v PDJ (2002) 7 VR 612). For more information on the application of this doctrine, see Extended Common Purpose.[426] For offences committed on or after 1 November 2014, the doctrine of extended common purpose is abolished. The prosecution must instead prove that the accused foresaw the probability that a co-offender would commit the relevant unlawful and dangerous act. See Statutory Complicity.

59. It is possible for a co-offender to be convicted of murder as a principal offender, and the accused to be convicted of manslaughter as an accessory. This will be the case, for example, where:

    - There was an agreement to pursue a criminal enterprise;
    - The unlawful and dangerous act committed by the principal offender (which caused the victim's death) was within the scope of the agreement;
    - The agreement did not comprehend that the unlawful and dangerous act would be committed with an intention to cause death or really serious injury;
    - The principal offender nevertheless committed the act with the intention to cause death or really serious injury; and
    - The accused did not foresee that the principal offender would act with such an intention (R v Nguyen (2010) 242 CLR 491; Gillard v R (2003) 219 CLR 1; R v Makin (2004) 8 VR 262; Woolley v R (1989) 42 A Crim R 418; R v Andreevski [2010] VSC 568).

60. In such cases, the judge must not direct the jury that they may only convict the accused of manslaughter as an accessory if they find the principal offender guilty of manslaughter. The judge must direct the jury that they may convict the principal offender of murder and convict the accused of manslaughter, and explain how this is possible (R v Nguyen (2010) 242 CLR 491).

[426] It was once thought that there was an additional form of manslaughter by concert ("Markby manslaughter"), which applied where a party to an agreement caused the death of the victim by acts which a reasonable person would have realised were a possible consequence of an agreement. It is now understood that this is not an available form of accessorial liability, and that liability for acts that are outside the scope of the agreement depends on the principles of extended common purpose (R v PDJ (2002) 7 VR 612; R v Hartwick, Hartwick & Clayton (2005) 14 VR 125).

Alternative Verdicts

Intentional or reckless murder

61. At common law, a judge must leave manslaughter as an alternative verdict to intentional or reckless murder if there is a "viable" case available on the evidence. Under Part 3 of the Jury Directions Act 2015, this obligation is reduced and the judge must consider whether the parties asked the judge to leave the alternative offence and, if the parties did not ask for the alternative, whether there are substantial and compelling reasons to leave the verdict. See 3.10 Alternative Verdicts.

62. The jury may only return a verdict on manslaughter as an alternative to murder if the jury unanimously agrees that the accused is not guilty of murder. In the event of a disagreement on the verdict for murder, the jury cannot return a verdict of "at least manslaughter" (Stanton v R (2003) 198 ALR 41; Gammage v R (1969) 122 CLR 444; R v McCready [1967] VR 325).

Constructive murder

63. A person commits constructive murder if he or she unintentionally causes the victim's death through an act of violence, in the course or furtherance of a crime the necessary elements of which include violence (Crimes Act 1958 s 3A). See 7.2.1A – Statutory murder.

64. Manslaughter by unlawful and dangerous act may or may not be available as a alternative to constructive murder, depending on the facts of the case (see R v Galas (2007) 18 VR 205; R v Butcher [1986] VR 43).

Negligent manslaughter

65. The prosecution does not need to specify a particular form of manslaughter in a charge. That is a matter for particulars. A single charge of manslaughter may encompass both unlawful and dangerous act manslaughter and negligent manslaughter without raising duplicity issues (see, e.g. R v Cramp (1999) 110 A Crim R 198; R v Isaacs (1997) 47 NSWLR 374).

66. The judge should not direct the jury on both unlawful and dangerous act manslaughter and negligent manslaughter if the issues are relevantly identical and there is a risk that the directions would confuse the jury. Such confusion is particularly likely when the judge leaves manslaughter as an alternative to reckless murder. The judge should generally resolve this situation by directing on one form of manslaughter the jury can understand and apply (R v Windsor [1982] VR 89; R v Edwards [2009] SASC 233).

67. In determining which form(s) of manslaughter to leave to the jury, the judge should consider whether there is a practical prospect of the jury reaching different conclusions on the two forms of manslaughter, and whether omitting a form of manslaughter may prejudice the prosecution or the accused (R v Windsor [1982] VR 89).

Manslaughter as an accessory

68. The obligation to leave a viable case of manslaughter to a jury as an alternative to a charge of murder includes an obligation to instruct the jury on appropriate forms of accessorial liability for manslaughter (R v Makin (2004) 8 VR 262. See also R v Panozzo [2007] VSCA 245; R v Nguyen (2010) 242 CLR 491).

69. Judges must be careful to only leave appropriate forms of accessorial liability to the jury. Leaving an inappropriate form of accessorial liability may deprive the accused of an opportunity of being acquitted of murder and convicted on a form of manslaughter that is reasonably open on the evidence (R v Makin (2004) 8 VR 262. See also R v Panozzo [2007] VSCA 245). See Part 5: Complicity for information concerning the different forms of accessorial liability.

Manslaughter and Unanimity

70. In some cases it may be necessary to direct the jury that they must be unanimous about a particular matter (in addition to being unanimous about whether or not the accused is guilty of manslaughter).

71. In addressing this issue, a distinction is drawn between three types of cases:

    i) Those in which alternative legal bases of liability are proposed by the prosecution;

    ii) Those in which alternative factual bases of liability are proposed by the prosecution; and

    iii) Those in which one offence is charged, but a number of discrete acts are relied upon as proof, any of which would entitle the jury to convict (R v Walsh (2002) 131 A Crim R 299; R v Klamo (2008) 18 VR 644; R v Cramp (1999) 110 A Crim R 198).

72. While a specific unanimity direction will not be required in the first type of case, such a direction will be necessary in the second and third types. For more information on this topic and sample charges, see Unanimous and Majority Verdicts.

Murder, Manslaughter and Self-defence

73. Where manslaughter is left as an alternative to murder and the issue of self-defence arises, the jury may need to consider self-defence separately for each offence. The fact that the jury excludes self-defence as a defence to murder does not invariably mean that they must also exclude it as a defence to manslaughter (R v Bednikov (2000) 95 A Crim R 200; R v Fragomeli [2008] SASC 96).

74. The judge may therefore need to address the issues concerning self-defence that arise in relation to murder and manslaughter separately. In doing so, the judge should bear in mind that:

    - The act which is alleged to have been committed in self-defence may be differently identified depending on whether the charge is murder or manslaughter (e.g. intentionally shooting the victim vs threatening with a weapon).
    - The question of whether the elements of self-defence are met may differ depending on the nature of the relevant act. For example, at common law, a person may have reasonable grounds to believe it is necessary to threaten a person with a weapon, without having reasonable grounds to believe it is necessary to use the weapon (R v Bednikov (2000) 95 A Crim R 200; R v Fragomeli [2008] SASC 96).
    - Similarly, under the current statutory test for self-defence (applicable to offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1 November 2014), threatening a person with a weapon may be a reasonable response to a perceived threat, while using that weapon may not be.
    - Additionally, if the offence is alleged to have been committed on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014, the self-defence test itself will be different for a charge of murder compared to a charge of manslaughter (Crimes Act 1958 ss 9AC, 9AE). See 8.2 Statutory Self-defence (Pre-1/11/14) and Defensive Homicide for more information.
    - If the offence is alleged to have been committed on or after 1 November 2014, a single statutory self-defence provision applies. However, under this provision, self-defence in relation to murder contains an additional element (compared to manslaughter self-defence) that the accused believed that the conduct was necessary to defend against death or really serious injury. See 8.1 Statutory Self-defence (From 1/11/14) for more information;
    - If the offence is alleged to have been committed before 23 November 2005, the common law on self-defence applies. See 8.3 Common Law Self-defence for further information.

7.2.2.1 Charge: Manslaughter by Unlawful and Dangerous Act (Principal Offence)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used if the accused is charged with manslaughter by an unlawful and dangerous act as a principal offender.

The charge will need to be adapted if the charge is based on principles of accessorial liability, or the jury must consider multiple bases of manslaughter.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of manslaughter. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused committed an act that caused the victim's death.

Two –this act was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

Three – this act was unlawful.

Four – this act was dangerous.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[427]

Cause of Death

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed an act that caused the victim's death.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA [identify unlawful act], and that doing so caused NOV's death. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is in issue, add the following shaded section and the relevant additional sections.]

To determine if this element has been proven, you must first determine whether NOA [identify unlawful act]. You must then determine whether that act caused NOV's death.

[If the cause of death is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that [identify unlawful act] caused NOV's death. However, the defence contends that NOA did not commit that act. For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [identify unlawful act].

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

[If cause of death is in issue because of multiple possible causes (whether combined or competing), add the following shaded section.]

[427] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

In this case you have heard evidence that NOV's death [resulted/may have resulted] from a number of [describe basis of uncertainty, e.g. possible, competing, inconsistent etc.] causes. [Insert relevant evidence and causal explanations.]

The law says that for NOA's acts to have caused NOV's death, they do not need to have been the only cause of that result, or the direct or immediate cause. You may find that his/her acts caused the death if they were a substantial or significant cause of that result.

You should approach this question in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

[If this element is in issue for another reason (e.g. there may have been an intervening act or the victim's own acts could have caused his or her own death) insert appropriately adapted sections from 7.2.1.1 Charge: Intentional Murder here.]

Voluntariness

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed the relevant act consciously, voluntarily and deliberately. These words each have a special meaning in law, which I will briefly explain.

The requirement that the relevant act was committed "consciously" means that this element will not be satisfied if that act was done by an unconscious person, such as a sleepwalker, or a person rolling over in bed.

The requirement that the act was committed "voluntarily" means that this element will not be satisfied if the act was not "willed". For this element to be met, the act must have resulted from the accused's control of his/her own actions. This element will therefore not be satisfied if the accused acted while operating in one of a number of rare mental states where the mind loses control of the body's actions.

The requirement that the act was committed "deliberately" means that this element will not be satisfied if the act was accidental. For example, an act which results from falling over or fumbling an item is not "deliberate".

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe alleged unlawful act, e.g. "punched NOV"] s/he did so consciously, voluntarily and deliberately, so you should have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If voluntariness is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case the defence argued[428] that the prosecution has failed to prove that [identify alleged unlawful act] was [select term(s), e.g. conscious, voluntary, deliberate].

The defence submitted that that act was committed [describe and discuss the relevant form of involuntary conduct raised as an issue in the trial, such as accident; reflex acts; physically compelled acts; acts performed in an automatic state]. The prosecution denied that this was the case. [Summarise relevant prosecution arguments and/or evidence.]

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was acting consciously, voluntarily and deliberately when s/he committed the relevant act. If you are not satisfied that that was the case, then you must find NOA not guilty of manslaughter.

Unlawful Act

The third element the prosecution must prove is that the relevant act was unlawful. That is, the prosecution must prove that NOA's act that caused NOV's death breached the criminal law and was committed without lawful excuse.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the relevant act is [identify relevant act, e.g. "punching NOV"]. It is not disputed that such an act is unlawful. That means that, if you find that NOA [describe relevant act, e.g. "punched NOV"], you should have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the relevant act is [identify relevant act, e.g. "punching NOV"].[429] The prosecution alleged that by doing so, NOA committed the crime of [identify alleged crime, e.g. "assault"].

To prove that NOA committed the crime of [identify alleged crime] – and so to prove that NOA committed an "unlawful" act – the prosecution must prove [instruct jury on all elements of the relevant offence,[430] including the mental elements].

[If any defences are in issue, insert any relevant directions here.]

[Summarise prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Dangerousness

The fourth element the prosecution must prove is that the alleged unlawful act was dangerous.

[If the prosecution relies on the conduct being deemed dangerous under Crimes Act 1958 s 4A, add the following shaded section.]

I direct you that, if you are satisfied that NOA's relevant act was a single punch or strike to the head or neck which, by itself, caused injury to the head or neck, then as a matter of law, that act is dangerous and this fourth element is proved.

For this purpose, the law defines an injury to the head or neck as a physical injury or harm to mental health, whether temporary or permanent[431]

[If the prosecution relies on the conduct being dangerous at common law, add the following shaded section.]

[If the prosecution relies on both deemed dangerousness and common law dangerousness, add the following shaded

---

[429] If there are multiple acts of the accused that may have caused the victim's death, this element must be modified to require the jury to consider the unlawfulness of the act they found to be a cause of the victim's death.

[430] Although not clear, it seems that only mens rea offences can fulfil the 'unlawfulness' criteria. See 7.2.2 Manslaughter by Unlawful and Dangerous Act for further information.

[431] In cases where the meaning of injury and its operation in the case is not in issue, the judge will need to consider whether to give this definition of injury.

section.]

If you are not satisfied that NOA's relevant act was a single punch or strike which, by itself, caused injury to NOV's head or neck, then you must determine whether his/her conduct was dangerous in accordance with the following directions.

The word "dangerous" has a technical legal meaning. An act is dangerous if a reasonable person, in the position of the accused, would have realised that s/he was exposing the victim to an appreciable risk of serious injury.

This is an objective test. That means that the prosecution does not need to establish that NOA realised that what s/he was doing was dangerous. What matters is what a reasonable person of ordinary strength of mind in his/her situation would have realised.[432] If a reasonable person in that situation would have realised that s/he was exposing the victim to an appreciable risk of serious injury, then this element will be satisfied.

[In cases where the degree of injury was unexpected, add the following shaded section.]

It is not sufficient for you to find that the reasonable person in the position of the accused would have realised s/he was exposing the victim to an appreciable risk of injury. In this context, there are two levels of harm known to the law: "injury" and "serious injury". There are no other classes such as "very serious injury" or "minor injury" or anything else.

You may consider that there is a spectrum of injuries. At one end are trivial injuries like a paper cut or a grazed knee. At the other end of the spectrum are life–threatening injuries or permanent brain damage and the like.

The phrase "serious injury" is not a technical legal phrase. These are ordinary English words, and it is for you to determine what this phrase means to you as jurors. It is for you to determine, using your common sense and experience, whether the reasonable person in the position of the accused would have realised that [describe act] exposed NOV to an appreciable risk of serious injury. An appreciable risk of injury is not sufficient.

The prosecution argued that this element is satisfied because [summarise relevant prosecution evidence and arguments]. In response, the defence say [summarise relevant defence evidence and arguments]. It is for you to determine whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused's acts were dangerous, in the way that I have described. If they have, then this fourth element will be met.

Relate Law to the Evidence

[If not previously done, summarise the evidence and relate the law to the evidence.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of manslaughter the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA committed an act that caused NOV's death; and

Two – that this act was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately; and

---

[432] If the reasonable person must be imbued with particular knowledge or characteristics of the accused, add "In this case, the reasonable person is [describe relevant facts or attributes which apply to the reasonable person]."

Three – that this act was unlawful; and Four – that this act was dangerous.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of manslaughter.

7.2.2.2 Charge: Manslaughter by Unlawful and Dangerous Act (Alternative to Murder)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used if manslaughter by unlawful and dangerous act is left as an alternative to murder, and the accused is alleged to be the principal offender.

The charge will need to be adapted if the charge is based on principles of accessorial liability, or the jury must consider multiple bases of manslaughter.

Manslaughter

I must also direct you about the alternative offence of manslaughter. This is an alternative to the offence of murder. That means that you will only be asked to return a verdict on this offence if you are not satisfied that the prosecution has proved the offence of murder beyond reasonable doubt. If you decide that NOA is guilty of murder, then you do not need to deliver a verdict on this alternative.

To prove the offence of manslaughter, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused committed an act that caused the victim's death.

Two –this act was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

Three – this act was unlawful.

Four – this act was dangerous.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[433]

Cause of Death

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed an act that caused the victim's death. This is the same as the first element for murder.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA [identify unlawful act], and that doing so caused NOV's death. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is in issue, add the following shaded section and the relevant additional section.]

To determine if this element has been proven, you must first determine whether NOA [identify unlawful act]. You must then determine whether that act caused NOV's death.

---

[433] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[If the cause of death is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that [identify unlawful act] caused NOV's death. However, the defence contends that NOA did not commit that act. For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [identify unlawful act].

[Summarise relevant evidence and arguments.]

[If cause of death is in issue because of multiple possible causes (whether combined or competing), add the following shaded section.]

In this case you have heard evidence that NOV's death [resulted/may have resulted] from a number of [describe basis of uncertainty, e.g. possible, competing, inconsistent etc.] causes. [Insert relevant evidence and causal explanations.]

The law says that for NOA's acts to have caused NOV's death, they do not need to have been the only cause of that result, or the direct or immediate cause. You may find that his/her acts caused the death if they were a substantial or significant cause of that result.

You should approach this question in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

[If this element is in issue for another reason (e.g. there may have been an intervening act or the victim's own acts could have caused his or her own death) insert appropriately adapted sections from 7.2.1.1 Charge: Intentional Murder here.]

Voluntariness

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused committed the relevant act consciously, voluntarily and deliberately. This is the same as the second element for murder. I have already explained the legal meaning of these terms.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe alleged unlawful act, e.g. "punched NOV"] s/he did so consciously, voluntarily and deliberately, so you should have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If voluntariness is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case the defence argued[434] that the prosecution has failed to prove that [identify alleged unlawful act] was [select term(s), e.g. conscious, voluntary, deliberate].

The defence submitted that that act was committed [describe and discuss the relevant form of involuntary conduct raised as an issue in the trial, such as accident; reflex acts; physically compelled acts; acts performed in an automatic state]. The prosecution denied that this was the case. [Summarise relevant prosecution arguments and/or evidence.]

[If the act on which the jury must focus differs from that in relation to murder, add the following shaded section.]

While this element is the same as the second element of murder, the act you must examine is different. For murder, the prosecution argued that [describe relevant act for murder] was conscious, voluntary and deliberate. In contrast, for the offence of manslaughter, you must determine whether [describe relevant act for manslaughter] was conscious, voluntary and deliberate. That is a different act and therefore your findings on this element may be different.

---

[434] If the defence did not raise the issue of voluntariness, but it arises on the evidence, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was acting consciously, voluntarily and deliberately when s/he committed the relevant act. If you are not satisfied that that was the case, then you must find NOA not guilty of manslaughter.

Unlawful Act

The third element the prosecution must prove is that the relevant act was unlawful. That is, the prosecution must prove that NOA's act that caused NOV's death breached the criminal law and was committed without lawful excuse.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the relevant act is [identify relevant act, e.g. "punching NOV"]. It is not disputed that such an act is unlawful. That means that, if you find that NOA [describe relevant act, e.g. "punched NOV"], you should have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the relevant act is [identify relevant act, e.g. "punching NOV"].[435] The prosecution alleged that by doing so, NOA committed the crime of [identify alleged crime, e.g. "assault"].

To prove that NOA committed the crime of [identify alleged crime] – and so to prove that NOA committed an "unlawful" act – the prosecution must prove [instruct jury on all elements of the relevant offence,[436] including the mental elements].

[If any defences are in issue, insert any relevant directions here and explain any differences between the defences for murder and manslaughter.]

[Summarise prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Dangerousness

The fourth element the prosecution must prove is that the alleged unlawful act was dangerous.

[If the prosecution relies on the conduct being deemed dangerous under Crimes Act 1958 s 4A, add the following shaded section.]

I direct you that, if you are satisfied that NOA's relevant act was a single punch or strike to the head or neck which, by itself, caused injury to the head or neck, then as a matter of law, that act is dangerous and this fourth element is proved.

For this purpose, the law defines an injury to the head or neck as a physical injury or harm to mental

[435] If there are multiple acts of the accused that may have caused the victim's death, this element must be modified to require the jury to consider the unlawfulness of the act they found to be a cause of the victim's death.

[436] Although not clear, it seems that only mens rea offences can fulfil the 'unlawfulness' criteria. See 7.2.2 Manslaughter by Unlawful and Dangerous Act for further information.

health, whether temporary or permanent.[437]

[If the prosecution relies on the conduct being dangerous at common law, add the following shaded section.]

[If the prosecution relies on both deemed dangerousness and common law dangerousness, add the following shaded section.]

If you are not satisfied that NOA's relevant act was a single punch or strike which, by itself, caused injury to NOV's head or neck, then you must determine whether his/her conduct was dangerous in accordance with the following directions.

The word "dangerous" has a technical legal meaning. An act is dangerous if a reasonable person, in the position of the accused, would have realised that s/he was exposing the victim to an appreciable risk of serious injury.

This is an objective test. That means that the prosecution does not need to establish that NOA realised that what s/he was doing was dangerous. What matters is what a reasonable person of ordinary strength of mind in his/her situation would have realised.[438] If a reasonable person in that situation would have realised that s/he was exposing the victim to an appreciable risk of serious injury, then this element will be satisfied.

[If the jury have been directed on reckless murder, explain the difference between recklessness and dangerousness]

When I say "serious injury", I am not using a technical legal phrase. These are ordinary English words, and it is for you to determine what this phrase means to you as jurors. I note, however, that it is a lower level of harm than is required for the third element of murder, where the prosecution must establish that the accused intended to cause death or really serious injury.[439]

[If there is an issue about the difference between injury and serious injury, adapt the direction on the meaning of "serious injury" from 7.4.2.1 Charge: Intentionally Causing Serious Injury (From 1/7/13).]

The prosecution argued that this element is satisfied because [summarise relevant prosecution evidence and arguments]. In response, the defence say [summarise relevant defence evidence and arguments].

It is for you to determine whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused's acts were dangerous, in the way that I have described. If they have, then this fourth element will be met.

Relate Law to the Evidence

[If not previously done, summarise the evidence and relate the law to the evidence.]

[437] In cases where the meaning of injury and its operation in the case is not in issue, the judge will need to consider whether to give this definition of injury.

[438] If the reasonable person must be imbued with particular knowledge or characteristics of the accused, add "In this case, the reasonable person is [describe relevant facts or attributes which apply to the reasonable person]."

[439] If reckless murder has been left to the jury, add "or knew that his/her acts would probably cause such harm".

Summary

To summarise, if you unanimously agree that NOA is not guilty of murder, then you will be asked to return a verdict on the offence of manslaughter. Before you can find NOA guilty of manslaughter the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA committed an act that caused NOV's death; and

Two – that that act was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately; and

Three – that that act was unlawful; and Four – that that act was dangerous.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of manslaughter.

7.2.2.3 Checklist: Manslaughter by Unlawful and Dangerous Act

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adapatation

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused committed an act that caused the victim's death ('the relevant act'); and
2. The accused committed the relevant act consciously, voluntarily and deliberately; and
3. The relevant act was unlawful; and
4. The relevant act was dangerous.

Causation

1. Did the accused commit the act that caused the victim's death?

*Consider – Was the accused's act a substantial or significant cause of the victim's death?

If Yes, then go to 2.

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

Conscious, Voluntary and Deliberate

2. Did the accused commit the relevant act consciously, voluntarily and deliberately?

If Yes, then go to 3.

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

Unlawful Act

3. Was the relevant act unlawful?

Consider – Has the prosecution proved all the elements of [insert offence]?

If Yes, then go to 4.

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

Dangerous

4. Was the relevant act dangerous?

Consider – "Dangerous" means that a reasonable person in the position of the accused, performing that act, would have realised that he or she was exposing the victim to an appreciable risk of serious injury.

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Manslaughter (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2 and 3).

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Manslaughter

7.2.3 Negligent Manslaughter

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Scope

1. This topic only addresses negligent manslaughter. For information concerning other forms of manslaughter, see:
    - 7.2.2 Manslaughter by Unlawful and Dangerous Act;
    - 8.12 Provocation;[440]
    - 8.13 Suicide Pact.

The Elements

2. Manslaughter is a common law offence. One form of manslaughter is by criminal negligence. This form of manslaughter has the following four elements, each of which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:
    i) The accused owed the victim a duty of care;
    ii) The accused breached that duty by criminal negligence;
    iii) The act which breached the duty of care was committed consciously and voluntarily;
    iv) The accused's breach of the duty caused the victim's death (R v Sood (Ruling No 3) [2006] NSWSC 762).
3. The prosecution does not need to establish any element of malice to prove negligent manslaughter (R v Lavender (2005) 222 CLR 67).

[440] While provocation has been abolished as a partial defence to murder (Crimes Act 1958 s 3B), it remains available as a partial defence for offences alleged to have been committed prior to 23 November 2005.

4. The prosecution does not need to establish that the accused's actions were unlawful. This is one of the differences between negligent manslaughter and unlawful and dangerous act manslaughter (Wilson v R (1992) 174 CLR 313).

The accused owed a duty of care

5. The first element the prosecution must prove is that the accused owed the victim a duty of care (Nydam v R [1977] VR 430).
6. Only a legal duty of care can give rise to liability for manslaughter. Moral duties, such as the obligation to help a stranger in distress or inform emergency services about a fire, are not relevant for this offence (R v Taktak (1988) 14 NSWLR 226).

When Does the Accused Owe a Duty of Care?

Duty to Avoid Harming Others

7. The common law imposes a general duty on all people who are doing a dangerous act, or who have charge of anything dangerous, to take ordinary precautions to avoid harming other people (see R v Doherty (1887) 16 Cox CC 306; Callaghan v R (1952) 87 CLR 115).

Duty to Act (Omissions)

8. While the accused has a duty to take care to avoid committing harmful actions, he or she will generally not have a legal duty to act in a particular manner. For example, he or she would usually not be legally required to rescue a stranger who is in danger (R v Rao [1999] ACTSC 132).
9. However, there are a number of broad reasons why the accused may have a duty to act in a certain way:

    i) Due to his or her relationship with the victim (including any contractual relationship);[441]

    ii) Due to a statutory obligation;

    iii) Due to the accused voluntarily assuming a duty to act; or

    iv) Due to the accused wrongfully placing a person in danger (Jones v United States of America 308 F 2d 307 (1962); R v Taktak (1988) 14 NSWLR 226; R v Reid (2010) 29 VR 446).[442]

Relationship duties

10. The accused may have a duty to act in a certain way due to his or her relationship with the victim. For example:

    - A person standing in loco parentis of an infant or child owes a duty to protect the infant or child and provide adequate food, shelter, warmth and medical care. This includes a duty to intervene to stop acts of violence against the infant or child (R v Clarke & Wilton [1959] VR 645; R v Taktak (1988) 14 NSWLR 226; R v Nicholls (1874) 13 Cox CC 75; H Ltd v J (2010) 107 SASR 352; Reynolds & Melville v R [2008] NTSC 30; R v Russell (1933) VLR 59).

[441] Where the relationship arises out of a contract, see Cittadini v R [2009] NSWCCA 302; R v Instan [1893] 1 QB 450; R v Marriott (1838) 8 C & P 425.

[442] In some cases, failure to comply with a duty to act may found liability for murder (e.g. where the accused intended, by his or her failure, to kill or really seriously injure the victim) (see R v Taber (2002) 56 NSWLR 443; R v Phillips (1971) 45 ALJR 467; R v Gibbons & Proctor (1918) 13 Cr App R 134).

- Those who live together as domestic partners (including husbands, wives and de facto partners) owe each other a duty to provide care if the other person is left helpless or unable to care for himself or herself due to injury or illness (R v Reid (2010) 29 VR 446).
- Where there is a relationship of protector and protected, and the protector knows that the protected person is in peril, the protector must take steps to rescue the protected person. However, the protector does not need to jeopardise his or her own life (People v Beardsley (1907) 113 NW 1128, quoted in R v Taktak (1988) 14 NSWLR 226).
- A person who has imprisoned or otherwise rendered a person helpless (e.g. a prison warden) is under a duty of care towards that person (R v Shepherd (1862) Le & Ca 147).

Statutory duties

11. Parliament may create a duty of care to take certain acts or avoid specified omissions. The range of possible statutory duties is beyond the scope of this topic.

Voluntarily assumed duties

12. The accused may voluntarily assume a duty to care for a person who is helpless or otherwise unable to care for himself or herself due to age or infirmity. In such circumstances the accused must provide competent care (R v Stone & Dobinson [1977] QB 354; R v Taktak (1988) 14 NSWLR 226; R v Hall [1999] NSWSC 738; H Ltd v J (2010) 107 SASR 352).
13. Before a voluntarily assumed duty of care will arise, the prosecution must prove that the accused isolated the victim in such a way that others could not render assistance. It is not necessary, however, to prove that the victim was isolated for the purpose of preventing others from assisting (see R v Stone & Dobinson [1977] QB 354; R v Taktak (1988) 14 NSWLR 226; R v Rao [1999] ACTSC 132. But c.f. R v Hall [1999] NSWSC 738; R v Burns [2009] NSWDC 232).
14. A duty may be assumed by making some efforts to care for the person, such as providing meals, or making ineffectual attempts to obtain medical assistance (see R v Stone & Dobinson [1977] QB 354).

Wrongful Creation of Danger

15. If the accused deliberately commits a wrongful act that places another person in danger, he or she owes that person a duty to take reasonable steps to render assistance and redress the danger (R v Reid (2010) 29 VR 446; R v Lawford (1993) 61 SASR 542; R v Taber (2002) 56 NSWLR 443; R v Phillips (1971) 45 ALJR 467).

Content of the Duty of Care

16. It can be seen from the sections above that the content of the duty of care is defined by the circumstances. For example:
    - The duty a parent owes a child is to protect him or her, and to provide adequate food, shelter and warmth;
    - The duty owed by a person who creates a danger is to take reasonable steps to redress the danger.
17. Where the accused is a member of a profession requiring particular skill or knowledge (such as a doctor), he or she owes a duty to exercise the skill of a reasonably competent member of that profession. He or she is not required to perform at the level expected of the most skilled member of that profession (R v Bateman (1925) 19 Cr App R 8; R v Adomako [1995] 1 AC 171).

The accused breached the duty by criminal negligence

18. The second element the prosecution must prove is that the accused breached the duty of care by criminal negligence (Nydam v R [1977] VR 430; R v Osip (2000) 2 VR 595; Wilson v R (1992) 174 CLR 313).

19. This requires the accused's act or omission to have fallen so far below the standard of care a reasonable person would have exercised, and to have involved such a high risk of death or really serious injury, that the act or omission merits criminal punishment (R v Lavender (2005) 222 CLR 67; Wilson v R (1992) 174 CLR 313; Andrews v DPP [1937] AC 576; R v Bateman (1925) 19 Cr App R 8; R v A C Hatrick Chemicals (1995) 152 A Crim R 384; R v Richards & Gregory [1998] 2 VR 1).

20. This is the same degree of negligence required to establish negligently causing serious injury (R v Shields [1981] VR 717; R v De'Zilwa (2002) 5 VR 408). For the offence of culpable driving by gross negligence to be committed, a jury does not need to consider whether an accused's act or omission merits criminal punishment (Bouch v R [2017] VSCA 86).

21. Whether this means that the degree of negligence required to establish that offence differs from that required to establish the offence of manslaughter by criminal negligence or negligently causing serious injury is not clear. Where relevant, judges should seek submissions from parties as to whether the degree of negligence required for each of these offences differs.

22. The test for criminal negligence imports a community standard, which determines whether the breach was sufficiently severe to warrant criminal punishment (R v Mitchell [2005] VSCA 304).

23. Negligence that would support civil liability (i.e., that the accused fell short of the standard of care that would have been taken by a reasonable person in the circumstances) is not sufficient to establish criminal negligence. The prosecution must establish such a high degree of negligence, involving disregard for the life and safety of others, as to amount to a crime and be deserving of punishment (Nydam v R [1977] VR 430; Andrews v DPP [1937] AC 576; R v Bateman (1925) 19 Cr App R 8; Cittadini v R [2009] NSWCCA 302; R v Wright [1999] 3 VR 355).

24. A "significant departure" from the standard of care required is not sufficient. Judges should ensure that their directions do not lower the degree of negligence required (see R v De'Zilwa (2002) 5 VR 408).

25. While a test of liability that requires proof that the act or omission merits criminal punishment involves a degree of circularity, the question is one of degree that cannot be defined more precisely (R v Adomako [1995] 1 AC 171).

26. The nature of the duty of care may be relevant when determining the seriousness of any breach. For example, where the duty arises because of the accused's deliberate wrongful conduct (e.g. where the accused injured the victim), the accused's obligation to remedy the danger created may be quite strict (e.g. he or she may be required to secure medical attention, even if the victim initially refuses). A failure to act accordingly may be viewed as a serious breach (see R v Reid (2010) 29 VR 446).

27. In directing the jury on the degree of negligence required, a comparison between civil and criminal negligence is often helpful (R v Shields [1981] VR 717).

Objective nature of criminal negligence

28. The test for criminal negligence is objective. The jury must compare the acts or omissions of the accused against the behaviour expected of a hypothetical reasonable person in the situation of the accused (R v Richards & Gregory [1998] 2 VR 1; R v Lavender (2005) 222 CLR 67; R v Sam [2009] NSWSC 803).

29. The element will only be met if a reasonable person would have realised that the accused's acts or omissions created a high risk of death or really serious injury (R v Richards & Gregory [1998] 2 VR 1; R v Lavender (2005) 222 CLR 67; R v Sam [2009] NSWSC 803).

30. As the test for negligence is objective, the prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to cause death or really serious injury, or that the accused knew that his or her conduct would likely cause death or really serious injury. Those states of mind would establish murder (R v Lavender (2005) 222 CLR 67; Nydam v R [1977] VR 430; R v Sam [2009] NSWSC 803).

31. The accused's belief or opinion about whether he or she was in breach of the duty of care is not relevant. The jury must make its own assessment of whether the acts or omissions were negligent, based on the information available to a reasonable person in the position of the accused at the time of the events in question (R v Lavender (2005) 222 CLR 67; R v Reid (2010) 29 VR 446; R v Taylor (1983) 9 A Crim R 358).[443]

32. It does not matter whether or not the accused was capable of meeting the relevant standard. Matters such as the accused's inability to meet the standard, or deficiencies in the accused's reasoning processes, are relevant only to sentencing (R v Richards & Gregory [1998] 2 VR 1).

33. In some cases, common practice within a field may be relevant to determining whether the accused breached the standard of care by acting in the way that he or she did. However, there are occasions when common industrial practice is negligent (see Dovuro Pty Ltd v Wilkins (2003) 215 CLR 317; Cittadini v R [2009] NSWCCA 302).

The reasonable person in the position of the accused

34. The test for criminal negligence requires the jury to determine how the reasonable person of ordinary fortitude and strength of mind, in the position of the accused, would have acted in the circumstances. In making this determination, the reasonable person should be considered to be the same age as the accused, and to have any specialised knowledge and experience that the accused had (R v Edwards [2008] SASC 303; R v Taylor (1983) 9 A Crim R 358; R v Sam [2009] NSWSC 803; R v Lavender (2005) 222 CLR 67).

35. However, the reasonable person should not be considered to have any of the accused's deficiencies in reasoning capabilities, or to have been suffering from any injuries that affected the accused's reasoning processes at the relevant time, such as concussion (R v Edwards [2008] SASC 303).

36. The reasonable person also does not share the accused's beliefs, values or attitudes (R v Sam [2009] NSWSC 803).

Guard against risks of hindsight

37. The mere fact that a person to whom the accused owed a duty of care died does not mean the accused must have been criminally negligent. A duty of care to avoid a particular risk is not a duty to ensure that the risk does not eventuate (Cittadini v R [2009] NSWCCA 302; Gordon v Ross [2006] NSWCA 157; R v Smith [2006] VSCA 92).

38. It is therefore important to ensure that the jury does not reason that the accused must have been criminally negligent because otherwise the event in question would not have occurred. The jury should take care not to use the benefits of hindsight when determining the degree of negligence (see Cittadini v R [2009] NSWCCA 302; Gordon v Ross [2006] NSWCA 157; R v Smith [2006] VSCA 92).

Negligence and recklessness

39. The difference between negligent manslaughter and reckless murder lies in the state of mind of the accused and the degree of foresight regarding the consequences of his or her actions, rather than in the degree of carelessness (Pemble v R (1971) 124 CLR 107 (Menzies J)).

40. While, in ordinary language, the type of behaviour necessary to meet the test of criminal negligence might be described as "reckless", judges should avoid using that term because of the risk of confusion that arises from the meaning of recklessness in the law (R v Adomako [1995] 1 AC 171; La Fontaine v R (1976) 136 CLR 62 (Gibbs J)).

[443] However, the accused's subjective beliefs may be relevant for certain defences, such as self-defence and emergency (see R v Edwards [2009] SASC 233).

The relevant act was voluntary

41. The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the act which breached the duty of care was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; R v Haywood [1971] VR 755; R v Winter [2006] VSCA 144; R v Williamson (1996) 67 SASR 428).

42. While the prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to cause death, they must still prove that the relevant act was committed consciously and voluntarily (R v Haywood [1971] VR 755; R v Vollmer [1996] 1 VR 95).

43. While the law predominantly focuses on the need for an act to be voluntary, there may be cases where the defence argues that an omission is involuntary. In such cases, the judge may need to direct the jury on the need to prove that the omission was conscious, voluntary and deliberate. Alternatively, the judge may identify an act within the omission and may instruct the jury to consider whether the accused committed that act consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

44. For further information on voluntariness, see 7.2.1 Intentional or Reckless Murder.

The breach of the duty of care caused the victim's death

45. The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the breach of the duty of care caused the victim's death (R v Adomako [1995] 1 AC 171; Cittadini v R [2009] NSWCCA 302).

46. As the prosecution must prove that it was the accused's criminal breach of the duty of care that caused the death, it is important that the judge precisely identify the act or omission alleged to have caused the victim's death (Cittadini v R [2009] NSWCCA 302; Justins v R (2010) 79 NSWLR 544).

47. Where the evidence reveals more than one possible breach of duty, the judge must decide, based on the factual circumstances, whether the separate breaches may be aggregated into a single breach for the purposes of causation (R v Pace & Conduit (Ruling No 2) [2008] VSC 308).

48. For further information about causation, see 7.1.2 Causation and 7.2.1 Intentional or Reckless Murder.

Defences

49. The prosecution must disprove any relevant defences, including self-defence, duress and emergency (R v Edwards [2009] SASC 233. See also Crimes Act 1958 ss 9AE, 9AG, 9AI).

50. Civil law principles relating to contributory negligence, consent and voluntary assumption of risk do not provide a defence to a charge of negligent manslaughter. The jury may, however, take the victim's conduct into account when determining whether the second element has been met (i.e., whether the accused acted with criminal negligence) (R v Cato [1976] 1 WLR 110; R v Edwards [2008] SASC 303. But c.f. R v Fleeting [No 1] [1977] 1 NZLR 343; R v Storey [1931] NZLR 417; R v Jones [1870] 11 Cox CC 544).

51. In some cases the accused will allege that he or she had an honest and reasonable belief in a set of facts which, if true, would have rendered the conduct innocent. In such cases, the prosecution does not need to disprove this allegation. The issue of an accused's honest and reasonable mistake of fact should be considered as part of the second element (i.e., as part of the jury's determination of whether the accused's acts or omissions were criminally negligent) (R v Osip (2000) 2 VR 595; R v Lavender (2005) 222 CLR 67).

52. Where manslaughter is left as an alternative to murder and the issue of self-defence arises, the jury may need to consider self-defence separately for each offence. The fact that the jury excludes self-defence as a defence to murder does not invariably mean that they must also exclude it as a defence to manslaughter.

53. The judge may therefore need to address the issues concerning self-defence that arise in relation to murder and manslaughter separately. See 8.1 Statutory Self-defence (From 1/11/14), 8.2 Statutory Self-defence (Pre-1/11/14) and Defensive Homicide and 8.3 Common Law Self-defence for further information.

Accessorial Liability

54. The ordinary principles of accessorial liability are capable of applying to manslaughter (Giorgianni v R (1985) 156 CLR 473; R v Chai (2002) 187 ALR 436; Markby v R (1978) 140 CLR 108). See Part 5: Complicity for information concerning these principles.

Alternative Verdicts

Intentional or reckless murder

55. A judge must leave manslaughter as an alternative verdict to intentional or reckless murder if there is a "viable" case available on the evidence. See 3.10 Alternative Verdicts.

56. The jury may only return a verdict on manslaughter as an alternative to murder if it unanimously agrees that the accused is not guilty of murder. In the event of a disagreement on the verdict for murder, the jury cannot return a verdict of "at least manslaughter" (Stanton v R (2003) 198 ALR 41; Gammage v R (1969) 122 CLR 444; R v McCready [1967] VR 325).

Unlawful and dangerous act manslaughter

57. The prosecution does not need to specify a particular form of manslaughter in a charge. That is a matter for particulars. A single charge of manslaughter may encompass both unlawful and dangerous act manslaughter and negligent manslaughter without raising duplicity issues (see, e.g. R v Cramp (1999) 110 A Crim R 198; R v Isaacs (1997) 47 NSWLR 374).

58. The judge should not direct the jury on both unlawful and dangerous act manslaughter and negligent manslaughter if the issues are relevantly identical and there is a risk that the directions would confuse the jury. Such confusion is particularly likely when the judge leaves manslaughter as an alternative to reckless murder. The judge should generally resolve this situation by directing on one form of manslaughter the jury can understand and apply (R v Windsor [1982] VR 89; R v Edwards [2009] SASC 233).

59. In determining which form(s) of manslaughter to leave to the jury, the judge should consider whether there is a practical prospect of the jury reaching different conclusions on the two forms of manslaughter, and whether omitting a form of manslaughter may prejudice the prosecution or the accused (R v Windsor [1982] VR 89).

Manslaughter as an accessory

60. The obligation to leave a viable case of manslaughter to a jury as an alternative to a charge of murder includes an obligation to instruct the jury on appropriate forms of accessorial liability for manslaughter (R v Makin (2004) 8 VR 262. See also R v Panozzo [2007] VSCA 245; R v Nguyen (2010) 242 CLR 491).

61. Judges must be careful to only leave appropriate forms of accessorial liability to the jury. Leaving an inappropriate form of accessorial liability may deprive the accused of an opportunity of being acquitted of murder and convicted on a form of manslaughter that is reasonably open on the evidence (R v Makin (2004) 8 VR 262. See also R v Panozzo [2007] VSCA 245). See Part 5: Complicity for information concerning the different forms of accessorial liability.

Manslaughter and Unanimity

62. In some cases it may be necessary to direct the jury that they must be unanimous about a particular matter (in addition to being unanimous about whether or not the accused is guilty of manslaughter).

63. In addressing this issue, a distinction is drawn between three types of cases:

    i) Those in which alternative legal bases of liability are proposed by the prosecution;

    ii) Those in which alternative factual bases of liability are proposed by the prosecution; and

    iii) Those in which one offence is charged, but a number of discrete acts are relied upon as proof, any of which would entitle the jury to convict (R v Walsh (2002) 131 A Crim R 299; R v Klamo (2008) 18 VR 644; R v Cramp (1999) 110 A Crim R 198).

64. While a specific unanimity direction will not be required in the first type of case, such a direction will be necessary in the second and third types. For more information on this topic and sample charges, see Unanimous and Majority Verdicts.

7.2.3.1 Charge: Negligent Manslaughter

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used if the accused is charged with negligent manslaughter by a positive act.

The charge will need to be adapted if the charge is based on principles of accessorial liability, the jury must consider multiple bases of manslaughter, the charge is left as an alternative to murder or the charge is based on a negligent omission.

I must now direct you about the crime of manslaughter. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that the accused owed the victim a duty of care.

Two – that the accused breached that duty by being criminally negligent.

Three – that the act which breached the duty of care was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

Four, that the breach of duty caused the victim's death.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[444]

Duty of Care

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused owed the victim a duty of care.

[444] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

The law imposes a duty [describe class of persons covered by the duty and the content of the duty,[445] e.g. "on a parent to provide for the welfare of his/her child" or "on a person who is doing a dangerous act to take ordinary precautions to avoid harming others"].

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

It is not disputed that NOA owed a duty of care to NOV because [describe basis for the duty, e.g. "s/he was his/her parent"]. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution argued that NOA owed NOV a duty because [describe basis for the duty and summarise prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. In response, the defence argued that [summarise relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

I direct you as a matter of law that if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that [describe findings of fact required to establish the duty], then NOA owed NOV a duty to [describe content of the duty]. If you are not satisfied that this was the case, then you must find NOA not guilty of manslaughter.

Criminal Negligence

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused breached the duty of care by being criminally negligent.

A person acts with "criminal negligence" if his/her acts fell so far short of the standard of care a reasonable person would have exercised, and involved such a high risk of death or really serious injury, that it deserves criminal punishment.

This requires you to compare NOA's conduct with the "standard of care" that a reasonable person would have exercised in the circumstances. Precisely what that standard would have been is for you to decide, taking into account all of the circumstances, such as [describe relevant factors].

This is an objective test. That means that the prosecution does not need to establish that NOA intended to cause death or really serious injury or that s/he realised that his/her conduct was negligent. What matters is what a reasonable person in his/her situation would have known and done.

For this element to be met, you must find that the reasonable person in the accused's situation would have realised that his/her conduct created a high risk of death or really serious injury. You must also find that, when compared against the standard of care that a reasonable person would have exercised in the circumstances, NOA's conduct fell so far short that it deserves criminal punishment.

In making your determination, you should consider the reasonable person to be the same age as the accused, to have any specialised knowledge and experience the accused had, and to be of ordinary strength of mind. In particular, [describe characteristics of the accused that are relevant to the reasonable person, including training and experience].

[If there are qualities of the accused that are not relevant, add the shaded section below.]

However, the reasonable person is not [describe any adverse traits of the accused that are irrelevant, such as intoxication, concussion or carelessness].

---

[445] See 7.2.3 Negligent Manslaughter for information concerning the people to whom the accused owes a duty of care and the content of the duty.

In considering this question, remember that people do not always act perfectly. Even the most careful person can occasionally lose attention for a moment, or make minor mistakes. This offence is not concerned with minor breaches of the expected standard of care, even if they result in someone being hurt. While that might establish negligence in a civil case, it is not sufficient to establish guilt in a criminal case. For a person to be guilty of negligently causing serious injury, more is required – NOA's conduct must have been "criminally negligent".

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Voluntariness

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused's act which breached the duty of care was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately. These words each have a special meaning in law, which I will briefly explain.

The term "conscious" excludes the acts of an unconscious person, such as a sleepwalker, or a person rolling over in bed.

The term "voluntary" directs you to the requirement that the act which killed the deceased must be a "willed" act, that is, one resulting from the control by the accused of his/her own actions. This excludes the acts of a person operating in one of a number of rare mental states where the mind loses control of the body's actions.

The term "deliberate" excludes accidental acts, such as the consequences of falling over or fumbling an item.

[If the case involves an accident and the element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, you have heard [counsel/witnesses] describe the [describe relevant event, e.g. 'death of NOV'] as an accident. For the purpose of this third element, you must look at [describe relevant voluntary act, e.g. 'whether the accused took proper safety precautions'], rather than [describe relevant accident, e.g. 'whether NOV falling through the roof was an accident']. There is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe alleged breach of the duty of care] s/he did so consciously, voluntarily and deliberately, so you should have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

There is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe alleged breach of the duty of care] s/he did so consciously, voluntarily and deliberately, so you should have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If voluntariness is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

The defence argued[446] that the prosecution has failed to prove that [describe alleged breach of the duty of care] was [select term(s), e.g. conscious, voluntary, deliberate].

The defence submitted that this breach was committed [describe and discuss the relevant form of involuntary conduct raised as an issue in the trial, such as reflex acts; physically compelled acts; acts performed in an automatic state]. The prosecution denied that this was the case. [Summarise relevant prosecution arguments and/or evidence.]

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the act which breached the duty of care was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately. If you are not satisfied that this was the case, then you must find NOA not guilty of manslaughter.

---

[446] If the defence did not raise the issue of voluntariness, but it arises on the evidence, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

Cause of death

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused's breach of the duty of care caused the victim's death.

For this element to be met, you must determine whether any criminal negligence you found for the purpose of the second element was a substantial or significant cause of NOV's death. It does not need to be the only cause, or the direct or immediate cause.

You should approach this question in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of manslaughter the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA owed NOV a duty of care; and

Two – that NOA breached that duty of care by being criminally negligent; and

Three – that the act which breached the duty of care was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately; and Four – that NOA's breach of the duty caused NOV's death.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of manslaughter.

7.2.4 Defensive Homicide

Defensive Homicide is an offence contrary to s 9AD (now repealed) of the Crimes Act 1958, which applies to offences alleged to have been committed on or after 23 November 2005 and before 1 November 2014.

Defensive Homicide is effectively an offence of murder committed in self defence, where the accused had no reasonable grounds for believing it was necessary to kill in self defence.

In theory Defensive Homicide could be charged as a primary offence upon a trial presentment. However in practice it will generally only be raised before juries as an alternative to murder. As a result, Defensive Homicide is not considered separately in this charge book.

Instead, for the elements of Murder see:

- 7.2.1 Intentional or Reckless Murder

For Charges, Checklists and commentary on Defensive Homicide see:

- 8.2 Statutory Self-defence (Pre-1/11/14) and Defensive Homicide

7.2.5 Culpable Driving Causing Death

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. The offence of culpable driving causing death is created by Crimes Act 1958 s 318(1).

2. The offence has the following three elements,[447] each of which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

   (a) The accused was driving a motor vehicle;

   (b) The driving was culpable; and

   (c) The culpable driving caused the death of another person.

   These elements are addressed in turn below.

Driving a Motor Vehicle

3. For the first element to be met, the jury must be satisfied that:

   - The accused was driving; and
   - The vehicle the accused was driving was a motor vehicle.

"Driving"

4. "Drive" is an ordinary English word. There is no exhaustive legal definition of when a person "drives" a motor vehicle (Tink v Francis [1983] 2 VR 17).

5. However, before a person can be considered to be driving, he or she must at least be in a position to control the movement and direction of the vehicle (Tink v Francis [1983] 2 VR 17).

6. To be "driving", a person must also, generally, have control over the propulsion of the vehicle (Tink v Francis [1983] 2 VR 17; Davies v Waldron [1989] VR 449).

7. In most cases it will be clear whether or not the accused was "driving". However, issues may arise where:

   - The vehicle was not fully operational at the relevant time (e.g. the engine, steering or brakes were not working);
   - The vehicle was not being propelled by its own motor force (e.g. the car was being towed or was coasting downhill); or
   - The vehicle was stationary at the relevant time (e.g. the vehicle was stopped at traffic lights).

8. In each of these cases the accused may or may not have been driving, depending on the degree of control the accused had over the propulsion, movement and direction of the vehicle. See Tink v Francis [1983] 2 VR 17 for a detailed analysis of this issue.

9. Whether or not the accused was "driving" a motor vehicle in such circumstances will be a question of fact for the jury to determine, taking into account all of the surrounding circumstances (Pullin v Insurance Commissioner [1971] VR 263).

"Motor Vehicle"

10. A "motor vehicle" is a vehicle that is used, or intended to be used, on a highway, and that is built to be propelled by a motor that forms part of the vehicle but does not include:

    - A vehicle intended to be used on a railway or tramway; or

[447] In some cases the prosecution will also have to prove that the accused's conduct was voluntary – see below.

- A motorised wheel-chair capable of a speed of not more than 10 kilometres per hour which is used solely for the conveyance of an injured or disabled person; or
- A vehicle that is not a motor vehicle by virtue of a declaration (Road Safety Act 1986 s 3; Crimes Act 1958 s 2A).

11. This definition requires the vehicle to be one that is normally used on a highway. It is not enough that the vehicle, at the time in question, was in use on a highway (Smith v Transport Accident Commission (2005) 12 VR 277; Transport Accident Commission v Serbec (1993) 6 VAR 151; Elizabeth Valley Pty Ltd v Fordham (1970) 16 FLR 459).

Culpable Driving

12. The accused's driving must have been "culpable". This term is defined to mean driving:
    - Recklessly (s 318(2)(a));
    - Negligently (s 318(2)(b));
    - Whilst so affected by alcohol as to be incapable of having proper control of the motor vehicle (s 318(2)(c)); or
    - Whilst so affected by drugs as to be incapable of having proper control of the motor vehicle (s 318(2)(d)).
13. The presentment must specify which of these bases of culpability is alleged against the accused (Crimes Act 1958 s 318(3)). The presentment may specify more than one basis of culpability (R v Horvath [1972] VR 533).
14. These bases of culpability do not create separate offences. While the conduct of the accused may satisfy more than one category, a person who causes the death of another by driving culpably commits only one offence of culpable driving (R v Beach (1994) 75 A Crim R 447).
15. Each of these forms of culpability is examined in turn below.

Recklessness

16. A person drives "recklessly" for the purpose of this offence if s/he "consciously and unjustifiably disregards a substantial risk that death of another person or the infliction of grievous bodily harm upon another person may result from his [or her] driving" (Crimes Act 1958 s 318(2)(a)).
17. This definition of "recklessness" requires the prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt that:
    - The accused was aware of a risk that death or grievous bodily harm may result from his or her driving;
    - That risk was substantial rather than remote;
    - The accused consciously disregarded that risk; and
    - The decision to disregard that risk was unjustifiable.
18. If the accused disregarded the risk of harm in order to avoid greater harm, his or her actions may have been "justifiable", and thus not reckless (R v Lucas [1973] VR 693).
19. In the law of murder the phrase "really serious injury" has replaced the phrase "grievous bodily harm". While the latter terminology is preserved in Crimes Act 1958 s 318(2)(a), if used it will commonly be necessary to explain it by reference to the modern phrase. As a result, it should not be a misdirection to simply direct the jury by reference to the risk of causing "really serious injury".

Negligence

20. A person drives "negligently" for the purpose of this offence if s/he "fails unjustifiably and to a gross degree to observe the standard of care which a reasonable person would have observed in all the circumstances of the case" (Crimes Act 1958 s 318(2)(b)).

21. Historically, deviating from the standard of care to a "gross" degree meant driving in a way that fell so short of the standard of care required, and held such a high risk of death or serious injury, that it merited criminal punishment (R v De'Zilwa (2002) 5 VR 408).

22. However, in King v R (2012) 245 CLR 588, the High Court questioned whether it was appropriate to ask jurors to consider whether the driving "merits criminal punishment" as part of culpable driving directions (see King v R, [45], [49], [68], [69], [83]). The minority (Heydon and Bell JJ) stated that if a judge used this expression in culpable driving directions and omitted it from dangerous driving directions, then juries would erroneously think that dangerous driving is a minor offence. This may affect their assessment of whether the accused was guilty of culpable driving.

23. Subsequently, in Bouch v R [2017] VSCA 86, the Court of Appeal expressly stated that directions for culpable driving by gross negligence should not ask jurors to consider whether an accused's driving "merits criminal punishment".

24. The level of negligence required must be of a "high order". It must involve a great falling short of the standard of care that a reasonable person would have exercised in the circumstances and involves a high risk of death or serious injury resulting from the relevant conduct (Bouch v R [2017] VSCA 86).

25. As the negligence required must be of a high order and must involve a high risk of death or serious injury, negligence in the form of momentary inattention or a minor lapse of judgment, or negligence that might be the basis for a simple civil claim for monetary compensation, would generally not be enough to support a finding of gross negligence (Bouch v R [2017] VSCA 86).

26. While the test for negligence for the purposes of culpable driving by gross negligence is expressed in different terms to the tests for negligence for the offences of manslaughter by criminal negligence (R v Franks [1999] 1 VR 518; R v Shields [1981] VR 717; R v De'Zilwa (2002) 5 VR 408) and negligently causing serious injury (R v Mitchell [2005] VSCA 304), this does not mean that the test for each offence is different in substance.

27. It is not certain that the tests for these offences differ in terms of the degree of negligence required for the respective offences to be committed. Given this, where an accused is charged with culpable driving by gross negligence, along with one of these other offences, which expresses the test for negligence in different terms, a judge should seek submissions from counsel as to how to explain the tests to the jury.

28. The test for negligence for the purposes of culpable driving by gross negligence is more serious than the degree of negligence that is required to found liability at civil law (R v Wright [1999] 3 VR 355)

29. This is an objective test (R v Gane 17/12/1993 Vic CCA). The jury should use their own knowledge and experiences when determining whether the driving was grossly negligent (R v Stephenson [1976] VR 376).

30. In making this determination, the jury must consider the driving in light of "all the circumstances of the case". The conditions of the road, and the size and speed of the driver's vehicle, may all be relevant to assessing whether the conduct of the accused was negligent (R v Rudebeck [1999] VSCA 155).

31. While adherence to the speed limit (or disregard of that limit) will be relevant, it will not be determinative:

    - Gross negligence is not proven merely by establishing that the accused drove in excess of the speed limit (R v Dickinson [2007] VSCA 111);

- The accused may have been grossly negligent even if s/he was driving under the speed limit (R v Rudebeck [1999] VSCA 155; R v Smith [2006] VSCA 92).

32. The jury does not only need to consider the accused's physical control of the vehicle when determining if the accused was driving negligently. They may also consider the question of whether the accused should have been driving at all in the circumstances. In making this determination, they can take into account factors such as the condition of the vehicle, the time of driving, lighting conditions, heating and ventilation of the vehicle (Jiminez v R (1992) 173 CLR 572).

33. The accused may have been grossly negligent if s/he was so fatigued that s/he knew, or ought to have known, that there was an appreciable risk of falling asleep or losing control of the vehicle while driving (Crimes Act 1958 s 318(2A)). See "Voluntariness" below for a detailed discussion of this issue.

34. Evidence of intoxication may be relevant to the jury's assessment of the accused's negligence. The use of such evidence is not limited to a charge of culpable driving under s 318(2)(c) (R v Wright [1999] 3 VR 355).

35. The existence of an external threat may be taken into account in determining the extent of the accused's negligence. An act which may be grossly negligent in the absence of such a threat may be considered to be reasonable (or only marginally negligent) if committed in order to avoid another danger (R v Lucas [1973] VR 693; R v Gane 17/12/1993 Vic CCA).

36. Not every fatal collision that is attributable to negligent driving involves the degree of negligence required for culpable driving. The law does not require drivers to act with perfect hindsight, or assume that for every accident there must be a remedy (R v Smith [2006] VSCA 92).

37. An error of judgment in a situation of sudden crisis, or a failure to successfully take evasive action, does not constitute gross negligence (R v Mitchell [2005] VSCA 304; R v Jiminez (1992) 173 CLR 572).

38. The requirement that the accused "unjustifiably" failed to observe the relevant standard of care does not create a separate step in the reasoning process. The presence or lack of justification for the accused's acts will simply be one factor to take into account in determining if s/he had acted with gross negligence in the circumstances (R v Shields [1981] VR 717; R v Lucas [1973] VR 693).

39. The defence of honest and reasonable mistake of fact is not relevant to this form of culpable driving. The jury should not be directed on this matter, as it is likely to result in confusion (R v Franks [1999] 1 VR 518).

Accused's Mental State is of Limited Relevance

40. The test for "gross negligence" is an objective one, to be determined by comparing the accused's actions with the standard of care expected of the reasonable person. The accused's state of mind (whether established by admissions or inference from post-offence conduct) will therefore only be relevant insofar as it provides evidence concerning the circumstances of the offence. It cannot establish that the accused knew s/he had deviated from the standard of care to the requisite extent, as that is a jury issue (see R v Dickinson [2007] VSCA 111).

41. Evidence that the accused was aware that s/he was taking a risk by driving in the circumstances, but chose to disregard that risk (i.e. s/he acted "recklessly"), may be of assistance in proving that the accused acted negligently. However, such behaviour is not a requirement of culpable driving by gross negligence (R v Horvath [1972] VR 533).

Charging the Jury about Gross Negligence

42. A trial judge, in directing a jury, should confine him or herself to the language of the statute. The judge should direct a jury in such terms. Thus, a jury should be directed that a person drives "negligently" for the purpose of the offence of culpable driving causing death if that person fails unjustifiably and to a gross degree to observe the standard of care that a reasonable person would have observed in all of the circumstances (Bouch v R [2017] VSCA 86).

43. As to the meaning of the word "gross", juries should be told that "gross" is an ordinary English word that should be given its ordinary meaning (R v De'Zilwa (2002) 5 VR 408; Bouch v R [2017] VSCA 86).

44. The jury may be invited to compare the standard required for gross negligence with the civil standard of negligence (which only requires that the accused fall short of the standard of care that would be taken by a reasonable person in the circumstances of the accused) (Bouch v R [2017] VSCA 86; R v Lucas [1973] VR 693; R v De'Zilwa (2002) 5 VR 408; R v Gane 17/12/1993 Vic CCA).

45. While attempts to further explain the meaning of "gross" are not forbidden, they may be unwise. Synonyms like "glaring", "flagrant" or "monstrous" should be avoided (Bouch v R [2017] VSCA 86).

46. Because "gross" is not a commonly used word in contemporary society, except in a vernacular and imprecise sense, juries often ask for an explanation of its meaning (Bouch v R [2017] VSCA 86).

47. The required negligence must be of a high order, involving a great falling short of the standard of care that a reasonable person would have exercised in all the circumstances and involving a high risk that death or serious injury would follow from the relevant conduct. The kind of negligence that might comprise momentary inattention or a minor error of judgment, or which might be the basis for a simple civil claim for monetary compensation, would usually not be enough to support a finding of gross negligence (Bouch v R [2017] VSCA 86).

48. The matters which might constitute negligence of the high order that is needed for conviction should be pointed out to the jury (Bouch v R [2017] VSCA 86).

49. A "significant departure" from the standard of care required is not sufficient. Judges should be careful that the language of their direction does not deviate from the degree of negligence stipulated by the Act (R v De'Zilwa (2002) 5 VR 408).
