50. When charging the jury, the circumstances alleged to have given rise to the negligence (e.g. speed, visibility, tiredness) should be clearly identified (R v Poduska [2008] VSCA 147; R v Franks [1999] 1 VR 518; R v Leusenkamp [2003] VSCA 193).

Intoxication and Drugs

51. The accused will have driven culpably if s/he drove whilst so affected by alcohol (s 318(2)(c)) or drugs (s 318(2)(d)) as to be incapable of having proper control of the motor vehicle.

52. While sections 318(2)(c) and (d) are independent, these two forms of culpability are fundamentally similar. They require the prosecution to prove that, at the time of driving:

    - The accused was under the influence of alcohol/drugs; and
    - The extent to which the accused was affected by alcohol/drugs was so great as to render him/her incapable of exercising proper control over the vehicle (R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26).

53. It is not necessary to show that the accused was incapable of exercising proper control at the time of the accident. It is sufficient if, at any point during the drive preceding the accident, the accused was incapable of exercising proper control over the vehicle (R v Burnside [1962] VR 96).

54. When charging the jury, the judge should clearly identify the matters relied upon by the prosecution to establish that the accused did not have proper control of the vehicle (R v Poduska [2008] VSCA 147).

55. To determine whether the accused was incapable of exercising proper control, the jury should compare the capacity of the accused to control the vehicle against the capacity of a reasonably competent driver. The specifics of the standard are a matter for the jury (R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26).

56. It is not sufficient to establish merely that the accused was affected by drugs or alcohol. It is necessary to show that s/he was influenced to the required extent (R v Hawkes (1931) 22 Cr App R 172).

57. Evidence of the percentage of alcohol in the accused's blood may be used by the jury in assessing the extent to which s/he was influenced by alcohol (R v Cheer [1979] VR 541).

58. It will not, however, be sufficient simply to show that the accused had a proscribed blood alcohol concentration. Such statutory standards cannot establish the inability of the accused to properly control the vehicle (see, e.g. R v Lucas [1973] VR 693).

59. Everybody's driving capacity is detrimentally affected by alcohol. The extent of this effect is a matter for the jury. They are not required to assume that an experienced or expert driver is less affected by alcohol than an inexperienced driver (R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26).

60. It is not necessary to show that the accused was "drunk" in the popular sense (R v Burnside [1962] VR 96).

The Culpable Driving "Caused" the Death

61. The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the culpable driving of the accused caused the death of another person.

62. There are two aspects to this element:

    - The culpable driving must have caused the victim's death; and
    - The victim must have been a "person".

    Each of these issues is addressed in turn below.

Causation

63. For the accused's culpable driving to have caused the victim's death, it must have "contributed significantly" to the death, or been a "substantial and operating cause" of it (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378; R v Rudebeck [1999] VSCA 155).

64. Precisely which act of the accused must have caused the death differs depending on whether the accused has been charged with driving recklessly or negligently (ss 318(2)(a) or (b)), or driving under the influence of alcohol or drugs (ss 318(2)(c) or (d)).

65. When the accused is charged with driving recklessly or negligently, the alleged reckless or negligent act must have been the substantial and operating cause of the events leading to the death of the deceased (R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26; R v Heron [2003] VSCA 76).

66. In the case of recklessness, this means that the risk that was realised and disregarded by the accused must be the risk that ultimately eventuated and caused the victim's death. It is not sufficient if the accused chose to accept one risk, but the death was caused by a different unforeseen risk (R v Burnside [1962] VR 96).

67. By contrast, when the accused is charged with driving under the influence of alcohol or drugs, the prosecution only needs to prove that the victim's death was caused by the driving of the accused. While the accused must have been so influenced by drugs or alcohol as to be incapable of having proper control of the vehicle (see above), it is not necessary to show that his or her inability to control the vehicle caused the death of the deceased (R v Feketa (1982) 10 A Crim R 287; R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26).

68. This imposes what may be akin to absolute liability on people who drive while under the influence of drugs or alcohol (R v Feketa (1982) 10 A Crim R 287).

69. The relevant acts of the accused must have been such that an ordinary person would hold them, as a matter of common sense, to be a cause of the death. The mere fact that they contributed causally to the death, or were a necessary cause of it, is not sufficient (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378).

70. The accused's acts do not need to be the sole cause of the death. A person can be criminally liable for a death that has multiple causes, even if he or she is not responsible for all of those causes (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378; R v Lee (2005) 12 VR 249).

71. So even if another driver's mistakes contributed to the collision, the accused's culpable driving will have caused the death if the jury finds it was a substantial and operating cause of the collision (R v Lee (2005) 12 VR 249; R v Dickinson [2007] VSCA 111; R v Guthridge (2010) 27 VR 452).

72. However, where there are other possible causes of the death that are inconsistent with the death having been caused by the accused's culpable driving, these must be excluded beyond reasonable doubt (R v Rudebeck [1999] VSCA 155).

73. In many cases it will be unnecessary for the judge to do more than simply identify causation as an element of the offence. However, more detailed directions should be given if:

    - Causation was a live issue in the trial; or
    - An undirected jury might consider causation to be a live issue.

74. Some cases in which causation will be a live issue include where:

    - There were multiple possible causes of the death;
    - The death was delayed;
    - There were intervening acts between the accused's actions and the victim's death; or
    - The accused is alleged to have caused the death indirectly (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378).

75. If the accused is charged with multiple forms of culpability (e.g. culpable driving by gross negligence and/or intoxication) the judge must clearly explain the differences in causation outlined above (R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26).

76. See 7.1.2 Causation for further information about this issue.

Death of another Person

77. To be found guilty of this offence, the accused must have caused the death of another person.

78. An unborn child is not classified as a "person" for the purposes of this offence (see, e.g. R v F (1996) 40 NSWLR 245; Attorney-General's Reference (No 3 of 1994) [1996] QB 581).

79. A child is treated as being "born" (and thus a "person") when "he or she is fully born in a living state". This occurs when the child is "completely delivered from the body of its mother and it has a separate and independent existence in the sense that it does not derive its power of living from its mother" (R v Hutty [1953] VLR 338).

80. It is not necessary that the victim be a person at the time of the collision. If an unborn child is injured in utero, is born alive, but dies as a result of injuries caused by the culpable driving, the culpable driving will have caused the death of another person (R v F (1996) 40 NSWLR 245).

Voluntariness

81. In the ordinary run of cases the voluntary quality of the accused's acts will not be in question (Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205). It will therefore not be necessary to direct the jury about voluntariness (R v Chang (2003) 7 VR 236; see also R v Le Broc (2000) 2 VR 43).

82. However, there is no presumption that any act of the accused is voluntary. Where voluntariness is in issue, the jury must be directed that the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the act of culpable driving was the voluntary or willed act of the accused (Jiminez v R (1992) 173 CLR 572; R v Frazer [2001] VSCA 101).

83. For voluntariness to be put in issue, there will need to be evidence that displaces the common experience that a person's will ordinarily accompanies his or her actions. While not a true evidentiary burden, this evidence needs to be sufficient to at least raise a doubt that the accused's acts occurred independently of the exercise of his or her will (R v Falconer (1990) 171 CLR 30).

84. In the case of culpable driving, the issue of voluntariness may arise if the collision occurred because the accused fell asleep.[448] The accused cannot be held responsible for any actions which take place when s/he is asleep, because such actions are not voluntary (Jiminez v R (1992) 173 CLR 572; R v Frazer [2001] VSCA 101).

85. This does not mean that the accused cannot be found guilty of culpable driving if s/he was asleep at the time of the collision. If the jury find that the act of driving or continuing to drive prior to falling asleep was culpable (e.g. it was grossly negligent for the accused to drive given how tired s/he was), and that the act of driving in those circumstances caused the victim's death, the accused may be found guilty (Jiminez v R (1992) 173 CLR 572; Kroon v R (1990) 55 SASR 476).

86. To find the accused guilty in such circumstances, the period of wakefulness must have been sufficiently contemporaneous to the collision to be regarded as the cause of the harm inflicted while the accused was asleep (Kroon v R (1990) 55 SASR 476; R v Franks [1999] 1 VR 518).

87. Legislation addresses this issue in relation to culpable driving by gross negligence. Crimes Act 1958 s 318(2A) states that a person will be grossly negligent if:

    - S/he drove when fatigued to such an extent that s/he knew or ought to have known that there was an appreciable risk of falling asleep or losing control of the vehicle; and
    - By driving the motor vehicle in such a condition, s/he failed unjustifiably and to a gross degree to observe the standard of care a reasonable person would have observed in the circumstances.

88. While there have not yet been any cases interpreting this provision, it appears to reflect the position at common law. At common law it was held that, when determining whether the accused was grossly negligent in such circumstances, the jury must consider his or her conduct prior to falling asleep. They must determine whether his or her decision to continue driving created a risk of losing control that was so fraught with danger to human life that it constituted a gross departure from the standard of care that a reasonable driver would have exercised in such circumstances (R v Rudebeck [1999] VSCA 155; R v Franks [1999] 1 VR 518; Jiminez v R (1992) 173 CLR 572).

89. When directing the jury about this issue, the judge must not suggest that tiredness or fatigue is sufficient. These are words of wide meaning, that do not necessarily entail an appreciable risk that the person would fall asleep or lose control of the vehicle (R v Franks [1999] 1 VR 518).

Agreement about Basis of Culpability

90. Where the jury are asked to consider more than one basis of culpability, they must agree on the mode of culpability before they can find the accused guilty. It is not just the ultimate question of guilt or innocence that the jury must agree upon, but the form of offence which has been committed (e.g. culpable driving by recklessness) (R v Beach (1994) 75 A Crim R 447; R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26. See also R v Clarke and Johnstone [1986] VR 643).

---

[448] A similar issue arises if the accused was unconscious or suffering from an epileptic seizure at the time of the collision (Jiminez v R (1992) 173 CLR 572; R v Frazer [2001] VSCA 101).

91. The jury will not, however, be required to identify the basis of their verdict. They will only be required to give a single verdict. The Act creates only one offence of culpable driving, and the different forms of culpability are not alternative counts (R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26).

92. See Unanimous and Majority Verdicts for further information about this issue.

Complicity

93. Where the accused participates in a race on a public road in which another participant in the race directly causes the death of the victim, the jury may find that the parties were acting in concert or that the accused aided and abetted the other participant (R v Guthridge (2010) 27 VR 452; [2010] VSCA 132).

94. In such cases, it will generally be preferable for the prosecution to present the accused on the basis that he or she aided or abetted the principal offender. Such an approach avoids the artificiality of relying on an implied agreement or understanding, and will simplify jury directions (R v Guthridge (2010) 27 VR 452; [2010] VSCA 132).

95. However, where there is cogent evidence of an agreement or understanding between the parties, it will be appropriate for the prosecution to rely upon concert (R v Guthridge (2010) 27 VR 452; [2010] VSCA 132).

96. See Statutory Complicity, Joint Criminal Enterprise and Aiding, Abetting, Counselling or Procuring for information concerning these types of complicity.

Alternative Offence: Dangerous Driving Causing Death

97. Crimes Act 1958 s 422A(1) provides that the jury may find the accused guilty of dangerous driving causing death (Crimes Act s 319(1)), if they are not satisfied that he or she is guilty of culpable driving causing death. See 7.2.6 Dangerous Driving Causing Death or Serious Injury for information about this alternative offence.

Last updated: 7 June 2017

7.2.5.1 Charge: Culpable Driving Causing Death: One Basis of Culpability

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used if the accused is charged with culpable driving causing death, and only one basis of culpability is alleged.

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of culpable driving causing death. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused was driving a motor vehicle.

Two – the accused's driving was culpable.

Three – the culpable driving caused the victim's death.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Driving

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused was driving a motor vehicle.[449]

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA was driving a motor vehicle when [describe relevant incident]. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If it is alleged that someone else was driving at the relevant time, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution submitted that it was NOA who was driving the [describe vehicle] when [describe relevant incident and outline relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, alleging that [insert relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to decide whether it was NOA who was driving at the relevant time. It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he was, that this first element will be met.

[If it is contended that the accused's acts did not constitute "driving", add the following shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution submitted that NOA was "driving" the [describe vehicle] when [describe relevant incident]. The defence denies this, alleging that what NOA was doing was not "driving".

"Driving" is an ordinary English word. It does not have a technical legal definition. It is for you to determine, using your common sense and experience, whether what NOA was doing was "driving".

While there is no legal definition of "driving", before a person can be considered to be driving, s/he must at least be in a position to control the movement and direction of the vehicle. S/he should also, generally, have control over its propulsion. For this reason, conduct such as steering a towed or disabled vehicle will generally not be considered "driving".

In deciding whether this element has been met, you should therefore consider the degree of control which NOA had over the vehicle. You should look at factors such as whether s/he could control the vehicle's acceleration and steering.

In this case, the prosecution submitted that NOA's acts were driving, because [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing that [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that what NOA was doing was "driving", that this first element will be met.

Culpable Driving

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused's driving was culpable.

The law defines "culpable" in a number of different ways. In this case, it is alleged that NOA's drove "culpably" because s/he drove [recklessly/with gross negligence/ while so affected by alcohol/drugs as to be incapable of having proper control of the vehicle].

---

[449] This charge assumes that the vehicle driven by the accused was clearly a "motor vehicle". If this is in issue, the charge will need to be modified. See 7.2.5 Culpable Driving Causing Death for guidance on the definition of a "motor vehicle".

Recklessness

[If it is alleged that the accused was reckless, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that a person drives "recklessly" if s/he consciously and unjustifiably disregards a substantial risk that his/her driving may cause another person to die or suffer really serious injury.

According to this definition, each of the following three matters must be proven beyond reasonable doubt for a person's driving to be considered "reckless":

First, the prosecution must prove that the accused was aware of a risk that death or really serious injury may result from his/her driving. When I say "really serious injury", I am not using a technical legal phrase. These are ordinary English words, and it is for you to determine what this phrase means to you as jurors.

The prosecution must prove that NOA himself/herself knew of the risk of death or really serious injury. It is not enough that you, or a reasonable person, would have recognised those risks in the circumstances.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that the risk of death or really serious injury was "substantial". It is not sufficient for NOA to have known that there was some risk that death or really serious injury may be caused by his/her actions. The accused must have disregarded a substantial risk.

Thirdly, the prosecution must prove that the accused "consciously and unjustifiably" disregarded that risk. That is, knowing there was a substantial risk that driving in the circumstances may result in death or really serious injury, the accused consciously decided – without justification – to drive anyway.

[If voluntariness is in issue, add the following darker shaded section.]

In determining whether the accused's actions were reckless, you may only take into account his/her voluntary actions – actions which were committed consciously and deliberately. This is because the law says that a person cannot be held criminally responsible for actions which s/he committed involuntarily.[450]

In this case, the prosecution argued that each of these aspects of "recklessness" have been met. [Insert prosecution arguments and/or evidence.] The defence denied this, contending [insert defence arguments and/or evidence].

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was aware of a substantial risk that death or really serious injury may result from his/her driving, and s/he consciously and unjustifiably disregarded that risk, that this second element will be met.

Gross Negligence

[If it is alleged that the accused was grossly negligent, add the following shaded section.]

A person drives with "gross negligence" if his/her driving falls greatly short of the standard of care a reasonable person would have exercised, and involved a high risk that death or serious injury would result.[451]

[450] This section may need to be expanded, depending on the nature of the alleged involuntary action. See the section on falling asleep while driving under "gross negligence" below for an example.

This requires you to compare NOA's conduct with the "standard of care" that a reasonable person would have exercised in the circumstances. Precisely what that standard would have been is for you to decide, taking into account all of the circumstances in which NOA drove, such as [describe relevant factors, such as visibility, lighting, other cars and road markings].

This is an objective test. That means that the prosecution does not need to establish that NOA intended to cause death or serious injury or that s/he realised that his/her conduct was negligent. What matters is what a reasonable person in his/her situation would have known and done.

For this element to be met, you must find that the reasonable person in the accused's situation would have realised that his/her driving created a high risk of death or serious injury.

In making your determination, you should consider the reasonable person to be the same age as the accused, to have any specialised knowledge and experience the accused had, and to be of ordinary strength of mind. In particular, [describe characteristics of the accused that are relevant to the reasonable person, including training and experience].

[If there are qualities of the accused that are not relevant, add the darker shaded section below.]

However, the reasonable person is not [describe any adverse traits of the accused that are irrelevant, such as intoxication, concussion or carelessness].

In considering this question, remember that people do not always act perfectly. Even the most careful person can occasionally lose attention for a moment, or make minor mistakes. This offence is not concerned with minor breaches of the expected standard of care, even if they result in someone being hurt. While that might establish negligence in a civil case, it is not sufficient to establish guilt in a criminal case. For a person to be guilty of negligently causing serious injury, more is required – NOA's conduct must have involved a great falling short of the standard of care required and there must have been a high risk that death or serious injury would result. To emphasise the standard required, a substantial departure from the standard of care a reasonable person would exercise may not be enough. There must be a high degree of negligence, involving a great departure from the standard of care required, to constitute gross negligence.

[If the driver's speed is in issue, add the following darker shaded section.]

While the speed at which a person drives will be relevant to your decision, it will not be conclusive. It is just one factor to take into account. This is because it is possible for the accused to have driven above the speed limit, but not to have driven with gross negligence in the circumstances. Similarly, it is possible for the accused to have driven within the speed limit, but to have nevertheless driven with gross negligence.

[If voluntariness is in issue, add the following darker shaded section.]

In determining whether the accused's actions were grossly negligent, you may only take into account his/her voluntary actions. This is because the law says that a person cannot be held criminally responsible for actions which s/he committed involuntarily.

---

[451] A "significant departure" from the standard of care required is not sufficient. Judges should be careful that the language of their direction does not deviate from the degree of negligence stipulated by the Act. See R v De'Zilwa (2002) 5 VR 408.

In this case, you have heard evidence that NOA fell asleep while driving, and that the collision occurred while s/he was sleeping.[452] Obviously, a person is not acting voluntarily when s/he is sleeping. You therefore cannot find that NOA was grossly negligent due to the way s/he drove whilst asleep.

However, that does not mean that you must acquit him/her if you find that s/he was asleep at the time of the collision. This second element will be satisfied if the prosecution can prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused drove in a grossly negligent fashion before falling asleep, when his/her actions were voluntary.

For example, you may find that it was grossly negligent for the accused to drive at all, or to continue to drive, given the likelihood that s/he would fall asleep. The law says that the accused will have been grossly negligent if:

- S/he drove when fatigued to such an extent that s/he knew, or ought to have known, that there was an appreciable risk of falling asleep or losing control of the vehicle; and
- By driving in such a condition, s/he fell far short of the standard of care expected of a reasonable person, and created a high risk of death or serious injury.

To determine if this was the case, you must focus on the accused's driving prior to falling asleep. Consider factors such as any warning signs the accused may have had that s/he was likely to fall asleep. If you find that by driving, or continuing to drive, in such circumstances s/he was acting with gross negligence, this second element will be satisfied.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Alcohol and/or Drugs

[If it is alleged that the accused was affected by alcohol and/or drugs, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that a person drives "culpably" if s/he drives while affected by [alcohol/drugs] to such an extent that s/he is incapable of exercising proper control over the vehicle.

This is not a question of whether the person actually exercises proper control over the vehicle. It is about whether s/he is capable of exercising such control. For this second element to be met, the accused must have been unable to exercise proper control over the vehicle, because of the effects of [alcohol/drugs].

It is therefore not enough for you simply to determine that the accused had [drunk alcohol/taken drugs] before driving. You must find that the [alcohol/drugs] affected NOA's capacity to drive to the necessary extent.

To determine whether this was the case, you must compare the capacity of the accused to control the vehicle with the capacity of a reasonably competent driver. If, as a result of the effects of [alcohol/drugs], the accused was unable to drive to the same standard, this second element will be satisfied.

[If evidence that the accused's blood alcohol concentration exceeded the statutory limit is given, add the following

[452] This part of the charge has been drafted for use in cases where it is alleged that the accused fell asleep while driving. If it is alleged that the accused acted involuntarily for a different reason, it will need to be modified accordingly.

darker shaded section.[453]]

In this case you have heard evidence that, when s/he was tested by police, the accused had a blood alcohol concentration of [insert blood alcohol concentration], which is above the [0.00 or 0.05] statutory limit for driving. If you find this to be proven, you may take it into account in assessing the extent to which s/he was influenced by alcohol.

However, this is just one factor to consider. You do not need to conclude that NOA was incapable of exercising proper control over the vehicle simply because his/her blood alcohol concentration exceeded the legal limit. A person may be over the limit and still be capable of exercising proper control.

Whether or not the accused was affected to the necessary extent is a question of fact for you to determine, taking into account all of the evidence.

[If evidence that the accused's blood alcohol concentration was within the statutory limit is given, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case you have heard evidence that, when s/he was tested by police, the accused had a blood alcohol concentration of [insert blood alcohol concentration], which is within the 0.05 statutory limit for driving. If you find this to be proven, you may take it into account in assessing the extent to which s/he was influenced by alcohol.

However, this is just one factor to consider. You do not need to conclude that NOA must have been capable of exercising proper control over the vehicle simply because his/her blood alcohol concentration was within the legal limit. A person can be under the limit, and yet be greatly affected by alcohol.

Whether or not the accused was affected to the necessary extent is a question of fact for you to determine, taking into account all of the evidence.

It is not necessary for you to find that the accused was unable to control the vehicle at the precise moment when the collision occurred. This element will be satisfied if you find that the accused was incapable of exercising proper control at any point in the drive leading up to the collision.

[If voluntariness is in issue, add the following darker shaded section.]

In determining whether the accused drove while affected by [alcohol/drugs] to such an extent that s/he was incapable of exercising proper control over the vehicle, you may only take into account his/her voluntary actions – actions which were committed consciously and deliberately. This is because the law says that a person cannot be held criminally responsible for actions which s/he committed involuntarily.[454]

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA was so affected by [alcohol/drugs] that s/he was incapable of exercising proper control over the vehicle. [Insert prosecution arguments and/or evidence.] The defence denied that NOA was affected by [alcohol/drugs] to the necessary extent, arguing [insert

---

[453] If evidence is given of positive drug test results, this section could be adapted accordingly.

[454] This section may need to be expanded, depending on the nature of the alleged involuntary action. If it is alleged that the accused was so intoxicated that s/he was acting involuntarily, relevant parts of 8.7.1 Charge: Intoxication and Voluntariness should be inserted.

defence arguments and/or evidence].

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was so affected by [alcohol/drugs] as to be incapable of exercising proper control over the vehicle, that this second element will be met.

Causation

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that NOA's culpable driving caused NOV's death.

Recklessness

[If it is alleged that the accused was reckless, add the following shaded section.]

It must have been the act of culpable driving that caused the death, not simply the act of driving. In this case, that means that the prosecution must prove that it was NOA's reckless driving that caused NOV to die. That is, his/her act of driving, despite knowing that there was a substantial risk of death or really serious injury, was the cause of death.

For this to be the case, you must find that NOV's death was caused by the occurrence of the risk that you found the accused was aware of, but chose to disregard. [Insert relevant example from the evidence.] It will not be sufficient for the death to have been caused by a different risk which the accused did not know about.

The accused's reckless driving does not need to have been the only cause of death, or the direct or immediate cause. You may find that his/her reckless driving caused the death if it was a substantial or significant cause of that result.

[If it is alleged that the death was caused by intervening acts, add the following darker shaded section.]

In making this determination, you need to decide whether it was the accused's acts which caused the death, or whether those acts merely provided the setting for the later acts of [insert intervening acts], which were the true cause of death. If NOA's acts only provided the setting, then s/he did not cause the death, and you must find him/her not guilty of culpable driving causing death.

You should approach this issue in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

In this case [insert competing arguments and evidence relating to causation].

Gross Negligence

[If it is alleged that the accused was grossly negligent, add the following shaded section.]

It must have been the act of culpable driving that caused the death, not simply the act of driving. In this case, that means that you must find that it was NOA's gross negligence that caused NOV to die. That is, the death resulted from NOA having driven in a way that fell far short of the standard of care expected of a reasonable person in the circumstances, and which held a high risk of death or serious injury.

For this to be the case, there must have been a relationship between the accused's negligence and the victim's death. It will not be sufficient if the collision simply happened to occur while NOA was driving negligently, but was not due to that negligence.

However, the accused's negligent driving does not need to have been the only cause of death, or the direct or immediate cause. You may find that his/her negligence caused the death if it was a substantial or significant cause of that result.

[If voluntariness is in issue, add the following darker shaded section.]

It must have been a voluntary act of the accused that caused the death. As I mentioned earlier, a person cannot be held responsible for acts s/he commits involuntarily.

This element will therefore not be satisfied if you decide that it was the acts of the accused whilst asleep that caused NOV's death.[455] For this element to be met, you must find that an act NOA committed before falling asleep – such as continuing to drive despite knowing that there was a high risk that s/he would fall asleep – was a substantial or significant cause of the death.

This will only be the case if that act was committed sufficiently close in time to the collision to be regarded as the cause of any harm inflicted while s/he was asleep.

[If it is alleged that the death was caused by intervening acts, add the following darker shaded section.]

In making this determination, you need to decide whether it was the accused's acts which caused the death, or whether those acts merely provided the setting for the later acts of [insert intervening acts], which were the true cause of death. If NOA's acts only provided the setting, then s/he did not cause the death, and you must find him/her not guilty of culpable driving causing death.

You should approach this issue in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

In this case [insert competing arguments and evidence relating to causation].

Alcohol and/or Drugs

[If it is alleged that the accused was affected by alcohol and/or drugs, add the following shaded section.]

For this element to be met, you only need to be satisfied that it was the accused's driving that caused the death. You do not need to find that the death was caused by the effects of the [alcohol/drugs] on NOA's ability to control the vehicle.

The accused's driving does not need to have been the only cause of death, or the direct or immediate cause. You may find that his/her driving caused the death if it was a substantial or significant cause of that result.

[If it is alleged that the death was caused by intervening acts, add the following darker shaded section.]

In making this determination, you need to decide whether it was the accused's driving which caused the death, or whether it merely provided the setting for the later acts of [insert intervening acts], which were the true cause of death. If NOA's driving only provided the setting, then s/he did not cause the death, and you must find him/her not guilty of culpable driving causing death.

You should approach this issue in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

In this case [insert competing arguments and evidence relating to causation].

---

[455] This part of the charge has been drafted for use in cases where it is alleged that the accused fell asleep while driving. If it is alleged that the accused acted involuntarily for a different reason, it will need to be modified accordingly.

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of culpable driving causing death, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA was driving a motor vehicle; and

Two – That NOA's driving was culpable – that is, s/he drove [recklessly/with gross negligence/ while so affected by alcohol/drugs as to be incapable of having proper control of the vehicle]; and

Three – That NOA's culpable driving caused NOV's death.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of culpable driving causing death.

Dangerous Driving Causing Death

[In most cases it will be necessary to leave a dangerous driving offence as an alternative offence.[456] In such cases, a suitably modified version of the appropriate charge should be inserted here.[457]

When modifying the charge, the judge must carefully explain the differences between culpable and dangerous driving.[458] The content of the explanation will vary depending on the basis of culpability alleged in relation to the culpable driving offence. For example:

- Where it is alleged that the accused was reckless, the judge should explain that the culpable driving offence requires proof that the accused was aware that his/her driving created a substantial risk of death or serious injury, whereas the dangerous driving offence does not require proof that the accused was aware that his/her driving was dangerous.
- Where it is alleged that the accused was grossly negligent, the judge should explain that while dangerous driving is a serious offence, it is less serious than culpable driving. In addition, while culpable driving requires gross negligence, dangerous driving requires a serious breach of the proper management or control of a vehicle that creates a real risk that members of the public in the vicinity will be killed or seriously injured.
- Where it is alleged that the accused was affected by alcohol or drugs, the judge should explain that the dangerous driving offence requires proof that the dangerous driving caused the victim's death, whereas the culpable driving offence only requires proof that the driving (not the drugs or alcohol) caused the victim's death.]

Last updated: 23 October 2019

---

456 Crimes Act 1958 s 422A. Where the offence was alleged to have been committed between 13 October 2004 and 18 March 2008, "dangerous driving causing death or serious injury" should be left as an alternative. Where the offence was alleged to have been committed on or after 19 March 2008, "dangerous driving causing death" should be left as an alternative. See 7.2.6 Dangerous Driving Causing Death or Serious Injury for further information concerning the duty to leave dangerous driving as an alternative offence.

457 See 7.2.6.1 Charge: Dangerous Driving Causing Death or Serious Injury.

458 See 7.2.6 Dangerous Driving Causing Death or Serious Injury for information concerning the differences between the offences.

7.2.5.2 Charge: Culpable Driving Causing Death: Multiple Bases of Culpability

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used if the accused is charged with culpable driving causing death, and multiple bases of culpability are alleged.

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of culpable driving causing death. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused was driving a motor vehicle.

Two – the accused's driving was culpable.

Three – the culpable driving caused the victim's death.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Driving

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused was driving a motor vehicle.[459]

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA was driving a motor vehicle when [describe relevant incident]. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If it is alleged that someone else was driving at the relevant time, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution submitted that it was NOA who was driving the [describe vehicle] when [describe relevant incident and outline relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, alleging that [insert relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to decide whether it was NOA who was driving at the relevant time. It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he was, that this first element will be met.

[If it is contended that the accused's acts did not constitute "driving", add the following shaded section.]

In this case the prosecution submitted that NOA was "driving" the [describe vehicle] when [describe relevant incident]. The defence denies this, alleging that what NOA was doing was not "driving".

"Driving" is an ordinary English word. It does not have a technical legal definition. It is for you to determine, using your common sense and experience, whether what NOA was doing was "driving".

While there is no legal definition of "driving", before a person can be considered to be driving, s/he must at least be in a position to control the movement and direction of the vehicle. S/he should also, generally, have control over its propulsion. For this reason, conduct such as steering a towed or disabled vehicle will generally not be considered "driving".

---

[459] This charge assumes that the vehicle driven by the accused was clearly a "motor vehicle". If this is in issue, the charge will need to be modified. See 7.2.5 Culpable Driving Causing Death for guidance on the definition of a "motor vehicle".

In deciding whether this element has been met, you should therefore consider the degree of control which NOA had over the vehicle. You should look at factors such as whether s/he could control the vehicle's acceleration and steering.

In this case, the prosecution submitted that NOA's acts were driving, because [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing that [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that what NOA was doing was "driving", that this first element will be met.

Culpable Driving

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused's driving was culpable.

The law defines "culpable" in a number of different ways. this case, it is alleged that there are two different ways[460] in which NOA drove "culpably".

First, it is alleged that s/he drove culpably because s/he drove [recklessly/with gross negligence/ while so affected by alcohol/drugs as to be incapable of having proper control of the vehicle].

Secondly, it is alleged that s/he drove culpably because s/he drove [recklessly/with gross negligence/ while so affected by alcohol/drugs as to be incapable of having proper control of the vehicle].

For this second element to be satisfied, you do not need to find that the accused acted both [insert basis one] and [insert basis two]. It is sufficient if you find one of these forms of culpability proven beyond reasonable doubt.

However, all twelve of you must agree that the same type of culpability has been proven. For example, all of you must agree that NOA was culpable because [insert basis one]. Or all of you must agree that NOA was culpable because [insert basis two].

If some of you find NOA culpable due to [insert basis one], and others find him/her culpable due to [insert basis two], then you will not have reached a unanimous verdict, as you are required to do.[461]

I will now look at each of these types of culpability in turn.

Recklessness

[If it is alleged that the accused was reckless, add the following shaded section.]

The [first/next] type of "culpability" alleged by the prosecution is recklessness. The law says that a person drove "recklessly" if s/he consciously and unjustifiably disregarded a substantial risk that his/her driving may cause another person to die or suffer really serious injury.

According to this definition, each of the following three matters must be proven beyond reasonable doubt for a person's driving to be considered "reckless":

First, the prosecution must prove that the accused was aware of a risk that death or really serious injury may result from his/her driving. When I say "really serious injury", I am not using a technical legal phrase. These are ordinary English words, and it is for you to determine what this phrase means

---

[460] It is possible that more than two different bases of culpability will have been alleged in the presentment. If so, this charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[461] This part of the charge assumes that the jury has been directed about the need for a unanimous verdict. If this has not occurred, the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

to you as jurors.

The prosecution must prove that NOA himself/herself knew of the risk of death or really serious injury. It is not enough that you, or a reasonable person, would have recognised those risks in the circumstances.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that the risk of death or really serious injury was "substantial". It is not sufficient for NOA to have known that there was some risk that death or really serious injury may be caused by his/her actions. The accused must have disregarded a substantial risk.

Thirdly, the prosecution must prove that the accused "consciously and unjustifiably" disregarded that risk. That is, knowing there was a substantial risk that driving in the circumstances may result in death or really serious injury, the accused consciously decided – without justification – to drive anyway.

[If voluntariness is in issue, add the following darker shaded section.]

In determining whether the accused's actions were reckless, you may only take into account his/her voluntary actions – actions which were committed consciously and deliberately. This is because the law says that a person cannot be held criminally responsible for actions which s/he committed involuntarily.[462]

In this case, the prosecution argued that each of these aspects of "recklessness" have been met. [Insert prosecution arguments and/or evidence.] The defence denied this, contending [insert defence arguments and/or evidence].

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was aware of a substantial risk that death or really serious injury may result from his/her driving, and s/he consciously and unjustifiably disregarded that risk, that s/he will have been culpable due to recklessness.

Gross Negligence

[If it is alleged that the accused was grossly negligent, add the following shaded section.]

The [first/next] type of "culpability" alleged by the prosecution is gross negligence. A person drives with "gross negligence" if his/her driving falls greatly short of the standard of care a reasonable person would have exercised, and involved a high risk that death or serious injury would result.[463]

This requires you to compare NOA's conduct with the "standard of care" that a reasonable person would have exercised in the circumstances. Precisely what that standard would have been is for you to decide, taking into account all of the circumstances in which NOA drove, such as [describe relevant factors, such as visibility, lighting, other cars and road markings].

This is an objective test. That means that the prosecution does not need to establish that NOA intended to cause death or serious injury or that s/he realised that his/her conduct was negligent.

---

[462] This section may need to be expanded, depending on the nature of the alleged involuntary action. See the section on falling asleep while driving under "gross negligence" below for an example.

[463] A "significant departure" from the standard of care required is not sufficient. Judges should be careful that the language of their direction does not deviate from the degree of negligence stipulated by the Act. See R v De'Zilwa (2002) 5 VR 408.

What matters is what a reasonable person in his/her situation would have known and done.

For this element to be met, you must find that the reasonable person in the accused's situation would have realised that his/her driving created a high risk of death or serious injury.

In making your determination, you should consider the reasonable person to be the same age as the accused, to have any specialised knowledge and experience the accused had, and to be of ordinary strength of mind. In particular, [describe characteristics of the accused that are relevant to the reasonable person, including training and experience].

[If there are qualities of the accused that are not relevant, add the shaded section below.]

However, the reasonable person is not [describe any adverse traits of the accused that are irrelevant, such as intoxication, concussion or carelessness].

In considering this question, remember that people do not always act perfectly. Even the most careful person can occasionally lose attention for a moment, or make minor mistakes. This offence is not concerned with minor breaches of the expected standard of care, even if they result in someone being hurt. While that might establish negligence in a civil case, it is not sufficient to establish guilt in a criminal case. For a person to be guilty of negligently causing serious injury, more is required – NOA's conduct must have involved a great falling short of the standard of care required and there must have been a high risk that death or serious injury would result. To emphasise the standard required, a substantial departure from the standard of care a reasonable person would exercise may not be enough. There must be a high degree of negligence, involving a great departure from the standard of care required, to constitute gross negligence.

[If the driver's speed is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

While the speed at which a person drives will be relevant to your decision, it will not be conclusive. It is just one factor to take into account. This is because it is possible for the accused to have driven above the speed limit, but not to have driven with gross negligence in the circumstances. Similarly, it is possible for the accused to have driven within the speed limit, but to have nevertheless driven with gross negligence.

[If voluntariness is in issue, add the following darker shaded section.]

In determining whether the accused's actions were grossly negligent, you may only take into account his/her voluntary actions. This is because the law says that a person cannot be held criminally responsible for actions which s/he committed involuntarily.

In this case, you have heard evidence that NOA fell asleep while driving, and that the collision occurred while s/he was sleeping.[464] Obviously, a person is not acting voluntarily when s/he is sleeping. You therefore cannot find that NOA was grossly negligent due to the way s/he drove whilst asleep.

However, that does not mean that you must acquit him/her if you find that s/he was asleep at the time of the collision. This second element will be satisfied if the prosecution can prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused drove in a grossly negligent fashion before falling asleep, when his/her actions were voluntary.

---

[464] This part of the charge has been drafted for use in cases where it is alleged that the accused fell asleep while driving. If it is alleged that the accused acted involuntarily for a different reason, it will need to be modified accordingly.

For example, you may find that it was grossly negligent for the accused to drive at all, or to continue to drive, given the likelihood that s/he would fall asleep. The law says that the accused will have been grossly negligent if:

- S/he drove when fatigued to such an extent that s/he knew, or ought to have known, that there was an appreciable risk of falling asleep or losing control of the vehicle; and

By driving in such a condition, s/he fell far short of the standard of care expected of a reasonable person, and created a high risk of death or serious injury.

To determine if this was the case, you must focus on the accused's driving prior to falling asleep. Consider factors such as any warning signs the accused may have had that s/he was likely to fall asleep. If you find that by driving, or continuing to drive, in such circumstances s/he was acting with gross negligence, this second element will be satisfied.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Alcohol and/or Drugs

[If it is alleged that the accused was affected by alcohol and/or drugs, add the following shaded section.]

The [first/next] type of "culpability" alleged by the prosecution is driving under the influence of [alcohol/drugs].[465] The law says that a person drove "culpably" if s/he drove while affected by [alcohol/drugs] to such an extent that s/he was incapable of exercising proper control over the vehicle.

This is not a question of whether the person actually exercises proper control over the vehicle. It is about whether s/he is capable of exercising such control. For this second element to be met, the accused must have been unable to exercise proper control over the vehicle, because of the effects of [alcohol/drugs].

It is therefore not enough for you simply to determine that the accused had [drunk alcohol/taken drugs] before driving. You must find that the [alcohol/drugs] affected NOA's capacity to drive to the necessary extent.

To determine whether this was the case, you must compare the capacity of the accused to control the vehicle with the capacity of a reasonably competent driver. If, as a result of the effects of [alcohol/drugs], the accused was unable to drive to the same standard, this second element will be satisfied in this way.

[If evidence that the accused's blood alcohol concentration exceeded the statutory limit is given, add the following darker shaded section.[466]]

In this case you have heard evidence that, when s/he was tested by police, the accused had a blood alcohol concentration of [insert blood alcohol concentration], which is above the [0.00 or 0.05] statutory limit for driving. If you find this to be proven, you may take it into account in assessing the extent to which s/he was influenced by alcohol.

---

[465] If it is alleged that the accused was affected by both alcohol and drugs, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[466] If evidence is given of positive drug test results, this section could be adapted accordingly.

However, this is just one factor to consider. You do not need to conclude that NOA was incapable of exercising proper control over the vehicle simply because his/her blood alcohol concentration exceeded the legal limit. A person may be over the limit and still be capable of exercising proper control.

Whether or not the accused was affected to the necessary extent is a question of fact for you to determine, taking into account all of the evidence.

[If evidence that the accused's blood alcohol concentration was within the statutory limit is given, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case you have heard evidence that, when s/he was tested by police, the accused had a blood alcohol concentration of [insert blood alcohol concentration], which is within the 0.05 statutory limit for driving. If you find this to be proven, you may take it into account in assessing the extent to which s/he was influenced by alcohol.

However, this is just one factor to consider. You do not need to conclude that NOA must have been capable of exercising proper control over the vehicle simply because his/her blood alcohol concentration was within the legal limit. A person can be under the limit, and yet be greatly affected by alcohol.

Whether or not the accused was affected to the necessary extent is a question of fact for you to determine, taking into account all of the evidence.

It is not necessary for you to find that the accused was unable to control the vehicle at the precise moment when the collision occurred. This element will be satisfied if you find that the accused was incapable of exercising proper control at any point in the drive leading up to the collision.

[If voluntariness is in issue, add the following darker shaded section.]

In determining whether the accused drove while affected by [alcohol/drugs] to such an extent that s/he was incapable of exercising proper control over the vehicle, you may only take into account his/her voluntary actions – actions which were committed consciously and deliberately. This is because the law says that a person cannot be held criminally responsible for actions which s/he committed involuntarily.[467]

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA was so affected by [alcohol/drugs] that s/he was incapable of exercising proper control over the vehicle. [Insert prosecution arguments and/or evidence.] The defence denied that NOA was affected by [alcohol/drugs] to the necessary extent, arguing [insert defence arguments and/or evidence].

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was so affected by [alcohol/drugs] as to be incapable of exercising proper control over the vehicle, that s/he will have been culpable in this way.

[467] This section may need to be expanded, depending on the nature of the alleged involuntary action. If it is alleged that the accused was so intoxicated that s/he was acting involuntarily, relevant parts of 8.7.1 Charge: Intoxication and Voluntariness should be inserted.

Need for Unanimity

To summarise, for this second element to be met, you must be satisfied that the accused's driving was culpable. In this case, the prosecution has alleged that the accused was culpable in two different ways: by [insert basis one] and [insert basis two].

Remember, you do not need to find that the accused was culpable in both of these ways. It is sufficient if you find one of these forms of culpability proven beyond reasonable doubt.

However, I want to emphasise again that, in order to reach a unanimous verdict, you must all agree that the same type of culpability has been proven. It is not enough for some of you to find NOA culpable due to [insert basis one], and others to find him/her culpable due to [insert basis two].

Causation

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that NOA's culpable driving caused NOV's death.

The nature of this requirement differs depending upon the type of culpability proven. For example, if you find that NOA was culpable because [insert basis one], you need to find that [insert basis one] caused NOV's death. However, if you find that NOA was culpable because [insert basis two], for this element to be satisfied you must find that [insert basis two] was the cause of death.

So in determining whether this element has been satisfied, you need to focus on the type or types of culpability you unanimously agreed was proven when considering the second element, if any. You must decide whether any of the proven types of culpable driving were the cause of NOV's death.

I will now examine each of these types of culpability in turn.

Recklessness

[If it is alleged that the accused was reckless, add the following shaded section.]

I [first/next] want to look at recklessness. If you find that the accused was culpable due to recklessness, then for this third element to be satisfied you must find that it was NOA's reckless driving that caused NOV to die. That is, his/her act of driving, despite knowing that there was a substantial risk of death or really serious injury, was the cause of death.

For this to be the case, you must find that NOV's death was caused by the occurrence of the risk that you found the accused was aware of, but chose to disregard. [Insert relevant example from the evidence.] It will not be sufficient for the death to have been caused by a different risk which the accused did not know about.

The accused's reckless driving does not need to have been the only cause of death, or the direct or immediate cause. You may find that his/her reckless driving caused the death if it was a substantial or significant cause of that result.

[If it is alleged that the death was caused by intervening acts, add the following darker shaded section.]

In making this determination, you need to decide whether it was the accused's acts which caused the death, or whether those acts merely provided the setting for the later acts of [insert intervening acts], which were the true cause of death. If NOA's acts only provided the setting, then s/he did not cause the death, and you must find him/her not guilty of culpable driving causing death.

You should approach this issue in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

In this case [insert competing arguments and evidence relating to causation].

Gross Negligence

[If it is alleged that the accused was grossly negligent, add the following shaded section.]

I [first/next] want to look at gross negligence. If you find that the accused was culpable due to gross negligence, then for this third element to be satisfied you must find that it was NOA's gross negligence that caused NOV to die. That is, the death resulted from NOA having driven in a way that fell far short of the standard of care expected of a reasonable person in the circumstances, and which held a high risk of death or serious injury.

For this to be the case, there must have been a relationship between the accused's negligence and the victim's death. It will not be sufficient if the collision simply happened to occur while NOA was driving negligently, but was not due to that negligence.

However, the accused's negligent driving does not need to have been the only cause of death, or the direct or immediate cause. You may find that his/her negligence caused the death if it was a substantial or significant cause of that result.

[If voluntariness is in issue, add the following darker shaded section.]

It must have been a voluntary act of the accused that caused the death. As I mentioned earlier, a person cannot be held responsible for acts s/he commits involuntarily.

This element will therefore not be satisfied if you decide that it was the acts of the accused whilst asleep that caused NOV's death.[468] For this element to be met, you must find that an act NOA committed before falling asleep – such as continuing to drive despite knowing that there was a high risk that s/he would fall asleep – was a substantial or significant cause of the death.

This will only be the case if that act was committed sufficiently close in time to the collision to be regarded as the cause of any harm inflicted while s/he was asleep.

[If it is alleged that the death was caused by intervening acts, add the following darker shaded section.]

In making this determination, you need to decide whether it was the accused's acts which caused the death, or whether those acts merely provided the setting for the later acts of [insert intervening acts], which were the true cause of death. If NOA's acts only provided the setting, then s/he did not cause the death, and you must find him/her not guilty of culpable driving causing death.

You should approach this issue in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

In this case [insert competing arguments and evidence relating to causation].

Alcohol and/or Drugs

[If it is alleged that the accused was affected by alcohol and/or drugs, add the following shaded section.]

I [first/next] want to look at driving under the influence of [alcohol/drugs]. If you find that the accused was culpable due to driving while affected by [alcohol/drugs] to such an extent that s/he was incapable of exercising proper control over the vehicle, then for this third element to be satisfied you only need to find that the accused's driving caused NOV's death. You do not need to find that the death was caused by the effects of the [alcohol/drugs] on NOA's ability to control the vehicle.

---

[468] This part of the charge has been drafted for use in cases where it is alleged that the accused fell asleep while driving. If it is alleged that the accused acted involuntarily for a different reason, it will need to be modified accordingly.

[If it is also alleged that the accused was culpable due to recklessness and/or gross negligence, add the following darker shaded section.]

This is different from what must be proved if you find the accused to have been [reckless/grossly negligent]. In that case, you need to find that it was the accused's [recklessness/negligence] that caused the death, not just his/her driving. However, if you find the accused to be culpable due to the effects of [alcohol/drugs], you are only required to find that the accused's driving caused the death.

The accused's driving does not need to have been the only cause of death, or the direct or immediate cause. You may find that his/her driving caused the death if it was a substantial or significant cause of that result.

[If it is alleged that the death was caused by intervening acts, add the following darker shaded section.]

In making this determination, you need to decide whether it was the accused's driving which caused the death, or whether it merely provided the setting for the later acts of [insert intervening acts], which were the true cause of death. If NOA's driving only provided the setting, then s/he did not cause the death, and you must find him/her not guilty of culpable driving causing death.

You should approach this issue in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

In this case [insert competing arguments and evidence relating to causation].

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of culpable driving causing death, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA was driving a motor vehicle; and

Two – That NOA's driving was culpable – that is, s/he drove [recklessly/with gross negligence/ while so affected by alcohol/drugs as to be incapable of having proper control of the vehicle]; and

Three – That NOA's culpable driving caused NOV's death.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of culpable driving causing death.

Dangerous Driving Causing Death

[In most cases it will be necessary to leave a dangerous driving offence as an alternative offence.[469] In such cases, a suitably modified version of the appropriate charge should be inserted here.[470]

When modifying the charge, the judge must carefully explain the differences between culpable and dangerous driving.[471] The content of the explanation will vary depending on the basis of culpability alleged in relation to the culpable driving offence. For example:

- Where it is alleged that the accused was reckless, the judge should explain that the culpable driving offence requires proof that the accused was aware that his/her driving created a substantial risk of death or serious injury, whereas the dangerous driving offence does not require proof that the accused was aware that his/her driving was dangerous.
- Where it is alleged that the accused was grossly negligent, the judge should explain that while dangerous driving is a serious offence, it is less serious than culpable driving. In addition, while culpable driving requires gross negligence, dangerous driving requires a serious breach of the proper management or control of a vehicle that creates a real risk that members of the public in the vicinity will be killed or seriously injured.
- Where it is alleged that the accused was affected by alcohol or drugs, the judge should explain that the dangerous driving offence requires proof that the dangerous driving caused the victim's death, whereas the culpable driving offence only requires proof that the driving (not the drugs or alcohol) caused the victim's death.]

Last updated: 23 October 2019

7.2.5.3 Checklist: Culpable Driving by Recklessness

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused was driving a motor vehicle; and
2. The accused's driving was culpable; and
3. The accused's culpable driving caused the victim's death.

Driving a Motor Vehicle

1. Was the accused driving a motor vehicle?

If Yes, then go to 2

---

[469] Crimes Act 1958 s 422A. Where the offence was alleged to have been committed between 13 October 2004 and 18 March 2008, "dangerous driving causing death or serious injury" should be left as an alternative. Where the offence was alleged to have been committed on or after 19 March 2008, "dangerous driving causing death" should be left as an alternative. See 7.2.6 Dangerous Driving Causing Death or Serious Injury for further information concerning the duty to leave dangerous driving as an alternative offence.

[470] See 7.2.6.1 Charge: Dangerous Driving Causing Death or Serious Injury.

[471] See 7.2.6 Dangerous Driving Causing Death or Serious Injury for information concerning the differences between the offences.

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Culpable Driving

Culpable Driving

2. Did the accused drive recklessly?

2.1 Was the accused aware of a risk that death or really serious injury may result from his/her driving?

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Culpable Driving

2.2 Was the risk of death or really serious injury substantial?

If Yes, then go to 2.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Culpable Driving

2.3 Did the accused consciously and unjustifiably disregard that risk?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Culpable Driving

Causation

3. Was the accused's reckless driving a substantial or significant cause of the victim's death?

*Consider – Was the victim's death caused by the occurrence of the risk that the accused was aware of, but chose to disregard?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Culpable Driving(as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2.1, 2.2 and 2.3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Culpable Driving

Last updated: 2 July 2019

7.2.5.4 Checklist: Culpable Driving by Gross Negligence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused was driving a motor vehicle; and
2. The accused's driving was culpable; and
3. The accused's culpable driving caused the victim's death.

Driving a Motor Vehicle

1. Was the accused driving a motor vehicle?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Culpable Driving

Culpable Driving

2. Did the accused drive in a way that was grossly negligent?

2.1 Did the accused grossly and unjustifiably fail to observe the standard of care that a reasonable person would have observed in the circumstances?

Consider – What were the circumstances in which the accused was driving?

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Culpable Driving

2.2 Did the accused's conduct fall so far short of that standard of care, and hold such a high risk of death or serious injury, that it constitutes gross negligence?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Culpable Driving

Causation

3. Was the accused's grossly negligent driving a substantial or significant cause of the victim's death?

Consider – Did the victim's death result from the accused driving in a way that fell far short of the standard of care expected of a reasonable person in the circumstances, and which involved a high risk of death or serious injury?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Culpable Driving (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2.1 and 2.2)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Culpable Driving

Last updated: 31 October 2018

7.2.5.5 Checklist: Culpable Driving by Influence of Alcohol

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused was driving a motor vehicle; and
2. The accused's driving was culpable; and
3. The accused's driving caused the victim's death.

Driving a Motor Vehicle

1. Was the accused driving a motor vehicle?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Culpable Driving

Culpable Driving

2. Did the accused drive while affected by alcohol to such an extent as to be incapable of having proper control over the motor vehicle?

Consider – Was the accused unable to drive to the same standard as a reasonably competent driver?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Culpable Driving

Causation

3. Was the accused's driving a substantial or significant cause of the victim's death?

Consider – The victim's death does not need to have been caused by the effects of the alcohol on the accused's driving.

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Culpable Driving (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1 and 2)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Culpable Driving

Last updated: 16 October 2007

7.2.5.6 Checklist: Culpable Driving by Influence of Drugs

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused was driving a motor vehicle; and
2. The accused's driving was culpable; and
3. The accused's driving caused the victim's death.

Driving a Motor Vehicle

1. Was the accused driving a motor vehicle?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Culpable Driving

Culpable Driving

2. Did the accused drive while affected by drugs to such an extent as to be incapable of having proper control over the motor vehicle?

Consider – Was the accused unable to drive to the same standard as a reasonably competent driver?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Culpable Driving

Causation

3. Was the accused's driving a substantial or significant cause of the victim's death?

Consider – The victim's death does not need to have been caused by the effects of the drugs on the accused's driving.

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Culpable Driving (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1 and 2)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Culpable Driving

Last updated: 16 October 2007

7.2.6 Dangerous Driving Causing Death or Serious Injury

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Commencement Information

1. Prior to 2004, there were two main serious driving offences in Victoria:
    - "Culpable driving causing death", carrying a maximum penalty of 20 years imprisonment and a minimum licence disqualification period of two years (Crimes Act 1958 s 318); and
    - "Dangerous driving", carrying a maximum penalty of two years imprisonment and a minimum licence disqualification period of six months (Road Safety Act 1986 s 64).
2. In 2004, the offence of "dangerous driving causing death or serious injury" was created, to fill a perceived gap in the seriousness between these two offences (Second Reading Speech, Hansard, Legislative Assembly, Mr Hulls, 3 June 2004, 1798). This offence, which commenced operation on 13 October 2004, carried a maximum penalty of five years imprisonment and a minimum licence disqualification period of 18 months (Crimes Act 1958 s 319).
3. In 2008, the offence of "dangerous driving causing death or serious injury" was divided into separate offences of "dangerous driving causing death" and "dangerous driving causing serious injury". The new offences, which differ only in the degree of injury inflicted, carry a maximum penalty of 10 years' and 5 years' imprisonment respectively (Crimes (Child Homicide) Act 2008 s 5).
4. This change only applies to offences committed on or after 19 March 2008. For offences occurring between 13 October 2004 and 18 March 2008, the offence of dangerous driving causing death or serious injury will continue to apply (Crimes Act 1958 s 610).
5. References to "dangerous driving" encompass the three offences of:
    - Dangerous driving causing death or serious injury (available for offences committed between 13 October 2004 and 18 March 2008);
    - Dangerous driving causing death (available for offences committed from 19 March 2008); and
    - Dangerous driving causing serious injury (available for offences committed from 19 March 2008).

When to Leave Dangerous Driving as an Alternative Verdict

6. For offences occurring between 13 October 2004 and 18 March 2008, "dangerous driving causing death or serious injury" is available as an alternative verdict to the offences of "culpable driving causing death" and "negligently causing serious injury" (Crimes Act 1958 s 422A).
7. For offences committed from 19 March 2008 onwards:
    - "Dangerous driving causing death" is available as an alternative verdict to the offence of "culpable driving causing death"; and
    - "Dangerous driving causing serious injury" is available as an alternative verdict to the offence of "negligently causing serious injury" (Crimes Act 1958 s 422A).
8. The relevant dangerous driving offence should generally be left as an alternative in any trial involving a motor vehicle incident, where the driver is charged with culpable driving causing death or negligently causing serious injury (R v Saad (2005) 156 A Crim R 533; R v DD (2007) 19 VR 143; R v Kane (2001) 3 VR 542).
9. See 3.10 Alternative Verdicts for further information concerning the requirement to leave alternative offences to the jury.

Elements

10. Dangerous driving has the following three elements,[472] each of which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

    i) The accused was driving a motor vehicle;

    ii) The accused drove dangerously; and

    iii) The dangerous driving caused the death or serious injury of another person.

Driving a Motor Vehicle

11. For the first element to be met, the jury must be satisfied that:
    - The accused was driving; and
    - The vehicle the accused was driving was a motor vehicle.

"Driving"

12. "Drive" is an ordinary English word. There is no exhaustive legal definition of when a person "drives" a motor vehicle (Tink v Francis [1983] 2 VR 17).
13. However, before a person can be considered to be driving, he or she must at least be in a position to control the movement and direction of the vehicle (Tink v Francis [1983] 2 VR 17).
14. To be "driving", a person must also, generally, have control over the propulsion of the vehicle (Tink v Francis [1983] 2 VR 17; Davies v Waldron [1989] VR 449).

---

[472] In some cases the prosecution will also have to prove that the accused's conduct was voluntary – see below.

15. In most cases it will be clear whether or not the accused was "driving". However, issues may arise where:

    - The vehicle was not fully operational at the relevant time (e.g. the engine, steering or brakes were not working);
    - The vehicle was not being propelled by its own motor force (e.g. the car was being towed or was coasting downhill);[473] or
    - The vehicle was stationary at the relevant time (e.g. the vehicle was stopped at traffic lights).

16. In each of these cases the accused may or may not have been driving, depending on the degree of control the accused had over the propulsion, movement and direction of the vehicle. See Tink v Francis [1983] 2 VR 17 for a detailed analysis of this issue.

17. Whether or not the accused was "driving" a motor vehicle in such circumstances will be a question of fact for the jury to determine, taking into account all of the surrounding circumstances (Pullin v Insurance Commissioner [1971] VR 263).

"Motor Vehicle"

18. A "motor vehicle" is a vehicle that is used, or intended to be used, on a highway, and that is built to be propelled by a motor that forms part of the vehicle but does not include:

    - A vehicle intended to be used on a railway or tramway; or
    - A motorised wheel-chair capable of a speed of not more than 10 kilometres per hour which is used solely for the conveyance of an injured or disabled person; or
    - A vehicle that is not a motor vehicle by virtue of a declaration (Road Safety Act 1986 s 3; Crimes Act 1958 s 2A).

19. This definition requires the vehicle to be one that is normally used on a highway. It is not enough that the vehicle, at the time in question, was in use on a highway (Smith v Transport Accident Commission (2005) 12 VR 277; Transport Accident Commission v Serbec (1993) 6 VAR 151; Elizabeth Valley Pty Ltd v Fordham (1970) 16 FLR 459).

Dangerous Driving

20. The second element requires the accused to have driven "at a speed or in a manner that is dangerous to the public having regard to all the circumstances of the case" (Crimes Act 1958 s 319(1)).

21. Section 319 creates an offence which can be committed by either driving at a speed that is dangerous to the public or driving in a manner dangerous to the public (Hedberg v Woodhall (1913) 15 CLR 531; R v Coventry (1938) 59 CLR 633; R v Burnside [1962] VR 96).

22. All matters concerned with the control and management of the vehicle are part of the accused's "manner of driving". This includes speed, navigation and communication with other drivers (R v Coventry (1938) 59 CLR 633; R v Burnside [1962] VR 96).

23. There is no need to prove a course of conduct. "Manner of driving" covers all of the acts and omissions of a driver, including casual or transitory acts. A single dangerous act is sufficient (R v Coventry (1938) 59 CLR 633; R v Burnside [1962] VR 96).

---

[473] Road Safety Act 1986 s 3AB states that a person who is steering a towed vehicle is taken to be driving for the purposes of that Act. However, as this expanded definition of driving is not incorporated into the Crimes Act 1958, the matters discussed in Tink v Francis [1983] 2 VR 17 continue to apply to the offence of dangerous driving.

Serious Breach of the Management or Control of the Vehicle

24. The speed or manner in which the accused drove must have involved such a serious breach of the proper management or control of the vehicle (R v De Montero (2009) 25 VR 694; McBride v The Queen (1966) 115 CLR 44; King v The Queen (2012) 245 CLR 588).

25. This test will only be satisfied if the speed or manner in which the accused drove posed a real, and not just speculative, danger to other members of the public who may have been in the vicinity (R v De Montero (2009) 25 VR 694; R v Guthridge (2010) 27 VR 452; McBride v The Queen (1966) 115 CLR 44; King v The Queen (2012) 245 CLR 588).

26. It is not necessary to prove that the accused intended to drive dangerously, or was aware that his or her conduct was dangerous to the public. This test may be satisfied even if the accused was driving at his or her (incompetent) best (R v Coventry (1938) 59 CLR 633; R v Goodman NSWCCA 10/12/1991; R v Evans [1963] 1 QB 412).

27. The accused's state of mind (whether established by admissions or inference from post-offence conduct) will therefore only be relevant insofar as it provides evidence concerning the circumstances of the offence (see below) (see, e.g. R v Dickinson [2007] VSCA 111).

28. Any harm caused by the accused's driving may be used as evidence of the seriousness of the breach (McBride v The Queen (1966) 115 CLR 44).

29. However, the mere fact that a collision has occurred is not conclusive evidence of a serious breach. The law does not require drivers to act with perfect hindsight, or assume that for every accident there must be a remedy (R v Smith [2006] VSCA 92).

30. An error of judgment in a situation of sudden crisis, or a failure to successfully take evasive action, may not constitute a sufficiently serious breach (R v Jiminez (1992) 173 CLR 572, 578–579; R v Coventry (1938) 59 CLR 633, 638).

Circumstances of the Offence

31. The jury must consider the accused's driving in the circumstances of the alleged offence. The driving may be dangerous because:

    - It was intrinsically dangerous in all circumstances; or
    - It was dangerous in the particular circumstances surrounding the driving (McBride v The Queen (1952) 87 CLR 115; King v The Queen (2012) 245 CLR 588).

32. The conditions of the road, and the size and speed of the driver's vehicle, may all be relevant to the jury's determination (R v Rudebeck [1999] VSCA 155).

33. In addition to considering the accused's physical control of the vehicle, the jury may also consider the question of whether, in all the circumstances, the accused should have been driving at all. In making this determination, the jury can take into account factors such as the condition of the vehicle, the time of driving, lighting conditions, heating and the ventilation of the vehicle (Jiminez v R (1992) 173 CLR 572; Giorgianni v The Queen (1985) 156 CLR 473).

34. The accused may have driven dangerously if s/he was so fatigued that s/he knew, or ought to have known, that there was an appreciable risk of falling asleep or losing control of the vehicle while driving (Jiminez v The Queen (1992) 173 CLR 572; R v Kroon (1990) 55 SASR 476). See "Voluntariness" in 7.2.5 Culpable Driving Causing Death for a detailed discussion of this issue.

35. Whether driving is dangerous due to a lack of attention will depend on all the circumstances. Inattention may be dangerous where it prevents the driver from avoiding other hazards. However, the level of attention required for safe driving is not constant, and depends on the terrain, environment and traffic conditions (Georgiou v The Queen [2022] VSCA 172, [21]).

36. Driving a motor vehicle in a seriously defective condition may constitute a serious breach of the proper management and control of the vehicle, even if the defect does not manifest itself until such time as the vehicle is out of the control of the driver (Jiminez v The Queen (1992) 173 CLR 572).[474]

37. While adherence to the speed limit (or disregard of that limit) will be relevant to determining the seriousness of the breach, it will not be conclusive. There must be a connection between the speed alleged and the creation of danger (R v De Montero (2009) 25 VR 694; Black v Goldman [1919] VLR 689; Buckley v Bowes [1925] VLR 530).

38. It therefore seems likely that an accused can be convicted of dangerous driving causing death or serious injury even if s/he was travelling under the speed limit (see, e.g. R v Rudebeck [1999] VSCA 155; R v De Montero (2009) 25 VR 694).

Ordinary Risks of the Road

39. The accused's driving must have created risks that significantly exceeded the risks which are ordinarily associated with driving (which is an inherently risky activity). The accused's manner of driving must have created a risk of harm which is not a fair or necessary risk of the road (R v De Montero (2009) 25 VR 694; R v Guthridge (2010) 27 VR 452; R v Duncan SASC 08/05/1953; Jiminez v The Queen (1992) 173 CLR 572; R v Mayne (1975) 11 SASR 583; King v The Queen (2012) 245 CLR 588; [2012] HCA 24).

40. In assessing the extent of the risk, the jury must consider both the likelihood of a collision, and the seriousness of any likely injuries if a collision does occur (Pope v Hall (1982) 30 SASR 78).

41. It is not necessary for the prosecution to identify a particular person who was endangered by the driving. The public includes actual or potential road users (R v Smith [1969] Tas SR 159; Wynwood v Williams (2000) 111 A Crim R 435).

42. Members of the public include passengers travelling with the accused (R v Burnside [1962] VR 96).

The Dangerous Driving "Caused" Death or Serious Injury

43. The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused's dangerous driving caused the death or serious injury of another person.

44. There are two aspects to this element:

    - The dangerous driving must have caused the victim to die or to suffer serious injury; and
    - The victim must have been a "person".

Causation

45. The test for causation is the same as that found in culpable driving by recklessness or gross negligence. See 7.1.2 Causation and 7.2.5 Culpable Driving Causing Death for detailed information.

46. The prosecution must prove that it was the dangerous driving that caused the relevant death or serious injury. It is not sufficient to prove that the accused's driving caused the death. This is likely to be an issue where there is a reasonable possibility that the victim would have been killed or seriously injured even if the accused's driving was not dangerous (Kennett v The King [2022] VSCA 202, [26]–[34]).

---

[474] In such circumstances, the accused may be able to rely on the defence of honest and reasonable mistake of fact (Jiminez v The Queen (1992) 173 CLR 572).

Death or Serious Injury

47. To be found guilty of this offence, the accused must have either caused a person to die, or to suffer serious injury (Crimes Act 1958 s 319). This is the only difference (apart from penalty) between this offence and dangerous driving under s 64 of the Road Safety Act (DPP v Oates [2007] VSCA 59; R v De Montero (2009) 25 VR 694).

48. For information about causing death, see 7.2.1 Intentional or Reckless Murder and 7.2.5 Culpable Driving Causing Death For information about causing serious injury, see 7.4.2 Intentionally Causing Serious Injury.

Voluntariness

49. This issue of voluntariness in relation to dangerous driving is the same as for culpable driving causing death. See 7.2.5 Culpable Driving Causing Death for information on this issue.

Complicity

50. Where the accused participates in a race on a public road in which another participant in the race directly causes the death of the victim, the jury may find that the parties were acting in concert or that the accused aided and abetted the other participant (R v Guthridge (2010) 27 VR 452).

51. In such cases, it will generally be preferable for the prosecution to present the accused on the basis that he or she aided or abetted the principal offender. Such an approach avoids the artificiality of relying on an implied agreement or understanding, and will simplify jury directions (R v Guthridge (2010) 27 VR 452).

52. However, where there is cogent evidence of an agreement or understanding between the parties, it will be appropriate for the prosecution to rely upon concert (R v Guthridge (2010) 27 VR 452).

53. See 5.2 Statutory Complicity, 5.3 Joint Criminal Enterprise and 5.5 Aiding, Abetting, Counselling or Procuring for information concerning these types of complicity.

Dangerous, Culpable and Negligent Driving

54. Dangerous driving is an alternative offence to culpable driving causing death or negligently causing serious injury (Crimes Act 1958 s 422A).

55. However, a majority of the High Court has held that dangerous driving is not a species of negligence (King v The Queen (2012) 245 CLR 588 (Bell J contra)). While Bell J has held that the difference between negligent culpable driving and dangerous driving is a difference of degree rather than kind, this was a dissenting view.

56. When dangerous driving is left to the jury as an alternative offence, the judge must clearly direct the jury about the differences between the two offences (R v De Montero (2009) 25 VR 694; King v R (2011) 32 VR 233; R v Buttsworth [1983] 1 NSWLR 658; McBride v The Queen (1966) 115 CLR 44; Jiminez v The Queen (1992) 173 CLR 572).

57. The judge should explain the following matters to the jury:

    - The offence of dangerous driving, though a serious offence, involves conduct that is less blameworthy than culpable driving;
    - While culpable driving may require proof of gross negligence, dangerous driving requires proof that the accused's driving involves a serious breach of the proper management or control of the vehicle that created a real risk that members of the public will be killed or seriously injured (R v De Montero (2009) 25 VR 694; King v The Queen (2012) 245 CLR 588).

Last updated: 14 May 2024

7.2.6.1 Charge: Dangerous Driving Causing Death or Serious Injury

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge may be given when the accused is charged with Dangerous driving causing death on or after 19/03/2008, Dangerous driving causing serious injury on or after 1/07/2013 or Dangerous driving causing death or serious injury between 13/10/2004 and 18/03/2008, where the conduct caused death.

The judge should adapt the charge to state the correct name of the offence and whether the prosecution allege that the accused's dangerous driving caused death or serious injury.

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of dangerous driving causing [death/serious injury]. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – at the time of the offence, the accused was driving a motor vehicle.

Two – the accused was driving at a speed or in a manner that was dangerous to the public.

Three – the dangerous driving caused the victim to [die/be seriously injured].

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Driving

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused was driving a motor vehicle.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA was driving a motor vehicle when [describe relevant incident]. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If it is alleged that someone else was driving at the relevant time, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution submitted that it was NOA who was driving the [describe vehicle] when [describe relevant incident and outline relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, alleging that [insert relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to decide whether it was NOA who was driving at the relevant time. It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he was, that this first element will be met.

[Add directions about any other issues that have arisen in relation to the first element (e.g. that the accused was not driving a "motor vehicle"; that the accused's acts did not constitute "driving"; that the accused's acts were not voluntary). See 7.2.5.1 Charge: Culpable Driving – One Basis of Culpability for an example of directions on what it means to "drive" a motor vehicle, as well as on the issue of voluntariness.]

Dangerous Driving

The second element the prosecution must prove is that the accused was driving at a speed or in a manner that was dangerous to the public. That is, his/her driving involved a serious breach of the proper management or control of a vehicle which created a real risk that members of the public in the vicinity would be killed or seriously injured.

In determining whether this was the case, remember that people do not always drive as they should. Even the best drivers occasionally lose attention for a moment, or make minor mistakes. For this element to be satisfied, the accused must have driven at a speed or in a manner that significantly increased the risk of serious injury or death, over and above the ordinary risks of the road. This could be because NOA's driving increased the likelihood of a collision, or because it made it more likely that any injuries suffered in a collision would be serious.

The accused's manner of driving includes all matters concerned with the management and control of the vehicle, such as the accused's technical driving skill. As part of this, you will consider the condition of his/her vehicle.

In determining whether NOA's driving was dangerous, you must consider all of the circumstances in which s/he was driving. In this case, that includes [describe relevant circumstances, such as time of day, weather, lighting, condition of the driver, road conditions, traffic and vehicle condition].

However, you must not assume that simply because there was a collision, NOA's driving must have been dangerous. Sometimes accidents happen, for which no one will be criminally responsible.

[If the driver's speed is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

While the speed at which a person drives will be relevant to your decision, it will not be conclusive. It is just one factor to take into account. This is because it is possible for the accused to have driven above the speed limit, but not to have driven dangerously in the circumstances. Similarly, it is possible for the accused to have driven within the speed limit, but to have nevertheless driven dangerously.

[If voluntariness is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In determining whether the accused's driving was dangerous, you may only take into account his/her voluntary actions. This is because the law says that a person cannot be held criminally responsible for actions which s/he committed involuntarily.

In this case, you have heard evidence that NOA fell asleep while driving, and that the collision occurred while s/he was sleeping.[475] Obviously, a person is not acting voluntarily when s/he is sleeping. You therefore cannot find that NOA drove dangerously due to the way s/he drove whilst asleep.

However, that does not mean that you must acquit him/her if you find that s/he was asleep at the time of the collision. This second element will be satisfied if the prosecution can prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused drove dangerously before falling asleep, when his/her actions were voluntary.

To determine if this was the case, you must focus on the accused's driving prior to falling asleep. Consider factors such as any warning signs the accused may have had that s/he was likely to fall asleep. If you find that by driving, or continuing to drive, in such circumstances s/he was creating a real risk of killing or seriously injuring others, this second element will be satisfied.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA's manner of driving was dangerous because [insert prosecution arguments and/or evidence, clearly identifying the facts alleged to have made it dangerous]. The defence denied that NOA's driving was dangerous, arguing [insert defence arguments and/or evidence].

This second element will only be met if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that his/her driving involved a serious breach of the proper management or control of a vehicle which created a real risk that members of the public in the vicinity would be killed or seriously injured.

---

[475] This part of the charge has been drafted for use in cases where it is alleged that the accused fell asleep while driving. If it is alleged that the accused acted involuntarily for a different reason, it will need to be modified accordingly.

Causation

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that NOA's dangerous driving caused NOV to [die/be seriously injured]. That is, NOV must have [died/suffered a serious injury] as a result of NOA driving at a speed or in a manner that was dangerous to the public.

For this to be the case, there must have been a relationship between the accused's dangerous driving and the victim's [death/injury]. It will not be sufficient if the collision simply happened to occur while NOA was driving dangerously, but was not due to his/her dangerous driving.

However, the accused's dangerous driving does not need to have been the only cause of NOV's [death/injury], or the direct or immediate cause. You may find that NOA's dangerous driving caused NOV to die/be seriously injured] if it was a substantial or significant cause of that result.

[If it is alleged that NOV was seriously injured, add the following shaded section.]

This element requires NOA's dangerous driving to have caused NOV to be seriously injured. It is not sufficient for NOV to have merely been injured.

The law defines the word injury to mean physical injury or harm to mental health, whether temporary or permanent. A serious injury is an injury which endangers life or is substantial and protracted.[476]

[If multiple injuries were inflicted, add the following darker shaded section.]

In making your decision, you do not have to look at each of NOV's injuries separately, and decide whether or not any one of them is a serious injury. A person may suffer a serious injury because of the cumulative effect of several injuries.

[If the physical injuries caused ongoing psychological harm, add the following darker shaded section.]

An injury may be substantial and protracted because of the combined effect of the immediate physical injuries and prolonged psychological injuries.

[Add directions about any other issues that have arisen in relation to the third element, e.g. "that the death was caused by an intervening act"/"that the death was not caused by a voluntary act". See 7.2.5.1 Charge: Culpable Driving – One Basis of Culpability for an example of directions on intervening acts, as well as on the issue of voluntariness.]

You should approach this element in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

In this case [insert competing arguments and evidence relating to causation].

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of dangerous driving causing [death/serious injury], the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that when the offence was committed:

One – NOA was driving a motor vehicle; and

---

[476] The judge should consider including an example of a serious injury, such as brain damage, or a stabbing which causes significant blood loss.

Two – NOA was driving at a speed or in a manner that was dangerous to the public; and Three – NOA's dangerous driving caused NOV to [die/suffer serious injury].

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of dangerous driving causing [death/serious injury].

Comparison with Culpable Driving

[Where dangerous driving causing death is left as an alternative to culpable driving, the judge should explain the differences between the two offences.

The content of the explanation will vary depending on the basis of culpability alleged in relation to the culpable driving offence. For example:

- Where it is alleged that the accused was reckless, the judge should explain that the culpable driving offence requires proof that the accused was aware that his/her driving created a substantial risk of death or serious injury, whereas the dangerous driving offence does not require proof that the accused was aware that his/her driving was dangerous.
- Where it is alleged that the accused was grossly negligent, the judge should explain that while dangerous driving is also a serious offence, it is less serious than culpable driving. In addition, while culpable driving requires gross negligence, dangerous driving requires a serious breach of the proper management or control of a vehicle that creates a real risk that members of the public in the vicinity will be killed or seriously injured.
- Where it is alleged that the accused was affected by alcohol or drugs, the judge should explain that the dangerous driving offence requires proof that the dangerous driving caused the victim's death, whereas the culpable driving offence only requires proof that the driving (not the drugs or alcohol) caused the victim's death.]

Last updated: 30 November 2015

7.2.6.2 Charge: Dangerous Driving Causing Serious Injury (Pre-1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge may be given when the accused is charged with Dangerous driving causing serious injury between 19/03/2008 and 30/06/2013 or Dangerous driving causing death or serious injury between 13/10/2004 and 18/03/2008, where the conduct caused serious injury.

The judge should adapt the charge to state the correct name of the offence and whether the prosecution allege that the accused's dangerous driving caused death or serious injury.

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of dangerous driving causing serious injury. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – at the time of the offence, the accused was driving a motor vehicle.

Two – the accused was driving at a speed or in a manner that was dangerous to the public.

Three – the dangerous driving caused the victim to be seriously injured.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Driving

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused was driving a motor vehicle.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA was driving a motor vehicle when [describe relevant incident]. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If it is alleged that someone else was driving at the relevant time, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution submitted that it was NOA who was driving the [describe vehicle] when [describe relevant incident and outline relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, alleging that [insert relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to decide whether it was NOA who was driving at the relevant time. It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he was, that this first element will be met.

[Add directions about any other issues that have arisen in relation to the first element, e.g. "that the accused was not driving a "motor vehicle""/"that the accused's acts did not constitute "driving""/"that the accused's acts were not voluntary." See 7.2.5.1 Charge: Culpable Driving – One Basis of Culpability for an example of directions on what it means to "drive" a motor vehicle, as well as on the issue of voluntariness.]

Dangerous Driving

The second element the prosecution must prove is that the accused was driving at a speed or in a manner that was dangerous to the public. That is, his/her driving involved a serious breach of the proper management or control of a vehicle which created a real risk that members of the public in the vicinity would be killed or seriously injured.

In determining whether this was the case, remember that people do not always drive as they should. Even the best drivers occasionally lose attention for a moment, or make minor mistakes. For this element to be satisfied, the accused must have driven at a speed or in a manner that significantly increased the risk of serious injury or death, over and above the ordinary risks of the road. This could be because NOA's driving increased the likelihood of a collision, or because it made it more likely that any injuries suffered in a collision would be serious.

The accused's manner of driving includes all matters concerned with the management and control of the vehicle, such as the accused's technical driving skill. As part of this, you will consider the condition of his/her vehicle.

In determining whether NOA's driving was dangerous, you must consider all of the circumstances in which s/he was driving. In this case, that includes [describe relevant circumstances, such as time of day, weather, lighting, condition of the driver, road conditions, traffic and vehicle condition].

However, you must not assume that simply because there was a collision, NOA's driving must have been dangerous. Sometimes accidents happen, for which no one will be criminally responsible.

[If the driver's speed is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

While the speed at which a person drives will be relevant to your decision, it will not be conclusive. It is just one factor to take into account. This is because it is possible for the accused to have driven above the speed limit, but not to have driven dangerously in the circumstances. Similarly, it is possible for the accused to have driven within the speed limit, but to have nevertheless driven dangerously.

[If voluntariness is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In determining whether the accused's driving was dangerous, you may only take into account his/her voluntary actions. This is because the law says that a person cannot be held criminally responsible for actions which s/he committed involuntarily.

In this case, you have heard evidence that NOA fell asleep while driving, and that the collision occurred while s/he was sleeping.[477] Obviously, a person is not acting voluntarily when s/he is sleeping. You therefore cannot find that NOA drove dangerously due to the way s/he drove whilst asleep.

However, that does not mean that you must acquit him/her if you find that s/he was asleep at the time of the collision. This second element will be satisfied if the prosecution can prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused drove dangerously before falling asleep, when his/her actions were voluntary.

To determine if this was the case, you must focus on the accused's driving prior to falling asleep. Consider factors such as any warning signs the accused may have had that s/he was likely to fall asleep. If you find that by driving, or continuing to drive, in such circumstances s/he was creating a real risk of killing or seriously injuring others, this second element will be satisfied.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA's manner of driving was dangerous because [insert prosecution arguments and/or evidence, clearly identifying the facts alleged to have made it dangerous]. The defence denied that NOA's driving was dangerous, arguing [insert defence arguments and/or evidence].

This second element will only be met if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that his/her driving involved a serious breach of the proper management or control of a vehicle which created a real risk that members of the public in the vicinity would be killed or seriously injured.

Causation

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that NOA's dangerous driving caused NOV to be seriously injured. That is, NOV must have suffered a serious injury as a result of NOA driving at a speed or in a manner that was dangerous to the public.

For this to be the case, there must have been a relationship between the accused's dangerous driving and the victim's injury. It will not be sufficient if the collision simply happened to occur while NOA was driving dangerously, but was not due to his/her dangerous driving.

However, the accused's dangerous driving does not need to have been the only cause of NOV's injury, or the direct or immediate cause. You may find that NOA's dangerous driving caused NOV to be seriously injured if it was a substantial or significant cause of that result.

This element requires NOA's dangerous driving to have caused NOV to be seriously injured. It is not sufficient for NOV to have merely been injured. The law does not define the term "serious injury" – it is for you, as members of the jury, to determine whether the harm caused to NOV was sufficiently severe to be called a "serious injury".

In making this determination, you may take into account any physical injuries suffered by NOV, as well as matters such as [insert any relevant matters, such as pain, unconsciousness, hysteria or bodily impairments].

You are not required to look at each of NOV's injuries separately and assess whether or not they are "serious". A person may suffer a "serious injury" because of a combination of injuries.

[Add directions about any other issues that have arisen in relation to the third element, e.g. "that the injury was caused by an intervening act"/"that the injury was not caused by a voluntary act." See 7.2.5.1 Charge: Culpable Driving – One Basis of Culpability for an example of directions on intervening acts, as well as on the issue of voluntariness.]

---

[477] This part of the charge has been drafted for use in cases where it is alleged that the accused fell asleep while driving. If it is alleged that the accused acted involuntarily for a different reason, it will need to be modified accordingly.

You should approach this element in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

In this case [insert competing arguments and evidence relating to causation].

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of dangerous driving causing serious injury, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that when the offence was committed:

One – NOA was driving a motor vehicle; and

Two – NOA was driving at a speed or in a manner that was dangerous to the public; and Three – NOA's dangerous driving caused NOV to suffer serious injury].

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of dangerous driving causing serious injury.

Last updated: 30 November 2015

7.2.6.3 Checklist: Dangerous Driving Causing Death

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused was driving a motor vehicle; and
2. The accused was driving dangerously; and
3. The accused's dangerous driving caused the victim's death.

Driving a Motor Vehicle

1. Was the accused driving a motor vehicle?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Dangerous Driving Causing Death

---

Dangerous Driving

2. Did the accused drive dangerously?

Consider – Did his/her driving involve a serious breach of the proper management or control of a vehicle which created a real risk that members of the public in the vicinity would be killed or seriously injured?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Dangerous Driving Causing Death

---

Causing Death

3. Was the accused's dangerous driving a substantial or significant cause of the victim's death?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Dangerous Driving Causing Death (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1 and 2)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Dangerous Driving Causing Death

Last updated: 25 July 2012

7.2.6.4 Checklist: Dangerous Driving Causing Serious Injury

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist is for conduct occurring on or after 1 July 2013. It must be adapted for conduct before that date.

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused was driving a motor vehicle; and
2. The accused was driving dangerously; and
3. The accused's dangerous driving caused the victim serious injury.

Driving a Motor Vehicle

1. Was the accused driving a motor vehicle?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Dangerous Driving Causing Death

Dangerous Driving

2. Did the accused drive dangerously?

Consider – Did his/her driving involve a serious breach of the proper management or control of a vehicle which created a real risk that members of the public in the vicinity would be killed or seriously injured?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Dangerous Driving Causing Death

Causing Serious Injury

3. Did the accused's dangerous driving cause the victim serious injury?

3.1 Were the victim's injuries serious?

Consider – A serious injury is an injury which endangers life or is substantial and protracted.

If Yes, then go to 3.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Dangerous Driving Causing Serious Injury

3.2 Was the accused's dangerous driving a substantial or significant cause of those injuries?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Dangerous Driving Causing Serious Injury (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2, and 3.1)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Dangerous Driving Causing Serious Injury

Last updated: 30 November 2015

7.3 Sexual Offences

7.3.1 Statutory Directions in Sexual Offence Cases

The Jury Directions Act 2015 contains several provisions which only apply in cases involving sexual offences. Information on these provisions is available in the following subchapters, and concern the following issues:

- 7.3.1.2 Consent and reasonable belief in consent (From 1/7/15)
- 7.3.1.4 Effect of delayed complaint on credit
- 7.3.1.5 Differences in a complainant's account
- 7.3.1.6 Evidence of a post-offence relationship
- 7.3.1.7 Distress

To support the identification of the need for these statutory directions, Jury Directions Act 2015 Part 5, Division 1AA allows a judge to request, in a proceeding that relates to a sexual offence (including a conspiracy, incitement or attempt to commit a sexual offence), that the parties inform the judge whether there is likely to be evidence that would provide a good reason for giving any of the directions contained in Part 5. This power to request information from the parties does not oblige the judge to form a view, at that time, about whether to give the direction. Further, the power to request information is discretionary, and it will be a matter for the judge to decide whether to invoke that process (see Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 44O, 44P).

Two other directions which may arise in sexual offences cases, but are not limited by the Jury Directions Act 2015 to such cases, are Delay Causing Forensic Disadvantage and Delay Risking Honest but Erroneous Memory.

Last updated: 1 January 2023

7.3.1.1 Early Directions on Jury Assessment of Evidence about Consent and Reasonable Belief in Consent

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. Part 5 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 prescribes a series of directions that may or must be given in criminal proceedings that relate to a charge for a sexual offence, or a charge of conspiracy or incitement to commit a sexual offence.
2. Division 1A of Part 5 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 is titled "Consent and reasonable belief in consent (offences before, on or after 1 July 2015)". It was inserted by s 48 of the Justice Legislation Amendment (Sexual Offences and Other Matters) Act 2022, which commenced operation on 1 January 2023.
3. By clause 6(4)(a) of Schedule 1 of the Jury Directions Act 2015, Division 1A applies to a trial that commences on or after 1 January 2023.
4. Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47C provides that a judge must give directions on any of the following topics the judge considers there are good reasons to give:

- The absence of physical injury, violence or a threat;
- Responses to non-consensual acts;
- Other sexual activity;
- Personal appearance and irrelevant conduct;
- Non-consensual sexual acts between all sorts of people;
- General assumptions not informing a reasonable belief in consent.

5. These directions apply even if the absence of consent is not an element of the offence. In such circumstances, the judge may use a form of words which reflects that absence of consent is not an element, regardless of whether or how consent is referred to in the provision (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47A(2)–(4)).
6. In deciding whether there are good reasons to give one or more of these directions, the judge must have regard to any submissions by the prosecution and defence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47C(2)).
7. A direction identified under s 47C must be given at the earliest time in the trial the judge determines is appropriate (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47C(3)), and may be given at any time during the trial, including before any evidence is adduced and in the final summing up (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47C(4)), and may be repeated at any time (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47C(6)).
8. Before the trial begins, the judge may ask the prosecution and defence whether it is likely that evidence will be adduced that would provide good reasons for giving any of those directions. This process of early identification does not require the judge to form a view at that time whether to give a direction, and does not prevent any party in the trial from seeking a direction which was not identified (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 44P).
9. A direction on the absence of physical injury, violence or a threat is a direction "informing the jury that experience shows that–

    (a) there are many different circumstances in which people do and do not consent to a sexual act; and

    (b) people who do not consent to a sexual act may not be–

        (i) physically injured or subjected to violence; or

        (ii) threatened with physical injury or violence" (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47D).

10. A direction on responses to non-consensual acts is a direction "informing the jury that experience shows that:

    (a) people may react differently to a sexual act to which they did not consent, and there is no typical, proper or normal response; and

    (b) people who do not consent to a sexual act may not protest or physically resist the act.

    Example

    The person may freeze and not do or say anything" (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47E).

11. A direction on other sexual activity is a direction "informing the jury that experience shows that people who do not consent to a sexual act with a particular person on one occasion may have, on one or more other occasions, engaged in or been involved in consensual sexual activity-

(a) with that person or another person; or

(b) of the same kind or a different kind" (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47F).

12. A direction on personal appearance and irrelevant conduct is a direction "informing the jury that it should not be assumed that a person consented to a sexual act just because the person-

(a) wore particular clothing; or

(b) had a particular appearance; or

(c) drank alcohol or took any other drug; or

(d) was present in a particular location; or

Examples

1 The complainant attended a nightclub.

2 The complainant went to the accused's home.

(e) acted flirtatiously" (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47G).

13. A direction on non-consensual sexual acts occurring between all sorts of people is a direction "informing the jury that experience shows that–

(a) there are many different circumstances in which people do and do not consent to a sexual act; and

(b) sexual acts can occur without consent between all sorts of people, including–

(i) people who know each other;

(ii) people who are married to each other;

(iii) people who are in a relationship with each other;

(iv) people who provide commercial sexual services and people for whose arousal or gratification such services are provided;

(v) people of the same or different sexual orientations;

(vi) people of any gender identity, including people whose gender identity does not correspond to their designated sex at birth.

Examples

People who are transgender, non-binary, genderqueer or gender fluid" (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47H).

14. A direction on general assumptions not informing a reasonable belief in consent is a direction "informing the jury that–

(a) a belief in consent based solely on a general assumption about the circumstances in which people consent to a sexual act (whether or not that assumption is informed by any particular culture, religion or other influence) is not a reasonable belief; and

(b) if a belief in consent is based on a combination of matters including a general assumption of that kind, then, to the extent that it is based on that general assumption, it is not a reasonable belief.

Examples

Each of the following is an example of a general assumption of the kind referred to in this section-

(a) a general assumption that a person who gets drunk and flirts with another person consents to a sexual act with that other person;

(b) a general assumption that a person who dresses in a way that is considered sexually provocative, and who visits another person's home, consents to a sexual act with that other person" (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47I).

15. While the relevant transitional provisions mean that s 47I applies to all sexual offences, whenever committed, it is likely the direction has no relevance to offences committed before 1 July 2015, when the element of "awareness of non-consent" was replaced by "reasonable belief in consent". This means that, for offences committed before 1 July 2015, a judge will not likely have good reason to give a s 47I direction.

16. The Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47I replaces the former Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(3)(c). While there are minor differences between the wording of the former s 47(3)(c)(ii) and the new s 47I(b), the effect of the two clauses is likely the same. While the examples were not in the original text of the provision, they reflect elaboration that was in the Explanatory Memorandum to the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Bill 2016 which introduced the original s 47(3)(c):

> These directions are designed to make clear that stereotyping opinions about sexual behaviour are not to be taken into account when assessing the reasonableness of a belief in consent. An example is an assumption by an accused that the complainant was consenting to sex with him because she was dressed provocatively and got drunk with him.

17. When giving this direction, the judge should identify what general assumptions might arise in the case.

18. This direction, in conjunction with the directions in s 47(3)(d) and (e), appears to bring Victorian law in line with the approach to reasonable beliefs in Western Australia under the Griffith Code. In Aubertin v Western Australia (2006) 33 WAR 87, McLure JA (Roberts-Smith and Buss JJA concurring) held, [46] that:

> Further, a person's values, whether they be informed by cultural, religious or other influences, are not part of a person's characteristics or attributes for the purpose of assessing the reasonableness of an accused's belief. For example, values resulting in extreme views as to the appropriate mode of dress for women, from which inferences about consent are purportedly drawn, cannot positively affect or inform the reasonableness of an accused's belief. Values do not impact on the capacity to perceive or appreciate primary objective facts or the capacity to process that information. In any event, reasonableness must be judged in the light of generally accepted community standards and attitudes.

Last updated: 9 November 2023

7.3.1.1.1 Statutory Directions on Consent

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47C provides that the following directions must be given at the earliest time in the trial that the trial judge determines is appropriate (assuming the judge is satisfied there are good reasons for giving the directions), and may be given before any evidence is adduced, and in the trial judge's summing up. The following directions are drafted on the basis that they will all be given at the start of the trial. Judges will need to modify these directions if they intend to give them at the end of the trial, or if the judge intends to omit any of these directions.

Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47C identifies six separate directions which may be given. This page contains the five directions identified in that section which are relevant to consent. See Statutory directions on belief in consent for the remaining direction.

Introduction

I am now going to give you some direction on how you assess parts of the evidence. The purpose of these directions is to inform you of what experience shows about the circumstances in which people consent, and do not consent, to sexual acts. These directions are often given in trials for sexual offences to help juries understand and assess the evidence. They do not reflect any judgment or opinion I might have about the evidence you might hear.

Absence of physical injury, violence or a threat

There are many different circumstances in which people do or do not consent to a sexual act. Non-consensual sexual acts can occur without causing injury or where the person is not subjected to violence or threatened. Do not assume that an absence of injuries, violence or threats means there was consent.

Responses to a non-consensual sexual act

People may react differently to a non-consensual sexual act. There is no typical, proper or normal response. Some people protest or physically resist, and others do not. Some people freeze and do not say or do anything when experiencing a non-consensual sexual act.

Other sexual activity[478]

Consent to one sexual act on one occasion does not establish consent to other acts, or on other occasions or with other people. In other words, a person who does not consent to a sexual act with a particular person on a particular occasion, may have consented to sexual acts on another occasion with that person or a different person, or to the same or different kinds of sexual acts.

[478] Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 342 restricts the admissibility of evidence about other sexual activities of the complainant. The direction under this heading will likely only be required if the court has, or likely will, give leave to adduce evidence of the complainant's sexual history.

Personal appearance and irrelevant conduct

When you are listening to the evidence, and considering the issue of consent, there are a few factors you should be careful of. Do not assume a person consented to a sexual act just because they wore particular clothing, had a particular appearance, drank alcohol or took drugs, went to the accused's house,[479] or acted flirtatiously.

Non-consensual acts occur between all sorts of people

The final thing I want to say at the moment about the issue of consent is that there are many different circumstances in which people do and do not consent to a sexual act. Sexual acts can occur without consent between all sorts of people, including [identify any features of the relationship between the complainant and accused which may be relevant, such as "people who know each other", "people who are married or in a relationship with each other", "people who provide commercial sexual services and their customers", "people of the same or different sexual orientations" and "people of any gender identity"].

Do not assume that sexual acts without consent only occur in one kind of situation. You must decide whether the prosecution has proved the complainant did not consent by considering all the evidence and without jumping to conclusions.

Last updated: 1 January 2023

7.3.1.1.2 Statutory Direction on Belief in Consent

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

I am now going to give you a short direction about what reasonable belief in consent means.

As you have heard, one element of charge [identify relevant charge] is that the accused had no reasonable belief that the complainant was consenting.

To decide whether a belief may have been reasonable, you must look at all the circumstances. In doing this, the law defines two matters you must take into account.

First, you must consider what steps the accused took to find out whether the complainant consented to the act.

Second, a belief that is solely based on a general assumption about when people consent is not a reasonable belief. If a belief is based partially on general assumptions and partially on other matters, you must ignore the influence of any general assumptions and look at whether the belief was reasonable, when based solely on those other matters. For example, you might decide that a belief that if someone drinks alcohol with you, then they consent to sexual activity with you, would be a belief based on a general assumption. If so, a belief based on a general assumption would not be a reasonable belief.

Last Updated: 1 January 2023

7.3.1.2 Consent and Reasonable Belief in Consent (From 1/7/15)

Click here for a Word version of this document

---

[479] Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47G(d) provides that the jury should not assume consent just because the person "was present in a particular place". The judge should identify the relevant place based on the facts of the case.

Note: This topic describes the law relating to consent and reasonable belief in consent for sexual offences committed on or after 1 July 2015. For information on consent and the fault element for offences committed before 1 July 2015, see 7.3.1.3 Consent and awareness of non-consent (Pre-1/07/15)

1. The Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences and Other Matters) Act 2014 ('the 2014 Act') altered the statutory definition of several sexual offences, including rape and sexual assault to replace the subject fault element of "awareness of non-consent" with a partially objective fault element of "no reasonable belief in consent".
2. The purpose of this change was to simplify the law on rape and rape related offences, particularly in relation to an accused's claimed belief that the complainant was consenting (Criminal Law Review Consultation Paper "Review of Sexual Offences" September 2013, 3–37).
3. The 2014 Amendment Act also made consequential changes to the definitions of consent and sexual penetration.
4. These provisions were further amended by the Justice Legislation Amendment (Sexual Offences and Other Matters) Act 2022 ('the 2022 Act'). The 2022 Act introduced changes to both offence definitions (which apply to conduct committed from 30 July 2023 onwards) and jury directions.
5. This topic explains the law relevant to consent and reasonable belief in consent which applies to sexual offences committed on or after 1 July 2015.
6. This topic also discusses the statutory directions under the Jury Directions Act 2015 which are designed to inform the jury about matters that may be relevant to their assessment of whether the prosecution has proved an absence of consent or reasonable belief in consent.
7. The Crimes Act 1958 defines "consent" to mean "free agreement" (until 30 July 2023) or "free and voluntary agreement" (from 30 July 2023 onwards) and describes (non-exclusively) circumstances where a person "does not freely agree to an act" (s 34C between 1 July 2015 and 30 June 2017, s 36 from 1 July 2017 to 29 July 2023 and s 36AA from 30 July 2023 onwards).

Operation of Consent Provisions

8. The provisions discussed in this chapter only apply to proceedings for sexual offences, and do not apply to non-sexual offences where consent may be an issue, such as common assault and intentionally causing injury.

Commencement and Transition

9. Before 1 July 2015, Crimes Act 1958 ss 36, 37AA and 37AAA provided for the meaning of consent and jury directions on consent. These sections were replaced by Crimes Act 1958 s 34C and Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 46 and 47.
10. Crimes Act 1958 s 34C and Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 46 and 47 only apply to offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1 July 2015 (Crimes Act 1958 s 626; Jury Directions Act 2015 Schedule 1, clause 1(2)).
11. The amendments to the Jury Directions Act 2015 introduced by the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Act 2016 (other than the changed reference from Crimes Act 1958 s 34C to Crimes Act 1958 s 36) commenced on 26 September 2016, and apply to trials commenced on or after that date, for offences committed on or after 1 July 2015.
12. For offences committed before 1 July 2015, see 7.3.1.3 Consent and awareness of non-consent (Pre-1/7/15).

13. From 1 July 2017, the definition of consent was moved to Crimes Act 1958 s 36, following the commencement of the remaining sections of the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Act 2016. In addition to the change of section number, the definition of consent included one additional circumstance in which a person does not consent (see s 36(2)(f)). The Amendment Act did not introduce any relevant transitional provisions to the Crimes Act 1958. As a matter of prudence, the Charge Book has adopted the view that s 36(2)(f) only applies to offences committed on or after 1 July 2017.

14. The 2022 Act made extensive changes to the Crimes Act 1958 and the Jury Directions Act 2015. There are now two relevant transitional provisions:

    - Changes to the Crimes Act 1958 by Part 2 of the 2022 Act only apply to offences alleged to have been committed after the commencement of Part 2. The default commencement date for Part 2 is 30 July 2023.
    - Changes to the Jury Directions Act 2015 by Part 4 of the 2022 Act apply to trials and other hearings commenced after the commencement of Part 4, regardless of when the alleged offences were committed. As noted, Part 4 commenced operation on 1 January 2023 (Jury Directions Act 2015 Schedule 1, clauses 6 and 7).[480]

Sexual Offences Where Consent is Relevant

15. Consent will generally be relevant to the following offences, as it is an element of each offence that there be an absence of consent:

    i) Rape (s 38)

    ii) Rape by compelling sexual penetration (s 39)

    iii) Sexual assault (s 40)

    iv) Sexual assault by compelling sexual touching (s 41)

    v) Assault with intent to commit a sexual offence (s 42)

16. Consent may be relevant to the following offences, as it is an element of the offence that there be an absence of consent in the particular circumstances identified in the offence provision:

    i) Incest (s 44 – as relevant to the defence of compulsion)

    ii) Sexual Penetration of a Child Under the Age of 16 (s 45)

    iii) Indecent Act With Child Under the Age of 16 (s 47)

    iv) Sexual Penetration of a 16 or 17 Year Old Child (s 48)

    v) Indecent Act With 16 or 17 Year Old Child (s 49)

    vi) Indecent Act With 17 Year Old Child (s 49 – repealed)

---

[480] Between 1 January 2023 and 11 October 2023, Schedule 1 clause 6(2) provided an additional transition provision which meant that amendments to ss 46 and 47 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 only applied to offences committed after 1 January 2023. This transitional provision has now been reversed, by a combination of clause 6(2A) and clause 7(1).

vii) Sexual Penetration of a Person with a Cognitive Impairment (ss 51(1), 52(1))

viii) Indecent Act with a Person with a Cognitive Impairment (ss 51(2), 52(2))

17. Offences contrary to s 47A (Persistent abuse of child under the age of 16) and s 49A as it stood before 1 July 2017 (Facilitating Sexual Offences Against Children) may also require consent directions if the underlying offence is listed above.

18. For offences under sections 45, 47, 48, 49, 51 and 52 (as in force before 1 July 2017), consent is not a defence unless the accused establishes an additional exculpatory matter, such as a belief that the child was aged 16 or over, or that the accused was married to the complainant. The relevant exculpatory matters are explained in the Charges and commentary for each offence.

19. Where consent is a defence, the prosecution must prove that the complainant did not consent (Crimes Act 1958 ss 45(4A), 47(3), 48(3), 49(3), 51(6), 52(4)).

20. It is an unresolved question what, if any, additional fault element arises where consent is a defence (see R v Deblasis & Deblasis (2007) 19 VR 128; R v Mark & Elmazovski [2006] VSCA 251).

21. In cases where the accused is charged with sexual penetration of a child or indecent act with a child, the judge should require the parties to identify before the trial whether consent will be in issue, or whether it will only be the additional exculpatory matters which are in issue (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 ss 182, 183, 199). This will allow the judge to determine what directions are required in relation to consent and, if necessary, will allow the parties to challenge those intended directions on an interlocutory appeal (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 295).

22. While the Crimes Act does not expressly refer to a fault element associated with consent for offences before 1 July 2017, the prudent approach, which is taken in this Charge Book, is to require for these offences that the prosecution prove the accused was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting. For offences after 1 July 2017, the drafting of the defences for sexual offences against children indicates that belief in consent is not part of the defences.

Meaning of "Consent"

23. Between 1 July 2015 and 30 June 2017, "consent" was defined in s 34C of the Crimes Act 1958 to mean "free agreement".

24. Between 1 July 2017 and 29 July 2023, s 36 of the Crimes Act 1958 similarly defined consent as "free agreement".

25. From 30 July 2023, the 2022 Act amended s 36 of the Crimes Act 1958 to define consent as "free and voluntary agreement", and also states that a person does not consent just because they do not resist the act, and that a person does not consent to an act just because they consented to the same or different act with the same or a different person.

26. Section 34C(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 listed the following situations in which a person is regarded as not having given free agreement.

    (a) The person submits to the act because of force or the fear of force, whether to that person or someone else;

    (b) The person submits to the act because of the fear of harm of any type, whether to that person or someone else or an animal;

    (c) The person submits to the act because the person is unlawfully detained;

    (d) The person is asleep or unconscious;

    (e) The person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of consenting to the act;

    (f) The person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

    (g) The person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act;

    (h) The person is mistaken about the identity of any other person involved in the act;

(i) The person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes;

(j) If the act involves an animal, the person mistakenly believes that the act is for veterinary, agricultural or scientific research purposes;

(k) The person does not say or do anything to indicate consent to the act;

(l) Having initially given consent to the act, the person later withdraws consent to the act taking place or continuing.

27. Section 36(2) lists all of these circumstances and included the additional circumstance:

- the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of withdrawing consent to the act (Crimes Act 1958 s 36(2)(f)).

28. From 30 July 2023, the new Crimes Act 1958 s 36AA contains the list of non-consent circumstances. While many of the former non-consent circumstances remain in the new s 36AA, some of those provisions have been restated, and the list has been reordered. For this reason, the new list is reproduced below:

(a) the person does not say or do anything to indicate consent to the act;

(b) the person submits to the act because of force, a fear of force, harm of any type or a fear of harm of any type, whether to that person or someone else or to an animal, regardless of-

(i) when the force, harm or conduct giving rise to the fear occurs; and

(ii) whether it is, or is a result of, a single incident or is part of an ongoing pattern;

Examples

Each of the following is a type of harm that can be done to a person as described in this paragraph-

(a) economic or financial harm;

(b) reputational harm;

(c) harm to the person's family, cultural or community relationships;

(d) harm to the person's employment;

(e) family violence involving psychological abuse or harm to mental health;

(f) sexual harassment.

(c) the person submits to the act because of coercion or intimidation-

(i) regardless of when the coercion or intimidation occurs; and

(ii) whether it is, or is a result of, a single incident or is part of an ongoing pattern;

(d) the person submits to the act because the person is unlawfully detained;

(e) the person submits to the act because the person is overborne by the abuse of a relationship of authority or trust;

(f) the person is asleep or unconscious;

(g) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of consenting to the act;

(h) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of withdrawing consent to the act;

Note

This circumstance may apply where a person gave consent when not so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of consenting.

(i) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(j) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act;

(k) the person is mistaken about the identity of any other person involved in the act;

(l) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes;

(m) the act occurs in the provision of commercial sexual services and the person engages in the act because of a false or misleading representation that the person will be paid;

(n) if the act involves an animal, the person mistakenly believes that the act is for veterinary or agricultural purposes or scientific research purposes;

(o) the person engages in the act on the basis that a condom is used and either-

(i) before or during the act, any other person involved in the act intentionally removes the condom or tampers with the condom; or

(ii) the person who was to use the condom intentionally does not use it;

(p) having given consent to the act, the person later withdraws consent to the act taking place or continuing.

29. Sections 34C, 36 and 36AA do not provide a definition of consent. Rather, they identify circumstances in which there is no consent. If the prosecution proves the existence of one of these circumstances, then the prosecution has proved an absence of consent and the jury does not need to separately decide whether there was no free, or free and voluntary, agreement (DPP v Yeong [2022] VSCA 179, [45]).

30. All versions of the section have identified that the list does not limit the circumstances in which there may be an absence of consent. This does not mean a court may add to the list. But where the prosecution relies on a circumstance which is not listed, the question for the jury will be whether the complainant did not consent in the sense that the complainant did not freely, or freely and voluntarily, agree to the act of sexual penetration (DPP v Yeong [2022] VSCA 179, [48]).

31. When applying the definition of consent as an absence of free, or free and voluntary, agreement, the court does not need to identify the parameters of free agreement in a way that avoids overlap with items on the list of deemed non-consent circumstances. A given circumstance could involve both an absence of free agreement, and the presence of a statutory non-consent circumstance (DPP v Yeong [2022] VSCA 179, [49]).

32. The existence of the offence of procuring sexual act by fraud (see, since 1 July 2017, Crimes Act 1958 s 45) does not mean that fraudulent acts are carved out from the concept of consent (DPP v Yeong [2022] VSCA 179, [51]–[53]).

33. Section 34C(2)(b) and section 36(2)(b) states that submission because of "the fear of harm of any type, whether to that person or someone else or an animal" is not consent. The section provides no assistance as to the nature of the harm contemplated. It may extend beyond physical or psychological injury, but that has not yet been determined. The successor to these provisions in s 36AA(1)(b) expressly notes that it does not matter when the fear arose, or whether the fear is the result of a single incident or as part of an ongoing pattern. The section also contains examples of the kinds of harms which qualify for the purpose of the section, including economic or financial harm, reputational harm, harm to other relationships or employment, psychological abuse and harm to mental health or sexual harassment. In accordance with Interpretation of Legislation Act 1984 s 36A, examples are not exhaustive and may extend but not limit the meaning of the provision.

34. New sections 36AA(1)(c) and (e) specify that submission because of coercion, intimidation or because the person is overborne by the abuse of a relationship of authority or trust is not consent.

35. Sections 34C(2)(e), 36(2)(e) and 36AA(1)(g) require that a person is "so affected" by drugs or alcohol as to be incapable of free agreement. Mere impairment of judgement or reduction of inhibitions does not negate free agreement (R v Wrigley 9/2/1995 CA Vic). Note that intoxication can also be relevant to the issue of reasonable belief in consent (see below).

36. Sections 34C(2)(f), 36(2)(g) and 36AA(1)(i) state that a person does not consent if they are incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act. It must be proved that the person was unable to comprehend either that what is proposed is the physical fact of penetration, or that the act of penetration proposed is sexual (as distinct from an act of a totally different kind) (R v Morgan [1970] VR 337; Neal v R (2011) 32 VR 454).

37. Sections 34C(2)(f), 36(2)(g) and 36AA(1)(i) relate to the complainant's intellectual capacity. But "capacity to understand the sexual nature of the act" is not the only basis upon which a cognitive impairment may be relevant to consent. A person who understands the sexual nature of an act may be nevertheless incapable of freely agreeing to it, if that person is intellectually unable to make a refusal of consent or unable to understand his or her right to refuse consent (R v Mobilio [1991] 1 VR 339; R v Eastwood [1998] VSCA 42).

38. In deciding whether a complainant who knew the nature and character of an act of sexual intercourse had the capacity to give real consent to it, the jury can have regard to such things as the complainant's capacity to appreciate:

    - that most of the community draw a distinction in quality between sexual acts and other acts of intimacy; and
    - that a decision to consent or not involves questions of the morality or social acceptability of the conduct (R v Mobilio [1991] 1 VR 339; R v Eastwood [1998] VSCA 42).

39. Sections 34C(2)(i), 36(2)(j) and 36AA(1)(l) say that a person does not consent where they have a mistaken belief that the sexual penetration was for either a medical or hygienic purpose. At common law, mistake as to the purpose of penetration did not deprive consent of reality (R v Mobilio [1991] 1 VR 339. Note that the law stated in Mobilio as to capacity to consent is still correct).

40. Sections 34C(2)(j), 36(2)(k) and 36AA(1)(n) provide that a person does not consent to a sexual act with an animal if the person mistakenly believes that the act is for veterinary, agricultural or scientific research purposes.

41. Sections 34C(2)(k), 36(2)(l) and 36AA(1)(a) state that a person does not consent if "the person does not say or do anything to indicate consent to the act". This codifies what has been termed the 'communicative model' of consent, and requires communication of consent. This amends the law as it existed prior to 1 July 2015.

42. Prior to 1 July 2015, the jury were directed that the fact that the complainant did not say or do anything to indicate consent was "enough to show" that the act took place without consent (Crimes Act 1958 s 37AAA(d)). Courts held that this was not a deeming provision, and that the prosecution was still required to prove the absence of consent. This required evidence to allow the jury to find, as a matter of fact, that the complainant did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement. It did not apply where there was an absence of evidence concerning the complainant's conduct at the time of the alleged sexual act (ISJ v R (2012) 38 VR 23).

43. The predecessor provision also did not affect the fault element for the offence, as the law did not require a person to satisfy himself or herself that the other person was consenting. Prior to 1 July 2015, the prosecution would fail to prove its case if it failed to establish the fault element due to the accused assuming that the complainant was consenting (Gordon v R [2010] VSCA 207). Due to the significant changes to Victoria's sexual offence laws on 1 July 2015, 26 September 2016 and 1 July 2023, Gordon must now be treated with caution.

44. Sections 34C(2)(l), 36(2)(m) and 36AA(1)(p) provide that a person does not consent if, having initially given consent to the act, the person later withdraws consent to the act taking place or continuing. This ensures that consent is an ongoing state of affairs and that a person must cease the relevant act if the other person withdraws consent.

45. There is nothing in ss 34C or 36 to deal with a situation where a person is mistaken as to one of the characteristics of the accused, and it is this characteristic which leads to consent. The common law holds that consent in such circumstances does not make the penetration unlawful (Papadimitropoulos v R (1957) 98 CLR 249).

46. However, in contrast to earlier iterations, s 36AA does contain several circumstances where consent is vitiated where the accused undermines a condition precedent to the consent.

47. First, s 36AA(1)(m) specifies that consent is negated if the sexual act occurs in the provision of commercial sexual services, and the person engaged in the act because of a false or misleading representation that the person will be paid. Such a false or misleading representation may be made by words or conduct (including by omission) and may be explicit or implicit (Crimes Act 1958 s 36AA(2)). At common law, this behaviour had been held not to vitiate consent (R v Linekar [1995] 3 ALL ER 69) and instead was dealt with through the offence of procuring sexual act by fraud.

48. Second, s 36AA(1)(o) deals with the phenomenon of 'stealthing'. A person does not consent if the person engages in the sexual act on the basis that a condom is used and either the other person intentionally removes the condom or tampers with it, or the other person intentionally does not use a condom.

49. Section 36AA(1)(o) reflects the position reached in DPP v Yeong [2022] VSCA 179, where the Court held that it was open for a jury to find that consent to penetration with a condom did not extend to consent to penetration without a condom. This conclusion was reached on the basis the nature of the differences between sexual intercourse with a condom and without, which meant that deception about the use of a condom could undermine free agreement. The court also noted that it was not necessary to determine the boundaries of the kinds of deceptions or misunderstandings which could vitiate consent (DPP v Yeong [2022] VSCA 179, [92]–[96]).

Reasonable belief in consent

50. The following offences contain a fault element that the accused did not reasonably believe that the complainant was consenting:

    - Rape (s 38);
    - Rape by compelling sexual penetration (s 39);
    - Sexual assault (s 40);
    - Sexual assault by compelling sexual touching (s 41);
    - Assault with intent to commit a sexual assault (s 42).

51. This fault element will be satisfied if the prosecution proves one of the following mental states beyond reasonable doubt:

    - The accused believed that the complainant was not consenting.
    - The accused did not believe the complainant was consenting. This includes circumstances where the accused gave no thought as to whether the complainant was consenting.
    - Even if the accused believed the complainant was consenting, his/her belief was not reasonable in the circumstances.

Reasonable and unreasonable beliefs

52. The reasonableness of an accused's alleged belief in consent (including any steps taken to ascertain consent) was previously relevant only in determining whether the accused genuinely held such a belief (see Crimes Act 1958 s 37AA(b) as in force before 1 July 2015). For sexual offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1 July 2015, reasonableness of belief is part of the fault element.

53. On 1 July 2017 the general provisions concerning reasonable belief in consent were repealed and replaced. The discussion below will identify the replacement provisions and any changes to the substance of the provisions.

54. According to Crimes Act 1958 s 37G(1) (before 1 July 2017) and s 36A(1) (from 1 July 2017–29 July 2023):

> ...whether or not a person reasonably believes that another person is consenting to an act depends on the circumstances.

55. Without limiting this, the circumstances include any steps the accused took to find out whether the other person was consenting (Crimes Act 1958 s 37G(2) (before 1 July 2017), s 36A(2) (from 1 July 2017 onwards)).

56. For offences committed from 30 July 2023 onwards, the new s 36A, introduced by the 2022 Act, states:

> A's belief that B consents to an act is not reasonable if, within a reasonable time before or at the time the act takes place, A does not say or do anything to find out whether B consents to the act (Crimes Act 1958 s 36A(2)).

57. The effect of this provision is that whereas previously the steps taken to find out whether the other person consented were relevant to whether a belief is reasonable, the new provision means a belief in consent cannot be reasonable unless the accused said or did something to find out whether the other person consented.

58. According to the explanatory memorandum, the replacement of s 36A:

> [A]mends reasonable belief in consent to reflect an affirmative consent model. The provision implements recommendation 50(a) of the VLRC Report to formulate a requirement for a person to "take steps" to find out if the other person consents for their belief in consent to be reasonable.
> ...
> This requires A to have taken active steps to find out whether B consented to the sexual act for their belief in consent to be reasonable. This may include taking a verbal or non-verbal step to ascertain consent but would not include an internal thought process, which is inconsistent with a communicative model of consent.
> New section 36A(2) provides that A must say or do anything to find out if B consents "within a reasonable time before or at the time". What is a "reasonable time before" the sexual act depends on the circumstances. In most circumstances, it will only be a reasonable time if A said or did anything at the time of the sexual act or immediately before it. However, the provision recognises that there may be limited circumstances where it is reasonable to do or say something to ascertain consent at an earlier time, so long as the circumstances have not changed when the sexual act occurs.

59. This statutory restriction on when a belief in consent is reasonable is itself qualified by s 36A(3), which provides that s 36A(2) does not apply if the accused has a cognitive impairment or mental illness other than the effects of self-induced intoxication which is a substantial cause of the accused not saying or doing anything to find out whether the other person is consenting (Crimes Act 1958 s 36A(3)).

60. The accused carries the burden of proving on the balance of probabilities the matters in s 36A(3) (Crimes Act 1958 s 36A(4)).

61. The statutory restriction on reasonable belief is supplemented by the new s 37A(ab), which adds the following statutory objective to the sexual offence provisions:

> to promote the principle that consent to an act is not to be assumed – that consent involves ongoing and mutual communication and decision-making between each person involved (that is, each person should seek the consent of each other person in a way and at a time that makes it clear whether they consent)

Directions on consent and reasonable belief in consent on request

62. Divisions 1 and 1A of Part 5 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 specify when a judge must give directions on consent or reasonable belief in consent.

63. The effect of these Divisions is that some directions are given at the end of the trial following a request (subject to the s 16 residual obligation to give directions not sought), while other directions are exempt from the Part 3 request process and must be given at the earliest time in the trial the judge determines is appropriate.

Early directions on consent and reasonable belief in consent

64. Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47C provides that a judge must give directions on any of the following topics the judge considers there are good reasons to give:

    - The absence of physical injury, violence or a threat;
    - Responses to non-consensual acts;
    - Other sexual activity;
    - Personal appearance and irrelevant conduct;
    - Non-consensual sexual acts between all sorts of people;
    - General assumptions not informing a reasonable belief in consent.

65. These directions are explained in 7.3.1.1 – Early directions on jury assessment of evidence about consent and reasonable belief in consent.

Directions on consent and reasonable belief in consent on request

66. The Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 46 and 47 specify further directions which the prosecution or defence may ask the judge to give under the Part 3 request process.

67. The directions the parties may request on consent are:

    - Inform the jury that a person can consent to an act only if the person is capable of consenting and free to choose whether or not to engage in or allow the act; or
    - Inform the jury that where a person has given consent to an act, the person may withdraw that consent either before the act takes place or at any time while the act is taking place (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 46(3)); or
    - Inform the jury of the relevant circumstances in which the law provides that a person does not consent to an act; or
    - Direct the jury that if the jury is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that a circumstance referred to in section 36 of the Crimes Act 1958 existed in relation to a person, the jury must find that the person did not consent to the act (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 46(4)).

68. As directions governed by Part 3 of the Jury Directions Act 2015, a judge should only give these directions if requested by a party or if there are substantial and compelling reasons, in the absence of a request, to give the directions (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 12, 14, 15, 16).

69. A judge must direct on consent with reference to the issues and evidence in the trial. In many trials the issue will not turn on the special cases described in ss 34C or 36. In those cases the standard charge should be adapted to focus on the true issues in the trial.

70. Section 47 provides that the prosecution or defence counsel may request any of the following directions on reasonable belief in consent:

(a) direct the jury that if the jury concludes that the accused knew or believed that a circumstance referred to in section 34C, 36 or 36AA (depending on the date of the alleged offence) of the Crimes Act 1958 existed in relation to a person, that knowledge or belief is enough to show that the accused did not reasonably believe that the person was consenting to the act; or

(b) direct the jury that in determining whether the accused who was intoxicated had a reasonable belief at any time–

(i) if the intoxication was self-induced, regard must be had to the standard of a reasonable person who is not intoxicated and who is otherwise in the same circumstances as the accused at the relevant time; and

(ii) if the intoxication is not self-induced, regard must be had to the standard of a reasonable person intoxicated to the same extent as the accused and who is in the same circumstances as the accused at the relevant time; or

(d) direct the jury that in determining whether the accused had a reasonable belief in consent, the jury must consider what the community would reasonably expect of the accused in the circumstances in forming a reasonable belief in consent; or

(e) direct the jury that in determining whether the accused had a reasonable belief in consent, the jury may take into account any personal attribute, characteristic or circumstance of the accused (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(3).

Directions on awareness of non-consent circumstance

71. Section s 47(3)(a) allows the prosecution or defence to seek a direction that knowledge of a non-consent circumstance "is enough to show that the accused did not reasonably believe that the person was consenting".

72. The effect of this provision is that where it is proved that the accused knew or believed that a non-consent circumstance existed at the moment of the relevant sexual act, the accused cannot rely on a so-called defence of reasonable belief in consent (Hubbard v The Queen [2020] VSCA 303, [37], [64]).

Directions on relevance of intoxication

73. The following material should be read in conjunction with 8.5 Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14) and associated charges.

74. In sexual offence cases, intoxication is potentially relevant in four ways:

- Intoxication of the complainant may be relevant to the complainant's consent;
- Intoxication of the complainant may be relevant to whether the accused had a reasonable belief in consent;
- Intoxication of the accused may be relevant to whether the accused believed the complainant consented;
- Intoxication of the accused may be relevant to whether the accused's belief in the complainant's consent was reasonable.

75. Sections 34C(2)(e), 36(2)(e) and 36AA(1)(g) provide that a person does not consent if he or she is so intoxicated as to be incapable of consenting. However, intoxication of the complainant may, in some cases, also contribute to a mistaken belief in consent, where the accused is not aware that the complainant is so intoxicated as to be incapable of consenting (see R v SAX [2006] QCA 397; R v Soloman [2006] QCA 244).

76. When directing the jury on the relevance of the accused's intoxication, it may be important to separate the effects of intoxication on whether the accused held a belief in consent and whether any such belief was reasonable. It is erroneous to conflate these two issues and suggest that self-induced intoxication is not relevant to the mental element of reasonable belief in consent (O'Loughlin v R [2011] QCA 123).

77. Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(3)(b) provides for a direction that the jury must not have regard to self-induced intoxication for the purpose of determining whether a belief was reasonable and must have regard to the degree of intoxication if it was not self-induced.

78. This reflects the provisions of Crimes Act 1958 ss 37H (from 1 July 2015 to 30 June 2017) and 36B (from 1 July 2017 onwards), which provide that in determining whether the accused had a reasonable belief in the complainant's consent, self-induced intoxication by the accused at the time of the offending must not be taken into account (ss 37H(1)(a), 36B(1)(a)).

79. Instead, the reasonableness of the belief must be determined according to the standard of a reasonable person who is not intoxicated, but is otherwise in the same circumstances as the accused at the relevant time (ss 37H(1)(a), 36B(1)(a)).

80. However, if the intoxication is not self-induced, the standard to be used is that of a reasonable person intoxicated to the same extent as the accused at the time of the offending, and who is in the same circumstances as the accused at the relevant time (ss 37H(1)(b), 36B(1)(b)).

81. Whether the intoxication is self-induced is governed by ss 37H(2)–(3) (from 1 July 2015 to 30 June 2017) or 36B(2)–(3) (from 1 July 2017 onwards). In summary, intoxication is self-induced unless it came about involuntarily, as a result of fraud, emergency, duress, or force, or through drug use in accordance with prescription or manufacturer directions (other than when the accused had reason to believe the drug would significantly impair judgment or control). This will be a matter for the jury to determine, if it is in issue.

82. For more information about directing a jury in cases where the parties dispute whether the intoxication was self-induced, see 8.5.2 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14) (self-induced contested).

Direction about community expectations

83. Under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(3)(d), the jury may be directed that in determining whether the accused had a reasonable belief in consent, the jury must consider what the community would reasonably expect of the accused in the circumstances in forming a reasonable belief in consent.

84. This imports the approach of using community standards and attitudes as the yardstick for assessing reasonableness (see Aubertin v The State of Western Australia (2006) 33 WAR 87; Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences and Other Matters) Bill 2014, Explanatory Memorandum).

85. As also reflected in the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Bill 2016 Explanatory Memorandum, this provision clarifies that in assessing whether the accused had no reasonable belief in consent, the jury need not consider whether the accused considered his or her belief to be reasonable.

Direction about the relevance of the accused's attributes, characteristics and circumstances

86. Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(3)(e) provides that a party may seek a direction telling the jury that the accused's personal attributes, characteristics or circumstances are relevant to determining whether the accused had a reasonable belief in consent.

87. Section 47(3)(e) must be read in conjunction with s 47(4), which was introduced at the same time. Section 47(4) provides that a good reason for not giving this direction is that the personal attribute, characteristic or circumstance–

(a) did not affect, or is not likely to have affected, the accused's perception or understanding of the objective circumstances; or

(b) was something that the accused was able to control; or

(c) was a subjective value, wish or bias held by the accused, whether or not that value, wish or bias was informed by any particular culture, religion or other influence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(4)).

88. Under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 14, a judge must give a requested direction unless there are good reasons for not giving the direction. Section 47(4) is a statutory statement of certain circumstances in which a judge may find good reasons for not giving the requested direction.

89. In Aubertin v Western Australia (2006) 33 WAR 87 McLure JA (Roberts-Smith and Buss JJA concurring) at [43] stated (emphasis added):

> For there to be an operative mistake under s 24, an accused must have acted under an actual belief in the existence of a state of things (subjective element) and the accused's belief must be reasonable (mixed element). The focus in this case is on the mixed element. The mixed element is not wholly objective; reasonableness is not to be adjudged by the standard of the hypothetical ordinary or reasonable person. The mixed element is a combination of subjective and objective aspects. The requirement that the belief be reasonable imports an objective standard. The subjective aspect is that the reasonableness is to be judged by reference to the personal attributes and characteristics of the accused that are capable of affecting his or her appreciation or perception of the circumstances in which he or she found himself or herself (See also Pallett v Paul [2007] WASC 290; Bailey v Doncon [2007] WASC 252).

90. The Act appears designed to adopt this same division, recognising that personal circumstances, attributes and characteristics are relevant to reasonableness of belief, but only to the extent that they may affect the accused's perceptions of the objective circumstances.

91. The following table is based on an analysis of decisions from other jurisdictions which allow personal circumstances to influence whether a belief is reasonable. It must be used with caution, as there is no guidance yet on exactly how section 47(3)(e) and 47(4) operate. See R v Mrzljak [2005] 1 Qd R 308; Aubertin v Western Australia (2006) 33 WAR 87; R v Julian (1998) 100 A Crim R 430; R v Conlon (1993) 69 A Crim R 92; Rope v R [2010] QCA 194; R v Dunrobin [2008] QCA 116.

Relevant to reasonableness	Irrelevant to reasonableness
Age of accused	Accused's values and beliefs, whether informed by cultural, religious or other influences
Maturity of accused	Self-induced intoxication of the accused
Language difficulties between the accused and complainant
Physical disabilities of the accused
Mental disabilities of the accused, including intellectual impairment

92. A useful example of how the accused's personal characteristics may affect his appreciation or perception is R v Dunrobin [2008] QCA 116. In this case, the accused suffered chronic paranoid schizophrenia. Evidence was led that the accused had poor complex reasoning, had difficulty understanding ambiguous situations and was prone to misinterpret the actions of others. The appellate court held that the trial judge had failed to direct the jury on how these characteristics could give rise to an honest but mistaken belief in consent, where the complainant ceased protesting against his attempts to sexually penetrate her.

93. In cases where both the accused and the complainant have a cognitive impairment, it may be necessary for the judge to link the accused's cognitive impairment to two discrete issues: Was the accused aware of whether the complainant had a capacity to consent; and did the accused hold a reasonable belief that the complainant was consenting? As noted above in relation to intoxication, it is an error to conflate these two questions (see R v Mrzljak [2005] 1 Qd R 308).

94. Queensland and Western Australian courts have also indicated that gender and ethnicity are relevant to reasonableness. However, there is no guidance on how precisely those matters "are capable of affecting [the accused's] appreciation or perception of the circumstances in which he or she found himself or herself" (compare Aubertin v Western Australia (2006) 33 WAR 87; Commissioner of Police v Stehbens [2013] QCA 81, [16]).

Relating the law to the facts in issue

95. Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 65 and 66 require the judge to relate the directions on consent and reasonable belief in consent to the facts in issue, and to the elements of the offence being tried in respect of which the direction is given, so as to aid the jury's comprehension of the direction. See Judge's Summing Up on Issues and Evidence.

Last updated: 9 November 2023

7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent (Pre-1/07/15)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. Section 36 of the Crimes Act 1958 defines "consent" to mean "free agreement" and describes (non-exclusively) seven particular circumstances where a person "does not freely agree to an act". In this respect s 36 is a deeming provision.

2. Sections 37, 37AAA and 37AA provide for jury directions that must be given in respect of the complainant's consent and the accused's awareness of that state of consent in sexual offence cases, where these matters are in issue.

Operation of Consent Provisions

3. Section 36 applies to the interpretation of Subdivision (8A) to (8D) of the Crimes Act 1958, that is, the sexual offences found in sections 38 to 52.

4. The operation of ss 37, 37AAA and 37AA is limited in three ways:

    i) The three sections create a scheme of directions that are only to be given where "relevant to a fact in issue in a proceeding" (s 37(1) & (2)).

    ii) Sections 37AAA(a)–(c) and 37AA rely on the definition of consent found in s 36. They are therefore only relevant to proceedings where s 36 applies.

    iii) Sections 37AAA(d)–(e) and 37AA involve directions about consent to "sexual acts".

5. These limitations have the effect that ss 37, 37AAA and 37AA do not apply to non-sexual offences where consent may be an issue, such as common assault and intentionally causing injury.

Commencement and Transition

6. Section 37 was amended, and ss 37AAA and 37AA were introduced by the Crimes Amendment (Rape) Act 2007. The new provisions apply only to trials commenced after 1 January 2008. The old s 37 still applies in trials commenced prior to 1 January 2008 (Crimes Act 1958 s 609(1)).

Sexual Offences Where Consent is Relevant

7. Consent will generally be relevant to the following offences, as it is an element of each offence that there be an absence of consent:

   i) Rape (s 38(2)(a))

   ii) Rape (Failure to withdraw) (s 38(2)(b))

   iii) Compelled Rape (s 38(3)(a))

   iv) Compelled Rape (Failure to withdraw) (s 38(3)(b))

   v) Compelling Sexual Penetration (s 38A)

   vi) Indecent Assault (s 39)

   vii) Assault with Intent to Rape (s 40)

8. Consent may be relevant to the following offences, as it is an element of the offence that there be an absence of consent in the particular circumstances identified in the offence provision:

   i) Incest (s 44 – as relevant to the defence of compulsion)

   ii) Sexual Penetration of a Child Under the Age of 16 (s 45)

   iii) Indecent Act With Child Under the Age of 16 (s 47)

   iv) Sexual Penetration of a 16 or 17 Year Old Child (s 48)

   v) Indecent Act With 16 or 17 Year Old Child (s 49)

   vi) Indecent Act With 17 Year Old Child (s 49 – repealed)

   vii) Sexual Penetration of a Person with a Cognitive Impairment (ss 51(1), 52(1))

   viii) Indecent Act with a Person with a Cognitive Impairment (ss 51(2), 52(2))

9. Offences contrary to s 47A (Persistent abuse of child under the age of 16) and s 49A (Facilitating Sexual Offences Against Children) may also require consent directions if the underlying offence is listed above.

Sexual Offences Where Awareness of Absence of Consent is Relevant

10. Sections 38, 38A, & 39 each expressly describes a fault element (or mens rea) associated with the complainant's lack of consent. This is, the accused must have acted while aware that the complainant was not or might not have been consenting, or while not giving any thought to whether the complainant was consenting. None of the other consent-relevant offences listed above include "awareness of non consent" as a statutory fault element.

11. Whether this additional awareness element should be implied for other sexual offences has not been authoritatively determined. See Consent and Child Sexual Offences (below).

12. For rape, compelled sexual penetration and indecent assault the Crimes Amendment (Rape) Act 2007 introduced a new statutory fault element. For these offences it is no defence for accused persons to assert that they were not aware that the complainant might not have been consenting to the sexual act because they had not given any thought to whether or not the complainant was consenting (Crimes Act 1958 ss 38(2)(a)(ii), 38(4)(b)(ii), 38A(3)(b)(ii), 39(2)(b)).

13. It is unclear whether this additional fault element was acknowledged under the common law, and if so whether it should now be applied to offences where it is not a statutory element. See further the discussion in 7.3.3 Rape and Aggravated Rape (Pre-1/1/92). The charge book charges only include this fault element where it is a statutory fault element. If it is to be applied in other cases, the charge will need to be amended.

Sexual Offences Where Consent May be Relevant

14. For offences under sections 45, 47, 48, 49, 51 and 52, consent is not a defence unless the accused establishes an additional exculpatory matter, such as a belief that the child was aged 16 or over, or that the accused was married to the complainant. The relevant exculpatory matters are explained in the Charges and commentary for each offence.

15. Where consent is a defence, the prosecution must prove that the complainant did not consent (Crimes Act 1958 ss 45(4A), 47(3), 48(3), 49(3), 51(6), 52(4)).

16. It is an unresolved question whether, where consent is a defence, the prosecution must also prove that the accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting (see R v Deblasis & Deblasis (2007) 19 VR 128; R v Mark & Elmazovski [2006] VSCA 251).

17. In cases where the accused is charged with sexual penetration of a child or indecent act with a child, the judge should require the parties to identify before the trial whether consent will be in issue, or whether it will only be the additional exculpatory matters which are in issue (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 ss 182, 183, 199). This will allow the judge to determine what directions are required in relation to consent and, if necessary, will allow the parties to challenge those intended directions on an interlocutory appeal (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 295).

18. While the Crimes Act does not expressly refer to a fault element associated with consent, the prudent approach, which is taken in this Charge Book, is to adopt the fault element provided for offences under sections 38, 38A and 39.

Meaning of "Consent"

19. "Consent" is defined in s 36 of the Crimes Act 1958 to mean "free agreement". This definition of consent applies to all of the provisions in Subdivisions 8A to 8D of the Crimes Act (ss 38–52).

20. Section 36 of the Crimes Act 1958 lists situations in which a person is regarded as not having given free agreement. This is not an exhaustive list.

21. Section 36 is not expressly drafted as a "deeming provision", but it is relatively clear that it must now be treated this way. This interpretation is supported for trials commenced on or after 1 January 2008 by s 37AAA(b) and (c) which require juries to be directed about the effect of s 36 in terms that assume that s 36 is a deeming provision on the question of whether the complainant consented to the sexual penetration (Wilson v R (2011) 33 VR 340).

22. Section 36(a) states that submission in circumstances of "force or fear of force" is not consent. The only degree of violence necessary is whatever is necessary to achieve penetration (R v Bourke [1915] VLR 289; R v Burles [1947] VLR 392).

23. Section 36(b) states that submission because of "the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else" is not consent. The section provides no assistance as to the nature of the harm contemplated. It may extend beyond physical or psychological injury, but that has not yet been determined.

24. Section 36(d) requires that a person is "so affected" by drugs or alcohol as to be incapable of free agreement. Mere impairment of judgement or reduction of inhibitions does not negate free agreement (R v Wrigley 9/2/1995 CA Vic). Note that intoxication can also be relevant to the issues of intention and mistaken belief (see 8.7 Common Law Intoxication).

25. Section 36(e) states that a person does not consent if they are incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act. It must be proved that the person was unable to comprehend either that what is proposed is the physical fact of penetration, or that the act of penetration proposed is sexual (as distinct from an act of a totally different kind) (R v Morgan [1970] VR 337; Neal v R (2011) 32 VR 454). The complainant's understanding of the moral significance of the act is not relevant to this issue (R v Mobilio [1991] 1 VR 339; R v Eastwood [1998] VSCA 42).

26. Section 36(e) relates to the complainant's intellectual capacity. But "capacity to understand the sexual nature of the act" is not the only basis upon which a cognitive impairment may be relevant to consent. A person who understands the sexual nature of an act may be nevertheless incapable of freely agreeing to it, if that person is intellectually unable to make a refusal of consent or unable to understand his or her right to refuse consent (R v Mobilio [1991] 1 VR 339; R v Eastwood [1998] VSCA 42).

27. In deciding whether a complainant who knew the nature and character of an act of sexual intercourse had the capacity to give real consent to it, the jury could have regard to such things as the complainant's capacity to appreciate:

    - that most of the community draw a distinction in quality between sexual acts and other acts of intimacy; and
    - that a decision to consent or not involves questions of the morality or social acceptability of the conduct (R v Mobilio [1991] 1 VR 339; R v Eastwood [1998] VSCA 42).

28. Section 36(g) says that a person does not consent where they have a mistaken belief that the sexual penetration was for either a medical or hygienic purpose. This section changed the pre-existing common law, which held that mistake as to the purpose of penetration did not deprive consent of reality (R v Mobilio [1991] 1 VR 339. Note that the law stated in Mobilio as to capacity to consent is still correct).

29. There is nothing in s 36 to deal with a situation where a woman is mistaken as to one of the characteristics of the accused, and it is this characteristic which leads her to consent. The common law holds that consent in such circumstances does not make the penetration unlawful (Papadimitropoulos v R (1957) 98 CLR 249).

30. The fact that a man has agreed to pay a specified sum in return for sex and leaves without paying does not mean that consent was vitiated by fraud (R v Linekar [1995] 3 ALL ER 69).

Directions on consent (s 37AAA)

31. Where consent is in issue, and where relevant (but not otherwise) the judge must direct the jury in respect of the matters set out in s 37AAA. They are:

(a) the meaning of consent set out in section 36;

(b) that the law deems a circumstance specified in section 36 to be a circumstance in which the complainant did not consent;

(c) that if the jury is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that a circumstance specified in section 36 exists in relation to the complainant, the jury must find that the complainant was not consenting;

(d) that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement;

(e) that the jury is not to regard a person as having freely agreed to a sexual act just because–

(i) she or he did not protest or physically resist; or

(ii) she or he did not sustain physical injury; or

(iii) on that or an earlier occasion, she or he freely agreed to engage in another sexual act (whether or not of the same type) with that person, or a sexual act with another person (Crimes Act 1958 ss 37, 37AAA).

The significance of the absence of communication

32. Section 37AAA(d) addresses the circumstance where the jury finds that the complainant did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place.

33. It requires the judge to direct the jury that this fact "is enough to show that the act took place without [the complainant's] free agreement" (see also Wilson v R (2011) 33 VR 340).

34. It is wrong to direct a jury that, if satisfied that the complainant did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement, then they must find the complainant did not consent (Yannic v The Queen [2021] VSCA 150, [70]).

35. Section 37AAA(d) is not a deeming provision and the onus remains on the prosecution to establish the absence of consent. There must be evidence that allows the jury to find an absence of consent and it is a question for the jury whether it is satisfied that there was an absence of consent (ISJ v R (2012) 38 VR 23).

36. Where the possibility of consent is a real issue, the section only applies where there is positive evidence that the complainant did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement. It does not apply where there is an absence of evidence concerning the complainant's conduct at the time of the alleged sexual act (ISJ v R (2012) 38 VR 23).

37. The section is also not relevant where the complainant gives evidence that they plainly and clearly stated their absence of consent and physically resisted the accused, while the accused alleges that the complainant clearly expressed their willingness to have sexual activity and did not resist in any way. In those circumstances, the factual basis for a direction under s 37AAA(d) will not be relevant to a fact in issue. The section is not a fallback where the jury rejects a primary case that the complainant overtly communicated their non-consent (Jabir v The Queen [2010] VSCA 342; Yannic v The Queen [2021] VSCA 150, [35]–[40], [63]).

38. Section 37AAA(d) does not affect the prosecution's obligation to separately prove that the accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting. The law does not require a person to satisfy himself or herself that the other person is consenting. The prosecution will fail to prove its case if it fails to establish the fault element due to the accused assuming that the complainant was consenting (Gordon v R [2010] VSCA 207).

Contemporaneous indications of consent

39. The Crimes (Sexual Offences) Act 2006 inserted into the former s 37(1)(a) the phrase "at the time at which the act took place". This was intended to make it clear that "consent to one act at one time is not consent to other acts at other times" (Explanatory Memorandum to the Crimes (Sexual Offences) Bill 2006).

When should a s 37AAA direction be given

40. The judge must give a s 37AAA direction if, and only if the direction is relevant to a fact in issue in the proceeding (Crimes Act 1958 ss 37(1), (2)).

41. For this purpose, the facts in issue are the facts which have been placed in issue in the proceeding, and not the ultimate issues which constitute the elements of the offence (R v Yusuf (2005) 11 VR 492, [18]; Yannic v The Queen [2021] VSCA 150, [60]).

42. As noted above, a section 37AAA(d) direction can only be given if there is evidence that the complainant did not say or do anything to indicate consent. Giving that direction where the complainant gives evidence that they communicated their absence of consent is confusing and unhelpful (Yannic v The Queen [2021] VSCA 150, [64]).

Interaction between ss 37AAA and 37AA

43. Prior to the commencement of the new ss 37, 37AAA and 37AA, the original s 37 created mandatory directions in relation to both consent (ss 37(1)(a) and (b)), and the accused's state of mind about the complainant's consent (s 37(1)(c)).

44. While s 37AAA in terms refers only to the question of consent, it is likely that some of the matters listed in s 37AAA (such as the significance of non-communication, non-resistance and prior consent) are also capable of affecting whether a belief in consent is reasonable and should be mentioned when giving directions under s 37AA.

Other directions on consent

45. A judge must direct on consent with reference to the issues and evidence in the trial. In many trials the issue will not turn on the special cases described in s 36. In those cases the standard charge should be adapted to focus on the true issue in the trial.

Directions on the accused's belief in consent (s 37AA)

46. In appropriate circumstances (see below) the judge must direct the jury in the terms described in s 37AA, that is:

> [I]n considering whether the prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that the accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not have been consenting, the jury must consider-
>
> (a) any evidence of that belief; and
>
> (b) whether that belief was reasonable in all the relevant circumstances having regard to-
>
> (i) in the case of a proceeding in which the jury finds that a circumstance specified in section 36 exists in relation to the complainant, whether the accused was aware that that circumstance existed in relation to the complainant; and
>
> (ii) whether the accused took any steps to ascertain whether the complainant was consenting or might not be consenting, and if so, the nature of those steps; and
>
> (iii) any other relevant matters.

47. "Other relevant matters" under s 37AA(b)(iii) may include a discussion of the impact of the accused's intoxication on his or her capacity to interpret the complainant's words or conduct, or on his or her formation of a belief in consent (Khan v R [2011] VSCA 286).

Awareness and belief

48. For the purposes of the fault element of rape, compelling sexual penetration and indecent assault, the accused's awareness that the complainant is not or might not be consenting is the real issue (R v Getachew (2012) 248 CLR 22). It is unclear whether this is also the real issue in relation to any fault element involving consent for other sexual offences in ss 44 to 52.

49. An assertion by the accused that s/he believed the complainant was consenting is relevant only to raising a reasonable doubt about whether s/he was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting (R v Getachew (2012) 248 CLR 22).

50. The existence of a belief in consent is not necessarily inconsistent with the fault element. It is possible for the prosecution to prove that the accused was aware that the complainant was not or might not have been consenting even though the accused had some belief in consent (R v Getachew (2012) 248 CLR 22).

51. For example, a belief that the complainant may have been or was probably consenting may not provide an answer to a charge of rape, because these states of mind may demonstrate that the accused was aware that the complainant might not be consenting or did not turn his or her mind to whether the complainant might not be consenting (R v Getachew (2012) 248 CLR 22).

52. The judge should explain the difference between a "belief in consent" and an awareness that the complainant might not be consenting and that:

> It is for the prosecution to establish that the accused did not have a belief in consent that creates a reasonable doubt that he was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting. Whether the belief does create a doubt will depend upon the jury's findings of fact as to the nature and extent of that belief (NT v R [2012] VSCA 213, [16]).

The significance of the reasonableness of the accused's belief

53. Section 37AA (like the former s 37(1)(c)) directs the jury to consider the reasonableness of the accused's belief in consent. However, this direction does not mean that the accused's belief in consent is relevant only if it is reasonable. Instead, the reasonableness of belief is relevant only to the jury's assessment of whether or not the belief was in fact held (DPP v Morgan [1976] AC 182; R v Ev Costa 2/4/1997 CA Vic; R v Saragozza [1984] VR 187; R v Zilm (2006) 14 VR 11; Worsnop v R (2010) 28 VR 187; R v Getachew (2012) 248 CLR 22).

54. The reasonableness of the accused's belief must be considered as "no more than a guide" as to whether the accused in fact believed that the complainant was consenting (R v Laz [1998] 1 VR 453).

55. Judges should explicitly tell the jury that the reasonableness of the belief "is no more than a guide to whether the belief was in fact held" (R v Ev Costa 2/4/1997 CA Vic; R v Lucin 25/3/1994 CA Vic; R v Munday (2003) 7 VR 423; R v Zilm (2006) 14 VR 11).

56. Judges will also need to tell the jury that the accused's belief does not have to be reasonable as a matter of law, and that the ultimate question is whether prosecution has proven that, in fact, the accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting (R v Munday (2003) 7 VR 423; R v Zilm (2006) 14 VR 11; R v Gose (2009) 22 VR 150; Wilson v R (2011) 33 VR 340).

The significance of an awareness of a s 36 circumstance

57. An awareness of a circumstance listed in s 36 is relevant to the reasonableness of a belief in consent. However, it is erroneous to tell the jury that, if the accused is aware that a s 36 circumstance either applies to the complainant or might apply to the complaint, then the accused is aware that the complainant is not consenting or might not be consenting. Proof of the existence of a s 36 circumstance combined with proof of the accused's awareness of that circumstance does not remove the Crown's obligation to prove the fault element (R v Getachew (2012) 248 CLR 22; Wilson v R (2011) 33 VR 340; Neal v R (2011) 32 VR 454).

58. An accused may be aware of the possibility that a s 36 circumstance exists without that awareness affecting his or her awareness of an absence of consent. Proof that the accused was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting must be assessed on the evidence as a whole (R v Getachew (2012) 248 CLR 22; Neal v R (2011) 32 VR 454; Wilson v R (2011) 33 VR 340; Brennan v R [2012] VSCA 151).

59. For example, an accused may believe that the complainant had consented prior to falling asleep, and that the consent continued to operate while he or she was asleep. While Crimes Act 1958 s 36(d) states that a person does not consent while he or she is asleep, the law does not deem the accused to be aware of this, and so the prosecution may not be able to prove that the accused was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

60. The law requires juries to understand the distinction between:

    - Being satisfied that the accused was aware that a s 36 circumstance existed or might have existed; and
    - Being satisfied that the prosecution had excluded, beyond reasonable doubt, the possibility that the accused, despite being aware that a s 36 circumstance existed or might have existed, might not have been aware of the absence or possible absence of consent (Wilson v R (2011) 33 VR 340 (Maxwell P)).

61. Awareness of the existence or possible existence of a s 36 circumstance is merely a matter the jury must consider when deciding whether the prosecution has proven that the accused was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting. While proof that the accused was aware of the existence of a s 36 circumstance may lead to an inference that the accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting, it will not necessarily do so in all cases (Roberts v R [2011] VSCA 162; Duwah v R [2011] VSCA 262; Wilson v R (2011) 33 VR 340; Brennan v R [2012] VSCA 151).

62. However, if belief in consent is not raised as an issue at trial (either by assertion or by the evidence) proof that the complainant did not consent due to the existence of a s 36 circumstance and proof that the accused was aware of that circumstance can, without more, demonstrate that the accused was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting (R v Getachew (2012) 248 CLR 22).

When should the s 37AA direction be given?

63. The judge must give a s 37AA direction if, and only if belief in consent is raised as an issue at the trial. This will occur when evidence is led or an assertion is made about the possibility that accused believed that the complainant was consenting to the sexual act (Crimes Act 1958 ss 37(1), 37AA. See also R v Getachew (2012) 248 CLR 22).

64. Section 37(2) provides that a s 37AA direction must not be given if it is "not relevant to the facts in issue in the proceeding". Where there is no evidence of a belief in consent and no assertion of a belief in consent, the judge must not give a direction under s 37AA (R v Getachew (2012) 248 CLR 22; ISJ v R (2012) 38 VR 23).

65. The rules contained in ss 37(1) and (2) reflect the common law obligation to direct the jury on so much of the law as is necessary to enable them to determine the issues in the case (R v Yusuf (2005) 11 VR 492; Jabir & Ahmed v R [2010] VSCA 342).

66. A judge only needs to direct the jury on "real issues" that plainly arise from the evidence, as distinct from remote or artificial possibilities (R v Getachew (2012) 248 CLR 22; R v Alexander [2007] VSCA 178).

67. In assessing whether a matter is in issue, the court will have regard to the matters identified by the parties in accordance with Jury Directions Act 2015 s 11 and the directions requested under Jury Directions Act 2015 s 12. Where the case is conducted purely on the basis that the alleged conduct did not occur and the defence does not request directions on awareness of non-consent, then a s 37AA direction will not be necessary (see Gul v R [2017] VSCA 153, [39]–[40]).

68. If the evidence of the accused's belief is inseparable from the evidence that the complainant consented, it may not be necessary to direct the jury on considering the reasonableness of the accused's belief. However, a direction will be required if there is evidence that supports a finding that the accused had a mistaken belief in consent (Jabir & Ahmed v R [2010] VSCA 342; Sibanda v R (2011) 33 VR 67; R v Bertrand (2008) 20 VR 222; R v Salih [2005] VSCA 282 (Harper AJA)).

69. A belief in consent usually arises out of some relationship, act or conduct. There must be some evidence underpinning a belief in consent beyond speculation. This might arise from some pre-existing relationship or conduct (Sibanda v R (2011) 33 VR 67).

70. Where there is evidence of intoxication which is capable of showing that the accused's mind was sufficiently "befuddled" to have formed a genuine but mistaken belief as to consent, the jury must be directed appropriately in relation to that evidence (R v Ev Costa 2/4/1997 CA Vic. See also: 8.7 Common Law Intoxication).

Direction on non-advertence

71. There are no mandatory directions to be given in respect of the non-advertent mental state described in Crimes Act 1958 ss 38(2)(a)(ii), 38(4)(b)(ii), 38A(3)(b)(ii), 39(2)(b).

72. Section 37AA is the key provision concerning the directions to be given in respect of the accused's awareness of the complainant's state of consent. However, s 37AA is solely concerned with the circumstance where "evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting to a sexual act". As a result it has no relevance to directions to be given in respect of the possibility of non-advertence.

Relating the law to the facts in issue

73. Section 37(3) requires the judge to relate the directions in s 37 to the facts in issue, and to the elements of the offence being tried in respect of which the direction is given, so as to aid the jury's comprehension of the direction.

74. The judge must relate the law to the facts in issue even where the evidence is brief (R v Yusuf (2005) 11 VR 492).

75. The judge must relate the directions to any relevant facts which have been placed in issue in the proceeding, and not just to the ultimate issues comprising the elements of the offence (R v Yusuf (2005) 11 VR 492).

76. The critical issues must be precisely identified in the course of the directions on the law, and must be highlighted by referring to the competing contentions and the evidence relevant to resolution of those issues. In particular, when the directions of law are given, there needs to be reference to the evidence of the complainant relevant to the critical issues. The issues of fact and law must also be related to the Record of Interview and the evidence of the accused (if any) as to their state of mind, and the factors that influenced it. The evidence must also be related to the ultimate issue of whether it has been established beyond reasonable doubt that the complainant consented and/or that the accused had the necessary state of mind concerning the absence of consent (R v Zilm (2006) 14 VR 11).

77. Judges may also relate their directions to events occurring after the alleged offence, as long as that evidence constitutes part of the whole context in which the alleged offending occurred (R v Salih [2005] VSCA 282).

78. If a judge tells the jury that the reason for giving these directions is that they are required by law, the judge must also explain to the jury that these are matters which will guide them in their determination of whether the relevant elements of the charge have been established (Defina v R 3/3/1993 CA Vic).

Last updated: 21 July 2021

7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in Consent (Pre–1/07/15)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge contains two alternative ways to explain the effect of Crimes Act 1958 s 37AA. Judges should choose one form of explanation, or may combine several options depending on what is most likely to clearly and correctly explain the relevant law to the jury.

Alternative 1

In considering whether the prosecution has proved that NOA was aware that NOC was not consenting or might not have been consenting to the penetration, you must consider any evidence that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting and whether that raises a doubt about whether s/he was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting. [Briefly summarise relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.[481]]

In deciding whether NOA believed that the complainant was consenting, you must consider whether it would have been reasonable for him/her to hold that belief in all the circumstances. This is not because the law requires that the belief be reasonable. It does not. A person may genuinely hold a belief, despite it being unreasonable and you could not find this element proven merely because you find that NOA's alleged belief in consent was unreasonable. The reasonableness of the accused's alleged belief is no more than a guide to help you decide whether or not the accused held that belief.

In considering the reasonableness of the NOA's belief, the following [two/three] factors may be relevant.

[Where a circumstance listed in section 36 or 37AAA(d) or (e) is relevant, add the following shaded section.]

First, if you are satisfied that NOC was not consenting because you are satisfied that [describe relevant section 36 or 37AAA(d) or (e) circumstance(s)], then you must consider whether NOA was aware that [describe relevant section 36 or 37AAA(d) or (e) circumstance(s)] as his/her knowledge of that matter is also relevant to whether s/he believed that NOC was consenting. However, knowledge by NOA that [describe relevant section 36 or 37AAA(d) or (e) circumstance] does not determine whether s/he was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.[482]

[First/Second], you must consider whether the accused took any steps to find out whether the complainant was consenting and if so, the nature of those steps. In this case [identify any evidence and/or competing arguments about the steps taken by the accused].

[Second/Third], you must consider any other relevant factors. That includes [identify any evidence and/or competing arguments about the accused's state of mind. In particular:

- Evidence of what was said and done by both parties at the time of the alleged penetration (including evidence before the jury, statements in police interviews and any complaint evidence admitted as evidence of the facts);
- Consider the history of the parties;
- Consider both direct and circumstantial evidence.]

[481] The judge should generally require counsel to identify any evidence relevant to this issue before commencing the charge to the jury.

[482] The judge may consider adding an example to further explain this point.

It is not for the accused to prove that s/he believed that the complainant was consenting. It is for the prosecution to disprove the existence of a belief in consent which would have prevented NOA from having an awareness that NOC was not consenting or might not have been consenting. [State whether the Crown disputes that NOA had such a belief at all.] The prosecution must satisfy you that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting, even if he believed NOC was consenting.

There is a difference between a belief in consent which NOA relies upon and an awareness that NOC was not or might not be consenting, which is what this element is about. That is because there are different strengths of belief.

- At one end of the scale, I might have a belief as to something and the strength of that belief leaves no possibility for error.
- At the other end of the scale, I can have a belief as to something while being aware that I might be mistaken. For example, I might believe that I parked my car on the fourth level of a carpark, but I'm aware that it might be on the third level. I then go to the fourth level to find my car, even though I'm aware it might not be there.

In order to prove this element of awareness, the prosecution must prove to you that NOA did not have such a strong belief that NOC was consenting that s/he did not think of the possibility that she might not be consenting. In determining the strength of NOA's belief in consent, you should consider the matters I just mentioned that are relevant to whether the belief was held. This includes any evidence of the belief, [whether the accused was aware that [describe relevant section 36 or 37AAA(d) or (e) circumstances], whether the accused took steps to find out whether the complainant was consenting and any other relevant factors.

It is for the prosecution to show NOA did not have a belief that creates a reasonable doubt that s/he was actually aware NOC was not, or might not have been, consenting.

The prosecution will therefore prove this element if you are satisfied that even though NOA believed NOC was consenting, he was still aware that s/he might not be consenting.

Alternative 2

In this case, [evidence has been led/the defence argue] that at the time of the sexual penetration NOA believed that NOC was consenting to the sexual act. [Briefly summarise relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

If the accused believed the complainant was consenting, that may raise a reasonable doubt about this element.

There are two matters you must consider regarding this [evidence/argument] about NOA's belief in consent.

First, you must look at any evidence of that belief. [Identify relevant evidence.]

Second, you must consider whether that belief was reasonable in the circumstances. This is because the reasonableness of a belief is a guide to whether it is held. There are [two/three] factors for you to look at when judging whether a belief in consent was reasonable.

[Where a circumstance listed in section 36 or 37AAA(d) or (e) is relevant, add the following shaded section.]

One, if you find that [describe relevant section 36 or 37AAA(d) or (e) circumstance(s)], you must consider whether the accused was aware that [describe relevant section 36 or 37AAA(d) or (e) circumstance(s)]. However, even if you find that NOA was aware that [describe relevant section 36 or 37AAA(d) or (e) circumstance(s)], that does not necessarily prove that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting. It just affects whether a belief in consent was reasonable.

[One/Two], whether the accused took any steps to find out whether the complainant was consenting or might not be consenting and if so, the nature of those steps. In this case [identify any evidence and/or competing arguments about the steps taken by the accused].

[Second/Third], any other relevant factors. That includes [identify any evidence and/or competing arguments about the accused's state of mind. In particular:

- Evidence of what was said and done by both parties at the time of the alleged penetration (including evidence before the jury, statements in police interviews and any complaint evidence admitted as evidence of the facts);
- Consider the history of the parties;
- Consider both direct and circumstantial evidence.]

Remember though that these [two/three] factors are only relevant because the reasonableness of a belief is a guide to whether NOA in fact held that belief. However, the law does not require that the accused's beliefs are reasonable. An unreasonable belief that is genuinely held can raise a reasonable doubt about this element.

So far, I've been speaking about a belief in consent. But remember that the element is that the prosecution must prove that at the time of the sexual penetration the accused:

- was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting; or
- was not giving any thought to whether the complainant was not or might not be consenting.[483]

A belief in consent and an awareness that the complainant might not be consenting are different ideas.[484] It is for the prosecution to show that NOA did not have a belief in consent of a kind that leaves you with a reasonable doubt that s/he was actually aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting. Whether a belief in consent raises a reasonable doubt about this element depends on your view of the nature and extent of NOA's alleged belief in consent.

Last updated: 10 October 2012

7.3.1.4 Effect of Delayed Complaint on Credit

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Scope

1. The law concerning delayed complaint and its impact on credibility in sexual offence cases is governed by the Jury Directions Act 2015 Part 5 Division 2. This Division applies to trials commenced on or after 29 June 2015 (Jury Directions Act 2015 Sch cl 2).
2. Division 2 applies to criminal proceedings that relate (wholly or partly) to a charge for 'a sexual offence' (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 50). 'Sexual offence' has the same meaning as in the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 3), and includes attempt, incitement and conspiracy to commit one of the listed offences (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 4).

[483] For offences alleged to have been committed before 1/1/08, the second bullet point must be omitted.

[484] Judge may wish to insert a suitable example at this point to explain the scope for a person to believe one thing and be aware that they might be mistaken.

Overview

3. If, before any evidence is adduced in a trial and after hearing submissions from the parties, the trial judge considers it is likely that there will be evidence in the trial that suggests there was a delay in complaint or that the complainant did not make a complaint, the trial judge must direct the jury about the relevance of delay to credit (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 52).
4. The judge may form this view on the basis of the depositions, through the matter being addressed during a pre-trial directions hearing, or through a pre-trial document filed under the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (see Criminal Procedure Act 2009 ss 182, 199 and 200).
5. The direction on the effect of delayed complaint on credit must be given before evidence about the delay in making a complaint is adduced and may be given before any evidence is adduced (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 52(1)).
6. Under section 51 of the Jury Directions Act 2015, there are certain statements about complainants in sexual offences which the trial judge, the prosecution and defence counsel are prohibited from making (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 51).
7. Depending on the circumstances of the case, the judge may also need to warn the jury about any forensic disadvantages caused by the delay, about Recent Complaint or about differences in the complainant's account.

Relevance of Delayed Complaint

8. At common law, the absence of "recent complaint" was relevant to the credibility of the complainant as it could be used in evaluating the consistency of the complainant's evidence (Kilby v R (1973) 129 CLR 460; Crofts v R (1996) 186 CLR 427; R v Miletic [1997] 1 VR 593; R v Matthews [1999] 1 VR 534; R v WEB (2003) 7 VR 200).
9. However, section 52 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 now requires the judge to give the jury certain directions which are relevant to assessing the significance of delay. These directions are designed to address certain misconceptions jurors may have about the significance of delay (see Department of Justice, Jury Directions: A Jury-Centric Approach, 2015).
10. While section 51 of the Act prohibits certain statements or suggestions about the impact of delay (See Prohibited Directions and Statements below), nothing in Part 5, Division 2 prevents or restricts the defence from cross-examining the complainant about the reasons for the delay. The defence is entitled to cross-examine a complainant to explore the reasons for a delay (WSJ v R [2010] VSCA 339).

When to Direct the Jury

11. If, before any evidence is adduced in a trial and after hearing submissions from the parties, the trial judge considers it is likely that there will be evidence in the trial that suggests there was a delay in making a complaint or that the complainant did not make a complaint, the trial judge must give a section 52 direction (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 52).
12. The term 'delay in making a complaint' is defined in the Act to include where:
    - the complainant has not pursued, or continued to pursue, the complaint in a timely manner; and
    - the complainant has not made a complaint at the first, or a subsequent, reasonable opportunity to complain (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 50).
13. This requires the judge to make an objective assessment of the interval between the alleged offending and the complaint, and the evidence that will likely be led in the trial.

14. The direction must be given before the evidence of the delay is adduced (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 52(1)(a)).
15. The judge may elect to give the direction before any evidence is adduced (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 52(1)(b)) and may give the direction more than once (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 52(3)).
16. If the judge forms the view during the trial that there is evidence that the complainant delayed in making a complaint or did not make a complaint, the judge must give the jury a section 52 direction as soon as possible (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 52(2)).
17. Section 52(2) ensures that juries will receive a section 52 direction even if the issue of delay is not identified at the start of the trial.
18. The obligation to give a section 52 direction does not depend on a request from the prosecutor or defence counsel (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 52(2A)).

Content of directions

19. In giving a section 52 direction, the judge must inform the jury that experience shows that:
    - people may react differently to sexual offences and there is no typical, proper or normal response to a sexual offence; and
    - some people may complain immediately to the first person they see, while others may not complain for some time and others may never make a complaint;
    - delay in making a complaint in respect of a sexual offence is a common occurrence
    - there may be good reasons why a person may not complain, or may delay in complaining, about a sexual offence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 52(4)).
20. This direction is designed to reflect empirical research about the behaviour of victims of sexual assault. It also aims to counter common misconceptions about such behaviour, which wrongly assumes that most victims of sexual assault will complain at the first opportunity and that failure to do suggests that the complainant is not a "real victim" (Victorian Department of Justice, Jury Directions: A Jury-Centric Approach, 2015).
21. It is not appropriate for a judge to tell the jury that they must have this direction "at the forefront of your minds" when assessing the evidence (Hermanus v R (2015) 49 VR 486, [45] (Osborn JA)).
22. While Jury Direction Act 2015 s 6 provides that the trial judge need not use any particular form of words, it can be dangerous to substitute words like 'disclose' and 'disclosure' for 'complain' or 'complaint'. Such substitution risks encouraging the jury to assume that the complainant's earlier statement is true, when that is a matter in issue in the trial (Nenna v The Queen [2021] VSCA 183, [103]–[105]).
23. As part of this direction, the judge may give an example of a good reason for delay. This example does not need to be based on the evidence given in the trial (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 52(4A), (4B)).
24. The explicit power to give an example of a good reason was introduced by the Justice Legislation Amendment (Sexual Offences and Other Matters) Act 2022 and was designed to address remarks by the Court of Appeal in Ford v The Queen [2020] VSCA 162. Since the direction may be given before any evidence is led, it is likely that abstract examples of possible good reasons, rather than examples identified by the complainant, will be more appropriate (Justice Legislation Amendment (Sexual Offences and Other Matters) Bill 2022 Explanatory Memorandum, 50).
25. Possible reasons for delay may include:
    - being ignorant about the nature, quality and character of the act performed upon them;
    - feeling powerless (particularly where, as is usually the case, the offender is a family member or close acquaintance);
    - trusting the offender, or being emotionally dependent on them;

- fearing family dissolution or punishment for the offender;
- continuing to be in a sexual relationship with the offender;
- feeling that the relationship with the offender is special;
- being sworn to secrecy or compelled to secrecy by threats;
- feeling responsible, guilty or to blame for the acts;
- feeling shame and embarrassment;
- fearing discouragement or disbelief on the part of family and of officials (see R v ERJ (2010) 200 A Crim R 270; Svajcer v R [2010] VSCA 116; Jones v R (1997) 191 CLR 439; M v R (1994) 181 CLR 487).

26. The judge should not refer to growing public knowledge of sexual abuse by teachers and members of clergy in a case where the offending does not involve abuse of institutional power relationships (Hermanus v R (2015) 49 VR 486, [51]).
27. When giving examples of possible good reasons, the judge should make sure their directions on the topic:
    - Do not overawe the jury;
    - Do not purport to give expert evidence;
    - Are not expressed as the experience of courts or the experience of judges;
    - Are directed to identifying reasonable possibilities as a matter of general human experience (Hermanus v R (2015) 49 VR 486, [29]–[34] (Osborn JA)).
28. The judge must also exercise caution and restraint in offering possible reasons, due to the risk that any such reasons may be misinterpreted by the jury (Hermanus v R (2015) 49 VR 486, [177] (McLeish JA)).
29. When informing the jury of possible reasons for delay, the judge must distinguish between the direction of law and the examples. The judge must not give the impression that they are endorsing any particular reason as a good reason for delay, or endorsing a reason given by the complainant as being a good reason (Briggs v The King [2024] VSCA 80, [105]–[109]).
30. Where the complainant has identified a reason for delay, the judge should not emphasise that the complainant has given that explanation him or herself. Such a direction improperly diminishes the weight of the evidence, and creates a risk that the jury might give less weight to the complainant's explanation and testimony generally (Svajcer v R [2010] VSCA 116).

Forensic Disadvantage Warning Does Not Remove Need for Direction

31. The need for directions under Part 5 Division 2 of the Jury Directions Act 2015 is independent of any directions on forensic disadvantage given under Part 4 Division 5 of the Act (see 4.8.1 Delay Causing Forensic Disadvantage). The directions address very different issues, and should be considered independently.

Prohibited Directions and Statements

32. The trial judge, the prosecution and defence counsel (or the accused if unrepresented) must not say, or suggest in any way, to the jury that:
    - the law regards complainants in sexual offence cases as an unreliable class of witness; or
    - complainants in sexual offence cases are an unreliable class of witness; or
    - complainants who delay in making a complaint or do not make a complaint are, as a class, less credible or require more careful scrutiny than other complainants

- complainants who provide commercial sexual services are, as a class, less credible or require more careful scrutiny than other complainants
- complainants who have a particular sexual orientation are, as a class, less credible or require more careful scrutiny than other complainants
- complainants who have a particular gender identity are, as a class, less credible or require more careful scrutiny than other complainants (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 51(1)).

33. This does not prohibit any of those parties saying or suggesting that the particular complainant's delay does, or may, affect their credibility (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 51 Notes).
34. Where the prosecution or defence breaches this prohibition, the judge must correct the statement or suggestion unless there are good reasons for not doing so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 7).
35. A judge must not say, or suggest in any way, to the jury that, because the complainant delayed in making, or failed to make, a complaint that:
    - it would be dangerous or unsafe to convict the accused; or
    - the complainant's evidence should be scrutinised with great care (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 51(2)).
36. A judge must not instruct the jury that the failure of the complainant to complain at the earliest possible opportunity is evidence of consent (Kilby v R (1973) 129 CLR 460).
37. The Jury Directions Act 2015 also abolishes the common law rule which requires a judge to direct the jury that delay in complaint may cast doubt on the reliability of the complainant's evidence and that the jury should take this into account when assessing the complainant's credibility (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54).
38. This abolition reverses the common law rule attributed to Crofts v R (1996) 186 CLR 427 which required judges to balance the statutory directions which informed the jury that there may be good reasons for a complainant to delay in complaining (see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54 Notes).

Last updated: 14 May 2024

7.3.1.4.1 Charge: Effect of Delayed Complaint on Credit

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge has been drafted for use in cases where the trial judge considers that there is likely to be evidence in the trial that suggests that the complainant delayed in making a complaint or did not make a complaint.

For this purpose, a complaint delayed in making a complaint if the complainant did not pursue or continue to pursue the complaint in a timely manner or the complainant did not make a complaint at the first or a subsequent reasonable opportunity.

This charge is designed to be given before any evidence is adduced. It will need to be adapted if it is given after evidence has been led.

As you will become aware, the offence[s] in this trial [is/are] alleged to have occurred [indicate date(s) or date range(s)].

You will hear evidence that NOC did not inform anyone about these offences until [indicate date], which was [indicate delay] after the offence[s] [was/were] alleged to have taken place.[485]

[485] If the section 52 direction is only relevant to some of the offences charged, this paragraph must be modified accordingly.

I must give you the following direction of law about this delay. Experience shows that people react differently to sexual offences and there is no typical, proper or normal response to a sexual offence. Some people may complain immediately to the first person they see, while others may not complain for some time and others may never make a complaint. It is a common occurrence for there to be a delay in making a complaint about a sexual offence and there may be good reasons why a person does not complain, or complain immediately, about a sexual offence.

The purpose of this direction is to warn you that you must decide the case on the evidence before you and not on the basis of assumptions that might be made about how a person may or may not behave or act if they have experienced a sexual assault.

Last updated: 30 July 2023

7.3.1.5 Differences in a Complainant's Account

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Warning! These directions were introduced the Jury Directions and Other Acts Amendment Act 2017. There has not yet been appellate guidance on the operation of these provisions. This information should be used with caution. Further information about the Jury Directions and Other Acts Amendment Act 2017 is available in the Department of Justice and Regulation report, 'Jury Directions: A Jury-Centric Approach Part 2'.

Overview

1. Following amendments which commenced on 1 October 2017, the Jury Directions Act 2015 contains provisions for a mandatory statutory direction about how the jury assesses differences in a complainant's account.
2. These provisions apply to criminal proceedings that relate (wholly or partly) to a charge for 'a sexual offence' (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54A). 'Sexual offence' has the same meaning as in the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 3), and includes attempt, incitement and conspiracy to commit one of the listed offences (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 4).
3. The judge is only required to give the direction if, after hearing prosecution and defence submissions, the judge thinks there is evidence in the trial that suggests a difference in the complainant's account of the alleged sexual offence that is relevant to the complainant's credibility or reliability (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54D).

Background to the direction

4. This direction was introduced by the Jury Directions and Other Acts Amendment Act 2017. It applies to trials that commence on or after 1 October 2017.
5. The direction is intended to address common misconceptions that occur in sexual offence trials: that a 'real' victim would remember all details of an offence, and be consistent in how they describe the offending whenever they are asked to do so (Victoria, Parliamentary Debates, Legislative Assembly, 22 February 2017, 18 (Martin Pakula, Attorney-General); see further Department of Justice and Regulation, Jury Directions: A Jury-Centric Approach Part 2, February 2017, pp 19–22).
6. While it remains up to a jury to assess whether the differences are relevant to the complainant's credibility and reliability, the directions set out in Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54D(2) are intended to assist a jury to deal with any differences in the complainant's account on an informed basis, rather than relying on unconscious misconceptions.

Meaning of difference

7. Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54C, as amended in 2017, provides an inclusive list of what constitutes a 'difference' in the complainant's account. It includes:

   (a) A gap in that account;

   (b) An inconsistency in that account; and

   (c) A difference between that account and another account.

8. This definition appears to cover both incomplete accounts (such as where a complainant does not reveal all alleged offending in the first interview with police) and inconsistent accounts (both inconsistencies that emerge between police statements or that emerge in the course of cross-examination). For a discussion of the significance of inconsistencies that emerge in cross-examination, see Failure to Challenge Evidence (Browne v Dunn) and Ward v R [2017] VSCA 37.

When is the direction required?

9. There are two conditions which must be met before the judge is required to give a differences in account direction:

   - The case must be a criminal proceeding that relates wholly or partly to a charge for a sexual offence or a charge for an offence of conspiracy or incitement to commit a sexual offence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54A); and
   - The judge, after hearing submissions from the prosecution and defence counsel, considers that there is evidence in the trial that suggests a difference in the complainant's account of the offence charged that is relevant to the complainant's credibility or reliability (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54D).

10. Unlike many directions under the Jury Directions Act 2015, the request process in Part 3 does not apply to this direction. The judge may form the view that they should give a differences in account direction either on their own motion, or following a request from the prosecution (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54D(2A)).

Timing of Direction

11. The direction on differences appears designed to be given after evidence of differences emerges in the trial. This may be contrasted with the direction on delay in complaint, which is designed to be given before any evidence is adduced in the trial (compare Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 52 and 54D).

12. The Act is silent on whether the direction should be given as a direction in running when inconsistencies emerge, or whether the judge should wait until final directions. The timing of the direction may be at the discretion of the judge, taking into account matters such as the significance of the differences, the likely length of the trial and any other matters that appear relevant.

13. The judge may repeat the direction on differences at any time in the trial (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54D(3)).

Content of the direction

14. Where a judge thinks that there is evidence suggesting such a difference, the judge must inform the jury that:

(a) It is up to the jury to decide whether the offence charged, or any alternative offence, was committed; and

(b) Differences in a complainant's account may be relevant to the jury's assessment of the complainant's credibility and reliability; and

(c) Experience shows that:

(i) People may not remember all the details of a sexual offence or may not describe a sexual offence in the same way each time; and

(ii) Trauma may affect different people differently, including by affecting how they recall events; and

(iii) It is common for there to be differences in accounts of a sexual offence; and

(iv) Both truthful and untruthful accounts of a sexual offence may contain differences; and

(d) It is up to the jury to decide:

(i) Whether or not any differences in the complainant's account are important to assessing the complainant's credibility and reliability; and

(ii) Whether they believe all, some or none of the complainant's evidence.

Prior Inconsistent Statements

15. Where the difference in a complainant's account is an inconsistency, a direction on the use of prior inconsistent statements may be required. See Previous Representations (Hearsay, Recent Complaint and Prior Statements) for further information.

Last updated: 1 January 2023

7.3.1.5.1 Charge: Differences in Complainant's Account

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This direction is designed to be used in cases involving a sexual offence if, after hearing counsel's submissions, the judge considers there is evidence that suggests a difference in the complainant's account of the offence that is relevant to the complainant's credibility or reliability.

Differences in complainant's account

In this case you have heard evidence that [insert details of the evidence that suggests a difference in the complainant's account of the offence].

You may think that this shows that there have been differences in what NOC has said on different occasions.

For this purpose, a difference can be a gap in NOC's account, an inconsistency in NOC's account or a difference between NOC's account and another account.

[Insert the following shaded section if it is appropriate to narrow the definition of differences.]

In this case, the parties are agreed that the only relevant form of difference is [a gap in NOC's account/an inconsistency in NOC's account/a difference between NOC's account and another account]. So when I speak of differences, I am referring to [refer to relevant difference].

You may use a difference in NOC's account when you are assessing his/her credibility and reliability. When you are assessing the evidence, bear in mind that experience shows that:

- People may not remember all the details of a sexual offence or may not describe a sexual offence in the same way each time;
- Trauma may affect different people differently, including by affecting how they recall events;
- It is common for there to be differences in accounts of a sexual offence. For example, people may describe a sexual offence differently at different times, to different people or in different contexts; and
- Both truthful and untruthful accounts of a sexual offence may contain differences.

The purpose of these directions is to warn you that you must decide the case on the evidence before you and not on the basis of assumptions that might be made about how a person may or may not behave or act if they have experienced a sexual assault.

It is up to you to decide whether or not the differences in NOC's account are important when assessing NOC's credibility and reliability. It is up to you to decide whether you believe all, some or none of his/her evidence.

Ultimately, the question you must decide is whether the prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that NOA committed NOO.

Last updated: 1 January 2023

7.3.1.6 Evidence of a Post-Offence Relationship

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. The Justice Legislation Amendment (Sexual Offences and Other Matters) Act 2022 introduced a statutory direction on post-offence relationships in sexual offence cases. These provisions are found in the Jury Directions Act 2015 Part 5 Division 4.
2. These provisions only apply to criminal proceedings that relate (wholly or partly) to a charge for 'a sexual offence' (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54E). 'Sexual offence' has the same meaning as in the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 3), and includes attempt, incitement and conspiracy to commit one of the listed offences (Criminal Procedure Act 2009 s 4).
3. For the purpose of this Division, 'evidence of a post-offence relationship' means:

   Evidence that suggests that, after the offence charged is alleged to have been committed, the complainant–

   (a) continued a relationship with the accused; or

   (b) otherwise continued to communicate with the accused (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54G).

4. If, before any evidence is adduced in a trial and after hearing submissions from the parties, the trial judge considers it is likely that there will be evidence in the trial of a post-offence relationship, the trial judge must give the direction in s 54H(5) (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54H(1)).
5. The judge may form this view on the basis of the depositions, through the matter being addressed during a pre-trial directions hearing, or through a pre-trial document filed under the Criminal Procedure Act 2009 (see Criminal Procedure Act 2009 ss 182, 199 and 200).
6. The direction on the post-offence relationship must be given before evidence about the post-offence relationship is adduced and may be given before any evidence is adduced (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54H(1)), and may be repeated at any time in the trial (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54H(4)).
7. If the judge later forms the view that there is or will be evidence of a post-offence relationship, the judge must give the s 54H direction as soon as practicable (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54H(2)).

8. The Jury Directions Act 2015 Part 3 request process does not apply to the direction on post-offence relationships. Instead, the onus is on the judge to decide whether the direction is necessary, though the prosecution may request the direction (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54H(3)).

9. A direction on evidence of a post-offence relationship must inform the jury that experience shows that:

   (a) people may react differently to a sexual offence, and there is no typical, proper or normal response; and

   (b) some people who are subjected to a sexual act a sexual offence will never again contact the person who subjected them to the offence, while others-

      (i) may continue a relationship with that person; or

      (ii) may otherwise continue to communicate with them; and

   (c) there may be good reasons why a person who is subjected to a sexual offence–

      (i) may continue a relationship with the person who subjected them to the offence; or

      (ii) may otherwise continue to communicate with that person (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54H(5)).

10. The judge may give the jury an example of a good reason why a person would continue a relationship or otherwise may continue to communicate with that person (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54H(6)), and an example of a good reason does not need to be based on the evidence given in the trial (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54H(7)).

11. There is currently no judicial guidance on when a person may have good reasons for continuing a relationship for the purpose of this provision. As with the direction on delayed complaint, the JDA expects judges to give the direction before the complainant gives evidence. The judge should consider whether to identify good reasons which the complainant is likely to give (based on the judge's knowledge of complainant's statements and any pre-recorded evidence), or whether to give generic reasons. See 7.3.1.4 Effect of delayed complaint on credit for examples of good reasons in the context of delay.

Post-offence relationships and child complainants

12. For a time, it was thought that this direction was not applicable if the complainant was a child, as the provision referred to a person "subjected to a sexual act without their consent" and consent is not an element of sexual offences against children.

13. This issue has been resolved through amendments made by Part 8 of the Justice Legislation Amendment Act 2023 which commenced on 11 October 2023. Section 61 of that Act amended s 54H of the Jury Directions Act 2015 to remove references to consent. These amendments apply to any trials commencing after 11 October 2023 (Jury Directions Act 2015 Schedule 1, clause 7(2)).

Last updated: 9 November 2023

7.3.1.6.1 Charge: Evidence of a Post-Offence Relationship

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge has been drafted for use in cases where the trial judge considers that there is likely to be evidence in the trial that suggests that the complainant continued a relationship with the alleged offender.

This charge is designed to be given before any evidence is adduced. It will need to be adapted if it is given after evidence has been led.

This charge is designed to be given immediately after a direction on delay in complaint. If a direction on delay in complaint is not necessary, or if the judge gives the directions at separate times, the direction must be adapted.

Another feature of this delay is that NOC continued to [live with/visit/write to/study with] NOA. You will likely hear evidence that, to outward appearances, NOC's relationship with NOA continued during the period of the alleged offending.

I must give you the following direction about this continued relationship. As I said before, experience shows that people may react differently to sexual offences and there is no typical, proper or normal response. Some people break contact with their alleged offender immediately and never see them again, while others may continue a relationship with that person or otherwise continue to communicate with them. As with a delay in complaining, there may be good reasons why a person would continue a relationship with their alleged offender, or otherwise continue to communicate with them.

The purpose of this direction is to warn you that you must decide the case on the evidence before you and not on the basis of assumptions that might be made about how a person may or may not behave or act if they have experienced a sexual assault.

Last updated: 9 November 2023

7.3.1.7 Distress

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Evidence of a complainant's "distress" during or shortly after an alleged sexual offence may be admitted as circumstantial evidence that independently supports the complainant's evidence (R v Redpath (1962) 46 Cr App R 319; R v Flannery [1969] VR 584; R v Sailor [1994] 2 Qd R 342; R v Tubou [2001] NSWCCA 306; R v Mathe [2003] VSCA 165; R v Shillings [2003] NSWCCA 272).
2. The law concerning distress evidence developed at a time when judges were generally required to warn juries about the dangers of convicting the accused on the uncorroborated evidence of victims of sexual offences. Judges are now prohibited from directing the jury about the need for corroboration (Evidence Act 2008 s 164). Despite this change in the underpinning of the law of distress, earlier decisions continue to apply (see cases discussed and cited in Paull v The Queen [2021] VSCA 339; Seccull v The King [2022] VSCA 219).
3. In addition, Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54K requires the judge to direct the jury about the possibility of the complainant being distressed while giving evidence.

Distress Evidence as Circumstantial Evidence

4. Distress evidence is a form of circumstantial evidence, with similarities to post-offence conduct evidence (Flora v R [2013] VSCA 192).
5. Distress evidence may be used as circumstantial evidence where it is reasonably open to the jury to infer that there was a causal connection between the alleged offending and the distress (Flora v R [2013] VSCA 192).
6. Distress evidence may also form part of the narrative when evidence is led of a previous complaint. While this portion of the evidence is admissible, it is admissible only to help the trier of fact put the conversation in context, and to understand what was conveyed during the conversation (Seccull v The King [2022] VSCA 219, [88]), and is not independently probative distress evidence.

Independent Evidence

7. The probative value of distress evidence is likely to be slight or non-existent where it is given only by the complainant. The value of such evidence is intrinsically linked with the complainant's credibility, and likely adds little to the complainant's account. At common law, distress evidence was incapable of providing corroboration unless it was given by an independent witness who observed the distress (see Eades v R [2001] WASCA 329; R v Meyer [2007] VSCA 115).

Probative Value of Distress Evidence

8. For distress evidence to be relevant, it must be reasonably open for the jury to infer that there was a causal connection between the offence and the distress (Flora v R [2013] VSCA 192; Seccull v The King [2022] VSCA 219, [30], [93], [97], [100]).

9. As distress is a form of circumstantial evidence, this inference will not be open to the jury if the connection between the alleged offending and the observed distress is too remote or tenuous (R v Link (1992) 60 A Crim R 264; R v Schlaefer (1984) 37 SASR 207; R v Roissetter [1984] 1 Qd R 477). See also Circumstantial Evidence and Inferences.

10. This inference may also not be open to the jury where there are multiple possible causes of the observed distress. To be admissible, it must be open to the jury to reasonably infer that the alleged offending, rather than some other matter, caused the distress (R v Flannery [1969] VR 586; R v Mathe [2003] VSCA 165; R v McNamara [2002] NSWCCA 248. But c.f. R v Schlaefer (1984) 37 SASR 207; R v Link (1992) 60 A Crim R 264).

11. However, evidence of distress is not rendered inadmissible simply because of competing theories as to its cause. As with evidence of incriminating conduct, other competing causes are relevant to weight not relevance, unless the evidence is 'intractably neutral'. It is rare that distress evidence will be intractably neutral, as items of circumstantial evidence must be considered in the context of all the evidence in the case (Flora v R [2013] VSCA 192. See also R v Ciantar (2006) 16 VR 26; R v Rogers [2008] VSCA 125; R v Mitrovic [1999] SASC 478).

No Need for Evidence to Unequivocally Establish Identity or Guilt

12. As long as it is open for the jury to find a causal connection between the complainant's distress and the alleged offending, and the evidence is capable of supporting the complainant's account in a material particular, the jury may use distress evidence even if:

    - It does not establish the identity of the accused (R v Major & Lawrence [1998] 1 Qd R 317); or
    - It does not point unequivocally to the accused's guilt (R v Taylor (2003) 8 VR 213; Doney v R (1990) 171 CLR 207; R v Berrill [1982] Qd R 508).[486]

Evaluation of Distress Evidence

13. Circumstance which a jury may wish to take into account when evaluating distress evidence include:

    - The age of the complainant;
    - The interval between the alleged offence and the observed distress;

---

[486] Some earlier cases stated that distress evidence has no probative value unless there were no other possible causes for the distress (R v Link (1992) 60 A Crim R 264; R v Schlaefer (1984) 37 SASR 207). These decisions appear inconsistent with Doney v R (1990) 171 CLR 207 and the modern understanding of circumstantial evidence. See also Flora v R [2013] VSCA 192.

- The conduct and appearance of the complainant between the alleged offence and the observed distress; and
- The circumstances at the time of the observed distress (see R v Flannery [1969] VR 586).

Timing of Observed Distress

14. The probative value of distress evidence diminishes rapidly with time. This is because the greater the interval there is between the alleged offending and the observed distress, the greater the risk that the distress was caused by something other than the alleged offence (R v Sailor [1994] 2 Qd R 342; R v BM [2005] VSCA 260; R v Link (1992) 60 A Crim R 264).
15. A time may eventually be reached when the only way to establish a connection between the observed distress and the alleged offending is by relying on the complainant's own evidence about the cause of his/her distress. In such a situation, the distress evidence will likely have no probative value (as the complainant cannot support his/her own account) (R v Sailor [1994] 2 Qd R 342).

Complainant Not Aware of Observation

16. The probative value of distress evidence is higher when the complainant is not aware that s/he is being observed (R v Redpath (1962) 46 Cr App R 319).

Distress When Making a Complaint

17. Special difficulties arise where distress is observed when the complainant is making a complaint. This is because it is difficult to establish that the distress is caused by the offending, rather than by the process of making a complaint or giving evidence (R v Sailor [1994] 2 Qd R 342; R v Flannery [1969] VR 586; R v Redpath (1962) 46 Cr App R 319; Paull v The Queen [2021] VSCA 339. See also Nimely v The King [2023] VSCA 20, [26]).

Directions to the Jury

Pre-trial distress

18. The need for a direction on distress depends on whether a direction is sought or whether there are substantial and compelling reasons to give a direction in the absence of any request (Jury Directions Act 2015 ss 14, 15, 16). See Directions Under Jury Directions Act 2015 for information on when directions are required.
19. When directing the jury on independently probative distress evidence, the judge should:
    - Explain that evidence of observed distress shortly after the alleged offending may be treated as independent or corroborative evidence of the charge;
    - Explain that evidence of distress is only relevant if the jury is satisfied that it is causally connected to the alleged offending;
    - Warn about the weaknesses inherent in distress, and that it generally carries little weight (other than in exceptional circumstances) (see R v Brdarovski [2006] VSCA 23; R v Flannery [1969] VR 586; Paull v The Queen [2021] VSCA 339; Seccull v The King [2022] VSCA 219).

Distress Evidence and Recent Complaint Evidence

20. At common law, it was necessary to instruct the jury about the separate uses of evidence of distress and evidence of recent complaint. This was because the two classes of evidence were different and must be used in different ways (see R v Roach [1988] VR 665; R v Brdarovski [2006] VSCA 231).
21. The need for this distinction does not arise under the Evidence Act 2008. Both distress evidence and the making of a recent complaint can be used in proof of the offence (see Evidence Act 2008 s 66).

Distress while giving evidence

22. If the complainant will give evidence, the judge must give the jury a direction on the possibility of the complainant being distressed while giving evidence, unless there are good reasons not to do so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54K(1)).
23. The judge must give this direction about the possibility of the complainant being distressed before the complainant gives evidence, unless there are good reasons not to do so (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54K(2)).
24. When directing the jury about the possibility of the complainant being distressed, the judge must inform the jury that experience shows that–
    - because trauma affects people differently, some people may show obvious signs of emotion or distress when giving evidence about a sexual offence, while others may not;
    - both truthful and untruthful accounts of a sexual offence may be given with or without obvious signs of emotion or distress (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54K(5)).
25. The judge may repeat this direction at any time in the trial (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54K(4)).
26. The judge must have regard to the submissions of the parties when deciding whether there are good reasons for not giving the direction at all, or for not giving the direction before the witness gives evidence (Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54K(3)).
27. This direction is based on research that jurors may believe that a person who has been the subject of a sexual offence will always display emotion when recounting the offending. Instead, emotional reactions of a sexual offence victim can be highly variable (Justice Legislation Amendment (Sexual Offences and Other Matters) Bill 2022 Explanatory Memorandum, 54–55). This direction is therefore designed to reduce the potential for the jury to give improper weight to the complainant's display of emotion when evaluating the credibility of the complainant's evidence.
28. This direction supplements the common law prohibition on the judge telling the jury that they may consider a display of emotion by the witness when giving evidence is a matter that may support the complainant's credibility (see Paull v The Queen [2021] VSCA 339).Jury Directions Act 2015 s 54K does not affect the rules or directions required in relation to pre-trial distress (Nimely v The King [2023] VSCA 20, [30]).

Last updated: 22 March 2023

7.3.1.7.1 Charge: Pre-Trial Distress

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

You have heard evidence about NOC's apparent distress [identify circumstances of distress and elaborate if necessary on the details of the distress].

If you find that NOC was distressed immediately after the alleged offence, the prosecution invites you to use this as indirect evidence that supports its case that [describe the issue the evidence may support, e.g. "s/he did not consent to the penetration")]. In other words, the prosecution says that the distress supports a conclusion that NOC suffered a traumatic event. Given the timing of the distress, the prosecution say that the only possible traumatic event was the alleged [identify relevant offence].

[Insert relevant prosecution arguments.] The defence dispute this, and say [insert relevant defence arguments].

I must give you the following directions of law about this piece of evidence. First, you can use the evidence in the way the prosecution suggests. But you may only do so if you are satisfied there is no other reason why NOC could have appeared distressed at that time. Second, the experience of the law is that evidence of observed distress is a weak type of evidence and you should not give this evidence much weight.

Last updated: 1 January 2023

7.3.1.7.2 Charge: Distress when Giving Evidence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This direction must be given before the complainant gives evidence in a trial for a sexual offence, unless the judge finds there are good reasons for not giving it at that time, or not giving it at all.

One of the witnesses you will hear from is NOC, who is the person who says [s/he] was the subject of NOA's offences. When you are hearing his/her evidence, you must bear in mind the following direction of law. Experience shows that some people may show obvious signs of distress when giving evidence about an alleged sexual offence, while others may not. This is because trauma affects people differently. Both truthful and untruthful accounts of a sexual offence may be given with or without obvious signs of emotion. To that direc*tion, I add the following comment*, which you may accept or reject. You should be slow to put any weight on whether NOC displays emotion when giving evidence. There are too many factors which can influence whether NOC displays emotion for that to be a safe tool for judging [his/her] evidence.

The purpose of this direction is to warn you that you must decide the case on the evidence before you and not on the basis of assumptions that might be made about how a person may or may not behave or act if they have experienced a sexual assault.

Last updated: 1 January 2023

7.3.2 Rape (From 1/1/92)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Types of Rape

Offences committed on or after 1 July 2015

1. The Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences and Other Matters) Act 2014 commenced operation of 1 July 2015. The Act substituted a new Subdivision (8A) in Division 1 of Part 1 of the Crimes Act 1958 and a new definition of consent in section 34C.
2. On 1 July 2017, this definition of consent was moved to section 36 by the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Act 2016.
3. Sections 38 and 39 of the Crimes Act 1958 create the two distinct offences of 'rape' and 'rape by compelling sexual penetration' (compelled rape):
    i) A person (A) commits rape when he/she intentionally sexually penetrates another person (B), without B's consent, and does not reasonably believe that B consents to the penetration (s 38(1));
    ii) A person (A) commits compelled rape when he/she intentionally causes another person (B) to sexually penetrate A, B, another person or an animal, or be sexually penetrated by another person or an animal without B's consent, and does not reasonably believe that B consents to doing that act (s 39(1)).
4. Prior to 1 July 2017, the definition of sexual penetration in Crimes Act 1958 s 37D meant that causing a person to be sexually penetrated by a third person was dealt with as rape. Due to changes introduced by the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Act 2016, from 1 July 2017 this scenario is dealt with by the offence of compelled rape.
5. Prior to 1 July 2015, the Crimes Act 1958 contained separate provisions for rape by sexual penetration and rape by failure to withdraw after sexual penetration. However, "failure to withdraw" is now included within the definition of sexual penetration (see "Sexual penetration" below).

6. Prior to 1 July 2015, different offences existed in respect of the accused compelling a person to sexually penetrate the accused or a third person (see Crimes Act 1958 s 38(3)), and an accused compelling a person to sexually penetrate themselves or an animal (see Crimes Act 1958 s 38A). All of these types of conduct are now included under the single compelled rape provision in s 39.

Offences committed between 1 January 2008 and 1 July 2015

7. Between 1 January 2008 and 1 July 2015, section 38 of the Crimes Act 1958 defined four distinct forms of rape. A person committed rape by:

   i) Intentionally sexually penetrating another person without their consent, while being aware that the person is not or might not be consenting, or while not giving any thought to whether the person is not or might not be consenting (s 38(2)(a));

   ii) After sexual penetration, failing to withdraw from a person who is not consenting on becoming aware that the person is not consenting or might not be consenting (s 38(2)(b));

   iii) Compelling a person to sexually penetrate the offender or another person (s 38(3)(a)); and

   iv) Compelling a person who has sexually penetrated the offender or another person not to withdraw (s 38(3)(b)).

8. This charge book includes charges for s 38(2)(a) rape, and s 38(3)(a) compelled rape. If a case involves a failure to withdraw, contrary to ss 38(2)(b) and 38(3)(b), these charges will need to be modified accordingly.

9. Where the pleading confines the rape to the kind of rape which is proscribed by s 38(2)(a), and at no point during the trial is it alleged that the accused had committed the kind of rape proscribed by s 38(2)(b), the judge should not direct the jury about s 38(2)(b) rape (R v SAB (2008) 20 VR 55; [2008] VSCA 150).

10. Section 38(3) compelled rape is a wholly different offence to s 38A compelled sexual penetration. Section 38(3) applies where the complainant is compelled to sexual penetrate the offender or "another person" (i.e. a person other than the victim). Section 38A involves either compulsion of the victim to sexually penetrate him or herself (i.e. self-penetration) or compelled bestiality.

Rape and compelled rape

11. As there have been no reported cases to date addressing the requirements of compelled rape, this commentary is primarily concerned with rape simpliciter. It is assumed that most of the principles will be equally applicable to compelled rape (with appropriate modifications), and the charges relating to compelled rape have been drafted accordingly.

Operation of rape provisions in the Crimes Act 1958

12. The offence of rape has changed significantly over time:

Date	Offence	Crimes Act 1958	Key changes
On/after 1 Jul 2017	Rape; compelled rape	s 38; s 39	New legislative definition of sexual penetration and compelled rape reclassified some conduct from rape to compelled rape

On/after 1 Jul 2015	Rape; compelled rape	s 38; s 39	New legislative definitions of rape and compelled rape (including a new fault element of no reasonable belief in consent) Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences and Other Matters) Act 2014
1 Jan 2008 – 30 Jun 2015	Rape; compelled rape	s 38(2)(a); s 38(4)	Rape and compelled rape definitions expanded (introducing new fault element based on non-advertence to the complainant's state of mind) Crimes Amendment (Rape) Act 2007
1 Dec 2006 – 31 Dec 2007	Compelled rape	s 38(3)	Compelled rape definition modified (to make the offences gender neutral) Crimes (Sexual Offences) Act 2006
22 Nov 2000 – 20 Nov 2005	Compelled rape	s 38(3)	First legislative definition of compelled rape Crimes (Rape) Act 2000
1 Jan 1992–21 Nov 2000	Rape	s 38(1)–(2)	New legislative definition of rape Crimes (Rape) Act 1991
5 Aug 1991 – 31 Dec 1991	Rape	s 38	Rape definition modified Crimes (Sexual Offences) Act 1991
1 Mar 1981 – 3 Aug 1991	Rape	s 45	First legislative definition of rape Crimes (Sexual Offences) Act 1980
Pre 1 Mar 1981	Rape	None	Common law

13. If an offence is alleged to have been committed between two dates which straddle any of the commencement dates described above, the allegation is to be treated as relating to the period before the commencement of the new provision (Crimes (Rape) Act 1991 s 9(4); Crimes Act 1958 ss 593(4), 606A(2), 609(4)).

General guidelines

Offences committed on or after 1 July 2015

14. There are three elements of rape under s 38(1). A person (A) commits rape if:

    i) A intentionally sexually penetrates another person (B);

    ii) B does not consent to the penetration; and

    iii) A does not reasonably believe that B is consenting to the penetration.

Offences committed before 1 July 2015

15. There were four elements of rape under s 38(2)(a). A person committed rape if he or she:

    i) Sexually penetrated another person;

    ii) Intentionally;

    iii) Without that person's consent;

    iv) While being aware that the person was not consenting or might not have been consenting or while not giving any thought to whether the person was not consenting or might not have been consenting.

All offences

16. It is preferable to use the language of the legislation in charging the jury on the elements of rape (R v Soldo [2005] VSCA 136; R v Zilm (2006) 14 VR 11 (Callaway JA)).

17. Judges should take care not to run the elements together. In particular, judges should not instruct the jury that the final element relates to "the guilty mind of the accused". For example, for offences committed before 1 July 2015, judges should not instruct the jury that the prosecution must prove that the accused "intended to commit the crime of rape in the sense that, at the time of sexual penetration, he [or she] realized that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting". This direction runs together the second and fourth elements (R v Soldo [2005] VSCA 136; R v Zilm (2006) 14 VR 11 (Callaway JA)).

18. A judge should not use the word "reckless" when directing the jury about the accused's knowledge as to lack of consent, as it is not used in the statutory language and it may mislead the jury because of its multiple legal meanings (R v Ev Costa 2/4/1997 CA Vic).

"Sexual penetration"

Offences committed on or after 1 July 2017

19. For offences committed on or after 1 July 2017 "Sexual penetration" is defined by s 35A of the Crimes Act 1958. This definition applies to all offences in Subdivisions (8A) to (8FA).

20. Section 35A provides that:

(1) A person (A) sexually penetrates another person (B) if-

(a) A introduces (to any extent) a part of A's body or an object into B's vagina; or

(b) A introduces (to any extent) a part of A's body or an object into B's anus; or

(c) A introduces (to any extent) their penis into B's mouth; or

(d) A, having introduced a part of A's body or an object into B's vagina, continues to keep it there; or

(e) A, having introduced a part of A's body or an object into B's anus, continues to keep it there; or

(f) A, having introduced their penis into B's mouth, continues to keep it there.

(2) A person sexually penetrates themselves if-

(a) the person introduces (to any extent) a part of their body or an object into their own vagina; or

(b) the person introduces (to any extent) a part of their body or an object into their own anus; or

(c) having introduced a part of their body or an object into their own vagina, they continue to keep it there; or

(d) having introduced a part of their body or an object into their own anus, they continue to keep it there.

(3) A person (A) sexually penetrates an animal if A engages in conduct with the animal that would involve sexual penetration as defined by subsection (1) were the animal another person (B).

(4) A person (B) is sexually penetrated by an animal if B engages in conduct with the animal that would involve sexual penetration as defined by subsection (1) were the animal another person (A).

(5) In relation to sexual penetration of an animal, a reference to the vagina or anus includes a reference to any similar part.

21. As with the former s 37D, the definition of sexual penetration does not contain an exception for good faith medical or hygienic procedures (compare Crimes Act 1958 s 35 prior to 1 July 2015). Instead, this exception is provided by dedicated provisions that apply in relation to offences (see, e.g. ss 48A, 49T, 50G).

Offences committed between 1 July 2015 and 30 June 2017

22. Between 1 July 2015 and 30 June 2017 "sexual penetration" was defined by s 37D of the Crimes Act 1958 for the offences in ss 38–43 (including rape and compelled rape). This definition is different from that in s 35, which continues to apply to all other sexual offences, and to rape or compelled rape committed prior to 1 July 2015.

23. Section 37D provides that sexual penetration includes:

- Penile penetration of the vagina, the anus or the mouth of another person; and
- Penetration by a part of the body (e.g. a finger) or by some other object of the vagina or the anus, but not the mouth.

24. The definition of "sexual penetration" in s 37D also includes the act of continuing to keep a body part or object in the vagina or anus once introduced, or the act of continuing to keep a penis in the mouth once introduced (ss 37D(1)(d)–(f)). This removes the need to distinguish between an act of sexual penetration and an act of failure to withdraw after sexual penetration.

25. A person (A) also commits sexual penetration of another person (B), if

    - A causes a third person to sexually penetrate B; or
    - A causes an act of penetration of B's anus or vagina by the penis of an animal (s 37D(2)).

26. The definition of sexual penetration in s 37D does not contain an exception for good faith medical or hygienic procedures (compare Crimes Act 1958 s 35 prior to 1 July 2015). Instead, this exception is built into the relevant offences, rather than the definition of sexual penetration (ss 38(3), 39(3)).

Offences committed before 1 July 2015

27. Before 1 July 2015 "sexual penetration" was defined by s 35 of the Crimes Act 1958 as

    - Penile penetration of the vagina, the anus or the mouth of another person; and
    - Penetration by a part of the body (e.g. a finger) or by some other object of the vagina or the anus, but not the mouth.

28. Conduct that would otherwise have fallen within the definition of sexual penetration will not do so if carried out in good faith in the course of a procedure for medical or hygienic purposes (Crimes Act 1958 s 35(1)). In such cases it is for the prosecution to satisfy the jury that the accused did not subjectively believe that there was a proper medical or hygienic purpose for carrying out the act (R v Zaidi (1991) 57 A Crim R 189).

All offences

29. It is not sufficient for the relevant body part to have simply been touched. It must have been penetrated to some extent (Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108).

30. Penetration need only be slight or fleeting. The definitions of sexual penetration include the words "to any extent" (See Crimes Act 1958 ss 35 (before 1 July 2015), 37D (on or after 1 July 2015) and 35A (on or after 1 July 2017). See also Randall v R (1991) 53 A Crim R 380; Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108).

31. The purpose of the penetration is irrelevant. It need not have been committed for the purposes of sexual gratification (R v Dunn 15/4/1992 CA NSW).

32. While in most cases the prosecution will be able to particularise the method of penetration (e.g., the complainant was penetrated by a penis; or the complainant's vagina was penetrated), in some cases this will not be possible. In such cases, it will be sufficient for the prosecution to particularise the penetration by reference to the relevant possibilities (e.g., the complainant was penetrated by a penis, a bodily part or some other object; or the complainant's vagina or anus was penetrated) (R v Castles (Ruling No.1) (2007) 17 VR 329; El-waly v The Queen (2012) 46 VR 656, [53]-[54]; Saab v The Queen [2022] VSCA 116, [85]; Stanford v DPP [2024] VSCA 35, [41]-[44]).

33. Where alternative possible methods of penetration are left to the jury, they do not need to unanimously agree about which of those methods was used. They only need to unanimously agree that penetration took place (R v Castles (Ruling No.1) (2007) 17 VR 329).

34. However, if the indictment specifies a mode of penetration, the jury must reach a verdict in relation to that mode of penetration. It cannot find the accused guilty on the basis of a mode of penetration different to that specified in the indictment (Stanford v DPP [2024] VSCA 35, [41]-[44]).

"Vagina"

All offences

35. The definition of vagina includes "the external genitalia" (s 35 (before 1 July 2015 and on or after 1 July 2017)/s 37C (between 1 July 2015 and 30 June 2017)). It has been held that this phrase is not within ordinary usage and needs more explanation. Where penetration is in issue, the jury should have explained to them "in precise and simple terms, what would constitute penetration of the outer lips of the vagina, and to have summarised the evidence as it related to that issue" (R v A J S (2005) 12 VR 563. See also Randall v R (1991) 53 A Crim R 380; Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108; R v MG (2010) 29 VR 305).

36. The definition of vagina also includes a surgically constructed vagina (s 35 (before 1 July 2015 and on or after 1 July 2017)/s 37C (between 1 July 2015 and 30 June 2017)). The offence can therefore apply to the penetration of transsexual people.

"Consent"

All offences

37. "Consent" is defined in the Crimes Act 1958 to mean "free agreement" (s 36 (before 1 July 2015 and on or after 1 July 2017)/s 34C (between 1 July 2015 and 30 June 2017)).

38. This definition of consent is relevant both to whether the complainant "consented" to the penetration, and to the accused's state of mind regarding whether the complainant was consenting (the fault element).

39. The Crimes Act 1958 also provides a non-exhaustive list of situations in which a person is regarded as not having given consent. The listed situations in the earlier version (s 36, for offences committed before 1 July 2015) were similar, but slightly narrower than those currently listed (s 34C, for offences committed between 1 July 2015 and 30 June 2017/s 36, for offences committed on or after 1 July 2017).

40. The provisions defining consent have never been expressly drafted as "deeming provisions", but it is relatively clear that they must be treated this way. This interpretation is supported for trials commenced on or after 1 January 2008 by either s 37AAA(b) and (c) for offences committed before 1 July 2015 and by Jury Directions Act 2015 s 46(4)(b) for offences committed on or after 1 July 2015 (see also R v Getachew (2012) 248 CLR 22, [19]).

41. For a full discussion of this topic see 7.3.1.3 Consent and awareness of non-consent (Pre-1/7/15) and 7.3.1.2 Consent and reasonable belief in consent (From 1/07/15).

Fault element: the accused's awareness of, or belief in, consent

Offences committed on or after 1 July 2015

Warning! This element has not yet been considered by the Court of Appeal. The following material is provided as a guide only and must be used with caution.

42. The third element is that the accused "does not reasonably believe that [the complainant] consents to the penetration" (Crimes Act 1958 s 38(1)(c)).

43. This fault element will be satisfied by any one of the following mental states:

    i) The accused believed that the complainant was not consenting;

    ii) The accused did not believe the complainant was consenting. This includes circumstances where the accused gave no thought as to whether the complainant was consenting;

iii) The accused believed the complainant was consenting, but his/her belief was not reasonable in the circumstances.

44. This element introduces objectivity into the fault element for rape and rape related offences (Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences and Other Matters) Bill 2014 Explanatory Memo).

45. This element is explained in more detail in 7.3.1.2 Consent and reasonable belief in consent (From 1/07/15).

Offences committed between 1 January 2008 and 1 July 2015

46. For offences committed between 1 January 2008 and 1 July 2015, the fault element consists of proof that the accused had any one of the following three different mental states:

    i) An awareness that the complainant was not consenting (ss 38(2)(a)(i)), 38(4)(b)(i);

    ii) An awareness that the complainant might not be consenting (ss 38(2)(a)(i)), 38(4)(b)(i);

    iii) A failure to give any thought to whether or not the complainant was consenting (ss 38(2)(a)(ii), 38(4)(b)(ii)).

Awareness of the real possibility of non-consent

47. The word "might" in the phrase "might not be consenting" suggests a test based on the "possibility" of non-consent. It does not suggest that the accused must have been aware that it was "probable" that the complainant was not consenting. However, the possibility of non-consent must be real, not just theoretical (R v Ev Costa 2/4/1997 CA Vic).

Non-advertence

48. For offences committed after 1 January 2008 it is no defence for the accused to assert that he or she was not aware that the complainant might not have been consenting to the sexual act because the accused had not given any thought to whether or not the complainant was consenting (Crimes Act 1958 ss 38(2)(a)(ii), 38(4)(b)(ii)).

49. Prior to this amendment it was uncertain whether or not "non-advertence" provided a defence. On one view, non-advertence was a culpable state under the common law, and this continued for the statutory offence of rape – see DPP v Morgan [1976] AC 182 and R v Tolmie (1995) 37 NSWLR 660. However, the Crimes Amendment (Rape) Bill 2007 was enacted on the basis that this mental state was not previously culpable (see Attorney-General Rob Hulls, Second Reading Speech, Crimes Amendment (Rape) Bill 2007). The charge–book charges reflect this view. If non-advertence was a culpable mental state prior to the amendment, and it is an issue in a pre-amendment case, the charge will need to be modified.

Effect of intoxication on awareness

50. Intoxication can also be relevant to the issue of mistaken belief in consent. See 8.7 Common Law Intoxication for more information.

Jury directions on awareness of or belief in consent

51. Sections 37 and 37AA of the Crimes Act 1958 provide a framework of directions in respect of the accused's awareness of the complainant's state of consent. These directions are mandatory where relevant to the facts in issue in a proceeding (Crimes Act 1958 s 37(1)).

52. For a full discussion of this topic see 7.3.1.3 Consent and awareness of non-consent (Pre-1/7/15).

Compelled rape

Offences committed on or after 1 July 2017

53. "Rape by compelling sexual penetration" is a separate offence contained in s 39.

54. The elements of compelled rape are as follows (s 39(1)):

    (a) A person (A) intentionally causes another person (B) –

        (i) to sexually penetrate A; or

        (ii) to sexually penetrate themselves, or

        (iii) to sexually penetrate another person (C) or an animal, or

        (iv) to be sexually penetrated by C or by an animal; and

    (b) B does not consent to the sexual penetration; and

    (c) A does not reasonably believe that B consents to the sexual penetration.

55. In contrast to the offence as it stood before 1 July 2015 (see Offences committed between 1 July 2015 and 30 June 2017 below), the complainant for this offence is either the person who sexually penetrates another person or an animal, or, under s 39(1)(a)(iv), is sexually penetrated by another person or an animal.

Offences committed between 1 July 2015 and 30 June 2017

56. "Rape by compelling sexual penetration" is a separate offence contained in s 39.

57. The elements of compelled rape are as follows (s 39(1)):

    (1) An accused person commits compelled rape if s/he:

        (a) intentionally causes another person to sexually penetrate –

            (i) the accused; or

            (ii) themselves, or

            (iii) a third person, or

            (iv) an animal; and

        (b) the person doing the penetrating does not consent to doing the act of sexual penetration; and

        (c) the accused does not reasonably believe that that person consents to doing that act.

58. The elements of the offence are similar to those of rape, but rather than the accused intentionally sexually penetrating the complainant, the accused intentionally causes the complainant to sexually penetrate either the accused, him/herself, a third person or an animal (s 39(1)(a)).

59. The definition of sexual penetration includes the following:

    i) A person sexually penetrates themselves if they introduce a part of their own body or an object into their anus or vagina, or having so introduced such body part or object, continues to keep it there (s 37D(3)).

    ii) A person sexually penetrates an animal if they introduce a part of their own body or an object into the animal's anus or vagina, or their penis into the animal's mouth, or having so introduced such body part or object, continues to keep it there (s 37D(4)).

60. While the accused must intentionally cause the penetration, compulsion is not a separate element. Compulsion is shown through the elements of lack of consent by the person doing the penetration, and lack of a reasonable belief by the accused in that consent, as in the offence of rape (s 39(1)).

61. The accused will have committed the offence of compelled rape in relation to the person s/he causes to do the penetrating, not the person penetrated. Where the accused causes the complainant to penetrate a third person, the accused will have committed rape simpliciter of that third person, assuming the other elements are met (s 37D(2)).

62. For the purposes of compelled rape, it is the consent of the complainant, that is the person doing the sexual penetration, and the accused's belief in that person's consent, that is relevant.

Offences committed before 1 July 2015

63. The compelled rape offences, like rape, involve sexual penetration without consent. For offences committed before 1 July 2015, the physical roles of offender and victim are reversed, and the compelled rape offence adds the additional concept of "compulsion" (see Crimes Act 1958 s 38(3)).

64. Compulsion is defined in s 38(4) as follows:

> (4) For the purposes of subsection (3), a person compels another person (the victim) to engage in a sexual act if the person compels the victim (by force or otherwise) to engage in that act–
>
> (a) without the victim's consent; and
>
> (b) while–
>
> (i) being aware that the victim is not consenting or might not be consenting; or
>
> (ii) not giving any thought to whether the victim is not consenting or might not be consenting.

65. This definition is mirrored for the separate offence of compelling sexual penetration contrary to s 38A (Crimes Act 1958 s 38A(3)).

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.2.1A Charge: Rape (From 30/7/23)

Click here for a Word version of this document for adaptation

Warning! Judges should also consider whether to repeat any of the directions specified in 7.3.1.1.1 Statutory directions on consent and 7.3.1.1.2 Statutory direction on belief in consent.

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of rape. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant.

Two – the complainant did not consent to the sexual penetration.

Three– the accused did not reasonably believe that the complainant consented to the sexual penetration.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[487]

Intentional Sexual Penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant in the way alleged. [If in issue, add: The prosecution must also prove that the accused did this act consciously, voluntarily, and deliberately.[488]]

Act of sexual penetration

The law defines the term sexual penetration to include a number of different acts. In this case the prosecution must prove that NOA introduced [identify item or body part, e.g. "his penis"] to any extent into NOC's [vagina/anus/mouth].[489]

[If relevant add:

- NOA's [identify item or body part] does not need to have gone all the way into NOC's [vagina/anus/mouth]. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation.]

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that NOA introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of NOC's vagina.

In this case [insert relevant evidence or competing arguments about proof of sexual penetration].

The act was conscious, voluntary and deliberate

[If the evidence or arguments have placed intention or voluntariness in issue, add the shaded section.]

The prosecution must prove that the accused sexually penetrated the complainant consciously, voluntarily, and deliberately.

This requirement is in issue here because [describe the evidence or arguments that place voluntariness in issue].

You must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the

---

[487] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proved."

[488] Described in the instructions within this charge as the "voluntariness" requirement.

[489] If sexual penetration by failure to withdraw, or by causing another person or an animal to sexually penetrate the complainant, is in issue the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

time of the penetration"].

Lack of consent

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the sexual penetration happened without the complainant's consent.

Consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free and voluntary agreement. So the prosecution must prove that NOC did not freely and voluntarily agree to being sexually penetrated by NOA at the time.[490]

[Where a party requests a direction about the meaning of consent, add one or more of the following shaded paragraphs.]

The law says that a person can consent to an act only if they are capable of consenting, and free to choose whether or not to engage in or to allow the act.

The law says that where a person has given their consent to an act, they may withdraw that consent before the act happens or at any time while it is happening.

[Where a party requests a direction about the circumstances in which a person is taken not to have consented, add the following shaded section.]

In some circumstances the law says that the complainant did not freely agree, or consent, to sexual penetration. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person does not say or do anything to indicate consent to the act;
(b) the person submits to the act because of force, a fear of force, harm of any type or a fear of harm of any type, whether to that person or someone else or to an animal, regardless of-
  (i) when the force, harm or conduct giving rise to the fear occurs; and
  (ii) whether it is, or is a result of, a single incident or is part of an ongoing pattern;
(c) the person submits to the act because of coercion or intimidation-
  (i) regardless of when the coercion or intimidation occurs; and
  (ii) whether it is, or is a result of, a single incident or is part of an ongoing pattern;
(d) the person submits to the act because the person is unlawfully detained;
(e) the person submits to the act because the person is overborne by the abuse of a relationship of authority or trust;
(f) the person is asleep or unconscious;
(g) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of consenting to the act;
(h) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of withdrawing consent to the act;
(i) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;
(j) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act;
(k) the person is mistaken about the identity of any other person involved in the act;
(l) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes;
(m) the act occurs in the provision of commercial sexual services and the person engages in the act because of a false or misleading representation that the person will be paid;
(n) if the act involves an animal, the person mistakenly believes that the act is for veterinary or agricultural purposes or scientific research purposes;
(o) the person engages in the act on the basis that a condom is used and either-

[490] If this element is not in issue, it will generally be sufficient to state that conclusion at this point and elaborate no further.

(i) before or during the act, any other person involved in the act intentionally removes the condom or tampers with the condom; or
(ii) the person who was to use the condom intentionally does not use it;

(p) having given consent to the act, the person later withdraws consent to the act taking place or continuing.

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting.

However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

In this case, [insert evidence and competing arguments relevant to proof that the complainant was not consenting].

It is important that you remember that it is not for the accused to prove to you that the complainant consented. For this second element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not consent.

No reasonable belief in consent

The third element relates to the accused's state of mind about the complainant's consent. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of sexual penetration the accused did not reasonably believe that the complainant was consenting.[491]

This third element will be met in any of the following circumstances [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

- The accused believed that the complainant was not consenting.
- The accused gave no thought to whether the complainant was consenting.
- Even if the accused may have believed that the complainant was consenting, this belief was not reasonable in the circumstances.]

The prosecution only needs to prove one of these three states of mind. If the prosecution does not prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had any of these states of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must not find this element proven, and you must not find NOA guilty of this offence.

In this case, [evidence has been led/the defence argue] that at the time of the sexual penetration NOA reasonably believed that NOC was consenting to the sexual act. [Briefly summarise relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

[If a party requests a direction on the relevance of knowledge of a deemed non-consent circumstance under s 34C(2), add the shaded section.]

If you find that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 s 36AA circumstance(s)], you must consider whether the accused knew or believed that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 s 36AA circumstance(s)]. If you find that NOA knew or believed that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 s 36AA circumstance(s)], that is enough to show that NOA did not reasonably believe that NOA was consenting and you may find this element proved.

[491] If this element is not in issue, it will generally be sufficient to state that conclusion at this point and elaborate no further.

A belief will be reasonable if there are reasonable grounds for a person in the position of the accused to hold that belief. You must also consider all the circumstances when deciding whether a belief in consent was reasonable.

[Refer to competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments on reasonable belief in consent.]

A belief in consent is not reasonable unless the accused said or did something a reasonable time before the sexual act to find out whether the other person consented to that act.[492] In this case [identify any evidence and/or competing arguments about the steps taken by the accused].

[If a party requests a direction about the relevance of community expectations to whether a belief is reasonable, add the following shaded section.]

When you are considering whether a belief in consent is unreasonable, you must consider what the community would reasonably expect of the accused in the circumstances in forming a reasonable belief in consent. As members of the community, you have the best idea of what the community would reasonably expect of NOA in the circumstances in forming a reasonable belief in consent.

[If a party requests a direction about the accused's personal attributes, characteristics or circumstances, add the following shaded section.]

In deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the accused did not have a reasonable belief in consent you may take into account any personal attributes or characteristics of the accused, or the circumstances of the accused. In this case, this would include [identify relevant attributes, characteristics and circumstances].[493]

[If a party requests a direction on the relevance of self-induced intoxication, add the following shaded section.]

If you find that NOA was intoxicated at the relevant time, you must not take this into account when assessing whether he/she reasonably believed that NOC was consenting. The law requires you to consider whether his/her belief in NOC's consent would have been reasonable to a person who was not intoxicated at the relevant time.[494]

Medical or hygienic purposes

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

According to the law, the accused has not committed the offence of rape if the sexual penetration was done in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [name

---

[492] This direction must be modified if the accused seeks to invoke Crimes Act 1958 s 36A(3), to claim that they have a cognitive impairment or mental illness which was a substantial cause of not saying or doing anything to find out whether the complainant consented. Depending on whether the prosecution is contesting the issue, the judge may need to direct the jury about the basic rule that a person must say or do something to ascertain consent, the exception in the case of a mental illness or cognitive impairment, the onus on the accused to establish the exception, and the fact that the basic rule will apply if the accused fails to establish the exception on the balance of probabilities.

[493] When a party seeks this direction Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(4) specifies good reasons for not giving this direction. See 7.3.2 Rape (From 1/1/92) for guidance.

[494] This direction will need to be modified if the intoxication is not self–induced. See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(3)(b)(ii) and 8.5.2 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (Self–induced contested) for guidance.

of object or body part] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of rape the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA intentionally sexually penetrated NOC in the way alleged; and

Two – that NOC did not consent to the sexual penetration; and

Three – that at the time of the sexual penetration NOA did not reasonably believe that NOC was consenting.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of rape.

Last updated: 30 July 2023

7.3.2.1 Charge: Rape (1/7/15–29/7/23)

Click here for a Word version of this document for adaptation

Warning! This charge contains many optional directions which may be requested by a party. Judges must take care to ensure that requested directions are appropriate to the circumstances of the case. Judges should also consider whether to repeat any of the directions specified in 7.3.1.1.1 Statutory directions on consent and 7.3.1.1.2 Statutory direction on belief in consent.

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of rape. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant.

Two – the complainant did not consent to the sexual penetration.

Three– the accused did not reasonably believe that the complainant consented to the sexual penetration.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[495]

[495] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proved."

Intentional Sexual Penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant in the way alleged. [If in issue, add: The prosecution must also prove that the accused did this act consciously, voluntarily, and deliberately.[496]]

Act of sexual penetration

The law defines the term sexual penetration to include a number of different acts. In this case the prosecution must prove that NOA introduced [identify item or body part, e.g. "his penis"] to any extent into NOC's [vagina/anus/mouth].[497]

[If relevant add:

- NOA's [identify item or body part] does not need to have gone all the way into NOC's [vagina/anus/mouth]. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation.]

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that NOA introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of NOC's vagina.

In this case [insert relevant evidence or competing arguments about proof of sexual penetration].

The act was conscious, voluntary and deliberate

[If the evidence or arguments have placed intention or voluntariness in issue, add the shaded section.]

The prosecution must prove that the accused sexually penetrated the complainant consciously, voluntarily, and deliberately.

This requirement is in issue here because [describe the evidence or arguments that place voluntariness in issue].

You must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

---

[496] Described in the instructions within this charge as the "voluntariness" requirement.

[497] If sexual penetration by failure to withdraw, or by causing another person or an animal to sexually penetrate the complainant, is in issue the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

Lack of consent

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the sexual penetration happened without the complainant's consent.

Consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So the prosecution must prove that NOC did not freely agree to being sexually penetrated by NOA at the time.[498]

[Where a party requests a direction about the meaning of consent, add one or more of the following shaded paragraphs.]

The law says that a person can consent to an act only if they are capable of consenting, and free to choose whether or not to engage in or to allow the act.

The law says that where a person has given their consent to an act, they may withdraw that consent before the act happens or at any time while it is happening.

[Where a party requests a direction about the circumstances in which a person is taken not to have consented, add the following shaded section.]

In some circumstances the law says that the complainant did not freely agree, or consent, to sexual penetration. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

a) the person submits to the act because of force or the fear of force, whether to that person or someone else;

b) the person submits to the act because of the fear of harm of any type, whether to that person or someone else or an animal;

c) the person submits to the act because the person is unlawfully detained;

d) the person is asleep or unconscious;

e) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of consenting to the act;

f) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of withdrawing consent to the act;

g) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

h) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act;

i) the person is mistaken about the identity of any other person involved in the act;

j) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes;

k) if the act involves an animal, the person mistakenly believes that the act is for veterinary, agricultural or scientific research purposes;

l) the person does not say or do anything to indicate consent to the act;

m) having initially given consent to the act, the person later withdraws consent to the act taking place

---

[498] If this element is not in issue, it will generally be sufficient to state that conclusion at this point and elaborate no further.

or continuing]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting.

However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

In this case, [insert evidence and competing arguments relevant to proof that the complainant was not consenting].

It is important that you remember that it is not for the accused to prove to you that the complainant consented. For this second element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not consent.

No reasonable belief in consent

The third element relates to the accused's state of mind about the complainant's consent. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of sexual penetration the accused did not reasonably believe that the complainant was consenting.[499]

This third element will be met in any of the following circumstances [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

- The accused believed that the complainant was not consenting.
- The accused gave no thought to whether the complainant was consenting.
- Even if the accused may have believed that the complainant was consenting, this belief was not reasonable in the circumstances.]

The prosecution only needs to prove one of these three states of mind. If the prosecution does not prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had any of these states of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must not find this element proven, and you must not find NOA guilty of this offence.

In this case, [evidence has been led/the defence argue] that at the time of the sexual penetration NOA reasonably believed that NOC was consenting to the sexual act. [Briefly summarise relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments].

[If a party requests a direction on the relevance of knowledge of a deemed non-consent circumstance under s 34C(2) or s 36, add the shaded section.]

If you find that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 section 34C(2) or 36 circumstance(s)], you must consider whether the accused knew or believed that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 section 34C(2) or 36 circumstance(s)]. If you find that NOA knew or believed that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 section 34C(2) or 36 circumstance(s)], that is enough to show that NOA did not reasonably believe that NOA was consenting and you may find this element proved.

A belief will be reasonable if there are reasonable grounds for a person in the position of the accused to hold that belief. You must also consider all the circumstances when deciding whether a belief in consent was reasonable.

[Refer to competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments on reasonable belief in consent.]

---

[499] If this element is not in issue, it will generally be sufficient to state that conclusion at this point and elaborate no further.

In looking at the evidence, you should consider whether the accused took any steps to find out whether the complainant was consenting or might not be consenting and, if so, the nature of those steps. In this case [identify any evidence and/or competing arguments about the steps taken by the accused].

[If a party requests a direction about the relevance of community expectations to whether a belief is reasonable, add the following shaded section.]

When you are considering whether a belief in consent is unreasonable, you must consider what the community would reasonably expect of the accused in the circumstances in forming a reasonable belief in consent. As members of the community, you have the best idea of what the community would reasonably expect of NOA in the circumstances in forming a reasonable belief in consent.

[If a party requests a direction about the accused's personal attributes, characteristics or circumstances, add the following shaded section.]

In deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the accused did not have a reasonable belief in consent you may take into account any personal attributes or characteristics of the accused, or the circumstances of the accused. In this case, this would include [identify relevant attributes, characteristics and circumstances].[500]

[If a party requests a direction on the relevance of self-induced intoxication, add the following shaded section.]

If you find that NOA was intoxicated at the relevant time, you must not take this into account when assessing whether he/she reasonably believed that NOC was consenting. The law requires you to consider whether his/her belief in NOC's consent would have been reasonable to a person who was not intoxicated at the relevant time.[501]

Medical or hygienic purposes

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

According to the law, the accused has not committed the offence of rape if the sexual penetration was done in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object or body part] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of rape the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA intentionally sexually penetrated NOC in the way alleged; and

Two – that NOC did not consent to the sexual penetration; and

---

[500] When a party seeks this direction Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(4) specifies good reasons for not giving this direction. See 7.3.2 Rape (From 1/1/92) for guidance.

[501] This direction will need to be modified if the intoxication is not self–induced. See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(3)(b)(ii) and 8.5.2 Charge: Statutory Intoxication (Self–induced contested) for guidance.

Three – that at the time of the sexual penetration NOA did not reasonably believe that NOC was consenting.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of rape.

Last updated: 30 July 2023

7.3.2.2 Checklist: Rape (From 1/7/15)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This checklist can be used where rape is alleged to have been committed on or after 1 July 2015.

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant in the way alleged; and

2. The complainant did not consent to the sexual penetration; and

3. The accused did not reasonably believe that the complainant consented to the sexual penetration.

The Accused's Acts

1. Did the accused intentionally sexually penetrate the complainant in the way alleged?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Rape

Consent

2. Did the sexual penetration occur without the complainant's consent?

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Rape

The Accused's State of Mind

3. At the time of sexual penetration, did the accused reasonably believe that the complainant was consenting?

3.1 Did the accused believe that the complainant was not consenting?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Rape (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1 and 2)

If No, go to 3.2

3.2 Did the accused not hold a belief that the complainant was consenting?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Rape (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1 and 2)

If No, go to 3.3

3.3 Are you satisfied that even if the accused may have believed that the complainant was consenting, that this belief was not reasonable in the circumstances?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Rape (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1 and 2)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Rape

Last updated: 30 November 2015

7.3.2.3 Charge: Rape (1/1/08–30/6/15)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of rape.[502] To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused sexually penetrated the complainant in the way alleged.

Two – the accused did this intentionally.

Three – the complainant did not consent to the sexual penetration.

Four – the accused had one of the following three states of mind about the complainant's consent –

(a) The accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting, or

(b) The accused was aware that the complainant might not be consenting, or

(c) The accused was not giving any thought to whether the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[503]

Sexual Penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused sexually penetrated the complainant in the way alleged. [If in issue, add: The prosecution must also prove that the accused did this act consciously, voluntarily, and deliberately.[504]]

---

[502] This charge is based on the definition of rape in Crimes Act 1958 s 38(2)(a). If failure to withdraw is in issue (s 38(2)(b)), the charge will need to be modified accordingly. For a charge based on the definition of rape in Crimes Act 1958 s 38(3), see 7.3.2.7 Charge: Compelled Rape (1/1/08 – 30/6/15).

[503] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[504] Described in the instructions within this charge as the "voluntariness" requirement

Act of sexual penetration

The law defines the term sexual penetration to include a number of different acts. In this case the prosecution must prove that NOA introduced [identify item or body part, e.g. "his penis"] to any extent into NOC's [vagina/anus/mouth].

[If relevant add:

- NOA's [identify item or body part] does not need to have gone all the way into NOC's [vagina/anus/mouth]. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation.]

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that NOA introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of NOC's vagina.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

According to the law, the introduction of an object or body part other than the penis into the [vagina/anus] of a complainant does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

In this case [insert relevant evidence or competing arguments about proof of sexual penetration].

The act was conscious, voluntary and deliberate

[If the evidence or arguments have placed voluntariness in issue, add the shaded section.]

As I have directed you, the prosecution must prove that the accused sexually penetrated the complainant consciously, voluntarily, and deliberately.

This requirement is in issue here because [describe the evidence or arguments that place voluntariness in issue].

You must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the sexual penetration was intentional.[505]

[If intention is not in issue, add the shaded section.]

This element is not in issue here. [If appropriate, explain further, e.g.

● The accused admits that s/he intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant.

● If you are satisfied that the accused [consciously, voluntarily and deliberately] sexually penetrated the complainant, you should have no trouble finding that s/he did so intentionally.]

Consent

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant was not consenting at the time to the sexual penetration.

The law says that consent means free agreement. So the prosecution must prove that NOC did not freely agree to being sexually penetrated by NOA [at the time in question].

The law identifies a number of circumstances where the complainant is deemed not to freely agree, or consent, to sexual penetration. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because she or he is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep, unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of freely agreeing;

(e) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(f) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act or the identity of the person;

(g) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting. However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

[If there is evidence the complainant did not indicate agreement, add the following shaded section.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without

---

[505] Because rape is an offence of basic intent (the intent to commit the physical act of penetrating the complainant) proof of the intent will rarely be separated from proof of the act, and "intention" will rarely be an independent issue. Instead, mental state issues related to the act of penetration should generally be addressed by voluntariness directions. This will be the case if the issue is negation of intent by involuntariness, unconsciousness or accident. If different "intention" issues arise, this charge should be adapted.

that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to the sexual penetration at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to be sexually penetrated, you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done, or not said and done at the time of the alleged penetration, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about [his/her] state of mind at that time.

In this case, [insert evidence and competing arguments relevant to proof that the complainant was not consenting].

It is important that you remember that it is not for the accused to prove to you that the complainant consented. For this third element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not consent.

State of Mind of the Accused

The fourth element relates to the accused's state of mind about the complainant's consent. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of sexual penetration the accused:

- was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting; or
- was not giving any thought to whether the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these states of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find this element not proven, and you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.[506]

Belief in Consent

[If evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting, add one of the directions in 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent.]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of rape the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA sexually penetrated NOC in the way alleged; and

Two – that NOA intended to sexually penetrate NOC; and

Three – that NOC did not consent to the sexual penetration; and Four – that at the time of the sexual penetration NOA either:

- was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting; or

---

[506] If this element is not in issue, it will generally be sufficient to state that conclusion at this point and elaborate no further.

- was not giving any thought to whether the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of rape.

Last updated: 30 July 2023

7.3.2.4 Checklist: Rape (1/1/08–30/6/15)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This checklist can be used where the offence is alleged to have been committed between 1 January 2008 and 30 June 2015.

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused sexually penetrated the complainant in the way alleged; and

2. The accused intended to sexually penetrate the complainant; and

3. The complainant did not consent to the sexual penetration; and

4. The accused was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting or was not giving any thought to whether the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

The Accused's Acts

1. Did the accused sexually penetrate the complainant in the way alleged?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Rape

Intention

2. Did the accused intend to sexually penetrate the complainant?

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Rape

Consent

3. Did the sexual penetration occur without the complainant's consent?

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Rape

The Accused's State of Mind

4. At the time of sexual penetration:

4.1 Was the accused aware that the complainant was not consenting or that s/he might not be consenting?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Rape (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then go to 4.2

4.2 Was the accused giving any thought to whether or not the complainant was consenting?

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of Rape

If No then the accused is guilty of Rape (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3)

Last updated: 18 March 2008

7.3.2.5 Charge: Rape (Pre-1/1/08)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge can be used for trials of rape offences allegedly committed between 1/1/1992 and 30/12/2007.

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of rape.[507] To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused sexually penetrated the complainant in the way alleged.

Two – the accused did this intentionally.

Three – the complainant did not consent to the sexual penetration.

Four – the accused was aware either that the complainant was not consenting, or that the complainant might not be consenting.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[508]

[507] This charge is based on the definition of rape in Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 38(2)(a). If failure to withdraw is in issue (s 38(2)(b)), the charge will need to be modified accordingly. For a charge based on the definition of rape in Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) s 38(3), see 7.3.2.7 Charge: Compelled Rape (1/1/08 – 30/6/15).

[508] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

Sexual Penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused sexually penetrated the complainant in the way alleged. [If in issue, add: The prosecution must also prove that the accused did this act consciously, voluntarily, and deliberately.[509]]

Act of sexual penetration

The law defines the term sexual penetration to include a number of different acts. In this case the prosecution must prove that NOA introduced [identify item or body part, e.g. "his penis"] to any extent into NOC's [vagina/anus/mouth].

[If relevant add:

- NOA's [identify item or body part] does not need to have gone all the way into NOC's [vagina/anus/mouth]. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation.]

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that NOA introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of NOC's vagina.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

According to the law, the introduction of an object or body part other than the penis into the [vagina/anus] of a complainant does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

In this case [insert relevant evidence or competing arguments about proof of sexual penetration].

The act was conscious, voluntary and deliberate

[If the evidence or arguments have placed voluntariness in issue, add the shaded section.]

As I have directed you, the prosecution must prove that the accused sexually penetrated the complainant consciously, voluntarily, and deliberately.

This requirement is in issue here because [describe the evidence or arguments that place voluntariness in issue].

You must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

[509] Described in the instructions within this charge as the "voluntariness" requirement.

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the sexual penetration was intentional.[510]

[If intention is not in issue, add the shaded section.]

This element is not in issue here. [If appropriate, explain further, e.g.

- The accused admits that s/he intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant.
- If you are satisfied that the accused [consciously, voluntarily and deliberately] sexually penetrated the complainant, you should have no trouble finding that s/he did so intentionally.]

Consent

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant was not consenting at the time to the sexual penetration.

The law says that consent means free agreement. So the prosecution must prove that NOC did not freely agree to being sexually penetrated by NOA [at the time in question].

The law identifies a number of circumstances where the complainant is deemed not to freely agree, or consent, to sexual penetration. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because she or he is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep, unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of freely agreeing;

(e) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(f) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act or the identity of the person;

(g) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting. However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

[If there is evidence the complainant did not indicate agreement, add the following shaded section.]

---

[510] Because rape is an offence of basic intent (the intent to commit the physical act of penetrating the complainant) proof of the intent will rarely be separated from proof of the act, and "intention" will rarely be an independent issue. Instead, mental state issues related to the act of penetration should generally be addressed by voluntariness directions. This will be the case if the issue is negation of intent by involuntariness, unconsciousness or accident. If different "intention" issues arise, this charge should be adapted.

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to the sexual penetration at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to be sexually penetrated, you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done, or not said and done at the time of the alleged penetration, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about [his/her] state of mind at that time.

In this case, [insert evidence and competing arguments relevant to proof that the complainant was not consenting].

It is important that you remember that it is not for the accused to prove to you that the complainant consented. For this third element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not consent.

State of Mind of the Accused

The fourth element relates to the accused's state of mind about the complainant's consent. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of sexual penetration the accused was either:

- aware that the complainant was not consenting; or
- aware that the complainant might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these states of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find this element not proven, and you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.[511]

Belief in Consent

[If evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting, add one of the directions in 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent.]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of rape the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA sexually penetrated NOC in the way alleged; and

Two – that NOA intended to sexually penetrate NOC; and

Three – that NOC did not consent to the sexual penetration; and Four – that at the time of the sexual penetration NOA was either:

---

[511] If this element is not in issue, it will generally be sufficient to state that conclusion at this point and elaborate no further.

- aware that the complainant was not consenting; or
- aware that the complainant might not be consenting.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of rape.

Last updated: 30 July 2023

7.3.2.6 Checklist: Rape (Pre-1/1/08)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used where the offence is alleged to have been committed prior to 1 January 2008.

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused sexually penetrated the complainant in the way alleged; and
2. The accused intended to sexually penetrate the complainant; and
3. The complainant did not consent to the sexual penetration; and
4. The accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or was aware that the complainant might not be consenting.

The Accused's Acts

1. Did the accused sexually penetrate the complainant in the way alleged?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Rape

Intention

2. Did the accused intend to sexually penetrate the complainant?

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Rape

Consent

3. Did the sexual penetration occur without the complainant's consent?

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Rape

The Accused's State of Mind

4. At the time of sexual penetration, was the accused aware that the complainant was not consenting or that s/he might not be consenting?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Rape (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Rape

Last updated: 18 March 2008

7.3.2.7A Charge: Compelled Rape (30/7/23 onwards)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Note: This charge has been drafted for a case where the accused caused the complainant to sexually penetrate the accused. The charge must be modified if the accused causes the complainant to sexually penetrate themselves, a third party or an animal, or causes the complainant to be sexually penetrated by a third party or an animal.

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of compelled rape. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused intentionally caused the complainant to sexually penetrate the accused.

Two – the complainant did not consent to doing the act of sexual penetration.

Three – the accused did not reasonably believe that the complainant consented to doing the act of sexual penetration.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[512]

Intentional causing Sexual Penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused intentionally caused the complainant to sexually penetrate the accused in the way alleged. [If in issue, add: The prosecution must also prove that the accused did this act consciously, voluntarily, and deliberately.[513]]

Act of sexual penetration

The law defines the term sexual penetration to include a number of different acts. In this case the prosecution must prove that NOA caused NOC to [identify relevant form of sexual penetration].

[If relevant add:

- NOC's [identify item or body part] does not need to have gone all the way into NOA's [vagina/anus/mouth]. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation.]

---

[512] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[513] Described in the instructions within this charge as the "voluntariness" requirement

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that NOA caused NOC to introduce [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of NOA's vagina.

It is a question for you, using your common sense and judgment, whether NOA caused NOC to sexually penetrate the accused. There is no special legal test you use to decide whether the accused caused something to happen. Here, the prosecution say that NOA caused [identify relevant sexual act] by [identify relevant evidence and arguments]. The defence dispute this, and say [identify relevant evidence and arguments].

The act was conscious, voluntary and deliberate

[If the evidence or arguments have placed intention or voluntariness in issue, add the shaded section.]

The prosecution must prove that the accused caused NOC to sexually penetrate him/her/them consciously, voluntarily, and deliberately.

This requirement is in issue here because [describe the evidence or arguments that place voluntariness in issue].

You must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA caused NOC to introduce his finger into NOA's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time he/she/they caused the penetration"].

Lack of consent

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the sexual penetration happened without the complainant's consent.

Consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free and voluntary agreement. So the prosecution must prove that NOC did not freely and voluntarily agree to sexually penetrating NOA at the time.[514]

[Where a party requests a direction about the meaning of consent, add one or more of the following shaded paragraphs.]

The law says that a person can consent to an act only if they are capable of consenting, and free to choose whether or not to engage in or to allow the act.

The law says that where a person has given their consent to an act, they may withdraw that consent before the act happens or at any time while it is happening.

[Where a party requests a direction about the circumstances in which a person is taken not to have consented, add the following shaded section.]

In some circumstances the law says that the complainant did not freely agree, or consent, to sexual penetration. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

---

[514] If this element is not in issue, it will generally be sufficient to state that conclusion at this point and elaborate no further.

(a) the person does not say or do anything to indicate consent to the act;

(b) the person submits to the act because of force, a fear of force, harm of any type or a fear of harm of any type, whether to that person or someone else or to an animal, regardless of-

(i) when the force, harm or conduct giving rise to the fear occurs; and

(ii) whether it is, or is a result of, a single incident or is part of an ongoing pattern;

(c) the person submits to the act because of coercion or intimidation-

(i) regardless of when the coercion or intimidation occurs; and

(ii) whether it is, or is a result of, a single incident or is part of an ongoing pattern;

(d) the person submits to the act because the person is unlawfully detained;

(e) the person submits to the act because the person is overborne by the abuse of a relationship of authority or trust;

(f) the person is asleep or unconscious;

(g) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of consenting to the act;

(h) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of withdrawing consent to the act;

(i) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(j) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act;

(k) the person is mistaken about the identity of any other person involved in the act;

(l) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes;

(m) the act occurs in the provision of commercial sexual services and the person engages in the act because of a false or misleading representation that the person will be paid;

(n) if the act involves an animal, the person mistakenly believes that the act is for veterinary or agricultural purposes or scientific research purposes;

(o) the person engages in the act on the basis that a condom is used and either-

(i) before or during the act, any other person involved in the act intentionally removes the condom or tampers with the condom; or

(ii) the person who was to use the condom intentionally does not use it;

(p) having given consent to the act, the person later withdraws consent to the act taking place or continuing.

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting.

However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

In this case, [insert evidence and competing arguments relevant to proof that the complainant was not consenting].

It is important that you remember that it is not for the accused to prove to you that the complainant consented. For this second element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not consent.

No reasonable belief in consent

The third element relates to the accused's state of mind about the complainant's consent. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of sexual penetration the accused did not reasonably believe that the complainant was consenting.[515]

This third element will be met in any of the following circumstances [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

- The accused believed that the complainant was not consenting.
- The accused gave no thought to whether the complainant was consenting.
- Even if the accused may have believed that the complainant was consenting, this belief was not reasonable in the circumstances.]

The prosecution only needs to prove one of these three states of mind. If the prosecution does not prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had any of these states of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must not find this element proven, and you must not find NOA guilty of this offence.

In this case, [evidence has been led/the defence argue] that at the time of the sexual penetration NOA reasonably believed that NOC was consenting to the sexual act. [Briefly summarise relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

[If a party requests a direction on the relevance of knowledge of a deemed non-consent circumstance under s 36AA, add the shaded section.]

If you find that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 section 36AA circumstance(s)], you must consider whether the accused knew or believed that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 section 36AA circumstance(s)]. If you find that NOA knew or believed that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 section 36AA circumstance(s)], that is enough to show that NOA did not reasonably believe that NOA was consenting and you may find this element proved.

A belief will be reasonable if there are reasonable grounds for a person in the position of the accused to hold that belief. You must also consider all the circumstances when deciding whether a belief in consent was reasonable.

[Refer to competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments on reasonable belief in consent.]

---

[515] If this element is not in issue, it will generally be sufficient to state that conclusion at this point and elaborate no further.

A belief in consent is not reasonable unless the accused said or did something a reasonable time before the sexual act to find out whether the other person consented to that act.[516] In this case [identify any evidence and/or competing arguments about the steps taken by the accused].

[If a party requests a direction about the relevance of community expectations to whether a belief is reasonable, add the following shaded section.]

When you are considering whether a belief in consent is unreasonable, you must consider what the community would reasonably expect of the accused in the circumstances in forming a reasonable belief in consent. As members of the community, you have the best idea of what the community would reasonably expect of NOA in the circumstances in forming a reasonable belief in consent.

[If a party requests a direction about the accused's personal attributes, characteristics or circumstances, add the following shaded section.]

In deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the accused did not have a reasonable belief in consent you may take into account any personal attributes or characteristics of the accused, or the circumstances of the accused. In this case, this would include [identify relevant attributes, characteristics and circumstances].[517]

[If a party requests a direction on the relevance of self-induced intoxication, add the following shaded section.]

If you find that NOA was intoxicated at the relevant time, you must not take this into account when assessing whether he/she reasonably believed that NOC was consenting.

The law requires you to consider whether his/her belief in NOC's consent would have been reasonable to a person who was not intoxicated at the relevant time.[518]

Medical or hygienic purposes

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

According to the law, the accused has not committed the offence of compelled rape if he/she/they caused the sexual penetration in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object or body part] by NOC into NOA's [anus/vagina], was not done in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

---

[516] This direction must be modified if the accused seeks to invoke Crimes Act 1958 s 36A(3), to claim that they have a cognitive impairment or mental illness which was a substantial cause of not saying or doing anything to find out whether the complainant consented. Depending on whether the prosecution is contesting the issue, the judge may need to direct the jury about the basic rule that a person must say or do something to ascertain consent, the exception in the case of a mental illness or cognitive impairment, the onus on the accused to establish the exception, and the fact that the basic rule will apply if the accused fails to establish the exception on the balance of probabilities.

[517] When a party seeks this direction Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(4) specifies good reasons for not giving this direction. See Rape for guidance.

[518] This direction will need to be modified if the intoxication is not self–induced. See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(3)(b)(ii) and Charge: Statutory Intoxication (Self–induced) for guidance.

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of rape the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA intentionally caused NOC to sexually penetrate him/her/them; and

Two – that NOC did not consent to that sexual penetration; and

Three – that at the time of the sexual penetration NOA did not reasonably believe that NOC was consenting.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of compelled rape.

Last updated: 13 October 2023

7.3.2.7B Charge: Compelled Rape (1/7/15 – 29/7/23)

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Note: This charge has been drafted for a case where the accused caused the complainant to sexually penetrate the accused. The charge must be modified if the accused causes the complainant to sexually penetrate themselves, a third party or an animal, or causes the complainant to be sexually penetrated by a third party or an animal.

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of compelled rape. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused intentionally caused the complainant to sexually penetrate the accused.

Two – the complainant did not consent to doing the act of sexual penetration.

Three– the accused did not reasonably believe that the complainant consented to doing the act of sexual penetration.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[519]

[519] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

Intentional causing Sexual Penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused intentionally caused the complainant to sexually penetrate the accused in the way alleged. [If in issue, add: The prosecution must also prove that the accused did this act consciously, voluntarily, and deliberately.[520]]

Act of sexual penetration

The law defines the term sexual penetration to include a number of different acts. In this case the prosecution must prove that NOA caused NOC to [identify relevant form of sexual penetration].

[If relevant add:

- NOC's [identify item or body part] does not need to have gone all the way into NOA's [vagina/anus/mouth]. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation.]

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that NOA caused NOC to introduce [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of NOA's vagina.

It is a question for you, using your common sense and judgment, whether NOA caused NOC to sexually penetrate the accused. There is no special legal test you use to decide whether the accused caused something to happen. Here, the prosecution say that NOA caused [identify relevant sexual act] by [identify relevant evidence and arguments]. The defence dispute this, and say [identify relevant evidence and arguments].

The act was conscious, voluntary and deliberate

[If the evidence or arguments have placed intention or voluntariness in issue, add the shaded section.]

The prosecution must prove that the accused caused NOC to sexually penetrate him/her/them consciously, voluntarily, and deliberately.

This requirement is in issue here because [describe the evidence or arguments that place voluntariness in issue].

You must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA caused NOC to introduce his finger into NOA's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time he/she/they caused the penetration"].

Lack of consent

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the sexual penetration happened without the complainant's consent.

---

[520] Described in the instructions within this charge as the "voluntariness" requirement.

Consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So the prosecution must prove that NOC did not freely agree to sexually penetrating NOA at the time.[521]

[Where a party requests a direction about the meaning of consent, add one or more of the following shaded paragraphs.]

The law says that a person can consent to an act only if they are capable of consenting, and free to choose whether or not to engage in or to allow the act.

The law says that where a person has given their consent to an act, they may withdraw that consent before the act happens or at any time while it is happening.

[Where a party requests a direction about the circumstances in which a person is taken not to have consented, add the following shaded section.]

In some circumstances the law says that the complainant did not freely agree, or consent, to sexual penetration. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

a) the person submits to the act because of force or the fear of force, whether to that person or someone else;

b) the person submits to the act because of the fear of harm of any type, whether to that person or someone else or an animal;

c) the person submits to the act because the person is unlawfully detained;

d) the person is asleep or unconscious;

e) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of consenting to the act;

f) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of withdrawing consent to the act;

g) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

h) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act;

i) the person is mistaken about the identity of any other person involved in the act;

j) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes;

k) if the act involves an animal, the person mistakenly believes that the act is for veterinary, agricultural or scientific research purposes;

l) the person does not say or do anything to indicate consent to the act;

m) having initially given consent to the act, the person later withdraws consent to the act taking place or continuing]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to

---

[521] If this element is not in issue, it will generally be sufficient to state that conclusion at this point and elaborate no further.

NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting.

However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

In this case, [insert evidence and competing arguments relevant to proof that the complainant was not consenting].

It is important that you remember that it is not for the accused to prove to you that the complainant consented. For this second element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not consent.

No reasonable belief in consent

The third element relates to the accused's state of mind about the complainant's consent. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of sexual penetration the accused did not reasonably believe that the complainant was consenting.[522]

This third element will be met in any of the following circumstances [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

- The accused believed that the complainant was not consenting.
- The accused gave no thought to whether the complainant was consenting.
- Even if the accused may have believed that the complainant was consenting, this belief was not reasonable in the circumstances.]

The prosecution only needs to prove one of these three states of mind. If the prosecution does not prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had any of these states of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must not find this element proven, and you must not find NOA guilty of this offence.

In this case, [evidence has been led/the defence argue] that at the time of the sexual penetration NOA reasonably believed that NOC was consenting to the sexual act. [Briefly summarise relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

[If a party requests a direction on the relevance of knowledge of a deemed non-consent circumstance under s 34C(2) or s 36, add the shaded section.]

If you find that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 section 34C(2) or 36 circumstance(s)], you must consider whether the accused knew or believed that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 section 34C(2) or 36 circumstance(s)]. If you find that NOA knew or believed that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 section 34C(2) or 36 circumstance(s)], that is enough to show that NOA did not reasonably believe that NOA was consenting and you may find this element proved.

A belief will be reasonable if there are reasonable grounds for a person in the position of the accused to hold that belief. You must also consider all the circumstances when deciding whether a belief in consent was reasonable.

[Refer to competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments on reasonable belief in consent.]

In looking at the evidence, you should consider whether the accused took any steps to find out whether the complainant was consenting or might not be consenting and, if so, the nature of those steps. In this case [identify any evidence and/or competing arguments about the steps taken by the accused].

---

[522] If this element is not in issue, it will generally be sufficient to state that conclusion at this point and elaborate no further.

[If a party requests a direction about the relevance of community expectations to whether a belief is reasonable, add the following shaded section.]

When you are considering whether a belief in consent is unreasonable, you must consider what the community would reasonably expect of the accused in the circumstances in forming a reasonable belief in consent. As members of the community, you have the best idea of what the community would reasonably expect of NOA in the circumstances in forming a reasonable belief in consent.

[If a party requests a direction about the accused's personal attributes, characteristics or circumstances, add the following shaded section.]

In deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the accused did not have a reasonable belief in consent you may take into account any personal attributes or characteristics of the accused, or the circumstances of the accused. In this case, this would include [identify relevant attributes, characteristics and circumstances].[523]

[If a party requests a direction on the relevance of self-induced intoxication, add the following shaded section.]

If you find that NOA was intoxicated at the relevant time, you must not take this into account when assessing whether he/she reasonably believed that NOC was consenting.

The law requires you to consider whether his/her belief in NOC's consent would have been reasonable to a person who was not intoxicated at the relevant time.[524]

Medical or hygienic purposes

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

According to the law, the accused has not committed the offence of compelled rape if he/she/they caused the sexual penetration in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object or body part] by NOC into NOA's [anus/vagina], was not done in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of rape the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA intentionally caused NOC to sexually penetrate him/her/them; and

Two – that NOC did not consent to that sexual penetration; and

---

[523] When a party seeks this direction Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(4) specifies good reasons for not giving this direction. See Rape for guidance.

[524] This direction will need to be modified if the intoxication is not self–induced. See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(3)(b)(ii) and Charge: Statutory Intoxication (Self–induced) for guidance.

Three – that at the time of the sexual penetration NOA did not reasonably believe that NOC was consenting.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of compelled rape.

Last updated: 13 October 2023

7.3.2.7 Charge: Compelled Rape (1/1/08–30/6/15)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for trials of compelled rape offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1/1/08.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of rape. The law says that rape can be committed in a number of different ways. In this case rape means forcing a person to have sex with the [accused/another person]. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following five elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the complainant sexually penetrated the [accused/another person].

Two – the accused compelled the complainant to sexually penetrate [him/her/the other person].

Three – the accused intended to compel the complainant to sexually penetrate [him/her/the other person].

Four – the complainant did not consent to the sexual penetration.

Five – at the time of the sexual penetration the accused either:

- was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting; or
- was not giving any thought to whether the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Sexual Penetration

The first element relates to what the complainant did. S/he must have sexually penetrated the [accused/another person].

Sexual penetration can include a number of different acts. In this case, sexual penetration means the introduction of NOC's [penis/body part/name of object] into the [vagina/anus/mouth] of [NOA/name of other person].[525]

[If a surgically constructed vagina is involved, add the following shaded section.]

The word vagina includes a surgically constructed vagina.

NOC's [penis/body part/name of object] does not need to have gone all the way into [NOA's/the other person's vagina/anus/mouth]. Even slight penetration is enough. However, there must have been penetration to some extent.

[In the case of penetration of a vagina, add the following shaded section.]

[525] Rape does not include the penetration of the mouth by a body part or object, other than the penis.

This includes penetration of the external genitalia – that is the external lips of the vagina.

[Where emission of semen is a potential issue, add the following shaded section.]

The law also says that there does not need to have been any emission of semen for sexual penetration to have occurred.

Compulsion

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant was compelled by the accused to sexually penetrate the [other person/accused].

The law says that the word "compel" means making someone do something by force or otherwise. In this case, NOA must have made NOC sexually penetrate [him/her/name of other person].

The prosecution alleged that NOA compelled NOC to sexually penetrate [him/her/name of other person] by [insert relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence].

For this second element of rape to be met, you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was compelled by NOA to sexually penetrate [him/her/name of other person].

Intention

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intended to compel the complainant to sexually penetrate [him/her/the other person]. That is, you must be satisfied that the accused's compulsion of the complainant was deliberate and not accidental. NOA must have intended to make NOC sexually penetrate [him/her/name of other person].

Consent

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant did not consent to sexually penetrate the [other person/accused]. Whether or not the [other person/accused] consented to being sexually penetrated is not relevant here. The relevant consent is the consent of the complainant, NOC.

Consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So NOC will not have consented to the sexual penetration if [he/she] did not freely agree to perform such an act.

The law identifies a number of circumstances where the complainant is deemed not to freely agree, or consent, to sexual penetration. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because she or he is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep, unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of freely agreeing;

(e) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(f) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act or the identity of the person;

(g) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting. However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

[If there is evidence the complainant did not indicate agreement, add the shaded section if relevant.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to the sexual penetration at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to sexually penetrate the [other person/accused], you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done at the time of the alleged penetration, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about his/her state of mind at that time. You can also consider what s/he did not say or do at the time of the alleged penetration.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC did not consent. [Refer to evidence supporting the prosecution case.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence].

It is important that you remember that it is not for the accused to prove to you that the complainant consented. For this fourth element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not consent.

State of Mind of the Accused

The fifth element relates to the accused's state of mind about the complainant's consent. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of sexual penetration the accused:

- was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting; or
- was not giving any thought to whether the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these states of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find this element not proven, and you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.[526]

Belief in Consent

[If evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting, add one of the directions in 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent.]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

[526] If the accused's state of mind is not in issue, this section of the charge will need to be modified.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of rape in the way alleged, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOC sexually penetrated [name of other person/NOA]; and

Two – that NOC was compelled by NOA to sexually penetrate [name of other person/NOA]; and

Three – that NOA intended to compel NOC to sexually penetrate [name of other person/him/her]; and

Four – that NOC did not consent to sexually penetrating [name of other person/NOA]; and Five – that at the time of the sexual penetration NOA either:

- was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting; or
- was not giving any thought to whether the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of rape.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

7.3.2.8 Checklist: Rape Compulsion to Penetrate the Accused (1/1/08–30/6/15)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This checklist can be used where the offence is alleged to have been committed between 1 January 2008 and 30 June 2015, regardless of the date the trial commenced.

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The complainant sexually penetrated the accused; and
2. The accused compelled the complainant to sexually penetrate him/her; and
3. The accused intended to compel the complainant to sexually penetrate him/her; and
4. The complainant did not consent to the sexual penetration; and
5. The accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting or was not giving any thought to whether the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

Sexual Penetration

1. Did the complainant sexually penetrate the accused?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of rape

Compulsion

2. Did the accused compel the complainant to sexually penetrate him/her?

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of rape

Intention

3. Did the accused intend to compel the complainant to sexually penetrate him/her?

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of rape

Consent

4. Did the sexual penetration occur without the complainant's consent?

If Yes to go 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of rape

The Accused's State of Mind

5. At the time of sexual penetration:

5.1 Was the accused aware that the complainant was not consenting or that s/he might not be consenting?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Rape (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If No, then go to 5.2

5.2 Was the accused giving any thought to whether or not the complainant was consenting?

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of rape

If No then the accused is guilty of Rape (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

Last updated: 22 June 2016

7.3.2.9 Checklist: Rape Compulsion to Penetrate Another Person (1/1/08–30/6/15)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used where the offence is alleged to have been committed between 1 January 2008 and 30 June 2015, regardless of the date the trial commenced.

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The complainant sexually penetrated a person; and
2. The accused compelled the complainant to sexually penetrate that person; and
3. The accused intended to compel the complainant to sexually penetrate that person; and
4. The complainant did not consent to the sexual penetration; and

5. The accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting or was not giving any thought to whether the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

Sexual Penetration

1. Did the complainant sexually penetrate a person?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of rape

Compulsion

2. Did the accused compel the complainant to sexually penetrate that person?

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of rape

Intention

3. Did the accused intend to compel the complainant to sexually penetrate that person?

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of rape

Consent

4. Did the sexual penetration occur without the complainant's consent?

If Yes to go 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of rape

The Accused's State of Mind

5. At the time of sexual penetration:

5.1 Was the accused aware that the complainant was not consenting or that s/he might not be consenting?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Rape (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If No, then go to 5.2

5.2 Was the accused giving any thought to whether or not the complainant was consenting?

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of Rape

If No then the accused is guilty of Rape (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

Last updated: 22 June 2016

7.3.2.10 Charge: Compelled Rape (1/12/06–31/12/07)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for trials commenced on or after 1/1/08 involving compelled rape offences alleged to have been committed between 1/12/06 and 31/12/07.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of rape. The law says that rape can be committed in a number of different ways. In this case rape means forcing a person to have sex with the [accused/another person]. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following five elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the complainant sexually penetrated the [accused/another person].

Two – the accused compelled the complainant to sexually penetrate [him/her/the other person].

Three – the accused intended to compel the complainant to sexually penetrate [him/her/the other person].

Four – the complainant did not consent to the sexual penetration.

Five – at the time of the sexual penetration the accused was either:

- aware that the complainant was not consenting; or
- aware that the complainant might not be consenting.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Sexual Penetration

The first element relates to what the complainant did. S/he must have sexually penetrated the [accused/another person].

Sexual penetration can include a number of different acts. In this case, sexual penetration means the introduction of NOC's [penis/body part/name of object] into the [vagina/anus/mouth] of [NOA/name of other person].[527]

[If a surgically constructed vagina is involved, add the following shaded section.]

The word vagina includes a surgically constructed vagina.

NOC's [penis/body part/name of object] does not need to have gone all the way into [NOA's/the other person's vagina/anus/mouth]. Even slight penetration is enough. However, there must have been penetration to some extent.

[In the case of penetration of a vagina, add the following shaded section.]

[527] Rape does not include the penetration of the mouth by a body part or object, other than the penis.

This includes penetration of the external genitalia – that is the external lips of the vagina.

[Where emission of semen is a potential issue, add the following shaded section.]

The law also says that there does not need to have been any emission of semen for sexual penetration to have occurred.

Compulsion

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant was compelled by the accused to sexually penetrate the [other person/accused].

The law says that the word "compel" means making someone do something by force or otherwise. In this case, NOA must have made NOC sexually penetrate [him/her/name of other person].

The prosecution alleged that NOA compelled NOC to sexually penetrate [him/her/name of other person] by [insert relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence].

For this second element of rape to be met, you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was compelled by NOA to sexually penetrate [him/her/name of other person].

Intention

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intended to compel the complainant to sexually penetrate [him/her/the other person]. That is, you must be satisfied that the accused's compulsion of the complainant was deliberate and not accidental. NOA must have intended to make NOC sexually penetrate [him/her/name of other person].

Consent

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant did not consent to sexually penetrate the [other person/accused]. Whether or not the [other person/accused] consented to being sexually penetrated is not relevant here. The relevant consent is the consent of the complainant, NOC.

Consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So NOC will not have consented to the sexual penetration if [he/she] did not freely agree to perform such an act.

The law identifies a number of circumstances where the complainant is deemed not to freely agree, or consent, to sexual penetration. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because she or he is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep, unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of freely agreeing;

(e) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(f) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act or the identity of the person;

(g) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting. However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

[If there is evidence the complainant did not indicate agreement, add the shaded section if relevant.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to the sexual penetration at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to sexually penetrate the [other person/accused], you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done at the time of the alleged penetration, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about his/her state of mind at that time. You can also consider what s/he did not say or do at the time of the alleged penetration.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC did not consent. [Refer to evidence supporting the prosecution case.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence].

It is important that you remember that it is not for the accused to prove to you that the complainant consented. For this fourth element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not consent.

State of Mind of the Accused

The fifth element relates to the accused's state of mind about the complainant's consent. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of sexual penetration the accused was either:

- aware that the complainant was not consenting; or
- aware that the complainant might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these states of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find this element not proven, and you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.[528]

Belief in Consent

[If evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting, add one of the directions in 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent.]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

[528] If the accused's state of mind is not in issue, this section of the charge will need to be modified.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of rape in the way alleged, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOC sexually penetrated [name of other person/NOA]; and

Two – that NOC was compelled by NOA to sexually penetrate [name of other person/NOA]; and

Three – that NOA intended to compel NOC to sexually penetrate [name of other person/him/her]; and

Four – that NOC did not consent to sexually penetrating [name of other person/NOA]; and

Five – that at the time of the sexual penetration NOA was either:

- aware that NOC was not consenting; or
- aware that NOC might not be consenting.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of rape.

Last updated: 30 July 2023

7.3.2.11 Charge: Compelled Rape (Pre-1/12/06)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for trials commenced on or after 1/1/08 involving compelled rape offences alleged to have been committed between 22/11/2000 and 30/11/2006.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of rape. The law says that rape can be committed in a number of different ways. In this case rape means forcing a male person to have sex with the [accused/another person]. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the complainant sexually penetrated the [accused/another person] with his penis.

Two – the accused compelled the complainant to sexually penetrate [him/her/the other person].

Three – the accused intended to compel the complainant to sexually penetrate [him/her/the other person].

Four – the complainant did not consent to the sexual penetration.

Five – at the time of the sexual penetration the accused was either:

- aware that the complainant was not consenting; or
- aware that the complainant might not be consenting.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Sexual Penetration

The first element relates to what the complainant did. He must have sexually penetrated the [accused/another person] with his penis.

In this case sexual penetration means the insertion of NOC's penis into the [anus/vagina/mouth] of [NOA/name of other person].

[If a surgically constructed vagina is involved, add the following shaded section.]

The word vagina includes a surgically constructed vagina.

NOC's penis does not need to have gone all the way into [NOA's/the other person's vagina/anus/mouth]. Even slight penetration is enough. However, there must have been penetration to some extent.

[In the case of penetration of a vagina, add the following shaded section.]

This includes penetration of the external genitalia – that is the external lips of the vagina.

The law also says that there does not need to have been any emission of semen for sexual penetration to have occurred.

Compulsion

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant was compelled by the accused to sexually penetrate the [other person/accused].

The law says that the word "compel" means making someone do something by force or otherwise. In this case, NOA must have made NOC sexually penetrate [him/her/name of other person].

The prosecution alleged that NOA compelled NOC to sexually penetrate [him/her/name of other person] by [insert relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence].

For this second element of rape to be met, you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was compelled by NOA to sexually penetrate [him/her/name of other person].

Intention

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intended to compel the complainant to sexually penetrate [him/her/the other person]. That is, you must be satisfied that the accused's compulsion of the complainant was deliberate and not accidental. NOA must have intended to make NOC sexually penetrate [him/her/name of other person].

Consent

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant did not consent to sexually penetrate the [other person/accused]. Whether or not the [other person/accused] consented to being sexually penetrated is not relevant here. The relevant consent is the consent of the complainant, NOC.

Consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So NOC will not have consented to the sexual penetration if s/he did not freely agree to perform such an act.

The law identifies a number of circumstances where the complainant is deemed not to freely agree, or consent, to sexual penetration. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because he is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep, unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of freely agreeing;

(e) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(f) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act or the identity of the person;

(g) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that he was not consenting. However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

[If there is evidence the complainant did not indicate agreement, add the shaded section if relevant.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to the sexual penetration at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that he did not consent to that act.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to sexually penetrate the [other person/accused], you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what he is alleged to have said and done at the time of the alleged penetration, as well as the evidence he gave in court about his state of mind at that time. You can also consider what he did not say or do at the time of the alleged penetration.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC did not consent. [Refer to evidence supporting the prosecution case.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence].

It is important that you remember that it is not for the accused to prove to you that the complainant consented. For this fourth element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not consent.

State of Mind of the Accused

The fifth element relates to the accused's state of mind about the complainant's consent. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of sexual penetration the accused was either:

- aware that the complainant was not consenting; or
- aware that the complainant might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these states of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find this element not proven, and you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.[529]

Belief in Consent

[If evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting, add one of the directions in 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent.]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

---

[529] If this element is not in issue, it will generally be sufficient to state that conclusion at this point and elaborate no further.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of rape in the way alleged, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOC sexually penetrated [name of other person/NOA]; and

Two – that NOC was compelled by NOA to sexually penetrate [name of other person/NOA]; and

Three – that NOA intended to compel NOC to sexually penetrate [name of other person/him/her]; and

Four – that NOC did not consent to sexually penetrating [name of other person/NOA]; and

Five – that at the time of the sexual penetration NOA was either:

- aware that NOC was not consenting; or
- aware that NOC might not be consenting.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of rape.

Last updated: 30 July 2023

7.3.2.12 Checklist: Rape Compulsion to Penetrate the Accused (Pre-1/1/08)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Rape: Compulsion to Penetrate the Accused

This checklist can be used where the offence is alleged to have been committed before 1 January 2008, regardless of the date the trial commenced.

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The complainant sexually penetrated the accused; and
2. The accused compelled the complainant to sexually penetrate him/her; and
3. The accused intended to compel the complainant to sexually penetrate him/her; and
4. The complainant did not consent to the sexual penetration; and
5. The accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting or was not giving any thought to whether the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

Sexual Penetration

1. Did the complainant sexually penetrate the accused?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of rape

Compulsion

2. Did the accused compel the complainant to sexually penetrate him/her?

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of rape

Intention

3. Did the accused intend to compel the complainant to sexually penetrate him/her?

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of rape

Consent

4. Did the sexual penetration occur without the complainant's consent?

If Yes to go 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of rape

The Accused's State of Mind

5. At the time of sexual penetration:

5.1 Was the accused aware that the complainant was not consenting or that s/he might not be consenting?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Rape (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If No, then go to 5.2

5.2 Was the accused giving any thought to whether or not the complainant was consenting?

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of rape

If No then the accused is guilty of Rape (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

Last updated: 18 March 2007

7.3.2.13 Checklist: Rape Compulsion to Penetrate Another Person (Pre-1/1/08)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used where the offence is alleged to have been committed before 1 January 2008, regardless of the date the trial commenced.

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The complainant sexually penetrated a person; and

2. The accused compelled the complainant to sexually penetrate that person; and

3. The accused intended to compel the complainant to sexually penetrate that person; and

4. The complainant did not consent to the sexual penetration; and

5. The accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting.

Sexual Penetration

1. Did the complainant sexually penetrate a person?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of rape

Compulsion

2. Did the accused compel the complainant to sexually penetrate that person?

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of rape

Intention

3. Did the accused intend to compel the complainant to sexually penetrate that person?

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of rape

Consent

4. Did the sexual penetration occur without the complainant's consent?

If Yes to go 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of rape

The Accused's State of Mind

5. At the time of sexual penetration:

5.1 Was the accused aware that the complainant was not consenting or that s/he might not be consenting?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Rape (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If No, then go to 5.2

5.2 Was the accused giving any thought to whether or not the complainant was consenting?

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of rape

If No then the accused is guilty of Rape (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

7.3.3 Rape and Aggravated Rape (Pre-1/1/92)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. The offence of rape has changed significantly over time:
    - Prior to 1 March 1981, rape was governed by the common law;
    - In 1981 the definition of rape was expanded by legislation. The new definition applied to acts committed between 1 March 1981 and 4 August 1991;
    - In 1991 the definition of rape was modified again. The revised definition applied to acts committed between 5 August 1991 and 31 December 1991;
    - From 1 January 1992, rape became a statutory offence.
2. The offence of rape with aggravating circumstances existed between 1 March 1981 and 31 December 1991.
3. This topic examines the directions a judge must give when:
    - A person is charged with rape or aggravated rape on or after 1 January 2010; and
    - The offence is alleged to have been committed before 1 January 1992.
4. Use 7.3.2 Rape (From 1/1/92) for offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1 January 1992.

Elements of Rape

5. Prior to 1992, a person committed rape if he or she:

    i) Sexually penetrated another person;

    ii) Intentionally;

    iii) Without that person's consent;

    iv) While being aware that the person was not consenting or might not be consenting.

6. Judges should take care not to run these elements together when directing the jury. In particular, judges should not instruct the jury that the fourth element relates to "the guilty mind of the accused", or that the prosecution must prove that the accused "intended to commit the crime of rape in the sense that, at the time of sexual penetration, he [or she] realized that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting" (R v Soldo [2005] VSCA 136; R v Zilm (2006) 14 VR 11; [2006] VSCA 72 (Callaway JA)).

"Sexual Penetration"

7. The meaning of "sexual penetration" for the purpose of this offence has been significantly modified over time.

Offences Committed Before 1 March 1981

8. The common law definition of "sexual penetration" applies to offences committed before 1 March 1981.

9. At common law, "sexual penetration" only consisted of penetration of a vagina by a penis. Other forms of sexual penetration were considered to be incidents of indecent assault, rather than rape (see R v Daly [1968] VR 257; R v Hornbuckle [1945] VLR 281).

10. This element was met when there was any penetration of the complainant's labia by the penis (R v Lines (1844) 1 Car & K 393; Randall v R (1991) 55 SASR 447).

11. From 5 August 1991, the Crimes Act 1958 defined vagina to include a surgically constructed vagina. It is unclear whether the common law recognised penetration of an artificially constructed sexual organ as sexual penetration (see R v Cogley [1989] VR 799; R v Harris & McGuiness (1988) 17 NSWLR 158).

12. This element was met by penetration "to any extent". Consequently:

    - The penetration only needed to be slight or fleeting; and
    - It was not necessary for the prosecution to prove that semen was emitted (see Randall v R (1991) 55 SASR 447; Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108; R v Pryor [2001] QCA 341).

13. It is not sufficient for the relevant body part to have simply been touched. It must have been penetrated to some extent (Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108).

14. It is unclear whether this element will be met where:

    - The complainant stops consenting, and the accused fails to cease the penetration; or
    - The accused becomes aware that the complainant is not consenting, but fails to cease the penetration (see Salmon v R [1969] SASR 76; Saraswati v R (1991) 172 CLR 1 (Dawson J); R v Murphy (1988) 52 SASR 186; R v Mayberry [1973] Qd R 211; Richardson v R [1978] Tas SR 178; Kaitamaki v R [1985] AC 147).

Offences Committed 1 March 1981 – 4 August 1991

15. From 1 March 1981 to 4 August 1991, the definition of rape was expanded to also include:

    - The introduction (to any extent) of a person's penis into the anus or mouth of another person of either sex; and
    - The introduction (to any extent) of an object that is not part of the body, and which was manipulated by a person of either sex, into the vagina or anus of another person of either sex (Crimes Act 1958 s 2A).

16. This definition removed the gendered nature of the offence, which previously could only be committed by a male against a female. Under this definition:

    - Both males and females can be the victim of the offence; and
    - Both males and females can commit the offence, by using an object that is not part of the body.

17. It is unclear whether the expanded definition uses the medical meaning of "vagina" (being the membranous passage or channel leading from the uterus to the vulva), or whether it should be interpreted in a manner consistent with the common law understanding of "sexual penetration" (which includes penetration of the external genitalia) (compare R v Lines (1844) 1 Car & K 393 and Holland v R (1993) 117 ALR 193. See also Randall v R (1991) 55 SASR 447 and R v AG (1997) 129 ACTR 1).[530] In cases where this is relevant, judges will need to engage in a process of statutory construction and will need to consider principles concerning the interpretation of ambiguous penal statutes and the interference with fundamental rights (see Coco v R (1994) 179 CLR 427; Bropho v State of Western Australia (1990) 171 CLR 1; Beckwith v R (1976) 135 CLR 569).

18. As was the case at common law, under the expanded definition:

    - The penetration only needed to be slight or fleeting (penetration "to any extent") (Randall v R (1991) 55 SASR 447; Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108);
    - The prosecution did not need to prove the emission of semen (Crimes Act 1958 s 2A);
    - It is unclear whether this element is met where the accused failed to cease sexual penetration upon withdrawal of consent, or upon becoming aware that the complainant was not consenting (see Salmon v R [1969] SASR 76; Saraswati v R (1991) 172 CLR 1 (Dawson J); R v Murphy (1988) 52 SASR 186; R v Mayberry [1973] Qd R 211; Richardson v R [1978] Tas SR 178; Kaitamaki v R [1985] AC 147).

19. The purpose of the penetration is irrelevant. It need not have been committed for the purposes of sexual gratification (R v Dunn 15/4/1992 CA NSW).

Offences Committed 5 August 1991–31 December 1991

20. From 5 August 1991 to 31 December 1991, the definition of rape was further expanded, to include:

    - The introduction of a part of the body other than the penis into the vagina or anus of another person; and
    - Failing to cease sexual penetration on becoming aware that the other person was not consenting, or upon realising that the other person might not be consenting (Crimes Act 1958 s 36).

Directing the Jury About the Meaning of "Vagina"

21. The common law definition of vagina (and possibly the statutory definitions: see above) includes "the external genitalia". It has been held that this phrase is not within ordinary usage and needs more explanation (R v AJS (2005) 12 VR 563; Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108; R v MG (2010) 29 VR 305).

22. Consequently, where penetration is in issue, the judge should explain to the jury in precise and simple terms, what would constitute penetration of the vagina, and summarise the evidence that relates to that issue (R v AJS (2005) 12 VR 563. See also Randall v R (1991) 55 SASR 447; Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108; R v MG (2010) 29 VR 305).

---

[530] If the legislation uses the medical definition, cases in which only the external genitalia have been penetrated will need to be charged as indecent assault instead.

Identifying the Penetrative Act

23. While in most cases the prosecution will be able to particularise the method of penetration (e.g. the complainant was penetrated by a penis), in some cases this will not be possible. In such cases, it will be sufficient for the prosecution to particularise the method of penetration by reference to the relevant possibilities (e.g. the complainant was penetrated by a penis, a bodily part or some other object) (R v Castles (Ruling No.1) (2007) 17 VR 329).

24. Where alternative possible methods of penetration are left to the jury, they do not need to unanimously agree about which of those methods was used. They only need to unanimously agree that penetration took place (R v Castles (Ruling No.1) (2007) 17 VR 329).

Lack of Consent

25. The third element the prosecution must prove is that the complainant did not consent to sexual penetration (R v Saragozza [1984] VR 187).

26. While the statutory definition of consent in Crimes Act 1958 s 36 was introduced on 1 January 1992 by the Crimes (Rape) Act 1991, the transitional provisions for that Act state that it applies to proceedings that occur after the commencement of the legislation, regardless of when the alleged offence was committed (Crimes (Rape) Act 1991 s 9).

27. Similarly, the amendments to the statutory directions on consent and awareness of the absence of consent introduced by the Crimes (Rape) Act 2007 also operate retrospectively (Crimes Act 1958 s 609).

28. While there is an argument that s 36 is incapable of applying to rape before prior to 1 January 1991, as the section is limited to offences under Subdivisions (8A) to (8D), the better view appears to be that, in light of the transitional provisions of the Crimes (Rape) Act 1991, the section does operate retrospectively and judges must direct juries on the contemporary meaning of consent, even for historical offences.

29. For information on the meaning of consent under s 36 and the statutory directions on consent, see 7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent (Pre-1/7/15).

Awareness of Non-Consent

30. The fourth element the prosecution must prove is that the accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting to the sexual penetration, or realised that the complainant might not be consenting to the sexual penetration (R v Flannery & Prendergast [1969] VR 31; R v Hornbuckle [1945] VLR 281; R v Daly [1968] VR 257; R v Morgan [1976] AC 182; Banditt v R (2005) 224 CLR 262; R v Saragozza [1984] VR 187).

31. The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused realised that the complainant probably was not consenting. It is sufficient to prove that the accused realised the complainant might not be consenting (R v Hemsley (1988) 36 A Crim R 334. See also R v Morgan [1976] AC 182; R v Daly [1968] VR 257).

32. The reasonableness of an accused's asserted belief in consent is relevant only to the question of whether the belief was held. The law does not treat an unreasonable belief as non-existent or irrelevant (R v Saragozza [1984] VR 187; R v Morgan [1976] AC 182).

33. The existence of a belief in consent (whether reasonable or unreasonable) is necessarily inconsistent with an awareness that the complainant is not consenting or might not be consenting (R v Flannery & Prendergast [1969] VR 31; R v Saragozza [1984] VR 187; R v Morgan [1976] AC 182).

34. For more information on this element, see 7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent (Pre-1/1/15).

Non-Advertence

35. Some cases have suggested that this element will be satisfied, both at common law and under subsequent statutory schemes, where a person did not give any thought to whether the complainant consented (see R v Morgan [1976] AC 182; R v Tolmie (1995) 37 NSWLR 660).

36. However, the Crimes Amendment (Rape) Act 2007 was enacted on the basis that an offence would not be committed where the accused did not advert to the issue. The transitional provisions limit the operation of the statutory fault element of non-advertence to offences committed after the commencement of the amending legislation (see Attorney-General Rob Hulls, Second Reading Speech, Crimes Amendment (Rape) Bill 2007. See also Neal v R (2011) 32 VR 454).

37. The charges in the Charge Book reflect the latter view (i.e., that this element cannot be proven by establishing non-advertence). If this position is considered to be incorrect, the charges will need to be modified accordingly.

Rape with Aggravating Circumstances

38. The offence of rape with aggravating circumstances existed between 1 March 1981 and 31 December 1991.

39. The accused can be found guilty of this offence in two ways:

    - The jury can convict him or her of rape with aggravating circumstances, if they are satisfied that all of the elements of that offence have been met; or
    - The judge can direct that the accused is deemed to have been found guilty of rape with aggravating circumstances, if he or she is satisfied that the accused has previously been convicted of a specified offence.

Jury Determination

40. "Rape with aggravating circumstances" is a separate offence from "rape". If the prosecution charges the accused with the aggravated offence, the judge must direct the jury about its elements (subject to the power of the judge to direct a verdict of rape with aggravating circumstances: see below) (Crimes Act 1958 s 45).

41. The offence consists of all the elements of rape, along with an additional element that the offence was committed in one of the following aggravating circumstances:

    (a) During the commission of the offence, or immediately before or after it, and at or in the vicinity of the place where the offence was committed, the offender inflicted serious personal violence on the victim or another person;

    (b) The offender had an offensive weapon with him or her;

    (c) During the commission of the offence, or immediately before or after it, the offender did an act which was likely to seriously and substantially degrade or humiliate the victim; or

    (d) During the commission of the offence, or immediately before or after it, the offender was aided or abetted by another person who was present at, or in the vicinity of, the place where the offence was committed (Crimes Act 1958 ss 45, 46).

42. The term "offensive weapon" means an offensive weapon, firearm, imitation firearm, explosive or imitation explosive, as defined in s 77 of the Act (Crimes Act 1958 ss 45, 46).

43. See 7.5.5 Aggravated Burglary for further information concerning the meaning of "offensive weapon", as well as the requirement that the accused had the weapon "with" him or her.

Directed Verdict

44. Where the accused is found guilty of rape, the judge may direct that he or she is deemed to have been found guilty of rape with aggravating circumstances if the judge is satisfied that the accused has previously been convicted of one of the following offences:
    - Rape (with or without aggravating circumstances);
    - Rape with mitigating circumstances;[531]
    - Attempted rape (with or without aggravating circumstances);
    - Assault with intent to rape (with or without aggravating circumstances);
    - Indecent assault (with or without aggravating circumstances) (Crimes Act 1958 s 46).
45. The power to direct a deemed verdict of rape with aggravating circumstances applies even if the accused pleaded guilty. It is not limited to a finding of guilt following a trial (R v Symons [1981] VR 297; R v Snabel, VSC, 2/12/1982).

Rape with Mitigating Circumstances

46. Prior to 1 March 1981, s 44(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 allowed the jury on a charge of rape to return a verdict of rape with mitigating circumstances, if satisfied that the accused committed the offence, but that there were circumstances connected with the commission of the offence which mitigate the offence.
47. It is unclear whether the repeal of this provision by the Crimes (Sexual Offences) Act 1980 removed the availability of the verdict of rape with mitigating circumstances. Where the parties raise this issue, the judge will need to consider whether this verdict is available for offences committed before 1 March 1981 and what assistance the judge should give the jury on the meaning of "mitigating circumstances". However, it may be difficult to reconcile the existence of this provision with the operation of Crimes Act 1958 ss 37A and 37B.[532]
48. This Charge Book does not provide a model direction on leaving a verdict of rape with mitigating circumstances.

Other Relevant Statutory Provisions

Crimes Act 1958 s 61 (Delayed Complaint)

49. Section 61 of the Crimes Act 1958 contains a number of jury warnings that are relevant to trials for sexual offences. This section applies to trials "for an offence under Subdivision (8A), (8B), (8C), (8D) or (8E) or under any corresponding previous enactment...".
50. As rape was an offence against s 45 of the Crimes Act 1958 between 1 March 1981 and 31 December 1991, s 61 applies to offences committed between those dates. See the documents in Delayed Complaint for further information.
51. It is unclear whether s 61 also applies to offences committed before 1 March 1981, as there was no "corresponding previous enactment" at that time (rape was purely a common law offence).

---

[531] Prior to 1 March 1981, s 44(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 allowed the jury on a charge of rape to return a verdict of rape with mitigating circumstances, if satisfied that the accused committed the offence in circumstances of mitigation.

[532] By Crimes Act 1958 s 606A(1), the guiding principles provisions in ss 37A and 37B apply to any trial commenced after 1 December 2006, regardless of when the offence was allegedly committed.

52. If s 61 does not apply to offences committed before 1 March 1981, then in relevant cases the judge will need to direct the jury about the effect of delayed complaint in accordance with the common law. See 7.3.1.4 Effect of delayed complaint on credit.

Evidence Act 2008

53. Judges will also need to consider the operation of the Evidence Act 2008, which applies to all hearings commenced on or after 1 January 2010 (Evidence Act 2008 Schedule 2).

54. For information on the effect of the Evidence Act 2008, see especially:

    - Delay Causing Forensic Disadvantage; and
    - Corroboration (General Principles).

Crimthreat was toes Act 1958 s 62 (Presumption of Consent)

55. Section 62 of the Crimes Act 1958 abolished two presumptions thought to exist at common law:

    - The presumption of impotence of a male under the age of 14; and
    - The presumption of consent to sexual intercourse within a marriage.

56. This provision only applies to offences committed on or after 1 March 1981 (Crimes (Sexual Offences) Act 1980 s 2).

57. However, recent cases have questioned whether the common law actually recognised a presumption of consent within marriage. Depending on the resolution of this issue, the abolition of that presumption by s 62(2) may be redundant (see R v L (1991) 174 CLR 379; R v P, GA (2010) 109 SASR 1 (special leave to appeal granted)).

Last updated: 5 March 2012

7.3.3.1 Charge: Rape (1/3/81–31/12/91)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for rapes alleged to have been committed between 1/3/1981 and 31/12/1991.

There are some minor differences between offences committed before 5/8/1991, and offences committed or on or after that date. See 7.3.3 Rape and Aggravated Rape (Pre-1/1/92) for information concerning these differences.

This charge can be adapted where the accused is charged with rape with aggravating circumstances. See 7.3.3 Rape and Aggravated Rape (Pre-1/1/92) for guidance.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of rape. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following four elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused sexually penetrated the complainant in the way alleged.[533]

[533] This charge will need to be adapted if the prosecution case relies on a failure to withdraw. See 7.3.3 Rape and Aggravated Rape (Pre–1/1/92) for information on when the law may allow such a case to be put to the jury.

Two – the accused did this intentionally.

Three – the complainant did not consent to the sexual penetration.

Four – the accused was aware either that the complainant was not consenting, or that the complainant might not be consenting.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[534]

Sexual Penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused sexually penetrated the complainant in the way alleged. [If in issue, add: The prosecution must also prove that the accused did this act consciously, voluntarily, and deliberately.[535]]

Act of sexual penetration

The law defines the term sexual penetration to include a number of different acts. In this case the prosecution must prove that NOA introduced [identify item or body part, e.g. "his penis"] to any extent into NOC's [vagina/anus/mouth].[536]

[If relevant add:

- NOA's [identify item or body part] does not need to have gone all the way into NOC's [vagina/anus/mouth]. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation.]

In this case [insert relevant evidence or competing arguments about proof of sexual penetration].

The act was conscious, voluntary and deliberate

[If the evidence or arguments have placed voluntariness in issue, add the shaded section.]

As I have directed you, the prosecution must prove that the accused sexually penetrated the complainant consciously, voluntarily, and deliberately.

This requirement is in issue here because [describe the evidence or arguments that place voluntariness in issue].

You must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g."NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the

---

[534] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[535] Described in the instructions within this charge as the "voluntariness" requirement.

[536] Penetration by a part of the body other than the penis only falls within the definition of "sexual penetration" for offences committed between 5 August 1991 and 31 December 1991.

time of the penetration"].

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the sexual penetration was intentional.[537]

[If intention is not in issue, add the shaded section.]

This element is not in issue here. [If appropriate, explain further, e.g. "The accused admits that s/he intentionally penetrated the complainant. If you are satisfied that the accused [consciously, voluntarily and deliberately] penetrated the complainant, you should have no trouble finding that s/he did so intentionally".]

Consent

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant was not consenting at the time to the sexual penetration.

The law says that consent means free agreement. So the prosecution must prove that NOC did not freely agree to being sexually penetrated by NOA [at the time in question].

The law identifies a number of circumstances where the complainant is deemed not to freely agree, or consent, to sexual penetration. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because she or he is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep, unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of freely agreeing;

(e) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(f) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act or the identity of the person;

(g) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting. However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

[If there is evidence the complainant did not indicate agreement, add the shaded section if relevant.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without

---

[537] Because rape is an offence of basic intent (the intent to commit the physical act of penetrating the complainant) proof of the intent will rarely be separated from proof of the act, and "intention" will rarely be an independent issue. Instead, mental state issues related to the act of penetration should generally be addressed by voluntariness directions. This will be the case if the issue is negation of intent by involuntariness, unconsciousness or accident. If different "intention" issues arise, this charge should be adapted.

that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to the sexual penetration at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to be sexually penetrated, you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done, or not said and done at the time of the alleged penetration, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about his/her state of mind at that time.

In this case, [insert evidence and competing arguments relevant to proof that the complainant was not consenting].

It is important that you remember that it is not for the accused to prove to you that the complainant consented. For this third element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not consent.

State of Mind of the Accused

The fourth element relates to the accused's state of mind about the complainant's consent. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of sexual penetration the accused was either:

- aware that the complainant was not consenting; or
- aware that the complainant might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these states of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find this element not proven, and you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.[538]

Belief in consent

[If evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed the complainant was consenting, add a suitably modified direction from 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent.]

Application of law to evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of rape the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA sexually penetrated NOC; and

Two – that NOA intended to sexually penetrate NOC; and

Three – that NOC did not consent to the sexual penetration; and

Four – that at the time of the sexual penetration NOA was either:

- aware that the complainant was not consenting; or

[538] If this element is not in issue, it will generally be sufficient to state that conclusion at this point and elaborate no further.

- aware that the complainant might not be consenting.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of rape.

Last updated: 30 July 2023

7.3.3.2 Charge: Rape (Pre-1/3/81)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for rapes alleged to have been committed prior to 1/3/1981.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of rape. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following four elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused sexually penetrated the complainant in the way alleged.

Two – the accused did this intentionally.

Three – the complainant did not consent to the sexual penetration.

Four – the accused was aware either that the complainant was not consenting, or that the complainant might not be consenting.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[539]

Sexual Penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused sexually penetrated the complainant in the way alleged. [If in issue, add: The prosecution must also prove that the accused did this act consciously, voluntarily, and deliberately.[540]]

Act of sexual penetration

To prove an act of sexual penetration, the prosecution must prove that NOA introduced his penis to any extent into NOC's vagina.

The law says that sexual penetration includes penetration of the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that NOA introduced his penis to any extent between the outer lips of NOC's vagina.

[If relevant add:

- NOA's penis does not need to have gone all the way into NOC's vagina. Even slight penetration is enough.

---

[539] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[540] Described in the instructions within this charge as the "voluntariness" requirement.

- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the penis to the outer surface of the external lips of the vagina is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation.]

In this case [insert relevant evidence or competing arguments about proof of sexual penetration].

The act was conscious, voluntary and deliberate

[If the evidence or arguments have placed voluntariness in issue, add the following shaded section.]

As I have directed you, the prosecution must prove that the accused sexually penetrated the complainant consciously, voluntarily, and deliberately.

This requirement is in issue here because [describe the evidence or arguments that place voluntariness in issue].

You must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the sexual penetration was intentional.[541]

[If intention is not in issue, add the shaded section.]

This element is not in issue here. [If appropriate, explain further, e.g. The accused admits that s/he intentionally penetrated the complainant. If you are satisfied that the accused [consciously, voluntarily and deliberately] penetrated the complainant, you should have no trouble finding that s/he did so intentionally.]

Consent

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant was not consenting at the time to the sexual penetration.

The law says that consent means free agreement. So the prosecution must prove that NOC did not freely agree to being sexually penetrated by NOA [at the time in question].

The law identifies a number of circumstances where the complainant is deemed not to freely agree, or consent, to sexual penetration. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because she or he is unlawfully detained;

---

[541] Because rape is an offence of basic intent (the intent to commit the physical act of penetrating the complainant) proof of the intent will rarely be separated from proof of the act, and "intention" will rarely be an independent issue. Instead, mental state issues related to the act of penetration should generally be addressed by voluntariness directions. This will be the case if the issue is negation of intent by involuntariness, unconsciousness or accident. If different "intention" issues arise, this charge should be adapted.

(d) the person is asleep, unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of freely agreeing;

(e) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(f) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act or the identity of the person;

(g) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting. However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

[If there is evidence the complainant did not indicate agreement, add the shaded section if relevant.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to the sexual penetration at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to be sexually penetrated, you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done, or not said and done at the time of the alleged penetration, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about his/her state of mind at that time.

In this case, [insert evidence and competing arguments relevant to proof that the complainant was not consenting].

It is important that you remember that it is not for the accused to prove to you that the complainant consented. For this third element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not consent.

State of Mind of the Accused

The fourth element relates to the accused's state of mind about the complainant's consent. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of sexual penetration the accused was either:

- aware that the complainant was not consenting; or
- aware that the complainant might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these states of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find this element not proven, and you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.[542]

Belief in consent

[If evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed the complainant was consenting, add a suitably modified direction from 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent.]

---

[542] If this element is not in issue, it will generally be sufficient to state that conclusion at this point and elaborate no further.

Application of law to evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of rape the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA sexually penetrated NOC; and

Two – that NOA intended to sexually penetrate NOC; and

Three – that NOC did not consent to the sexual penetration; and

Four – that at the time of the sexual penetration NOA was either:

- aware that the complainant was not consenting; or
- aware that the complainant might not be consenting.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of rape.

Last updated: 30 July 2023

7.3.3.3 Checklist: Rape (Pre-1/1/92)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused sexually penetrated the complainant; and

2. The accused sexually penetrated the complainant intentionally; and

3. The complainant did not consent to the sexual penetration; and

4. The accused was aware either that the complainant was not consenting or that the complainant might not be consenting.

Sexual penetration

1. Did the accused sexually penetrate the complainant in the way alleged?

If yes, then go to 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of rape

Intention

2. Did the accused intend to sexually penetrate the complainant?

If yes, then go to 3

If no, then the accused is not guilty of rape

Lack of Consent

3. Did the sexual penetration occur without the complainant's consent?

If yes, then go to 4.1

If no, then the accused is not guilty of rape

Accused's Awareness of Lack of Consent

4.1 Was that accused aware that the complainant was not consenting to the sexual penetration?

If yes, then the accused is guilty of rape (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1, 2 and 3)

If no, then go to 4.2

4.2 Was the accused aware that the complainant might not be consenting to the sexual penetration?

If yes, then the accused is guilty of rape (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1, 2 and 3)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of rape

Last updated: 30 May 2014

7.3.3A Assault with Intent to Commit a Sexual Offence (From 1/7/15)

Click here for a Word version of this document

This topic relates to assaults with intent to commit a sexual offence committed on or after 1 July 2015. Before that date, the equivalent offence only applied to assaults with intent to commit rape. See Assault with Intent to Rape (Pre-1/7/15)

1. Crimes Act 1958 s 42 creates the offence of assault with intent to commit a sexual offence. The offence has four elements which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt. These are:
   i) The accused intentionally applied force to another person;
   ii) The other person did not consent to that application of force;
   iii) At the time of applying force, the accused intended that the other person take part in a sexual act;
   iv) The accused did not reasonably believe that the other person would consent to taking part in that sexual act.
2. This is a hybrid offence, which draws on elements of assault and sexual offences.
3. Section 42 provides that force may be applied directly or indirectly, or to the body, clothing or equipment worn by the other person (Crimes Act 1958 s 42(4)).
4. Application of force includes application of heat, light, electric current or other forms of energy, or the application of solid, liquid or gaseous matter (Crimes Act 1958 s 42(5)).
5. A person takes part in a sexual act if the person:
   i) is sexually penetrated or sexually touched by another person or by an animal; or
   ii) sexually penetrates or sexually touches another person, themselves or an animal (Crimes Act 1958 s 35C).
6. Sexual penetration is defined in s 35A, and is discussed in 7.3.2 Rape (From 1/1/92). Sexual touching is defined in s 35B and is discussed in 7.3.5 Sexual Assault (From 1/7/15).

7. This offence replaced the offence of assault with intent to rape. Under the previous offence, it was recognised that the offence prohibited conduct that was more remote than a charge of attempted rape (see R v Worland [1964] VR 607).
8. It was also established in relation to the previous offence that the criminality came from the assault and the intent to commit rape and it did not matter if the intended rape was factually impossible (R v Cogley [1989] VR 799, 807).

Last updated: 26 April 2021

7.3.3A.1A Charge: Assault with Intent to Commit a Sexual Offence (From 30/7/23)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of assault with intent to commit a sexual offence. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – The accused intentionally applied force to the complainant;

Two – The complainant did not consent to that application of force;

Three – At the time of applying force, the accused intended that the complainant would take part in a sexual act;

Four – The accused did not reasonably believe the complainant would consent to taking part in that sexual act.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Assault

The first element relates to what the accused did.

The prosecution must prove the accused intentionally applied force to the complainant.

For the purpose of this offence, force can be applied directly or indirectly to the complainant's body, or to clothing or equipment the complainant was wearing.

It does not matter how much force was applied, or for how long. The prosecution does not need to prove that the application of force harmed the complainant. Even the slightest touch is enough.

[If relevant, add: The application of force can involve the application of heat, light or electric current to the complainant, or the application of any substance, including liquids or gases].

[If relevant, add: For this element, the prosecution does not need to show that NOC realised that NOA was applying force to [his/her] [body/clothing or equipment [he/she] was wearing].

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Absence of consent

The second element relates to the complainant's state of mind.

The prosecution must prove that the complainant did not consent to the application of force.

Consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free and voluntary agreement. So the prosecution must prove that NOC did not freely and voluntarily agree to the accused [identify relevant application of force].

[Where a party requests a direction about the meaning of consent, add one or more of the following shaded paragraphs.]

The law says that a person can consent to an act only if they are capable of consenting, and free to choose whether or not to engage in or to allow the act.

The law says that where a person has given their consent to an act, they may withdraw that consent before the act happens or at any time while it is happening.

In this case, [insert evidence and competing arguments relevant to proof that the complainant was not consenting].

It is important that you remember that it is not for the accused to prove to you that the complainant consented. For this second element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not consent to the alleged assault.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Intention to take part in a sexual act

The third element relates to the accused's intentions.

The prosecution must prove that the accused assaulted the complainant with the intention that the complainant would take part in a sexual act. In other words, the prosecution must prove why the accused's assaulted the complainant.

In this case, the prosecution argues that the accused intended to [identify alleged sexual act]. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that this is what NOA intended to do when s/he assaulted NOC, then you can find this element proved.[543]

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

No reasonable belief complainant would consent

The fourth element relates to the accused's state of mind about the complainant's consent. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of the assault the accused did not reasonably believe that the complainant would consent to the intended sexual act.

This fourth element will be met in any of the following circumstances [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

- The accused believed that the complainant would not consent to the intended sexual act.
- The accused gave no thought to whether the complainant would consent to the intended sexual act.
- Even if the accused may have believed that the complainant would consent, this belief was not reasonable in the circumstances.]

The prosecution only needs to prove one of these three states of mind. If the prosecution does not prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had any of these states of mind about whether the complainant would consent to the intended sexual act, then you must not find this element proven, and you must not find NOA guilty of this offence.

In this case, [evidence has been led/the defence argue] that at the time of the alleged assault NOA reasonably believed that NOC would consent to the intended sexual act. [Briefly summarise relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

---

[543] If the prosecution has not provided sufficient particulars about the nature of the intended sexual act, or if it is necessary to direct the jury about the meaning of taking part in a sexual penetration, then the judge will need to direct the jury about the meaning of sexual penetration or sexual touching. See 7.3.2.1 Charge: Rape (From 1/07/15) or 7.3.5.1 Charge: Sexual Assault (From 1/7/15) for directions about sexual penetration or sexual touching, respectively.

[If a party requests a direction on the relevance of knowledge of a deemed non-consent circumstance under s 34C(2) or s 36, add the shaded section.]

If you find that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 s 36AA circumstance(s)], you must consider whether the accused knew or believed that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 s 36AA circumstance(s)]. If you find that NOA knew or believed that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 s 36AA circumstance(s)], that is enough to show that NOA did not reasonably believe that NOA would consent and you may find this element proved.

A belief will be reasonable if there are reasonable grounds for a person in the position of the accused to hold that belief. You must also consider all the circumstances when deciding whether a belief in consent was reasonable.

[Refer to competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments on reasonable belief in consent.]

A belief in consent is not reasonable unless the accused said or did something a reasonable time before the sexual act to find out whether the other person consented to that act.[544]

[If a party requests a direction about the relevance of community expectations to whether a belief is reasonable, add the following shaded section.]

When you are considering whether a belief in consent is unreasonable, you must consider what the community would reasonably expect of the accused in the circumstances in forming a reasonable belief in consent. As members of the community, you have the best idea of what the community would reasonably expect of NOA in the circumstances in forming a reasonable belief in consent.[545]

[If a party requests a direction about the accused's personal attributes, characteristics or circumstances, add the following shaded section.]

In deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the accused did not have a reasonable belief in consent you may take into account any personal attributes or characteristics of the accused, or the circumstances of the accused. In this case, this would include [identify relevant attributes, characteristics and circumstances].[546]

[If it is alleged that the accused was intoxicated at the relevant time, add the shaded section.]

If you find that NOA was intoxicated, you must not take this into account when assessing whether he/she reasonably believed that NOC would consent.

The law requires you to consider whether a belief that NOC would consent would have been reasonable for a person who was not intoxicated at the relevant time.

---

[544] This direction must be modified if the accused seeks to invoke Crimes Act 1958 s 36A(3), to claim that they have a cognitive impairment or mental illness which was a substantial cause of not saying or doing anything to find out whether the complainant consented. Depending on whether the prosecution is contesting the issue, the judge may need to direct the jury about the basic rule that a person must say or do something to ascertain consent, the exception in the case of a mental illness or cognitive impairment, the onus on the accused to establish the exception, and the fact that the basic rule will apply if the accused fails to establish the exception on the balance of probabilities.

[545] When a party seeks this direction Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(4) specifies good reasons for not giving this direction. See 7.3.1.1 Consent and Reasonable Belief in Consent (From 1/7/15) for guidance.

[546] This direction will need to be modified if the intoxication is not self–induced. See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(3)(b)(ii) and 8.5 Statutory intoxication (from 1/11/14) for guidance.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of assault with intent to commit a sexual offence, the prosecution must prove each of the following elements to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA intentionally applied force to NOC;

Two – that NOC did not consent to that application of force;

Three – at the time of applying force, NOA intended that NOC would take part in a sexual act;

Four – NOA did not reasonably believe that NOC would consent to taking part in that sexual act.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of assault with intent to commit a sexual offence.

Last updated: 30 July 2023

7.3.3A.1 Charge: Assault with Intent to Commit a Sexual Offence

Click here for a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of assault with intent to commit a sexual offence. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – The accused intentionally applied force to the complainant;

Two – The complainant did not consent to that application of force;

Three – At the time of applying force, the accused intended that the complainant would take part in a sexual act;

Four – The accused did not reasonably believe the complainant would consent to taking part in that sexual act.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Assault

The first element relates to what the accused did.

The prosecution must prove the accused intentionally applied force to the complainant.

For the purpose of this offence, force can be applied directly or indirectly to the complainant's body, or to clothing or equipment the complainant was wearing.

It does not matter how much force was applied, or for how long. The prosecution does not need to prove that the application of force harmed the complainant. Even the slightest touch is enough.

[If relevant, add: The application of force can involve the application of heat, light or electric current to the complainant, or the application of any substance, including liquids or gases].

[If relevant, add: For this element, the prosecution does not need to show that NOC realised that NOA was applying force to [his/her] [body/clothing or equipment] [he/she] was wearing].

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Absence of consent

The second element relates to the complainant's state of mind.

The prosecution must prove that the complainant did not consent to the application of force.

Consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So the prosecution must prove that NOC did not freely agree to the accused [identify relevant application of force].

[Where a party requests a direction about the meaning of consent, add one or more of the following shaded paragraphs.]

The law says that a person can consent to an act only if they are capable of consenting, and free to choose whether or not to engage in or to allow the act.

The law says that where a person has given their consent to an act, they may withdraw that consent before the act happens or at any time while it is happening.

In this case, [insert evidence and competing arguments relevant to proof that the complainant was not consenting].

It is important that you remember that it is not for the accused to prove to you that the complainant consented. For this second element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not consent to the alleged assault.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Intention to take part in a sexual act

The third element relates to the accused's intentions.

The prosecution must prove that the accused assaulted the complainant with the intention that the complainant would take part in a sexual act. In other words, the prosecution must prove why the accused's assaulted the complainant.

In this case, the prosecution argues that the accused intended to [identify alleged sexual act]. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that this is what NOA intended to do when s/he assaulted NOC, then you can find this element proved.[547]

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

No reasonable belief complainant would consent

The fourth element relates to the accused's state of mind about the complainant's consent. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of the assault the accused did not reasonably believe that the complainant would consent to the intended sexual act.

This fourth element will be met in any of the following circumstances [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

- The accused believed that the complainant would not consent to the intended sexual act.
- The accused gave no thought to whether the complainant would consent to the intended sexual act.
- Even if the accused may have believed that the complainant would consent, this belief was not reasonable in the circumstances.]

[547] If the prosecution has not provided sufficient particulars about the nature of the intended sexual act, or if it is necessary to direct the jury about the meaning of taking part in a sexual penetration, then the judge will need to direct the jury about the meaning of sexual penetration or sexual touching. See 7.3.2.1 Charge: Rape (From 1/07/15) or 7.3.5.1 Charge: Sexual Assault (From 1/7/15) for directions about sexual penetration or sexual touching, respectively.

The prosecution only needs to prove one of these three states of mind. If the prosecution does not prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had any of these states of mind about whether the complainant would consent to the intended sexual act, then you must not find this element proven, and you must not find NOA guilty of this offence.

In this case, [evidence has been led/the defence argue] that at the time of the alleged assault NOA reasonably believed that NOC would consent to the intended sexual act. [Briefly summarise relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

[If a party requests a direction on the relevance of knowledge of a deemed non-consent circumstance under s 34C(2) or s 36, add the shaded section.]

If you find that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 section 34C(2) or 36 circumstance(s)], you must consider whether the accused knew or believed that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 section 34C(2) or 36 circumstance(s)]. If you find that NOA knew or believed that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 section 34C(2) or 36 circumstance(s)], that is enough to show that NOA did not reasonably believe that NOA would consent and you may find this element proved.

A belief will be reasonable if there are reasonable grounds for a person in the position of the accused to hold that belief. You must also consider all the circumstances when deciding whether a belief in consent was reasonable.

[Refer to competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments on reasonable belief in consent.]

In looking at the evidence, you should consider whether the accused took any steps to find out whether the complainant would consent and, if so, the nature of those steps. In this case [identify any evidence and/or competing arguments about the steps taken by the accused].

[If a party requests a direction about the relevance of community expectations to whether a belief is reasonable, add the following shaded section.]

When you are considering whether a belief in consent is unreasonable, you must consider what the community would reasonably expect of the accused in the circumstances in forming a reasonable belief in consent. As members of the community, you have the best idea of what the community would reasonably expect of NOA in the circumstances in forming a reasonable belief in consent.

[If a party requests a direction about the accused's personal attributes, characteristics or circumstances, add the following shaded section.]

In deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the accused did not have a reasonable belief in consent you may take into account any personal attributes or characteristics of the accused, or the circumstances of the accused. In this case, this would include [identify relevant attributes, characteristics and circumstances].[548]

[If it is alleged that the accused was intoxicated at the relevant time, add the shaded section.]

If you find that NOA was intoxicated, you must not take this into account when assessing whether he/she reasonably believed that NOC would consent.

The law requires you to consider whether a belief that NOC would consent would have been reasonable for a person who was not intoxicated at the relevant time.[549]

[548] When a party seeks this direction Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(4) specifies good reasons for not giving this direction. See 7.3.1.1 Consent and Reasonable Belief in Consent (From 1/07/15) for guidance.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of assault with intent to commit a sexual offence, the prosecution must prove each of the following elements to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA intentionally applied force to NOC;

Two – that NOC did not consent to that application of force;

Three – at the time of applying force, NOA intended that NOC would take part in a sexual act;

Four – NOA did not reasonably believe that NOC would consent to taking part in that sexual act.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of assault with intent to commit a sexual offence.

Last updated: 30 July 2023

7.3.4 Assault with Intent to Rape (Pre-1/7/15)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. The offence of assault with intent to rape is set out under s 40 of the Crimes Act 1958. The section states that a person must not assault or threaten to assault another person with intent to commit rape. The section specifies that the relevant definition of "assault" is that contained in s 31(2) of the Crimes Act 1958.
2. The section was inserted in 1993 and applies to offences alleged to have been committed on or after 15 August 1993 and before 1 July 2015.
3. On 1 July 2015, the offence was repealed and replaced by two new offences – Assault with intent to commit a sexual offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 42) and Threat to commit a sexual offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 43).
4. Assault with intent to rape differs from attempted rape in that it can involve an act which is more remote from the commission of rape. The elements of the offence will be satisfied, as long as the assault was committed with the relevant intent. Attempted rape, by comparison, requires the act to be so proximate to the vital element of penetration that nothing remains to be done but to commit the crime (R v Worland [1964] VR 607).
5. The criminality of the offence of assault with intent to rape comes from the assault and the intent to commit the crime of rape. The intent must be with respect to a real and not an imaginary crime (R v Cogley [1989] VR 798).
6. Unless consent is in issue, evidence of the complainant's belief about the intent of the accused will generally be irrelevant and inadmissible (R v Cahill [1998] 4 VR 1).
7. Although ordinarily "assault" under s 31(2) requires proof that the accused intended to inflict (or was reckless as to the infliction of) bodily injury, pain, discomfort, damage, insult or deprivation of liberty, it is not necessary to prove these matters as a separate element in relation to assault with intent to rape. This is because a finding that the accused intended to rape the complainant would necessarily involve a finding that the accused had the intention to inflict one of these detriments (R v Saffoury 25/8/1998 Vic CA).
8. For further information on the statutory definition of assault see 7.4.9 Statutory Assault.

---

[549] This direction will need to be modified if the intoxication is not self–induced. See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(3)(b)(ii) and 8.5 Statutory intoxication (From 1/11/14) for guidance.

9. For further information on Rape see 7.3.2 Rape (From 1/1/92).

Last updated: 22 June 2016

7.3.4.1 Charge: Assault with Intent to Rape (1/1/08–30/6/15)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for assault with intent to rape trials where the offence is alleged to have been committed on or after 1/1/2008 and before 1/7/2015. For cases before 1/1/2008, see 7.3.4.3 Charge: Assault with Intent to Rape (Pre-1/1/08).

I must now direct you about the crime of assault with intent to rape. To prove that crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused [applied force to the body of the complainant/threatened to apply force to the body[550] of the complainant].

Two – the accused acted with the intention to rape the complainant.

Three – the accused's actions resulted in the complainant being [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, caused damage, insulted or deprived of liberty].

I will now explain each of these elements in detail.

Application of Force

The first element relates to what the accused did. The accused must have [applied force to the body of the complainant/threatened to apply force to the body of the complainant].

It does not matter [how the force was applied/what type of force was threatened]. It could involve any type of physical contact, [if relevant, add: such as kicking or punching, pushing or hitting with an object].

[If relevant, add: The application of force could also involve an application of heat, light or electric current to the body of the complainant, or the application of any substance, including liquids or gases.]

It also does not matter how much force was [applied/threatened]. Even a slight touch is enough for this element to be satisfied.

In this case, the prosecution argued that NOA [applied force/threatened to apply force] to NOC when [insert evidence]. In response, the defence argued [insert evidence].

Intention to Rape

The second element relates to the accused person's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that the accused acted with the intention to rape the complainant. An intention to rape has two parts.

First, the prosecution must prove that at the time the accused [applied force/threatened to apply force] to the complainant's body, [he/she] had an intention to sexually penetrate the complainant.

[550] Section 31(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that the application of force can also be to clothes or equipment worn by the complainant. In cases involving such an application of force, the wording of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

Under the law, sexual penetration is defined as the introduction of a person's penis, body part or object into another person's vagina or anus. It also includes putting a penis into someone's mouth. So for this part of the second element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove that NOA intended to commit one of these acts upon NOC.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that at the time of the assault, NOA either:

- was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting; or
- was not giving any thought to whether the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

In this case there is no suggestion that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting to any sexual penetration by the accused, so you should have no difficulty finding that aspect of the offence proven.[551]

[Insert evidence and arguments relevant to this element.]

Result of the Accused's Acts

The third element relates to the results of the accused's actions. The prosecution must prove that the accused's actions [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injured the complainant, inflicted pain, caused discomfort, caused damage, caused insult or deprived the complainant of liberty].

In this case, the prosecution argued [insert evidence]. In response, the defence argued [insert evidence].

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of assault with intent to rape, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA [applied force/threatened to apply force] to NOC's body; and

Two – that NOA [applied force/threatened to apply force] to NOC with the intention to rape [him/her]; and

Three – that NOA's actions resulted in NOC being [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, damaged, insulted or deprived of liberty].

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of assault with intent to rape.

Last updated: 22 June 2016

7.3.4.2 Checklist: Assault with Intent to Rape (1/1/08–30/6/15)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used where the offence is alleged to have been committed between 1 January 2008 and 1 July 2015, regardless of the date the trial commenced.

This checklist is based on an assault involving the application of force where no lawful excuse is raised. If the assault in issue involved a threat to apply force, or lawful excuse is open on the evidence, it will need to be amended as necessary.

---

[551] If consent or the accused's awareness of the complainant's state of consent is in issue this charge will need to be adapted to include directions in the terms required by Crimes Act 1958 ss 37, 37AAA and 37AA. See further 7.3.2.3 Charge: Rape (1/1/08 – 30/06/15) and 7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent.

Three elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused applied force to the complainant's body; and
2. The accused applied force to the complainant's body with the intention of raping him or her; and
3. The accused's actions resulted in the complainant being [insert one or more of the following: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, damaged, insulted or deprived of liberty].

Application of Force

1. Did the accused apply force to complainant's body?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault with intent to rape

Intention to Rape

2.1 Did the accused apply that force with the intention of sexually penetrating the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault with intent to rape

Consider – Sexual penetration is defined as the introduction of a person's penis, body part or object into another person's vagina or anus. It also includes putting a penis into someone's mouth.

2.2 Was the accused giving any thought to whether or not the complainant was consenting to being sexually penetrated?

If Yes, then go to 2.3

If No, go to 3

2.3 Was the accused aware that the complainant was not consenting or that s/he might not be consenting to being sexually penetrated?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault with intent to rape

Result of Accused's Actions

3. Did the actions of the accused result in the complainant being [insert one or more of the following: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, damaged, insulted or deprived of liberty]?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of assault with intent to rape (as long as no answers to the earlier questions indicate that the accused is not guilty)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault with intent to rape

Last updated: 22 June 2016

7.3.4.3 Charge: Assault with Intent to Rape (Pre-1/1/08)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for assault with intent to rape trials where the offence is alleged to have been committed before 1/1/08. For other cases see 7.3.4.1 Charge: Assault with Intent to Rape (1/1/08–30/6/15).

I must now direct you about the crime of assault with intent to rape is a crime. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused [applied force to the body[552] of the complainant/threatened to apply force to the body of the complainant].

Two – the accused intended to sexually penetrate the complainant, either without their consent or whether or not they were consenting.

Three – the accused's actions resulted in the complainant being [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, caused damage, insulted or deprived of liberty].

I will now explain each of these elements in detail.

Application of Force

The first element relates to what the accused did. The accused must have [applied force to the body of the complainant/threatened to apply force to the body of the complainant].

It does not matter [how the force was applied/what type of force was threatened]. It could involve any type of physical contact, [if relevant, add: such as kicking or punching, pushing or hitting with an object].

[If relevant, add: The application of force could also involve an application of heat, light or electric current to the body of the complainant, or the application of any substance, including liquids or gases.]

It also does not matter how much force was [applied/threatened]. Even a slight touch is enough for this element to be satisfied.

In this case, the prosecution argued that NOA [applied force/threatened to apply force] to NOC when [insert evidence]. In response, the defence argued [insert evidence].

Intention to Rape

The second element that the prosecution must prove relates to the accused person's state of mind. The accused must have had an intention to rape the complainant.

In order to prove that the accused intended to rape the complainant, the prosecution must prove that at the time the accused [applied force/threatened to apply force] to the complainant's body, [he/she] had an intention to sexually penetrate the complainant either without [his/her] consent or regardless of whether or not [he/she] was consenting.

[552] Section 31(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that the application of force can also be to clothes or equipment worn by the complainant. In cases involving such an application of force, the wording of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

Under the law, sexual penetration is defined as the introduction of a person's penis, body part or object into another person's vagina or anus. It also includes putting a penis into someone's mouth. So for this second element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove that NOA intended to commit one of these acts, without NOC's consent or regardless of whether or not [he/she] was consenting.

In this case, the prosecution argued [insert evidence]. The defence responded [insert evidence].

Result of the Accused's Acts

The third element relates to the results of the accused's actions. The prosecution must prove that the accused's actions [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injured the complainant, inflicted pain, caused discomfort, caused damage, caused insult or deprived the complainant of liberty].

In this case, the prosecution argued [insert evidence]. In response, the defence argued [insert evidence].

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of assault with intent to rape, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA [applied force/threatened to apply force] to NOC's body; and

Two – that NOA [applied force/threatened to apply force] NOC with the intention to sexually penetrate [him/her] either without [his/her] consent, or whether or not [he/she] was consenting; and

Three – that NOA's actions resulted in NOC being [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, damaged, insulted or deprived of liberty].

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of assault with intent to rape.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

7.3.4.4 Checklist: Assault with Intent to Rape (Pre-1/1/08)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used where the offence is alleged to have been committed before 1 January 2008, regardless of the date the trial commenced.

This checklist is based on an assault involving the application of force where no lawful excuse is raised. If the assault in issue involved a threat to apply force, or lawful excuse is open on the evidence, it will need to be amended as necessary.

Three elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused applied force to the complainant's body; and
2. The accused applied force to the complainant's body with the intention of sexually penetrating them either without their consent, or regardless of whether or not they were consenting; and
3. The accused's actions resulted in the complainant being [insert one or more of the following: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, damaged, insulted or deprived of liberty].

Application of Force

1. Did the accused apply force to complainant's body?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault with intent to rape

Intention to Rape

2. Did the accused apply force with the intention of sexually penetrating the complainant either without their consent, or regardless of whether or not they were consenting?

Consider – Sexual penetration is defined as the introduction of a person's penis, body part or object into another person's vagina or anus. It also includes putting a penis into someone's mouth.

If Yes, go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault with intent to rape

Result of Accused's Actions

3. Did the actions of the accused result in the complainant being [insert one or more of the following: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, damaged, insulted or deprived of liberty]?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of assault with intent to rape (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault with intent to rape

Last updated: 18 March 2008

7.3.5 Sexual Assault (From 1/7/15)

Click here to download a Word version of this document

This topic relates to sexual assault offences committed on or after 1 July 2015. For indecent assault offences committed before 1 July 2015, see 7.3.6 Indecent Assault (1/1/92–30/6/15).

Elements

1. Sexual assault is an offence under Crimes Act 1958 s 40.
2. The offence has the following four elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt. A person (A) commits the offence of sexual assault if he or she:
   i) Intentionally touches another person (B);
   ii) The touching is sexual;
   iii) B does not consent to the touching; and
   iv) A does not reasonably believe that B consents to the touching.
3. Compelled sexual assault is a separate offence under s 41. Many of the elements of sexual assault are also relevant to compelled sexual assault, including the meanings of sexual touching, consent and reasonable belief in consent. See "Compelled Sexual Assault" below.

Commencement information

4. The offence of sexual assault in Crimes Act 1958 s 40 commenced operation on 1 July 2015. As a new offence, it only applies to conduct committed on or after 1 July.
5. Prior to 1 July 2015, similar conduct was covered by the offence of indecent assault (see Crimes Act 1958 s 39)

Intentional Touching

6. The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intentionally touched another person. The term "touching" is defined in Crimes Act 1958 s 35B as touching that may be done:

   (a) with any part of the body; or

   (b) with anything else; or

   (c) through anything, including anything worn by the person doing the touching or by the person touched.

7. Before 1 July 2015, the offence of indecent assault relied on the common law definition of "assault". Assault was defined as any act done with the intention to cause the victim to apprehend immediate or unlawful violence (R v Venna [1976] QB 421; Fagan v Metropolitan Police [1969] 1 QB 439; R v Court [1989] AC 28).

8. The exact intention required in relation to indecent assault was somewhat unclear – whether there must merely have been an intention to assault, or whether an intention to commit an indecent assault was required.

9. In relation to common law indecent assault, it had been held that the accused must have had an intention to commit an indecent assault (R v Court [1989] AC 28).

10. However, "assault" forms no part of the elements of the current offence.

11. As a result, the fault element for the first element is basic or general intention. Where relevant, the prosecution must prove that the touching was intentional in the sense that it was deliberate rather than inadvertent or accidental.

Sexual touching

12. Touching may be "sexual" because of:

    (a) the area of the body that is touched or used in the touching, including (but not limited to) the genital or anal region, the buttocks or, in the case of a female, or a person who identifies as female, the breasts; or

    (b) the fact that the person doing the touching seeks or gets sexual arousal or sexual gratification from the touching; or

    (c) any other aspect of the touching, including the circumstances in which it is done (Crimes Act 1958 s 35B(2)).

13. This provision does not provide a definition of "sexual" for the purpose of touching, or an exhaustive test for when touching will be sexual. Treating satisfaction of any of the clauses of s 35B(2) as automatically sexual does not pay due regard to the text and structure of the section. Instead, s 35B(2) should be read as if it provided a series of matters which a jury may consider in deciding whether touching is sexual. For this purpose, the three limbs of s 35B(2) can operate cumulatively and the prosecution may rely on more than one limb (AB v Paulet [2022] VSC 414, [217]–[234]).

14. In addition to the factors in s 35B(2), "common understandings of social behaviour may inform whether an instance of touching is sexual". This does not reintroduce a "public morals" or "contemporary standards of modesty and decency" test which the legislature discarded when enacting the current form of s 40 in 2015 (AB v Paulet [2022] VSC 414, [248]–[249]).

15. Something more is required than bare satisfaction of one or more of the limbs of s 35B(2). It is, however, difficult to provide a definitive statement of what that 'something more' involves, particularly at the margins (AB v Paulet [2022] VSC 414, [246]–[248]).

16. The first limb of s 35B(2) is consistent with the common law on the previous offence of indecent assault, which held that an act may have had a sexual connotation due to the body area used by the accused (e.g. genitals, anus, breasts), or due to the accused's motive (R v Harkin (1989) 38 A Crim R 296; Sabet v R [2011] VSCA 124; Curtis v R [2011] VSCA 102).

17. In determining whether an act had a sexual connotation, at common law the jury could consider a range of factors including:

    - The relationship of the accused to victim (e.g. were they relatives, friends or complete strangers);
    - How the accused had come to embark on this conduct; and
    - Why the accused was behaving in that way (R v Court [1989] AC 28).

18. These principles may continue to be relevant in determining whether touching was "sexual" for the purposes of s 40 sexual assault.

19. At common law, there was a distinction between acts supposedly incapable of having a sexual connotation (e.g. removing a person's shoe) and acts equivocal in the sense that they may or may not have a sexual connotation (e.g. a kiss on the cheek), depending on the accused's motive. While s 35B(2)(b) makes the accused's motivation for the touching relevant to whether the touching is sexual, innocuous touching combined with a sexual interest is likely not enough, by itself, to render the touching sexual (AB v Paulet [2022] VSC 414, [266]. On the common law distinction, see R v George [1956] Crim LR 52; R v Court [1989] AC 28; cf Sabet v R [2011] VSCA 124; Curtis v R [2011] VSCA 102; R v RL [2009] VSCA 95).

20. The jury must assess whether touching is sexual objectively, though subjective factors may be relevant. Evidence that the accused intended, or did not intend, sexual gratification from the touching is relevant but not determinative when characterising the touching (AB v Paulet [2022] VSC 414, [250]–[257]).

21. The complainant's subjective characterisation of the touching as sexual is not relevant. However, a complainant may be allowed to describe touching as "caressing" or "intimate" as a form of lay opinion within the meaning of Evidence Act 2008 s 78, where necessary to describe the physical act of touching (AB v Paulet [2022] VSC 414, [258]–[259]).

22. The jury may also consider the history and relationship between the parties, and how the conduct was undertaken, and is not limited to the immediate circumstances of the touching. Despite this, in most cases, the immediate circumstances of the touching are likely to be more important in characterising the touching than more report circumstances (AB v Paulet [2022] VSC 414, [272]–[273]).

23. As with the earlier offence of indecent assault, there is no requirement that the touching involved any "hostility" over and above sexual nature of the touching (Boughey v R (1986) 161 CLR 10; Fitzgerald v Kennard (1995) 84 A Crim R 333).

Honest and Reasonable Mistake

24. The Act states that it is no defence that the accused had an honest and reasonable belief that the touching was not sexual (Crimes Act 1958 s 48B). This excludes the general criminal defence of honest and reasonable mistake of fact with respect to the sexual nature of the touching.

25. The effect of this provision appears to be that the accused's belief can make a touching sexual (such as where he or she seeks or gets sexual gratification from the touching), but the accused's belief is not capable of operating in an exculpatory manner.

Without Consent

26. "Consent" is defined in s 36 of the Crimes Act 1958 to mean "free agreement".

27. This definition of consent is relevant both to the question of whether the complainant consented to the conduct (the third element), and the accused's mental state in respect of that consent (the fourth element).

28. Section 36(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 lists situations in which a person is regarded as not having given free agreement. This is not an exhaustive list.

29. Section 36(2) is not expressly drafted as a "deeming provision", but it is relatively clear that it must now be treated this way. This interpretation is supported by Jury Directions Act 2015 s 46(4)(b) which require juries to be directed about the effect of s 36(2) in terms that assume that it is a deeming provision.

30. For a full discussion of this topic see 7.3.1.2 Consent and reasonable belief in consent (From 1/07/15).

No Reasonable Belief in Consent

31. The fourth element is that the accused "does not reasonably believe that [the complainant] consents to taking part in the sexual act" (Crimes Act 1958, s 40(1)(d)).

32. This fault element will be satisfied by any one of the following mental states:

    i) The accused believed that the complainant was not consenting.

    ii) The accused did not believe the complainant was consenting. This includes circumstances where the accused gave no thought as to whether the complainant was consenting.

    iii) The accused believed the complainant was consenting, but his/her belief was not reasonable in the circumstances.

33. This element introduces objectivity into the fault criteria for sexual assault (Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences and Other Matters) Bill 2014 Explanatory Memo).

34. This element is explained in more detail in 7.3.1.2 Consent and reasonable belief in consent (From 1/07/15).

Compelled Sexual Assault

35. "Sexual assault by compelling sexual touching" (compelled sexual assault) is a separate offence contained in s 41.

36. The elements of compelled sexual assault are as follows (s 41(1)):

(a) The accused (A) intentionally causes another person (B) –

(i) To touch A; or

(ii) To touch themselves, or

(iii) To touch another person (C) or an animal, or

(iv) To be touched by C or by an animal; and

(b) The touching is sexual; and

(c) B does not consent to the touching; and

(d) A does not reasonably believe that B consents to the touching.

37. The elements of the offence are similar to those of sexual assault, but rather than the accused intentionally touching the complainant, the accused intentionally causes the complainant to sexually touch either the accused, the complainant him/herself, a third person, or an animal, or be touched by a third person or an animal (s 41(1)(a)).

38. The accused will have committed the offence of compelled sexual assault in relation to the person who s/he causes to do the touching, not the person touched. Where the accused causes the complainant to touch a third person, the accused may also have committed sexual assault simpliciter of that third person, assuming the other elements of that offence are met (s 35B(2)).

Last updated: 13 October 2023

7.3.5.1A Charge: Sexual Assault (From 30/7/23)

Click here for a Word version of this document for adaptation

Warning! This charge contains many optional directions which may be requested by a party. Judges must take care to ensure that requested directions are appropriate to the circumstances of the case. Judges should also consider whether to repeat any of the directions specified in 7.3.1.1.1 Statutory directions on consent and 7.3.1.1.2 Statutory direction on belief in consent.

I must now direct you about the crime of sexual assault. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused intentionally touched the complainant in the way alleged.

Two – the touching was sexual.

Three – the complainant did not consent to the touching.

Four – the accused did not reasonably believe that the complainant consented to the touching.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Touching

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have intentionally touched the complainant. [If in issue, add: The prosecution must also prove that the accused did this act consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.[553]]

[553] Described in the instructions within this charge as the "voluntariness" requirement.

[Add any parts of the shaded section, as relevant.]

The touching does not need to be violent, or to cause any physical harm or injury. Any touching, no matter how slight, is enough.

The touching can be done with any part of the accused's body, or with anything else.

The touching can be done through anything, including anything the accused or the complainant was wearing.

The law says that if the accused causes another person or an animal to touch the complainant, then the accused is the person who did the touching.

The act was conscious, voluntary and deliberate

[If the evidence or arguments have placed intention or voluntariness in issue, add the shaded section.]

The prosecution must prove that the accused touched the complainant consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

This requirement is in issue here because [describe the evidence or arguments that place voluntariness in issue].

You must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstances of the case, e.g. "NOA touched NOC on the breasts deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time he touched NOC on the breasts"].

Sexual

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the touching was sexual.

The law says that touching can be sexual because of the area of the body involved, of either the person being touched or the person doing the touching, such as the genital or anal area, or the buttocks or breasts.

Or the touching can be sexual because the person doing the touching wants to get or gets sexual gratification from the touching.

Finally, any other aspect of the touching, including the circumstances in which it happened, can also make the touching sexual.

The question of whether or not the touching was sexual is for you to decide.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that the touching was sexual because [insert evidence and arguments]. [If relevant add: The defence responded [insert evidence and arguments]].

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA's touching of NOC was sexual.

Lack of consent

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the touching happened without the complainant's consent.

Consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free and voluntary agreement. So the prosecution must prove that NOC did not freely and voluntarily agree to being touched by NOA at the time.[554]

[Where a party requests a direction about the meaning of consent, add the following shaded section as relevant to the facts in issue.]

The law says that a person can consent to an act only if they are capable of consenting, and free to choose whether or not to engage in or to allow the act.

The law says that where a person has given their consent to an act, they may withdraw that consent before the act happens or at any time while it is happening.

[Where a party requests a direction about the circumstances in which a person is taken not to have consented, add the following shaded section.]

In some circumstances the law says that the complainant did not freely agree, or consent, to be touched. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person does not say or do anything to indicate consent to the act;
(b) the person submits to the act because of force, a fear of force, harm of any type or a fear of harm of any type, whether to that person or someone else or to an animal, regardless of-
  (i) when the force, harm or conduct giving rise to the fear occurs; and
  (ii) whether it is, or is a result of, a single incident or is part of an ongoing pattern;
(c) the person submits to the act because of coercion or intimidation-
  (i) regardless of when the coercion or intimidation occurs; and
  (ii) whether it is, or is a result of, a single incident or is part of an ongoing pattern;
(d) the person submits to the act because the person is unlawfully detained;
(e) the person submits to the act because the person is overborne by the abuse of a relationship of authority or trust;
(f) the person is asleep or unconscious;
(g) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of consenting to the act;
(h) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of withdrawing consent to the act;
(i) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;
(j) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act;
(k) the person is mistaken about the identity of any other person involved in the act;
(l) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes;
(m) the act occurs in the provision of commercial sexual services and the person engages in the act because of a false or misleading representation that the person will be paid;
(n) if the act involves an animal, the person mistakenly believes that the act is for veterinary or agricultural purposes or scientific research purposes;
(o) the person engages in the act on the basis that a condom is used and either-
  (i) before or during the act, any other person involved in the act intentionally removes the condom or tampers with the condom; or
  (ii) the person who was to use the condom intentionally does not use it;
(p) having given consent to the act, the person later withdraws consent to the act taking place or continuing.

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting.

---

[554] If this element is not in issue, it will generally be sufficient to state that conclusion at this point and elaborate no further.

However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

In this case, [insert evidence and competing arguments relevant to proof that the complainant was not consenting].

It is important that you remember that it is not for the accused to prove to you that the complainant consented. For this third element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not consent.

No reasonable belief in consent

The fourth element relates to the accused's state of mind about the complainant's consent. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of the touching the accused did not reasonably believe that the complainant was consenting.[555]

This fourth element will be met in any of the following circumstances [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

- The accused believed that the complainant was not consenting.
- The accused gave no thought to whether the complainant was consenting.
- Even if the accused may have believed that the complainant was consenting, this belief was not reasonable in the circumstances.]

The prosecution only needs to prove one of these three states of mind. If the prosecution does not prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had any of these states of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must not find this element proven, and you must not find NOA guilty of this offence.

In this case, [evidence has been led/the defence argue] that at the time of the sexual touching NOA reasonably believed that NOC was consenting to the touching. [Briefly summarise relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments].

[If a party requests a direction on the relevance of knowledge of a deemed non-consent circumstance under s 34C(2) or s 36, add the shaded section.]

If you find that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 s 36AA circumstance(s)], you must consider whether the accused knew or believed that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 s 36AA circumstance(s)]. If you find that NOA knew or believed that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 s 36AA circumstance(s)], that is enough to show that NOA did not reasonably believe that NOA was consenting and you may find this element proved.

A belief will be reasonable if there are reasonable grounds for a person in the position of the accused to hold that belief. You must also consider all the circumstances when deciding whether a belief in consent was reasonable.

[Refer to competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments on reasonable belief in consent.]

[555] If this element is not in issue, it will generally be sufficient to state that conclusion at this point and elaborate no further.

A belief in consent is not reasonable unless the accused said or did something a reasonable time before the sexual act to find out whether the other person consented to that act.[556]

[If a party requests a direction about the relevance of community expectations to whether a belief is reasonable, add the following shaded section.]

When you are considering whether a belief in consent is unreasonable, you must consider what the community would reasonably expect of the accused in the circumstances in forming a reasonable belief in consent. As members of the community, you have the best idea of what the community would reasonably expect of NOA in the circumstances in forming a reasonable belief in consent.

[If a party requests a direction about the accused's personal attributes, characteristics or circumstances, add the following shaded section.]

In deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the accused did not have a reasonable belief in consent you may take into account any personal attributes or characteristics of the accused, or the circumstances of the accused. In this case, this would include [identify relevant attributes, characteristics and circumstances].[557]

[If it is alleged that the accused was intoxicated at the relevant time, add the shaded section.]

If you find that NOA was intoxicated, you must not take this into account when assessing whether he/she reasonably believed that NOC was consenting.

The law requires you to consider whether the belief in NOC's consent would have been reasonable to a person who was not intoxicated at the relevant time.[558]

Medical or hygienic purposes

[In cases involving alleged sexual touching in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

According to the law, the accused has not committed the offence of sexual assault if the sexual touching was done in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the [describe alleged sexual touching], was not done in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

---

[556] This direction must be modified if the accused seeks to invoke Crimes Act 1958 s 36A(3), to claim that they have a cognitive impairment or mental illness which was a substantial cause of not saying or doing anything to find out whether the complainant consented. Depending on whether the prosecution is contesting the issue, the judge may need to direct the jury about the basic rule that a person must say or do something to ascertain consent, the exception in the case of a mental illness or cognitive impairment, the onus on the accused to establish the exception, and the fact that the basic rule will apply if the accused fails to establish the exception on the balance of probabilities.

[557] When a party seeks this direction Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(4) specifies good reasons for not giving this direction. See Consent and Reasonable Belief in Consent (From 1/07/15) for guidance.

[558] This direction will need to be modified if the intoxication is not self–induced. See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(3)(b)(ii) and Charge: Self–induced intoxication for guidance.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of sexual assault the prosecution must prove each of the following elements to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA intentionally touched NOC in the way alleged; and

Two – that the touching was sexual.

Three – that NOC did not consent to the touching; and

Four – that at the time of the touching NOA did not reasonably believe that NOC was consenting.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual assault.

Last updated: 30 July 2023

7.3.5.1 Charge: Sexual Assault (1/7/15 – 29/7/23)

Click here for a Word version of this document for adaptation

When to use this charge

This charge can be used for cases involving sexual assault alleged to have been committed on or after 1/7/2015.

Warning! This charge contains many optional directions which may be requested by a party. Judges must take care to ensure that requested directions are appropriate to the circumstances of the case.

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of sexual assault.

To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused intentionally touched the complainant in the way alleged.

Two – the touching was sexual.

Three – the complainant did not consent to the touching.

Four – the accused did not reasonably believe that the complainant consented to the touching.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Touching

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have intentionally touched the complainant. [If in issue, add: The prosecution must also prove that the accused did this act consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.[559]]

[Add any parts of the shaded section, as relevant.]

The touching does not need to be violent, or to cause any physical harm or injury. Any touching, no matter how slight, is enough.

[559] Described in the instructions within this charge as the "voluntariness" requirement.

The touching can be done with any part of the accused's body, or with anything else.

The touching can be done through anything, including anything the accused or the complainant was wearing.

The law says that if the accused causes another person or an animal to touch the complainant, then the accused is the person who did the touching.

The act was conscious, voluntary and deliberate

[If the evidence or arguments have placed intention or voluntariness in issue, add the shaded section.]

The prosecution must prove that the accused touched the complainant consciously, voluntarily and deliberately. This requirement is in issue here because [describe the evidence or arguments that place voluntariness in issue]. You must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstances of the case, e.g. "NOA touched NOC on the breasts deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time he touched NOC on the breasts"].

Sexual

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the touching was sexual.

The law says that touching can be sexual because of the area of the body involved, of either the person being touched or the person doing the touching, such as the genital or anal area, or the buttocks or breasts.

Or the touching can be sexual because the person doing the touching wants to get or gets sexual gratification from the touching.

Finally, any other aspect of the touching, including the circumstances in which it happened, can also make the touching sexual.

The question of whether or not the touching was sexual is for you to decide.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that the touching was sexual because [insert evidence and arguments]. [If relevant add: The defence responded [insert evidence and arguments]].

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA's touching of NOC was sexual.

Lack of consent

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the touching happened without the complainant's consent.

Consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So the prosecution must prove that NOC did not freely agree to being touched by NOA at the time.[560]

[Where a party requests a direction about the meaning of consent, add the following shaded section as relevant to the facts in issue.]

---

[560] If this element is not in issue, it will generally be sufficient to state that conclusion at this point and elaborate no further.

The law says that a person can consent to an act only if they are capable of consenting, and free to choose whether or not to engage in or to allow the act.

The law says that where a person has given their consent to an act, they may withdraw that consent before the act happens or at any time while it is happening.

[Where a party requests a direction about the circumstances in which a person is taken not to have consented, add the following shaded section.]

In some circumstances the law says that the complainant did not freely agree, or consent, to be touched. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits to the act because of force or the fear of force, whether to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits to the act because of the fear of harm of any type, whether to that person or someone else or an animal;

(c) the person submits to the act because the person is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep or unconscious;

(e) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of consenting to the act;

(f) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of withdrawing consent to the act;

(g) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(h) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act;

(i) the person is mistaken about the identity of any other person involved in the act;

(j) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes;

(k) if the act involves an animal, the person mistakenly believes that the act is for veterinary, agricultural or scientific research purposes

(l) the person does not say or do anything to indicate consent to the act;

(m) having initially given consent to the act, the person later withdraws consent to the act taking place or continuing.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting.

However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

In this case, [insert evidence and competing arguments relevant to proof that the complainant was not consenting].

It is important that you remember that it is not for the accused to prove to you that the complainant consented. For this third element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not consent.

No reasonable belief in consent

The fourth element relates to the accused's state of mind about the complainant's consent. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of the touching the accused did not reasonably believe that the complainant was consenting.[561]

This fourth element will be met in any of the following circumstances [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

- The accused believed that the complainant was not consenting.
- The accused gave no thought to whether the complainant was consenting.
- Even if the accused may have believed that the complainant was consenting, this belief was not reasonable in the circumstances.]

The prosecution only needs to prove one of these three states of mind. If the prosecution does not prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had any of these states of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must not find this element proven, and you must not find NOA guilty of this offence.

In this case, [evidence has been led/the defence argue] that at the time of the sexual touching NOA reasonably believed that NOC was consenting to the touching. [Briefly summarise relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

[If a party requests a direction on the relevance of knowledge of a deemed non-consent circumstance under s 34C(2) or s 36, add the shaded section.]

If you find that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 section 34C(2) or 36 circumstance(s)], you must consider whether the accused knew or believed that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 section 34C(2) or 36 circumstance(s)]. If you find that NOA knew or believed that [describe relevant Crimes Act 1958 section 34C(2) or 36 circumstance(s)], that is enough to show that NOA did not reasonably believe that NOA was consenting and you may find this element proved.

A belief will be reasonable if there are reasonable grounds for a person in the position of the accused to hold that belief. You must also consider all the circumstances when deciding whether a belief in consent was reasonable.

[Refer to competing prosecution and defence evidence and arguments on reasonable belief in consent.]

In looking at the evidence, you should consider whether the accused took any steps to find out whether the complainant was consenting or might not be consenting and, if so, the nature of those steps. In this case [identify any evidence and/or competing arguments about the steps taken by the accused].

[If a party requests a direction about the relevance of community expectations to whether a belief is reasonable, add the following shaded section.]

When you are considering whether a belief in consent is unreasonable, you must consider what the community would reasonably expect of the accused in the circumstances in forming a reasonable belief in consent. As members of the community, you have the best idea of what the community would reasonably expect of NOA in the circumstances in forming a reasonable belief in consent.

[If a party requests a direction about the accused's personal attributes, characteristics or circumstances, add the following shaded section.]

In deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the accused did not have a reasonable belief in consent you may take into account any personal attributes or characteristics of the accused, or the circumstances of the accused. In this case, this would include [identify relevant attributes, characteristics and circumstances].[562]

---

[561] If this element is not in issue, it will generally be sufficient to state that conclusion at this point and elaborate no further.

[If it is alleged that the accused was intoxicated at the relevant time, add the shaded section.]

If you find that NOA was intoxicated, you must not take this into account when assessing whether he/she reasonably believed that NOC was consenting.

The law requires you to consider whether the belief in NOC's consent would have been reasonable to a person who was not intoxicated at the relevant time.[563]

Medical or hygienic purposes

[In cases involving alleged sexual touching in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

According to the law, the accused has not committed the offence of sexual assault if the sexual touching was done in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the [describe alleged sexual touching], was not done in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of sexual assault the prosecution must prove each of the following elements to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA intentionally touched NOC in the way alleged; and

Two – that the touching was sexual;

Three – that NOC did not consent to the touching; and

Four – that at the time of the touching NOA did not reasonably believe that NOC was consenting.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual assault.

Last updated: 30 July 2023

7.3.5.2 Checklist: Sexual Assault (From 1/7/15)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used for a charge of sexual assault allegedly committed on or after 1 July 2015.

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

---

[562] When a party seeks this direction Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(4) specifies good reasons for not giving this direction. See 7.3.1.2 Consent and Reasonable Belief in Consent (From 1/07/15) for guidance.

[563] This direction will need to be modified if the intoxication is not self–induced. See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 47(3)(b)(ii) and 8.5.1 Charge: Statutory intoxication (self-induced contested) for guidance.

1. The accused intentionally touched the complainant; and
2. The touching was sexual; and
3. The complainant did not consent to the touching; and
4. The accused did not reasonably believe that the complainant consented to the touching.

Touching

1. Did the accused intentionally touch the complainant?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Assault

Sexual

2. Was the touching sexual?

Consider – What was the area of the body touched, did the accused get sexual gratification from the touching or did other circumstances make the touching sexual

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Assault

Sexual Assault Consent

3. Did the touching occur without the complainant's consent?

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Assault

The Accused's State of Mind

4. At the time of sexual touching, did the accused reasonably believe that the complainant was consenting?

4.1 Did the accused believe that the complainant was not consenting?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Sexual Assault (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, go to 4.2

4.2 Did the accused not hold a belief that the complainant was consenting?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Sexual Assault (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, go to 4.3

4.3 Are you satisfied that even if the accused may have believed that the complainant was consenting, that this belief was not reasonable in the circumstances?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Sexual Assault (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Assault

Last updated: 30 November 2015

7.3.6 Indecent Assault (1/1/92–30/6/15)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Elements

1. Indecent assault is an offence under Crimes Act 1958 s 39.
2. The offence has the following five elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt. A person commits indecent assault if he or she:
   i) Assaults another person;
   ii) Intentionally;
   iii) Without lawful justification;
   iv) While being aware that the person is not consenting or might not be consenting or while not giving any thought to whether the person is not consenting or might not be consenting;
   v) In indecent circumstances.

"Assault"

3. The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused assaulted another person. The term "assaults" is not defined for the purposes of s 39. These charges are based on the assumption that s 39 relies on the common law definition of assault.
4. At common law, assault is defined as any act done with the intention to cause the victim to apprehend immediate or unlawful violence (R v Venna [1976] QB 421; Fagan v Commissioner of Metropolitan Police [1969] 1 QB 439; R v Court [1989] AC 28).
5. In practice, the term assault is now often used synonymously with battery, which is the intentional application of force to another, either directly or indirectly (R v Holzer [1968] VR 481; Fagan v Commissioner of Metropolitan Police [1969] 1 QB 439).
6. The force used need not be violent, and can be as slight as a mere touch (Collins v Wilcock [1984] 1 WLR 1172).
7. In the context of indecent assault involving an actual touching, it is not necessary to establish any "hostility" over and above the actual circumstances of the indecency (Boughey v R (1986) 161 CLR 10*; Fitzgerald v Kennard* (1995) 38 NSWLR 184).

Threats to assault

8. It is unclear whether indecent assault under s 39 includes threats to indecently assault, in the same way that common law assault includes threats to assault.

9. The common law definition of assault includes threats to apply force, so long as those threats cause the victim to apprehend immediate or unlawful violence (R v Venna [1976] QB 421; Fagan v Commissioner of Metropolitan Police [1969] 1 QB 439).

10. In New South Wales, it has been held that common law indecent assault includes threats to indecently assault (Fitzgerald v Kennard (1995) 38 NSWLR 184).

11. If threats to indecently assault are held to constitute an offence, these charges will need to be modified in appropriate cases.

Intention

12. It is somewhat unclear what intention is required in relation to indecent assault – whether there must merely be an intention to assault, or if there must be an intention to commit an indecent assault.

13. In relation to common law indecent assault, it has been held that the accused must have an intention to commit an indecent assault (R v Court [1989] AC 28).

14. However, the wording of s 39(2) states that a person commits an indecent assault if they "assault another person in indecent circumstances". This could be interpreted to mean that there need only be an intention to assault – so long as that assault occurred in the relevant circumstances. This is the interpretation used in this charge.

Lawful justification

15. Consent is the most commonly relevant justification for indecent touching. However, other justifications relevant to common law assault may also be relied upon in unusual circumstances. See 7.4.8 Common Law Assault.

Consent

16. "Consent" is defined in s 36 of the Crimes Act 1958 to mean "free agreement". This definition of consent applies to all of the provisions in Subdivisions 8A to 8D of the Crimes Act (ss 38–52).

17. In relation to s 39, this definition of consent is relevant both to the question of whether the complainant "consented" to the conduct (thus providing a lawful justification for that conduct – the third element), and the accused's mental state in respect of that "consent" (the fourth element).

18. Section 36 of the Crimes Act 1958 lists situations in which a person is regarded as not having given free agreement. This is not an exhaustive list.

19. Section 36 is not expressly drafted as a "deeming provision", but it is relatively clear that it must now be treated this way. This interpretation is supported for trials commenced on or after 1 January 2008 by ss 37AAA(b) and (c) which require juries to be directed about the effect of s 36 in terms that assume that s 36 is a deeming provision.

20. Section 36(a) states that submission in circumstances of "force or fear of force" is not consent. The only degree of force necessary is whatever is necessary to achieve the touching (see R v Bourke [1915] VLR 289; R v Burles [1947] VLR 392).

21. Section 36(b) states that submission because of "the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else" is not consent. The section provides no assistance as to the nature of the harm contemplated. It may extend beyond physical or psychological injury, but that has not yet been determined.

22. Section 36(d) requires that a person is "so affected" by drugs or alcohol as to be incapable of free agreement. Mere impairment of judgement or reduction of inhibitions does not negate free agreement (R v Wrigley 9/2/1995 CA Vic). Note that intoxication can also be relevant to the issues of intention and mistaken belief (see 8.7 Common Law Intoxication).

23. Section 36(e) states that a person does not consent if they are incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act. The complainant's understanding of the moral significance of the act is not relevant to this issue (R v Mobilio [1991] 1 VR 339*; R v Eastwood* [1998] VSCA 42*).*

24. Section 36(e) relates to the complainant's intellectual capacity. But "capacity to understand the sexual nature of the act" is not the only basis upon which a cognitive impairment may be relevant to consent. A person who understands the sexual nature of an act may be nevertheless incapable of freely agreeing to it, if that person is intellectually unable to make a refusal of consent or unable to understand his or her right to refuse consent (R v Mobilio [1991] 1 VR 339*; R v Eastwood* [1998] VSCA 42).

25. In deciding whether a complainant who knew the nature and character of an act of sexual intercourse had the capacity to give real consent to it, the jury could have regard to such things as the complainant's capacity to appreciate:

    - that most of the community draw a distinction in quality between sexual acts and other acts of intimacy; and
    - that a decision to consent or not involves questions of the morality or social acceptability of the conduct (R v Mobilio [1991] 1 VR 339*; R v Eastwood* [1998] VSCA 42*)*.

26. Section 36(g) says that a person does not consent where they have a mistaken belief that the sexual act was for either a medical or hygienic purpose. This section changed the pre-existing common law, which held that mistake as to the purpose of the act did not deprive consent of reality (R v Mobilio [1991] 1 VR 339. Note that the law stated in Mobilio as to capacity to consent is still correct).

27. There is nothing in s 36 to deal with a situation where a woman is mistaken as to one of the characteristics of the accused, and it is this characteristic which leads her to consent. The common law holds that consent in such circumstances does not make the act unlawful (Papadimitropoulos v R (1957) 98 CLR 249).

28. The fact that a man has agreed to pay a specified sum in return for sexual contact and leaves without paying does not mean that consent was vitiated by fraud (R v Linekar [1995] 3 ALL ER 69).

Jury directions on consent

29. Sections 37 and 37AAA of the Crimes Act 1958 provide a framework of directions in respect of the complainant's consent. These directions are mandatory where relevant to the facts in issue in a proceeding (Crimes Act 1958 s 37(1)).

30. For a full discussion of this topic see 7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent (Pre-1/7/15).

31. Where the alleged indecent assault is the immediate forerunner to an alleged rape, and the jury is to be directed on consent in relation to the alleged rape, they should also be directed about consent in relation to the alleged indecent assault (Paton v R [2011] VSCA 72).

The Accused's Awareness

32. The awareness element can be constituted by any one of three different mental states on the part of the accused:

    i) An awareness that the complainant was not consenting (s 39(2)(a));

    ii) An awareness that the complainant might not be consenting (s 39(2)(a));

    iii) A failure to give any thought to whether or not the complainant was consenting ("inadvertence") (s 39(2)(b)).

Awareness of the real possibility of non-consent

33. The word "might" in the phrase "might not be consenting" suggests a test based on the "possibility" of non-consent. It does not suggest that the accused must have been aware that it was "probable" that the complainant was not consenting. However, the possibility of non-consent must be a real possibility, not just a theoretical possibility (R v Ev Costa 2/4/1997 CA Vic).

Inadvertence

34. For offences committed after 1 January 2008 it is no defence for accused persons to assert that they were not aware that the complainant might not have been consenting to the sexual act because they had not given any thought to whether or not the complainant was consenting (Crimes Act 1958 ss 38(2)(a)(ii), 38(4)(b)(ii)).

35. Prior to this amendment it was uncertain whether or not "inadvertence" did provide a defence. On one view, inadvertence was a culpable state under the common law, and this continued for the statutory offences of rape and indecent assault – see DPP v Morgan [1976] AC 182 and R v Tolmie (1995) 37 NSWLR 660. However, the Crimes Amendment (Rape) Bill 2007 was enacted on the basis that this mental state was not previously culpable (see Attorney-General Rob Hulls, Second Reading Speech, Crimes Amendment (Rape) Bill 2007). The charge–book charges reflect this view. If non-advertence was a culpable mental state even prior to the amendment, and it is an issue in a pre-amendment case, the charge will need to be modified.

Jury directions on the accused's awareness

36. Sections 37 and 37AA of the Crimes Act 1958 provide a framework of directions in respect of the accused's awareness of the complainant's state of consent. These directions are mandatory where relevant to the facts in issue in a proceeding (Crimes Act 1958 s 37(1)).

37. For a full discussion of this topic see 7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent (Pre-1/7/15).

"Indecent Circumstances"

38. "Indecent" has been held to be an ordinary word in the English language. It is for the jury to decide whether the facts of a case amount to indecency (R v Nazif [1987] NZLR 122; Curtis v R [2011] VSCA 102).

39. The issue of whether an assault occurred in "indecent circumstances" is an objective one, to be assessed according to community standards. "Indecent" conduct is conduct which would be considered indecent by "right minded people", or which is "so offensive to contemporary standards of modesty or decency as to be indecent" (R v Court [1989] AC 28; Curtis v R [2011] VSCA 102).[564]

40. There must be a "sexual connotation" for an act to be considered indecent (R v Court [1989] AC 28; R v RL [2009] VSCA 95; Sabet v R [2011] VSCA 124).

[564] Other ways in which this requirement has been expressed include "unbecoming or offensive to common propriety", "an affront to modesty" or "offending the modesty of the average person" (see Sabet v R [2011] VSCA 124)

41. An act may have a sexual connotation due to the body area used by the accused (e.g. genitals, anus, breasts). In certain circumstances, an act that does not invovle one of these body areas may also come to have a sexual connotation due to the accused's motive (R v Harkin (1989) 38 A Crim R 296; Sabet v R [2011] VSCA 124; Curtis v R [2011] VSCA 102).

Relevance of the accused's motive to "indecency"

42. If an act has a clear sexual connotation due to the involvement of the genitals, anus or breasts, the accused's motive will be irrelevant in determining whether the assault occurred in indecent circumstances. A clearly indecent act cannot become decent due to a decent motive (R v Harkin (1989) 38 A Crim R 296; Sabet v R [2011] VSCA 124. But cf. R v Court [1989] AC 28).
43. Similarly, where an act is incapable of having a sexual connotation (e.g. removing a person's shoe), the accused's motive is irrelevant. An indecent motive cannot turn an innocuous act into an indecent assault (R v George [1956] Crim LR 52; R v Court [1989] AC 28).
44. However, where the alleged act is equivocal, in the sense that it may or may not have a sexual connotation (e.g. a kiss on the cheek), the accused's motive may be relevant to determining whether it had such a connotation (Sabet v R [2011] VSCA 124; Curtis v R [2011] VSCA 102; R v RL [2009] VSCA 95; R v Court [1989] AC 28).
45. Such an act will have a sexual connotation if it was committed for the purpose of obtaining sexual gratification (Sabet v R [2011] VSCA 124; R v RL [2009] VSCA 95; R v Court [1989] AC 28).
46. Where it is not clear whether an assault occurred in indecent circumstances or not, then it must be shown that the accused intended it to have a sexual connotation. Proof of the accused's motive is relevant in determining this issue (R v Court [1989] AC 28).
47. In determining whether an act has a sexual connotation, the jury may consider a range of factors including:
    - The relationship of the accused to victim (e.g. were they relatives, friends or complete strangers);
    - How the accused had come to embark on this conduct; and
    - Why the accused was behaving in that way (R v Court [1989] AC 28).

Concurrency of Elements

48. The assault must have been indecent at the time it was committed (Sabet v R [2011] VSCA 124).
49. Consequently, the prosecution must prove that when the assault was committed, it ws directly accompanied by either:
    - A sexual connotation; or
    - An intention to obtain sexual gratification (Sabet v R [2011] VSCA 124. See also R v Court [1989] AC 28).
50. It is not necessary that there be an assault as well as an independent act of indecency. Any assault which is itself an act of indecency, or that is of such a character as to involve an act of indecency, is sufficient (Fitzgerald v Kennard (1995) 38 NSWLR 184).

Last updated: 1 December 2011

7.3.6.1 Charge: Indecent Assault (1/1/08–30/6/15)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for cases involving indecent assault alleged to have been committed between 1/1/2008 and 30/6/2015.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of indecent assault. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that the accused touched the complainant in the way alleged.[565]

Two – that the touching was intentional.

Three – that the touching occurred in indecent circumstances.

Four – that there was no lawful justification for the touching, such as the consent of the complainant.[566]

Five – that at the time of the touching the accused either:

- was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting; or
- was not giving any thought to whether the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Application of Force/Touching

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have touched the complainant.

The touching does not need to be violent, or to cause any physical harm or injury. Any touching, no matter how slight, is enough.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA touched NOC when s/he [insert relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence].

For this first element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA touched NOC in the way alleged by the prosecution.

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the touching was intentional. That is, you must be satisfied that the accused touched the complainant deliberately, not accidentally.[567]

---

[565] As most cases of indecent assault involve touching, this charge has been drafted accordingly. The offence can, however, be constituted by any direct or indirect application of force. In cases not involving touching, the wording should be modified appropriately.

A threat to indecently assault may also constitute an indecent assault: see 7.3.6 Indecent Assault (1/1/92–30/6/15). If this is the case, this charge will need to be modified in trials involving such threats.

[566] This charge only includes the lawful justification of consent. Directions should also be given on any other lawful justifications that are in issue.

[567] This charge has been drafted based on the assumption that there need only be an intention to assault, not an intention to indecently assault: see 7.3.6 Indecent Assault (1/1/92–30/6/15).

The touching does not need to have been done with any hostile or aggressive intent,[568] and it is not necessary that the accused intended to cause some kind of harm to the complainant.

[If relevant add the following: It is also not necessary that the purpose of the touching was for the accused's sexual gratification.]

For this second element to be met, you need only find that the accused intended to touch the complainant in the way alleged by the prosecution.

Indecent circumstances

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the touching occurred in indecent circumstances.

Indecent is an ordinary, everyday word, and it is for you to determine whether the circumstances were indecent.

However, the law says that indecent circumstances must involve a sexual connotation. This may arise from the area of the complainant's body that was touched, from the part of the accused's body that was used for the touching, or from the circumstances surrounding the touching. Beyond that requirement, the question of whether or not the circumstances were indecent is for you to decide.

It is possible for the touching itself to be indecent – for example, because of the area of the body touched by the accused. In such a case, there may be no need to find any additional indecent circumstances – the elements of touching and indecency may both be satisfied by the one act.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that the touching was indecent because [insert evidence]. [If relevant add: The defence responded [insert evidence]].

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the circumstances in which NOA touched NOC were indecent.

Lack of Consent (Lawful Justification)

The fourth element that must be proven by the prosecution is that the touching occurred without any lawful justification. In this case, that means that the complainant was touched without his/her consent.

Consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So NOC will not have consented to the touching if s/he did not freely agree to be touched.

The law identifies a number of circumstances where the complainant is deemed not to freely agree, or consent, to be touched. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because he or she is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep, unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of freely agreeing;

---

[568] In relation to indecent assaults involving an actual touching, it is not necessary to establish any hostility over and above the actual circumstances of the indecency. In other circumstances (e.g. a threat to indecently assault) it may be necessary to show hostility.

(e) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(f) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act or the identity of the person;

(g) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting. However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

[If there is evidence the complainant did not indicate agreement, add the shaded section if relevant.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to be touched at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to be touched, you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done at the time of the alleged touching, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about [his/her] state of mind at that time. You can also consider what s/he did not say or do at the time of the alleged touching.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC did not consent. [Refer to evidence supporting the prosecution case]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence].

It is important that you remember that it is not for the accused to prove to you that the complainant consented. For this element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not consent.

State of Mind of the Accused

The fifth element relates to the accused's state of mind about the complainant's consent. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of the touching the accused:

- was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting; or
- was not giving any thought to whether the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these states of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find this element not proven, and you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.[569]

Belief in Consent

[If evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting, add one of the directions in 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent.]

[569] If this element is not in issue, it will generally be sufficient to state that conclusion at this point and elaborate no further.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of indecent assault the prosecution must prove each of the following elements to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA touched NOC in the way alleged; and

Two – that NOA intended to touch NOC; and

Three – that the touching occurred in indecent circumstances.

Four – that NOC did not consent to the touching; and Five – that at the time of the touching NOA either:

- was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting; or
- was not giving any thought to whether the complainant was not or might not be consenting; and

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of indecent assault.

Last updated: 30 July 2023

7.3.6.2 Checklist: Indecent Assault (1/1/08–30/6/15)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used where indecent assault is alleged to have been committed between 1 January 2008 and 30 June 2015.

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused touched the complainant; and
2. The accused intended to touch the complainant; and
3. The touching occurred in indecent circumstances; and
4. The complainant did not consent to the touching; and
5. The accused was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting or was not giving any thought to whether the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

Assault

1. Did the accused touch the complainant?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of indecent assault

Intention

2. Did the accused intend to touch the complainant?

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of indecent assault

Indecent Circumstances

3. Did the accused touch the complainant in indecent circumstances?

Consider – Indecent circumstances requires a sexual connotation

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of indecent assault

Consent

4. Did the touching occur without the complainant's consent?

If Yes then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of indecent assault

The Accused's State of Mind

5. At the time of the assault:

5.1 Was the accused giving any thought to whether or not the complainant was consenting?

If Yes, then go to 5.2

If No, then the accused is guilty of indecent assault (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

5.2 Was the accused aware that the complainant was not consenting or that s/he might not be consenting?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of indecent assault (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of indecent assault

Last updated: 12 September 2019

7.3.6.3 Charge: Indecent Assault (1/1/92–31/12/07)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for indecent assault offences alleged to have been committed between 1/1/1992 and 1/1/2008.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of indecent assault. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that the accused touched the complainant in the way alleged.[570]

Two – that the touching was intentional.

Three – that the touching occurred in indecent circumstances.

Four – that there was no lawful justification for the touching, such as the consent of the complainant.[571]

Five – that at the time of the touching the accused was either:

- aware that the complainant was not consenting; or
- aware that the complainant might not be consenting.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Application of Force/Touching

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have touched the complainant.

The touching does not need to be violent, or to cause any physical harm or injury. Any touching, no matter how slight, is enough.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA touched NOC when s/he [insert relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence].

For this first element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA touched NOC in the way alleged by the prosecution.

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the touching was intentional. That is, you must be satisfied that the accused touched the complainant deliberately, not accidentally.[572]

The touching does not need to have been done with any hostile or aggressive intent,[573] and it is not necessary that the accused intended to cause some kind of harm to the complainant.

[If relevant add the following: It is also not necessary that the purpose of the touching was for the accused's sexual gratification.]

---

[570] As most cases of indecent assault involve touching, this charge has been drafted accordingly. The offence can, however, be constituted by any direct or indirect application of force. In cases not involving touching, the wording should be modified appropriately.

A threat to indecently assault may also constitute an indecent assault: see 7.3.6 Indecent Assault (1/1/92–30/6/15). If this is the case, this charge will need to be modified in trials involving such threats.

[571] This charge only includes the lawful justification of consent. Directions should also be given on any other lawful justifications that are in issue.

[572] This charge has been drafted based on the assumption that there need only be an intention to assault, not an intention to indecently assault: see 7.3.6 Indecent Assault (1/1/92–30/6/15).

[573] In relation to indecent assaults involving an actual touching, it is not necessary to establish any hostility over and above the actual circumstances of the indecency. In other circumstances (e.g. a threat to indecently assault) it may be necessary to show hostility.

For this second element to be met, you need only find that the accused intended to touch the complainant in the way alleged by the prosecution.

Indecent circumstances

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the touching occurred in indecent circumstances.

Indecent is an ordinary, everyday word, and it is for you to determine whether the circumstances were indecent.

However, the law says that indecent circumstances must involve a sexual connotation. This may arise from the area of the complainant's body that was touched, from the part of the accused's body that was used for the touching, or from the circumstances surrounding the touching. Beyond that requirement, the question of whether or not the circumstances were indecent is for you to decide.

It is possible for the touching itself to be indecent – for example, because of the area of the body touched by the accused. In such a case, there may be no need to find any additional indecent circumstances – the elements of touching and indecency may both be satisfied by the one act.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that the touching was indecent because [insert evidence]. [If relevant add: The defence responded [insert evidence]].

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the circumstances in which NOA touched NOC were indecent.

Lack of Consent (Lawful Justification)

The fourth element that must be proven by the prosecution is that the touching occurred without any lawful justification. In this case, that means that the complainant was touched without his/her consent.

Consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So NOC will not have consented to the touching if s/he did not freely agree to be touched.

The law identifies a number of circumstances where the complainant is deemed not to freely agree, or consent, to be touched. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because he or she is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep, unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of freely agreeing;

(e) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(f) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act or the identity of the person;

(g) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting. However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

[If there is evidence the complainant did not indicate agreement, add the shaded section if relevant.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to be touched at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to be touched, you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done at the time of the alleged touching, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about [his/her] state of mind at that time. You can also consider what s/he did not say or do at the time of the alleged touching.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC did not consent. [Refer to evidence supporting the prosecution case]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence].

It is important that you remember that it is not for the accused to prove to you that the complainant consented. For this element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not consent.

State of Mind of the Accused

The fifth element relates to the accused's state of mind about the complainant's consent. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of the touching the accused was either:

- aware that the complainant was not consenting; or
- aware that the complainant might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these states of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find this element not proven, and you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.[574]

Belief in Consent

[If evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting, add one of the directions in 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of indecent assault the prosecution must prove each of the following elements to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA touched NOC in the way alleged; and

Two – that NOA intended to touch NOC; and

Three – that the touching occurred in indecent circumstances.

Four – that NOC did not consent to the touching; and

Five – that at the time of the touching NOA was either:

- aware that NOC was not consenting; or
- aware that NOC might not be consenting; and

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of indecent assault.

---

[574] If the accused's state of mind is not in issue, this section of the charge will need to be modified.

Last updated: 30 July 2023

7.3.6.4 Checklist: Indecent Assault (1/1/92–31/12/07)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist can be used where indecent assault is alleged to have been committed between 1/1/1992 and 1/1/2008.

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused touched the complainant; and
2. The accused intended to touch the complainant; and
3. The touching occurred in indecent circumstances; and
4. The complainant did not consent to the touching; and
5. The accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or that the complainant might not be consenting.

Assault

1. Did the accused touch the complainant?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of indecent assault

Intention

2. Did the accused intend to touch the complainant?

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of indecent assault

Indecent Circumstances

3. Did the accused touch the complainant in indecent circumstances?

Consider – Indecent circumstances requires a sexual connotation

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of indecent assault

Consent

4. Did the touching occur without the complainant's consent?

If Yes then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of indecent assault

The Accused's State of Mind

5. At the time of the assault, was the accused aware that the complainant was not consenting, or was the accused aware that the complainant might not be consenting?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of indecent assault (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of indecent assault

Last updated: 12 September 2019

7.3.7 Indecent Assault (Pre-1/1/92)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. This topic concerns the offence of indecent assault as it existed before 1 January 1992.
2. This topic should be read in conjunction with 7.3.6 Indecent assault (1/1/92 – 30/6/15), which describe the offence as in force from 1 January 1992 onwards. The focus of this topic is on the differences that applied at various times to the offence of indecent assault.
3. Prior to 1 March 1981, indecent assault could only be committed on a woman or girl (Crimes Act 1958 s 55, as in force before 1 March 1981).
4. From 1 March 1981, the offence became gender-neutral. In addition, an aggravated form of offence was introduced (Crimes Act 1958 ss 44, 46 as in force from 1 March 1981 to 4 August 1991; Crimes Act 1958 ss 38, 42, 43, as in force from 5 August 1991 to 31 December 1991).

Consent

5. Before 1 March 1981, the Crimes Act 1958 specified that for a person under 16, consent is not a defence to indecent assault (Crimes Act 1958 s 55(2), as in force before 1 March 1981).
6. From 1 March 1981, the Crimes Act 1958 provided that consent was no defence unless:

   (a) the accused was, or believed on reasonable grounds that he was, married to the person;

   (b) the accused believed on reasonable grounds that the person was of or above the age of sixteen years; or

   (c) the accused was not more than two years older than the person (Crimes Act 1958 s 44(3), as in force from 1 March 1981 to 8 August 1991).
7. Without these provisions, consent is a defence to a charge of indecent assault, as it would be in a charge of common assault (R v Williamson [1969] VR 696, 968).
8. These provisions also have the effect that, where consent is excluded, common assault is not available as an alternative verdict to a charge of indecent assault (R v Williamson [1969] VR 696, 698).
9. Where consent is an element of indecent assault, the prosecution must also prove that the accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or realised that the complainant might not be consenting (see Frank v The King [2024] VSCA 37, [33]-[34]; R v Whelan [1973] VR 268; R v Trotter, Unreported, Supreme Court of Victoria Court of Criminal Appeal, 5 December 1985). For further information about awareness of non-consent at common law, see Rape and Aggravated Rape (Pre-1/1/92).

10. In the case of a complainant under 16 and a charge alleging an offence from 1 March 1981 to 4 August 1991, the accused has an evidentiary burden to raise the issue of one of the three limbs of s 44(3). Once that evidentiary burden is met, the onus is on the prosecution to prove that the complainant did not consent and the accused knew that the complainant was not, or believed that the complainant might not be, consenting (see R v Deblasis & Deblasis (2007) 19 VR 128; c.f. R v Trotter, Unreported, Supreme Court of Victoria Court of Criminal Appeal, 5 December 1985).
11. For offences committed between 5 August 1991 and 31 December 1991, the general offence of indecent assault did not contain a clause excluding consent as a defence. Instead, the provision excluding consent is found in the specific offences of sexual offences against children, including the offence of committing an indecent act with or in the presence of a child under 16 (Crimes Act 1958 s 47, as in force between 5 August 1991 and 31 December 1991).

Interaction between rape and indecent assault

12. Changes in the definition of sexual penetration for the purposes of rape over time have affected whether conduct can be charged as rape or indecent assault.
13. Before 1 March 1981, sexual penetration for the purpose of rape only consisted of penetration of a vagina by a penis. Other conduct that is now treated as sexual penetration, including digital-vaginal, digital-anal, penile–anal and penile–oral penetration, could only be charged as indecent assault, buggery or gross indecency (see R v Daly [1968] VR 257; R v Hornbuckle [1945] VLR 281).
14. Between 1 March 1981 and 4 August 1991, the definition of rape was expanded to include:
    - The introduction (to any extent) of a person's penis into the anus or mouth of another person of either sex; and
    - The introduction (to any extent) of an object that is not part of the body, and which was manipulated by a person of either sex, into the vagina or anus of another person of either sex (Crimes Act 1958 s 2A, as in force between 1 March 1981 and 4 August 1991).
15. The definition of rape was further expanded from 5 August 1991 to 31 December 1991 to include the introduction of a part of the body other than the penis into the vagina or anus of another person (Crimes Act 1958 s 36, as in force between 5 August 1991 and 31 December 1991).
16. These expansions to the definition of rape have correspondingly narrowed the range of conduct that should be charged as indecent assault. See 7.3.3 Rape and Aggravated Rape (Pre-1/1/92) for more information on the changing definition of rape and sexual penetration.

Application of the Jury Directions Act 2015

17. The majority of the Jury Directions Act 2015 applies to trials for historical indecent assault (Jury Directions Act 2015, Schedule 1, clause 1(1)).
18. However, the provisions in Division 1 of Part 5, which contain directions on consent and belief in consent, only apply to offences alleged to have been committed on or after the commencement of that Division (Jury Directions Act 2015, Schedule 1, clause 1(2)). Those provisions will therefore not apply to trials for historical indecent assault.

Indecent assault with aggravating circumstances

19. The offence of indecent assault with aggravating circumstances existed between 1 March 1981 and 31 December 1991.
20. The accused can be found guilty of this offence in two ways:
    - The jury can convict the accused of indecent assault with aggravating circumstances if they are satisfied that all of the elements of that offence have been met; or

- The judge can direct that the accused is deemed to have been found guilty of indecent assault with aggravating circumstances, if the judge is satisfied that the accused has previously been convicted of a specified offence.

Jury Determination

21. "Indecent assault with aggravating circumstances" is a separate offence from "indecent assault". If the prosecution charges the accused with the aggravated offence, the judge must direct the jury about its elements (subject to the power of the judge to direct a verdict of indecent assault with aggravating circumstances: see below) (Crimes Act 1958 s 44).

22. The offence consists of all the elements of indecent assault, along with an additional element that the offence was committed in one of the following aggravating circumstances:

    (a) During the commission of the offence, or immediately before or after it, and at or in the vicinity of the place where the offence was committed, the offender inflicted serious personal violence on the victim or another person;

    (b) The offender had an offensive weapon with him or her;

    (c) During the commission of the offence, or immediately before or after it, the offender did an act which was likely to seriously and substantially degrade or humiliate the victim; or

    (d) During the commission of the offence, or immediately before or after it, the offender was aided or abetted by another person who was present at, or in the vicinity of, the place where the offence was committed (Crimes Act 1958 ss 45, 46).

23. The term "offensive weapon" means an offensive weapon, firearm, imitation firearm, explosive or imitation explosive, as defined in s 77 of the Act (Crimes Act 1958 ss 45, 46).

24. See 7.5.5 Aggravated Burglary for further information concerning the meaning of "offensive weapon", as well as the requirement that the accused had the weapon "with" him or her.

Directed Verdict

25. Where the accused is found guilty of indecent assault, the judge may direct that he or she is deemed to have been found guilty of indecent assault with aggravating circumstances if the judge is satisfied that the accused has previously been convicted of one of the following offences:

    - Rape (with or without aggravating circumstances);
    - Rape with mitigating circumstances;[575]
    - Attempted rape (with or without aggravating circumstances);
    - Assault with intent to rape (with or without aggravating circumstances);
    - Indecent assault (with or without aggravating circumstances) (Crimes Act 1958 s 46).

26. The power to direct a deemed verdict of indecent assault with aggravating circumstances applies even if the accused pleaded guilty. It is not limited to a finding of guilt following a trial (R v Symons [1981] VR 297; R v Snabel, VSC, 2/12/1982).

Last updated: 17 April 2024

---

[575] Prior to 1 March 1981, s 44(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 allowed the jury on a charge of rape to return a verdict of rape with mitigating circumstances, if satisfied that the accused committed the offence in circumstances of mitigation.

7.3.7.1 Charge: Indecent Assault (Pre-1/1/92) Consent Not in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge is designed for cases where consent is not available as a defence. Where consent is available, use 7.3.7.3 Charge: Indecent Assault (Pre-1/1/92) – Consent in issue.

See 7.3.7 Indecent Assault (Pre-1/1/92) for information on when consent is not available as a defence.

This charge can be adapted where the accused is charged with indecent assault with aggravating circumstances. See 7.3.7 Indecent Assault (Pre-1/1/92) for guidance.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of indecent assault. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that the accused touched[576] the complainant in the way alleged.

Two – that the touching was intentional.

Three – that the touching occurred in indecent circumstances.[577]

To protect children under the age of 16, Parliament has created a number of offences where consent is not relevant. This is one of those offences, so you do not need to consider the issue of whether or not NOC agreed to be touched in the way alleged.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Application of Force/Touching

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have touched the complainant.

The touching does not need to be violent, or to cause any physical harm or injury. Any touching, no matter how slight, is enough.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA touched NOC when s/he [insert relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence].

For this first element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA touched NOC in the way alleged by the prosecution.

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the touching was intentional. That is, you must be satisfied that the accused touched the complainant deliberately, not accidentally.[578]

---

[576] As most cases of indecent assault involve touching, this charge has been drafted accordingly. The offence can, however, be constituted by any direct or indirect application of force. In cases not involving touching, the wording should be modified appropriately.

[577] If a lawful excuse other than consent is raised, this matter should be identified for the jury, added to the list of elements as a matter the prosecution must disprove, and the charge adapted to include directions on that defence.

[578] This charge has been drafted based on the assumption that there need only be an intention to assault, not an intention to indecently assault.

The touching does not need to have been done with any hostile or aggressive intent,[579] and it is not necessary that the accused intended to cause some kind of harm to the complainant.

[If relevant add the following: It is also not necessary that the purpose of the touching was for the accused's sexual gratification.]

For this second element to be met, you need only find that the accused intended to touch the complainant in the way alleged by the prosecution.

Indecent circumstances

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the touching occurred in indecent circumstances.

Indecent is an ordinary, everyday word, and it is for you to determine whether the circumstances were indecent.

However, the law says that indecent circumstances must involve a sexual connotation. This may arise from the area of the complainant's body that was touched, from the part of the accused's body that was used for the touching, or from the circumstances surrounding the touching. Beyond that requirement, the question of whether or not the circumstances were indecent is for you to decide.

It is possible for the touching itself to be indecent – for example, because of the area of the body touched by the accused. In such a case, there may be no need to find any additional indecent circumstances – the elements of touching and indecency may both be satisfied by the one act.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that the touching was indecent because [insert evidence]. [If relevant add: The defence responded [insert evidence]].

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the circumstances in which NOA touched NOC were indecent.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of indecent assault the prosecution must prove each of the following elements to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA touched NOC in the way alleged; and

Two – that NOA intended to touch NOC; and

Three – that the touching occurred in indecent circumstances.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of indecent assault.

Last updated: 12 April 2018

7.3.7.2 Checklist: Indecent Assault (Pre-1/1/92) Consent Not in Issue

Click here for a Word version of this document for adaptation

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

---

[579] In relation to indecent assaults involving an actual touching, it is not necessary to establish any hostility over and above the actual circumstances of the indecency. In other circumstances (e.g. a threat to indecently assault) it may be necessary to show hostility.

1. The accused touched the complainant in the way alleged; and

2. The touching was intention; and

3. The touching occurred in indecent circumstances.

Assault

1. Did the accused touch the complainant in the way alleged?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of indecent assault

Intention

2. Did the accused intend to touch the complainant in the way alleged?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of indecent assault

Indecent circumstances

3. Did the touching occur in indecent circumstances?

Consider – Indecent circumstances requires a sexual connotation

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of indecent assault (as long as you answered yes to question 1 and 2)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of indecent assault

Last updated: 12 September 2019

7.3.7.3 Charge: Indecent Assault (Pre-1/1/92) Consent in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge is designed for cases where consent is available as a defence. Where consent is not available, use 7.3.7.1 Charge: Indecent Assault (Pre-1/1/92) – Consent not in issue.

See 7.3.7 Indecent Assault (Pre-1/1/92) for information on when consent is not available as a defence.

This charge can be adapted where the accused is charged with indecent assault with aggravating circumstances. See 7.3.7 Indecent Assault (Pre-1/1/92) for guidance.

The Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of indecent assault. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that the accused touched[580] the complainant in the way alleged.

Two – that the touching was intentional.

Three – that the touching occurred in indecent circumstances.

Four – that there was no lawful justification for the touching, such as the consent of the complainant.[581]

Five – that at the time of the touching the accused was either:

- aware that the complainant was not consenting; or
- aware that the complainant might not be consenting.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Application of Force/Touching

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have touched the complainant.

The touching does not need to be violent, or to cause any physical harm or injury. Any touching, no matter how slight, is enough.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA touched NOC when s/he [insert relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence].

For this first element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA touched NOC in the way alleged by the prosecution.

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the touching was intentional. That is, you must be satisfied that the accused touched the complainant deliberately, not accidentally.[582]

The touching does not need to have been done with any hostile or aggressive intent,[583] and it is not necessary that the accused intended to cause some kind of harm to the complainant.

[If relevant add the following: It is also not necessary that the purpose of the touching was for the accused's sexual gratification.]

---

[580] As most cases of indecent assault involve touching, this charge has been drafted accordingly. The offence can, however, be constituted by any direct or indirect application of force. In cases not involving touching, the wording should be modified appropriately.

A threat to indecently assault may also constitute an indecent assault: see 7.3.6 Indecent Assault (1/1/92–30/6/15). If this is the case, this charge will need to be modified in trials involving such threats.

[581] This charge only includes the lawful justification of consent. Directions should also be given on any other lawful justifications that are in issue.

[582] This charge has been drafted based on the assumption that there need only be an intention to assault, not an intention to indecently assault.

[583] In relation to indecent assaults involving an actual touching, it is not necessary to establish any hostility over and above the actual circumstances of the indecency. In other circumstances (e.g. a threat to indecently assault) it may be necessary to show hostility.

For this second element to be met, you need only find that the accused intended to touch the complainant in the way alleged by the prosecution.

Indecent circumstances

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the touching occurred in indecent circumstances.

Indecent is an ordinary, everyday word, and it is for you to determine whether the circumstances were indecent.

However, the law says that indecent circumstances must involve a sexual connotation. This may arise from the area of the complainant's body that was touched, from the part of the accused's body that was used for the touching, or from the circumstances surrounding the touching. Beyond that requirement, the question of whether or not the circumstances were indecent is for you to decide.

It is possible for the touching itself to be indecent – for example, because of the area of the body touched by the accused. In such a case, there may be no need to find any additional indecent circumstances – the elements of touching and indecency may both be satisfied by the one act.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that the touching was indecent because [insert evidence]. [If relevant add: The defence responded [insert evidence]].

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the circumstances in which NOA touched NOC were indecent.

Lack of Consent (Lawful Justification)

The fourth element that must be proven by the prosecution is that the touching occurred without any lawful justification. In this case, that means that the complainant was touched without his/her consent.

Consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So NOC will not have consented to the touching if s/he did not freely agree to be touched.

The law identifies a number of circumstances where the complainant is deemed not to freely agree, or consent, to be touched. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because he or she is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep, unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of freely agreeing;

(e) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(f) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act or the identity of the person;

(g) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting. However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

[If there is evidence the complainant did not indicate agreement, add the shaded section if relevant.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to be touched at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to be touched, you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done at the time of the alleged touching, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about [his/her] state of mind at that time. You can also consider what s/he did not say or do at the time of the alleged touching.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC did not consent. [Refer to evidence supporting the prosecution case]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence].

It is important that you remember that it is not for the accused to prove to you that the complainant consented. For this element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not consent.

State of Mind of the Accused

The fifth element relates to the accused's state of mind about the complainant's consent. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of the touching the accused was either:

- aware that the complainant was not consenting; or
- aware that the complainant might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these states of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find this element not proven, and you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.[584]

Belief in Consent

[If evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting, add one of the directions in 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of indecent assault the prosecution must prove each of the following elements to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA touched NOC in the way alleged; and

Two – that NOA intended to touch NOC; and

Three – that the touching occurred in indecent circumstances.

Four – that NOC did not consent to the touching; and

Five – that at the time of the touching NOA was either:

- aware that NOC was not consenting; or

[584] If this element is not in issue, it will generally be sufficient to state that conclusion at this point and elaborate no further.

- aware that NOC might not be consenting; and

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of indecent assault.

Last updated: 30 July 2023

7.3.7.4 Checklist: Indecent Assault (Pre-1/1/92) Consent in Issue

Click here for a Word version of this document for adaptation

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused touched the complainant in the way alleged; and

2. The touching was intention; and

3. The touching occurred in indecent circumstances; and

4. There was no lawful justification for the touching; and

5. The accused was aware that the complainant was not or may not have been consenting at the time of the touching.

Assault

1. Did the accused touch the complainant in the way alleged?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of indecent assault

Intention

2. Did the accused intend to touch the complainant in the way alleged?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of indecent assault

Indecent circumstances

3. Did the touching occur in indecent circumstances?

Consider – Indecent circumstances requires a sexual connotation

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of indecent assault

Consent

4. Did the touching occur without the complainant's consent?

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of indecent assault

The Accused's State of Mind

5. At the time of the assault:

5.1. Was the accused aware that the complainant was not consenting?

If Yes, then go to 5.2

If No, then the accused is guilty of indecent assault (as long as you have answered questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

5.2. Was the accused aware that the complainant might not be consenting?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of indecent assault (as long as you have answered questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of indecent assault

Last updated: 12 September 2019

7.3.8 Abduction or Detention for a Sexual Purpose

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. Crimes Act 1958 s 47 creates the offence of 'Abduction or detention for a sexual purpose'.
2. The offence consists of four elements:
   i) The accused:
      - Takes away or detains the complainant; or
      - Causes the complainant to be taken away or detained by a third party
   ii) The complainant does not consent to being taken away or detained
   iii) The accused knows that:
      - The complainant does not consent to being taken away or detained; or
      - The complainant probably does not consent to being taken away or detained
   iv) The accused intends that:
      - The complainant will take part in a sexual act with the accused, a third party or both
      - The accused or a third party will marry the complainant (whether or not the complainant consents to being married).
3. As explained in R v Nguyen and Tran [1998] 4 VR 394, 409 and Davis v R [2006] NSWCCA 392, [34]–[38], 'abduction' offences have long existed as a particular form of kidnapping.

Commencement information and previous forms of offence

4. Section 47 was introduced through the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Act 2016, and replaced the previous abduction or detention offence in Crimes Act 1958 s 55. The current form of the offence applies to conduct committed on or after 1 July 2017.

5. The principal difference between the current s 47 offence and the previous s 55 offence is that the s 47 offence is broader, as it covers an intention that the complainant 'take part in a sexual act', whereas the s 55 offence only applied to an intention that the complainant would take part in an act of sexual penetration.

6. The offence also differs from the much earlier Crimes Act 1958 s 62 (as in force in 1975), which required that the taking away or detention be accomplished 'by force' (as discussed by Mason J in R v Storey (1978) 140 CLR 364).

Takes away or detains

7. The first element contains four possible forms of conduct:

    - The accused takes away the complainant personally
    - The accused detains the complainant personally
    - The accused causes the complainant to be taken away
    - The accused causes the complainant to be detained.

8. The accused 'takes away' the complainant when their acts are the effective cause of the complainant accompanying the accused to another place (R v Fetherston [2006] VSCA 278, [55]. See also R v Wellard [1978] 1 WLR 921).

9. While there must be some movement, there is no strict rule regarding how far the accused must take the complainant from the complainant's previous location. The sufficiency of the distance travelled is a jury question to be decided on the facts of the case (R v Wellard [1978] 1 WLR 921; Davis v The Queen [2006] NSWCCA 392, [33]. See, for a further example, R v Mathe [2003] VSCA 165, where dragging the complainant into a ditch beside a footpath was sufficient for an abduction).

10. The offence is complete at the point when the accused takes away or detains the complainant (or causes the complainant to be taken away or detained), provided the relevant lack of consent, knowledge and intention existed at that time (see R v Manwaring & Ors [1983] 2 NSWLR 82, 84).

Absence of consent

11. The second element is that the complainant did not consent to being taken away or detained.

12. Unlike the offence of kidnapping (see 7.4.20 Kidnapping (Statutory)), it is explicitly required that the taking away or the detention is without the complainant's consent.

13. As an offence in Subdivision (8A) of Division 1 of Part 1 of the Crimes Act 1958, the definition of consent in Crimes Act 1958 s 36 and the deemed non-consent circumstances in Crimes Act 1958 s 36AA may apply to this element (see Crimes Act 1958 s 35). While several of the provisions in ss 36 and 36AA are limited to consent to sexual acts, some of provisions are capable on their face of applying to non-sexual consent. In such cases, it will be a question of statutory interpretation for the trial judge to determine whether the general language used in s 35 must be read down so that consent, for the purpose of s 47, carries its ordinary meaning, or whether it carries the ss 36 and 36AA meaning.

Accused's knowledge of absence of consent

14. The third element is that the accused knew that the complainant did not consent, or probably did not consent, to being taken away or detained (Crimes Act 1958 s 47(1)(c)).

Purpose of accused

15. The fourth element concerns the intention of the accused at the time of the abduction or detention.

16. Section 47 (1)(d) provides two possible purposes of the accused for the abduction or detention:

    - That the complainant will take part in a sexual act with the accused, a third person or both; or
    - That the accused or a third person will marry the complainant.

17. Section 35C identifies that a person 'takes part in a sexual act' when the person is sexually penetrated or sexually touched. See 7.3.2 Rape (From 1/1/92) for information on the meaning of sexual penetration and 7.3.5 Sexual Assault for information on the meaning of sexual touching.

18. While it has not been authoritatively determined, it is likely that for the current form of s 47, the prosecution can bring a single charge identifying a number of possible people with whom the accused intended the complainant to take part in a sexual act with, even if that group of people includes the accused. This is consistent with the concluding words 'or both' in s 47(1)(d)(i) (compare R v Manwaring [1983] 2 NSWLR 82 per Street CJ and Miles J (Begg J contra)). However, the earlier version of the offence in Crimes Act 1958 s 55 contained discrete sections depending on whether it was intended that complainant take part in a sexual act with, or marry, the accused or a third party and did not contain the words 'or both'. For that version of the offence, it is likely that a charge could not allege an intention that the complainant take part in an act of sexual penetration with a mix of people which includes both the accused and third parties.

19. Section 47(1)(d)(ii) makes clear that the complainant's consent to marriage is not relevant, but there is no equivalent statement in relation to the accused's intent that the complainant take part in a sexual act. Despite this, it is suggested that there is no basis to read in an additional element that the complainant did not or would not consent to the intended sexual act. As a modern, carefully drafted provision with explicit attention to the physical and mental elements of the offence, it is suggested that if Parliament wanted to require the prosecution to prove something additional about the complainant's state of mind (that the complainant not only did not consent to the taking away or detention, but also the accused's ultimate purpose), it could have said so.

Last updated: 4 March 2024

7.3.8.1 Charge: Abduction for a Sexual Purpose

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Note: This charge has been written on the basis that:

1. The abduction is for a sexual purpose (and not for the purpose of marriage); and

2. The accused intends to personally take part in a sexual act with the complainant (as distinct from an intention that one or more third parties take part in a sexual act with the complainant).

The charge must be modified if the case involves different issues.

I must now direct you about the crime of abduction for a sexual purpose. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – The accused took another person away.

Two – The other person did not consent to being taken away.

Three – The accused knew the other person did not consent or probably did not consent to being taken away.

Four – The accused intended that the other person would take part in a sexual act with the accused.

I will now explain each element in more detail.[585]

Abduction

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused took another person away.

This requires the prosecution to prove that NOA took NOC away from where he was/she was/they were to some other place.

[If NOA only took NOC a short distance, add the following shaded section.]

The law does not set a minimum distance that must be travelled before this element may be met. It is a matter for you to decide whether NOA took NOC far enough from where NOC wished to be that you can say the accused took NOC away.

[Summarise evidence and/or arguments.]

Absence of consent

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant did not consent to being taken away.

Consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free and voluntary agreement. For this element the prosecution must prove that NOC did not freely and voluntarily agree to being taken away by NOA at the time.

[Where a party requests a direction about the meaning of consent, add one or more of the following shaded paragraphs.]

The law says that a person can consent to something only if they are capable of consenting, and free to choose whether or not to engage in or to allow that act.

The law says that where a person has given their consent to something, they may withdraw that consent before that act happens, or while it is happening.

[Where a party requests a direction about the circumstances in which a person is taken not to have consented, add the following shaded section.[586]]

In some circumstances the law says that the complainant did not freely agree, or consent, to being taken away. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person does not say or do anything to indicate consent to being taken away;

(b) the person submits to being taken away because of force, a fear of force, harm of any type or a fear of harm of any type, whether to that person or someone else or to an animal, regardless of—

---

[585] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[586] Note: The circumstances specified below only apply to offences alleged to have been committed on or after 30 June 2023. For offences before that date, see the relevant provisions in the Crimes Act 1958 on deemed non-consent.

(i) when the force, harm or conduct giving rise to the fear occurs; and

(ii) whether it is, or is a result of, a single incident or is part of an ongoing pattern;

(c) the person submits to being taken away because of coercion or intimidation—

(i) regardless of when the coercion or intimidation occurs; and

(ii) whether it is, or is a result of, a single incident or is part of an ongoing pattern;

(d) the person submits to being taken away because the person is unlawfully detained;

(e) the person submits to being taken away because the person is overborne by the abuse of a relationship of authority or trust;

(f) the person is asleep or unconscious;

(g) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of consenting to being taken away;

(h) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of withdrawing consent to being taken away;

...

(k) the person is mistaken about the identity of any other person involved in the act;

(l) the person mistakenly believes they are being taken away for medical or hygienic purposes;

...

(p) having given consent to being taken away, the person later withdraws consent to being taken away or continuing to be taken away, and the accused does not stop taking the person away.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that he was/she was/they were not consenting.

However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting to being taken away, then this element will be proven.

[Summarise evidence and/or arguments.]

Knowledge of non-consent

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused knew that the other person did not consent to being taken away or probably did not consent to being taken away.

This requires you to draw a conclusion about NOA's state of mind. You can look at the circumstances of the alleged acts, and what NOA and NOC said and did at the time.

[Summarise evidence and/or arguments.]

Intention to take part in a sexual act

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intended that the complainant would take part in a sexual act with the accused.

This requires the prosecution to prove that the accused intended that NOC would be sexually penetrated or be sexually touched by the accused, or would sexually penetrate or sexually touch the accused.

In this case, the prosecution argues that NOA intended that NOC would [identify relevant act].

I direct you as a matter of law that this is a sexual act for the purpose of the law. If you are satisfied that NOA intended that NOC would [identify relevant act], then you may find this element proved.

[Summarise evidence and/or arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of detention for a sexual purpose the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA took NOC away.

Two – That NOC did not consent to being taken away.

Three – That NOA knew NOC did not consent or probably did not consent to being taken away.

Four – That NOA intended that NOC would take part in a sexual act with the accused.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of abduction for a sexual purpose.

Last updated: 4 March 2024

7.3.8.2 Charge: Detention for a Sexual Purpose

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Note: This charge has been written on the basis that:

1. The detention is for a sexual purpose (and not for the purpose of marriage); and

2. The accused intends to personally take part in a sexual act with the complainant (as distinct from an intention that one or more third parties take part in a sexual act with the complainant).

The charge must be modified if the case involves different issues.

I must now direct you about the crime of detention for a sexual purpose. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – The accused detained another person.

Two – The other person did not consent to being detained.

Three – The accused knew the other person did not consent or probably did not consent to being detained.

Four – The accused intended that the other person would take part in a sexual act with the accused.

I will now explain each element in more detail.[587]

Detention

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused detained another person.

This requires the prosecution to prove that NOA prevented NOC from freely moving from one place to another.

[If it is alleged that the complainant was deprived of his/her liberty by non-physical means, add the following shaded section.]

NOA does not need to have physically prevented NOC from moving. A person can be detained by [insert relevant example, e.g. "threats or other intimidating conduct"].

[If the reasonableness of any means of escape are in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In deciding whether NOA detained NOC, you must consider whether NOC had a reasonable means of escape. A person who has a reasonable means of escape is not detained.

To determine whether a means of escape was reasonable, you must consider [describe factors relevant to the reasonableness of escape, including risks to the victim, risks to property, distance and time required to escape and the legality of the means of escape].

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC had no reasonable means of escape. If they are unable to do so, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

[Summarise evidence and/or arguments.]

Absence of consent

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant did not consent to being detained.

Consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free and voluntary agreement. For this element the prosecution must prove that NOC did not freely and voluntarily agree to being detained by NOA at the time.

[Where a party requests a direction about the meaning of consent, add one or more of the following shaded paragraphs.]

The law says that a person can consent to something only if they are capable of consenting, and free to choose whether or not to engage in or to allow that act.

The law says that where a person has given their consent to something, they may withdraw that consent before that act happens, or while it is happening.

---

[587] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[Where a party requests a direction about the circumstances in which a person is taken not to have consented, add the following shaded section.[588]]

In some circumstances the law says that the complainant did not freely agree, or consent, to being detained. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person does not say or do anything to indicate consent to being detained;

(b) the person submits to being detained because of force, a fear of force, harm of any type or a fear of harm of any type, whether to that person or someone else or to an animal, regardless of—

(i) when the force, harm or conduct giving rise to the fear occurs; and

(ii) whether it is, or is a result of, a single incident or is part of an ongoing pattern;

(c) the person submits to being detained because of coercion or intimidation—

(i) regardless of when the coercion or intimidation occurs; and

(ii) whether it is, or is a result of, a single incident or is part of an ongoing pattern;

…

(e) the person submits to being detained because the person is overborne by the abuse of a relationship of authority or trust;

(f) the person is asleep or unconscious;

(g) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of consenting to being detained;

(h) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of withdrawing consent to being detained;

…

(k) the person is mistaken about the identity of any other person involved in the act;

(l) the person mistakenly believes they are being detained for medical or hygienic purposes;

…

(p) having given consent to being detained, the person later withdraws consent to being detained or continuing to be detained.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that he was/she was/they were not consenting.

However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting to being detained, then this element will be proven.

---

[588] Note: The circumstances specified below only apply to offences alleged to have been committed on or after 30 June 2023. For offences before that date, see the relevant provisions in the Crimes Act 1958 on deemed non-consent.

In this case, [insert evidence and competing arguments relevant to proof that the complainant was not consenting].

[Summarise evidence and/or arguments.]

Knowledge of non-consent

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused knew that the other person did not consent to being detained or probably did not consent to being detained.

This requires you to draw a conclusion about NOA's state of mind. You can look at the circumstances of the alleged detention, and what NOA and NOC said and did at the time.

[Summarise evidence and/or arguments.]

Intention to take part in a sexual act

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intended that the complainant would take part in a sexual act with the accused.

This requires the prosecution to prove that the accused intended that NOC would be sexually penetrated or be sexually touched by the accused, or would sexually penetrate or sexually touch the accused.

In this case, the prosecution argues that NOA intended that NOC would [identify relevant act].

I direct you as a matter of law that this is a sexual act for the purpose of the law. If you are satisfied that NOA intended that NOC would [identify relevant act], then you may find this element proved.

[Summarise evidence and/or arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of detention for a sexual purpose the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA detained NOC.

Two – That NOC did not consent to being detained.

Three – That NOA knew NOC did not consent or probably did not consent to being detained.

Four – That NOA intended that NOC would take part in a sexual act with the accused.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of detention for a sexual purpose.

Last updated: 4 March 2024

7.3.9 Incest (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Operational period

1. The current incest offences in Crimes Act 1958 sections 50C–50F came into force on 1 July 2017, replacing the former incest offences previously in s 44. For information on incest committed between 5 August 1991 and 30 June 2017, see 7.3.10 Incest (Pre-1/7/17).

Overview

2. Subdivision (8C) of the Crimes Act 1958 contains four separate incest offences depending on the relationship between the accused and the complainant. These are:
    - Sexual penetration of a child or lineal descendant (s 50C);
    - Sexual penetration of a step-child (s 50D);
    - Sexual penetration of a parent, lineal ancestor or step-parent (s 50E);
    - Sexual penetration of a sibling or half-sibling (s 50F).
3. This topic first discusses matters common to each offence, and then examines any details particular to individual offences.

Elements

4. All incest offences involve the following three elements:

    i) The accused intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant or intentionally caused or allowed the complainant to sexually penetrate the accused;

    ii) The accused and the complainant are in the prescribed family relationship;

    iii) The accused knew about that relationship (Crimes Act 1958 ss 50C, 50D, 50E, 50F).

5. The offence of sexual penetration of a parent, lineal ancestor or step-parent (s 50E) contains an additional element that the accused is 18 years or over.

Intentional sexual penetration

6. "Sexual penetration" is defined in s 35A of the Crimes Act 1958. See 7.3.2 Rape (From 1/1/92) for information about this definition.
7. The definition of the incest offences covers both the situation where the accused intentionally sexually penetrates the complainant and where the accused intentionally causes or allows the complainant to sexually penetrate the accused.
8. Intention is a fundamental element of the offence. The prosecution must show that the sexual penetration was intentional, in the sense that it was willed and consciously performed (R v MG (2010) 29 VR 305, [21]; R v AJS (2005) 12 VR 563, [25]).
9. While intention will often not be in issue, it is of paramount importance to direct the jury about this element when it is in issue (R v AJS (2005) 12 VR 563, [25]).
10. Due to the nature of the element, it will often be difficult to separate issues of intention and voluntariness.
11. Where the question of voluntariness is in issue (e.g. where the accused alleges that he or she was asleep at the time the act was performed), the jury should also be instructed that the act of penetration must have been conscious, voluntary and deliberate (R v MG (2010) 29 VR 305). See 7.1.1 Voluntariness for further information.

Prescribed family members

12. The four family relationships prescribed by Subdivision (8C) are:

    i) The children or lineal descendants of the accused (s 50C);

    ii) The children or lineal descendants of the accused's spouse or domestic partner (s 50D);

iii) The parents, lineal ancestors or step-parents of the accused (s 50E);

iv) The siblings or half-siblings of the accused (s 50F).

13. Adopted children are deemed to be the children of both their natural parents and their adoptive parents for the purposes of Subdivision (8C) (s 50A; Adoption Act 1984 s 53(2)).

14. Section 50A of the Crimes Act 1958 provides definitions of the following terms:

- Child, being a child by birth, genetic child, by adoption or due to the Status of Children Act 1974;
- Half-sibling, being a person who shares a common parent;
- Lineal ancestor, being a lineal ancestor of the person's parent (e.g. grandparent or beyond);
- Lineal descendant, being a lineal descendant of the person's child (e.g. grandchild or beyond);
- Parent, being a parent by birth, genetic parent, parent by adoption or parent due to the Status of Children Act 1974;
- Sibling, being a person who has the same parents as the person;
- Step-parent, being the spouse or domestic partner of A's parent, where that person is not A's parent.

15. Section 35 of the Act defines 'domestic partner' as

(a) a person who is in a registered domestic relationship with the person; or

(b) a person to whom the person is not married but with whom the person is living as a couple on a genuine domestic basis (irrespective of gender or gender identity)".

16. Crimes Act 1958 s 35 also states:

> In determining whether persons who are not in a registered domestic relationship are domestic partners of each other, all the circumstances of their relationship are to be taken into account, including any one or more of the matters referred to in section 35(2) of the Relationships Act 2008 as may be relevant in a particular case.

17. Relationships Act 2008 s 35(2) lists eight circumstances which may be taken into account to determine whether there is a domestic relationship:

(a) the degree of mutual commitment to a shared life;

(b) the duration of the relationship;

(c) the nature and extent of common residence;

(d) whether or not a sexual relationship exists;

(e) the degree of financial dependence or interdependence, and any arrangements for financial support, between the parties;

(f) the ownership, use and acquisition of property;

(g) the care and support of children;

(h) the reputation and public aspects of the relationship.

18. The Act provides a rebuttable presumption that people who are reputed to be related to each other in a particular way are in fact related in that way (Crimes Act 1958 s 50B).

19. Prior to the commencement of s 50D (Sexual penetration of a step-chlid), the previous equivalent offence applied to the children, step-children and lineal descendants of the accused's "de facto spouse" (see Crimes Act 1958 s 44(2), as in force before 1 July 2017). "De facto spouse" was defined as > a person who is living with a person of the opposite sex as if they were married although they are not (Crimes Act 1958 s 35, repealed 1 July 2017).

20. When assessing whether there was a de facto relationship, the jury was told to consider whether the accused exercises any parental responsibility for the children of the alleged de–facto spouse, including:

> (a) the role played, and responsibility assumed, by the accused with respect to the child(ren);
> (b) the authority exercised by the accused over the child(ren); and/or
> (c) the view which the child(ren) and the accused respectively had of the nature of the relationship between them (Sutton v R (2015) 47 VR 496, [36]).

21. However, under the previous provisions, it was generally undesirable for judges to expand on the statutory definition of "de–facto spouse" as the statutory definition called for the jury to apply its common sense and experience to evaluate the relationship of the parties and compare it to their understanding of marriage relationships. This allowed the jury to accommodate varied and even conflicting concepts of marriage–like relationships. Providing a list of factors relevant to assessing whether the relationship is marriage–like was thought to risk impermissibly interfering with the jury's assessment of what makes a relationship marriage–like (Sutton v R (2015) 47 VR 496, [53]. See also King v R (2011) 34 VR 106, [2]–[9] (Neave JA)).

22. The factors listed in Relationships Act 2008 s 35(2) closely resemble the factors identified by Powell J in D v McA (1986) 11 Fam LR 214 as indicia of a de facto relationship. In R v King (2011) 34 VR 106, [30], Bongiorno JA observed in relation to the former incest offences that, depending on the issues, some of the D v McA factors may be of greater or lesser importance. In contrast, Neave JA stated that directions would be over-complicated if judges routinely had to refer to all of the D v McA factors. Later, in Sutton v R (2015) 47 VR 496, [34]–[37], Maxwell P and Redlich JA observed that evidence about the relationship between the accused and the partner's children will likely to carry more weight relative to other factors than it would in statutory regimes concerned with distribution of property.

23. In cases where the jury must determine whether two people were in a domestic relationship, judges should seek submissions on what directions are necessary in relation to the definition of domestic relationship in Crimes Act 1958 s 35. Parties should identify whether all the Relationship Act 2008 s 35(2) considerations are relevant, or whether the selection of factors depends on the fact that the question arises in the context of a prosecution for incest. If the selection of factors is limited, then, consistent with R v King, and Sutton v R, the jury will likely need to focus on the degree of mutual commitment to a shared life (s 35(2)(a)), the duration of the relationship (s 35(2)(b)) and the care and support of children (s 35(2)(g)).

Knowledge of the family relationship

24. The third common element is that the accused knows that they are related to the complainant in the way alleged (Crimes Act 1958 ss 50C, 50D, 50E, 50F).

25. The accused is presumed to know that they are related to the other person in the way alleged. This presumption can be rebutted by evidence to the contrary (Crimes Act 1958 s 50B).

26. However, there must be evidence of the particular prescribed relationship before the presumption in s 50B can be engaged. Evidence of a reputed relationship with one person which provides a basis for inferring another relationship may not be sufficient. For example, in R v Umanski [1961] VR 242 at 249, the Court held that admissions by A and B that they were married (and evidence from other witnesses that A and B were reputed to be married) were not sufficient to establish that A's daughter, C, was reputed to be B's step-daughter.

Additional element – Incest against a parent, lineal ancestor or step-parent

27. For alleged offences against s 50E (incest against a parent, lineal ancestor or step-parent) there is an additional element. The prosecution must prove that the accused was 18 years of age or more (Crimes Act 1958 s 50E(1)(b)).

Marriage

28. Where it is necessary to prove that particular parties were married, there must be strict proof of the marriage. It is not sufficient to rely solely on admissions of the accused as to the marriage, or on evidence of co-habitation (R v Umanski [1961] VR 242).

Defences

Medical or hygienic purposes

29. For all incest offences, the accused does not commit the offence if the accused's conduct occurs in the course of a procedure carried out in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes (Crimes Act 1958 s 50G).

Non consent of accused

30. For all incest offences, the accused does not commit the offence if he or she did not consent to the conduct constituting the offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 50H).

31. Where this issue is raised on the evidence, the prosecution bears the onus of rebutting the defence.

32. This defence of consent replaces the previous defence of 'compulsion' (see Crimes Act 1958 s 44(6) and (6A) as in force before 1 July 2017).

Exception for alleged incest against a step-child

33. In proceedings for a charge against s 50D (incest against a step-child), the accused does not commit the offence if at the time of the alleged offence:

    i) The complainant is 18 years of age or more;

    ii) The accused did not engage in sexual activity with the complainant when the complainant was under 18 years of age; and

    iii) The complainant has not at any time been under the accused's care, supervision or authority (Crimes Act 1958 s 50I).

34. The term 'care, supervision or authority' is defined in Crimes Act 1958 s 37. For information on this phrase, see 7.3.14 Sexual Penetration of a 16 or 17 Year Old Child (From 1/7/17).

35. Where this issue is raised on the evidence, the prosecution bears the onus of rebutting the defence.

Exceptions for alleged incest against parent, lineal ancestor or step-parent

36. In proceedings for a charge against s 50E (incest against a parent, lineal ancestor or step-parent), the accused does not commit the offence if at the time of the alleged offence:

    i) The complainant is the accused's step-parent; and

    ii) The accused has not at any time been under the complainant's care, supervision or authority (Crimes Act 1958 s 50J(1)).

37. The Crimes Act 1958 also provides that s 50E does not apply if the complainant had engaged in sexual activity with the accused when the accused was under 18 years of age (Crimes Act 1958 s 50J(2)).

38. The effect of s 50J(2) is that continued sexual activity between a child and a parent, lineal ancestor or step-parent before and after the child turns 18 is not an offence by the child.

Consent of complainant not a defence

39. Consent of the complainant is not a defence to a charge of incest (s 50K).

Other Relevant Matters

40. Depending on the circumstances of the case, the trial judge may need to consider the following issues in relation to incest cases:

    - Indemnities;
    - Criminally concerned witness warnings (but see R v Ware (10/3/1994 SC Vic), in which Coldrey J held, after a review of the authorities, that it was not appropriate to class a complainant as an accomplice in an incest case);
    - Possible exemptions from being compelled to give evidence in a case involving certain family members (Evidence Act 2008 s 18);
    - The privilege against self-incrimination.

41. In proceedings for a charge of incest, it is not appropriate for the prosecutor, the judge or a witness to describe the conduct as "rape". While it may not be practical to prevent a witness from using that term, the prosecutor and the judge should not adopt the same practice. Where a witness has used the term "rape" to describe sexual penetration, the judge should make clear to the jury that the term has been used inaccurately, that the charge is one of incest, not rape and that the jury should not be distracted by the use of that word (see Packard v R [2018] VSCA 45, [163]–[168] (Beach JA and Beale AJA), [108] (Priest JA)).

Last updated: 19 March 2018

7.3.9.1 Charge: Incest with Child or Lineal Descendant (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge concerns acts of sexual penetration involving the accused and his or her child or lineal descendant (s 50C).

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of incest. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused intentionally sexually penetrated NOC.[589]

Two – NOC is the accused's [insert relevant family relationship, e.g. son/daughter/grandson/granddaughter].

Three – the accused knew that NOC was [his/her] [insert relevant family relationship].

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Sexual penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant, NOC.

The prosecution seeks to prove this element by showing that NOA [describe relevant form of penetration, e.g. "put his finger into NOC's anus"]. I direct you as a matter of law that if you find that NOA did this, then the prosecution has proved this first element.

[If relevant add:

- [Identify item or body part and actor] does not need to have gone all the way into NOC's [vagina/anus/mouth]. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation].

[589] If the charge involves the accused causing or allowing the complainant to sexually penetrate the accused, these directions must be modified accordingly.

[If the evidence or arguments have placed the intentional or voluntary nature of the acts in issue, add the following shaded section.[590]]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant act of penetration, e.g. "introducing his finger into NOC's anus"] must have been done intentionally.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves intention in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that NOA introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of NOC's vagina.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

However, according to the law, the introduction of an object or body part into a person's [vagina/anus] does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in the course of a procedure carried out in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in the course of a procedure carried out in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

In this case [insert evidence and arguments relevant to proof of this element].

Relationship to the other participant

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that NOC is the accused's [insert relevant family relationship].

This matter is not in dispute and so you should have no difficulty finding that NOC is NOA's [insert family relationship].[591]

Knowledge of relationship

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused knew that NOC was [his/her] [insert relevant family relationship].

It has not been disputed that NOA knew that NOC was [his/her] [insert relevant relationship]. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proved.[592]

---

[590] Because of how the offence is defined, the issue of intention is likely inseparable from the question of voluntariness. Where the issue is raised, the judge should direct the jury on the specific matters the jury must consider to find that the accused's conduct was voluntary and intentional (e.g. disproof of accident or proof that the accused was conscious).

[591] If the relationship between the accused and NOC has been disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[592] If the accused's knowledge of their relationship to the other party has been disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

Defences

Non-consent of accused

[If the accused relies on the non-consent defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 50H, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, there is an additional matter the prosecution must prove before you can find NOA guilty of incest.

The prosecution must prove that the accused consented to the sexual penetration. That is, the prosecution must show that NOA freely agreed to [identify relevant conduct].

[If the evidence raises the possibility that one of the circumstances listed in Crimes Act 1958 s 36(2) exists, add the following darker shaded section.]

In order to show that NOA freely agreed to sexually penetrate NOC, the prosecution must also show that NOA:

[Insert the following statements as appropriate:

(a) Did not submit to the act because of force or fear of force, whether to NOA or to someone else;

(b) Did not submit to the act because of fear of harm of any type, whether to NOA or someone else or an animal;

(c) Did not submit to the act because NOA was unlawfully detained;

(d) Was not asleep or unconscious;

(e) Was not so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of consenting to the act;

(f) Was not so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of withdrawing consent to the act;

(g) Was capable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(h) Was not mistaken about the sexual nature of the act;

(i) Was not mistaken about the identity of any other person involved in the act;

(j) Did not mistakenly believe that the act was for medical or hygienic purposes;

(k) Said or did something to indicate consent; and

(l) Having given consent to the act, did not later withdraw consent to the act taking place or continuing.

Remember though that even if you accept that [refer to relevant s 36(2) circumstance, e.g. "NOA was not asleep or unconscious"], you must still decide whether the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA consented to the sexual penetration alleged. Finding that [refer to relevant s 36(2) circumstance as described above] only removes one barrier to finding that NOA consented.

[Refer to relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments].

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of incest, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

- One – that NOA intentionally sexually penetrated NOC; and

- Two – that NOC is NOA's [insert family relationship]; and
- Three – that NOA knew that NOC was [his/her] [insert family relationship].

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of Incest.

Last updated: 19 March 2018

7.3.9.2 Charge: Incest with Step-Child (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge concerns acts of sexual penetration involving the accused and the step-child or lineal descendants of the accused's spouse or domestic partner (s 50D).

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of incest. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused intentionally sexually penetrated NOC.[593]

Two – NOC is a [child/lineal descendant] of NOA's [spouse/domestic partner].

Three – NOA knew that NOC was a [child/lineal descendant] of [his/her] [spouse/domestic partner].

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Sexual penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant, NOC.

The prosecution seeks to prove this element by showing that NOA [describe relevant form of penetration, e.g. "put his finger into NOC's anus"]. I direct you as a matter of law that if you find that NOA did this, then the prosecution has proved this first element.

[If relevant add:

- [Identify item or body part and actor] does not need to have gone all the way into NOC's [vagina/anus/mouth]. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation].

[593] If the charge involves the accused causing or allowing the complainant to sexually penetrate the accused, these directions must be modified accordingly.

[If the evidence or arguments have placed the intentional or voluntary nature of the acts in issue, add the following shaded section.[594]]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant act of penetration, e.g. "introducing his finger into NOC's anus"] must have been done intentionally.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves intention in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that NOA introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of NOC's vagina.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

However, according to the law, the introduction of an object or body part into a person's [vagina/anus] does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in the course of a procedure carried out in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in the course of a procedure carried out in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

In this case [insert evidence and arguments relevant to proof of this element].

Relationship to the other participant

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that NOC is the [child/lineal descendant] of NOA's [spouse/domestic partner].

[If the parties are married or in a registered domestic relationship, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that two people are [spouses/domestic partners] if they are [married/in a registered domestic relationship]. You have heard evidence that [identify relevant evidence]. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proved.

[If the jury must determine whether NOA is the domestic partner of the child's parent or ancestor, add the following shaded section.]

[Warning! The law on the relevance of the factors (a) to (h) below is uncertain. Judges should seek submissions on which factors are relevant. See Incest (From 1/7/17) for guidance.]

For this element, you must determine whether NOP[595] and NOA are domestic partners. The law says that two people are domestic partners when they are not married but are living together as a couple on a genuine domestic basis [if relevant, add: regardless of gender or gender identity].

---

[594] Because of how the offence is defined, the issue of intention is likely inseparable from the question of voluntariness. Where the issue is raised, the judge should direct the jury on the specific matters the jury must consider to find that the accused's conduct was voluntary and intentional (e.g. disproof of accident or proof that the accused was conscious).

[595] Name of the complainant's parent or lineal ancestor.

To determine whether two people are domestic partners, you must look at all the circumstances of their relationship. These include [add the following as relevant in the context of the case:

(a) the degree of mutual commitment to a shared life;

(b) the duration of the relationship;

(c) the nature and extent of common residence;

(d) whether or not a sexual relationship exists;

(e) the degree of financial dependence or interdependence, and any arrangements for financial support, between the parties;

(f) the ownership, use and acquisition of property;

(g) the care and support of children;

(h) the reputation and public aspects of the relationship.]

The prosecution argues that [refer to relevant prosecution evidence and arguments]. The defence dispute this, saying [refer to relevant evidence and arguments].

Knowledge of relationship

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused knew that NOC was a [child/lineal descendant] of [his/her] [spouse/domestic partner].

[If the prosecution argues that NOA is married or in a registered domestic relationship, add the following shaded section.]

It has not been disputed that NOA knew that NOC was a [child/lineal descendant] of [his/her] [spouse/domestic partner]. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proved.[596]

[If the prosecution argues that NOA is in an unregistered domestic relationship, add the following shaded section.]

[Warning! The operation of this element is uncertain. Judges should seek submissions from the parties]

As you are aware, in this case the prosecution says that NOA and NOP were in an unregistered domestic relationship.

To prove this element, the prosecution must therefore prove that NOA knew that NOC was a [child/lineal descendant] of NOP and must know the facts that gave rise to NOA and NOP being in an unregistered domestic relationship.

You are not looking at whether NOA thought that NOP was [his/her] domestic partner. Your focus must be on whether NOA knew or was aware of the objective factors which meant that [s/he] and NOP were domestic partners. That is, did NOA know, or was NOA aware, of the factors which an outside observer would use to conclude that [s/he] and NOP were living together as a couple on a genuine domestic basis?

[596] If the accused's knowledge of their relationship to the other party has been disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Defences

Non-consent of accused

[If the accused relies on the non-consent defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 50H, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, there is an additional matter the prosecution must prove before you can find NOA guilty of incest.

The prosecution must prove that the accused consented to the sexual penetration. That is, the prosecution must show that NOA freely agreed to [identify relevant conduct].

[If the evidence raises the possibility that one of the circumstances listed in Crimes Act 1958 s 36(2) exists, add the following darker shaded section.]

In order to show that NOA freely agreed to sexually penetrate NOC, the prosecution must also show that NOA:

[Insert the following statements as appropriate:

(a) Did not submit to the act because of force or fear of force, whether to NOA or to someone else;

(b) Did not submit to the act because of fear of harm of any type, whether to NOA or someone else or an animal;

(c) Did not submit to the act because NOA was unlawfully detained;

(d) Was not asleep or unconscious;

(e) Was not so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of consenting to the act;

(f) Was not so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of withdrawing consent to the act;

(g) Was capable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(h) Was not mistaken about the sexual nature of the act;

(i) Was not mistaken about the identity of any other person involved in the act;

(j) Did not mistakenly believe that the act was for medical or hygienic purposes;

(k) Said or did something to indicate consent; and

(l) Having given consent to the act, did not later withdraw consent to the act taking place or continuing.

Remember though that even if you accept that [refer to relevant s 36(2) circumstance, e.g. NOA was not asleep or unconscious], you must still decide whether the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA consented to the sexual penetration alleged. Finding that [refer to relevant s 36(2) circumstance as described above] only removes one barrier to finding that NOA consented.

[Refer to relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments].

No history of care, supervision or authority

[If the accused relies on the defence under Crimes Act 1958 s 50I, add the following shaded section.]

For this offence, the law recognises a defence. There are three parts to this defence.

First, NOC was aged 18 years or more at the time of the relevant acts. There is no dispute about this.

Second, NOA must not have engaged in sexual activity with NOC when NOC was under 18 years of age. The prosecution disputes this.

Third, NOC must not, at any time, have been under NOA's care, supervision or authority. The prosecution also disputes this.

As I told you at the start of the trial, the prosecution must prove the accused's guilt. This means the prosecution must prove that the defence does not apply. In other words, the prosecution must either prove that NOA engaged in sexual activity with NOC when NOC was under 18 years of age or the prosecution must prove that at some time NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments regarding possible sexual activity between NOC and NOA before NOC turned 18 years of age.]

[If care, supervision or authority is in issue and the prosecution relies on a prescribed relationship, add the following darker shaded section.]

Parliament has defined a number of relationships where a child is deemed to be under the care, supervision and authority of another person. This includes [name relevant relationships from s 37 list].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA had been NOC's [describe relationship]. [Insert prosecution evidence.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

If you find beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had been NOC's [identify relationship] [identify relevant time], the prosecution has proved this defence does not apply. If the prosecution has also proved the three elements of the offence, then you may find NOA guilty of the charge of incest.

[If care, supervision or authority is in issue and the prosecution does not rely on a prescribed relationship, add the following darker shaded section.]

The words "care, supervision or authority" all describe different types of relationships where one person is in a position to exploit or take advantage of that relationship to influence a child to engage in an act of sexual penetration. You should take this into account when deciding whether the prosecution has proved that NOC was ever under NOA's care, supervision or authority.

The relationship of care, supervision or authority does not have to be a formal one. There does not, for example, have to have been a formal agreement that NOA would take care of NOC. An informal relationship of care, supervision or authority is sufficient.

[If relevant, add: You do not need to find that the alleged act of penetration was actually connected with, or influenced by, the relationship of care, supervision or authority. It is sufficient if you are satisfied that at some time, NOC had been under NOA's care, supervision or authority.]

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOC had been under NOA's [care/supervision/authority]. [Insert prosecution evidence.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC had been under NOA's care, supervision or authority at a time before the alleged offence. Unless the prosecution has proved that NOC had been under NOA's care, supervision or authority at an earlier time, you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

[If the accused may be unaware of the facts giving rise to a relationship of care, supervision or authority, add the following darker shaded section.[597]]

The law states that NOA must know and be aware of the facts that gave rise to a relationship of care, supervision or authority. For example, if NOA did not recognise that NOC had been his/her [describe relevant relationship], then the prosecution could not prove the defence does not apply. In other words, the prosecution could not prove NOA's guilt.

[Insert relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of incest, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

- One – that NOA intentionally sexually penetrated NOC; and
- Two – that NOC is a [child/lineal descendant] of NOA's [spouse/domestic partner]; and
- Three – that NOA knew that NOC was a [child/lineal descendant] of [his/her] [spouse/domestic partner].

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of Incest.

Last updated: 19 March 2018

7.3.9.3 Charge: Incest with Sibling or Half-Sibling (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge concerns acts of sexual penetration involving the accused and the accused's sibling or step-sibling (s 50F).

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of incest. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused intentionally sexually penetrated NOC.[598]

Two – NOC is NOA's [brother/sister/half-brother/half-sister].

Three – NOA knew that NOC was [his/her] [brother/sister/half-brother/half-sister].

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

---

[597] Warning! Judges should seek submissions from parties as to whether this direction is required, as it is adapted from caselaw developed in a different context.

[598] If the charge involves the accused causing or allowing the complainant to sexually penetrate the accused, these directions must be modified accordingly.

Sexual penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant, NOC.

The prosecution seeks to prove this element by showing that NOA [describe relevant form of penetration, e.g. "put his finger into NOC's anus"]. I direct you as a matter of law that if you find that NOA did this, then the prosecution has proved this first element.

[If relevant add:

- [Identify item or body part and actor] does not need to have gone all the way into NOC's [vagina/anus/mouth]. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation].

[If the evidence or arguments have placed the intentional or voluntary nature of the acts in issue, add the following shaded section.[599]]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant act of penetration, e.g. "introducing his finger into NOC's anus"] must have been done intentionally.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves intention in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that NOA introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of NOC's vagina.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

However, according to the law, the introduction of an object or body part into a person's [vagina/anus] does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in the course of a procedure carried out in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in the course of a procedure carried out in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

In this case [insert evidence and arguments relevant to proof of this element].

---

[599] Because of how the offence is defined, the issue of intention is likely inseparable from the question of voluntariness. Where the issue is raised, the judge should direct the jury on the specific matters the jury must consider to find that the accused's conduct was voluntary and intentional (e.g. disproof of accident or proof that the accused was conscious).

Relationship to the other participant

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that NOC is NOA's [brother/sister/half-brother/half-sister].

This matter is not in dispute and so you should have no difficulty finding that NOC is NOA's [insert family relationship].[600]

Knowledge of relationship

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused knew that NOC was [his/her] [brother/sister/half-brother/half-sister].

It has not been disputed that NOA knew that NOC was [his/her] [insert relevant relationship]. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proved.[601]

Defences

Non-consent of accused

[If the accused relies on the non-consent defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 50H, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, there is an additional matter the prosecution must prove before you can find NOA guilty of incest.

The prosecution must prove that the accused consented to the sexual penetration. That is, the prosecution must show that NOA freely agreed to [identify relevant conduct].

[If the evidence raises the possibility that one of the circumstances listed in Crimes Act 1958 s 36(2) exists, add the following darker shaded section.]

In order to show that NOA freely agreed to sexually penetrate NOC, the prosecution must also show that NOA:

[Insert the following statements as appropriate:

(a) Did not submit to the act because of force or fear of force, whether to NOA or to someone else;

(b) Did not submit to the act because of fear of harm of any type, whether to NOA or someone else or an animal;

(c) Did not submit to the act because NOA was unlawfully detained;

(d) Was not asleep or unconscious;

(e) Was not so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of consenting to the act;

(f) Was not so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of withdrawing consent to the act;

---

[600] If the relationship between the accused and NOC has been disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[601] If the accused's knowledge of their relationship to the other party has been disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

(g) Was capable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(h) Was not mistaken about the sexual nature of the act;

(i) Was not mistaken about the identity of any other person involved in the act;

(j) Did not mistakenly believe that the act was for medical or hygienic purposes;

(k) Said or did something to indicate consent; and

(l) Having given consent to the act, did not later withdraw consent to the act taking place or continuing.

Remember though that even if you accept that [refer to relevant s 36(2) circumstance, e.g. NOA was not asleep or unconscious], you must still decide whether the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA consented to the sexual penetration alleged. Finding that [refer to relevant s 36(2) circumstance as described above] only removes one barrier to finding that NOA consented.

[Refer to relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments].

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of incest, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

- One – that NOA intentionally sexually penetrated NOC; and
- Two – that NOC is NOA's [brother/sister/half-brother/half-sister]; and
- Three – that NOA knew that NOC was [his/her] [brother/sister/half-brother/half-sister].

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of Incest.

Last updated: 19 March 2018

7.3.9.4 Checklist: Incest with Child, Lineal Descendant, Step-Child or Sibling (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1.The accused intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant;[602] and

2.The complainant is the [insert relevant family relationship] of the accused; and

3.The accused knew that the complainant was [his/her] [insert relevant family relationship].

Accused's Acts

1. Did the accused intentionally sexually penetrate the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Incest

[602] If the charge involves the accused causing or allowing the complaint to sexually penetrate the accused, the checklist must be modified accordingly.

Relationship between the Accused and the Complainant

2. Is the complainant the [insert relevant family relationship] of the accused?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Incest

Knowledge of the Accused

3. Did the accused know that the complainant was [his/her] [insert relevant family relationship]?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Incest (as long as you have also answered yes to questions 1 and 2)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Incest

7.3.9.5 Charge: Incest with Parent, Lineal Ancestor or Step-Parent (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge concerns acts of sexual penetration involving the accused and the accused's father, mother, step-father, step-mother or lineal ancestor (s 50E).

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of incest. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused intentionally sexually penetrated NOC.[603]

Two – NOC is the accused's [insert relevant family relationship, i.e. "father", "mother", "step-father", "step-mother", "grandfather" or "grandmother"].

Three – the accused knew that NOC was [his/her] [insert relevant family relationship].

Four – the accused was aged 18 or older at the time of sexual penetration.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Sexual penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant, NOC.

The prosecution seeks to prove this element by showing that NOA [describe relevant form of penetration, e.g. "put his finger into NOC's anus"]. I direct you as a matter of law that if you find that NOA did this, then the prosecution has proved this first element.

[If relevant add:

[603] If the charge involves the accused causing or allowing the complainant to sexually penetrate the accused, these directions must be modified accordingly.

- [Identify item or body part and actor] does not need to have gone all the way into NOC's [vagina/anus/mouth]. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation].

[If the evidence or arguments have placed the intentional or voluntary nature of the acts in issue, add the following shaded section.[604]]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant act of penetration, e.g. "introducing his finger into NOC's anus"] must have been done intentionally.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves intention in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that NOA introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of NOC's vagina.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

However, according to the law, the introduction of an object or body part into a person's [vagina/anus] does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in the course of a procedure carried out in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in the course of a procedure carried out in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

In this case [insert evidence and arguments relevant to proof of this element].

Relationship to the other participant

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that NOC is the [insert relevant family relationship] of the accused.

This matter is not in dispute and so you should have no difficulty finding that NOC is NOA's [insert family relationship].[605]

---

[604] Because of how the offence is defined, the issue of intention is likely inseparable from the question of voluntariness. Where the issue is raised, the judge should direct the jury on the specific matters the jury must consider to find that the accused's conduct was voluntary and intentional (e.g. disproof of accident or proof that the accused was conscious).

[605] If the relationship between the accused and NOC has been disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

Knowledge of relationship

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused knew that NOC was [his/her] [insert relevant family relationship].

It has not been disputed that NOA knew that NOC was [his/her] [insert relevant relationship]. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proved.[606]

Age of the accused

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused was aged 18 or older at the time of the sexual penetration.

In this case, it has not been disputed that NOA was at least 18 years of age at the time the alleged act of sexual penetration took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[607]

Defences

Non-consent of accused

[If the accused relies on the non-consent defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 50H, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, there is an additional matter the prosecution must prove before you can find NOA guilty of incest.

The prosecution must prove that the accused consented to the sexual penetration. That is, the prosecution must show that NOA freely agreed to [identify relevant conduct].

[If the evidence raises the possibility that one of the circumstances listed in Crimes Act 1958 s 36(2) exists, add the following darker shaded section.]

In order to show that NOA freely agreed to sexually penetrate NOC, the prosecution must also show that NOA:

[Insert the following statements as appropriate:

(a) Did not submit to the act because of force or fear of force, whether to NOA or to someone else;

(b) Did not submit to the act because of fear of harm of any type, whether to NOA or someone else or an animal;

(c) Did not submit to the act because NOA was unlawfully detained;

(d) Was not asleep or unconscious;

(e) Was not so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of consenting to the act;

---

[606] If the accused's knowledge of their relationship to the other party has been disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly. If the defence raises evidence in rebuttal of the presumption in s 50B, it is for the prosecution to prove knowledge of the relationship beyond reasonable doubt. There is no onus of proof on the defence.

[607] If the accused's age has been disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

(f) Was not so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of withdrawing consent to the act;

(g) Was capable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(h) Was not mistaken about the sexual nature of the act;

(i) Was not mistaken about the identity of any other person involved in the act;

(j) Did not mistakenly believe that the act was for medical or hygienic purposes;

(k) Said or did something to indicate consent; and

(l) Having given consent to the act, did not later withdraw consent to the act taking place or continuing.

Remember though that even if you accept that [refer to relevant s 36(2) circumstance, e.g. NOA was not asleep or unconscious], you must still decide whether the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA consented to the sexual penetration alleged. Finding that [refer to relevant s 36(2) circumstance as described above] only removes one barrier to finding that NOA consented.

[Refer to relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

No history of care, supervision or authority

[If the accused relies on the defence under Crimes Act 1958 s 50J(1), add the following shaded section.]

For this offence, the law recognises a defence. There are two parts to this defence.

First, NOC must be NOA's step-parent. This is not in dispute.

Second, NOA must not, at any time, have been under NOC's care, supervision or authority. The prosecution disputes this.

As I told you at the start of the trial, the prosecution must prove the accused's guilt. This means the prosecution must prove that the defence does not apply. In other words, the prosecution must prove that at some time NOA was under NOC's care, supervision or authority.

[If care, supervision or authority is in issue and the prosecution relies on a prescribed relationship, add the following darker shaded section.]

Parliament has defined a number of relationships where a child is deemed to be under the care, supervision and authority of another person. This includes [name relevant relationships from s 37 list].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOC had been NOA's [describe relationship]. [Insert prosecution evidence]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

If you find beyond reasonable doubt that NOC had been NOA's [identify relationship] [identify relevant time], the prosecution has proved this defence does not apply. If the prosecution has also proved the four elements of the offence then you may find NOA guilty of the charge of incest.

[If care, supervision or authority is in issue and the prosecution does not rely on a prescribed relationship, add the following darker shaded section.]

The words "care, supervision or authority" all describe different types of relationships where one person is in a position to exploit or take advantage of that relationship to influence a child to engage in an act of sexual penetration. You should take this into account when deciding whether the prosecution has proved that NOA was ever under NOC's care, supervision or authority.

The relationship of care, supervision or authority does not have to be a formal one. There does not, for example, have to have been a formal agreement that NOC would take care of NOA. An informal relationship of care, supervision or authority is sufficient.

[If relevant, add: You do not need to find that the alleged act of penetration was actually connected with, or influenced by, the relationship of care, supervision or authority. It is sufficient if you are satisfied that at some time, NOA had been under NOC's care, supervision or authority.]

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA had been under NOC's [care/supervision/authority]. [Insert prosecution evidence]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA had been under NOC's care, supervision or authority at a time before the alleged offence. Unless the prosecution has proved that NOA had been under NOC's care, supervision or authority at an earlier time, you must find NOA not guilty of incest.

[If the accused may be unaware of the facts giving rise to a relationship of care, supervision or authority, add the following darker shaded section.[608]]

The law states that NOA must know and be aware of the facts that give rise to a relationship of care, supervision or authority. For example, if NOA did not recognise that NOC had been his/her [describe relevant relationship], then the prosecution could not prove the defence does not apply. In other words, the prosecution could not prove NOA's guilt.

[Insert relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

History of sexual activity

[If the accused relies on the defence under Crimes Act 1958 s 50J(2), add the following shaded section.]

For this offence, the law recognises a defence which may be termed "history of sexual activity".

The law says that a person does not commit this offence if NOC engaged in sexual activity with NOA when NOA was under 18 years of age.

In this case, the defence say [refer to relevant evidence and arguments]. The prosecution argue that you should reject this. [Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

As I told you at the start of the trial, the prosecution must prove the accused's guilt. This means the prosecution must prove that the defence does not apply. In other words, the prosecution must prove that NOC did not engage in sexual activity with NOA when NOA was under 18 years of age.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of incest, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

- One – that NOA intentionally sexually penetrated NOC; and
- Two – that NOC is NOA's [insert family relationship]; and
- Three – that NOA knew that NOC was [his/her] [insert family relationship]; and

---

[608] Warning! Judges should seek submissions from parties as to whether this direction is required, as it is adapted from caselaw developed in a different context.

- Four – that NOA was aged 18 or older at the time of the sexual penetration.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of Incest.

Last updated: 19 March 2018

7.3.9.6 Checklist: Incest with Parent, Lineal Ancestor or Step-Parent (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1.The accused intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant;[609] and

2.The complainant is the [insert relevant family relationship] of the accused; and

3.The accused knew that the complainant was [his/her] [insert relevant family relationship]; and 4.The accused was aged 18 or older.

Accused's Acts

1. Did the accused intentionally sexually penetrate the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Incest

Relationship between the Accused and the Complainant

2. Is the complainant the [insert relevant family relationship] of the accused?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Incest

Knowledge of the Accused

3. Did the accused know that the complainant was [his/her] [insert relevant family relationship]?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Incest

Age of accused

4. Was the accused aged 18 or older at the time of the sexual penetration?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Incest (as long as you have also answered yes to questions 1, 2 and 3)

[609] If the charge involves the accused causing or allowing the complaint to sexually penetrate the accused, the checklist must be modified accordingly.

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Incest

7.3.10 Incest (Pre-1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Operational period

1. The current s 44 offence came into force on 5 August 1991, replacing the former offence of incest under s 52.
2. The amendments to s 44 extended the offence to include the children, lineal descendants and step-children of an accused's de facto spouse.
3. The current offence applies to any acts committed on or after 5 August 1991 (Crimes Act 1958 s 585A(2)).
4. If an offence is alleged to have been committed between two dates, one before and one on or after 5 August 1991, the offence is alleged to have been committed before 5 August 1991 (Crimes Act 1958 s 585A(4)).
5. The offence as enacted in 1991 included a defence of coercion. Section 8 of the Crimes (Sexual Offences) Act 2006 repealed with defence and replaced it with a new defence of compulsion. The new defence applies to offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1 December 2006 (Crimes Act 1958 s 606A). These defences are discussed below.

Elements

6. There are four main elements to the offence of incest:
   i) The accused must have taken part in an act of sexual penetration with another person;
   ii) The sexual penetration must have been intentional;
   iii) The parties must have been in a prescribed family relationship;
   iv) The accused must have known about that relationship.
7. Where the question of voluntariness is in issue (e.g. where the accused alleges that he or she was asleep at the time the act was performed), the jury should also be instructed that the act of penetration must have been conscious, voluntary and deliberate (R v MG (2010) 29 VR 305). See 7.1.1 Voluntariness for further information.

Intentional sexual penetration

8. "Sexual penetration" is defined in s 35 of the *Crimes Act 1958. S*ee 7.3.2 Rape (From 1/1/92) for information about this definition.
9. Under s 35(2), the person who sexually penetrates and the person who is penetrated are both deemed to be "taking part" in an act of sexual penetration. This means that an accused may be found guilty of incest whether they were sexually penetrating or sexually penetrated.
10. It also means that both parties to an act of sexual penetration may be liable to prosecution for the offence of incest. It has been held that it is not appropriate to class a complainant as an accomplice in incest cases (R v Ware 10/3/1994 SC Vic).
11. The sexual penetration must be intentional (R v AJS 13/12/2005 CA Vic).

Prescribed family members

12. The four family relationships prescribed by s 44 are:

    i) The children, step-children or lineal descendants of the accused (s 44(1));

    ii) The children, step-children or lineal descendants of the accused's de–facto spouse who are under 18 years of age (s 44(2));

    iii) The parents or lineal ancestors of the accused, where the accused is over 18 years of age (s 44(3));

    iv) The siblings or half-siblings of the accused (s 44(4)).

13. Adopted children are deemed to be the children of both their natural parents and their adoptive parents for the purposes of s 44 (Adoption Act 1984 (ss 53(1) and (2)).

14. Section 35 of the Act defines 'de–facto spouse' as "a person who is living with a person of the opposite sex as if they were married although they are not".

15. Applying this definition in the context of incest contrary to section 44(2) requires the jury to consider the nature of the relationship between the accused and the alleged de–facto spouse.

16. As part of this assessment, the jury may consider whether the accused exercises any parental responsibility for the children of the alleged de–facto spouse, including:

    (a) the role played, and responsibility assumed, by the accused with respect to the child(ren);
    (b) the authority exercised by the accused over the child(ren); and/or
    (c) the view which the child(ren) and the accused respectively had of the nature of the relationship between them (Sutton v R (2015) 47 VR 496, [36]).

17. A marriage–like relationship can exist even where its sole purpose is to provide support for the children (Sutton v R (2015) 47 VR 496, [36]).

18. Due to the statutory context of the offence of incest, the relationship between the accused and his or her partner's children is likely to be more significant in determining whether a de–facto relationship exists than in cases involving the distribution of property (Sutton v R (2015) 47 VR 496, [37]).

19. However, in general, it is undesirable for judges to expand on the statutory definition of "de–facto spouse" as the statutory definition calls for the jury to apply its common sense and experience to evaluate the relationship of the parties and compare it to their understanding of marriage relationships. This allows the jury to accommodate varied and even conflicting concepts of marriage–like relationships. Providing a list of factors relevant to assessing whether the relationship is marriage–like risks impermissibly interfering with the jury's assessment of what makes a relationship marriage–like (Sutton v R (2015) 47 VR 496, [53]).

Knowledge of the family relationship

20. Except for offences under s 44(2), the accused is presumed to know that they are related to the other person in the way alleged. This presumption can be rebutted by evidence to the contrary (s 44(7)(a)).

Marriage

21. Where it is necessary to prove that particular parties were married, there must be strict proof of the marriage. It is not sufficient to rely solely on admissions of the accused as to the marriage, or on evidence of co-habitation or common repute (R v Umanski [1961] VR 242).

Defences

22. Consent is not a defence to a charge of incest (s 44(5)).

Old scheme – Coercion defence

23. Where the offence is alleged to have been committed prior to 1 December 2006 it is a defence for the accused to prove on the balance of probabilities that he or she was coerced to take part in the act of sexual penetration (s 44(6)).

New scheme – Compulsion

24. The Crimes (Sexual Offences) Act 2006 substituted a new s 44(6) & (6A) which replaced "coercion" with a defence of "compulsion".

25. For offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1 December 2006, a person will not be guilty of the offence of incest if he or she was compelled to take part in the act of sexual penetration (Crimes Act 1958 s 44(6)).

26. The definition of compulsion was modified on 28 November 2007. Section 44(6A) now defines compulsion as follows:

> For the purposes of this section, a person compels another person (the victim) to take part in an act of sexual penetration if the person compels the victim (by force or otherwise) to engage in that act without the victim's consent.

27. These amendments apply to "any trial commenced on or after [28 November 2007] irrespective of when the offence to which the trial relates is alleged to have been committed" (Crimes Act 1958 s 609(1)).

28. Despite the absolute terms of s 609(1) it is doubtful that it applies the new compulsion defence to offences committed before 1 December 2006. The 2008 amendments operated solely to delete qualifications to s 44(6A). They cannot operate to insert the positive aspects of ss 44(6) and 44(6A) into the Act at a time prior to the date of their substantive enactment. While in practice this provision is most likely to be considered in trials where the compelled party is the uncharged victim of the offence, it can be expected that s 44(6) will be raised as a defence by defendants.

29. It is likely that if raised on the evidence, this is a defence that the prosecution must disprove beyond a reasonable doubt (see R v Mark & Elmazovski [2006] VSCA 251; R v Deblasis (2007) 19 VR 128).

Other Relevant Matters

30. Depending on the circumstances of the case, the trial judge may need to consider the following issues in relation to incest cases:

    - Indemnities;
    - Accomplice warnings (but see R v Ware (10/3/1994 SC Vic), in which Coldrey J held, after a review of the authorities, that it was not appropriate to class a complainant as an accomplice in an incest case);
    - Possible exemptions from being compelled to give evidence in a case involving certain family members (Evidence Act 2008 s 18);
    - The privilege against self-incrimination.

Last updated: 1 March 2016

7.3.10.1 Charge: Incest with Child, Step-Child or Sibling (Pre-1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge concerns acts of sexual penetration involving the accused's child, step-child or lineal descendant (s 44(1)), or brother, half-brother, sister or half-sister (s 44(4)).

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of incest.[610] To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt.[611]

One – the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant.

Two – the accused took part in this act intentionally.

Three – the complainant is the [*identify relationship, i.e. "*daughter", "son", "step-daughter", "step-son", "sister", "half-sister", "brother", "half-brother" or other "lineal descendant"] of the accused.

Four – the accused knew that the complainant was [his/her] [insert relevant family relationship].

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[612]

Taking part in sexual penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant. [If in issue, add: The prosecution must also prove that the relevant acts of the accused were performed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.[613]]

Act of sexual penetration

The law defines sexual penetration as the introduction of a person's penis, body part or object into another person's vagina or anus. It also includes putting a penis into someone's mouth.

For this first element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove that NOA took part in one of these acts. The law says that both the person who sexually penetrates and the person who is penetrated are regarded as "taking part" in sexual penetration. [If relevant add: This means that if you find that NOA was sexually penetrated by NOC, you will be satisfied that the accused "took part" in that act of sexual penetration.]

---

[610] Contrary to Crimes Act 1958 ss 44(1) or (4)).

[611] If either of the defences of coercion or compulsion is in issue, a section will need to be added to this charge. Coercion applies to offences alleged to have been committed prior to 1 December 2006, "compulsion" to offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1 December 2006. See 7.3.10 Incest (Pre–1/7/17) for further information.

[612] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[613] Described in the instructions within this charge as the "voluntariness" requirement.

In this case the prosecution seeks to prove that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC [describe relevant form of penetration, e.g. "by putting his finger into NOC's anus"/"when he took NOC's penis in his mouth"].

[If relevant add:

- [Identify item or body part and actor] does not need to have gone all the way into [NOC/NOA's] [vagina/anus/mouth]. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation].

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that [NOA/NOC] introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of [NOA/NOC's] vagina.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

However, according to the law, the introduction of an object or body part other than the penis into a person's [vagina/anus] does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

In this case [insert relevant evidence or competing arguments about proof of the accused's participation in an act of sexual penetration].

The act was conscious, voluntary and deliberate

[If the evidence or arguments have placed voluntariness in issue, add the following shaded section.]

As I have directed you, the prosecution must prove that the relevant acts of the accused were performed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

In this case you are concerned with NOA's alleged act in [describe relevant act of participation, e.g. "introducing his finger into NOC's anus"/"receiving NOC's penis into his mouth".]

This requirement is in issue because [describe the evidence or arguments that place voluntariness in issue].

You must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

In this case [insert evidence and arguments relevant to proof of this element].

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused intended to take part in the act of sexual penetration with the complainant.[614]

[If intention is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

This element is not in issue here. [If appropriate, explain further, e.g.

- The accused admits that s/he intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant.
- If you are satisfied that the accused [consciously, voluntarily and deliberately] sexually penetrated the complainant, you should have no trouble finding that s/he did so intentionally.]

Relationship to the complainant

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant is the [insert relevant family relationship] of the accused.

The law says that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it can be presumed that people who are generally considered to be related to each other in a particular way are in fact related in that way. In this case, as there has been no challenge to the alleged relationship between NOA and NOC, it can therefore be presumed that they are [insert relevant relationship], and that this third element has been satisfied.[615]

Knowledge of relationship

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused knew that the complainant was [his/her] [insert relevant family relationship].

The law says that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it can be presumed that the accused knew that they were related to the complainant in the way alleged. In this case, as it has not been disputed that NOA knew that NOC was [his/her] [insert relevant relationship], it can therefore be presumed that [he/she] had such knowledge, and that this fourth element has been satisfied.[616]

---

[614] If the accused is alleged to have penetrated the complainant, "intention" will only rarely be in issue. This constitutes an offence of basic intent, that is, the intent to commit the physical act of penetrating the complainant. This means that proof of intent will rarely be separated from proof of the act, and "intention" will rarely be an independent issue. Any mental state issues related to the act of penetration (e.g. the negation of intent by involuntariness, unconsciousness or accident) should generally be addressed by voluntariness directions. Offences involving penetration of the accused by the complainant may raise different issues.

[615] If the relationship between the accused and the complainant has been disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly. If the defence raises evidence in rebuttal of the presumption in s 44(7), it is for the prosecution to prove the relationship beyond reasonable doubt. There is no onus of proof on the defence.

[616] If the accused's knowledge of their relationship to the complainant has been disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly. If the defence raises evidence in rebuttal of the presumption in s 44(7), it is for the prosecution to prove knowledge of the relationship beyond reasonable doubt. There is no onus of proof on the defence.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of incest, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC; and

Two – that NOA intended to take part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC; and

Three – that NOC is NOA's [insert family relationship]; and Four – that NOA knew that NOC was [his/her] [insert family relationship].

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of incest.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

7.3.10.2 Checklist: Incest with Child, Step-Child or Sibling (Pre-1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant; and
2. The accused intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration with the complainant; and
3. The complainant is the [insert relevant family relationship] of the accused; and
4. The accused knew that the complainant was [his/her] [insert relevant family relationship].

Accused's Acts

1. Did the accused take part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Incest

Accused's Intention

2. Did the accused intend to take part in that act of sexual penetration with the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Incest

Relationship between the Accused and the Complainant

3. Is the complainant the [insert relevant family relationship] of the accused?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Incest

Knowledge of the Accused

4. Did the accused know that the complainant was [his/her] [insert relevant family relationship]?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Incest (as long as you have also answered yes to questions 1,2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Incest

Last updated: 6 June 2006

7.3.10.3 Charge: Incest with Child of De Facto Spouse (Pre-1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge concerns acts of sexual penetration involving the child, step-child or lineal descendant of the accused's de facto spouse (ss 44(2)).

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of incest. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following five elements beyond reasonable doubt.[617]

One – the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant.

Two – the accused took part in this act intentionally.

Three – the complainant is the [*identify family relationship, i.e. "*daughter", "son", "step-daughter", "step-son", or other "lineal descendant"] of the accused's de facto spouse.

Four – the accused knew that the complainant was the [insert relevant family relationship] of [his/her] de facto spouse.

Five – the complainant was under the age of 18 at the time of sexual penetration.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[618]

Taking part in sexual penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant. [If in issue, add: The prosecution must also prove that the relevant acts of the accused were performed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.[619]]

Act of sexual penetration

The law defines sexual penetration as the introduction of a person's penis, body part or object into another person's vagina or anus. It also includes putting a penis into someone's mouth.

---

[617] If either of the defences of coercion or compulsion is in issue, a section will need to be added to this charge. Coercion applies to offences alleged to have been committed prior to 1 December 2006, "compulsion" to offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1 December 2006. See 7.3.10 Incest (Pre–1/7/17) for further information.

[618] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[619] Described in the instructions within this charge as the "voluntariness" requirement.

For this first element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove that NOA took part in one of these acts. The law says that both the person who sexually penetrates and the person who is penetrated are regarded as "taking part" in sexual penetration. [If relevant add: This means that if you find that NOA was sexually penetrated by NOC, you will be satisfied that the accused "took part" in that act of sexual penetration.]

In this case the prosecution seeks to prove that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC [describe relevant form of penetration, e.g. "by putting his finger into NOC's anus"/"when he took NOC's penis in his mouth"].

[If relevant add:

- [Identify item or body part and actor] does not need to have gone all the way into [NOC/NOA's] [vagina/anus/mouth]. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation].

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that [NOA/NOC] introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of [NOA/NOC's] vagina.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

However, according to the law, the introduction of an object or body part other than the penis into a person's [vagina/anus] does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

In this case [insert relevant evidence or competing arguments about proof of the accused's participation in an act of sexual penetration].

The act was conscious, voluntary and deliberate

[If the evidence or arguments have placed voluntariness in issue, add the following shaded section.]

As I have directed you, the prosecution must prove that the relevant acts of the accused were performed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

In this case you are concerned with NOA's alleged act in [describe relevant act of participation, e.g. "introducing his finger into NOC's anus"/"receiving NOC's penis into his mouth".]

This requirement is in issue because [describe the evidence or arguments that place voluntariness in issue].

You must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

In this case [insert evidence and arguments relevant to proof of this element].

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused intended to take part in the act of sexual penetration with the complainant.[620]

[If intention is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

This element is not in issue here. [If appropriate, explain further, e.g. The accused admits that s/he intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant. If you are satisfied that the accused [consciously, voluntarily and deliberately] sexually penetrated the complainant, you should have no trouble finding that s/he did so intentionally.]

Relationship to the complainant

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant is the [insert relevant family relationship] of the accused's de facto spouse.[621]

There are two parts to this element. First, the prosecution must prove that NOA and [insert name of de facto spouse] were de facto spouses. A "de facto spouse" is a person who is living with someone of the opposite sex as if they were married, although they are not. In this case it is alleged that NOA and [insert name of de facto spouse] were de facto spouses because [insert relevant evidence].

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that complainant was the [insert relevant family relationship] of the accused's de facto spouse. In this case,the prosecution submitted that NOC was the [insert family relationship] of NOA's alleged de facto spouse, [insert name of de facto spouse]. [Insert details of any evidence supporting the existence of the relationship between the accused and the complainant.] The defence responded [insert evidence].

So for this third element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA and [insert name of de facto spouse] were de facto spouses, and that NOC is the [insert family relationship] of [insert name of de facto spouse].

Knowledge of relationship

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused knew that the complainant was [his/her] de facto spouse's [insert relevant family relationship].[622]

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA knew that NOC was [insert name of de facto spouse and relevant family relationship. Insert relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence].

---

[620] If the accused is alleged to have penetrated the complainant, "intention" will only rarely be in issue. This constitutes an offence of basic intent, that is, the intent to commit the physical act of penetrating the complainant. This means that proof of intent will rarely be separated from proof of the act, and "intention" will rarely be an independent issue. Any mental state issues related to the act of penetration (e.g. the negation of intent by involuntariness, unconsciousness or accident) should generally be addressed by voluntariness directions. Offences involving penetration of the accused by the complainant may raise different issues.

[621] Note that the presumption specified in s 44(7)(b) (that people who are reputed to be related to each other in a particular way are in fact related in that way) does not to apply to offences under s 44(2).

[622] Note that the presumption specified in s 44(7)(a) (that the accused knew that he or she was related to the other person in the way alleged) does not to apply to offences under s 44(2).

Age of the complainant

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant was under the age of 18 at the time of the sexual penetration.

In this case, it has not been disputed that NOC was under 18 at the time the alleged act of sexual penetration took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[623]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of incest, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC; and

Two – that NOA intended to take part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC; and

Three – that NOC is the [insert relevant family relationship] of NOA's de facto spouse; and

Four – that NOA knew that NOC was the [insert relevant family relationship] of NOA's de facto spouse; and Five – that NOC was under the age of 18 at the time of the sexual penetration.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of Incest.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

7.3.10.4 Checklist: Incest with Child of De Facto Spouse (Pre-1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant; and
2. The accused intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration with the complainant; and
3. The complainant is the [insert relevant family relationship] of the accused's de facto spouse; and
4. The accused knew that the complainant was the [insert relevant family relationship] of [his/her] de facto spouse; and
5. The complainant was under the age of 18 at the time the act of sexual penetration took place.

Accused's Acts

1. Did the accused take part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Incest

[623] If the complainant's age has been disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

Accused's Intention

2. Did the accused intend to take part in that act of sexual penetration with the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Incest

Relationship between the Accused and the Complainant

3. Is the complainant the [insert relevant family relationship] of the accused's de facto spouse?

Consider – A "de facto" spouse is someone who lives with a person of the opposite sex as if they are married although they are not.

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Incest

Knowledge of the Accused

4. Did the accused know that the complainant was the [insert relevant family relationship] of [his/her] de facto spouse?

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Incest

Age of the Complainant

5. Was the complainant under the age of 18 at the time of the sexual penetration?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Incest (as long as you have also answered yes to questions 1,2,3 and 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Incest

Last updated: 6 June 2006

7.3.10.5 Charge: Incest with Parent (Pre-1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge concerns acts of sexual penetration involving the accused's father, mother, step-father, step-mother or lineal ancestor (s 44(3)).

The elements

I must now direct you about the crime of incest. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt.[624]

One – the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOP.[625]

Two – the accused took part in this act intentionally.

Three – NOP is the accused's [insert relevant family relationship, i.e. "father", "mother", "step-father/mother", or "grandfather/grandmother"].

Four – the accused knew that NOP was [his/her] [insert relevant family relationship].

Five – the accused was aged 18 or older at the time of sexual penetration.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[626]

Taking part in sexual penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOP. [If in issue, add: The prosecution must also prove that the relevant acts of the accused were performed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.[627]]

Act of sexual penetration

The law defines sexual penetration as the introduction of a person's penis, body part or object into another person's vagina or anus. It also includes putting a penis into someone's mouth.

For this first element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove that NOA took part in one of these acts. The law says that both the person who sexually penetrates and the person who is penetrated are regarded as "taking part" in sexual penetration. [If relevant add: This means that if you find that NOA was sexually penetrated by NOP, you will be satisfied that the accused "took part" in that act of sexual penetration.]

In this case the prosecution seeks to prove that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOP [describe relevant form of penetration, e.g. "by putting his finger into NOP's anus"/"when he took NOP's penis in his mouth"].

[If relevant add:

---

[624] If either of the defences of coercion or compulsion is in issue, a section will need to be added to this charge. Coercion applies to offences alleged to have been committed prior to 1 December 2006, "compulsion" to offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1 December 2006. See 7.3.10 Incest (Pre–1/7/17) for further information.

[625] Name of alleged parent, step-parent or other lineal ancestor.

[626] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[627] Described in the instructions within this charge as the "voluntariness" requirement.

- [Identify item or body part and actor] does not need to have gone all the way into [NOP/NOA's] [vagina/anus/mouth]. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation].

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that [NOA/NOP] introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of [NOA/NOP's] vagina.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

However, according to the law, the introduction of an object or body part other than the penis into a person's [vagina/anus] does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOP's [anus/vagina], was not done in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

In this case [insert relevant evidence or competing arguments about proof of the accused's participation in an act of sexual penetration].

The act was conscious, voluntary and deliberate

[If the evidence or arguments have placed voluntariness in issue, add the following shaded section.]

As I have directed you, the prosecution must prove that the relevant acts of the accused were performed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

In this case you are concerned with NOA's alleged act in [describe relevant act of participation, e.g. "introducing his finger into NOP's anus"/"receiving NOP's penis into his mouth".]

This requirement is in issue because [describe the evidence or arguments that place voluntariness in issue].

You must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOP's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

In this case [insert evidence and arguments relevant to proof of this element].

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused intended to take part in the act of sexual penetration with NOP.[628]

[If intention is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

This element is not in issue here. [If appropriate, explain further, e.g. The accused admits that s/he intentionally sexually penetrated NOP. If you are satisfied that the accused [consciously, voluntarily and deliberately] sexually penetrated NOP, you should have no trouble finding that s/he did so intentionally.]

Relationship to the other participant

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that NOP is the [insert relevant family relationship] of the accused.

The law says that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it can be presumed that people who are generally considered to be related to each other in a particular way are in fact related in that way. In this case, as there has been no challenge to the alleged relationship between NOA and NOP, it can therefore be presumed that they are [insert relevant relationship], and that this third element has been satisfied.[629]

Knowledge of relationship

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused knew that NOP was [his/her] [insert relevant family relationship].

The law says that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it can be presumed that the accused knew that they were related to NOP in the way alleged. In this case, as it has not been disputed that NOA knew that NOP was [his/her] [insert relevant relationship], it can therefore be presumed that [he/she] had such knowledge, and that this fourth element has been satisfied.[630]

---

[628] If the accused is alleged to have penetrated the other party, "intention" will only rarely be in issue. This constitutes an offence of basic intent, that is, the intent to commit the physical act of penetrating the complainant. This means that proof of intent will rarely be separated from proof of the act, and "intention" will rarely be an independent issue. Any mental state issues related to the act of penetration (e.g. the negation of intent by involuntariness, unconsciousness or accident) should generally be addressed by voluntariness directions. Offences involving penetration of the accused by the other party may raise different issues.

[629] If the relationship between the accused and the other party has been disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly. If the defence raises evidence in rebuttal of the presumption in s 44(7), it is for the prosecution to prove the relationship beyond reasonable doubt. There is no onus of proof on the defence.

[630] If the accused's knowledge of his or her relationship to the other party has been disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly. If the defence raises evidence in rebuttal of the presumption in s 44(7), it is for the prosecution to prove knowledge of the relationship beyond reasonable doubt. There is no onus of proof on the defence.

Age of the accused

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused was aged 18 or older at the time of the sexual penetration.

In this case, it has not been disputed that NOA was at least 18 years old at the time the alleged act of sexual penetration took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[631]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of incest, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOP; and

Two – that NOA intended to take part in an act of sexual penetration with NOP; and

Three – that NOP is NOA's [insert family relationship]; and Four – that NOA knew that NOP was [his/her] [insert family relationship]; and Five – that NOA was aged 18 or older at the time of the sexual penetration.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of Incest.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

7.3.10.6 Checklist: Incest with Parent (Pre-1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with [insert name of other participant]; and
2. The accused intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration with [insert name of other participant]; and
3. [insert name of other participant] is the [insert relevant family relationship] of the accused; and
4. The accused knew that [name of other participant] was [his/her] [insert relevant family relationship]; and
5. The accused was aged 18 or older at the time the act of sexual penetration took place.

Accused's Acts

1. Did the accused take part in an act of sexual penetration with [insert name of other participant]?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Incest

Accused's Intention

2. Did the accused intend to take part in that act of sexual penetration?

---

[631] If the accused's has been disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Incest

Relationship between the Accused and the Other Participant

3. Is [insert name of other participant] the [insert relevant family relationship] of the accused?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Incest

Knowledge of the Accused

4. Did the accused know that [insert name of other participant] was [his/her] [insert relevant family relationship]?

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Incest

Age of the Accused

5. Was the accused aged 18 or older at the time of the sexual penetration?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Incest (as long as you have also answered yes to questions 1,2,3 and 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Incest

Last updated: 6 June 2006

7.3.11 Sexual Penetration of a Child under 12 (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Commencement Information

1. The current s 49A offence came into force on 1 July 2017, replacing the former offences specified in s 45 of the Crimes Act 1958.
2. For offences committed before 1 July 2017, see 7.3.13 Sexual Penetration of a Child Under 16 (1/1/92–30/6/17).

Elements

3. The elements of the offence are set out in s 49A(1) of the Crimes Act 1958. The prosecution must prove that:

   (a) The accused (A) intentionally:

   i) sexually penetrated another person (B);

   ii) caused or allowed B to sexually penetrate A; or

iii) causes B to sexually penetrate themselves, another person (C) or be sexually penetrated by C; and

(b) B is a child under the age of 12 years.

Intentional sexual penetration

4. The first element involves three permutations on B being involved in an act of sexual penetration (Crimes Act 1958 s 49A).

5. "Sexual penetration" is defined in s 35A of the Crimes Act 1958. For more information on the meaning of sexual penetration see 7.3.2 Rape (From 1/1/92).

6. The intention must have been to sexually penetrate or be penetrated. An intent to commit an indecent assault is not sufficient (Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108).

7. There will often be no issue about whether the act was intentional. For example, if there is evidence that the penetration took place over an extended period of time, there will ordinarily be no doubt about the accused's mental state (Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108).

8. However, in some cases intent will be in issue. Where this is so, it is of paramount importance that the jury be directed about the prosecution's obligation to establish basic intent or voluntariness, as the case may be, beyond reasonable doubt (R v AJS (2005) 12 VR 563; MG v R (2010) 29 VR 305; Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108). See also 7.1.1 Voluntariness.

9. For example, a clear direction about intention will be necessary where it is possible that any penetration that occurred was accidental. Such a possibility must be excluded for this element to be proven (Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108; R v AJS (2005) 12 VR 563).

Child Under 12

10. The second element requires the prosecution to prove that the complainant was under the age of 12 at the time the relevant act took place (Crimes Act 1958 s 49A(1)).

Statutory exemption

Medical or hygienic purposes

11. A person does not commit the offence against s 49A(1) if the accused's conduct occurs in the course of a procedure carried out in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes (Crimes Act 1958 s 49T).

Matters that do not provide a defence

Belief in age

12. The Crimes Act 1958 specifically provides that a mistaken but honest and reasonable belief that the child was aged 12 or more is not a defence (Crimes Act 1958 s 49ZC).

Consent

13. Consent forms no part of the definition of the offence and is irrelevant.

Marriage and domestic partnerships

14. Sections 49Y and 49Z specifically recognises that marriage, domestic partnership or a reasonable belief in marriage or a domestic partnership will be a defence for some sexual offences against children. However, section 49A is not such an offence (Crimes Act 1958 ss 49Y, 49Z).

Section 49A and territorial jurisdiction

15. This offence can be committed where the accused causes one person to sexually penetrate a third person. This form of offending may be committed even if the accused causes the conduct while they are outside the Victoria, if the sexual penetration between the other two parties occurs in Victoria (Case v The King [2023] VSCA 12, [120], [134]–[137]).

Last updated: 22 March 2023

7.3.11.1 Charge: Sexual Penetration of a Child under 12 (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 12. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 2 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant.[632]

Two – the complainant was under the age of 12 at that time.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Intentional sexual penetration

Warning! This charge is designed for cases where the prosecution relies on s 49A(1)(a)(i). This direction on the first element must be modified if the prosecution relies on other limbs of s 49A(1)(a).

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant, NOC.

The prosecution seeks to prove this element by showing that NOA [describe relevant form of penetration, e.g. "put his finger into NOC's anus"]. I direct you as a matter of law that if you find that NOA did this, then the prosecution has proved this first element.

[If relevant add:

- [Identify item or body part and actor] does not need to have gone all the way into [NOC/NOA's] [vagina/anus/mouth]. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation].

[632] This statement of the element must be modified if the prosecution relies on the other limbs of s 49A(1)(a). The words "sexually penetrated the complainant" may be replaced with "caused or allowed the complainant to sexually penetrate the accused" or "caused the complainant to sexually penetrate himself/herself" or "caused the complainant to sexually penetrate another person" or "caused the complainant to be sexually penetrated by another person".

[If the evidence or arguments have placed the intentional or voluntary nature of the acts in issue, add the following shaded section.[633]]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant act of penetration, e.g. "introducing his finger into NOC's anus"/"receiving NOC's penis into his mouth"] must have been done intentionally.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves intention in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that [NOA/NOC] introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of [NOA/NOC's] vagina.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

However, according to the law, the introduction of an object or body part into a person's [vagina/anus] does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in the course of a procedure carried out in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object or body part] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in the course of a procedure carried out in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

In this case [insert evidence and arguments relevant to proof of this element].

Child under the age of 12

The second element relates to the age of the complainant, NOC. The prosecution must prove that s/he was under the age of 12 when the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was under 12 at that time. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[634]

Statutory defences and exclusions

Direction on matters that are not a defence

To protect children under the age of 12, Parliament has specifically stated that consent is not relevant to this offence. You do not need to consider the issue of whether or not NOC agreed to be sexually penetrated by NOA.

Parliament has also stated that NOA belief about NOC's age is also not relevant. For the second element, you must only look at how old NOC was at the time of the conduct. Whether NOA knew that NOC under 12 at the time is not relevant.

---

[633] Because of how the offence is defined, the issue of intention is likely inseparable from the question of voluntariness. Where the issue is raised, the judge should direct the jury on the specific matters the jury must consider to find that the accused's conduct was voluntary and intentional (e.g. disproof of accident or proof that the accused was conscious).

[634] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 12, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

- One – that NOA intentionally sexually penetrated NOC; and
- Two – that NOC was under the age of 12 at the time of the sexual penetration.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 12.

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.11.2 Checklist: Sexual Penetration of a Child under 12 (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Two elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant; and

2. The complainant was under the age of 12.

Intentional sexual penetration

1. Did the accused intentionally [identify relevant act of sexual penetration] NOC?

    If Yes then go to 2

    If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Penetration of a child under 12

Complainant under age of 12

2. At the time of the act, was NOC under the age of 12?

    If Yes then the accused is guilty of Sexual Penetration of a child under 12 (as long as you also answered Yes to Question 1)

    If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Penetration of a child under 12

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.12 Sexual Penetration of a Child under 16 (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Commencement Information

1. The current s 49B offence came into force on 1 July 2017, replacing the former offences specified in s 46 of the Crimes Act 1958.
2. For offences committed before 1 July 2017, see 7.3.13 Sexual Penetration of a Child Under 16 (1/1/992–30/6/17).

Elements

3. The elements of the offence are set out in s 49B(1) of the Crimes Act 1958. The prosecution must prove that:

   i) The accused (A) intentionally:

      - sexually penetrated another person (B);
      - caused or allowed B to sexually penetrate A; or
      - causes B to sexually penetrate themselves, another person (C) or be sexually penetrated by C; and

   ii) B is a child under the age of 16 years.

Intentional sexual penetration

4. The first element involves three permutations on B being involved in an act of sexual penetration (Crimes Act 1958 s 49B).

5. "Sexual penetration" is defined in s 35A of the Crimes Act 1958. For more information on the meaning of sexual penetration see, 7.3.2 Rape (From 1/1/92).

6. For more information about this element, including proof of intention, see 7.3.11 Sexual penetration of a child under 12 (From 1/7/17).

Child Under 16

7. The second element requires the prosecution to prove that the complainant was under the age of 16 at the time the relevant act took place (Crimes Act 1958 s 49B(1)).

Statutory defences and exemption

Medical or hygienic purposes

8. A person does not commit the offence against s 49B(1) if the accused's conduct occurs in the course of a procedure carried out in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes (Crimes Act 1958 s 49T).

Similarity in age

9. Section 49V of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that it is a defence to an offence against section 49B(1) if, at the time of the conduct:

   i) A was not more than 2 years older than B; and

   ii) B was 12 years of age or more; and

   iii) B consented to the sexual penetration.

10. In relation to this defence, the accused's actual age must not exceed the child's by more than 24 months. The availability of the defence is not determined by a measure limited to whole–years (Stannard v DPP (2010) 28 VR 84).

11. To disprove this defence, the prosecution must rebut one or more limbs of section 49V. For information on the circumstances in which a person does not consent, see 7.3.1.2 Consent and reasonable belief in consent.

12. This defence does not involve a consideration of whether the accused had a reasonable belief in consent. Compare 7.3.13 Sexual Penetration of a Child Under 16 (1/1/92 – 30/6/17).

Reasonable belief as to age

13. Section 49W of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that it is a defence to an offence against section 49B(1) if, at the time of the conduct:

    i) B was 12 years of age or more; and

    ii) A reasonably believed that B was 16 years of age or more.

14. The accused bears the burden of proving, on the balance of probabilities, that he or she reasonably believed that B was 16 years of age or more (Crimes Act 1958 s 49W(4)).

15. The Note to section 49W states that:

> Whether or not A reasonably believed that B … was 16 years of age or more depends on the circumstances. The circumstances include any steps that A took to find out [B's] age.

16. The Note also specifies that the accused has an evidential burden to establish that B was 12 years of age or more.

17. Unlike the former s 45, a reasonable belief in age is not used as a threshold requirement before consent is relevant. This means that the jury does not need to consider consent, or a reasonable belief in consent, as part of this belief in age defence.

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.12.1 Charge: Sexual Penetration of a Child under 16 (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 2 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant.[635]

Two – the complainant was under the age of 16 at that time.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Intentional sexual penetration

Warning! This charge is designed for cases where the prosecution relies on s 49B(1)(a)(i). This direction on the first element must be modified if the prosecution relies on other limbs of s 49B(1)(a).

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant, NOC.

The prosecution seeks to prove this element by showing that NOA [describe relevant form of penetration, e.g. "put his finger into NOC's anus"]. I direct you as a matter of law that if you find that NOA did this, then the prosecution has proved this first element.

---

[635] This statement of the element must be modified if the prosecution relies on the other limbs of s 49B(1)(a). The words "sexually penetrated the complainant" may be replaced with "caused or allowed the complainant to sexually penetrate the accused" or "caused the complainant to sexually penetrate himself/herself" or "caused the complainant to sexually penetrate another person" or "caused the complainant to be sexually penetrated by another person".

[If relevant add:

- [Identify item or body part and actor] does not need to have gone all the way into [NOC/NOA's] [vagina/anus/mouth]. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation].

[If the evidence or arguments have placed the intentional or voluntary nature of the acts in issue, add the following shaded section.[636]]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant act of participation, e.g. "introducing his finger into NOC's anus"/"receiving NOC's penis into his mouth"] must have been done intentionally.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves intention in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that [NOA/NOC] introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of [NOA/NOC's] vagina.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

However, according to the law, the introduction of an object or body part into a person's [vagina/anus] does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in the course of a procedure carried out in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [name of object or body part] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in the course of a procedure carried out in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

In this case [insert evidence and arguments relevant to proof of this element].

Child under the age of 16

The second element relates to the age of the complainant, NOC. The prosecution must prove that s/he was under the age of 16 when the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was under 16 at that time. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[637]

---

[636] Because of how the offence is defined, the issue of intention is likely inseparable from the question of voluntariness. Where the issue is raised, the judge should direct the jury on the specific matters the jury must consider to find that the accused's conduct was voluntary and intentional (e.g. disproof of accident or proof that the accused was conscious).

[637] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

Statutory defences and exclusions

Similarity in age

[If the accused relies on the similarity in age defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 49V, add the following shaded section.]

For this offence, the law recognises a defence which may be termed "similarity in age". There are three parts to this defence.

First, the accused must be no more than 2 years older than the complainant. In this case, that requirement is met.

Second, the complainant must have been 12 years old or more at the time of the alleged conduct. Again, this requirement is met in this case.[638]

Third, the complainant must have consented to the sexual penetration. It is this part of the defence which is in dispute.

As I told you at the start of the trial, the prosecution must prove the accused's guilt. This means the prosecution must prove that the defence does not apply. In other words, the prosecution must prove that NOC did not consent to the sexual penetration.

Consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So the prosecution must prove that NOC did not freely agree to being sexually penetrated by NOA at the time.

[Where a party requests a direction about the meaning of consent, add one or more of the following shaded paragraphs.]

The law says that a person can consent to an act only if they are capable of consenting, and free to choose whether or not to engage in or to allow the act.

The law says that where a person has given their consent to an act, they may withdraw that consent before the act happens or at any time while it is happening.

[Where a party requests a direction about the circumstances in which a person is taken not to have consented, add the following shaded section.]

The law specifies some circumstances in which a person does not freely agree, or consent, to sexual penetration. These circumstances include where [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

a) the person submits to the act because of force or the fear of force, whether to that person or someone else;

b) the person submits to the act because of the fear of harm of any type, whether to that person or someone else or an animal;

---

[638] This part of the direction must be modified if the age of the complainant is in issue. If this part of the defence is in issue, the judge must explain that the prosecution can rebut the defence by disproving any of the three components of the defence.

c) the person submits to the act because the person is unlawfully detained;

d) the person is asleep or unconscious;

e) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of consenting to the act;

f) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of withdrawing consent to the act;

g) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

h) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act;

i) the person is mistaken about the identity of any other person involved in the act;

j) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes;

k) if the act involves an animal, the person mistakenly believes that the act is for veterinary, agricultural or scientific research purposes;

l) the person does not say or do anything to indicate consent to the act;

m) having initially given consent to the act, the person later withdraws consent to the act taking place or continuing]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC at the time [describe relevant act], you must find that s/he was not consenting.

However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

[Where a party requests a direction about the lack of physical injury, add the following shaded section.]

When you are assessing the evidence, it is important to know that experience shows that there are many different circumstances in which a person does not consent to sexual penetration. Experience also shows that just because a person is not physically injured, subjected to violence or threatened with physical injury or violence does not mean that they consented.

[When a party requests a direction about the lack of protest or physical resistance, add the following shaded section.]

When you are assessing the evidence, it is important to know that experience shows that people react in different ways to a non-consensual sexual act. There is no typical, proper or normal response. Experience shows that just because a person did not protest or resist does not mean that they consented. For example, a person might freeze and not say or do anything, even though they are not consenting.

[When a party requests a direction on the relevance of past consensual sex, add the following shaded section.]

When you are assessing the evidence, it is important to know that experience shows just because a person has consented to sexual activity with a person on one occasion does not mean that they consented to sexual activity with that person on another occasion.[639]

In this case, [insert evidence and competing arguments relevant to proof that the complainant was not consenting].

It is important that you remember that it is not for the accused to prove to you that the complainant consented. Unless the prosecution proves, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not consent, you must find the accused not guilty of this offence.

Belief in age

[If the accused relies on the belief in age defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 49W, add the following shaded section.]

The law states that a person does not commit this offence if, at the time s/he sexually penetrated NOC, s/he reasonably believed that the accused was aged 16 years or more. There are two parts to this defence.

First, at the time of the conduct, NOC must have been aged 12 or more. There is no issue in this case that NOC was aged 12 or more at the time of the conduct.[640]

Second, NOA must have reasonably believed that NOC was aged 16 or more. It is a matter for you to decide whether NOA held this belief, and whether it was reasonable. As part of deciding this issue, you should consider what steps NOA took to find out NOC's age.

Unlike the elements of the offence, this is a matter which the accused must prove. It is an exception to the general rule that the prosecution must prove all matters. However, the accused only need to prove that s/he reasonably believed that NOC was aged 16 or more on the balance of probabilities. In other words, s/he must show that it is more likely than not that s/he believed that NOC was aged 16 or more and that this belief was reasonable. Unlike the prosecution, s/he does not need to prove these matters beyond reasonable doubt.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments.]

Consent not a defence

To protect children under the age of 16, Parliament has specifically stated that consent is not relevant to this offence. You do not need to consider the issue of whether or not NOC agreed to be sexually penetrated by NOA.[641]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

- One – that NOA intentionally sexually penetrated NOC; and

---

[639] This direction may be modified to include reference to different forms of sexual activity, or sexual activity with different people, if appropriate in the circumstances of the case. See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 46(3)(e).

[640] If the age of the child is in dispute, then this direction must be modified. The prosecution bears the onus of rebutting this threshold requirement, once the accused has satisfied the evidential burden.

[641] This part of the direction must be omitted if the similarity in age defence is relevant.

- Two – that NOC was under the age of 16 at the time of the sexual penetration.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16.

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.12.2 Checklist: Sexual Penetration of a Child under 16 (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Two elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant; and

2. The complainant was under the age of 16.

Intentional sexual penetration

1. Did the accused intentionally [identify relevant act of sexual penetration] NOC?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Penetration of a child under 16

Complainant under age of 16

2. At the time of the act, was NOC under the age of 16?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Sexual Penetration of a child under 16 (as long as you also answered Yes to Question 1)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Intentional Sexual Penetration of a child under 16

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.13 Sexual Penetration of a Child under 16 (1/1/92–30/6/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Commencement Information

1. For offences alleged to have been committed before 1 July 2017, s 45 contained the offence of sexual penetration of a child under 16.
2. This offence came into force on 22 November 2000, replacing the former offences specified in ss 45 and 46 of the Crimes Act 1958.
3. The offence applies to any acts committed on or after 5 August 1991 and before 1 July 2017 (Crimes Act 1958 s 593(5)).
4. If an offence is alleged to have been committed between dates, one date before and one date on or after 5 August 1991, the offence is alleged to have been committed before 5 August 1991 (Crimes Act 1958 s 593(6)).
5. The current s 45(4) and s 45(4A) apply only to offences committed on or after 1 December 2006. Their impact is considered below in the discussion of Statutory defences and exemptions.
6. The offence was further amended on 17 March 2010 by s 3 of the Crimes Legislation Amendment Act 2010 to raise the age limits for various purposes from 10 to 12. This change only applies to offences committed on or after 17 March 2010.

Elements

7. The elements of the offence are set out in s 45(1) of the Crimes Act 1958. The prosecution must prove that:

   i) The accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant;

   ii) The accused intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration; and

   iii) The complainant was under the age of 16 at the time the sexual penetration took place.

Taking Part in an Act of Sexual Penetration

8. The first element requires the accused to have "taken part" in an act of "sexual penetration" with the complainant (Crimes Act 1958 s 45(1)).

9. "Sexual penetration" is defined in s 35(1)(a) of the Crimes Act 1958. For more information on the meaning of sexual penetration see 7.3.2 Rape (From 1/1/92).

10. Section 35(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that both the person who sexually penetrates another person and that other person shall be deemed to be "taking part" in an act of sexual penetration. This means that an accused may be found guilty of the offence whether he or she was sexually penetrating the complainant or was being sexually penetrated by the complainant.

Intention to Take Part in an Act of Sexual Penetration

11. The second element requires the accused to have intended to take part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant (Crimes Act 1958 s 45(1)).

12. The intention must have been to sexually penetrate or be penetrated. An intent to commit an indecent assault is not sufficient (Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108).

13. There will often be no issue about whether the act was intentional. For example, if there is evidence that the penetration took place over an extended period of time, there will ordinarily be no doubt about the accused's mental state (Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108).

14. However, in some cases intent will be in issue. Where this is so, it is of paramount importance that the jury be directed about the prosecution's obligation to establish intent beyond reasonable doubt (R v AJS (2005) 12 VR 563; MG v R (2010) 29 VR 305; Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108).

15. For example, a clear direction about intention will be necessary where it is possible that any penetration that occurred was accidental. Such a possibility must be excluded for this element to be proven (Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108; R v AJS (2005) 12 VR 563).

Child Under 16

16. The third element requires the prosecution to prove that the complainant was under the age of 16 at the time the relevant act took place (Crimes Act 1958 s 45(1)).

17. The jury should determine the complainant's age having regard to the evidence in the case, or if no other sufficient evidence is presented, to the complainant's appearance (Crimes Act 1958 s 411).

Aggravating Circumstances

18. Section 45(2) specifies two aggravating circumstances which will make someone who is guilty liable to a greater maximum penalty. These circumstances are:

    - Where the child was under the age of 12 at the time of the offence; or

- Where the child was aged between 12 and 16, and is under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

19. Section 45(5) provides that these circumstances of aggravation are not elements of the offence, but that they must be stated in the indictment if they are alleged by the prosecution.
20. Under s 45(6), where an accused disputes the circumstances set out in s 45(2) and wants to have this matter determined at the trial, they may do so by pleading not guilty to the offence, even if they do not dispute the other facts alleged by the prosecution in proof of the offence.
21. Section 45(7) provides that the circumstances of aggravation must be determined by a jury where the accused pleads not guilty, and by the trial judge where the accused pleads guilty.
22. It is therefore possible that where an accused pleads not guilty to sexual penetration of a child under 16, the trial may require the prosecution to prove:

    i) The elements of the offence only (if no circumstances of aggravation are alleged in the indictment);

    ii) The aggravating circumstances only (if the accused disputes the aggravating circumstances but not the other facts alleged by the prosecution); or

    iii) The elements of the offence and the aggravating circumstances.

23. If an accused pleads not guilty to an alleged offence contrary to s 45 in which aggravating circumstances have been included in the indictment, the judge should inquire as to whether they will be contesting the elements of the offence, the aggravating circumstances, or both.

Care, supervision or authority

24. The words "care, supervision or authority" are to be given their ordinary grammatical meaning (R v Howes (2000) 2 VR 141).
25. The words "care, supervision or authority" should be read disjunctively (R v Howes (2000) 2 VR 141).
26. These words are intended to encompass those who, by virtue of an established and ongoing relationship involving care, supervision or authority, are in a position to exploit or take advantage of the influence which grows out of the relationship (R v Howes (2000) 2 VR 141).
27. The relationship of care, supervision or authority does not need to be based on a legal right or power. While legal authority may create or help to create such a relationship, it is not essential (R v Howes (2000) 2 VR 141; R v Macfie [2000] VSCA 173).
28. The words therefore cover a person who has assumed de facto control, supervision or authority over a child, even if responsibility for that child has not been delegated to them by the person with legal responsibility for that child (R v Macfie [2000] VSCA 173).
29. Care, supervision or authority may be vested in more than one person or authority at the same time (R v Macfie [2000] VSCA 173).
30. Care, supervision or authority may change from time to time, depending on the circumstances (R v Macfie [2000] VSCA 173).
31. It is not necessary that the occasion on which the penetration took place was connected with, or arose out of, the relationship of care, supervision or authority, or that the parties were acting in the capacities which gave rise to the relationship. It is sufficient if the jury is satisfied that there was a standing relationship of care, supervision or authority between the parties, and that that relationship existed on the day on which the penetration took place (R v Howes (2000) 2 VR 141).

Statutory defences and exemptions

Marriage

32. The offence specified in s 45(1) does not apply if the child is between the ages of 12 and 16 and the people taking part in sexual penetration were married to each other (s 45(3)).

33. For offences committed before 17 March 2010, this defence is also available if the child was aged 10 or 11 (see Crimes Legislation Amendment Act 2010 s 3).

Consent

34. Section 45(4) states that consent is not a defence to a charge of sexual penetration of a child under 16, unless the child was 12 years or older and:

    (a) The accused believed on reasonable grounds that the child was 16 or older; or

    (b) The accused was not more than 2 years older than the child; or

    (c) The accused believed on reasonable grounds that he or she was married to the child.

35. For offences committed before 17 March 2010, this defence is also available if the child was aged 10 or 11 (see Crimes Legislation Amendment Act 2010 s 3).

36. In relation to s 45(4)(b), consent will not be a defence where the accused's actual age exceeds the child's by anything more than 24 months. The availability of the defence is not determined by a measure limited to whole–years (Stannard v DPP (2010) 28 VR 84).

Burden of proof

37. Sections 45(4) and 45(4A) were introduced by s 9 of the Crimes (Sexual Offences) Act 2006. These amendments apply to offences committed after 1 December 2006 (Crimes Act 1958 s 606A).

38. The sections were further amended by s 3 of the Crimes Legislation Amendment Act 2010 to raise the age at which a child may consent from 10 to 12. Those amendments only apply to offences committed on or after 17 March 2010.

39. The effect of these provisions is to place the legal burden on the accused to prove, on the balance of probabilities, that he or she believed on reasonable grounds that the child was 16 or older (s 45(4)(a)), or that he or she was married to the child (s 45(4)(c)).

40. However, for offences alleged to have been committed prior to 1 December 2006, where there is an evidentiary basis for a s 45(4) defence, the burden of proof is on the prosecution to disprove the defence beyond reasonable doubt (R v Mark & Elmazovski [2006] VSCA 251; R v Deblasis (2007) 19 VR 128; R v Fagone [2008] VSCA 175. Cf R v Douglas [1985] VR 721).

41. Judges should carefully explain the burden of proof to the jury in a way they can understand (R v Fagone [2008] VSCA 175).[642]

42. Generally, if the age gap between the complainant and the accused is in issue under s 45(4)(b), the prosecution will be required to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the accused is more than 2 years older than the complainant.

---

[642] For example, instead of charging the jury that "the prosecutor carried an onus to negative, to the criminal standard of beyond reasonable doubt, a belief on reasonable grounds that the complainant was 16 or older", the jury should be directed that "the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused did not believe, on reasonable grounds, that the complainant was 16 or older" (R v Fagone [2008] VSCA 175).

43. It is only if the jury is satisfied that one of the matters specified in s 45(4) have been proved to the requisite standard that consent will be relevant. In such cases, the prosecution will then need to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not consent.

44. For there to be reasonable grounds for a state of mind (such as belief), there must exist facts which are sufficient to induce that state of mind in a reasonable person (George v Rockett and Another (1990) 170 CLR 104).

Intoxication

45. At common law, the fact that the accused had used drugs or alcohol could be relevant to his or her belief that the child was 16 or older (see, e.g. R v Fagone [2008] VSCA 175).

46. However, this issue only needed to be addressed if there was a factual foundation for finding that the accused's drug or alcohol use affected his or her belief that the child was 16 or older. The mere fact that s/he had used drugs or alcohol at the relevant time was not sufficient (R v Fagone [2008] VSCA 175).

47. For offences committed on or after 1 November 2014, section 322T restricts the use of evidence of self-induced intoxication in assessing whether a person had a reasonable belief for the purpose of a defence. Judges will need to consider whether section 322T applies to the defence of consent for this offence. As a matter of prudence, for the purpose of this Charge Book, we have assumed that s 322T does not apply to this defence. See 8.5 Statutory Intoxication (From 1/11/14) for more information.

48. For offences committed before 1 November 2014, the relevance of drug or alcohol use generally is discussed in 8.7 Common Law Intoxication.

Reasonable grounds for belief

49. As it is the grounds for the accused's belief that must be reasonable, not the belief itself, the accused does not need to prove that he or she had the same state of mind as a reasonable person (LAL v R [2011] VSCA 111).

50. However, it is not sufficient for the accused to prove that he or she thought that there were reasonable grounds for his or her belief. There must be facts which would be sufficient to induce a reasonable person to believe the child was 16 or older (Curtis v R [2011] VSCA 102; LAL v R [2011] VSCA 111; George v Rockett (1990) 170 CLR 104).

51. Where the complainant did not tell the accused his or her age, it will usually be necessary for the accused to say what it was about the complainant's appearance, demeanour or behaviour which induced the belief that he or she was aged 16 or over (Curtis v R [2011] VSCA 102).

Accused's awareness of the absence of consent

52. Crimes Act 1958 ss 38, 38A, & 39 expressly describe a fault element (or mens rea) associated with the complainant's lack of consent. This is, the accused must have acted while aware that the complainant was not or might not have been consenting, or while not giving any thought to whether the complainant was consenting. No other Crimes Act 1958 sexual offences include "awareness of non consent" as a statutory fault element.

53. Whether this additional awareness element should be implied for other sexual offences has not been authoritatively determined. However, despite the contrast in drafting between ss 38, 38A, & 39 and the other sexual offences, it is likely that wherever consent is an issue, mens rea in respect of consent will also be relevant. This would be consistent with the principles set down in He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523 and now applied in relation to common assault by Parish v DPP (2007) 17 VR 412.

54. If a mens rea requirement in respect of consent is to be implied, it will be necessary to determine the form of mens rea that will be sufficient. For rape and indecent assault at common law the mens rea associated with consent was the same as that reflected in Crimes Act 1958 ss 38 and 39 before 1 January 2008 (R v Saragozza [1984] VR 187, DPP v Morgan [1976] AC 182, R v Kimber [1983] 1 WLR 1118). That is, it was sufficient if the sexual act was done with the awareness that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting. It has been assumed that this form of mens rea attaches to the consent element of all relevant sexual offences, and the charges for these offences are drafted accordingly.

55. For rape, compelled sexual penetration and indecent assault the Crimes Amendment (Rape) Act 2007 introduced a new statutory fault element. For these offences it is no defence for accused persons to assert that they were not aware that the complainant might not have been consenting to the sexual act because they had not given any thought to whether or not the complainant was consenting (Crimes Act 1958 ss 38(2)(a)(ii), 38(4)(b)(ii), 38A(3)(b)(ii), 39(2)(b)).

56. It is unclear whether this additional fault element was acknowledged under the common law, and if so whether it should now be applied to offences such as Sexual penetration of a child under 16 where it is not a statutory element. See further the discussion in 7.3.2 Rape (From 1/1/92). The charge book charges only include this fault element where it is a statutory fault element. If it is to be applied to other offences, the charge will need to be amended.

Directions about consent and awareness of non-consent

57. The definition and mandatory directions in respect of consent in s 36 and s 37, and s 37AAA of the Crimes Act 1958 apply to this offence. If mens rea in respect of consent is an implied requirement for this offence, then the directions in s 37AA may also need to be given. See 7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent (Pre-1/7/15) for more information in relation to these matters.

Procedural matters

58. As the circumstances of aggravation in s 45(2) are not elements of the offence, they should not be considered as part of the jury's determination of the accused's guilt. The jury should be directed that their first task is to decide whether the prosecution has proven the elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt.

59. The jury should be directed that they should only consider the circumstances of aggravation if they decide that the accused is guilty of the offence specified in s 45(1).

60. In taking the jury's verdict, the judge should first ask whether the jury has reached a verdict in relation to the offence. If that verdict is guilty, the judge should then ask whether the jury has reached agreement about the circumstances of aggravation.

61. It has not been judicially determined whether the jury must be unanimous as to the circumstances of aggravation, or whether a majority verdict will suffice. Under s 46 of the Juries Act 2000, a majority verdict may only be taken if the jury is unable to agree on its "verdict". While it has not been decided that the jury's decision about the circumstances of aggravation is a "verdict" for the purposes of the Juries Act, it seems likely that it will be treated in this way.

62. Due to the construction of s 45(2), it seems likely that if the jury return a unanimous verdict as to guilt, but cannot reach a unanimous verdict as to the aggravating circumstances, the verdict will stand and the accused will be liable to the lower penalty specified in s 45(2)(c). However, this issue has not been judicially determined.

Last updated: 30 November 2017

7.3.13.1 Charge: Sexual Penetration of a Child under 16 (From 17/3/10) Consent Not in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for trials involving offences alleged to have been committed on or after 17/3/2010 where neither consent nor any precondition for relying on consent as a defence is in issue.

I must now direct you about the crime of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant.

Two – the accused did this intentionally.

Three – the complainant was under the age of 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[643]

Taking part in an act of sexual penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant. [If the conscious, voluntary or deliberate nature of the act is in issue,[644] add: The prosecution must also prove that the relevant acts of the accused were performed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.]

The law defines sexual penetration as the introduction of a person's penis, body part or object into another person's vagina or anus. It also includes putting a penis into someone's mouth.

For this first element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove that NOA took part in one of these acts. The law says that both the person who sexually penetrates and the person who is penetrated are regarded as "taking part" in sexual penetration. [If relevant add: This means that if you find that NOA was sexually penetrated by NOC, you will be satisfied that the accused "took part" in that act of sexual penetration.]

In this case the prosecution seeks to prove that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC [describe relevant form of penetration, e.g. "by putting his finger into NOC's anus"/"when he took NOC's penis in his mouth"].

[If relevant add:

- [Identify item or body part and actor] does not need to have gone all the way into [NOC/NOA's] [vagina/anus/mouth]. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation].

[If the evidence or arguments have placed the conscious, voluntary or deliberate nature of the acts in issue, add the following shaded section.]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant act of participation, e.g. "introducing his finger into

---

[643] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[644] Described hereafter as the "voluntariness" requirement.

NOC's anus"/"receiving NOC's penis into his mouth"] must have been done consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that [NOA/NOC] introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of [NOA/NOC's] vagina.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

However, according to the law, the introduction of an object or body part other than the penis into a person's [vagina/anus] does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

In this case [insert evidence and arguments relevant to proof of this element].

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused intended to take part in the act of sexual penetration with the complainant.[645]

[If intention is not in issue, add the shaded section.]

This element is not in issue here. [If appropriate, explain further, e.g. If you are satisfied that the accused [consciously, voluntarily and deliberately] sexually penetrated the complainant, you should have no trouble finding that s/he did so intentionally.]

Child under the age of 16

The third element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that s/he was under the age of 16 when the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was under 16 at that time. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[646]

---

[645] Because sexual penetration of a child under 16 is an offence of basic intent (the intent to take part in the act of penetration), the issue of intention is only likely to arise in cases involving penetration of the accused by the complainant. In cases where the accused is alleged to have penetrated the complainant, proof of intent will rarely be separated from proof of the act, and "intention" will rarely be an independent issue. Mental state issues related to the intention to penetrate (e.g. the negation of intent by involuntariness, unconsciousness or accident) should generally be addressed by voluntariness directions.

[646] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

Statutory defences and exclusions

Accused married to the complainant

[For offences allegedly committed before 22 October 2014, if the accused alleged that s/he was married to the complainant, who was aged between 12 and 16 at the time of the alleged penetration, add the following shaded section.]

Even if these three elements are met, the law states that a person is not guilty of this offence if the accused and the complainant were married to each other at the time of the alleged penetration, and the complainant was at least 12 years' old at that time.

In this case [insert relevant evidence and competing arguments].

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was not married to NOC at the time of the alleged act of sexual penetration, or that NOC was aged under 12 at the relevant time. If the prosecution cannot prove at least one of these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Consent is not a defence

[This charge is designed for use in cases where consent is not in issue. Use one of the charges listed at the beginning of this document if consent or a precondition for consideration of consent (belief in age, age gap of less than 2 years, or marriage to complainant) is contested.]

To protect children under the age of 16, Parliament has created a number of offences where consent is not relevant. This is one of those offences, so you do not need to consider the issue of whether or not NOC agreed to take part in the alleged act of sexual penetration.

Circumstances of Aggravation

[If any circumstances of aggravation have been alleged in the indictment, add the following shaded section.]

The law has specified certain "circumstances of aggravation" which you must consider if you find that each of the elements of this offence has been proved. These are not elements of the offence, but circumstances which make the crime more serious. Like the elements of the offence, these are matters which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt and you can only find a circumstance of aggravation if you all agree that circumstance exists.[647]

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was under the age of 12, add the following shaded section.]

One of the "circumstances of aggravation" specified by the law is that the complainant was under the age of 12 at the time that the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case [insert relevant evidence and competing arguments about the complainant's age].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proven this circumstance of aggravation beyond reasonable doubt. I want to remind you, however, that you must first determine whether the elements of the offence have been proved beyond reasonable doubt. When your verdict is taken, you will only be asked about this circumstance if you have found the accused guilty of the offence. I will tell you later how your verdicts are to be taken by my associate.

---

[647] If more than one circumstance of aggravation is in issue, the judge should consider spelling out that the jury must agree on a particular circumstance of aggravation.

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was between 12 and 16 and under the care, supervision or authority of the accused, add the following shaded section.]

One of the "circumstances of aggravation" specified by the law is that the complainant was aged between 12 and 16 at the time that the alleged act of sexual penetration took place, and was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

This is a two-part test. You must first be satisfied that NOC was aged between 12 and 16. You must also be satisfied that NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority at the time the alleged act of sexual penetration took place. These are ordinary everyday English words.

The relationship of care, supervision or authority does not have to be a formal one. There does not, for example, have to have been a formal agreement that the accused would take care of the complainant. An informal relationship of care, support or authority is sufficient.

[If relevant, add: You do not need to find that the occasion on which the alleged act of penetration took place was connected with, or arose out of, the relationship of care, supervision or authority. It is sufficient if you are satisfied that there was an ongoing relationship of care, supervision or authority between NOA and NOC, and that that relationship existed on the day on which the penetration took place.]

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOC was [insert age] at the relevant time, and was under NOA's [care/supervision/authority]. [Insert relevant evidence and competing arguments.]

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proved this circumstance of aggravation beyond reasonable doubt. I want to remind you, however, that you must first determine whether the elements of the offence have been proved beyond reasonable doubt. When your verdict is taken, you will only be asked about this circumstance if you have found the accused guilty of the crime. I will tell you later how your verdicts are to be taken by my associate.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt: ·

One – that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC; and

Two – that NOA intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration; and

Three – that NOC was under the age of 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16.

[If any circumstances of aggravation are in issue, add the following shaded section.]

If you find that all of these elements have been proved, you must then consider whether circumstances of aggravation have been established.

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was under the age of 12, add: You must decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was under 12 at the time of the alleged penetration.]

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was between 12 and 16 and under the care, supervision or authority of the accused, add: You must decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was aged between 12 and 16 at the time of the alleged penetration, and was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.]

Taking the verdict

When you have reached your verdict and returned to this court room, my associate will ask you whether you have agreed on a verdict, and what your verdict is. You, [Mr/Madam] foreman, will answer "guilty" or "not guilty", according to the decision the jury has reached.

If you answer guilty, you will then be asked whether you have reached agreement about the circumstances of aggravation, to which you, [Madam/Mr] foreman will answer according to what the jury have decided.

Last updated: 22 January 2016

7.3.13.2 Checklist: Sexual Penetration of a Child under the Age of 16 (From 17/3/10) Consent Not in Issue

Click here for a downloadable version of this document for adaptation

This checklist includes two aggravating circumstances which are mutually exclusive. If both circumstances are alleged in a single case because of uncertainty about the date of offending, the numbering and instructions of the aggravating circumstances should be changed.

The Elements

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant; and

2. The accused intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration; and

3. The complainant was under the age of 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

Accused's Acts

1. Did the accused take part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 16

Accused's Intention

2. Did the accused intend to take part in that act of sexual penetration with the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 16

The Complainant's Age

3. Was the complainant under the age of 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 16 (as long as you have also answered yes to questions 1 and 2). Go to aggravating circumstances.

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 16

Aggravating Circumstances

[If it is alleged in the presentment that the complainant was under the age of 12 at the time of the offence, add the following section.]

4. Was the complainant under the age of 12 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If Yes, then you are satisfied the child was under 12

If No, then you are not satisfied the child was under 12

[If it is alleged in the presentment that the complainant was between the ages of 12 and 16 at the time of the offence, and was under care, supervision or authority of the accused, add the following section.]

4. Was the complainant between the ages of 12 and 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then you are not satisfied the child was between 12 and 16 and under the accused's care, supervision and authority

5. Was the complainant under the care, supervision or authority of the accused at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If Yes, then you are satisfied the child was between 12 and 16 and under the accused's care, supervision and authority

If No, then you are not satisfied the child was between 12 and 16 and under the accused's care, supervision and authority

Last updated: 19 September 2019

7.3.13.3 Charge: Sexual Penetration of a Child under 16 (Pre-17/3/10) Consent Not in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for trials involving offences alleged to have been committed before 17/3/2010 where neither consent nor any precondition for relying on consent as a defence is in issue.

I must now direct you about the crime of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant.

Two – the accused did this intentionally.

Three – the complainant was under the age of 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[648]

[648] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

Taking part in an act of sexual penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant. [If the conscious, voluntary or deliberate nature of the act is in issue,[649] add: The prosecution must also prove that the relevant acts of the accused were performed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.]

The law defines sexual penetration as the introduction of a person's penis, body part or object into another person's vagina or anus. It also includes putting a penis into someone's mouth.

For this first element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove that NOA took part in one of these acts. The law says that both the person who sexually penetrates and the person who is penetrated are regarded as "taking part" in sexual penetration. [If relevant add: This means that if you find that NOA was sexually penetrated by NOC, you will be satisfied that the accused "took part" in that act of sexual penetration.]

In this case the prosecution seeks to prove that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC [describe relevant form of penetration, e.g. "by putting his finger into NOC's anus"/"when he took NOC's penis in his mouth"].

[If relevant add:

- [Identify item or body part and actor] does not need to have gone all the way into [NOC/NOA's] [vagina/anus/mouth]. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation].

[If the conscious, voluntary or deliberate nature of the acts are in issue, add the following shaded section.]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant act of participation, e.g. "introducing his finger into NOC's anus"/"receiving NOC's penis into his mouth"] must have been done consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that [NOA/NOC] introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of [NOA/NOC's] vagina.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

However, according to the law, the introduction of an object or body part other than the penis into a person's [vagina/anus] does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

[649] Described hereafter as the "voluntariness" requirement.

In this case [insert evidence and arguments relevant to proof of this element].

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused intended to take part in the act of sexual penetration with the complainant.[650]

[If intention is not in issue, add the shaded section.]

This element is not in issue here. [If appropriate, explain further, e.g. "If you are satisfied that the accused [consciously, voluntarily and deliberately] sexually penetrated the complainant, you should have no trouble finding that s/he did so intentionally".]

Child under the age of 16

The third element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that s/he was under the age of 16 when the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was under 16 at that time. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[651]

Statutory defences and exclusions

Accused married to the complainant

[If the accused alleged that s/he was married to the complainant, who was aged between 10 and 16 at the time of the alleged penetration, add the following shaded section.]

Even if these three elements are met, the law states that a person is not guilty of this offence if the accused and the complainant were married to each other at the time of the alleged penetration, and the complainant was at least 10 years' old at that time.

In this case [insert relevant evidence and competing arguments].

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was not married to NOC at the time of the alleged act of sexual penetration, or that NOC was aged under 10 at the relevant time. If the prosecution cannot prove at least one of these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

---

[650] Because sexual penetration of a child under 16 is an offence of basic intent (the intent to take part in the act of penetration), the issue of intention is only likely to arise in cases involving penetration of the accused by the complainant. In cases where the accused is alleged to have penetrated the complainant, proof of intent will rarely be separated from proof of the act, and "intention" will rarely be an independent issue. Mental state issues related to the intention to penetrate (e.g. the negation of intent by involuntariness, unconsciousness or accident) should generally be addressed by voluntariness directions.

[651] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

Consent is not a defence

[This charge is designed for use in cases where consent is not in issue. Use one of the charges listed at the beginning of this document if consent or a precondition for consideration of consent (belief in age, age gap of less than 2 years, or marriage to complainant) is contested.]

To protect children under the age of 16, Parliament has created a number of offences where consent is not relevant. This is one of those offences, so you do not need to consider the issue of whether or not NOC agreed to take part in the alleged act of sexual penetration.

Circumstances of Aggravation

[If any circumstances of aggravation have been alleged in the indictment, add the following shaded section.]

The law has specified certain "circumstances of aggravation" which you must consider if you find that each of the elements of this offence has been proved. These are not elements of the offence, but circumstances which make the crime more serious. Like the elements of the offence, these are matters which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt and you can only find a circumstance of aggravation if you all agree that circumstance exists.[652]

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was under the age of 10, add the following shaded section.]

One of the "circumstances of aggravation" specified by the law is that the complainant was under the age of 10 at the time that the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case [insert relevant evidence and competing arguments about the complainant's age].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proved this circumstance of aggravation beyond reasonable doubt. I want to remind you, however, that you must first determine whether the elements of the offence have been proved beyond reasonable doubt. When your verdict is taken, you will only be asked about this circumstance if you have found the accused guilty of the offence. I will tell you later how your verdicts are to be taken by my associate.

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was between 10 and 16 and under the care, supervision or authority of the accused, add the following shaded section.]

One of the "circumstances of aggravation" specified by the law is that the complainant was aged between 10 and 16 at the time that the alleged act of sexual penetration took place, and was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

This is a two-part test. You must first be satisfied that NOC was aged between 10 and 16. You must also be satisfied that NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority at the time the alleged act of sexual penetration took place. These are ordinary everyday English words.

The relationship of care, supervision or authority does not have to be a formal one. There does not, for example, have to have been a formal agreement that the accused would take care of the complainant. An informal relationship of care, support or authority is sufficient.

[If relevant, add: You do not need to find that the occasion on which the alleged act of penetration took place was connected with, or arose out of, the relationship of care, supervision or authority. It is sufficient if you are satisfied that there was an ongoing relationship of care, supervision or authority between NOA and NOC, and that that relationship existed on the day on which the penetration took place.]

---

[652] If more than one circumstance of aggravation is in issue, the judge should consider spelling out that the jury must agree on a particular circumstance of aggravation.

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOC was [insert age] at the relevant time, and was under NOA's [care/supervision/authority]. [Insert relevant evidence and competing arguments].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proved this circumstance of aggravation beyond reasonable doubt. I want to remind you, however, that you must first determine whether the elements of the offence have been proved beyond reasonable doubt. When your verdict is taken, you will only be asked about this circumstance if you have found the accused guilty of the crime. I will tell you later how your verdicts are to be taken by my associate.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC; and

Two – that NOA intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration; and

Three – that NOC was under the age of 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16.

[If any circumstances of aggravation are in issue, add the following shaded section.]

If you find that all of these elements have been proved, you must then consider whether circumstances of aggravation have been established.

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was under the age of 10, add: You must decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was under 10 at the time of the alleged penetration.]

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was between 10 and 16 and under the care, supervision or authority of the accused, add: You must decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was aged between 10 and 16 at the time of the alleged penetration, and was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.]

Taking the verdict

When you have reached your verdict and returned to this court room, my associate will ask you whether you have agreed on a verdict, and what your verdict is. You, [Mr/Madam] foreman, will answer "guilty" or "not guilty", according to the decision the jury has reached.

If you answer guilty, you will then be asked whether you have reached agreement about the circumstances of aggravation, to which you, [Madam/Mr] foreman will answer according to what the jury have decided.

Last updated: 19 March 2015

7.3.13.4 Checklist: Sexual Penetration of a Child under the Age of 16 Consent Not in Issue (Pre-17/3/10)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist includes two aggravating circumstances which are mutually exclusive. If both circumstances are alleged in a single case because of uncertainty about the date of offending, the numbering and instructions of the aggravating circumstances should be changed.

The Elements

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant; and
2. The accused intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration; and
3. The complainant was under the age of 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

Accused's Acts

1. Did the accused take part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 16

Accused's Intention

2. Did the accused intend to take part in that act of sexual penetration with the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 16

The Complainant's Age

3. Was the complainant under the age of 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 16 (as long as you have also answered yes to questions 1 and 2). Go to aggravating circumstances.

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 16

Aggravating Circumstances

[If it is alleged in the presentment that the complainant was under the age of 10 at the time of the offence, add the following section.]

4. Was the complainant under the age of 10 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If Yes, then you are satisfied the child was under 10

If No, then you are not satisfied the child was under 10

[If it is alleged in the presentment that the complainant was between the ages of 10 and 16 at the time of the offence, and was under care, supervision or authority of the accused, add the following section.]

4. Was the complainant between the ages of 10 and 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then you are not satisfied the child was between 10 and 16 and under the accused's care, supervision and authority

5. Was the complainant under the care, supervision or authority of the accused at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If Yes, then you are satisfied the child was between 10 and 16 and under the accused's care, supervision and authority

If No, then you are not satisfied the child was between 10 and 16 and under the accused's care, supervision and authority

Last updated: 19 September 2019

7.3.13.5 Charge: Sexual Penetration of a Child under 16 (From 1/7/15) Consent in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for trials involving offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1/7/2015 where consent is in issue (because the complainant was aged 12 or over and the accused relies on a circumstance described in s 45(4)).

I must now direct you about the crime of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant.

Two – the accused did this intentionally.

Three – the complainant was under the age of 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[653]

Taking part in an act of sexual penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant. [If the conscious, voluntary or deliberate nature of the act is in issue,[654] add: The prosecution must also prove that the relevant acts of the accused were performed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.]

The law defines sexual penetration as the introduction of a person's penis, body part or object into another person's vagina or anus. It also includes putting a penis into someone's mouth.

[653] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proved."

[654] Described hereafter as the "voluntariness" requirement.

For this first element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove that NOA took part in one of these acts. The law says that both the person who sexually penetrates and the person who is penetrated are regarded as "taking part" in sexual penetration. [If relevant add: This means that if you find that NOA was sexually penetrated by NOC, you will be satisfied that the accused "took part" in that act of sexual penetration.]

In this case the prosecution seeks to prove that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC [describe relevant form of penetration, e.g. "by putting his finger into NOC's anus"/"when he took NOC's penis in his mouth"].

[If relevant add:

- [Identify item or body part and actor] does not need to have gone all the way into [NOC/NOA's] [vagina/anus/mouth]. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation].

[If the evidence or arguments have placed the conscious, voluntary or deliberate nature of the acts in issue, add the following shaded section.]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant act of participation, e.g. "introducing his finger into NOC's anus"/"receiving NOC's penis into his mouth"] must have been done consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that [NOA/NOC] introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of [NOA/NOC's] vagina.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

However, according to the law, the introduction of an object or body part other than the penis into a person's [vagina/anus] does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

In this case [insert evidence and arguments relevant to proof of this element].

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused intended to take part in the act of sexual penetration with the complainant.[655]

[If intention is not in issue, add the shaded section.]

This element is not in issue here. [If appropriate, explain further, e.g. "if you are satisfied that the accused [consciously, voluntarily and deliberately] sexually penetrated the complainant, you should have no trouble finding that s/he did so intentionally".]

Child under the age of 16

The third element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that s/he was under the age of 16 when the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was under 16 at that time. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[656]

Statutory defences and exclusions

Consent

Consent can only be in issue if the complainant was aged 12 or older at the time of the offence. If age is in issue in this respect this charge will need to be modified.

This charge addresses consent coupled with a belief on reasonable grounds that the child was aged 16 or older (s 45(4)(a)). If the issue is s 45(4)(b) (accused not more than 2 years older than the complainant) or s 45(4)(c) (accused believed on reasonable grounds that s/he was married to the complainant) the charge will need to be adapted accordingly. See Sexual penetration of a child under 16 (1/1/92 – 30/6/17) for guidance.

Warning! It is not clear whether Crimes Act 1958 s 322T affects the relevance of intoxication to this defence. Judges should seek submissions from the parties on this issue where relevant.

Belief that complainant was aged 16 or more

Even if you find that the prosecution has proved all three elements of this offence, NOA will not necessarily be guilty of this offence. This is because, in certain circumstances, consent will be a defence.

---

[655] Because sexual penetration of a child under 16 is an offence of basic intent (the intent to take part in the act of penetration), the issue of intention is only likely to arise in cases involving penetration of the accused by the complainant. In cases where the accused is alleged to have penetrated the complainant, proof of intent will rarely be separated from proof of the act, and "intention" will rarely be an independent issue. Mental state issues related to the intention to penetrate (e.g. the negation of intent by involuntariness, unconsciousness or accident) should generally be addressed by voluntariness directions.

[656] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

The law states that consent is available as a defence if the accused believed on reasonable grounds that the complainant was at least 16 years old at the time of the alleged penetration.

Unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – this belief is a matter which the accused must prove on the balance of probabilities. That is, the accused must prove that it is more likely than not that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that NOC was aged 16 or over for consent to be available as a defence.

So, by contrast to proof of the elements of the offence(s), where the prosecution must satisfy you beyond reasonable doubt of them, for the defence of reasonable belief to be established to your satisfaction, it is for the accused, not the prosecution to prove the existence of a reasonable belief in age.

And the standard to which the defence must do this is a lesser standard than proof beyond reasonable doubt, it is proof on the balance of probabilities. That is, the accused must satisfy you that it is more likely than not that he believed, on reasonable grounds, that the complainant was 16 or over.

In this case [insert relevant evidence and competing arguments].

[If the prosecution has conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section.]

As it is not in issue in this case that the sexual act was consensual, if the accused satisfied you, on the balance of probabilities that s/he believed, on reasonable grounds, that at the time s/he took part in the act of sexual penetration, that the complainant was 16 or over, then your verdict in respect of that charge will be not guilty. If however, the accused does not satisfy you on the balance of probabilities that at the time he believed the complainant was 16 or over, and that his belief was based on reasonable grounds, then despite the fact that the act was consensual, this defence will fail.

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

Warning: It is an unresolved question whether the prosecution must prove that the accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting. This Charge Book requires proof of awareness of non-consent as a matter of prudence. See 7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent (Pre-1/7/15) for more information.

If, however, you find that the NOA has proven that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that NOC was at least 16 years old at the time of the alleged indecent act, then you will need to determine whether the prosecution have proved two additional elements: first, that NOC did not consent to the alleged act of sexual penetration and second, that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

Definition of consent

Dealing with the first of these additional elements, consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So NOC will not have consented to the sexual penetration if s/he did not freely agree to take part in that act.

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not freely agree to the sexual penetration. So if consent is relevant to your determination, and the prosecution cannot prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not freely agree to the sexual penetration, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

[Where a party requests a direction about the meaning of consent, add one or more of the following shaded paragraphs.]

The law says that a person can consent to an act only if they are capable of consenting, and free to choose whether or not to engage in or to allow the act.

The law says that where a person has given their consent to an act, they may withdraw that consent before the act happens or at any time while it is happening.

[Where a party requests a direction about the circumstances in which a person is taken not to have consented, add the following darker shaded section.]

In some circumstances the law says that the complainant did not freely agree, or consent, to an act. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because s/he is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep or unconscious;

(e) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of consenting to the act;

(f) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of withdrawing consent to the act;[657]

(g) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(h) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act;

(i) the person is mistaken about the identity of any other person involved in the act;

(j) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes;

(k) if the act involves an animal, the person mistakenly believes that the act is for veterinary, agricultural or scientific research purposes;

(l) the person does not say or do anything to indicate consent to the act;

(m) having initially given consent to the act, the person later withdraws consent to the act taking place or continuing].

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting.

However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

[If there is evidence that the complainant did not say or do anything to indicate agreement, add the following darker shaded section.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to the alleged act of sexual penetration at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

[Where a party requests a direction about the absence of physical resistance or protest, lack of physical injury or past consensual sexual conduct, add the following shaded section as relevant to the facts in issue.]

---

[657] Only for offences committed from 1 July 2017.

The law also says the complainant is not to be regarded as having freely agreed just because:

- [if relevant] s/he did not protest or physically resist the accused;
- [if relevant] s/he did not sustain physical injury;
- [if relevant] s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act on that occasion with the accused or with any other person, or that s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act with the accused or another person on an earlier occasion.

However, these are relevant factors for you to consider. You must consider the action or lack of action of NOC, together with all the surrounding circumstances, in order to decide whether the prosecution has proven beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not consent.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to the alleged sexual penetration, you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done at the time of that act, or not said and done at the time of the alleged act, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about [his/her] state of mind at that time.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC did not consent. [Insert relevant evidence and competing arguments.]

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt this first additional element that NOC did not consent, then you must find NOA not guilty.

Awareness of Lack of Consent

Turning now to the second additional element, if consent is available as a defence, the prosecution must also prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of the alleged act of sexual penetration the accused was aware either:

- that the complainant was not consenting; or
- that the complainant might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these state(s) of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

[Warning! If this element is in issue, the judge should invite submissions on how to direct the jury about this issue. With the repeal of Crimes Act 1958 s 37AA, it may not be prudent to use 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent (Pre 1/07/2015).]

Onus and standard of proof

Remember, you may not need to consider the issue of consent. The process that you must follow is this. First, you must decide if the prosecution has proven the three elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt. That is, the prosecution must prove that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC, that s/he intended to take part in the act of sexual penetration, and that NOC was under the age of 16 at the relevant time. If the prosecution cannot prove all three of these elements, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Next, if you find that the prosecution has proven each of these elements beyond reasonable doubt, and the accused has raised the issue as to belief in age, you must then decide if NOA has proven, on the balance of probabilities, that s/he believed that NOC was at least 16 years old, and that that belief was based on reasonable grounds. If the accused cannot prove both of these matters, then NOA will be guilty of this offence, as long as the prosecution have proven each of the first three elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt.

If, however, you find that the accused has proven these matters as to belief in age on the balance of probabilities, you must then decide whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, the two additional elements that NOC did not consent, and that NOA was aware that s/he was not or might not be consenting. If the prosecution cannot prove both of these things, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence. It is only if you are satisfied that they have been proven beyond reasonable doubt, together with each of the first three elements of the offence, that you can convict NOA of indecent act with a child under 16.

Circumstances of Aggravation

[If any circumstances of aggravation have been alleged in the indictment, add the following shaded section.]

The law has specified certain "circumstances of aggravation" which you must consider if you find that each of the elements of this offence has been proved. These are not elements of the offence, but circumstances which make the crime more serious. Like the elements of the offence, these are matters which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt and you can only find a circumstance of aggravation if you all agree that circumstance exists.[658]

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was under the age of 12, add the following shaded section.]

One of the "circumstances of aggravation" specified by the law is that the complainant was under the age of 12 at the time that the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case [insert relevant evidence and competing arguments about the complainant's age].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proved this circumstance of aggravation beyond reasonable doubt. I want to remind you, however, that you must first determine whether the elements of the offence have been proved beyond reasonable doubt. When your verdict is taken, you will only be asked about this circumstance if you have found the accused guilty of the offence. I will tell you later how your verdicts are to be taken by my associate.

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was between 12 and 16 and under the care, supervision or authority of the accused, add the following shaded section.]

One of the "circumstances of aggravation" specified by the law is that the complainant was aged between 12 and 16 at the time that the alleged act of sexual penetration took place, and was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

This is a two-part test. You must first be satisfied that NOC was aged between 12 and 16. You must also be satisfied that NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority at the time the alleged act of sexual penetration took place. These are ordinary everyday English words.

The relationship of care, supervision or authority does not have to be a formal one. There does not, for example, have to have been a formal agreement that the accused would take care of the complainant. An informal relationship of care, support or authority is sufficient.

[If relevant, add: You do not need to find that the occasion on which the alleged act of penetration took place was connected with, or arose out of, the relationship of care, supervision or authority. It is

---

[658] If more than one circumstance of aggravation is in issue, the judge should consider spelling out that the jury must agree on a particular circumstance of aggravation.

sufficient if you are satisfied that there was an ongoing relationship of care, supervision or authority between NOA and NOC, and that that relationship existed on the day on which the penetration took place.]

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOC was [insert age] at the relevant time, and was under NOA's [care/supervision/authority]. [Insert prosecution evidence]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proved this circumstance of aggravation beyond reasonable doubt. I want to remind you, however, that you must first determine whether the elements of the offence have been proved beyond reasonable doubt. When your verdict is taken, you will only be asked about this circumstance if you have found the accused guilty of the crime. I will tell you later how your verdicts are to be taken by my associate.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

- One – that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC; and
- Two – that NOA intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration; and
- Three – that NOC was under the age of 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16.

If you decide that each of these elements have been proved beyond reasonable doubt, you must decide if the accused has proved, on the balance of probabilities:

- That NOA believed that NOC was aged 16 or older at the relevant time; and
- That NOA had reasonable grounds for that belief.

If the accused has not proved both of these matters on the balance of probabilities, and you find that all of the elements have been proved by the prosecution beyond reasonable doubt, then NOA will be guilty of the offence. However, if you find that both of these matters have been proved by the accused on the balance of probabilities, you must then decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC did not consent to the act of sexual penetration and that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

[If the prosecution conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section.]

Since the prosecution does not dispute the accused's claim that [insert basis of concession about consent, e.g. "NOC was consenting" or "s/he believed that NOC was consenting"], you must, if you reach this point, find NOA not guilty of this offence.

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

If the prosecution cannot prove these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16.

[If any circumstances of aggravation are in issue, add the following shaded section.]

If you find that all of these elements have been proved, you must then consider whether circumstances of aggravation have been established.

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was under the age of 12, add: You must decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was under 12 at the time of the alleged penetration.]

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was between 12 and 16 and under the care, supervision or authority of the accused, add: You must decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was aged between 12 and 16 at the time of the alleged penetration, and was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.]

Taking the verdict

When you have reached your verdict and returned to this court room, my associate will ask you whether you have agreed on a verdict, and what your verdict is. You, [Mr/Madam] foreman, will answer "guilty" or "not guilty", according to the decision the jury has reached.

If you answer guilty, you will then be asked whether you have reached agreement about the circumstances of aggravation. My associate will ask you "Do you find that [describe relevant aggravating circumstances]?", to which you, [Madam/Mr] foreman will answer "yes" or "no", according to what the jury have decided.

Last updated: 30 November 2017

7.3.13.6 Charge: Sexual Penetration of a Child under 16 (17/3/10–30/6/15) Consent in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for trials involving offences alleged to have been committed between 17/3/2010 and 30/6/2015 where consent is in issue (because the complainant was aged 12 or over and the accused relies on a circumstance described in s 45(4)).

I must now direct you about the crime of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant.

Two – the accused did this intentionally.

Three – the complainant was under the age of 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[659]

Taking part in an act of sexual penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant. [If the conscious, voluntary or deliberate nature of the act is in issue,[660] add: The prosecution must also prove that the relevant acts of the accused were performed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.]

The law defines sexual penetration as the introduction of a person's penis, body part or object into another person's vagina or anus. It also includes putting a penis into someone's mouth.

---

[659] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[660] Described hereafter as the "voluntariness" requirement.

For this first element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove that NOA took part in one of these acts. The law says that both the person who sexually penetrates and the person who is penetrated are regarded as "taking part" in sexual penetration. [If relevant add: This means that if you find that NOA was sexually penetrated by NOC, you will be satisfied that the accused "took part" in that act of sexual penetration.]

In this case the prosecution seeks to prove that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC [describe relevant form of penetration, e.g. "by putting his finger into NOC's anus"/"when he took NOC's penis in his mouth"].

[If relevant add:

- [Identify item or body part and actor] does not need to have gone all the way into [NOC/NOA's] [vagina/anus/mouth]. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation].

[If the evidence or arguments have placed the conscious, voluntary or deliberate nature of the acts in issue, add the following shaded section.]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant act of participation, e.g. "introducing his finger into NOC's anus"/"receiving NOC's penis into his mouth"] must have been done consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that [NOA/NOC] introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of [NOA/NOC's] vagina.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

However, according to the law, the introduction of an object or body part other than the penis into a person's [vagina/anus] does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

In this case [insert evidence and arguments relevant to proof of this element].

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused intended to take part in the act of sexual penetration with the complainant.[661]

[If intention is not in issue, add the shaded section.]

This element is not in issue here. [If appropriate, explain further, e.g. "if you are satisfied that the accused [consciously, voluntarily and deliberately] sexually penetrated the complainant, you should have no trouble finding that s/he did so intentionally".]

Child under the age of 16

The third element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that s/he was under the age of 16 when the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was under 16 at that time. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[662]

Statutory defences and exclusions

Accused married to the complainant

[For offences allegedly committed before 22 October 2014, if the accused alleged that s/he was married to the complainant, who was aged between 12 and 16 at the time of the alleged penetration, add the following shaded section.]

Even if these three elements are met, the law states that a person is not guilty of this offence if the accused and the complainant were married to each other at the time of the alleged penetration, and the complainant was at least 12 years' old at that time.

In this case [insert relevant evidence and competing arguments].

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was not married to NOC at the time of the alleged act of sexual penetration, or that NOC was aged under 12 at the relevant time. If the prosecution cannot prove at least one of these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

---

[661] Because sexual penetration of a child under 16 is an offence of basic intent (the intent to take part in the act of penetration), the issue of intention is only likely to arise in cases involving penetration of the accused by the complainant. In cases where the accused is alleged to have penetrated the complainant, proof of intent will rarely be separated from proof of the act, and "intention" will rarely be an independent issue. Mental state issues related to the intention to penetrate (e.g. the negation of intent by involuntariness, unconsciousness or accident) should generally be addressed by voluntariness directions.

[662] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

Consent

Consent can only be in issue if the complainant was aged 12 or older at the time of the offence. If age is in issue in this respect this charge will need to be modified.

This charge addresses consent coupled with a belief on reasonable grounds that the child was aged 16 or older (s 45(4)(a)). If the issue is s 45(4)(b) (accused not more than 2 years older than the complainant) or s 45(4)(c) (accused believed on reasonable grounds that s/he was married to the complainant) the charge will need to be adapted accordingly. See Sexual penetration of a child under 16 (1/1/92–30/6/17) for guidance.

Warning! For offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1 November 2014, it is not clear whether Crimes Act 1958 s 322T affects the relevance of intoxication to this defence. Judges should seek submissions from the parties on this issue where relevant.

Belief that complainant was aged 16 or more

Even if you find that the prosecution has proved all three elements of this offence, NOA will not necessarily be guilty of this offence. This is because, in certain circumstances, consent will be a defence.

The law states that consent is available as a defence if the accused believed on reasonable grounds that the complainant was at least 16 years old at the time of the alleged penetration.

Unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – this belief is a matter which the accused must prove on the balance of probabilities. That is, the accused must prove that it is more likely than not that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that NOC was aged 16 or over for consent to be available as a defence.

So, by contrast to proof of the elements of the offence(s), where the prosecution must satisfy you beyond reasonable doubt of them, for the defence of reasonable belief to be established to your satisfaction, it is for the accused, not the prosecution to prove the existence of a reasonable belief in age.

And the standard to which the defence must do this is a lesser standard than proof beyond reasonable doubt, it is proof on the balance of probabilities. That is, the accused must satisfy you that it is more likely than not that he believed, on reasonable grounds, that the complainant was 16 or over.

In this case [insert relevant evidence and competing arguments].

[If the prosecution has conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section.]

As it is not in issue in this case that the sexual act was consensual, if the accused satisfied you, on the balance of probabilities that s/he believed, on reasonable grounds, that at the time s/he took part in the act of sexual penetration, that the complainant was 16 or over, then your verdict in respect of that charge will be not guilty. If however, the accused does not satisfy you on the balance of probabilities that at the time he believed the complainant was 16 or over, and that his belief was based on reasonable grounds, then despite the fact that the act was consensual, this defence will fail.

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

Warning: It is an unresolved question whether the prosecution must prove that the accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting. This Charge Book requires proof of awareness of non-consent as a matter of prudence. See 7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent (Pre-1/7/15) for more information.

If, however, you find that the NOA has proved that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that NOC was at least 16 years old at the time of the alleged penetration, then you will need to determine whether the prosecution have proved two additional elements: first, that NOC did not consent to the alleged act of sexual penetration and second, that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

Definition of consent

Dealing with the first of these additional elements, consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So NOC will not have consented to the sexual penetration if s/he did not freely agree to take part in that act.

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not freely agree to the sexual penetration. So if consent is relevant to your determination, and the prosecution cannot prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not freely agree to the penetration, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

The law identifies a number of circumstances where the complainant is deemed not to freely agree, or consent, to sexual penetration. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because s/he is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep, unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of freely agreeing;

(e) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(f) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act or the identity of the person;

(g) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting. However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proved.

[If there is evidence that the complainant did not say or do anything to indicate agreement, add the following darker shaded section.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to the sexual penetration at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

[Where evidence is given about the absence of physical resistance, lack of physical injury or past consensual sex, add the following darker shaded section if relevant to the facts in issue.]

The law also says the complainant is not to be regarded as having freely agreed just because:

- [if relevant] s/he did not protest or physically resist the accused;
- [if relevant] s/he did not sustain physical injury;
- [if relevant] s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act on that occasion with the accused or with any other person, or that s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act with the accused or another person on an earlier occasion.

However, these are relevant factors for you to consider. You must consider the action or lack of action of NOC, together with all the surrounding circumstances, in order to decide whether the prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not consent.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to take part in the act of sexual penetration, you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done at the time of the alleged penetration, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about [his/her] state of mind at that time. You can also consider what s/he did not say or do at the time of the alleged penetration.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC did not consent. [Insert relevant evidence and competing arguments.]

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt this first additional element that NOC did not consent, then you must find NOA not guilty.

Awareness of Lack of Consent

Turning now to the second additional element, if consent is available as a defence, the prosecution must also prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of the alleged sexual penetration the accused was aware either:

- that the complainant was not consenting; or
- that the complainant might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these state(s) of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Belief in consent

[If evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting, add one of the directions in 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent.]

Onus and standard of proof

Remember, you may not need to consider the issue of consent. The process that you must follow is this. First, you must decide if the prosecution has proved the three elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt. That is, the prosecution must prove that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC, that s/he intended to take part in the act of sexual penetration, and that NOC was under the age of 16 at the relevant time. If the prosecution cannot prove all three of these elements, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Next, if you find that the prosecution has proved each of these elements beyond reasonable doubt, and the accused has raised the issue as to belief in age, you must then decide if NOA has proved, on the balance of probabilities, that s/he believed that NOC was at least 16 years old, and that that belief was based on reasonable grounds. If the accused cannot prove both of these matters, then NOA will be guilty of this offence, as long as the prosecution have proved each of the first three elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt.

If, however, you find that the accused has proved these matters as to belief in age on the balance of probabilities, you must then decide whether the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, the two additional elements that NOC did not consent, and that NOA was aware that s/he was not or might not be consenting. If the prosecution cannot prove both of these things, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence. It is only if you are satisfied that they have been proved beyond reasonable doubt, together with each of the first three elements of the offence, that you can convict NOA of sexual penetration of a child under 16.

Circumstances of Aggravation

[If any circumstances of aggravation have been alleged in the indictment, add the following shaded section.]

The law has specified certain "circumstances of aggravation" which you must consider if you find that each of the elements of this offence has been proved. These are not elements of the offence, but circumstances which make the crime more serious. Like the elements of the offence, these are matters which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt and you can only find a circumstance of aggravation if you all agree that circumstance exists.[663]

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was under the age of 12, add the following shaded section.]

One of the "circumstances of aggravation" specified by the law is that the complainant was under the age of 12 at the time that the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case [insert relevant evidence and competing arguments about the complainant's age].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proved this circumstance of aggravation beyond reasonable doubt. I want to remind you, however, that you must first determine whether the elements of the offence have been proved beyond reasonable doubt. When your verdict is taken, you will only be asked about this circumstance if you have found the accused guilty of the offence. I will tell you later how your verdicts are to be taken by my associate.

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was between 12 and 16 and under the care, supervision or authority of the accused, add the following shaded section.]

One of the "circumstances of aggravation" specified by the law is that the complainant was aged between 12 and 16 at the time that the alleged act of sexual penetration took place, and was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

This is a two-part test. You must first be satisfied that NOC was aged between 12 and 16. You must also be satisfied that NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority at the time the alleged act of sexual penetration took place. These are ordinary everyday English words.

The relationship of care, supervision or authority does not have to be a formal one. There does not, for example, have to have been a formal agreement that the accused would take care of the complainant. An informal relationship of care, support or authority is sufficient.

[If relevant, add: You do not need to find that the occasion on which the alleged act of penetration took place was connected with, or arose out of, the relationship of care, supervision or authority. It is sufficient if you are satisfied that there was an ongoing relationship of care, supervision or authority between NOA and NOC, and that that relationship existed on the day on which the penetration took place.]

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOC was [insert age] at the relevant time, and was under NOA's [care/supervision/authority]. [Insert prosecution evidence.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proved this circumstance of aggravation beyond reasonable doubt. I want to remind you, however, that you must first determine whether the elements of the offence have been proved beyond reasonable doubt. When your verdict is taken, you will only be asked about this circumstance if you have found the accused guilty of the crime. I will tell you later how your verdicts are to be taken by my associate.

---

[663] If more than one circumstance of aggravation is in issue, the judge should consider spelling out that the jury must agree on a particular circumstance of aggravation.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC; and

Two – that NOA intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration; and

Three – that NOC was under the age of 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16.

If you decide that each of these elements have been proved beyond reasonable doubt, you must decide if the accused has proved, on the balance of probabilities:

- That NOA believed that NOC was aged 16 or older at the relevant time; and
- That NOA had reasonable grounds for that belief.

If the accused has not proved both of these matters on the balance of probabilities, and you find that all of the elements have been proved by the prosecution beyond reasonable doubt, then NOA will be guilty of the offence. However, if you find that both of these matters have been proved by the accused on the balance of probabilities, you must then decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC did not consent to the act of sexual penetration and that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

[If the prosecution conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section.]

Since the prosecution does not dispute the accused's claim that [insert basis of concession about consent, e.g. "NOC was consenting" or "s/he believed that NOC was consenting"], you must, if you reach this point, find NOA not guilty of this offence.

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

If the prosecution cannot prove these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16.

[If any circumstances of aggravation are in issue, add the following shaded section.]

If you find that all of these elements have been proved, you must then consider whether circumstances of aggravation have been established.

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was under the age of 12, add: You must decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was under 12 at the time of the alleged penetration.]

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was between 12 and 16 and under the care, supervision or authority of the accused, add: You must decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was aged between 12 and 16 at the time of the alleged penetration, and was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.]

Taking the verdict

When you have reached your verdict and returned to this court room, my associate will ask you whether you have agreed on a verdict, and what your verdict is. You, [Mr/Madam] foreman, will answer "guilty" or "not guilty", according to the decision the jury has reached.

If you answer guilty, you will then be asked whether you have reached agreement about the circumstances of aggravation. My associate will ask you "Do you find that [describe relevant aggravating circumstances]?", to which you, [Madam/Mr] foreman will answer "yes" or "no", according to what the jury have decided.

Last updated: 30 November 2017

7.3.13.7 Checklist: Sexual Penetration of a Child under 16 (From 17/3/10) Consent in Issue

Click here for a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist is designed for offences committed on or after 17 March 2010.

The Elements

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant; and
2. The accused intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration; and
3. The complainant was under the age of 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

Accused's Acts

1. Did the accused take part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 16

Accused's Intention

2. Did the accused intend to take part in that act of sexual penetration with the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 16

The Complainant's Age

3. Was the complainant under the age of 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 16

Relevance of Consent

[Consent can only be relevant where the complainant was aged 12 or over at the time of the offence. If the complainant's age is in issue in this respect this checklist will need to be modified. This section of the checklist can be used if the accused alleged that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that the complainant was 16 or older and consented to the act of sexual penetration. If consent is in issue because the accused alleged that s/he is not more than 2 years older than the complainant, or that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that s/he was married to the complainant, it will need to be modified as necessary.]

Consent is only relevant if you are satisfied the defence has proven, on the balance of probabilities, both that:

4. The accused believed that the complainant was aged 16 or older at the time the act of sexual penetration took place; and

5. The accused's belief that the complainant was aged 16 or older was based on reasonable grounds.

Lack of Consent

If consent is relevant, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that:

6. The complainant did not consent to taking part in the act of sexual penetration; and

7. The accused was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

Consent

6. Did the sexual penetration occur without the complainant's consent?

If Yes, then go to 7

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 16 (as long as you answered yes to questions 4 and 5)

Awareness of Lack of Consent

7. At the time of sexual penetration, was the accused aware that the complainant was not consenting or that s/he might not be consenting?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 16 (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3 and 6). Go to aggravating circumstances.

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 16 (as long as you answered yes to questions 4 and 5)

Aggravating Circumstances

[If it is alleged in the presentment that the complainant was under the age of 12 at the time of the offence, add the following section.]

8. Was the complainant under the age of 12 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If Yes, then you are satisfied the child was under 12

If No, then you are not satisfied the child was under 12

[If it is alleged in the presentment that the complainant was between the ages of 12 and 16 at the time of the offence, and was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused, add the following section.]

8. Was the complainant between the ages of 12 and 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If Yes, then go to 9

If No, then you are not satisfied the child was between 12 and 16 and under the accused's care, supervision and authority

9. Was the complainant under the care, supervision or authority of the accused at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If Yes, then you are satisfied the child was between 12 and 16 and under the accused's care, supervision and authority

If No, then you are not satisfied the child was between 12 and 16 and under the accused's care, supervision and authority

Last updated: 22 June 2016

7.3.13.8 Charge: Sexual Penetration of a Child under 16 (1/12/06–16/3/10) Consent in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for trials involving offences alleged to have been committed between 1/12/2006 and 16/3/2010 where consent is in issue (because the complainant was aged 10 or over and the accused relies on a circumstance described in s 45(4)).

I must now direct you about the crime of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant.

Two – the accused did this intentionally.

Three – the complainant was under the age of 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[664]

Taking part in an act of sexual penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant. [If the conscious, voluntary or deliberate nature of the act is in issue,[665] add: The prosecution must also prove that the relevant acts of the accused were performed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.]

The law defines sexual penetration as the introduction of a person's penis, body part or object into another person's vagina or anus. It also includes putting a penis into someone's mouth.

For this first element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove that NOA took part in one of these acts. The law says that both the person who sexually penetrates and the person who is penetrated are regarded as "taking part" in sexual penetration. [If relevant add: This means that if you find that NOA was sexually penetrated by NOC, you will be satisfied that the accused "took part" in that act of sexual penetration.]

---

[664] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[665] Described hereafter as the "voluntariness" requirement.

In this case the prosecution seeks to prove that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC [describe relevant form of penetration, e.g. "by putting his finger into NOC's anus"/"when he took NOC's penis in his mouth"].

[If relevant add:

- [Identify item or body part and actor] does not need to have gone all the way into [NOC/NOA's] [vagina/anus/mouth]. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation].

[If the evidence or arguments have placed the conscious, voluntary or deliberate nature of the acts in issue, add the following shaded section.]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant act of participation, e.g. "introducing his finger into NOC's anus"/"receiving NOC's penis into his mouth"] must have been done consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that [NOA/NOC] introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of [NOA/NOC's] vagina.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

However, according to the law, the introduction of an object or body part other than the penis into a person's [vagina/anus] does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

In this case [insert evidence and arguments relevant to proof of this element].

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused intended to take part in the act of sexual penetration with the complainant.[666]

[If intention is not in issue, add the shaded section.]

This element is not in issue here. [If appropriate, explain further, e.g. if you are satisfied that the accused [consciously, voluntarily and deliberately] sexually penetrated the complainant, you should have no trouble finding that s/he did so intentionally.]

Child under the age of 16

The third element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that s/he was under the age of 16 when the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was under 16 at that time. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[667]

Statutory defences and exclusions

Accused married to the complainant

[If the accused alleged that s/he was married to the complainant, who was aged between 10 and 16 at the time of the alleged penetration, add the following shaded section.]

Even if these three elements are met, the law states that a person is not guilty of this offence if the accused and the complainant were married to each other at the time of the alleged penetration, and the complainant was at least 10 years' old at that time.

In this case [insert relevant evidence and competing arguments].

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was not married to NOC at the time of the alleged act of sexual penetration, or that NOC was aged under 10 at the relevant time. If the prosecution cannot prove at least one of these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Consent

Consent can only be in issue if the complainant was aged 10 or older at the time of the offence. If age is in issue in this respect this charge will need to be modified.

[666] Because sexual penetration of a child under 16 is an offence of basic intent (the intent to take part in the act of penetration), the issue of intention is only likely to arise in cases involving penetration of the accused by the complainant. In cases where the accused is alleged to have penetrated the complainant, proof of intent will rarely be separated from proof of the act, and "intention" will rarely be an independent issue. Mental state issues related to the intention to penetrate (e.g. the negation of intent by involuntariness, unconsciousness or accident) should generally be addressed by voluntariness directions.

[667] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

This charge addresses consent coupled with a belief on reasonable grounds that the child was aged 16 or older (s 45(4)(a)). If the issue is s 45(4)(b) (accused not more than 2 years older than the complainant) or s 45(4)(c) (accused believed on reasonable grounds that s/he was married to the complainant) the charge will need to be adapted accordingly. See Sexual penetration of a child under 16 (1/1/92 – 30/6/17) for guidance.

Belief that complainant was aged 16 or more

Even if you find that the prosecution has proved all three elements of this offence, NOA will not necessarily be guilty of this offence. This is because, in certain circumstances, consent will be a defence.

The law states that consent is available as a defence if the accused believed on reasonable grounds that the complainant was at least 16 years old at the time of the alleged penetration.

Unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – this belief is a matter which the accused must prove on the balance of probabilities. That is, the accused must prove that it is more likely than not that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that NOC was aged 16 or over for consent to be available as a defence.

So, by contrast to proof of the elements of the offence(s), where the prosecution must satisfy you beyond reasonable doubt of them, for the defence of reasonable belief to be established to your satisfaction, it is for the accused, not the prosecution to prove the existence of a reasonable belief in age.

And the standard to which the defence must do this is a lesser standard than proof beyond reasonable doubt, it is proof on the balance of probabilities. That is, the accused must satisfy you that it is more likely than not that he believed, on reasonable grounds, that the complainant was 16 or over.

In this case [insert relevant evidence and competing arguments].

[If the prosecution has conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section.]

As it is not in issue in this case that the sexual act was consensual, if the accused satisfied you, on the balance of probabilities that s/he believed, on reasonable grounds, that at the time s/he took part in the act of sexual penetration, that the complainant was 16 or over, then your verdict in respect of that charge will be not guilty. If however, the accused does not satisfy you on the balance of probabilities that at the time he believed the complainant was 16 or over, and that his belief was based on reasonable grounds, then despite the fact that the act was consensual, this defence will fail.

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

Warning: It is an unresolved question whether the prosecution must prove that the accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting. This Charge Book requires proof of awareness of non-consent as a matter of prudence. See 7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent (Pre-1/7/15) for more information.

If, however, you find that the NOA has proved that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that NOC was at least 16 years old at the time of the alleged penetration, then you will need to determine whether the prosecution have proved two additional elements: first, that NOC did not consent to the alleged act of sexual penetration and second, that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

Definition of consent

Dealing with the first of these additional elements, consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So NOC will not have consented to the sexual penetration if s/he did not freely agree to take part in that act.

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not freely agree to the sexual penetration. So if consent is relevant to your determination, and the prosecution cannot prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not freely agree to the penetration, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

The law identifies a number of circumstances where the complainant is deemed not to freely agree, or consent, to sexual penetration. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because s/he is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep, unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of freely agreeing;

(e) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(f) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act or the identity of the person;

(g) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting. However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proved.

[If there is evidence that the complainant did not say or do anything to indicate agreement, add the following darker shaded section.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to the sexual penetration at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

[Where evidence is given about the absence of physical resistance, lack of physical injury or past consensual sex, add the following darker shaded section if relevant to the facts in issue.]

The law also says the complainant is not to be regarded as having freely agreed just because:

- [if relevant] s/he did not protest or physically resist the accused;
- [if relevant] s/he did not sustain physical injury;
- [if relevant] s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act on that occasion with the accused or with any other person, or that s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act with the accused or another person on an earlier occasion.

However, these are relevant factors for you to consider. You must consider the action or lack of action of NOC, together with all the surrounding circumstances, in order to decide whether the prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not consent.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to take part in the act of sexual penetration, you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done at the time of the alleged penetration, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about [his/her] state of mind at that time. You can also consider what s/he did not say or do at the time of the alleged penetration.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC did not consent. [Insert relevant evidence and competing arguments.]

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt this first additional element that NOC did not consent, then you must find NOA not guilty.

Awareness of Lack of Consent

Turning now to the second additional element, if consent is available as a defence, the prosecution must also prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of the alleged sexual penetration the accused was aware either:

- that the complainant was not consenting; or
- that the complainant might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these state(s) of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Belief in Consent

[If evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting, add one of the directions in 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent.]

Onus and standard of proof

Remember, you may not need to consider the issue of consent. The process that you must follow is this. First, you must decide if the prosecution has proved the three elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt. That is, the prosecution must prove that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC, that s/he intended to take part in the act of sexual penetration, and that NOC was under the age of 16 at the relevant time. If the prosecution cannot prove all three of these elements, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Next, if you find that the prosecution has proved each of these elements beyond reasonable doubt, and the accused has raised the issue as to belief in age, you must then decide if NOA has proved, on the balance of probabilities, that s/he believed that NOC was at least 16 years old, and that that belief was based on reasonable grounds. If the accused cannot prove both of these matters, then NOA will be guilty of this offence, as long as the prosecution have proved each of the first three elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt.

If, however, you find that the accused has proved these matters as to belief in age on the balance of probabilities, you must then decide whether the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, the two additional elements that NOC did not consent, and that NOA was aware that s/he was not or might not be consenting. If the prosecution cannot prove both of these things, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence. It is only if you are satisfied that they have been proved beyond reasonable doubt, together with each of the first three elements of the offence, that you can convict NOA of sexual penetration of a child under 16.

Circumstances of Aggravation

[If any circumstances of aggravation have been alleged in the indictment, add the following shaded section.]

The law has specified certain "circumstances of aggravation" which you must consider if you find that each of the elements of this offence has been proved. These are not elements of the offence, but circumstances which make the crime more serious. Like the elements of the offence, these are matters which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt and you can only find a circumstance of aggravation if you all agree that circumstance exists.[668]

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was under the age of 10, add the following shaded section.]

One of the "circumstances of aggravation" specified by the law is that the complainant was under the age of 10 at the time that the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case [insert relevant evidence and competing arguments about the complainant's age].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proved this circumstance of aggravation beyond reasonable doubt. I want to remind you, however, that you must first determine whether the elements of the offence have been proved beyond reasonable doubt. When your verdict is taken, you will only be asked about this circumstance if you have found the accused guilty of the offence. I will tell you later how your verdicts are to be taken by my associate.

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was between 10 and 16 and under the care, supervision or authority of the accused, add the following shaded section.]

One of the "circumstances of aggravation" specified by the law is that the complainant was aged between 10 and 16 at the time that the alleged act of sexual penetration took place, and was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

This is a two-part test. You must first be satisfied that NOC was aged between 10 and 16. You must also be satisfied that NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority at the time the alleged act of sexual penetration took place. These are ordinary everyday English words.

The relationship of care, supervision or authority does not have to be a formal one. There does not, for example, have to have been a formal agreement that the accused would take care of the complainant. An informal relationship of care, support or authority is sufficient.

[If relevant, add: You do not need to find that the occasion on which the alleged act of penetration took place was connected with, or arose out of, the relationship of care, supervision or authority. It is sufficient if you are satisfied that there was an ongoing relationship of care, supervision or authority between NOA and NOC, and that that relationship existed on the day on which the penetration took place.]

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOC was [insert age] at the relevant time, and was under NOA's [care/supervision/authority]. [Insert prosecution evidence]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proved this circumstance of aggravation beyond reasonable doubt. I want to remind you, however, that you must first determine whether the elements of the offence have been proved beyond reasonable doubt. When your verdict is taken, you will only be asked about this circumstance if you have found the accused guilty of the crime. I will tell you later how your verdicts are to be taken by my associate.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

---

[668] If more than one circumstance of aggravation is in issue, the judge should consider spelling out that the jury must agree on a particular circumstance of aggravation.

One – that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC; and

Two – that NOA intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration; and

Three – that NOC was under the age of 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16.

If you decide that each of these elements have been proved beyond reasonable doubt, you must decide if the accused has proved, on the balance of probabilities:

- That NOA believed that NOC was aged 16 or older at the relevant time; and
- That NOA had reasonable grounds for that belief.

If the accused has not proved both of these matters on the balance of probabilities, and you find that all of the elements have been proved by the prosecution beyond reasonable doubt, then NOA will be guilty of the offence. However, if you find that both of these matters have been proved by the accused on the balance of probabilities, you must then decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC did not consent to the act of sexual penetration and that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

[If the prosecution conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section.]

Since the prosecution does not dispute the accused's claim that [insert basis of concession about consent, e.g. "NOC was consenting" or "s/he believed that NOC was consenting"], you must, if you reach this point, find NOA not guilty of this offence.

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

If the prosecution cannot prove these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16.

[If any circumstances of aggravation are in issue, add the following shaded section.]

If you find that all of these elements have been proved, you must then consider whether circumstances of aggravation have been established.

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was under the age of 10, add: You must decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was under 10 at the time of the alleged penetration.]

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was between 10 and 16 and under the care, supervision or authority of the accused, add: You must decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was aged between 10 and 16 at the time of the alleged penetration, and was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.]

Taking the verdict

When you have reached your verdict and returned to this court room, my associate will ask you whether you have agreed on a verdict, and what your verdict is. You, [Mr/Madam] foreman, will answer "guilty" or "not guilty", according to the decision the jury has reached.

If you answer guilty, you will then be asked whether you have reached agreement about the circumstances of aggravation. My associate will ask you "Do you find that [describe relevant aggravating circumstances]?", to which you, [Madam/Mr] foreman will answer "yes" or "no", according to what the jury have decided.

Last updated: 22 January 2016

7.3.13.9 Charge: Sexual Penetration of a Child under 16 (Pre-1/12/06) Consent in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for trials involving offences alleged to have been committed before 1/12/2006 where consent is in issue (because the complainant was aged 10 or over and the accused relies on a circumstance described in s 45(4)).

I must now direct you about the crime of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant.

Two – the accused did this intentionally.

Three – the complainant was under the age of 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[669]

Taking part in an act of sexual penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant. [If the conscious, voluntary or deliberate nature of the act is in issue,[670] add: The prosecution must also prove that the relevant acts of the accused were performed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.]

The law defines sexual penetration as the introduction of a person's penis, body part or object into another person's vagina or anus. It also includes putting a penis into someone's mouth.

For this first element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove that NOA took part in one of these acts. The law says that both the person who sexually penetrates and the person who is penetrated are regarded as "taking part" in sexual penetration. [If relevant add: This means that if you find that NOA was sexually penetrated by NOC, you will be satisfied that the accused "took part" in that act of sexual penetration.]

In this case the prosecution seeks to prove that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC [describe relevant form of penetration, e.g. "by putting his finger into NOC's anus"/"when he took NOC's penis in his mouth"].

[If relevant add:

- [Identify item or body part and actor] does not need to have gone all the way into [NOC/NOA's] [vagina/anus/mouth]. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.

---

669 If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

670 Described hereafter as the "voluntariness" requirement.

- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation].

[If the evidence or arguments have placed the conscious, voluntary or deliberate nature of the acts in issue, add the following shaded section.]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant act of participation, e.g. "introducing his finger into NOC's anus"/"receiving NOC's penis into his mouth"] must have been done consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that [NOA/NOC] introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of [NOA/NOC's] vagina.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

However, according to the law, the introduction of an object or body part other than the penis into a person's [vagina/anus] does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

In this case [insert evidence and arguments relevant to proof of this element].

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused intended to take part in the act of sexual penetration with the complainant.[671]

[If intention is not in issue, add the shaded section.]

This element is not in issue here. [If appropriate, explain further, e.g. "if you are satisfied that the accused [consciously, voluntarily and deliberately] sexually penetrated the complainant, you should have no trouble finding that s/he did so intentionally".]

Child under the age of 16

The third element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that s/he was under the age of 16 when the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

---

[671] Because sexual penetration of a child under 16 is an offence of basic intent (the intent to take part in the act of penetration), the issue of intention is only likely to arise in cases involving penetration of the accused by the complainant. In cases where the accused is alleged to have penetrated the complainant, proof of intent will rarely be separated from proof of the act, and "intention" will rarely be an independent issue. Mental state issues related to the intention to penetrate (e.g. the negation of intent by involuntariness, unconsciousness or accident) should generally be addressed by voluntariness directions.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was under 16 at that time. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[672]

Statutory defences and exclusions

Accused married to the complainant

[If the accused alleged that s/he was married to the complainant, who was aged between 10 and 16 at the time of the alleged penetration, add the following shaded section.]

Even if these three elements are met, the law states that a person is not guilty of this offence if the accused and the complainant were married to each other at the time of the alleged penetration, and the complainant was at least 10 years' old at that time.

In this case [insert relevant evidence and competing arguments].

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was not married to NOC at the time of the alleged act of sexual penetration, or that NOC was aged under 10 at the relevant time. If the prosecution cannot prove at least one of these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Consent

Consent can only be in issue if the complainant was aged 10 or older at the time of the offence. If age is in issue in this respect this charge will need to be modified.

This charge addresses consent coupled with a belief on reasonable grounds that the child was aged 16 or older (s 45(4)(a)). If the issue is s 45(4)(b) (accused not more than 2 years older than the complainant) or s 45(4)(c) (accused believed on reasonable grounds that s/he was married to the complainant) the charge will need to be adapted accordingly. See Sexual penetration of a child under 16 (1/1/92 – 30/6/17) for guidance.

Belief that complainant was aged 16 or more

Even if you find that the prosecution has proved all three elements of this offence, NOA will not necessarily be guilty of this offence. This is because, in certain circumstances, consent will be a defence.

The law states that consent is available as a defence if the accused believed on reasonable grounds that the complainant was at least 16 years old at the time of the alleged penetration.

As a result, the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt either:

1. That NOA did not believe that NOC was aged 16 or older at the time of the alleged penetration; or

2. That NOA did not have reasonable grounds to believe that NOC was aged 16 or older at the time of the alleged penetration

For there to be reasonable grounds for a belief, the belief must be based on facts which could have caused a reasonable person to believe the same thing. So to prove this second alternative the prosecution must prove that even if NOA may have believed NOC was 16 or older, a reasonable person in his/her situation could not have reached that conclusion based on the facts known to NOA.

---

[672] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

In this case the prosecution alleged [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments]. In response, the defence submitted [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

If the prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA did not believe on reasonable grounds that NOC was at least 16 years old at the time of the alleged penetration, then consent will not be a defence, and will not be relevant to your determination of the accused's guilt.

[If the prosecution has conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section.]

If, however, you find that this has not been proved, then you will find the accused not guilty. This is because the prosecution does not dispute that [insert basis of concession about consent, e.g. "NOC was consenting" or "NOA believed that NOC was consenting"].

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

Warning: It is an unresolved question whether the prosecution must prove that the accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting. This Charge Book requires proof of awareness of non-consent as a matter of prudence. See 7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent (Pre-1/7/15) for more information.

If, however, you find that this has not been proved, then you will need to determine whether the prosecution have proved two additional elements: first, that NOC did not consent to the alleged act of sexual penetration and second, that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

Definition of consent

Dealing with the first of these additional elements, consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So NOC will not have consented to the sexual penetration if s/he did not freely agree to take part in that act.

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not freely agree to the sexual penetration. So if consent is relevant to your determination, and the prosecution cannot prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not freely agree to the penetration, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

The law identifies a number of circumstances where the complainant is deemed not to freely agree, or consent, to sexual penetration. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because s/he is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep, unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of freely agreeing;

(e) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(f) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act or the identity of the person;

(g) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting. However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proved.

[If there is evidence that the complainant did not say or do anything to indicate agreement, add the following darker shaded section.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to the sexual penetration at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

[Where evidence is given about the absence of physical resistance, lack of physical injury or past consensual sex, add the following darker shaded section if relevant to the facts in issue.]

The law also says the complainant is not to be regarded as having freely agreed just because:

- [if relevant] s/he did not protest or physically resist the accused;
- [if relevant] s/he did not sustain physical injury;
- [if relevant] s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act on that occasion with the accused or with any other person, or that s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act with the accused or another person on an earlier occasion.

However, these are relevant factors for you to consider. You must consider the action or lack of action of NOC, together with all the surrounding circumstances, in order to decide whether the prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not consent.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to take part in the act of sexual penetration, you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done at the time of the alleged penetration, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about [his/her] state of mind at that time. You can also consider what s/he did not say or do at the time of the alleged penetration.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC did not consent. [Insert relevant evidence and competing arguments.]

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt this first additional element that NOC did not consent, then you must find NOA not guilty.

Awareness of Lack of Consent

Turning now to the second additional element, if consent is available as a defence, the prosecution must also prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of the alleged sexual penetration the accused was aware either:

- that the complainant was not consenting; or
- that the complainant might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these state(s) of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Belief in Consent

[If evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting, add one of the directions in 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent.]

Onus and standard of proof

Remember, you may not need to consider the issue of consent. The process that you must follow is this. First, you must decide if the prosecution has proved the three elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt. That is, the prosecution must prove that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC, that s/he intended to take part in the act of sexual penetration, and that NOC was under the age of 16 at the relevant time. If the prosecution cannot prove all three of these elements, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Next, if you find that the prosecution has proved each of these elements beyond reasonable doubt, and the accused has raised the issue as to belief in age, you must then decide if NOA has proved, on the balance of probabilities, that s/he believed that NOC was at least 16 years old, and that that belief was based on reasonable grounds. If the accused cannot prove both of these matters, then NOA will be guilty of this offence, as long as the prosecution have proved each of the first three elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt.

If, however, you find that the accused has proved these matters as to belief in age on the balance of probabilities, you must then decide whether the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, the two additional elements that NOC did not consent, and that NOA was aware that s/he was not or might not be consenting. If the prosecution cannot prove both of these things, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence. It is only if you are satisfied that they have been proved beyond reasonable doubt, together with each of the first three elements of the offence, that you can convict NOA of sexual penetration of a child under 16.

Circumstances of Aggravation

[If any circumstances of aggravation have been alleged in the indictment, add the following shaded section.]

The law has specified certain "circumstances of aggravation" which you must consider if you find that each of the elements of this offence has been proved. These are not elements of the offence, but circumstances which make the crime more serious. Like the elements of the offence, these are matters which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt and you can only find a circumstance of aggravation if you all agree that circumstance exists.[673]

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was under the age of 10, add the following shaded section.]

One of the "circumstances of aggravation" specified by the law is that the complainant was under the age of 10 at the time that the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case [insert relevant evidence and competing arguments about the complainant's age].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proved this circumstance of aggravation beyond reasonable doubt. I want to remind you, however, that you must first determine whether the elements of the offence have been proved beyond reasonable doubt. When your verdict is taken, you will only be asked about this circumstance if you have found the accused guilty of the offence. I will tell you later how your verdicts are to be taken by my associate.

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was between 10 and 16 and under the care, supervision or authority of the accused, add the following shaded section.]

One of the "circumstances of aggravation" specified by the law is that the complainant was aged between 10 and 16 at the time that the alleged act of sexual penetration took place, and was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

---

[673] If more than one circumstance of aggravation is in issue, the judge should consider spelling out that the jury must agree on a particular circumstance of aggravation.

This is a two-part test. You must first be satisfied that NOC was aged between 10 and 16. You must also be satisfied that NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority at the time the alleged act of sexual penetration took place. These are ordinary everyday English words.

The relationship of care, supervision or authority does not have to be a formal one. There does not, for example, have to have been a formal agreement that the accused would take care of the complainant. An informal relationship of care, support or authority is sufficient.

[If relevant, add: You do not need to find that the occasion on which the alleged act of penetration took place was connected with, or arose out of, the relationship of care, supervision or authority. It is sufficient if you are satisfied that there was an ongoing relationship of care, supervision or authority between NOA and NOC, and that that relationship existed on the day on which the penetration took place.]

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOC was [insert age] at the relevant time, and was under NOA's [care/supervision/authority]. [Insert prosecution evidence.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proved this circumstance of aggravation beyond reasonable doubt. I want to remind you, however, that you must first determine whether the elements of the offence have been proved beyond reasonable doubt. When your verdict is taken, you will only be asked about this circumstance if you have found the accused guilty of the crime. I will tell you later how your verdicts are to be taken by my associate.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC; and

Two – that NOA intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration; and

Three – that NOC was under the age of 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16.

If you decide that each of these elements have been proved beyond reasonable doubt, you must decide if the prosecution has also proved, to the same standard:

- That NOA did not believe that NOC was aged 16 or older at the relevant time; or
- That NOA had no reasonable grounds to believe that NOC was aged 16 or older at the relevant time.

If the prosecution has proved one of these matters, and you find that all of the elements have been proved by the prosecution beyond reasonable doubt, then NOA will be guilty of the offence. However, if the prosecution has not proved either of these matters, you must then decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC did not consent to the act of sexual penetration and that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

[If the prosecution conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section.]

Since the prosecution does not dispute the accused's claim that [insert basis of concession about consent, e.g. "NOC was consenting" or "s/he believed that NOC was consenting"], you must, if you reach this point, find NOA not guilty of this offence.

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

If the prosecution cannot prove these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16.

[If any circumstances of aggravation are in issue, add the following shaded section.]

If you find that all of these elements have been proved, you must then consider whether circumstances of aggravation have been established.

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was under the age of 10*, add*: You must decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was under 10 at the time of the alleged penetration.]

[Where it is alleged that the complainant was between 10 and 16 and under the care, supervision or authority of the accused, add: You must decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was aged between 10 and 16 at the time of the alleged penetration, and was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.]

Taking the verdict

When you have reached your verdict and returned to this court room, my associate will ask you whether you have agreed on a verdict, and what your verdict is. You, [Mr/Madam] foreman, will answer "guilty" or "not guilty", according to the decision the jury has reached.

If you answer guilty, you will then be asked whether you have reached agreement about the circumstances of aggravation. My associate will ask you "Do you find that [describe relevant aggravating circumstances]?", to which you, [Madam/Mr] foreman will answer "yes" or "no", according to what the jury have decided.

Last updated: 22 January 2016

7.3.13.10 Checklist: Sexual Penetration of a Child under the Age of 16 (Pre-17/3/10) Consent in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist is designed for offences committed before 17 March 2010

The Elements

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant; and
2. The accused intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration; and
3. The complainant was under the age of 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

Accused's Acts

1. Did the accused take part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 16

Accused's Intention

2. Did the accused intend to take part in that act of sexual penetration with the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 16

The Complainant's Age

3. Was the complainant under the age of 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 16

Relevance of Consent

[Consent can only be relevant where the complainant was aged 10 or over at the time of the offence. If the complainant's age is in issue in this respect this checklist will need to be modified. This section of the checklist can be used if the accused alleged that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that the complainant was 16 or older and consented to the act of sexual penetration. If consent is in issue because the accused alleged that s/he is not more than 2 years older than the complainant, or that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that s/he was married to the complainant, it will need to be modified as necessary.]

[Use this section if the offence was allegedly committed on or after 1 December 2006.]

Consent is only relevant if you are satisfied the defence has proven, on the balance of probabilities, both that:

4. The accused believed that the complainant was aged 16 or older at the time the act of sexual penetration took place; and

5. The accused's belief that the complainant was aged 16 or older was based on reasonable grounds.

[Use this section if the offence was allegedly committed before 1 December 2006.]

Consent is relevant unless you are satisfied the prosecution has proven beyond reasonable doubt that either:

4. The accused did not believe that the complainant was aged 16 or older at the time the act of sexual penetration took place; or

5. The accused did not have reasonable grounds to believe that the complainant was aged 16 or older.

Lack of Consent

If consent is relevant, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that:

6. The complainant did not consent to taking part in the act of sexual penetration; and

7. The accused was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

Consent

6. Did the sexual penetration occur without the complainant's consent?

If Yes, then go to 7

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 16 (as long as you answered yes to questions 4 and 5)

Awareness of Lack of Consent

7. At the time of sexual penetration, was the accused aware that the complainant was not consenting or that s/he might not be consenting?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 16 (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3 and 6). Go to aggravating circumstances.

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 16 (as long as you answered yes to questions 4 and 5)

Aggravating Circumstances

[If it is alleged in the presentment that the complainant was under the age of 10 at the time of the offence, add the following section.]

8. Was the complainant under the age of 10 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If Yes, then you are satisfied the child was under 10

If No, then you are not satisfied the child was under 10

[If it is alleged in the presentment that the complainant was between the ages of 10 and 16 at the time of the offence, and was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused, add the following section.]

8. Was the complainant between the ages of 12 and 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If Yes, then go to 9

If No, then you are not satisfied the child was between 12 and 16 and under the accused's care, supervision and authority

9. Was the complainant under the care, supervision or authority of the accused at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If Yes, then you are satisfied the child was between 12 and 16 and under the accused's care, supervision and authority

If No, then you are not satisfied the child was between 12 and 16 and under the accused's care, supervision and authority

Last updated: 21 August 2008

7.3.14 Sexual Penetration of a 16- or 17-Year-Old Child (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Operational Period

1. Section 49C commenced on 1 July 2017, replacing the former offences specified in s 48 of the Crimes Act 1958.
2. For offences committed before 1 July 2017, see 7.3.15 Sexual Penetration of a 16 or 17 Year Old Child (1/1/92 – 30/6/17).

The Elements

3. The elements of the offence are set out in s 49C(1) of the Crimes Act 1958. The prosecution must prove that:

   i) The accused (A) intentionally:

      - sexually penetrated another person (B);
      - caused or allowed B to sexually penetrate A; or
      - causes B to sexually penetrate themselves, another person (C) or be sexually penetrated by C; and

   ii) B is a child aged 16 or 17 years; and

   iii) B is under A's care, supervision or authority

Intentional sexual penetration

4. The first element involves three permutations on B being involved in an act of sexual penetration (Crimes Act 1958 s 49C).
5. "Sexual penetration" is defined in s 35A of the Crimes Act 1958. For more information on the meaning of sexual penetration see, 7.3.2 Rape (From 1/1/92).
6. For more information about this element, including proof of intention, see 7.3.11 Sexual penetration of a child under 12 (From 1/7/17).

Complainant's age

7. The second element requires the prosecution to prove that the complainant was aged 16 or 17 at the time the relevant act took place (Crimes Act 1958 s 49C(1)).

Care, supervision or authority

8. The third element is that the complainant was under the accused's care, supervision or authority.
9. Section 37 of the Crimes Act 1958 provides a non-exhaustive list of relationships where a child is deemed to be under the care, supervision or authority of a person.
10. The relationships listed are:

(a) the child's parent or step-parent;

(b) the child's teacher;

(c) the child's employer;

(d) the child's youth worker;

(e) the child's sports coach;

(f) the child's counsellor;

(g) the child's health professional;

(h) a person with parental responsibility within the meaning of the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 for the child;

(i) a religious or spiritual guide, or a leader or official (including a lay member) of a church or religious body, however any such guide, leader, official, church or body is described, who provides care, advice or instruction to the child or has authority over the child;

(j) an out of home carer within the meaning given by section 74 of the Children, Youth and Families Act 2005 of the child;

(k) a police officer acting in the course of his or her duty in respect of the child;

(k) a person employed in, or providing services in, a remand centre, youth residential centre, youth training centre or prison and acting in the course of his or her duty in respect of the child

11. Section 37(2) provides that a parent includes a parent by adoption or a parent by operation of the Status of Children Act 1974, and that a step parent includes the spouse or domestic partner of the person's parent.

12. Judgments sometimes draw a distinction between a "standing relationship" and an "ad hoc" relationship for the purpose of care, supervision or authority. A "standing" relationship is one that has existed for some time, whereas an "ad hoc" relationship is one that comes into being on the day of the alleged offending.

13. However, the language of standing relationships and ad hoc relationships must not be allowed to distract attention from the requirements of the Act, which does not use the word "relationship" (Lydgate v R (2014) 46 VR 78, [98]).

14. Instead, the question is whether the complainant is under the care, supervision or authority of the accused or, alternatively, is in one of the relationships listed in s 37.

15. Section 37 of the Crimes Act 1958 is a deeming provision. Where the jury finds that the accused falls within one of the listed categories, the jury should not be instructed to look beyond the listed relationships to determine whether there was a relationship of "care, supervision or authority" (Lydgate v R (2014) 46 VR 78, [97]).

16. The words "care, supervision or authority" are to be given their ordinary grammatical meaning (R v Howes (2000) 2 VR 141).

17. The meaning of the words is a question for the jury. While a jury may be provided with the dictionary definitions of the words "care", "supervision" and "authority", the judge must make clear that these are not definitions prescribed by the Act (R v Howes (2000) 2 VR 141, [57]; R v Little (2015) 45 VR 816, [83]).

18. For the purpose of providing dictionary definitions, the following definitions are likely to be most relevant:

- Authority – "power to influence the conduct and actions of others; personal or practical influence"
- Supervision – "the act or function of supervising"
- Supervising – "to oversee, have the oversight of, superintend the execution of performance of (a thing), the movements or work of (a person)" (R v Howes (2000) 2 VR 141, [57]).

19. The words "care, supervision or authority" must be read disjunctively (R v Howes (2000) 2 VR 141; R v Little (2015) 45 VR 816, [81]).
20. These words extend to cover those who, by virtue of an established and ongoing relationship involving care, supervision or authority, are in a position to exploit or take advantage of the influence which grows out of the relationship (R v Howes (2000) 2 VR 141, [58]; R v Little (2015) 45 VR 816, [84]).
21. The relationship of care, supervision or authority does not need to be based on a legal right or power. While legal authority may create or help to create such a relationship, it is not essential (R v Howes (2000) 2 VR 141; R v Macfie [2000] VSCA 173. See also R v Little (2015) 45 VR 816, [86]–[90]).
22. The words therefore cover a person who has assumed de facto control, supervision or authority over a child, even if responsibility for that child has not been delegated to them by the person with legal responsibility for that child (R v Macfie [2000] VSCA 173).
23. Care, supervision or authority may be vested in more than one person or authority at the same time (R v Macfie [2000] VSCA 173).
24. Care, supervision or authority may change from time to time, depending on the circumstances (R v Macfie [2000] VSCA 173).
25. It is not necessary that the occasion on which the penetration took place was connected with, or arose out of, the relationship of care, supervision or authority, or that the parties were acting in the capacities which gave rise to the relationship. Similarly, it is not necessary to show that the complainant's consent to sexual penetration was influenced by the relationship of care, supervision or authority. It is sufficient if the jury is satisfied that there was a relationship of care, supervision or authority between the parties, and that that relationship existed on the day on which the penetration took place (R v Howes (2000) 2 VR 141, [60]).
26. In identifying what a jury should be told, Brooking JA in R v Howes (2000) 2 VR 141, [58] said that:

> It is appropriate to tell them to consider the three words in the context in which they appear, that of creating a sexual offence. They may be told that what is often called the age of consent for acts of sexual penetration is fixed by the law at 16 as a general rule but that Parliament has chosen to give special protection by raising the age of consent by two years for the protection of 16 and 17 year old children against what Parliament has called, in a general statement of its purposes, "exploitation by persons in positions of care, supervision and authority".... Juries may be told that the obvious purpose underlying the section is to protect 16 and 17 year olds from being taken advantage of by persons who are in a position to influence them. They may be told that the section is concerned to protect young people, and often, protect them from themselves. ... I would prefer, with the Victorian Act, to say that the section is obviously concerned to protect 16 and 17 year olds against persons who occupy a position of responsibility towards them and that in considering the words "care, supervision and authority" juries should bear in mind the obvious underlying purpose of the section.

27. Brooking JA also explained that instructing jurors about the purpose of the section may help a jury dealing with cases where there may be a technical relationship of supervision, but no reason to think that Parliament intended that a complainant in such a relationship needed to be protected from people who occupy that position of responsibility (see R v Howes (2000) 2 VR 141, [59] for examples).

28. In deciding whether a relationship of care, supervision or authority exists, it may be relevant to consider that the parties were previously in a relationship prescribed by s 37. While the prosecution cannot rely solely on the existence of a former prescribed relationship, the former relationship, along with other evidence, may provide a basis for a jury to find that there was an relationship of care, supervision or authority at the time of the alleged offence (Lydgate v R (2014) 46 VR 78, [103]).

29. In determining whether the former prescribed relationship is relevant to the existence of a current care, supervision or authority relationship, it may be important to consider the length of time between the former prescribed relationship ending and the alleged commission of the offence. This is because the period of time may rationally affect the probability that the complainant was under the accused's care, supervision or authority at the time of the alleged offence (Lydgate v R (2014) 46 VR 78, [104]; Lydgate v R (No 2) [2016] VSCA 33).

Statutory defences and exemption

Medical or hygienic purposes

30. A person does not commit the offence against s 49C(1) if the accused's conduct occurs in the course of a procedure carried out in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes (Crimes Act 1958 s 49T).

Reasonable belief as to age

31. Section 49X of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that it is a defence to an offence against section 49C(1) if, at the time of the conduct, the accused reasonably believed that the child was 18 years of age or more (Crimes Act 1958 s 49X(1)).

32. The accused bears the burden of proving, on the balance of probabilities, that he or she reasonably believed that B was 18 years of age or more (Crimes Act 1958 s 49X(4)).

33. The Note to section 49X states that:

> Whether or not A reasonably believed that B … was 18 years of age or more depends on the circumstances. The circumstances include any steps that A took to find out [B's] age.

Marriage or domestic partnership

34. Section 49Y of the Crimes Act 1958 provides an exception to the offence in s 49C(1). This exception applies if, at the time of the alleged offence –

    (i) A and B are married to each other and the marriage is recognised as valid under the Marriage Act 1961 of the Commonwealth; or

    (ii) A–

        (a) is not more than 5 years older than B; and

        (b) is B's domestic partner and the domestic partnership commenced before B came under A's care, supervision or authority.

35. For more information on the meaning of the term "domestic partnership", see 7.3.9 Incest (From 1/7/17).

Reasonable belief as to marriage or domestic partnership

36. Section 49Z of the Crimes Act 1958 provides a defence to the offence in s 49C(1) which applies if, at the time of the alleged offence –

(i) A reasonably believed that A and B are married to each other and that the marriage is recognised as valid under the Marriage Act 1961 of the Commonwealth; or

(ii) A–

(a) was not more than 5 years older than B; and

(b) reasonably believed that A was B's domestic partner and that the domestic partnership commenced before B came under A's care, supervision or authority.

37. The accused bears the burden of proving, on the balance of probabilities, the reasonable belief referred to in the section (Crimes Act 1958 s 49Z(3)).

38. The Note to the section specifies that the accused has an evidential burden in relation to the relative ages of the accused and the complainant.

Reasonable belief as to care, supervision or authority

39. Section 49ZA provides a defence to a charge under s 49C(1) that applies if, at the time of the conduct constituting the offence, the accused reasonably believed that the complainant was not under his or her care, supervision or authority.

40. The accused bears the burden of proving, on the balance of probabilities, that he or she held this reasonable belief (Crimes Act 1958 s 49ZA(3)).

41. This is a new defence, as the law did not previously require the prosecution to prove that A knew or believed that B was under his or her care, supervision or authority. Instead, the law required the prosecution to show only that A was aware of the primary facts which gave rise to the relevant relationship (compare Lydgate v R (2014) 46 VR 78, [113] (Beach JA)).

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.14.1 Charge: Sexual Penetration of a 16- or 17-Year-Old Child (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year old child.

The law says that the age of consent for sexual acts is normally 16. However, for persons aged 16 or 17, the law has created this specific offence to protect such young people from exploitation by persons in positions of care, supervision or authority.

To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant.[674]

Two – the complainant was either 16 or 17 years of age at the time that the sexual penetration took place.

Three – at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place, the complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

---

[674] This statement of the element must be modified if the prosecution relies on the other limbs of s 49C(1)(a). The words "sexually penetrated the complainant" may be replaced with "caused or allowed the complainant to sexually penetrate the accused" or "caused the complainant to sexually penetrate himself/herself" or "caused the complainant to sexually penetrate another person" or "caused the complainant to be sexually penetrated by another person".

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Intentional sexual penetration

Warning! This charge is designed for cases where the prosecution relies on s 49C(1)(a)(i). This direction on the first element must be modified if the prosecution relies on other limbs of s 49C(1)(a).

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant, NOC.

The prosecution seeks to prove this element by showing that NOA [describe relevant form of penetration, e.g. "put his finger into NOC's anus"]. I direct you as a matter of law that if you find that NOA did this, then the prosecution has proved this first element.

[If relevant add:

- [Identify item or body part and actor] does not need to have gone all the way into [NOC/NOA's] [vagina/anus/mouth]. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation].

[If the evidence or arguments have placed the intentional or voluntary nature of the acts in issue, add the following shaded section.[675]]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant act of participation, e.g. "introducing his finger into NOC's anus"/"receiving NOC's penis into his mouth"] must have been done intentionally.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves intention in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that [NOA/NOC] introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of [NOA/NOC's] vagina.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

However, according to the law, the introduction of an object or body part into a person's [vagina/anus] does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in the course of a procedure carried out in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in the course of a procedure carried out in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

[675] Because of how the offence is defined, the issue of intention is likely inseparable from the question of voluntariness. Where the issue is raised, the judge should direct the jury on the specific matters the jury must consider to find that the accused's conduct was voluntary and intentional (e.g. disproof of accident or proof that the accused was conscious).

In this case [insert evidence and arguments relevant to proof of this element].

Complainant aged 16 or 17

The second element relates to the age of the complainant, NOC. The prosecution must prove that s/he was either 16 or 17 years of age at the time that the alleged sexual penetration took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was [16/17] at the time the alleged sexual penetration took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[676]

Care, supervision or authority

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that, at the time that the sexual penetration took place, the complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

[If care, supervision or authority is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it was conceded by the defence that NOA was NOC's [describe relationship] and that the complainant was therefore under the care, supervision or authority of the accused [at the relevant time]. While it is for you to determine whether this was the case, you should have no difficulty finding that this element has been proven.

[If care, supervision or authority is in issue and the prosecution relies on a prescribed relationship, add the following shaded section.]

Parliament has defined a number of relationships where a child is deemed to be under the care, supervision and authority of another person. This includes [name relevant relationships from s 37 list].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA was NOC's [describe relationship]. [Insert prosecution evidence.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

If you find beyond reasonable doubt that NOA was NOC's [identify relationship] at the time of the alleged offence(s), then you will find this element has been proven.

[If care, supervision or authority is in issue and the prosecution does not rely on a prescribed relationship, add the following shaded section.]

The words "care, supervision or authority" all describe different types of relationships where the accused is in a position to exploit or take advantage of that relationship to influence the child to engage in an act of sexual penetration. You should take this into account when deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the complainant was under the accused's care, supervision or authority.

The relationship of care, supervision or authority does not have to be a formal one. There does not, for example, have to have been a formal agreement that the accused would take care of the complainant. An informal relationship of care, supervision or authority is sufficient.

[If relevant, add: You do not need to find that the alleged act of penetration was actually connected with, or influenced by, the relationship of care, supervision or authority or that NOA was actually exploiting his/her position of advantage. It is sufficient if you are satisfied that an established relationship of care, supervision or authority existed between NOA and NOC that could have been connected with, or influenced the child to engage in, the act of sexual penetration, and that the relationship existed on the day on which the penetration took place.]

---

[676] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOC was under NOA's [care/supervision/authority]. [Insert prosecution evidence.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

[If the accused may be unaware of the facts giving rise to a relationship of care, supervision or authority, add the following shaded section.]

The law states that NOA must know and be aware of the facts that give rise to a relationship of care, supervision or authority. For example, if a teacher with a large number of students did not recognise the complainant was a member of one of his/her classes, then you could not find this element proved.

[Insert relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

[If the accused raises the defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 49ZA of a reasonable belief as to no care, supervision or authority, add the following shaded section.]

This element requires you to look at the facts and decide whether NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority. The prosecution does not need to prove that NOA thought NOC was under his/her care, supervision or authority.

However, the law provides that NOA has a defence to this charge if s/he can show that s/he reasonably believed that NOC was not under his/her care, supervision or authority.

Unlike the elements of the offence, this is a matter which the accused must prove. It is an exception to the general rule that the prosecution must prove all matters. However, the accused only need to prove that s/he reasonably believed that NOC was not under his/her care, supervision or authority on the balance of probabilities. In other words, s/he must show that it is more likely than not that s/he believed that NOC was not under his/her care, supervision or authority and that this belief was reasonable. Unlike the prosecution, s/he does not need to prove this matter beyond reasonable doubt.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Defences

Marriage or domestic partnership

[If the accused relies on the domestic partnership defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 49Y, add the following shaded section.]

For this offence, the law recognises a defence which may be termed "domestic partnership".

There are three parts to the defence.

First, NOA must be no more than 5 years older than NOC. This applies here.

Second, NOA must be NOC's domestic partner. The law recognises that two people are in a domestic partnership if they are not married but are living as a couple on a genuine domestic basis.[677]

To decide whether two people are domestic partners, you must consider all the circumstances of the relationship, including [add the following factors from Relationships Act 2008 s 35(2), as relevant:

(a) the degree of mutual commitment to a shared life;

(b) the duration of the relationship;

(c) the nature and extent of common residence;

(d) whether or not a sexual relationship exists;

(e) the degree of financial dependence or interdependence, and any arrangements for financial support, between the parties;

(f) the ownership, use and acquisition of property;

(g) the care and support of children;

(h) the reputation and public aspects of the relationship.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Third, the domestic partnership must have started before NOC came under NOA's care, supervision or authority.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Remember, while I called this a defence, it is the prosecution's role to prove guilt. This means that the prosecution must show that this defence of domestic partnership does not apply. In other words, you cannot find NOA guilty unless the prosecution can prove beyond reasonable doubt either that NOA was not NOC's domestic partner, or that the domestic partnership started after NOC came under NOA's care, supervision or authority.

Reasonable belief as to age

[If the accused relies on the belief in age defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 49X, add the following shaded section.]

For this offence, the law recognises a defence which may be termed "reasonable belief in age".

This defence is available if the accused had a reasonable belief that at the time of the act, the complainant was 18 years of age or more.

Unlike the elements of the offence, this is a matter which the accused must prove. It is an exception to the general rule that the prosecution must prove all matters. However, the accused only need to prove that s/he reasonably believed that NOC was aged 18 or more on the balance of probabilities. In other words, s/he must show that it is more likely than not that s/he reasonably believed that NOC was aged 18 or more at the time of the sexual penetration and that this belief was reasonable. Unlike the prosecution, s/he does not need to prove this matter beyond reasonable doubt.

[677] If there is evidence of a registered domestic relationship, this part of the direction must be modified accordingly.

Reasonable belief as to marriage or domestic partnership

[If the accused relies on the reasonable belief in domestic partnership defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 49Z, add the following shaded section.]

For this offence, the law recognises a defence which may be termed "reasonable belief in domestic partnership".[678]

There are three parts to this defence.

First, NOA must be no more than 5 years older than NOC. This applies here.

Second, NOA must have reasonably believed that s/he was in a domestic partnership with NOC.

The law recognises that two people are in a domestic partnership if they are not married but are living as a couple on a genuine domestic basis.[679]

To decide whether two people are domestic partners, you must consider all the circumstances of the relationship, including [add the following factors from Relationships Act 2008 s 35(2), as relevant:

(a) the degree of mutual commitment to a shared life;

(b) the duration of the relationship;

(c) the nature and extent of common residence;

(d) whether or not a sexual relationship exists;

(e) the degree of financial dependence or interdependence, and any arrangements for financial support, between the parties;

(f) the ownership, use and acquisition of property;

(g) the care and support of children;

(h) the reputation and public aspects of the relationship.

Third, NOA must have reasonably believed that this domestic partnership started before NOC came under his/her care, supervision or authority.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Unlike the elements of the offence, the accused must prove these matters. It is an exception to the general rule that the prosecution must prove all matters. However, the accused only need to prove that s/he reasonably believed that s/he was in a domestic partnership with NOC which started before

---

[678] Section 49Z also creates a reasonable belief in marriage defence. If the accused relies on this defence the directions must be modified accordingly.

[679] Section 35 defines a domestic partner also as a person who is in a registered domestic relationship with the person. If the accused relies on this limb of the definition the directions must be modified accordingly.

NOC came under his/her care, supervision or authority on the balance of probabilities. In other words, s/he must show that it is more likely than not that s/he believed that s/he was in a domestic partnership with NOC which started before NOC came under his/her care, supervision or authority, and that this belief was reasonable. Unlike the prosecution, s/he does not need to prove this matter beyond reasonable doubt.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year old child, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

- One – that NOA intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant; and
- Two – that NOC was either 16 or 17 years of age at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place; and
- Three – that NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual penetration of a child aged 16 or 17.

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.14.2 Checklist: Sexual Penetration of a 16- or 17-Year-Old Child (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant; and

2. The complainant was aged 16 or 17; and

3. The complainant was under the accused's care, supervision or authority at the time of the sexual penetration.

Intentional sexual penetration

1. Did the accused intentionally [identify relevant act of sexual penetration] NOC?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Penetration of a child aged 16 or 17

Complainant aged 16 or 17

2. At the time of the act, was NOC aged 16 or 17?

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Penetration of a child aged 16 or 17

Care, supervision or authority

3. At the time of the act, was NOC under NOA's care, supervision or authority?

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Sexual Penetration of a child aged 16 or 17 (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1 and 2)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Penetration of a child aged 16 or 17

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.15 Sexual Penetration of a 16- or 17-Year-Old Child (1/1/92–30/6/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Operational Period

1. For offences alleged to have been committed before 1 July 2017, s 48 contained the offence of sexual penetration of a child aged 16 or 17.
2. This offence came into force on 5 August 1991.
3. The offence applies to any acts committed on or after 5 August 1991 and before 1 July 2017 (Crimes Act 1958 s 585A(2)).
4. If an offence is alleged to have been committed between dates, one date before and one date on or after 5 August 1991, the offence is alleged to have been committed before 5 August 1991 (Crimes Act 1958 s 585A(4)).
5. Section 48 was substantially amended in 2006. These changes apply only to offences committed on or after 1 December 2006. Their impact is considered below.

The Elements

6. The elements of the offence are set out in s 48(1) of the Crimes Act 1958. The section makes it an offence to take part in an act of sexual penetration with a 16 or 17 year old to whom the accused is not married and who is under their care, supervision or authority.

Taking part in an act of sexual penetration

7. "Sexual penetration" is defined in s 35(1)(a) of the Crimes Act 1958. For more information on the meaning of sexual penetration see 7.3.2 Rape (From 1/1/92).
8. Section 35(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that both the person who sexually penetrates another person and that other person shall be deemed to be "taking part" in an act of sexual penetration. This means that an accused may be found guilty of the offence whether they were sexually penetrating the complainant or were being sexually penetrated by the complainant.

Complainant's age

9. The jury should determine the complainant's age having regard to the evidence in the case, or if no other sufficient evidence is presented, to the complainant's appearance (Crimes Act 1958 s 411).

Care, supervision or authority

10. Section 48(4) of the Crimes Act 1958 now non-exhaustively lists relationships where a child is deemed to be under the care, supervision or authority of a person. This list applies only in respect of offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1 December 2006.
11. The relationships listed are:
    (a) the child's teacher;
    (b) the child's foster parent;
    (c) the child's legal guardian;
    (d) a minister of religion with pastoral responsibility for the child;

(e) the child's employer;

(f) the child's youth worker;

(g) the child's sports coach;

(h) the child's counsellor;

(i) the child's health professional;

(j) a member of the police force acting in the course of his or her duty in respect of the child;

(k) employed in, or providing services in, a remand centre, youth residential centre, youth training centre or prison and is acting in the course of his or her duty in respect of the child

12. Section 48(4) of the Crimes Act 1958 is a deeming provision. Where it applies, and where the jury finds that the accused falls within one of the listed categories, the jury should not be instructed to look beyond s 48(4) to determine whether there was a relationship of "care, supervision or authority".

13. Where s 48(4) of the Crimes Act 1958 does not apply (i.e. if the offence was committed before 1 December 2006), or where an accused does not fall within one of the listed relationships, courts must apply the common law definition of the terms "care, supervision or authority".

14. The words "care, supervision or authority" are to be given their ordinary grammatical meaning (R v Howes (2000) 2 VR 141).

15. The words "care, supervision or authority" should be read disjunctively (R v Howes (2000) 2 VR 141).

16. These words are intended to encompass those who, by virtue of an established and ongoing relationship involving care, supervision or authority, are in a position to exploit or take advantage of the influence which grows out of the relationship (R v Howes (2000) 2 VR 141).

17. The relationship of care, supervision or authority does not need to be based on a legal right or power. While legal authority may create or help to create such a relationship, it is not essential (R v Howes (2000) 2 VR 141; R v Macfie [2000] VSCA 173).

18. The words therefore cover a person who has assumed de facto control, supervision or authority over a child, even if responsibility for that child has not been delegated to them by the person with legal responsibility for that child (R v Macfie [2000] VSCA 173).

19. Care, supervision or authority may be vested in more than one person or authority at the same time (R v Macfie [2000] VSCA 173).

20. Care, supervision or authority may change from time to time, depending on the circumstances (R v Macfie [2000] VSCA 173).

21. It is not necessary that the occasion on which the penetration took place was connected with, or arose out of, the relationship of care, supervision or authority, or that the parties were acting in the capacities which gave rise to the relationship. It is sufficient if the jury is satisfied that there was a standing relationship of care, supervision or authority between the parties, and that that relationship existed on the day on which the penetration took place (R v Howes (2000) 2 VR 141).

Consent

22. Section 48(2) states that consent is not a defence unless, at the time of the offence, the accused believed on reasonable grounds, that:

- The complainant was aged 18 or older; or
- He or she was married to the complainant.

23. For information on this defence, see 7.3.13 Sexual Penetration of a child under 16 (1/1/92 – 30/6/17), where the equivalent defence under s 45(4) is discussed.

Last updated: 30 November 2017

7.3.15.1 Charge: Sexual Penetration of a 16- or 17-Year-Old Child Consent Not in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for trials commenced on or after 1/1/08 involving offences alleged to have been committed on or after 5/8/1991 where consent is not in issue.

I must now direct you about the crime of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year old child.

The law says that the age of consent for sexual acts is normally 16. However, for persons aged 16 or 17, the law has created this specific offence to protect such young people from exploitation by persons in positions of care, supervision or authority.

To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant.

Two – the accused intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration.

Three – the complainant was either 16 or 17 years of age at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

Four – the accused was not married to the complainant.

Five – at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place, the complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[680]

Taking part in sexual penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant. [If in issue, add: The prosecution must also prove that the relevant acts of the accused were performed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.[681]]

Act of sexual penetration

The law defines sexual penetration as the introduction of a person's penis, body part or object into another person's vagina or anus. It also includes putting a penis into someone's mouth.

For this first element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove that NOA took part in one of these acts. The law says that both the person who sexually penetrates and the person who is penetrated are regarded as "taking part" in sexual penetration. [If relevant add: This means that if you find that NOA was sexually penetrated by NOC, you will be satisfied that the accused "took part" in that act of sexual penetration.]

In this case the prosecution seeks to prove that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC [describe relevant form of penetration, e.g. "by putting his finger into NOC's anus"/"when he took NOC's penis in his mouth"].

---

[680] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[681] Described in the instructions within this charge as the "voluntariness" requirement.

[If relevant add:

- [Identify item or body part and actor] does not need to have gone all the way into [NOC/NOA's] [vagina/anus/mouth]. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation.]

[If the evidence or arguments have placed voluntariness in issue, add the shaded section.]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant act of participation, e.g. "introducing his finger into NOC's anus"/"receiving NOC's penis into his mouth"] must have been consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstances of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that [NOA/NOC] introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of [NOA/NOC's] vagina.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

However, according to the law, the introduction of an object or body part other than the penis into a person's [vagina/anus] does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

In this case [insert relevant evidence or competing arguments about proof of the accused's participation in an act of sexual penetration].

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused intended to take part in the act of sexual penetration with the complainant.[682]

---

[682] If the accused is alleged to have penetrated the complainant, "intention" will only rarely be in issue. This constitutes an offence of basic intent, that is, the intent to commit the physical act of penetrating the complainant. This means that proof of intent will rarely be separated from proof of the act, and "intention" will rarely be an independent issue. Any mental state issues related to the act of penetration (e.g. the negation of intent by involuntariness, unconsciousness or accident) should generally be addressed by voluntariness directions. Offences involving penetration of the accused by the complainant may raise different issues.

[If intention is not in issue, add the shaded section.]

This element is not in issue here. [If appropriate, explain further, e.g.

- The accused admits that s/he intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant.
- If you are satisfied that the accused [consciously, voluntarily and deliberately] sexually penetrated the complainant, you should have no trouble finding that s/he did so intentionally.]

Complainant aged 16 or 17

The third element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that the [he/she] was either 16 or 17 years of age at the time that the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was [16/17] at the time the alleged act of sexual penetration took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[683]

Accused not married to the complainant

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused was not married to the complainant at the time the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case, the defence has not disputed the prosecution's submission that [he/she] was not married to NOC at the time that the alleged act of sexual penetration took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[684]

Care, supervision or authority

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that, at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place, the complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

[If care, supervision or authority is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it was conceded by the defence that NOA was NOC's [describe relationship] and that the complainant was thus under the care, supervision or authority of the accused [at the relevant time]. While it is for you to determine whether this was the case, you should have no difficulty finding that this element has been proven.

[If care, supervision or authority is in issue and s 48(4) applies, add the following shaded section.]

[Note: Section 48(4) of the Crimes Act 1958 will apply if the relationship between the accused and the complainant is listed in s 48(4), and the offence was alleged to have been committed on or after 1 December 2006. If the prosecution relies on s 48(4) and the phrase 'care, supervision or authority' as alternatives, this charge will need to be modified.]

Parliament has defined a number of relationships where a child is deemed to be under the care, supervision and authority of another person. This includes [name relevant relationships from s 48(4) list].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA was NOC's [describe relationship]. [Insert prosecution evidence.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

---

[683] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[684] If it is alleged that the accused and complainant were married, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

If you find beyond reasonable doubt that NOA was NOC's [identify relationship] at the time of the alleged offence(s), then you will find this element has been proven.

[If care, supervision or authority is in issue and s 48(4) does not apply, add the following shaded section.]

[Note: Section 48(4) of the Crimes Act 1958 will not apply if the relationship between the accused and the complainant is not listed in s 48(4), or if the offence was alleged to have been committed before 1 December 2006.]

The words "care, supervision or authority" all describe different types of relationships where the accused is in a position to exploit or take advantage of that relationship to influence the child to engage in an act of sexual penetration. You should take this into account when deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the complainant was under the accused's care, supervision or authority.

The relationship of care, supervision or authority does not have to be a formal one. There does not, for example, have to have been a formal agreement that the accused would take care of the complainant. An informal relationship of care, supervision or authority is sufficient.

[If relevant, add: You do not need to find that the alleged act of penetration was actually connected with, or influenced by, the relationship of care, supervision or authority or that NOA was actually exploiting his/her position of advantage. It is sufficient if you are satisfied that an established relationship of care, supervision or authority existed between NOA and NOC that could have been connected with, or influenced the child to engage in, the act of sexual penetration, and that the relationship existed on the day on which the penetration took place.]

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOC was under NOA's [care/supervision/authority]. [Insert prosecution evidence.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

[If the accused may be unaware of the facts giving rise to a relationship of care, supervision or authority, add the following shaded section.]

The law states that NOA must know and be aware of the facts that give rise to a relationship of care, supervision or authority. For example, if a teacher with a large number of students did not recognise the complainant was a member of one of his/her classes, then you could not find this element proved.

[Insert relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Consent is not a defence

[This charge is designed for use in cases where consent is not in issue. Use one of the charges listed at the beginning of this document if consent or a precondition for consideration of consent (belief in age or marriage to complainant) is contested.]

To protect children, Parliament has created a number of offences where consent is not relevant. This is one of those offences, so you do not need to consider the issue of whether or not NOC agreed to take part in the alleged act of sexual penetration.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year old child, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant; and

Two – that NOA intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration; and

Three – that NOC was either 16 or 17 years of age at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place; and

Four – that NOA and NOC were not married at the relevant time; and

Five – that NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual penetration of a child aged 16 or 17.

Last updated: 14 May 2015

7.3.15.2 Checklist: Sexual Penetration of a 16- or 17-Year-Old Child Consent Not in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

The Elements

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant; and
2. The accused intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration; and
3. The complainant was either 16 or 17 years of age at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place; and
4. The accused was not married to the complainant at that time; and
5. The complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused at that time.

Accused's Acts

1. Did the accused take part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year-old child

Accused's Intention

2. Did the accused intend to take part in that act of sexual penetration with the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year-old child

The Complainant's Age

3. Was the complainant either 16 or 17 years of age at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year-old child

No Marital Relationship

4. Were the accused and the complainant married to each other at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year-old child

If No, then go to 5

Relationship of Care, Supervision or Authority

5. Was the complainant in a relationship of care, supervision or authority with the accused at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year-old child

(as long as you also answered yes to questions 1, 2 and 3, and no to question 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year-old child

Last updated: 1 August 2006

7.3.15.3 Charge: Sexual Penetration of a 16- or 17-Year-Old Child (1/12/06–30/6/17) Consent in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for trials commenced on or after 1/1/08 involving offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1/12/2006 where consent is in issue.

I must now direct you about the crime of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year old child.

The law says that the age of consent for sexual acts is normally 16. However, for persons aged 16 or 17, the law has created this specific offence to protect such young people from exploitation by persons in positions of care, supervision or authority.

To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant.

Two – the accused intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration.

Three – the complainant was either 16 or 17 years of age at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

Four – the accused was not married to the complainant.

Five – at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place, the complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[685]

[685] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

Taking part in sexual penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant. [If in issue, add: The prosecution must also prove that the relevant acts of the accused were performed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.[686]]

Act of sexual penetration

The law defines sexual penetration as the introduction of a person's penis, body part or object into another person's vagina or anus. It also includes putting a penis into someone's mouth.

For this first element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove that NOA took part in one of these acts. The law says that both the person who sexually penetrates and the person who is penetrated are regarded as "taking part" in sexual penetration. [If relevant add: This means that if you find that NOA was sexually penetrated by NOC, you will be satisfied that the accused "took part" in that act of sexual penetration.]

In this case the prosecution seeks to prove that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC [describe relevant form of penetration, e.g. "by putting his finger into NOC's anus"/"when he took NOC's penis in his mouth"].

[If relevant add:

- [Identify item or body part and actor] does not need to have gone all the way into [NOC/NOA's] [vagina/anus/mouth]. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation.]

[If the evidence or arguments have placed voluntariness in issue, add the shaded section.]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant act of participation, e.g. "introducing his finger into NOC's anus"/"receiving NOC's penis into his mouth"] must have been consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstances of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that [NOA/NOC] introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of [NOA/NOC's] vagina.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

However, according to the law, the introduction of an object or body part other than the penis into a person's [vagina/anus] does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

---

[686] Described in the instructions within this charge as the "voluntariness" requirement.

In this case [insert relevant evidence or competing arguments about proof of the accused's participation in an act of sexual penetration].

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused intended to take part in the act of sexual penetration with the complainant.[687]

[If intention is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

This element is not in issue here. [If appropriate, explain further, e.g.

- The accused admits that s/he intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant.
- If you are satisfied that the accused [consciously, voluntarily and deliberately] sexually penetrated the complainant, you should have no trouble finding that s/he did so intentionally.]

Complainant aged 16 or 17

The third element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that the [he/she] was either 16 or 17 years of age at the time that the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was [16/17] at the time the alleged act of sexual penetration took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[688]

Accused not married to the complainant

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused was not married to the complainant at the time the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case, the defence has not disputed the prosecution's submission that [he/she] was not married to NOC at the time that the alleged act of sexual penetration took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[689]

---

[687] If the accused is alleged to have penetrated the complainant, "intention" will only rarely be in issue. This constitutes an offence of basic intent, that is, the intent to commit the physical act of penetrating the complainant. This means that proof of intent will rarely be separated from proof of the act, and "intention" will rarely be an independent issue. Any mental state issues related to the act of penetration (e.g. the negation of intent by involuntariness, unconsciousness or accident) should generally be addressed by voluntariness directions. Offences involving penetration of the accused by the complainant may raise different issues.

[688] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[689] If it is alleged that the accused and complainant were married, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

Care, supervision or authority

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that, at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place, the complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

[If care, supervision or authority is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it was conceded by the defence that NOA was NOC's [describe relationship] and that the complainant was thus under the care, supervision or authority of the accused [at the relevant time]. While it is for you to determine whether this was the case, you should have no difficulty finding that this element has been proven.

[If care, supervision or authority is in issue and s 48(4) applies, add the following shaded section.]

[Note: Section 48(4) of the Crimes Act 1958 will apply if the relationship between the accused and the complainant is listed in s 48(4), and the offence was alleged to have been committed on or after 1 December 2006. If the prosecution relies on s 48(4) and the phrase 'care, supervision or authority' as alternatives, this charge will need to be modified.]

Parliament has defined a number of relationships where a child is deemed to be under the care, supervision and authority of another person. This includes [name relevant relationships from s 48(4) list].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA was NOC's [describe relationship]. [Insert prosecution evidence.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

If you find beyond reasonable doubt that NOA was NOC's [identify relationship] at the time of the alleged offence(s), then you will find this element has been proven.

[If care, supervision or authority is in issue and s 48(4) does not apply, add the following shaded section.]

[Note: Section 48(4) of the Crimes Act 1958 will not apply if the relationship between the accused and the complainant is not listed in s 48(4), or if the offence was alleged to have been committed before 1 December 2006.]

The words "care, supervision or authority" all describe different types of relationships where the accused is in a position to exploit or take advantage of that relationship to influence the child to engage in an act of sexual penetration. You should take this into account when deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the complainant was under the accused's care, supervision or authority.

The relationship of care, supervision or authority does not have to be a formal one. There does not, for example, have to have been a formal agreement that the accused would take care of the complainant. An informal relationship of care, supervision or authority is sufficient.

[If relevant, add: You do not need to find that the alleged act of penetration was actually connected with, or influenced by, the relationship of care, supervision or authority or that NOA was actually exploiting his/her position of advantage. It is sufficient if you are satisfied that an established relationship of care, supervision or authority existed between NOA and NOC that could have been connected with, or influenced the child to engage in, the act of sexual penetration, and that the relationship existed on the day on which the penetration took place.]

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOC was under NOA's [care/supervision/authority]. [Insert prosecution evidence.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

[If the accused may be unaware of the facts giving rise to a relationship of care, supervision or authority, add the following shaded section.]

The law states that NOA must know and be aware of the facts that give rise to a relationship of care, supervision or authority. For example, if a teacher with a large number of students did not recognise the complainant was a member of one of his/her classes, then you could not find this element proved.

[Insert relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Consent

This charge addresses consent coupled with a belief on reasonable grounds that the child was aged 18 or older (s 48(2)(a)). If the issue is s 48(2)(b) (accused believed on reasonable grounds that s/he was married to the complainant) the charge will need to be adapted accordingly. See 7.3.15 Sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year old child (1/1/92 – 30/6/17) for guidance.

Warning! For offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1 November 2014, it is not clear whether Crimes Act 1958 s 322T affects the relevance of intoxication to this defence. Judges should seek submissions from the parties on this issue where relevant.

Belief that complainant was aged 18 or more

Even if you find that the prosecution has proven all five elements of this offence, NOA will not necessarily be guilty of this offence. This is because, in certain circumstances, consent will be a defence.

The law states that consent is available as a defence if the accused believed on reasonable grounds that the complainant was at least 18 years old at the time of the alleged sexual penetration.

Unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – this belief is a matter which the accused must prove on the balance of probabilities. That is, the accused must prove that it is more likely than not that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that NOC was aged 18 or over for consent to be available as a defence.

So, by contrast to proof of the elements of the offence(s), where the prosecution must satisfy you beyond reasonable doubt of them, for the defence of reasonable belief to be established to your satisfaction, it is for the accused, not the prosecution to prove the existence of a reasonable belief in age.

And the standard to which the defence must do this is a lesser standard than proof beyond reasonable doubt, it is proof on the balance of probabilities. That is, the accused must satisfy you that it is more likely than not that he believed, on reasonable grounds, that the complainant was 18 or over.

In this case [insert relevant evidence and competing arguments].

[If the prosecution has conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section.]

As it is not in issue in this case that the alleged sexual act was consensual, if the accused satisfied you, on the balance of probabilities that s/he believed, on reasonable grounds, that at the time s/he took part in the alleged sexual act, that the complainant was 18 or over, then your verdict in respect of that charge will be not guilty. If however, the accused does not satisfy you on the balance of probabilities that at the time he believed the complainant was 18 or over, and that his belief was based on reasonable grounds, then despite the fact that the act was consensual, this defence will fail.

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

Warning: It is an unresolved question whether the prosecution must prove that the accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting. This Charge Book requires proof of awareness of non-consent as a matter of prudence. See 7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent (Pre-1/7/15) for more information.

If, however, you find that the NOA has proven that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that NOC was at least 18 years old at the time of the alleged penetration, then you will need to determine whether the prosecution have proved two additional elements: first, that NOC did not consent to the alleged act of sexual penetration and second, that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

Definition of consent

Dealing with the first of these additional elements, consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So NOC will not have consented to the sexual penetration if s/he did not freely agree to take part in that act.

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not freely agree to the sexual penetration. So if consent is relevant to your determination, and the prosecution cannot prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not freely agree to the penetration, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

The law identifies a number of circumstances where the complainant is deemed not to freely agree, or consent, to sexual penetration. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because s/he is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep, unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of freely agreeing;

(e) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(f) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act or the identity of the person;

(g) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting. However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

[If there is evidence that the complainant did not say or do anything to indicate agreement, add the following darker shaded section.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to the sexual penetration at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

[Where evidence is given about the lack of resistance or injury or about past consensual sex, add the following darker shaded section.]

The law also says the complainant is not to be regarded as having freely agreed just because:

- [if relevant] s/he did not protest or physically resist the accused;
- [if relevant] s/he did not sustain physical injury;

- [if relevant] s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act on that occasion with the accused or with any other person, or that s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act with the accused or another person on an earlier occasion.

However, these are relevant factors for you to consider. You must consider the action or lack of action of NOC, together with all the surrounding circumstances, in order to decide whether the prosecution has proven beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not consent.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to take part in the act of sexual penetration, you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done at the time of the alleged penetration, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about [his/her] state of mind at that time. You can also consider what s/he did not say or do at the time of the alleged penetration.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC did not consent. [Insert relevant evidence and competing arguments.]

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt this first additional element that NOC did not consent, then you must find NOA not guilty.

Awareness of Lack of Consent

Turning now to the second additional element, if consent is available as a defence, the prosecution must also prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of the alleged sexual penetration the accused was aware either:

- that the complainant was not consenting; or
- that the complainant might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these state(s) of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Belief in consent

[If evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting, add one of the directions in 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent.]

Onus and standard of proof

Remember, you may not need to consider the issue of consent. The process that you must follow is this. First, you must decide if the prosecution has proven the five elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt. That is, the prosecution must prove that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC, that s/he intended to take part in the act of sexual penetration, that NOC was aged 16 or 17 at the relevant time, that NOA was not married to NOC and that at the relevant time, NOC was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused. If the prosecution cannot prove all five of these elements, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Next, if you find that the prosecution has proven each of these elements beyond reasonable doubt, and the accused has raised the issue as to belief in age, you must then decide if NOA has proven, on the balance of probabilities, that s/he believed that NOC was at least 18 years old, and that that belief was based on reasonable grounds. If the accused cannot prove both of these matters, then NOA will be guilty of this offence, as long as the prosecution have proven each of the first three elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt.

If, however, you find that the accused has proven these matters as to belief in age on the balance of probabilities, you must then decide whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, the two additional elements that NOC did not consent, and that NOA was aware that s/he was not or might not be consenting. If the prosecution cannot prove both of these things, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence. It is only if you are satisfied that they have been proven beyond reasonable doubt, together with each of the first five elements of the offence, that you can convict NOA of sexual penetration of a child aged 16 or 17.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year old child, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant; and

Two – that NOA intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration; and

Three – that NOC was either 16 or 17 years of age at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place; and

Four – that NOA and NOC were not married at the relevant time; and

Five – that NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual penetration of a child aged 16 or 17.

If you decide that each of these elements have been proven beyond reasonable doubt, you must decide if the accused has proved, on the balance of probabilities:

- That NOA believed that NOC was aged 18 or older at the relevant time; and
- That NOA had reasonable grounds for that belief.

If the accused has not proved both of these matters on the balance of probabilities, and you find that all of the elements have been proved by the prosecution beyond reasonable doubt, then NOA will be guilty of the offence. However, if you find that both of these matters have been proved by the accused on the balance of probabilities, you must then decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC did not consent to the act of sexual penetration and that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

[If the prosecution conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section.]

Since the prosecution does not dispute the accused's claim that [insert basis of concession about consent, e.g. "NOC was consenting" or "s/he believed that NOC was consenting"], you must, if you reach this point, find NOA not guilty of this offence.

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

If the prosecution cannot prove these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual penetration of a child aged of 16 or 17.

Last updated: 30 November 2017

7.3.15.4 Charge: Sexual Penetration of a 16- or 17-Year-Old Child (1/1/92–1/12/06) Consent in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for trials commenced on or after 1/1/08 involving offences alleged to have been committed between 5/8/1991 and 30/11/2006 where consent is in issue.

I must now direct you about the crime of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year old child.

The law says that the age of consent for sexual acts is normally 16. However, for persons aged 16 or 17, the law has created this specific offence to protect such young people from exploitation by persons in positions of care, supervision or authority.

To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant.

Two – the accused intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration.

Three – the complainant was either 16 or 17 years of age at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

Four – the accused was not married to the complainant.

Five – at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place, the complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[690]

Taking part in sexual penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant. [If in issue, add: The prosecution must also prove that the relevant acts of the accused were performed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.[691]]

Act of sexual penetration

The law defines sexual penetration as the introduction of a person's penis, body part or object into another person's vagina or anus. It also includes putting a penis into someone's mouth.

For this first element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove that NOA took part in one of these acts. The law says that both the person who sexually penetrates and the person who is penetrated are regarded as "taking part" in sexual penetration. [If relevant add: This means that if you find that NOA was sexually penetrated by NOC, you will be satisfied that the accused "took part" in that act of sexual penetration.]

In this case the prosecution seeks to prove that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC [describe relevant form of penetration, e.g. "by putting his finger into NOC's anus"/"when he took NOC's penis in his mouth"].

[If relevant add:

- [Identify item or body part and actor] does not need to have gone all the way into [NOC/NOA's] [vagina/anus/mouth]. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.

---

[690] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[691] Described in the instructions within this charge as the "voluntariness" requirement.

- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation].

[If the evidence or arguments have placed voluntariness in issue, add the following shaded section.]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant act of participation, e.g. "introducing his finger into NOC's anus"/"receiving NOC's penis into his mouth"] must have been consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstances of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

[In vaginal penetration cases, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that [NOA/NOC] introduced [identify body part or object] to any extent between the outer lips of [NOA/NOC's] vagina.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

However, according to the law, the introduction of an object or body part other than the penis into a person's [vagina/anus] does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done in good faith for medical or hygienic purposes. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done in good faith for [medical/hygienic] purposes.

In this case [insert relevant evidence or competing arguments about proof of the accused's participation in an act of sexual penetration].

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused intended to take part in the act of sexual penetration with the complainant.[692]

[If intention is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

This element is not in issue here. [If appropriate, explain further, e.g.

- The accused admits that s/he intentionally sexually penetrated the complainant.
- If you are satisfied that the accused [consciously, voluntarily and deliberately] sexually penetrated the complainant, you should have no trouble finding that s/he did so intentionally.]

[692] If the accused is alleged to have penetrated the complainant, "intention" will only rarely be in issue. This constitutes an offence of basic intent, that is, the intent to commit the physical act of penetrating the complainant. This means that proof of intent will rarely be separated from proof of the act, and "intention" will rarely be an independent issue. Any mental state issues related to the act of penetration (e.g. the negation of intent by involuntariness, unconsciousness or accident) should generally be addressed by voluntariness directions. Offences involving penetration of the accused by the complainant may raise different issues.

Complainant aged 16 or 17

The third element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that [he/she] was either 16 or 17 years of age at the time that the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was [16/17] at the time the alleged act of sexual penetration took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[693]

Accused not married to the complainant

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused was not married to the complainant at the time the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case, the defence has not disputed the prosecution's submission that [he/she] was not married to NOC at the time that the alleged act of sexual penetration took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[694]

Care, supervision or authority

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that, at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place, the complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

[If care, supervision or authority is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it was conceded by the defence that NOA was NOC's [describe relationship] and that the complainant was thus under the care, supervision or authority of the accused [at the relevant time]. While it is for you to determine whether this was the case, you should have no difficulty finding that this element has been proven.

[If care, supervision or authority is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

The words "care, supervision or authority" all describe different types of relationships where the accused is in a position to exploit or take advantage of that relationship to influence the child to engage in an act of sexual penetration. You should take this into account when deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the complainant was under the accused's care, supervision or authority.

The relationship of care, supervision or authority does not have to be a formal one. There does not, for example, have to have been a formal agreement that the accused would take care of the complainant. An informal relationship of care, supervision or authority is sufficient.

[If relevant, add: You do not need to find that the alleged act of penetration was actually connected with, or influenced by, the relationship of care, supervision or authority or that NOA was actually exploiting his/her position of advantage. It is sufficient if you are satisfied that an established relationship of care, supervision or authority existed between NOA and NOC that could have been connected with, or influenced the child to engage in, the act of sexual penetration, and that the relationship existed on the day on which the penetration took place.]

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOC was under NOA's [care/supervision/authority]. [Insert

---

[693] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[694] If it is alleged that the accused and complainant were married, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

prosecution evidence]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place..

[If the accused may be unaware of the facts giving rise to a relationship of care, supervision or authority, add the following shaded section.]

The law states that NOA must know and be aware of the facts that give rise to a relationship of care, supervision or authority. For example, if a teacher with a large number of students did not recognise the complainant was a member of one of his/her classes, then you could not find this element proved.

[Insert relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Consent

This charge addresses consent coupled with a belief on reasonable grounds that the child was aged 16 or older (s 48(2)(a)). If the issue is 48(2)(b) (accused believed on reasonable grounds that s/he was married to the complainant) the charge will need to be adapted accordingly. See 7.3.15 Sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year old child (1/1/92 – 30/6/17) for guidance.

Belief that complainant was aged 18 or more

Even if you find that the prosecution has proven all five elements of this offence, NOA will not necessarily be guilty of this offence. This is because, in certain circumstances, consent will be a defence.

The law states that consent is available as a defence if the accused believed on reasonable grounds that the complainant was at least 18 years old at the time of the alleged sexual penetration.

As a result, the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt either:

1. That NOA did not believe that NOC was aged 18 or older at the time of the alleged sexual penetration; or

2. That NOA did not have reasonable grounds to believe that NOC was aged 18 or older at the time of the alleged sexual penetration

For there to be reasonable grounds for a belief, the belief must be based on facts which could have caused a reasonable person to believe the same thing. So to prove this second alternative the prosecution must prove that even if NOA may have believed NOC was 18 or older, a reasonable person in his/her situation could not have reached that conclusion based on the facts known to NOA.

In this case the prosecution alleged [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments]. In response, the defence submitted [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

If the prosecution has proven beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA did not believe on reasonable grounds that NOC was at least 18 years old at the time of the alleged sexual penetration, then consent will not be a defence, and will not be relevant to your determination of the accused's guilt.

[If the prosecution has conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the following shaded section.]

The prosecution does not dispute that [insert basis of concession about consent, e.g. "NOC was consenting" or "NOA believed that NOC was consenting"]. Therefore, if the prosecution fails to prove either that NOA did not believe that NOC was aged 18 or older at the time of the alleged sexual penetration, or that NOA did not have reasonable grounds to believe that NOC was aged 18 or older at the time of the alleged sexual penetration, then you will find the accused not guilty.

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

Warning: It is an unresolved question whether the prosecution must prove that the accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting. This Charge Book requires proof of awareness of non-consent as a matter of prudence. See 7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent (Pre-1/7/15) for more information.

If, however, you find that this has not been proven, then you will need to determine whether the prosecution have proved two additional elements: first, that NOC did not consent to the alleged act of sexual penetration and second, that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

Definition of consent

Dealing with the first of these additional elements, consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So NOC will not have consented to the sexual penetration if s/he did not freely agree to take part in that act.

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not freely agree to the sexual penetration. So if consent is relevant to your determination, and the prosecution cannot prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not freely agree to the penetration, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

The law identifies a number of circumstances where the complainant is deemed not to freely agree, or consent, to sexual penetration. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because s/he is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep, unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of freely agreeing;

(e) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(f) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act or the identity of the person;

(g) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting. However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

[If there is evidence that the complainant did not say or do anything to indicate agreement, add the following darker shaded section.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to the sexual penetration at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

[Where evidence is given about the lack of resistance or injury or about past consensual sex, add the following darker shaded section.]

The law also says the complainant is not to be regarded as having freely agreed just because:

- [if relevant] s/he did not protest or physically resist the accused;
- [if relevant] s/he did not sustain physical injury;
- [if relevant] s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act on that occasion with the accused or with any other person, or that s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act with the accused or another person on an earlier occasion.

However, these are relevant factors for you to consider. You must consider the action or lack of action of NOC, together with all the surrounding circumstances, in order to decide whether the prosecution has proven beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not consent.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to take part in the act of sexual penetration, you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done at the time of the alleged penetration, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about [his/her] state of mind at that time. You can also consider what s/he did not say or do at the time of the alleged penetration.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC did not consent. [Insert relevant evidence and competing arguments.]

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt this first additional element that NOC did not consent, then you must find NOA not guilty.

Awareness of Lack of Consent

Turning now to the second additional element, if consent is available as a defence, the prosecution must also prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of the alleged sexual penetration the accused was aware either:

- that the complainant was not consenting; or
- that the complainant might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these state(s) of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Belief in consent

[If evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting, add one of the directions in 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent.]

Onus and standard of proof

Remember, you may not need to consider the issue of consent. You will only need to consider this issue if the prosecution fails to prove:

(1) That NOA did not believe that NOC was aged 18 or older at the time of the alleged sexual penetration; or

(2) That NOA did not have reasonable grounds to believe that NOC was aged 18 or older at the time of the alleged sexual penetration.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year old child, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant; and

Two – that NOA intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration; and

Three – that NOC was either 16 or 17 years of age at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place; and

Four – that NOA and NOC were not married at the relevant time; and

Five – that NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual penetration of a child aged 16 or 17.

If you decide that each of these elements have been proved beyond reasonable doubt, you must decide if the prosecution has also proved, to the same standard:

- That NOA did not believe that NOC was aged 18 or older at the relevant time; or
- That NOA had no reasonable grounds to believe that NOC was aged 18 or older at the relevant time.

If the prosecution has proved one of these matters, and you find that all of the elements have been proved by the prosecution beyond reasonable doubt, then NOA will be guilty of the offence. However, if the prosecution has not proved either of these matters, you must then decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC did not consent to the act of sexual penetration and that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

[If the prosecution conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the following shaded section.]

Since the prosecution does not dispute the accused's claim that [insert basis of concession about consent, e.g. "NOC was consenting" or "s/he believed that NOC was consenting"], you must, if you reach this point, find NOA not guilty of this offence.

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

If the prosecution cannot prove these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual penetration of a child aged of 16 or 17.

Last updated: 14 May 2015

7.3.15.5 Checklist: Sexual Penetration of a 16- or 17-Year-Old Child (1/1/92–30/6/17) Consent in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

The Elements

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant; and
2. The accused intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration; and
3. The complainant was either 16 or 17 years of age at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place; and

4. The accused was not married to the complainant at that time; and

5. The complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused at that time.

Accused's Acts

1. Did the accused take part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year-old child

Accused's Intention

2. Did the accused intend to take part in that act of sexual penetration with the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year-old child

The Complainant's Age

3. Was the complainant either 16 or 17 years of age at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year-old child

No Marital Relationship

4. Were the accused and the complainant married to each other at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If No, then go to 5

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year-old child

Relationship of Care, Supervision or Authority

5. Was the complainant in a relationship of care, supervision or authority with the accused at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place?

If Yes, then go to 6

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year-old child

Relevance of Consent

[This section of the checklist can be used if the accused alleged that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that the complainant was 18 or older and consented to the act of sexual penetration. If consent is in issue because the accused believed on reasonable grounds that s/he was married to the complainant, it will need to be modified as necessary.]

[Use this section if the offence was allegedly committed on or after 1 December 2006.]

Consent is only relevant if you are satisfied the defence has proven, on the balance of probabilities, both that:

6. The accused believed that the complainant was aged 18 or older at the time the act of sexual penetration took place; and

7. The accused's belief that the complainant was aged 18 or older was based on reasonable grounds.

[Use this section if the offence was allegedly committed before 1 December 2006]

Consent is relevant unless you are satisfied the prosecution has proven beyond reasonable doubt that either:

6. The accused did not believe that the complainant was aged 18 or older at the time the act of sexual penetration took place; or

7. The accused did not have reasonable grounds to believe that the complainant was aged 18 or older.

Lack of Consent

If consent is relevant, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that:

8. The complainant did not consent to taking part in the act of sexual penetration; and

9. The accused was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

Consent

8. Did the sexual penetration occur without the complainant's consent?

If Yes, then go to 9

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year-old child (as long as you answered yes to questions 6 and 7)

Awareness of Lack of Consent

9. At the time of sexual penetration, was the accused aware that the complainant was not consenting or that s/he might not be consenting?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year-old child (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3, 5 and 8, and no to question 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year-old child (as long as you answered yes to questions 6 and 7)

Last updated: 21 August 2008

7.3.16 Sexual Assault of a Child under 16 (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Commencement Information

1. The current s 49D offence came into force on 1 July 2017.

2. Prior to 1 July 2017, Crimes Act 1958 s 47 contained a composite offence of an indecent act "with or in the presence of" a child under 16. Following the amendments introduced by the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Act 2016, the offence was split so that section 49D addresses sexual touching and section 49F addresses sexual activity in the presence of the child.
3. For offences committed before 1 July 2017, see 7.3.17 Indecent Act with a Child Under 16 (1/1/92–30/6/17).
4. For offences involving sexual activity, see 7.3.21 Sexual activity in the presence of a child under 16 (From 1/7/17).

Elements

5. The elements of the offence are set out in s 49D(1) of the Crimes Act 1958. The prosecution must prove that:

   i) The accused (A) intentionally:

      - touched another person (B);
      - caused or allowed B to touch A; or
      - caused B to touch or to continue to touch themselves, another person (C) or to be touched, or to continue to be touched, by C;

   ii) B was a child under the age of 16 years;

   iii) The touching was sexual;

   iv) The touching was contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct.

Intentional touching

6. The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intentionally touched another person, or caused the other person to touch someone. The term "touching" is defined in Crimes Act 1958 s 35B as touching that may be done:

   (a) with any part of the body; or
   (b) with anything else; or
   (c) through anything, including anything worn by the person doing the touching or by the person touched.

7. This element may also be proved where the accused causes another person to touch the complainant (Crimes Act 1958 s 49D(1)).
8. The fault element for this element is basic or general intention. Where relevant, the prosecution must prove that the touching was intentional in the sense that it was deliberate rather than inadvertent or accidental.
9. For more information on this element, see 7.3.5 Sexual Assault (From 1/7/15).

Child Under 16

10. The second element requires the prosecution to prove that the complainant was under the age of 16 at the time the relevant act took place (Crimes Act 1958 s 49D(1)).

Sexual Touching

11. The third element requires the prosecution to prove that the touching was sexual (Crimes Act 1958 s 49D(1)).
12. Touching can be "sexual" because of:

(a) the area of the body that is touched or used in the touching, including (but not limited to) the genital or anal region, the buttocks or, in the case of a female or a person who identifies as a female, the breasts; or
(b) the fact that the person doing the touching seeks or gets sexual arousal or sexual gratification from the touching; or
(c) any other aspect of the touching, including the circumstances in which it is done (Crimes Act 1958 s 35B(2)).

13. For more information on this element, see 7.3.5 Sexual Assault (From 1/7/15).

Touching contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct

14. The fourth element is that the touching is contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct (Crimes Act 1958 s 49D(1)).

15. Section 49D(3) of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that:

> Whether or not the touching is contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct depends on the circumstances.

16. The Act specifies that the circumstances include the purpose of the touching and whether the accused seeks or gets sexual arousal or gratification from the touching. However, the circumstances do not include whether the complainant consented to the touching or whether the accused believed the complainant consented to the touching (Crimes Act 1958 s 49D(4)).

Statutory defences and exemption

Similarity in age

17. Section 49U of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that it is a defence to an offence against section 49D(1) if, at the time of the conduct:

    i) A was not more than 2 years older than B; and

    ii) B was 12 years of age or more.

18. In relation to this defence, the accused's actual age must not exceed the child's by more than 24 months. The availability of the defence is not determined by a measure limited to whole–years (Stannard v DPP (2010) 28 VR 84).

19. To disprove this defence, the prosecution must rebut one or more limbs of section 49U.

20. Unlike the former s 47, a similarity in age is not used as a threshold requirement before consent is relevant. This means that the jury does not need to consider consent, or a reasonable belief in consent, as part of the similarity in age defence.

Reasonable belief as to age

21. Section 49W of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that it is a defence to an offence against section 49D(1) if, at the time of the conduct:

    i) B was 12 years of age or more; and

    ii) A reasonably believed that B was 16 years of age or more.

22. The accused bears the burden of proving, on the balance of probabilities, that he or she reasonably believed that B was 16 years of age or more (Crimes Act 1958 s 49W(4)).

23. The Note to section 49W states that:

> Whether or not A reasonably believed that B … was 16 years of age or more depends on the circumstances. The circumstances include any steps that A took to find out [B's] age.

24. The Note also specifies that the accused has an evidential burden to establish that B was 12 years of age or more.

25. Unlike the former s 47, a reasonable belief in age is not used as a threshold requirement before consent is relevant. This means that the jury does not need to consider consent, or a reasonable belief in consent, as part of the belief in age defence.

Honest and reasonable mistake not a defence in some circumstances

26. Section 49ZC(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that an honest and reasonable mistaken belief that the touching was not sexual or was not contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct is not a defence.

27. The combined effect of sections 49D(4) and 49ZC(2) is that while the accused's beliefs can make a touching sexual or contrary to community standards, the accused's beliefs cannot operate to excuse otherwise prohibited conduct.

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.16.1 Charge: Sexual Assault of a Child under 16 (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of sexual assault of a child under 16. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused intentionally touched another person, NOC.[695]

Two – NOC was under the age of 16 years.

Three – The touching was sexual.

Four – The touching was contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail

Actions of the accused

Warning! This charge is designed for cases where the prosecution relies on s 49D(1)(a)(i). This direction on the first element must be modified if the prosecution relies on other limbs of s 49D(1)(a).

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOA intentionally touched NOC.

[695] This statement of the element must be modified if the prosecution relies on the other limbs of s 49D(1)(a). The words "touched the complainant" may be replaced with "caused or allowed the complainant to touch the accused" or "caused the complainant to touch himself/herself" or "caused the complainant to touch another person" or "caused the complainant to be touched by another person".

[If the evidence or arguments have placed the intentional or voluntary nature of the acts in issue, add the following shaded section.[696]]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant act of touching] must have been done intentionally.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves intention in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA touched the outside of NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the touching"].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA [insert evidence about the relevant act]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Child under the age of 16

The second element relates to the age of the complainant, NOC. The prosecution must prove that s/he was under the age of 16 when the alleged touching occurred.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was under 16 at that time. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[697]

Sexual touching

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act of touching was sexual.

The law says that touching can be sexual because of the area of the body involved, of either the person being touched or the person doing the touching, such as the genital or anal area, or the buttocks or breasts.

Or the touching can be sexual because the person doing the touching wants to get or gets sexual gratification from the touching.

Finally, any other aspect of the touching, including the circumstances in which it happened, can also make the touching sexual.

The question of whether or not the touching was sexual is for you to decide.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that the touching was sexual because [insert evidence and arguments]. [If relevant add: The defence responded [insert evidence and arguments]].

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA's touching of NOC was sexual.

Contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged touching was contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct.

---

[696] Because of how the offence is defined, the issue of intention is likely inseparable from the question of voluntariness. Where the issue is raised, the judge should direct the jury on the specific matters the jury must consider to find that the accused's conduct was voluntary and intentional (e.g. disproof of accident or proof that the accused was conscious).

[697] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

The law says that whether touching is contrary to community standards depends on the circumstances, and that this includes the purpose of the touching and whether NOA seeks or gets sexual arousal or sexual gratification from the touching.

The law also says that whether NOC consented to the touching and whether NOA believed that NOC consented to the touching are not relevant to whether the touching was contrary to community standards.

[Refer to relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Defences

Similarity in Age

[If the accused relies on the similarity in age defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 49U, add the following shaded section.]

For this offence, the law recognises a defence which may be termed "similarity in age". There are two parts to this defence.

First, the accused must be no more than 2 years older than the complainant. In this case, that requirement is met.[698]

Second, the complainant must have been 12 years old or more at the time of the alleged conduct. It is this part of the defence which is in dispute.

As I told you at the start of the trial, the prosecution must prove the accused's guilt. This means the prosecution must prove that at the time of the alleged conduct, NOC was not aged 12 years or older. In other words, the prosecution must prove that at the time of the touching, NOC was aged 11 years or younger.

[Refer to relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Reasonable belief in Age

[If the accused relies on the belief in age defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 49W, add the following shaded section.]

The law states that the accused does not commit this offence if, at the time s/he touched NOC, the accused reasonably believed that NOC was aged 16 years or more. There are two parts to this defence.

First, at the time of the conduct, NOC was aged 12 or more. There is no issue in this case that NOC was aged 12 or more at the time of the conduct.[699]

Second, NOA must have reasonably believed that NOC was aged 16 or more. It is a matter for you to decide whether NOA held this belief, and whether it was reasonable. As part of deciding this issue, you should consider what steps NOA took to find out NOC's age.

Unlike the elements of the offence, this is a matter which the accused must prove. It is an exception to the general rule that the prosecution must prove all matters. However, the accused only need to prove that s/he reasonably believed that NOC was aged 16 or more on the balance of probabilities. In other words, s/he must show that it is more likely than not that s/he believed NOC was aged 16 or more and

---

[698] If the prosecution contests this matter, then the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[699] If the age of the child is in dispute, then this direction must be modified. The prosecution bears the onus of rebutting this threshold requirement, once the accused has satisfied the evidential burden.

this belief was reasonable. Unlike the prosecution, s/he does not need to prove this matter beyond reasonable doubt.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments.]

Consent not a defence

To protect children under the age of 16, Parliament has specifically stated that consent is not relevant to this offence. You do not need to consider the issue of whether or not NOC agreed to be touched by NOA.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of sexual assault of a child under the age of 16, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

- One – that NOA intentionally touched NOC; and
- Two – NOC is a child under the age of 16 years; and
- Three – that the touching was sexual; and
- Four – that the touching was contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual assault of a child under the age of 16.

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.16.2 Checklist: Sexual Assault of a Child under 16 (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally touched the complainant; and

2. The complainant was under the age of 16; and

3. The touching was sexual; and

4. The touching was contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct.

Intentional touching

1. Did the accused intentionally touch NOC?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Assault of a child under 16

Complainant under the age of 16

2. At the time of the act, was NOC under the age of 16?

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Assault of a child under 16

Sexual touching

3. Was the touching sexual?

Consider – Touching may be sexual because of the area of body touched, the fact that the person doing it seeks or gets sexual arousal or gratification from the touching, or any other reason.

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Assault of a child under 16

Contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct

4. Was the touching contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct?

Consider – Relevant matters include the circumstances of the touching and whether the accused was seeking or got sexual arousal or gratification

Consider – Whether NOC consented to the touching or whether NOA believed NOC consented to the touching is not relevant to this element

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Sexual Assault of a child under 16 (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Assault of a child under 16

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.17 Indecent Act with a Child under 16 (1/1/92–30/6/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Commencement Information

1. For offences alleged to have been committed before 1 July 2017, s 47 contained the offence of indecent act with a child under 16.
2. This offence came into force on 5 August 1991, replacing the former offences specified in s 44(3) (indecent assault on a person under the age of 16 years) and s 50 (gross indecency).
3. The offence applies to any acts committed on or after 5 August 1991 and before 1 July 2017 (Crimes Act 1958 s 585A(2)).
4. If an offence is alleged to have been committed between dates, one date before and one date on or after 5 August 1991, the offence is alleged to have been committed before 5 August 1991 (Crimes Act 1958 s 585A(4)).
5. The offence was amended on 22 October 2014 by section 5 of the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences and Other Matters) Act 2014. This amendment removed reference to the accused and the complaint not being married.
6. The current s 47(2) and s 47(3) apply only to offences committed on or after 1 December 2006. Their impact is considered below in the discussion of Statutory defences and exemptions.

Indecent Acts

7. An indecent act is one which "right-minded persons would consider to be contrary to community standards of decency" (DPP v Scott [2004] VSC 129; Curtis v R [2011] VSCA 102).

8. Although two teenagers of the same age kissing each other may not, of itself, be an indecent act, instigating two teenagers to kiss for the accused's sexual gratification may be (Curtis v R [2011] VSCA 102).

9. For the purposes of s 47, an "indecent act" includes an indecent assault (R v TSR (2002) 5 VR 627).

10. See 7.3.6 Indecent Assault (1/1/92 – 30/6/15) for further guidance on the meaning of indecency.

"Wilfully"

11. Section 47 provides that a person must not "wilfully" commit, or "wilfully" be in any way a party to the commission of an indecent act with or in the presence of a child under the age of 16.

12. There has been much dispute over the meaning of the word "wilfully", and it appears that its meaning varies according to the particular statutory provision in which it appears (for a general discussion of the term, see Ianella v French (1968) 119 CLR 84; Bergin v Brown [1990] VR 888).

13. Although the meaning of the word "wilfully" in the context of s 47 has not been determined, it seems likely that it means intentionally (see, e.g. R v Papamitrou (2004) 7 VR 375, which casts doubt on the relevance of recklessness to s 47).

14. Although it has not been judicially determined, it seems likely that the accused must have not only wilfully committed the relevant indecent act, but have wilfully committed it with or in the presence of a child.

"With or in the presence of"

15. Under s 47, the relevant act must be committed "with" or "in the presence of" a child under the age of 16.

16. The use of the words "with" and "in the presence of" does not create two separate offences. Section 47 creates a single offence that deals with indecent acts involving children under the age of 16 (R v Coffey (2003) 6 VR 543; R v ADJ [2005] VSCA 102).

17. A count that specifies that an act was committed "with or in the presence of" a child would therefore not be bad for duplicity (R v Coffey (2003) 6 VR 543).

18. Committing an act "with" a child does not require the child to have co-operated, consented or participated in the act. The offence may be constituted by an indecent act committed against the child, regardless of whether or not they were consenting or approving (R v TSR (2002) 5 VR 627).

19. For an act to have been committed "with" a child (cf. "in the presence of" a child), there must have been physical contact between the parties. Speaking indecently to a child over the telephone is therefore incapable of constituting an offence under s 47, as it is neither "with" a child nor in their presence (R v Alexander and McKenzie (2002) 6 VR 53. See also R v Coffey (2003) 6 VR 543).

20. No physical contact is required for an act to have been committed "in the presence of" a child. An act committed in front of a child is committed in their presence (R v Alexander and McKenzie (2002) 6 VR 53; [2002] VSCA 183; R v Coffey (2003) 6 VR 543; R v Barnes [2003] VSCA 156).

21. While an accused who encourages a child to perform an indecent act in front of them will be a party to the commission of an indecent act "in the presence of" a child (R v Coffey (2003) 6 VR 543), there is no need for there to be an act of encouragement to satisfy this element of the offence. The words "in the presence of" do not require anything more than mere presence or proximity (R v ADJ [2005] VSCA 102).

22. In South Australia it has been held (in relation to a similar offence) that "in the presence of" simply requires that the child be present. It is not necessary that the child saw the indecent act or was aware of it. The offence will be established even if the child was asleep at the time (R v AWL [2003] SASC 416).

Child under 16

23. The jury should determine the complainant's age having regard to the evidence in the case, or if no other sufficient evidence is presented, to the complainant's appearance (Crimes Act 1958 s 411).

Consent

24. Section 47(2) states that consent is not a defence to a charge of committing an indecent act with a child under 16, unless at the time of the alleged offence:
    - The accused believed on reasonable grounds that the child was 16 or older; or
    - The accused was not more than 2 years older than the child; or
    - The accused believed on reasonable grounds that he or she was married to the child.
25. The prosecution does not have to address the question of consent as part of its case – it is a matter for the defence to raise (R v TSR (2002) 5 VR 627).
26. For information on this defence, see 7.3.13 Sexual Penetration of a child under 16 (1/1/92–30/6/17), where the equivalent defence under s 45(4) is discussed.

Last updated: 30 November 2017

7.3.17.1 Charge: Indecent Act with a Child under 16 (22/10/14–30/6/17) Consent not in issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge can be used for offences of indecent act with a child under 16 alleged to have been committed on or after 22/10/2014 where consent is not in issue.

I must now direct you about the crime of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under the age of 16. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused [committed the alleged act/was a party to the commission of the alleged act].

Two – the accused [wilfully committed the alleged indecent act/was wilfully a party to the alleged indecent act].

Three – the act occurred in indecent circumstances.

Four – the act was done [with/in the presence of] the complainant.

Five – the complainant was under the age of 16 when the act took place.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail

Actions of the accused

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have [committed the act alleged by the prosecution/been a party in any way to the act alleged by the prosecution].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA [insert evidence about the relevant act]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Wilful

The second element relates to the accused person's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that the accused [wilfully committed the alleged indecent act/was wilfully a party to the alleged indecent act]. That is, you must be satisfied that the accused's participation in the act was deliberate not accidental.

Indecent circumstances

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act occurred in indecent circumstances.

Indecent is an ordinary, everyday word, and it is for you to determine whether the circumstances were indecent.

However, the law says that indecent circumstances must involve a sexual connotation. This may arise from the area of the complainant's body NOA touched, what NOA used to touch NOC or from the circumstances of the act. Beyond the requirement of a sexual connotation, the question of whether or not the circumstances were indecent is for you to decide.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA's act occurred in indecent circumstances because [insert evidence]. [If relevant add: The defence responded [insert evidence]].

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA's act occurred in indecent circumstances.

With/In the Presence of the complainant

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act was intentionally done [with/in the presence of] the complainant.

In this case the prosecution submitted that [insert evidence about the way in which the act was committed with or in the presence of the complainant]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

[If it is alleged that the act was committed in the presence of the complainant, add the following shaded text: For this element to be satisfied, you do not need to find that there was any physical contact between NOA and NOC. This element will be met if the prosecution can prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was present at the place where the alleged act was committed and NOA was aware of that fact.]

Child under the Age of 16

The fifth element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that s/he was under the age of 16 at the time that the alleged indecent act took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was under 16 at the time the alleged indecent act took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[700]

Consent

To protect children under the age of 16, Parliament has created a number of offences where consent is not relevant. This is one of those offences, so you do not need to consider the issue of whether or not NOC agreed to take part in the alleged indecent act.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under 16, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

---

[700] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

- One – that NOA [committed [insert relevant act]/was a party to the commission of [insert relevant act]; and
- Two – that NOA [wilfully committed/was wilfully a party to] the alleged indecent act; and
- Three – that this act occurred in indecent circumstances; and
- Four – that this act was done [with/in the presence of] NOC; and
- Five – that NOC was under the age of 16 when this act took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under 16.

Last updated: 27 April 2016

7.3.17.2 Checklist: Indecent Act with a Child under 16 (22/10/14–30/6/17) Consent Not in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Five elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused [committed/was a party to the commission of] the alleged act; and
2. The accused [wilfully committed/was wilfully a party to] the act; and
3. The act occurred in indecent circumstances; and
4. The accused did the act [with/in the presence of] the complainant; and
5. The complainant was under the age of 16 at the time the act was committed.

Accused's Acts

1. [Did the accused commit/Was the accused a party to the commission of] the alleged act?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

Accused's Mental State

2. [Did the accused wilfully commit/Was the accused wilfully a party to] the act?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

Indecent Circumstances

3. Did the act occur in indecent circumstances?

Consider – sexual connotation

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

Complainant's Involvement

4. Did the act take place [with/in the presence of] the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

Complainant's Age

5. Was the complainant under the age of 16 at the time the act was committed?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16 (as long as you answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

Last updated: 22 January 2016

7.3.17.3 Charge: Indecent Act with a Child under 16 (1/1/92–21/10/14) Consent Not in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for offences of indecent act with a child under 16 alleged to have been committed between 5/8/1991 and 21/10/2014 where consent is not in issue.

I must now direct you about the crime of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under the age of 16. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 6 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused [committed the alleged act/was a party to the commission of the alleged act].

Two – the accused [wilfully committed the alleged indecent act/was wilfully a party to the alleged indecent act].

Three – the act occurred in indecent circumstances.

Four – the act was done [with/in the presence of] the complainant.

Five – the complainant was under the age of 16 when the act took place.

Six – the accused was not married to the complainant at the time the alleged act took place.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Actions of the accused

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have [committed the act alleged by the prosecution/been a party in any way to the act alleged by the prosecution].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA [insert evidence about the relevant act]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Wilful

The second element relates to the accused person's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that the accused [wilfully committed the alleged indecent act/was wilfully a party to the alleged indecent act]. That is, you must be satisfied that the accused's participation in the act was deliberate not accidental.

Indecent circumstances

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act occurred in indecent circumstances.

Indecent is an ordinary, everyday word, and it is for you to determine whether the circumstances were indecent.

However, the law says that indecent circumstances must involve a sexual connotation. This may arise from the area of the complainant's body NOA touched, what NOA used to touch NOC or from the circumstances of the act. Beyond the requirement of a sexual connotation, the question of whether or not the circumstances were indecent is for you to decide.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA's act occurred in indecent circumstances because [insert evidence]. [If relevant add: The defence responded [insert evidence]].

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA's act occurred in indecent circumstances.

With/In the Presence of the complainant

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act was intentionally done [with/in the presence of] the complainant.

In this case the prosecution submitted that [insert evidence about the way in which the act was committed with or in the presence of the complainant]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

[If it is alleged that the act was committed in the presence of the complainant, add the following shaded text: For this element to be satisfied, you do not need to find that there was any physical contact between NOA and NOC. This element will be met if the prosecution can prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was present at the place where the alleged act was committed and NOA was aware of that fact.]

Child under the Age of 16

The fifth element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that s/he was under the age of 16 at the time that the alleged indecent act took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was under 16 at the time the alleged indecent act took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[701]

Accused not married to the complainant

The sixth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused was not married to the complainant at the time the alleged act took place.

In this case, the defence has not disputed the prosecution's claim that s/he was not married to NOC at the time that the alleged act took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[702]

---

[701] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

[702] If it is alleged that the accused and complainant were married, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

Consent

To protect children under the age of 16, Parliament has created a number of offences where consent is not relevant. This is one of those offences, so you do not need to consider the issue of whether or not NOC agreed to take part in the alleged indecent act.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under 16, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA [committed [insert relevant act]/was a party to the commission of [insert relevant act]]; and

Two – that NOA [wilfully committed/was wilfully a party to] the alleged indecent act; and

Three – that this act occurred in indecent circumstances; and

Four – that this act was done [with/in the presence of] NOC; and

Five – that NOC was under the age of 16 when this act took place; and

Six – that NOA was not married to NOC at the time that this act took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under 16.

Last updated: 27 April 2016

7.3.17.4 Checklist: Indecent Act with a Child under 16 (1/1/92–21/10/14) Consent Not in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Six elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused [committed/was a party to the commission of] the alleged act; and
2. The accused [wilfully committed/was wilfully a party to] the act; and
3. The act occurred in indecent circumstances; and
4. The accused did the act [with/in the presence of] the complainant; and
5. The complainant was under the age of 16 at the time the act was committed; and
6. The accused was not married to the complainant at the time the act was committed.

Accused's Acts

1. [Did the accused commit/Was the accused a party to the commission of] the alleged act?

    If Yes, then go to 2

    If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

Accused's mental state

2. [Did the accused wilfully commit/Was the accused wilfully a party to] the act?

    If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

Indecent Circumstances

3. Did the act occur in indecent circumstances?

Consider – sexual connotation

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

Complainant's Involvement

4. Did the act take place [with/in the presence of] the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

Complainant's Age

5. Was the complainant under the age of 16 at the time the act was committed?

If Yes, then go to 6

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

No Marital Relationship

6. Were the accused and the complainant married to each other at the time that the act took place?

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

If No, then the accused is guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16 (as long as you answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5)

Last updated: 22 January 2016

7.3.17.5 Charge: Indecent Act with a Child under 16 (1/7/15–30/6/17) Consent in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for offences of indecent act with a child under 16 alleged to have been committed between 1/07/2015 and 30/06/2017 where consent is in issue.

I must now direct you about the crime of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under the age of 16. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused [committed the alleged act/was a party to the commission of the alleged act].

Two – the accused [wilfully committed the alleged indecent act/was wilfully a party to the alleged indecent act].

Three – the act occurred in indecent circumstances.

Four – the act was done [with/in the presence of] the complainant.

Five – the complainant was under the age of 16 when the act took place.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail

Actions of the accused

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have [committed the act alleged by the prosecution/been a party in any way to the act alleged by the prosecution].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA [insert evidence about the relevant act]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Wilful

The second element relates to the accused person's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that the accused [wilfully committed the alleged indecent act/was wilfully a party to the alleged indecent act]. That is, you must be satisfied that the accused's participation in the act was deliberate not accidental.

Indecent circumstances

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act occurred in indecent circumstances.

Indecent is an ordinary, everyday word, and it is for you to determine whether the circumstances were indecent.

However, the law says that indecent circumstances must involve a sexual connotation. This may arise from the area of the complainant's body NOA touched, what NOA used to touch NOC or from the circumstances of the act. Beyond the requirement of a sexual connotation, the question of whether or not the circumstances were indecent is for you to decide.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA's act occurred in indecent circumstances because [insert evidence]. [If relevant add: The defence responded [insert evidence]].

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA's act occurred in indecent circumstances.

With/In the Presence of the complainant

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act was intentionally done [with/in the presence of] the complainant.

In this case the prosecution submitted that [insert evidence about the way in which the act was committed with or in the presence of the complainant]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

[If it is alleged that the act was committed in the presence of the complainant, add the following shaded text: For this element to be satisfied, you do not need to find that there was any physical contact between NOA and NOC. This element will be met if the prosecution can prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was present at the place where the alleged act was committed and NOA was aware of that fact.]

Child under the Age of 16

The fifth element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that s/he was under the age of 16 at the time that the alleged indecent act took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was under 16 at the time the alleged indecent act took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[703]

Consent

This charge addresses consent coupled with a belief on reasonable grounds that the child was aged 16 or older (s 47(2)(a)). If the issue is s 47(2)(b) (accused not more than 2 years older than the complainant) or s 47(2)(c) (accused believed on reasonable grounds that s/he was married to the complainant) the charge will need to be adapted accordingly. See Indecent Act with a Child under 16 (1/1/92 – 30/6/17) for guidance.

Warning! It is not clear whether Crimes Act 1958 s 322T affects the relevance of intoxication to this defence. Judges should seek submissions from the parties on this issue where relevant.

Belief that complainant was aged 16 or more

Even if you find that the prosecution has proven all five elements of this offence, NOA will not necessarily be guilty of this offence. This is because, in certain circumstances, consent will be a defence.

The law states that consent is available as a defence if the accused believed on reasonable grounds that the complainant was at least 16 years old at the time of the alleged indecent act.

Unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – this belief is a matter which the accused must prove on the balance of probabilities. That is, the accused must prove that it is more likely than not that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that NOC was aged 16 or over for consent to be available as a defence.

So, by contrast to proof of the elements of the offence(s), where the prosecution must satisfy you beyond reasonable doubt of them, for the defence of reasonable belief to be established to your satisfaction, it is for the accused, not the prosecution to prove the existence of a reasonable belief in age.

And the standard to which the defence must do this is a lesser standard than proof beyond reasonable doubt, it is proof on the balance of probabilities. That is, the accused must satisfy you that it is more likely than not that he believed, on reasonable grounds, that the complainant was 16 or over.

In this case [insert relevant evidence and competing arguments].

[If the prosecution has conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section.]

As it is not in issue in this case that the indecent act was consensual, if the accused satisfied you, on the balance of probabilities that s/he believed, on reasonable grounds, that at the time of the alleged indecent act, that the complainant was 16 or over, then your verdict in respect of that charge will be not guilty. If however, the accused does not satisfy you on the balance of probabilities that at the time he believed the complainant was 16 or over, and that his belief was based on reasonable grounds, then despite the fact that the act was consensual, this defence will fail.

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

Warning: It is an unresolved question whether the prosecution must prove that the accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting. This Charge Book requires proof of awareness of non-consent as a matter of prudence. See 7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent (Pre-1/7/15) for more information.

[703] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

If, however, you find that the NOA has proven that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that NOC was at least 16 years old at the time of the alleged indecent act, then you will need to determine whether the prosecution have proved two additional elements: first, that NOC did not consent to the alleged indecent act and second, that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

Definition of consent

Dealing with the first of these additional elements, consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So NOC will not have consented to the indecent act if s/he did not freely agree to take part in that act.

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not freely agree to the indecent act. So if consent is relevant to your determination, and the prosecution cannot prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not freely agree to the alleged indecent act, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

[Where a party requests a direction about the meaning of consent, add one or more of the following shaded paragraphs.]

The law says that a person can consent to an act only if they are capable of consenting, and free to choose whether or not to engage in or to allow the act.

The law says that where a person has given their consent to an act, they may withdraw that consent before the act happens or at any time while it is happening.

[Where a party requests a direction about the circumstances in which a person is taken not to have consented, add the following darker shaded section.]

In some circumstances the law says that the complainant did not freely agree, or consent, to an act. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because s/he is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep or unconscious;

(e) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of consenting to the act;

(f) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(g) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act;

(h) the person is mistaken about the identity of any other person involved in the act;

(i) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes;

(j) if the act involves an animal, the person mistakenly believes that the act is for veterinary, agricultural or scientific research purposes;

(k) the person does not say or do anything to indicate consent to the act;

(l) having initially given consent to the act, the person later withdraws consent to the act taking place or continuing].

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting.

However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

[If there is evidence that the complainant did not say or do anything to indicate agreement, add the following darker shaded section.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to an indecent act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to the alleged indecent act at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

[Where a party requests a direction about the absence of physical resistance or protest, lack of physical injury or past consensual sexual conduct, add the following shaded section as relevant to the facts in issue.]

The law also says the complainant is not to be regarded as having freely agreed just because:

- [if relevant] s/he did not protest or physically resist the accused;
- [if relevant] s/he did not sustain physical injury;
- [if relevant] s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act on that occasion with the accused or with any other person, or that s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act with the accused or another person on an earlier occasion.

However, these are relevant factors for you to consider. You must consider the action or lack of action of NOC, together with all the surrounding circumstances, in order to decide whether the prosecution has proven beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not consent.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to the alleged indecent act, you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done at the time of that act, or not said and done at the time of the alleged act, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about [his/her] state of mind at that time.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC did not consent. [Insert relevant evidence and competing arguments.]

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt this first additional element that NOC did not consent, then you must find NOA not guilty.

Awareness of Lack of Consent

Turning now to the second additional element, if consent is available as a defence, the prosecution must also prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of the alleged indecent act the accused was aware either:

- that the complainant was not consenting; or
- that the complainant might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these state(s) of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

[Warning! If this element is in issue, the judge should invite submissions on how to direct the jury about this issue. With the repeal of Crimes Act 1958 s 37AA, it may not be prudent to use 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent (Pre 1/07/2015).]

Onus and standard of proof

Remember, you may not need to consider the issue of consent. The process that you must follow is this. First, you must decide if the prosecution has proven the five elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt. That is, the prosecution must prove that NOA [wilfully committed/was wilfully a party to] an indecent act [with/in the presence of] the complainant, that NOC was under the age of 16 at the relevant time.

Next, if you find that the prosecution has proven each of these elements beyond reasonable doubt, and the accused has raised the issue as to belief in age, you must then decide if NOA has proven, on the balance of probabilities, that s/he believed that NOC was at least 16 years old, and that that belief was based on reasonable grounds. If the accused cannot prove both of these matters, then NOA will be guilty of this offence, as long as the prosecution have proven each of the first five elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt.

If, however, you find that the accused has proven these matters as to belief in age on the balance of probabilities, you must then decide whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, the two additional elements that NOC did not consent, and that NOA was aware that s/he was not or might not be consenting. If the prosecution cannot prove both of these things, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence. It is only if you are satisfied that they have been proven beyond reasonable doubt, together with each of the first five elements of the offence, that you can convict NOA of indecent act with a child under 16.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under 16, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

- One – that NOA [committed [insert relevant act]/was a party to the commission of [insert relevant act]]; and
- Two – that NOA [wilfully committed/was wilfully a party to] the alleged indecent act; and
- Three – that this act occurred in indecent circumstances; and
- Four – that this act was done [with/in the presence of] NOC; and
- Five – that NOC was under the age of 16 when this act took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under 16.

If you decide that each of these elements have been proven beyond reasonable doubt, you must decide if the accused has proven, on the balance of probabilities:

- That NOA believed that NOC was aged 16 or older at the relevant time; and
- That NOA had reasonable grounds for that belief.

If the accused has not proven both of these matters on the balance of probabilities, and you find that all of the elements have been proven by the prosecution beyond reasonable doubt, then NOA will be guilty of the offence. However, if you find that both of these matters have been proven by the accused on the balance of probabilities, you must then decide if the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC did not consent to the indecent act and that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

[If the prosecution conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section.]

Since the prosecution does not dispute the accused's claim that [insert basis of concession about consent, e.g. "NOC was consenting" or "s/he believed that NOC was consenting"], you must, if you reach this point, find NOA not guilty of this offence.

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

If the prosecution cannot prove these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under 16.

Last updated: 30 November 2017

7.3.17.6 Charge: Indecent Act with a Child under 16 (22/10/14–30/6/15) Consent in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for offences of indecent act with a child under 16 alleged to have been committed between 22/10/2014 and 30/06/2015 where consent is in issue.

I must now direct you about the crime of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under the age of 16. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused [committed the alleged act/was a party to the commission of the alleged act].

Two – the accused [wilfully committed the alleged indecent act/was wilfully a party to the alleged indecent act].

Three – the act occurred in indecent circumstances.

Four – the act was done [with/in the presence of] the complainant.

Five – the complainant was under the age of 16 when the act took place.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail

Actions of the accused

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have [committed the act alleged by the prosecution/been a party in any way to the act alleged by the prosecution].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA [insert evidence about the relevant act]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Wilful

The second element relates to the accused person's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that the accused [wilfully committed the alleged indecent act/was wilfully a party to the alleged indecent act]. That is, you must be satisfied that the accused's participation in the act was deliberate not accidental.

Indecent circumstances

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act occurred in indecent circumstances.

Indecent is an ordinary, everyday word, and it is for you to determine whether the circumstances were indecent.

However, the law says that indecent circumstances must involve a sexual connotation. This may arise from the area of the complainant's body NOA touched, what NOA used to touch NOC or from the circumstances of the act. Beyond the requirement of a sexual connotation, the question of whether or not the circumstances were indecent is for you to decide.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA's act occurred in indecent circumstances because [insert evidence]. [If relevant add: The defence responded [insert evidence]].

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA's act occurred in indecent circumstances.

With/In the Presence of the complainant

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act was intentionally done [with/in the presence of] the complainant.

In this case the prosecution submitted that [insert evidence about the way in which the act was committed with or in the presence of the complainant]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

[If it is alleged that the act was committed in the presence of the complainant, add the following shaded text: For this element to be satisfied, you do not need to find that there was any physical contact between NOA and NOC. This element will be met if the prosecution can prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was present at the place where the alleged act was committed and NOA was aware of that fact.]

Child under the Age of 16

The fifth element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that s/he was under the age of 16 at the time that the alleged indecent act took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was under 16 at the time the alleged indecent act took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[704]

Consent

This charge addresses consent coupled with a belief on reasonable grounds that the child was aged 16 or older (s 47(2)(a)). If the issue is s 47(2)(b) (accused not more than 2 years older than the complainant) or s 47(2)(c) (accused believed on reasonable grounds that s/he was married to the complainant) the charge will need to be adapted accordingly. See Indecent Act with a Child under 16 (1/1/92 – 30/6/17) for guidance.

[704] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

Warning! For offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1 November 2014, it is not clear whether Crimes Act 1958 s 322T affects the relevance of intoxication to this defence. Judges should seek submissions from the parties on this issue where relevant.

Belief that complainant was aged 16 or more

Even if you find that the prosecution has proven all five elements of this offence, NOA will not necessarily be guilty of this offence. This is because, in certain circumstances, consent will be a defence.

The law states that consent is available as a defence if the accused believed on reasonable grounds that the complainant was at least 16 years old at the time of the alleged indecent act.

Unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – this belief is a matter which the accused must prove on the balance of probabilities. That is, the accused must prove that it is more likely than not that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that NOC was aged 16 or over for consent to be available as a defence.

So, by contrast to proof of the elements of the offence(s), where the prosecution must satisfy you beyond reasonable doubt of them, for the defence of reasonable belief to be established to your satisfaction, it is for the accused, not the prosecution to prove the existence of a reasonable belief in age.

And the standard to which the defence must do this is a lesser standard than proof beyond reasonable doubt, it is proof on the balance of probabilities. That is, the accused must satisfy you that it is more likely than not that he believed, on reasonable grounds, that the complainant was 16 or over.

In this case [insert relevant evidence and competing arguments].

[If the prosecution has conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section.]

As it is not in issue in this case that the indecent act was consensual, if the accused satisfied you, on the balance of probabilities that s/he believed, on reasonable grounds, that at the time of the alleged indecent act, that the complainant was 16 or over, then your verdict in respect of that charge will be not guilty. If however, the accused does not satisfy you on the balance of probabilities that at the time he believed the complainant was 16 or over, and that his belief was based on reasonable grounds, then despite the fact that the act was consensual, this defence will fail.

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

Warning: It is an unresolved question whether the prosecution must prove that the accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting. This Charge Book requires proof of awareness of non-consent as a matter of prudence. See 7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent (Pre-1/7/15) for more information.

If, however, you find that the NOA has proven that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that NOC was at least 16 years old at the time of the alleged indecent act, then you will need to determine whether the prosecution have proved two additional elements: first, that NOC did not consent to the alleged indecent act and second, that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

Definition of consent

Dealing with the first of these additional elements, consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So NOC will not have consented to the indecent act if s/he did not freely agree to take part in that act.

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not freely agree to the indecent act. So if consent is relevant to your determination, and the prosecution cannot prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not freely agree to the alleged indecent act, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

The law identifies a number of circumstances where the complainant is deemed not to freely agree, or consent, to an indecent act. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because s/he is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep, unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of freely agreeing;

(e) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(f) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act or the identity of the person;

(g) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting. However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

[If there is evidence that the complainant did not say or do anything to indicate agreement, add the following darker shaded section.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to the alleged indecent act at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

[Where evidence is given about the absence of physical resistance, lack of physical injury or past consensual sex, add the following darker shaded section if relevant to the facts in issue.]

The law also says the complainant is not to be regarded as having freely agreed just because:

- [if relevant] s/he did not protest or physically resist the accused;
- [if relevant] s/he did not sustain physical injury;
- [if relevant] s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act on that occasion with the accused or with any other person, or that s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act with the accused or another person on an earlier occasion.

However, these are relevant factors for you to consider. You must consider the action or lack of action of NOC, together with all the surrounding circumstances, in order to decide whether the prosecution has proven beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not consent.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to the alleged indecent act, you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done at the time of that act, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about [his/her] state of mind at that time. You can also consider what s/he did not say or do at the time of the alleged act.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC did not consent. [Insert relevant evidence and competing arguments.]

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt this first additional element that NOC did not consent, then you must find NOA not guilty.

Awareness of Lack of Consent

Turning now to the second additional element, if consent is available as a defence, the prosecution must also prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of the alleged indecent act the accused was aware either:

- that the complainant was not consenting; or
- that the complainant might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these state(s) of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Belief in Consent

[If evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting, add one of the directions in 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent.]

Onus and standard of proof

Remember, you may not need to consider the issue of consent. The process that you must follow is this. First, you must decide if the prosecution has proven the five elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt. That is, the prosecution must prove that NOA [wilfully committed/was wilfully a party to] an indecent act [with/in the presence of] the complainant, that NOC was under the age of 16 at the relevant time.

Next, if you find that the prosecution has proven each of these elements beyond reasonable doubt, and the accused has raised the issue as to belief in age, you must then decide if NOA has proven, on the balance of probabilities, that s/he believed that NOC was at least 16 years old, and that that belief was based on reasonable grounds. If the accused cannot prove both of these matters, then NOA will be guilty of this offence, as long as the prosecution have proven each of the first five elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt.

If, however, you find that the accused has proven these matters as to belief in age on the balance of probabilities, you must then decide whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, the two additional elements that NOC did not consent, and that NOA was aware that s/he was not or might not be consenting. If the prosecution cannot prove both of these things, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence. It is only if you are satisfied that they have been proven beyond reasonable doubt, together with each of the first five elements of the offence, that you can convict NOA of indecent act with a child under 16.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under 16, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

- One – that NOA [committed [insert relevant act]/was a party to the commission of [insert relevant act]]; and
- Two – that NOA [wilfully committed/was wilfully a party to] the alleged indecent act; and

- Three – that this act occurred in indecent circumstances; and
- Four – that this act was done [with/in the presence of] NOC; and
- Five – that NOC was under the age of 16 when this act took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under 16.

If you decide that each of these elements have been proven beyond reasonable doubt, you must decide if the accused has proven, on the balance of probabilities:

- That NOA believed that NOC was aged 16 or older at the relevant time; and
- That NOA had reasonable grounds for that belief.

If the accused has not proven both of these matters on the balance of probabilities, and you find that all of the elements have been proven by the prosecution beyond reasonable doubt, then NOA will be guilty of the offence. However, if you find that both of these matters have been proven by the accused on the balance of probabilities, you must then decide if the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC did not consent to the indecent act and that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

[If the prosecution conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section.]

Since the prosecution does not dispute the accused's claim that [insert basis of concession about consent, e.g. "NOC was consenting" or "s/he believed that NOC was consenting"], you must, if you reach this point, find NOA not guilty of this offence.

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

If the prosecution cannot prove these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under 16.

Last updated: 30 November 2017

7.3.17.7 Checklist: Indecent Act with a Child under 16 (22/10/14–30/6/17) Consent in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Five elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused [committed/was a party to the commission of] the alleged act; and
2. The accused [wilfully committed/was wilfully a party to] the act; and
3. The act occurred in indecent circumstances; and
4. The accused did the act [with/in the presence of] the complainant; and
5. The complainant was under the age of 16 at the time the act was committed.

Accused's Acts

1. [Did the accused commit/Was the accused a party to the commission of] the alleged act?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

Accused's Mental State

2. [Did the accused wilfully commit/Was the accused wilfully a party to] the act?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

Indecent Circumstances

3. Did the act occur in indecent circumstances?

Consider – sexual connotation

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

Complainant's Involvement

4. Did the act take place [with/in the presence of] the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

Complainant's Age

5. Was the complainant under the age of 16 at the time the act was committed?

If Yes, then go to 6

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

Relevance of Consent

[This section of the checklist can be used if the accused alleged that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that the complainant was 16 or older and consented to the indecent act. If consent is in issue because the accused alleged that s/he is not more than 2 years older than the complainant, or that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that s/he was married to the complainant, it will need to be modified as necessary.]

Consent is only relevant if you are satisfied the defence has proven, on the balance of probabilities, both that:

6. The accused believed that the complainant was aged 16 or older at the time the indecent act took place; and

7. The accused's belief that the complainant was aged 16 or older was based on reasonable grounds.

If Yes to both questions, then go to 8

If No to either question, then the accused is guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16 (as long as you answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5)

Lack of Consent

If consent is relevant, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that:

8. The complainant did not consent to the alleged indecent act; and

9. The accused was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

Consent

8. Did the indecent act occur without the complainant's consent?

If Yes, then go to 9

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16 (as long as you answered yes to questions 7 and 8)

Awareness of Lack of Consent

9. At the time of alleged indecent act, was the accused aware that the complainant was not consenting or that s/he might not be consenting?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16 (as long as you answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 8)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16 (as long as you answered yes to questions 7 and 8)

Last updated: 22 January 2016

7.3.17.8 Charge: Indecent Act with a Child under 16 (1/12/06–21/10/14) Consent in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for offences of indecent act with a child under 16 alleged to have been committed between 1/12/2006 and 21/10/2014 where consent is in issue.

I must now direct you about the crime of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under the age of 16. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 6 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused [committed the alleged act/was a party to the commission of the alleged act].

Two – the accused [wilfully committed the alleged indecent act/was wilfully a party to the alleged indecent act].

Three – the act occurred in indecent circumstances.

Four – the act was done [with/in the presence of] the complainant.

Five – the complainant was under the age of 16 when the act took place.

Six – the accused was not married to the complainant at the time the alleged act took place.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Actions of the accused

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have [committed the act alleged by the prosecution/been a party in any way to the act alleged by the prosecution].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA [insert evidence about the relevant act]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Wilful

The second element relates to the accused person's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that the accused [wilfully committed the alleged indecent act/was wilfully a party to the alleged indecent act]. That is, you must be satisfied that the accused's participation in the act was deliberate not accidental.

Indecent circumstances

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act occurred in indecent circumstances.

Indecent is an ordinary, everyday word, and it is for you to determine whether the circumstances were indecent.

However, the law says that indecent circumstances must involve a sexual connotation. This may arise from the area of the complainant's body NOA touched, what NOA used to touch NOC or from the circumstances of the act. Beyond the requirement of a sexual connotation, the question of whether or not the circumstances were indecent is for you to decide.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA's act occurred in indecent circumstances because [insert evidence]. [If relevant add: The defence responded [insert evidence]].

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA's act occurred in indecent circumstances.

With/In the Presence of the complainant

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act was intentionally done [with/in the presence of] the complainant.

In this case the prosecution submitted that [insert evidence about the way in which the act was committed with or in the presence of the complainant]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

[If it is alleged that the act was committed in the presence of the complainant, add the following shaded text: For this element to be satisfied, you do not need to find that there was any physical contact between NOA and NOC. This element will be met if the prosecution can prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was present at the place where the alleged act was committed and NOA was aware of that fact.]

Child under the Age of 16

The fifth element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that s/he was under the age of 16 at the time that the alleged indecent act took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was under 16 at the time the alleged indecent act took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[705]

Accused not married to the complainant

The sixth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused was not married to the complainant at the time the alleged act took place.

---

[705] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

In this case, the defence has not disputed the prosecution's claim that s/he was not married to NOC at the time that the alleged act took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[706]

Consent

This charge addresses consent coupled with a belief on reasonable grounds that the child was aged 16 or older (s 47(2)(a)). If the issue is s 47(2)(b) (accused not more than 2 years older than the complainant) or s 47(2)(c) (accused believed on reasonable grounds that s/he was married to the complainant) the charge will need to be adapted accordingly. See 7.3.17 Indecent Act with a Child under 16 (1/1/92 – 30/6/17) for guidance.

Belief that complainant was aged 16 or more

Even if you find that the prosecution has proved all six elements of this offence, NOA will not necessarily be guilty of this offence. This is because, in certain circumstances, consent will be a defence.

The law states that consent is available as a defence if the accused believed on reasonable grounds that the complainant was at least 16 years old at the time of the alleged indecent act.

Unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – this belief is a matter which the accused must prove on the balance of probabilities. That is, the accused must prove that it is more likely than not that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that NOC was aged 16 or over for consent to be available as a defence.

So, by contrast to proof of the elements of the offence(s), where the prosecution must satisfy you beyond reasonable doubt of them, for the defence of reasonable belief to be established to your satisfaction, it is for the accused, not the prosecution to prove the existence of a reasonable belief in age.

And the standard to which the defence must do this is a lesser standard than proof beyond reasonable doubt, it is proof on the balance of probabilities. That is, the accused must satisfy you that it is more likely than not that he believed, on reasonable grounds, that the complainant was 16 or over.

In this case [insert relevant evidence and competing arguments].

[If the prosecution has conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section.]

As it is not in issue in this case that the indecent act was consensual, if the accused satisfied you, on the balance of probabilities that s/he believed, on reasonable grounds, that at the time of the alleged indecent act, that the complainant was 16 or over, then your verdict in respect of that charge will be not guilty. If however, the accused does not satisfy you on the balance of probabilities that at the time he believed the complainant was 16 or over, and that his belief was based on reasonable grounds, then despite the fact that the act was consensual, this defence will fail.

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

Warning: It is an unresolved question whether the prosecution must prove that the accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting. This Charge Book requires proof of awareness of non-consent as a matter of prudence. See 7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent (Pre-1/7/15) for more information.

If, however, you find that the NOA has proven that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that NOC was at least 16 years old at the time of the alleged indecent act, then you will need to determine whether the prosecution have proved two additional elements: first, that NOC did not consent to the alleged indecent act and second, that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

[706] If it is alleged that the accused and complainant were married, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

Definition of consent

Dealing with the first of these additional elements, consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So NOC will not have consented to the indecent act if s/he did not freely agree to take part in that act.

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not freely agree to the indecent act. So if consent is relevant to your determination, and the prosecution cannot prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not freely agree to the alleged indecent act, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

The law identifies a number of circumstances where the complainant is deemed not to freely agree, or consent, to an indecent act. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because s/he is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep, unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of freely agreeing;

(e) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(f) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act or the identity of the person;

(g) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting. However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proved.

[If there is evidence that the complainant did not say or do anything to indicate agreement, add the following darker shaded section.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to the alleged indecent act at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

[Where evidence is given about the absence of physical resistance, lack of physical injury or past consensual sex, add the following darker shaded section if relevant to the facts in issue.]

The law also says the complainant is not to be regarded as having freely agreed just because:

- [if relevant] s/he did not protest or physically resist the accused;
- [if relevant] s/he did not sustain physical injury;
- [if relevant] s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act on that occasion with the accused or with any other person, or that s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act with the accused or another person on an earlier occasion.

However, these are relevant factors for you to consider. You must consider the action or lack of action of NOC, together with all the surrounding circumstances, in order to decide whether the prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not consent.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to the alleged indecent act, you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done at the time of that act, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about [his/her] state of mind at that time. You can also consider what s/he did not say or do at the time of the alleged act.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC did not consent. [Insert relevant evidence and competing arguments.]

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt this first additional element that NOC did not consent, then you must find NOA not guilty.

Awareness of Lack of Consent

Turning now to the second additional element, if consent is available as a defence, the prosecution must also prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of the alleged indecent act the accused was aware either:

- that the complainant was not consenting; or
- that the complainant might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these state(s) of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Belief in consent

[If evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting, add one of the directions in Charge: Belief in consent.]

Onus and standard of proof

Remember, you may not need to consider the issue of consent. The process that you must follow is this. First, you must decide if the prosecution has proved the six elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt. That is, the prosecution must prove that NOA [wilfully committed/was wilfully a party to] an indecent act [with/in the presence of] the complainant, that NOC was under the age of 16 at the relevant time and that NOA and NOC were not married at the relevant time.

Next, if you find that the prosecution has proved each of these elements beyond reasonable doubt, and the accused has raised the issue as to belief in age, you must then decide if NOA has proved, on the balance of probabilities, that s/he believed that NOC was at least 16 years old, and that that belief was based on reasonable grounds. If the accused cannot prove both of these matters, then NOA will be guilty of this offence, as long as the prosecution have proved each of the first six elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt.

If, however, you find that the accused has proved these matters as to belief in age on the balance of probabilities, you must then decide whether the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, the two additional elements that NOC did not consent, and that NOA was aware that s/he was not or might not be consenting. If the prosecution cannot prove both of these things, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence. It is only if you are satisfied that they have been proved beyond reasonable doubt, together with each of the first six elements of the offence, that you can convict NOA of indecent act with a child under 16.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under 16, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA [committed [insert relevant act]/was a party to the commission of [insert relevant act]]; and

Two – that NOA [wilfully committed/was wilfully a party to] the alleged indecent act; and

Three – that this act occurred in indecent circumstances; and

Four – that this act was done [with/in the presence of] NOC; and

Five – that NOC was under the age of 16 when this act took place; and

Six – that NOA was not married to NOC at the time that this act took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under 16.

If you decide that each of these elements have been proved beyond reasonable doubt, you must decide if the accused has proved, on the balance of probabilities:

- That NOA believed that NOC was aged 16 or older at the relevant time; and
- That NOA had reasonable grounds for that belief.

If the accused has not proved both of these matters on the balance of probabilities, and you find that all of the elements have been proved by the prosecution beyond reasonable doubt, then NOA will be guilty of the offence. However, if you find that both of these matters have been proved by the accused on the balance of probabilities, you must then decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC did not consent to the indecent act and that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

[If the prosecution conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section.]

Since the prosecution does not dispute the accused's claim that [insert basis of concession about consent, e.g. "NOC was consenting" or "s/he believed that NOC was consenting"], you must, if you reach this point, find NOA not guilty of this offence.

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

If the prosecution cannot prove these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under 16.

Last updated: 27 April 2016

7.3.17.9 Charge: Indecent Act with a Child under 16 (1/1/92–1/12/06) Consent in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for offences of indecent act with a child under 16 alleged to have been committed between 5/8/1991 and 30/11/2006 where consent is in issue.

I must now direct you about the crime of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under the age of 16. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following six elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused [committed the alleged act/was a party to the commission of the alleged act].

Two – the accused [wilfully committed the alleged indecent act/was wilfully a party to the alleged indecent act].

Three – the act occurred in indecent circumstances.

Four – the act was done [with/in the presence of] the complainant.

Five – the complainant was under the age of 16 when the act took place.

Six – the accused was not married to the complainant at the time the alleged act took place.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Actions of the accused

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have [committed the act alleged by the prosecution/been a party in any way to the act alleged by the prosecution].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA [insert evidence about the relevant act]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Wilful

The second element relates to the accused person's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that the accused [wilfully committed the alleged indecent act/was wilfully a party to the alleged indecent act]. That is, you must be satisfied that the accused's participation in the act was deliberate not accidental.

Indecent circumstances

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act occurred in indecent circumstances.

Indecent is an ordinary, everyday word, and it is for you to determine whether the circumstances were indecent.

However, the law says that indecent circumstances must involve a sexual connotation. This may arise from the area of the complainant's body NOA touched, what NOA used to touch NOC or from the circumstances of the act. Beyond the requirement of a sexual connotation, the question of whether or not the circumstances were indecent is for you to decide.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA's act occurred in indecent circumstances because [insert evidence]. [If relevant add: The defence responded [insert evidence]].

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA's act occurred in indecent circumstances.

With/In the Presence of the complainant

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act was intentionally done [with/in the presence of] the complainant.

In this case the prosecution submitted that [insert evidence about the way in which the act was committed with or in the presence of the complainant]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

[If it is alleged that the act was committed in the presence of the complainant, add the following shaded text: For this element to be satisfied, you do not need to find that there was any physical contact between NOA and NOC. This element will be met if the prosecution can prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was present at the place where the alleged act was committed and NOA was aware of that fact.]

Child under the Age of 16

The fifth element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that the s/he was under the age of 16 at the time that the alleged indecent act took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was under 16 at the time the alleged indecent act took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[707]

Accused not married to the complainant

The sixth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused was not married to the complainant at the time the alleged act took place.

In this case, the defence has not disputed the prosecution's claim that s/he was not married to NOC at the time that the alleged act took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[708]

Consent

This charge addresses consent coupled with a belief on reasonable grounds that the child was aged 16 or older (s 47(2)(a)). If the issue is s 47(2)(b) (accused not more than 2 years older than the complainant) or s 47(2)(c) (accused believed on reasonable grounds that s/he was married to the complainant) the charge will need to be adapted accordingly. See 7.3.17 Indecent Act with a Child under 16 (1/1/92 – 30/6/17) for guidance.

Belief that complainant was aged 16 or more

Even if you find that the prosecution has proven all six elements of this offence, NOA will not necessarily be guilty of this offence. This is because, in certain circumstances, consent will be a defence.

The law states that consent is available as a defence if the accused believed on reasonable grounds that the complainant was at least 16 years old at the time of the alleged indecent act.

As a result, the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt either:

(1) That NOA did not believe that NOC was aged 16 or older at the time of the alleged indecent act; or

(2) That NOA did not have reasonable grounds to believe that NOC was aged 16 or older at the time of the alleged indecent act.

For there to be reasonable grounds for a belief, the belief must be based on facts which could have caused a reasonable person to believe the same thing. So to prove this second alternative the prosecution must prove that even if NOA may have believed NOC was 16 or older, a reasonable person in his/her situation could not have reached that conclusion based on the facts known to NOA.

In this case the prosecution alleged [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments]. In response, the defence submitted [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

If the prosecution has proven beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA did not believe on reasonable grounds that NOC was at least 16 years old at the time of the alleged indecent, then consent will not be a defence, and will not be relevant to your determination of the accused's guilt. In this case [insert relevant evidence and competing arguments].

[If the prosecution has conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section.]

---

[707] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

[708] If it is alleged that the accused and complainant were married, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

If, however, you find that this has not been proven, then you will find the accused not guilty. This is because the prosecution does not dispute that [insert basis of concession about consent, e.g. "NOC was consenting" or "NOA believed that NOC was consenting"].

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

Warning: It is an unresolved question whether the prosecution must prove that the accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting. This Charge Book requires proof of awareness of non-consent as a matter of prudence. See 7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent (Pre-1/7/15) for more information.

If, however, you find that this has not been proven, then you will need to determine whether the prosecution have proved two additional elements: first, that NOC did not consent to the alleged indecent act and second, that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

Definition of consent

Dealing with the first of these additional elements, consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So NOC will not have consented to the indecent act if s/he did not freely agree to take part in that act.

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not freely agree to the alleged indecent act. So if consent is relevant to your determination, and the prosecution cannot prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not freely agree to the act, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

The law identifies a number of circumstances where the complainant is deemed not to freely agree, or consent, to an indecent act. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because s/he is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep, unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of freely agreeing;

(e) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(f) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act or the identity of the person;

(g) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting. However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

[If there is evidence that the complainant did not say or do anything to indicate agreement, add the following darker shaded section.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to the alleged indecent act at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

[Where evidence is given about the absence of physical resistance, lack of physical injury or past consensual sex, add the following darker shaded section if relevant to the facts in issue.]

The law also says the complainant is not to be regarded as having freely agreed just because:

- [if relevant] s/he did not protest or physically resist the accused;
- [if relevant] s/he did not sustain physical injury;
- [if relevant] s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act on that occasion with the accused or with any other person, or that s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act with the accused or another person on an earlier occasion.

However, these are relevant factors for you to consider. You must consider the action or lack of action of NOC, together with all the surrounding circumstances, in order to decide whether the prosecution has proven beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not consent.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to take part in the alleged indecent act, you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done at the time of the alleged indecent act, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about [his/her] state of mind at that time. You can also consider what s/he did not say or do at the time of the alleged indecent act.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC did not consent. [Insert relevant evidence and competing arguments.]

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt this first additional element that NOC did not consent, then you must find NOA not guilty.

Awareness of Lack of Consent

Turning now to the second additional element, if consent is available as a defence, the prosecution must also prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of the alleged indecent act the accused was aware either:

- that the complainant was not consenting; or
- that the complainant might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these state(s) of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Belief in consent

[If evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting, add one of the directions in 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent.]

Onus and standard of proof

Remember, you may not need to consider the issue of consent.

You will only need to consider this issue if the prosecution fails to prove:

(1) That NOA did not believe that NOC was aged 16 or older at the time of the alleged indecent act; or

(2) That NOA did not have reasonable grounds to believe that NOC was aged 16 or older at the time of the alleged indecent act.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under 16, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA [committed [insert relevant act]/was a party to the commission of [insert relevant act]]; and

Two – that NOA [wilfully committed/was wilfully a party to] the alleged indecent act; and

Three – that this act occurred in indecent circumstances; and

Four – that this act was done [with/in the presence of] NOC; and

Five – that NOC was under the age of 16 when this act took place; and

Six – that NOA was not married to NOC at the time that this act took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under 16.

If you decide that each of these elements have been proven beyond reasonable doubt, you must decide if the prosecution has also proved, to the same standard:

- That NOA did not believe that NOC was aged 16 or older at the relevant time; or
- That NOA had no reasonable grounds to believe that NOC was aged 16 or older at the relevant time.

If the prosecution has proven one of these matters, and you find that all of the elements have been proved by the prosecution beyond reasonable doubt, then NOA will be guilty of the offence. However, if the prosecution has not proved either of these matters, you must then decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC did not consent to the commission of the indecent act and that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

[If the prosecution conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section.]

Since the prosecution does not dispute the accused's claim that [insert basis of concession about consent, e.g. "NOC was consenting" or "s/he believed that NOC was consenting"], you must, if you reach this point, find NOA not guilty of this offence.

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

If the prosecution cannot prove these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of [committing/being party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child under the age of 16.

Last updated: 27 April 2016

7.3.17.10 Checklist: Indecent Act with a Child under 16 (1/1/92–21/10/14) Consent in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Six elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused [committed/was a party to the commission of] the alleged act; and
2. The accused [wilfully committed/was wilfully a party to] the act; and
3. The act occurred in indecent circumstances; and

4. The accused did the act [with/in the presence of] the complainant; and
5. The complainant was under the age of 16 at the time the act was committed; and
6. The accused was not married to the complainant at the time the act was committed.

Accused's Acts

1. [Did the accused commit/Was the accused a party to the commission of] the alleged act?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

Accused's Mental State

2. [Did the Accused wilfully commit/Was the accused wilfully a party to] the act?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

Indecent Circumstances

3. Did the act occur in indecent circumstances?

Consider – sexual connotation

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

Complainant's Involvement

4. Did the act take place [with/in the presence of] the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

Complainant's Age

5. Was the complainant under the age of 16 at the time the act was committed?

If Yes, then go to 6

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

No Marital Relationship

6. Were the accused and the complainant married to each other at the time that the act took place?

If No, then go to 7

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16

Relevance of Consent

[This section of the checklist can be used if the accused alleged that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that the complainant was 16 or older and consented to the indecent act. If consent is in issue because the accused alleged that s/he is not more than 2 years older than the complainant, or that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that s/he was married to the complainant, it will need to be modified as necessary.]

[Use this section if the offence was allegedly committed on or after 1 December 2006.]

Consent is only relevant if you are satisfied the defence has proven, on the balance of probabilities, both that:

7. The accused believed that the complainant was aged 16 or older at the time the indecent act took place; and

8. The accused's belief that the complainant was aged 16 or older was based on reasonable grounds.

[Use this section if the offence was allegedly committed before 1 December 2006]

Consent is relevant unless you are satisfied the prosecution has proven beyond reasonable doubt that either:

7. The accused did not believe that the complainant was aged 16 or older at the time the indecent act took place; or

8. The accused did not have reasonable grounds to believe that the complainant was aged 16 or older.

Lack of Consent

If consent is relevant, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that:

9. The complainant did not consent to the alleged indecent act; and

10. The accused was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

Consent

9. Did the indecent act occur without the complainant's consent?

If Yes, then go to 10

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16 (as long as you answered yes to questions 7 and 8)

Awareness of Lack of Consent

10. At the time of alleged indecent act, was the accused aware that the complainant was not consenting or that s/he might not be consenting?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16 (as long as you answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 9, and no to question 6)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a child under 16 (as long as you answered yes to questions 7 and 8)

Last updated: 22 January 2016

7.3.18 Sexual Assault of a Child Aged 16 or 17 under Care, Supervision or Authority (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Commencement Information

1. The current s 49E offence came into force on 1 July 2017.
2. Prior to 1 July 2017, Crimes Act 1958 s 49 contained a composite offence of an indecent act "with or in the presence of" a child aged 16 or 17. Following the amendments introduced by the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Act 2016, the offence was split so that section 49E addresses sexual touching and section 49G addresses sexual activity in the presence of the child.
3. For offences committed before 1 July 2017, see 7.3.19 Indecent Act with a 16 or 17 year old Child (1/12/06 – 30/6/17).
4. For offences involving sexual activity in the presence of a child, see 7.3.22 Sexual activity in the presence of a child aged 16 or 17 under care, supervision or authority (From 1/7/17).

Elements

5. The elements of the offence are set out in s 49E(1) of the Crimes Act 1958. The prosecution must prove that:

   i) The accused (A) intentionally:

      - touched another person (B);
      - caused or allowed B to touch A; or
      - caused B to touch or to continue to touch themselves, another person (C) or to be touched, or to continue to be touched, by C;

   ii) B was a child aged 16 or 17 years;

   iii) B was under the accused's care, supervision or authority;

   iv) The touching was sexual;

   v) The touching was contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct.

Intentional touching

6. The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intentionally touched another person, or caused the other person to touch someone. The term "touching" is defined in Crimes Act 1958 s 35B as touching that may be done:

   (a) with any part of the body; or
   (b) with anything else; or
   (c) through anything, including anything worn by the person doing the touching or by the person touched.

7. This element may also be proved where the accused causes another person to touch the complainant (Crimes Act 1958 s 49E(1)).
8. The fault element for this element is basic or general intention. Where relevant, the prosecution must prove that the touching was intentional in the sense that it was deliberate rather than inadvertent or accidental.

9. For more information on this element, see 7.3.5 Sexual Assault (From 1/7/15).

Child aged 16 or 17

10. The second element requires the prosecution to prove that the complainant was aged 16 or 17 at the time the relevant act took place (Crimes Act 1958 s 49E(1)).

Care, supervision or authority

11. The third element the prosecution must prove is that the complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused (Crimes Act 1958 s 49E(1)).
12. For information on when a relationship of care, supervision or authority will exist, see 7.3.14 Sexual Penetration of a 16 or 17 Year Old Child (From 1/7/17).

Sexual Touching

13. The fourth element requires the prosecution to prove that the touching was sexual (Crimes Act 1958 s 49E(1)).
14. Touching can be "sexual" because of:

> (a) the area of the body that is touched or used in the touching, including (but not limited to) the genital or anal region, the buttocks or, in the case of a female or a person who identifies as a female, the breasts; or
> (b) the fact that the person doing the touching seeks or gets sexual arousal or sexual gratification from the touching; or
> (c) any other aspect of the touching, including the circumstances in which it is done (Crimes Act 1958 s 35B(2)).

15. For more information on this element, see 7.3.5 Sexual Assault (From 1/7/15).

Touching contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct

16. The fifth element is that the touching is contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct (Crimes Act 1958 s 49E(1)).
17. Section 49E(3) of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that:

> Whether or not the touching is contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct depends on the circumstances.

18. The Act specifies that the circumstances include the purpose of the touching and whether the accused seeks or gets sexual arousal or gratification from the touching. However, the circumstances do not include whether the complainant consented to the touching or whether the accused believed the complainant consented to the touching (Crimes Act 1958 s 49E(4)).

Statutory defences and exemption

Marriage or domestic partnership

19. Section 49Y of the Crimes Act 1958 provides an exception to the offence in s 49E(1). This exception applies if, at the time of the alleged offence –

(a) A and B are married to each other and the marriage is recognised as valid under the Marriage Act 1961 of the Commonwealth; or

(b) A–

(i) is not more than 5 years older than B; and

(ii) is B's domestic partner and the domestic partnership commenced before B came under A's care, supervision or authority.

Reasonable belief as to age

20. Section 49X of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that it is a defence to an offence against section 49E(1) if, at the time of the conduct, the accused reasonably believed that the child was 18 years of age or more (Crimes Act 1958 s 49X(1))

21. The accused bears the burden of proving, on the balance of probabilities, that he or she reasonably believed that B was 18 years of age or more (Crimes Act 1958 s 49X(4)).

22. The Note to section 49X states that:

> Whether or not A reasonably believed that B … was 18 years of age or more depends on the circumstances. The circumstances include any steps that A took to find out [B's] age.

Reasonable belief as to marriage or domestic partnership

23. Section 49Z of the Crimes Act 1958 provides a defence to the offence in s 49E(1) which applies if, at the time of the alleged offence –

(a) A reasonably believed that A and B are married to each other and that the marriage is recognised as valid under the Marriage Act 1961 of the Commonwealth; or

(b) A–

(i) was not more than 5 years older than B; and

(ii) reasonably believed that A was B's domestic partner and that the domestic partnership commenced before B came under A's care, supervision or authority.

24. The accused bears the burden of proving, on the balance of probabilities, the reasonable belief referred to in the section (Crimes Act 1958 s 49Z(3)).

25. The Note to the section specifies that the accused has an evidential burden in relation to the relative ages of the accused and the complainant.

Reasonable belief as to care, supervision or authority

26. Section 49ZA provides a defence to a charge under s 49E(1) that applies if, at the time of the conduct constituting the offence, the accused reasonably believed that the complainant was not under his or her care, supervision or authority.

27. The accused bears the burden of proving, on the balance of probabilities, that he or she held this reasonable belief (Crimes Act 1958 s 49ZA(3)).

28. This is a new defence, as the law did not previously require the prosecution to prove that A knew or believed that B was under his or her care, supervision or authority. Instead, the law required the prosecution to show only that A was aware of the primary facts which gave rise to the relevant relationship (compare Lydgate v R (2014) 46 VR 78, [113] (Beach JA)).

Honest and reasonable mistake not a defence in some circumstances

29. Section 49ZC(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that an honest and reasonable mistaken belief that the touching was not sexual or was not contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct is not a defence.

30. The combined effect of sections 49E(4) and 49ZC(2) is that while the accused's beliefs can make a touching sexual or contrary to community standards, the accused's beliefs cannot operate to excuse otherwise prohibited conduct.

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.18.1 Charge: Sexual Assault of a Child Aged 16 or 17 under Care, Supervision or Authority (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of sexual assault of a child aged 16 or 17. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused intentionally touched another person, NOC.[709]

Two – NOC was aged 16 or 17 years.

Three – NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority.

Four – The touching was sexual.

Five – The touching was contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail

Actions of the accused

Warning! This charge is designed for cases where the prosecution relies on s 49E(1)(a)(i). This direction on the first element must be modified if the prosecution relies on other limbs of s 49E(1)(a).

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOA intentionally touched NOC.

[If the evidence or arguments have placed the intentional or voluntary nature of the acts in issue, add the following shaded section.[710]]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant act of touching] must have been done intentionally.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the [709] This statement of the element must be modified if the prosecution relies on the other limbs of s 49E(1)(a). The words "touched another person, NOC" may be replaced with "caused or allowed the complainant to touch the accused" or "caused the complainant to touch himself/herself" or "caused the complainant to touch another person" or "caused the complainant to be touched by another person".

[710] Because of how the offence is defined, the issue of intention is likely inseparable from the question of voluntariness. Where the issue is raised, the judge should direct the jury on the specific matters the jury must consider to find that the accused's conduct was voluntary and intentional (e.g. disproof of accident or proof that the accused was conscious).

finding that proves intention in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA touched the outside of NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the touching"].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA [insert evidence about the relevant act]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Child under aged 16 or 17

The second element relates to the age of the complainant, NOC. The prosecution must prove that s/he was aged of 16 or 17 when the alleged touching occurred.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was aged 16 or 17 at that time. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[711]

Care, supervision or authority

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that, at the time that the sexual touching took place, the complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

[If care, supervision or authority is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it was conceded by the defence that NOA was NOC's [describe relationship] and that the complainant was therefore under the care, supervision or authority of the accused [at the relevant time]. While it is for you to determine whether this was the case, you should have no difficulty finding that this element has been proven.

[If care, supervision or authority is in issue and the prosecution relies on a prescribed relationship, add the following shaded section.]

Parliament has defined a number of relationships where a child is deemed to be under the care, supervision and authority of another person. This includes [name relevant relationships from s 37 list].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA was NOC's [describe relationship]. [Insert prosecution evidence]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

If you find beyond reasonable doubt that NOA was NOC's [identify relationship] at the time of the alleged offence(s), then you will find this element has been proven.

[If care, supervision or authority is in issue and the prosecution does not rely on a standing relationship, add the following shaded section.]

The words "care, supervision or authority" all describe different types of relationships where the accused is in a position to exploit or take advantage of that relationship to influence the child to engage in an act of sexual touching. You should take this into account when deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the complainant was under the accused's care, supervision or authority.

The relationship of care, supervision or authority does not have to be a formal one. There does not, for example, have to have been a formal agreement that the accused would take care of the complainant. An informal relationship of care, supervision or authority is sufficient.

[If relevant, add: You do not need to find that the alleged act of touching was actually connected with, or influenced by, the relationship of care, supervision or authority or that NOA was actually exploiting his/her position of advantage. It is sufficient if you are satisfied that an established relationship of care, supervision or authority existed between NOA and NOC that could have been connected with, or influenced the child to engage in, the act of sexual touching, and that the relationship existed on the day on which the touching took place.]

---

[711] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOC was under NOA's [care/supervision/authority]. [Insert prosecution evidence]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority at the time that the sexual touching took place.

[If the accused may be unaware of the facts giving rise to a relationship of care, supervision or authority, add the following shaded section.]

The law states that NOA must know and be aware of the facts that give rise to a relationship of care, supervision or authority. For example, if a teacher with a large number of students did not recognise the complainant was a member of one of his/her classes, then you could not find this element proved.

[Insert relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

[If the accused raises the defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 49ZA of a reasonable belief as to no care, supervision or authority, add the following shaded section.]

This element requires you to look at the facts and decide whether NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority. The prosecution does not need to prove that NOA thought NOC was under his/her care, supervision or authority.

However, the law provides that NOA has a defence to this charge if s/he can show that s/he reasonably believed that NOC was not under his/her care, supervision or authority.

Unlike the elements of the offence, this is a matter which the accused must prove. It is an exception to the general rule that the prosecution must prove all matters. However, the accused only need to prove that s/he reasonably believed that NOC was not under his/her care, supervision or authority on the balance of probabilities. In other words, s/he must show that it is more likely than not that s/he believed that NOC was not under his/her care, supervision or authority and that this belief was reasonable. Unlike the prosecution, s/he does not need to prove this matter beyond reasonable doubt.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Sexual touching

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act of touching was sexual.

The law says that touching can be sexual because of the area of the body involved, of either the person being touched or the person doing the touching, such as the genital or anal area, or the buttocks or breasts.

Or the touching can be sexual because the person doing the touching wants to get or gets sexual gratification from the touching.

Finally, any other aspect of the touching, including the circumstances in which it happened, can also make the touching sexual.

The question of whether or not the touching was sexual is for you to decide.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that the touching was sexual because [insert evidence and arguments]. [If relevant add: The defence responded [insert evidence and arguments]].

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA's touching of NOC was sexual.

Contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged touching was contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct.

The law says that whether touching is contrary to community standards depends on the circumstances, and that this includes the purpose of the touching and whether NOA seeks or gets sexual arousal or sexual gratification from the touching.

The law also says that whether NOC consented to the touching and whether NOA believed that NOC consented to the touching are not relevant to whether the touching was contrary to community standards.

[Refer to relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Defences

Reasonable belief as to age

[If the accused relies on the belief in age defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 49X, add the following shaded section.]

For this offence, the law recognises a defence which may be termed "reasonable belief in age".

This defence is available if the accused had a reasonable belief that at the time of the act, the complainant was 18 years of age or more.

Unlike the elements of the offence, this is a matter which the accused must prove. It is an exception to the general rule that the prosecution must prove all matters. However, the accused only need to prove that s/he reasonably believed that NOC was aged 18 or more on the balance of probabilities. In other words, s/he must show that it is more likely than not that s/he believed that NOC was aged 18 or more and that this belief was reasonable. Unlike the prosecution, s/he does not need to prove this matter beyond reasonable doubt.

Marriage or domestic partnership

[If the accused relies on the domestic partnership defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 49Y, add the following shaded section.]

For this offence, the law recognises a defence which may be termed "domestic partnership".

There are three parts to the defence.

First, NOA must be no more than 5 years older than NOC. This applies here.

Second, NOA must be NOC's domestic partner. The law recognises that two people are in a domestic partnership if they are not married but are living as a couple on a genuine domestic basis.[712]

To decide whether two people are domestic partners, you must consider all the circumstances of the relationship, including [add the following factors from Relationships Act 2008 s 35(2), as relevant:

(a) the degree of mutual commitment to a shared life;

[712] If there is evidence of a registered domestic relationship, this part of the direction must be modified accordingly.

(b) the duration of the relationship;

(c) the nature and extent of common residence;

(d) whether or not a sexual relationship exists;

(e) the degree of financial dependence or interdependence, and any arrangements for financial support, between the parties;

(f) the ownership, use and acquisition of property;

(g) the care and support of children;

(h) the reputation and public aspects of the relationship.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Third, the domestic partnership must have started before NOC came under NOA's care, supervision or authority.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Remember, while I called this a defence, it is the prosecution's role to prove guilt. This means that the prosecution must show that this defence of domestic partnership does not apply. In other words, you cannot find NOA guilty unless the prosecution can prove beyond reasonable doubt either that NOA was not NOC's domestic partner, or that the domestic partnership started after NOC came under NOA's care, supervision or authority.

Reasonable belief as to marriage or domestic partnership

[If the accused relies on the reasonable belief in domestic partnership defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 49Z, add the following shaded section.]

For this offence, the law recognises a defence which may be termed "reasonable belief in domestic partnership".[713]

There are three parts to this defence.

First, NOA must be no more than 5 years older than NOC. This applies here.

Second, NOA must have reasonably believed that s/he was in a domestic partnership with NOC.

The law recognises that two people are in a domestic partnership if they are not married but are living as a couple on a genuine domestic basis.[714]

---

[713] Section 49Z also creates a reasonable belief in marriage defence. If the accused relies on this defence the directions must be modified accordingly.

[714] Section 35 defines a domestic partner also as a person who is in a registered domestic relationship with the person. If the accused relies on this limb of the definition the directions must be modified accordingly.

To decide whether two people are domestic partners, you must consider all the circumstances of the relationship, including [add the following factors from Relationships Act 2008 s 35(2), as relevant:

(a) the degree of mutual commitment to a shared life;

(b) the duration of the relationship;

(c) the nature and extent of common residence;

(d) whether or not a sexual relationship exists;

(e) the degree of financial dependence or interdependence, and any arrangements for financial support, between the parties;

(f) the ownership, use and acquisition of property;

(g) the care and support of children;

(h) the reputation and public aspects of the relationship.

Third, NOA must have reasonably believed that this domestic partnership started before NOC came under his/her care, supervision or authority.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Unlike the elements of the offence, the accused must prove these matters. It is an exception to the general rule that the prosecution must prove all matters. However, the accused only need to prove that s/he reasonably believed that s/he was in a domestic partnership with NOC which started before NOC came under his/her care, supervision or authority on the balance of probabilities. In other words, s/he must show that it is more likely than not that s/he believed that s/he was in a domestic partnership with NOC which started before NOC came under his/her care, supervision or authority, and that this belief was reasonable. Unlike the prosecution, s/he does not need to prove this matter beyond reasonable doubt.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of sexual assault of a child aged 16 or 17, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

- One – that NOA intentionally touched NOC; and
- Two – NOC was aged 16 or 17 years; and
- Three – NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority; and
- Four – that the touching was sexual; and
- Five – that the touching was contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual assault of a child aged 16 or 17.

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.18.2 Checklist: Sexual Assault of a Child Aged 16 or 17 under Care, Supervision or Authority (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally touched the complainant; and

2. The complainant was under the age of 16; and

3. The complainant was under the accused's care, supervision or authority; and

4. The touching was sexual; and

5. The touching was contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct.

Intentional touching

1. Did the accused intentionally touch NOC?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Assault of a child aged 16 or 17 under care, supervision or authority

Complainant under the age of 16

2. At the time of the act, was NOC under the age of 16?

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Assault of a child aged 16 or 17 under care, supervision or authority

Care, supervision or authority

3. At the time of the act, was NOC under NOA's care, supervision or authority?

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Assault of a child aged 16 or 17 under care, supervision or authority

Sexual touching

4. Was the touching sexual?

Consider – Touching may be sexual because of the area of body touched, the fact that the person doing it seeks or gets sexual arousal or gratification from the touching, or any other reason.

If Yes then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Assault of a child aged 16 or 17 under care, supervision or authority

Contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct

5. Was the touching contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct?

Consider – Relevant matters include the circumstances of the touching and whether the accused was seeking or got sexual arousal or gratification

Consider – Whether NOC consented to the touching or whether NOA believed NOC consented to the touching is not relevant to this element

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Sexual Assault of a child aged 16 or 17 under care, supervision or authority (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Assault of a child aged 16 or 17 under care, supervision or authority

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.19 Indecent Act with a 16- or 17-Year-Old Child (1/12/06–30/6/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Commencement Information

1. For offences alleged to have been committed before 1 July 2017, s 49 contained the offence of indecent act with a child aged 16 or 17.
2. This offence came into operation on 1 December 2006, replacing the former offence of indecent act with a child aged 16.
3. The offence applies to any acts committed on or after 1 December 2006 and before 1 July 2017.

Elements and defences

4. The offence of committing an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child is the same as that of committing an indecent act with a child under the age of 16 (s 47), with four exceptions:
   i) The child must be 16 or 17 years of age;
   ii) The child must be under the care, supervision or authority of the accused;
   iii) Consent is a defence if the accused believed on reasonable grounds that the child was aged 18 or older; and
   iv) An age gap of 2 years or less does not permit a defence of consent.
5. The elements and defence of the s 49 offence mirror components of the offences contrary to ss 47 and 48 of the Crimes Act 1958.
6. Guidance in the interpretation of the s 49 terms "indecent act", "wilfully" and "with or in the presence of" can thus be taken from the case law in relation to s 47. See 7.3.17 Indecent Act with a Child Under the Age of 16 (1/1/92 – 30/6/17 for a summary of the relevant law in this area.
7. Similarly, the consideration of the terms "care, supervision or authority" in the s 48 cases will offer guidance for their interpretation in the s 49 context. See 7.3.15 Sexual Penetration of a 16 or 17 Year Old Child (1/1/92 – 30/6/17) for a summary of the law in this area.
8. The definition and mandatory directions in respect of consent and the accused's awareness of non-consent in ss 36, 37, 37AA and 37AAA of the Crimes Act 1958 apply to this offence. See 7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent (Pre-1/7/15) for more information in relation to these matters. See 7.3.17 Indecent Act with a Child Under the Age of 16 (1/1/92 – 30/6/17) for a discussion of the procedure to be used if consent is in issue.

Last updated: 30 November 2017

7.3.19.1 Charge: Indecent Act with a 16- or 17-Year-Old Child (1/12/06 – 30/6/17) Consent Not in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for trials commenced after 1/1/08 involving offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1/12/06 where consent is not in issue. If consent is in issue, use 7.3.19.3 Charge: Indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child (1/12/06 – 30/6/17) – Consent in issue instead.

I must now direct you about the crime of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child.

The law says that the age of consent for sexual acts is normally 16. However, for persons aged 16 or 17, the law has created this specific offence to protect young people from exploitation by persons in positions of care, supervision or authority.

To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 7 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused [committed the alleged act/was a party to the commission of the alleged act].

Two – the accused [wilfully committed the alleged indecent act/was wilfully a party to the alleged indecent act].

Three – the act occurred in indecent circumstances.

Four – the act was intentionally done [with/in the presence of] the complainant.

Five – at the time the alleged act took place, the complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

Six – the complainant was 16 or 17 years old when the act took place.

Seven – the accused was not married to the complainant at the time the alleged act took place.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Actions of the accused

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have [committed the act alleged by the prosecution/been a party in any way to the act alleged by the prosecution].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA [insert evidence about the relevant act]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Wilful

The second element relates to the accused person's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that the accused [wilfully committed the alleged indecent act/was wilfully a party to the alleged indecent act]. That is, you must be satisfied that the accused's participation in the act was deliberate not accidental.

Indecent circumstances

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act occurred in indecent circumstances.

Indecent is an ordinary, everyday word, and it is for you to determine whether the circumstances were indecent.

However, the law says that indecent circumstances must involve a sexual connotation. This may arise from the area of the complainant's body NOA touched, what NOA used to touch NOC or from the circumstances of the act. Beyond the requirement of a sexual connotation, the question of whether or not the circumstances were indecent is for you to decide.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA's act occurred in indecent circumstances because [insert evidence]. [If relevant add: The defence responded [insert evidence]].

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA's act occurred in indecent circumstances.

With/In the presence of the complainant

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act was intentionally done [with/in the presence of] the complainant.

In this case the prosecution submitted that [insert evidence about the way in which the act was committed with or in the presence of the complainant]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

[If it is alleged that the act was committed in the presence of the complainant, add the shaded text.]

For this element to be satisfied, you do not need to find that there was any physical contact between NOA and NOC. This element will be met if the prosecution can prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was present at the place where the alleged act was committed, and NOA was aware of that fact.

Care, Supervision and Authority

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that, at the time that the alleged indecent act took place, the complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

[If care, supervision or authority is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it was conceded by the defence that NOA was NOC's [describe relationship] and that the complainant was thus under the care, supervision or authority of the accused [at the relevant time]. While it is for you to determine whether this was the case, you should have no difficulty finding that this element has been proved.

[If care, supervision or authority is in issue and s 49(4) applies, add the direction from the following shaded section.][715]

Parliament has defined a number of relationships where a child is deemed to be under the care, supervision and authority of another person. This includes [name relevant relationships from s 49(4) list].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA was NOC's [describe relationship]. [Insert prosecution evidence.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

If you find beyond reasonable doubt that NOA was NOC's [identify relationship] at the time of the alleged offence(s), then you will find this element has been proved.

[If care, supervision or authority is in issue and s 49(4) does not apply, add the shaded section.]

The words "care, supervision or authority" all describe different types of relationships where the accused is in a position to exploit or take advantage of that relationship to influence the child to take [715] Note: If the prosecution relies on s 49(4) and the phrase 'care, supervision or authority' as alternatives, this charge will need to be modified.

part in act in indecent circumstances.[716] You should take this into account when deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the complainant was under the accused's care, supervision or authority.

The relationship of care, supervision or authority does not have to be a formal one. There does not, for example, have to have been a formal agreement that the accused would take care of the complainant. An informal relationship of care, supervision or authority is sufficient.

[If relevant, add: You do not need to find that the alleged act was actually connected with, or influenced by, the relationship of care, supervision or authority or that NOA was actually exploiting his/her position of advantage. It is sufficient if you are satisfied that an established relationship of care, supervision or authority existed between NOA and NOC that could have been connected with, or influenced the child to engage in, the alleged act, and that the relationship existed on the day on which the act took place.]

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOC was under NOA's [care/supervision/authority]. [Insert prosecution evidence.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority at the time that the alleged act took place.

[If the accused may be unaware of the facts giving rise to a relationship of care, supervision or authority, add the following shaded section.]

The law states that NOA must know and be aware of the facts that give rise to a relationship of care, supervision or authority. For example, if a teacher with a large number of students did not recognise the complainant was a member of one of his/her classes, then you could not find this element proved.

[Insert relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

16 or 17 year old child

The sixth element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that the s/he was 16 or 17 years old at the time that the alleged indecent act took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was [16/17/16 or 17] at the time the alleged indecent act took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[717]

Accused not married to the complainant

The seventh element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused was not married to the complainant at the time the alleged indecent act took place.

---

[716] This charge is designed for cases where the accused committed an indecent act with the complainant. In cases where the act is committed in the presence of the complainant, the charge will need to be modified.

[717] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

In this case, the defence has not disputed the prosecution's claim that s/he was not married to NOC at the time that the alleged act took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[718]

Consent is not a defence

[This charge is designed for use in cases where consent is not in issue. Use one of the charges listed at the beginning of this document if consent or a precondition for consideration of consent (belief in age or marriage to complainant) is contested.]

To protect children, Parliament has created a number of offences where consent is not relevant. This is one of those offences, so you do not need to consider the issue of whether or not NOC agreed to take part in the alleged indecent act.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA [committed [insert relevant act]/was a party to the commission of [insert relevant act]]; and

Two – that NOA [wilfully committed/was wilfully a party to] the alleged indecent act; and

Three – that this act occurred in indecent circumstances; and

Four – that this act was done [with/in the presence of] NOC; and

Five – that NOC was under the care, supervision or authority of NOA at the time that this act took place; and

Six – that NOC was 16 or 17 years old when this act took place; and

Seven – that NOA was not married to NOC at the time that this act took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child.

Last updated: 27 April 2016

7.3.19.2 Checklist: Indecent Act with a 16- or 17-Year-Old Child (1/12/06–30/6/17) Consent Not in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist may be used for offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1 December 2006.

For offences alleged to have been committed prior to 1 December 2006, see: 7.3.20.2 Checklist: Indecent Act With a 16 Year Old Child (5/8/91–30/11/6) – Consent not in Issue.

Seven elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused [committed/was a party to the commission of] the alleged act; and
2. The accused [wilfully committed/was wilfully a party to] the act; and [718] If it is alleged that the accused and complainant were married, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

3. The act occurred in indecent circumstances; and
4. The accused did the act [with/in the presence of] the complainant; and
5. The complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused at the time the act was committed; and
6. The complainant was 16 or 17 years old at the time the act was committed; and
7. The accused was not married to the complainant at the time the act was committed.

Accused's Acts

1. [Did the accused commit/Was the accused a party to the commission of] the alleged act?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child

Accused's Mental State

2. [Did the accused wilfully commit/Was the accused wilfully a party to] the act?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child

Indecent Circumstances

3. Did the act occur in indecent circumstances?

Consider – sexual connotation

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child

Complainant's Involvement

4. Did the act take place [with/in the presence of] the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child

Care, Supervision or Authority

5. Was the complainant under the care, supervision or authority of the accused at the time that the act took place?

If Yes, then go to 6

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child

Complainant's Age

6. Was the complainant 16 or 17 years old at the time the act was committed?

If Yes, then go to 7

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child

No Marital Relationship

7. Were the accused and the complainant married to each other at the time that the act took place?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5, and no to question 6)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child

Last updated: 1 March 2007

7.3.19.3 Charge: Indecent Act with a 16- or 17-Year-Old Child (1/12/06–30/6/17) Consent in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for trials commenced after 1/1/08 involving offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1/12/06 where consent is in issue. If consent is not in issue, use 7.3.19.1 Charge: Indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child (1/12/06–30/6/17) – Consent Not in issue instead.

I must now direct you about the crime of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child.

The law says that the age of consent for sexual acts is normally 16. However, for persons aged 16 or 17, the law has created this specific offence to protect young people from exploitation by persons in positions of care, supervision or authority.

To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 7 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused [committed the alleged act/was a party to the commission of the alleged act].

Two – the accused [wilfully committed the alleged indecent act/was wilfully a party to the alleged indecent act].

Three – the act occurred in indecent circumstances.

Four – the act was intentionally done [with/in the presence of] the complainant.

Five – at the time the alleged act took place, the complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

Six – the complainant was 16 or 17 years old when the act took place.

Seven – the accused was not married to the complainant at the time the alleged act took place.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Actions of the accused

The first element relates to what the accused did. S/he must have [committed the act alleged by the prosecution/been a party in any way to the act alleged by the prosecution].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA [insert evidence about the relevant act]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Wilful

The second element relates to the accused person's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that the accused [wilfully committed the alleged indecent act/was wilfully a party to the alleged indecent act]. That is, you must be satisfied that the accused's participation in the act was deliberate not accidental.

Indecent circumstances

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act occurred in indecent circumstances.

Indecent is an ordinary, everyday word, and it is for you to determine whether the circumstances were indecent.

However, the law says that indecent circumstances must involve a sexual connotation. This may arise from the area of the complainant's body NOA touched, what NOA used to touch NOC or from the circumstances of the act. Beyond the requirement of a sexual connotation, the question of whether or not the circumstances were indecent is for you to decide.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA's act occurred in indecent circumstances because [insert evidence]. [If relevant add: The defence responded [insert evidence]].

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA's act occurred in indecent circumstances.

With/In the presence of the complainant

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act was intentionally done [with/in the presence of] the complainant.

In this case the prosecution submitted that [insert evidence about the way in which the act was committed with or in the presence of the complainant]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

[If it is alleged that the act was committed in the presence of the complainant, add the following shaded text.]

For this element to be satisfied, you do not need to find that there was any physical contact between NOA and NOC. This element will be met if the prosecution can prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was present at the place where the alleged act was committed, and NOA was aware of that fact.

Care, Supervision and Authority

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that, at the time that the alleged indecent act took place, the complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

[If care, supervision or authority is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it was conceded by the defence that NOA was NOC's [describe relationship] and that the complainant was thus under the care, supervision or authority of the accused [at the relevant time]. While it is for you to determine whether this was the case, you should have no difficulty finding that this element has been proved.

[If care, supervision or authority is in issue and s 49(4) applies, add the direction from the following shaded section.]

[Note: If the prosecution relies on s 49(4) and the common law as alternatives, this charge will need to be modified.]

Parliament has defined a number of relationships where a child is deemed to be under the care, supervision and authority of another person. This includes [name relevant relationships from s 49(4) list].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA was NOC's [describe relationship]. [Insert prosecution evidence]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

If you find beyond reasonable doubt that NOA was NOC's [identify relationship] at the time of the alleged offence(s), then you will find this element has been proved.

[If care, supervision or authority is in issue and s 49(4) does not apply, add the shaded section.]

The words "care, supervision or authority" all describe different types of relationships where the accused is in a position to exploit or take advantage of that relationship to influence the child to take part in act in indecent circumstances.[719] You should take this into account when deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the complainant was under the accused's care, supervision or authority.

The relationship of care, supervision or authority does not have to be a formal one. There does not, for example, have to have been a formal agreement that the accused would take care of the complainant. An informal relationship of care, supervision or authority is sufficient.

[If relevant, add: You do not need to find that the alleged act was actually connected with, or influenced by, the relationship of care, supervision or authority or that NOA was actually exploiting his/her position of advantage. It is sufficient if you are satisfied that an established relationship of care, supervision or authority existed between NOA and NOC that could have been connected with, or influenced the child to engage in, the alleged act, and that the relationship existed on the day on which the act took place.]

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOC was under NOA's [care/supervision/authority]. [Insert prosecution evidence]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority at the time that the alleged act took place.

[If the accused may be unaware of the facts giving rise to a relationship of care, supervision or authority, add the following shaded section.]

The law states that NOA must know and be aware of the facts that give rise to a relationship of care, supervision or authority. For example, if a teacher with a large number of students did not recognise the complainant was a member of one of his/her classes, then you could not find this element proved.

[Insert relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

---

[719] This charge is designed for cases where the accused committed an indecent act with the complainant. In cases where the act is committed in the presence of the complainant, the charge will need to be modified.

16 or 17 year old child

The sixth element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that s/he was 16 or 17 years old at the time that the alleged indecent act took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was [16 or 17] at the time the alleged indecent act took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[720]

Accused not married to the complainant

The seventh element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused was not married to the complainant at the time the alleged indecent act took place.

In this case, the defence has not disputed the prosecution's claim that s/he was not married to NOC at the time that the alleged act took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[721]

Consent

This charge addresses consent coupled with a belief on reasonable grounds that the child was aged 18 or older (s 49(2)(a)). If the issue is s 49(2)(b) (accused believed on reasonable grounds that s/he was married to the complainant) the charge will need to be adapted accordingly. See 7.3.19 Indecent Act with a 16 or 17 year old Child (1/12/06 – 30/6/17) for guidance.

Warning! For offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1 November 2014, it is not clear whether Crimes Act 1958 s 322T affects the relevance of intoxication to this defence. Judges should seek submissions from the parties on this issue where relevant.

Belief that complainant was aged 18 or more

Even if you find that the prosecution has proved all seven elements of this offence, NOA will not necessarily be guilty of this offence. This is because, in certain circumstances, consent will be a defence.

The law states that consent is available as a defence if the accused believed on reasonable grounds that the complainant was at least 18 years old at the time of the alleged indecent act.

Unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – this belief is a matter which the accused must prove on the balance of probabilities. That is, the accused must prove that it is more likely than not that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that NOC was aged 18 or over for consent to be available as a defence.

So, by contrast to proof of the elements of the offence(s), where the prosecution must satisfy you beyond reasonable doubt of them, for the defence of reasonable belief to be established to your satisfaction, it is for the accused, not the prosecution to prove the existence of a reasonable belief in age.

And the standard to which the defence must do this is a lesser standard than proof beyond reasonable doubt, it is proof on the balance of probabilities. That is, the accused must satisfy you that it is more likely than not that he believed, on reasonable grounds, that the complainant was 18 or over.

In this case [insert relevant evidence and competing arguments].

---

[720] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

[721] If it is alleged that the accused and complainant were married, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

[If the prosecution has conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section].

As it is not in issue in this case that the indecent act was consensual, if the accused satisfied you, on the balance of probabilities that s/he believed, on reasonable grounds, that at the time of the alleged indecent act, that the complainant was 18 or over, then your verdict in respect of that charge will be not guilty. If however, the accused does not satisfy you on the balance of probabilities that at the time he believed the complainant was 18 or over, and that his belief was based on reasonable grounds, then despite the fact that the act was consensual, this defence will fail.

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

Warning: It is an unresolved question whether the prosecution must prove that the accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting. This Charge Book requires proof of awareness of non-consent as a matter of prudence. See 7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent (Pre-1/7/15) for more information.

If, however, you find that the NOA has proved that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that NOC was at least 18 years old at the time of the alleged indecent act, then you will need to determine whether the prosecution have proved two additional elements: first, that NOC did not consent to the alleged indecent act and second, that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

Definition of consent

Dealing with the first of these additional elements, consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So NOC will not have consented to the indecent act if s/he did not freely agree to take part in that act.

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not freely agree to the indecent act. So if consent is relevant to your determination, and the prosecution cannot prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not freely agree to the alleged indecent act, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

The law identifies a number of circumstances where the complainant is deemed not to freely agree, or consent, to an indecent act. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because s/he is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep, unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of freely agreeing;

(e) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(f) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act or the identity of the person;

(g) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting. However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proved.

[If there is evidence that the complainant did not say or do anything to indicate agreement, add the following shaded section.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to the alleged indecent act at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

[Where evidence is given about the lack of resistance or injury or about past consensual sex, add the following section.]

The law also says the complainant is not to be regarded as having freely agreed just because:

- [if relevant] s/he did not protest or physically resist the accused;
- [if relevant] s/he did not sustain physical injury*;*
- [if relevant] s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act on that occasion with the accused or with any other person, or that s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act with the accused or another person on an earlier occasion.

However, these are relevant factors for you to consider. You must consider the action or lack of action of NOC, together with all the surrounding circumstances, in order to decide whether the prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not consent.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to the alleged indecent act you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done at the time of that act, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about [his/her] state of mind at that time. You can also consider what s/he did not say or do at the time of the alleged act.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC did not consent. [Insert relevant evidence and competing arguments.]

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt this first additional element that NOC did not consent, then you must find NOA not guilty.

Awareness of Lack of Consent

Turning now to the second additional element, if consent is available as a defence, the prosecution must also prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of the alleged indecent act the accused was aware either:

- that the complainant was not consenting; or
- that the complainant might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these state(s) of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Belief in consent

[If evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting, add one of the directions in 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent.]

Onus and standard of proof

Remember, you may not need to consider the issue of consent. The process that you must follow is this. First, you must decide if the prosecution has proved the seven elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt. That is, the prosecution must prove that the accused [committed/was party to the commission] of an act in indecent circumstances with the complainant, that the act was intentionally done [with/in the presence of] the complainant, that NOC was aged 16 or 17 years old at the time, that NOA [committed the act wilfully/was wilfully a party to the act], that NOA was not married to NOC and that NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority. If the prosecution cannot prove all seven of these elements, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Next, if you find that the prosecution has proved each of these elements beyond reasonable doubt, and the accused has raised the issue as to belief in age, you must then decide if NOA has proved, on the balance of probabilities, that s/he believed that NOC was at least 18 years old, and that that belief was based on reasonable grounds. If the accused cannot prove both of these matters, then NOA will be guilty of this offence, as long as the prosecution have proved each of the first seven elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt.

If, however, you find that the accused has proved these matters as to belief in age on the balance of probabilities, you must then decide whether the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, the two additional elements that NOC did not consent, and that NOA was aware that s/he was not or might not be consenting. If the prosecution cannot prove both of these things, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence. It is only if you are satisfied that they have been proved beyond reasonable doubt, together with each of the first seven elements of the offence, that you can convict NOA of [committing/being party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child aged 16 or 17.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA [committed [insert relevant act]/was a party to the commission of [insert relevant act]]; and

Two – that NOA [wilfully committed/was wilfully a party to] the alleged indecent act; and

Three – that this act occurred in indecent circumstances; and

Four – that this act was done [with/in the presence of] NOC; and

Five – That NOC was under the care, supervision or authority of NOA at the time that this act took place; and

Six – that NOC was 16 or 17 years old when this act took place; and

Seven – that NOA was not married to NOC at the time that this act took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child.

If you decide that each of these elements have been proved beyond reasonable doubt, you must decide if the accused has proved, on the balance of probabilities:

- That NOA believed that NOC was aged 18 or older at the relevant time; and
- That NOA had reasonable grounds for that belief.

If the accused has not proved both of these matters on the balance of probabilities, and you find that all of the elements have been proved by the prosecution beyond reasonable doubt, then NOA will be guilty of the offence. However, if you find that both of these matters have been proved by the accused on the balance of probabilities, you must then decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC did not consent to the indecent act and that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

[If the prosecution conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section.]

Since the prosecution does not dispute the accused's claim that [insert basis of concession about consent, e.g. "NOC was consenting" or "s/he believed that NOC was consenting"], you must, if you reach this point, find NOA not guilty of this offence.

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

If the prosecution cannot prove these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child.

Last updated: 30 November 2017

7.3.19.4 Checklist: Indecent Act with a 16- or 17-Year-Old Child (1/12/06–30/6/17) Consent in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist may be used for offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1 December 2006.

For offences alleged to have been committed prior to 1 December 2006, see: 7.3.20.4 Checklist: Indecent Act With a 16 Year Old Child (5/8/91–30/11/06 – Consent in Issue.

Seven elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused [committed/was a party to the commission of] the alleged act; and
2. The accused [wilfully committed/was wilfully a party to] the act; and
3. The act occurred in indecent circumstances; and
4. The accused did the act [with/in the presence of] the complainant; and
5. The complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused at the time the act was committed.
6. The complainant was 16 or 17 years old at the time the act was committed; and
7. The accused was not married to the complainant at the time the act was committed.

Accused's Acts

1. [Did the accused commit/Was the accused a party to the commission of] the alleged act?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child

Accused's Mental State

2. [Did the accused wilfully commit/Was the accused wilfully a party to] the act?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child

Indecent Circumstances

3. Did the act occur in indecent circumstances?

Consider – sexual connotation

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child

Complainant's Involvement

4. Did the act take place [with/in the presence of] the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child

Care, Supervision or Authority

5. Was the complainant under the care, supervision or authority of the accused at the time that the act took place?

If Yes, then go to 6

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child

Complainant's Age

6. Was the complainant 16 or 17 years old at the time the act was committed?

If Yes, then go to 7

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child

No Marital Relationship

7. Were the accused and the complainant married to each other at the time that the act took place?

If No, then go to 8

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child

Relevance of Consent

[This section of the checklist can be used if the accused alleged that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that the complainant was 18 or older and consented to the alleged indecent act. If consent is in issue because the accused submitted that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that s/he was married to the complainant, it will need to be modified as necessary.]

Consent is only relevant if the defence has proven, on the balance of probabilities, that:

8. The accused believed that the complainant was aged 18 or older at the time the alleged indecent act took place; and

9. The accused's belief that the complainant was aged 18 or older was based on reasonable grounds.

Accused's Belief

8. Did the accused believe that the complainant was aged 18 or older at the time the alleged indecent act took place?

If Yes, then go to 9

If No, then consent is not relevant and the accused is guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child (as long as you answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 7, and no to question 6)

Reasonable Grounds for Belief

9. Was the accused's belief that the complainant was aged 18 or older based on reasonable grounds?

Consider – Was the belief based on facts which would have caused a reasonable person to believe the same thing?

If Yes, then consent is relevant. Go to 10

If No, then consent is not relevant and the accused is guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child (as long as you answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 7, and no to question 6)

Lack of Consent

If consent is relevant, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that:

10. The complainant did not consent to the alleged indecent act; and

11. The accused was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

Consent

10. Did the indecent act occur without the complainant's consent?

If Yes, then go to 11

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child (as long as you answered yes to questions 8 and 9)

Awareness of Lack of Consent

11. At the time of alleged indecent act, was the accused aware that the complainant was not consenting or that s/he might not be consenting?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child (as long as you answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7 and 10, and no to question 6)

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child (as long as you answered yes to questions 8 and 9)

Last updated: 1 March 2007

7.3.20 Indecent Act with a 16-Year-Old Child (5/8/91–30/11/06)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Warning: This topic only relates to offences alleged to have been committed between 5 August 1991 and 1 December 2006.

Commencement Information

1. The offence of indecent act with a child aged 16 contrary to s 49 of the Crimes Act 1958 came into force on 5 August 1991. This offence applies to any acts committed between that date and 1 December 2006 (Crimes Act 1958 s 585A(2)).
2. If an offence is alleged to have been committed between two dates, one before and one on or after 5 August 1991, the offence is alleged to have been committed before 5 August 1991 (Crimes Act 1958 s 585A(4)).
3. A new s 49 was substituted by the Crimes (Sexual Offences) Act 2006. It creates the offence of indecent act with a child aged 16 or 17 and applies to all offences committed on or after 1 December 2006 (See 7.3.19 Indecent Act with a 16 or 17 year old child (1/12/06 – 30/6/17).

Elements and defences

4. The offence of committing an indecent act with a 16 year old child is the same as that of committing an indecent act with a child under the age of 16 (s 47), with four exceptions:
   i) The child must be 16 years of age;
   ii) The child must be under the care, supervision or authority of the accused;
   iii) Consent is a defence if the accused believed on reasonable grounds that the child was aged 17 or older; and
   iv) An age gap of 2 years or less does not permit a defence of consent.
5. There have been no reported cases specifically examining the operation of s 49. However the elements and defence of the s 49 offence mirror components of the offences contrary to ss 47 and 48 of the Crimes Act 1958.

Indecent Act elements

6. Guidance in the interpretation of the terms "indecent act", "wilfully" and "with or in the presence of" in s 49 can thus be taken from the case law in relation to s 47. See 7.3.17 Indecent Act with a Child under 16 (1/1/92 – 30/6/17) for a summary of the relevant law in this area.

"Care, supervision or authority"

7. Similarly, the consideration of the terms "care, supervision or authority" in the s 47A and s 48 cases will offer guidance for their interpretation in the s 49 context. However, care should be taken in considering cases decided on the basis of the new s 48(4) and s 49(4) inserted on 1 December 2006. See 7.3.13 Sexual Penetration of a Child under 16 (1/1/92 – 30/6/17).

Consent

8. Consent will not be a defence to a charge of committing an indecent act with a child aged 16 unless, at the time of the alleged offence, the accused believed on reasonable grounds that:
   - The complainant was aged 17 or older; or

- S/he was married to the complainant (Crimes Act 1958 s 49(2)).

9. Where consent is in issue, the onus is on the prosecution to disprove the defence beyond reasonable doubt (R v Mark & Elmazovski [2006] VSCA 251; R v Deblasis (2007) 19 VR 128. Cf R v Douglas [1985] VR 721).

10. Thus, if consent is in issue, the prosecution must prove either:

    - That at the time of the alleged offence, the accused did not believe, on reasonable grounds, that the child was aged 17 or older, nor that s/he was married to the child; or
    - That the complainant did not consent.

Accused's awareness of the absence of consent

11. If consent is in issue, it is likely, but not absolutely certain, that the prosecution will also need to prove mens rea in respect of consent. The charge book charge is drafted on the basis that proof of mens rea is a requirement, and it is the same mens rea as was traditionally applied to the consent element of rape and indecent assault. If this is wrong, the charge will need to be adapted. See 7.3.13 Sexual Penetration of a Child under 16 (1/1/92–30/6/17) for a more detailed discussion of this issue.

Directions about consent and awareness of non-consent

12. The definition and mandatory directions in respect of consent in ss 36 and 37, and s 37AAA of the Crimes Act 1958 apply to this offence. If mens rea in respect of consent is an implied requirement for this offence, then the directions in s 37AA may also need to be given. See 7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent (Pre-1/7/15) for more information in relation to these matters.

Last updated: 18 March 2008

7.3.20.1 Charge: Indecent Act with a 16-Year-Old Child (5/8/91 – 30/11/06) Consent Not in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for trials commenced on or after 1/1/2008 involving offences alleged to have been committed between 5/8/1991 and 30/11/06 where consent is not in issue. If consent is in issue, use 7.3.20.3 Charge: Indecent act with a 16 year old child (Consent in issue) instead.

I must now direct you about the crime of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a 16 year old child.

The law says that the age of consent for sexual acts is normally 16. However, for persons aged 16 or 17, the law has created this specific offence to protect such young people from exploitation by persons in positions of care, supervision or authority.

To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 7 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused [committed the alleged act/was a party to the commission of the alleged act].

Two – the accused [wilfully committed the alleged indecent act/was wilfully a party to the alleged indecent act].

Three – the act occurred in indecent circumstances.

Four – the act was intentionally done [with/in the presence of] the complainant.

Five – at the time the alleged act took place, the complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

Six – the complainant was 16 years old when the act took place.

Seven – the accused was not married to the complainant at the time the alleged act took place.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Actions of the accused

The first element relates to what the accused did. [S/he] must have [committed the act alleged by the prosecution/been a party in any way to the act alleged by the prosecution].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA [insert evidence about the relevant act]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Wilful

The second element relates to the accused person's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that the accused [wilfully committed the alleged indecent act/was wilfully a party to the alleged indecent act]. That is, you must be satisfied that the accused's participation in the act was deliberate not accidental.

Indecent circumstances

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act occurred in indecent circumstances.

Indecent is an ordinary, everyday word, and it is for you to determine whether the circumstances were indecent.

However, the law says that indecent circumstances must involve a sexual connotation. This may arise from the area of the complainant's body NOA touched, what NOA used to touch NOC or from the circumstances of the act. Beyond the requirement of a sexual connotation, the question of whether or not the circumstances were indecent is for you to decide.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA's act occurred in indecent circumstances because [insert evidence]. [If relevant add: The defence responded [insert evidence]].

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA's act occurred in indecent circumstances.

With/In the presence of the complainant

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act was intentionally done [with/in the presence of] the complainant.

In this case the prosecution submitted that [insert evidence about the way in which the act was committed with or in the presence of the complainant]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

[If it is alleged that the act was committed in the presence of the complainant, add the following shaded section.]

For this element to be satisfied, you do not need to find that there was any physical contact between NOA and NOC. This element will be met if the prosecution can prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was present at the place where the alleged act was committed, and NOA was aware of that fact.

Care, Supervision and Authority

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that, at the time that the alleged indecent act took place, the complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

[If care, supervision or authority is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it was conceded by the defence that NOA was NOC's [describe relationship] and that the complainant was thus under the care, supervision or authority of the accused [at the relevant time]. While it is for you to determine whether this was the case, you should have no difficulty finding that this element has been proven.

[If care, supervision or authority is in issue add the shaded section.]

The words "care, supervision or authority" all describe different types of relationships where the accused is in a position to exploit or take advantage of that relationship to influence the child to take part in act in indecent circumstances.[722] You should take this into account when deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the complainant was under the accused's care, supervision or authority.

The relationship of care, supervision or authority does not have to be a formal one. There does not, for example, have to have been a formal agreement that the accused would take care of the complainant. An informal relationship of care, supervision or authority is sufficient.

[If relevant, add: You do not need to find that the alleged act was actually connected with, or influenced by, the relationship of care, supervision or authority or that NOA was actually exploiting his/her position of advantage. It is sufficient if you are satisfied that an established relationship of care, supervision or authority existed between NOA and NOC that could have been connected with, or influenced the child to engage in, the alleged act, and that the relationship existed on the day on which the act took place.]

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOC was under NOA's [care/supervision/authority]. [Insert prosecution evidence]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority at the time that the alleged act took place.

16 Year old child

The sixth element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that s/he was 16 years old at the time that the alleged indecent act took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was 16 at the time the alleged indecent act took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[723]

Accused not married to the complainant

The seventh element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused was not married to the complainant at the time the alleged indecent act took place.

In this case, the defence has not disputed the prosecution's claim that s/he was not married to NOC at the time that the alleged act took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[724]

Consent is not a defence

[This charge is designed for use in cases where consent is not in issue. Use one of the charges listed at the beginning of this document if consent or a precondition for consideration of consent (belief in age or marriage to complainant) is contested.]

---

[722] This charge is designed for cases where the accused committed an indecent act with the complainant. In cases the act is committed in the presence of, the charge will need to be modified.

[723] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

[724] If it is alleged that the accused and complainant were married, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

To protect children, Parliament has created a number of offences where consent is not relevant. This is one of those offences, so you do not need to consider the issue of whether or not NOC agreed to take part in the alleged indecent act.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a 16 year old child, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA [committed [insert relevant act]/was a party to the commission of [insert relevant act]]; and

Two – that NOA [wilfully committed/was wilfully a party to] the alleged indecent act; and

Three – that this act occurred in indecent circumstances; and

Four – that this act was done [with/in the presence of] NOC; and

Five – That NOC was under the care, supervision or authority of NOA at the time that this act took place; and

Six – that NOC was 16 years old when this act took place; and

Seven – that NOA was not married to NOC at the time that this act took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a 16 year old child.

Last updated: 27 April 2016

7.3.20.2 Checklist: Indecent Act with a 16-Year-Old Child (5/8/91–30/11/06) Consent Not in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist may be used for offences alleged to have been committed before 1 December 2006.

For offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1 December 2006, see: 7.3.19.2 Checklist: Indecent Act With a 16 or 17 Year Old Child (1/12/06–30/6/17) – Consent Not in Issue.

Seven elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused [committed/was a party to the commission of] the alleged act; and
2. The accused [wilfully committed/was wilfully a party to] the act; and
3. The act occurred in indecent circumstances; and
4. The accused did the act [with/in the presence of] the complainant; and
5. The complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused at the time the act was committed; and
6. The complainant was 16 years old at the time the act was committed; and
7. The accused was not married to the complainant at the time the act was committed.

Accused's Acts

1. [Did the accused commit/Was the accused a party to the commission of] the alleged act?

    If Yes, then go to 2

    If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 year old child

Accused's Mental State

2. [Did the accused wilfully commit/Was the accused wilfully a party to] the act?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 year old child

Indecent Circumstances

3. Did the act occur in indecent circumstances?

Consider – sexual connotation

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 year old child

Complainant's Involvement

4. Did the act take place [with/in the presence of] the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 year old child

Care, Supervision or Authority

5. Was the complainant under the care, supervision or authority of the accused at the time that the act took place?

If Yes, then go to 6

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 year old child

Complainant's Age

6. Was the complainant 16 years old at the time the act was committed?

If Yes, then go to 7

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 year old child

No Marital Relationship

7. Were the accused and the complainant married to each other at the time that the act took place?

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 year old child

If No, then the accused is guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 year old child (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1,2,3,4,5 and 6)

Last updated: 5 September 2012

7.3.20.3 Charge: Indecent Act with a 16-Year-Old Child (5/8/91–30/11/06) Consent in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for trials commenced on or after 1/1/2008 involving offences alleged to have been committed between 5/8/1991 and 30/11/06 where consent is in issue. If consent is not in issue, use 7.3.20.1 Charge: Indecent act with a 16 year old child (5/8/91–30/11/06) – Consent not in issue instead.

I must now direct you about the crime of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a 16 year old child.

The law says that the age of consent for sexual acts is normally 16. However, the law has created this specific offence to protect a person aged 16 from exploitation by persons in positions of care, supervision or authority.

To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 7 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused [committed the alleged act/was a party to the commission of the alleged act].

Two – the accused [wilfully committed the alleged indecent act/was wilfully a party to the alleged indecent act].

Three – the act occurred in indecent circumstances.

Four – the act was intentionally done [with/in the presence of] the complainant.

Five – at the time the alleged act took place, the complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

Six – the complainant was 16 years old when the act took place.

Seven – the accused was not married to the complainant at the time the alleged act took place.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Actions of the accused

The first element relates to what the accused did. [S/he] must have [committed the act alleged by the prosecution/been a party in any way to the act alleged by the prosecution].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA [insert evidence about the relevant act]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Wilful

The second element relates to the accused person's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that the accused [wilfully committed the alleged indecent act/was wilfully a party to the alleged indecent act]. That is, you must be satisfied that the accused's participation in the act was deliberate not accidental.

Indecent circumstances

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act occurred in indecent circumstances.

Indecent is an ordinary, everyday word, and it is for you to determine whether the circumstances were indecent.

However, the law says that indecent circumstances must involve a sexual connotation. This may arise from the area of the complainant's body NOA touched, what NOA used to touch NOC or from the circumstances of the act. Beyond the requirement of a sexual connotation, the question of whether or not the circumstances were indecent is for you to decide.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA's act occurred in indecent circumstances because [insert evidence]. [If relevant add: The defence responded [insert evidence]].

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA's act occurred in indecent circumstances.

With/In the presence of the complainant

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the alleged act was intentionally done [with/in the presence of] the complainant.

In this case the prosecution submitted that [insert evidence about the way in which the act was committed with or in the presence of the complainant]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

[If it is alleged that the act was committed in the presence of the complainant, add the following shaded text.]

For this element to be satisfied, you do not need to find that there was any physical contact between NOA and NOC. This element will be met if the prosecution can prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was present at the place where the alleged act was committed, and NOA was aware of that fact.

Care, Supervision and Authority

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that, at the time that the alleged indecent act took place, the complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

[If care, supervision or authority is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it was conceded by the defence that NOA was NOC's [describe relationship] and that the complainant was thus under the care, supervision or authority of the accused [at the relevant time]. While it is for you to determine whether this was the case, you should have no difficulty finding that this element has been proven.

[If care, supervision or authority is in issue add the following shaded section.]

The words "care, supervision or authority" all describe different types of relationships where the accused is in a position to exploit or take advantage of that relationship to influence the child to take part in an act in indecent circumstances.[725] You should take this into account when deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the complainant was under the accused's care, supervision or authority.

The relationship of care, supervision or authority does not have to be a formal one. There does not, for example, have to have been a formal agreement that the accused would take care of the complainant. An informal relationship of care, supervision or authority is sufficient.

[If relevant, add: You do not need to find that the alleged act was actually connected with, or influenced by, the relationship of care, supervision or authority or that NOA was actually exploiting his/her position of advantage. It is sufficient if you are satisfied that an established relationship of care, supervision or authority existed between NOA and NOC that could have been connected with, or influenced the child to engage in, the alleged act, and that the relationship existed on the day on which the act took place.]

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOC was under NOA's [care/supervision/authority]. [Insert

[725] This charge is designed for cases where the accused committed an indecent act with the complainant. In cases the act is committed in the presence of, the charge will need to be modified.

prosecution evidence.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority at the time that the alleged act took place.

16 Year old child

The sixth element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that the s/he was 16 years old at the time that the alleged indecent act took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was 16 at the time the alleged indecent act took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[726]

Accused not married to the complainant

The seventh element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused was not married to the complainant at the time the alleged indecent act took place.

In this case, the defence has not disputed the prosecution's claim that s/he was not married to NOC at the time that the alleged act took place. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[727]

Consent

This charge addresses consent coupled with a belief on reasonable grounds that the child was aged 17 or older (s 49(2)(a)). If the issue is s 47(2)(b) (accused believed on reasonable grounds that s/he was married to the complainant) the charge will need to be adapted accordingly. See 7.3.20 Indecent act with a 16 year old child (5/8/91 – 30/11/06) for guidance.

Belief that complainant was aged 17 or more

Even if you find that the prosecution has proven all seven elements of this offence, NOA will not necessarily be guilty of this offence. This is because, in certain circumstances, consent will be a defence.

The law states that consent is available as a defence if the accused believed on reasonable grounds that the complainant was at least 17 years old at the time of the alleged indecent act.

As a result, the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt either:

1. That NOA did not believe that NOC was aged 17 or older at the time of the alleged indecent act; or

2. That NOA did not have reasonable grounds to believe that NOC was aged 17 or older at the time of the alleged indecent act.

For there to be reasonable grounds for a belief, the belief must be based on facts which could have caused a reasonable person to believe the same thing. So to prove this second alternative the prosecution must prove that even if NOA may have believed NOC was 17 or older, a reasonable person in his/her situation could not have reached that conclusion based on the facts known to NOA.

In this case the prosecution alleged [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments]. In response, the defence submitted [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

---

[726] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

[727] If it is alleged that the accused and complainant were married, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

If the prosecution has proven beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA did not believe on reasonable grounds that NOC was at least 17 years old at the time of the alleged indecent act, then consent will not be a defence, and will not be relevant to your determination of the accused's guilt.

[If the prosecution has conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section.]

If, however, you find that this has not been proven, then you will find the accused not guilty. This is because the prosecution does not dispute that [insert basis of concession about consent, e.g. "NOC was consenting" or "NOA believed that NOC was consenting"].

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

Warning: It is an unresolved question whether the prosecution must prove that the accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting. This Charge Book requires proof of awareness of non-consent as a matter of prudence. See 7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent (Pre-1/7/15) for more information.

If, however, you find that this has not been proven, then you will need to determine whether the prosecution have proved two additional elements: first, that NOC did not consent to the alleged indecent act and second, that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

Definition of consent

Dealing with the first of these additional elements, consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So NOC will not have consented to the indecent act if s/he did not freely agree to take part in that act.

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant did not freely agree to the indecent act. So if consent is relevant to your determination, and the prosecution cannot prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not freely agree to the alleged indecent act, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

The law identifies a number of circumstances where the complainant is deemed not to freely agree, or consent, to an indecent act. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

(a) the person submits because of force or the fear of force to that person or someone else;

(b) the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else;

(c) the person submits because s/he is unlawfully detained;

(d) the person is asleep, unconscious, or so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of freely agreeing;

(e) the person is incapable of understanding the sexual nature of the act;

(f) the person is mistaken about the sexual nature of the act or the identity of the person;

(g) the person mistakenly believes that the act is for medical or hygienic purposes.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOC, you must find that s/he was not consenting. However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting, then this element will be proven.

[If there is evidence that the complainant did not say or do anything to indicate agreement, add the following shaded section.]

The law also says that the fact that a person did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to a sexual act at the time at which the act took place is enough to show that the act took place without that person's free agreement.

This means that if you accept that NOC did not say or do anything to indicate free agreement to the alleged indecent act at the time of that act, you may find on that basis that s/he did not consent to that act.

[Where evidence is given about the lack of resistance or injury or about past consensual sex, add the following section.]

The law also says the complainant is not to be regarded as having freely agreed just because:

- [if relevant] s/he did not protest or physically resist the accused;
- [if relevant] s/he did not sustain physical injury;
- [if relevant] s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act on that occasion with the accused or with any other person, or that s/he agreed to engage in another sexual act with the accused or another person on an earlier occasion.

However, these are relevant factors for you to consider. You must consider the action or lack of action of NOC, together with all the surrounding circumstances, in order to decide whether the prosecution has proven beyond reasonable doubt that NOC did not consent.

In determining whether NOC did not freely agree to take part in the alleged indecent act, you must consider all of the relevant evidence, including what s/he is alleged to have said and done at the time of that act, as well as the evidence s/he gave in court about [his/her] state of mind at that time. You can also consider what s/he did not say or do at the time of the alleged act.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC did not consent. [Insert relevant evidence and competing arguments.]

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt this first additional element that NOC did not consent, then you must find NOA not guilty.

Awareness of Lack of Consent

Turning now to the second additional element, if consent is available as a defence, the prosecution must also prove beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of the alleged indecent act the accused was aware either:

● that the complainant was not consenting; or

● that the complainant might not be consenting.

If the prosecution fails to prove to you beyond reasonable doubt that NOA had one of these state(s) of mind about the complainant's consent, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Belief in consent

[If evidence is led or an assertion is made that the accused believed that the complainant was consenting, add one of the directions in 7.3.1.3.1 Charge: Belief in consent.]

Onus and standard of proof

Remember, you may not need to consider the issue of consent. You will only need to consider this issue if the prosecution fails to prove:

(1) That NOA did not believe that NOC was aged 17 or older at the time of the alleged indecent act; or

(2) That NOA did not have reasonable grounds to believe that NOC was aged 17 or older at the time of the alleged indecent act.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a 16 year old child, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA [committed [insert relevant act]/was a party to the commission of [insert relevant act]]; and

Two – that NOA [wilfully committed/was wilfully a party to] the alleged indecent act; and

Three – that this act occurred in indecent circumstances; and

Four – that this act was done [with/in the presence of] NOC; and

Five – That NOC was under the care, supervision or authority of NOA at the time that this act took place; and

Six – that NOC was 16 years old when this act took place; and

Seven – that NOA was not married to NOC at the time that this act took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a 16 year old child.

If you decide that each of these elements have been proved beyond reasonable doubt, you must decide if the prosecution has also proved, to the same standard:

- That NOA did not believe that NOC was aged 17 or older at the relevant time; or
- That NOA had no reasonable grounds to believe that NOC was aged 17 or older at the relevant time.

If the prosecution has proved one of these matters, and you find that all of the elements have been proved by the prosecution beyond reasonable doubt, then NOA will be guilty of the offence. However, if the prosecution has not proved either of these matters, you must then decide if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC did not consent to the indecent act and that NOA was aware that NOC was not or might not be consenting.

[If the prosecution conceded either consent or belief in consent, add the shaded section.]

Since the prosecution does not dispute the accused's claim that [insert basis of concession about consent, e.g. "NOC was consenting" or "s/he believed that NOC was consenting"], you must, if you reach this point, find NOA not guilty of this offence.

[If either consent or belief in consent is in issue, add the shaded section.]

If the prosecution cannot prove these matters, then you must find NOA not guilty of [committing/being a party to the commission of] an indecent act with a child aged of 16.

Last updated: 27 April 2016

7.3.20.4 Checklist: Indecent Act with a 16-Year-Old Child (5/8/91–30/11/06) Consent in Issue

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist may be used for offences alleged to have been committed before 1 December 2006.

For offences alleged to have been committed on or after 1 December 2006, see: 7.3.19.4 Checklist: Indecent Act With a 16 or 17 Year Old Child (1/12/06–30/6/17) – Consent in Issue.

Seven elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused [committed/was a party to the commission of] the alleged act; and
2. The accused [wilfully committed/was wilfully a party to] the act; and
3. The act occurred in indecent circumstances; and
4. The accused did the act [with/in the presence of] the complainant; and
5. The complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused at the time the act was committed; and
6. The complainant was 16 years old at the time the act was committed; and
7. The accused was not married to the complainant at the time the act was committed; and

Accused's Acts

1. [Did the accused commit/Was the accused a party to the commission of] the alleged act?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 year old child

Accused's Mental State

2. [Did the accused wilfully commit/Was the accused wilfully a party to] the act?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 year old child

Indecent Circumstances

3. Did the act occur in indecent circumstances?

Consider – sexual connotation

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 year old child

Complainant's Involvement

4. Did the act take place [with/in the presence of] the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 year old child

Care, Supervision or Authority

5. Was the complainant under the care, supervision or authority of the accused at the time that the act took place?

If Yes, then go to 6

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 year old child

Complainant's Age

6. Was the complainant 16 years old at the time the act was committed?

If Yes, then go to 7

If No, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 year old child

No Marital Relationship

7. Were the accused and the complainant married to each other at the time that the act took place?

If Yes, then the accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 year old child

If No, then go to 8

Relevance of Consent

[This section of the checklist can be used if the accused alleged that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that the complainant was 17 or older and consented to the alleged indecent act. If consent is in issue because the accused alleged that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that s/he was married to the complainant, it will need to be modified as necessary.]

Consent is relevant unless you are satisfied the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt that either:

8. The accused did not believe that the complainant was aged 17 or older at the time the alleged indecent act took place; or

9. The accused did not have reasonable grounds to believe that the complainant was aged 17 or older.

Accused's Belief

8. Did the accused believe that the complainant was aged 17 or older at the time the alleged indecent act took place?

If Yes, then go to 9

If No, then consent is not relevant and the accused is guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 year old child (as long as you answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 7, and no to question 6)

Reasonable Grounds for Belief

9. Was the accused's belief that the complainant was aged 17 or older based on reasonable grounds?

Consider – Was the belief based on facts which would have caused a reasonable person to believe the same thing?

If Yes, then consent is relevant. Go to 10

If No, then consent is not relevant and the accused is guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 year old child (as long as you answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 7, and no to question 6)

Lack of Consent

If consent is relevant, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that:

10. The complainant did not consent to the alleged indecent act; and

11. The accused was aware that the complainant was not or might not be consenting.

Consent

10. Did the indecent act occur without the complainant's consent?

If Yes, then go to 11

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 year old child (as long as you answered yes to questions 8 and 9)

Awareness of Lack of Consent

11. At the time of alleged indecent act, was the accused aware that the complainant was not consenting or that s/he might not be consenting?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 year old child (as long as you answered yes to questions 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7 and 10, and no to question 6)

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of committing an indecent act with a 16 year old child (as long as you answered yes to questions 8 and 9)

Last updated: 5 September 2012

7.3.21 Sexual Activity in the Presence of a Child under 16 (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Commencement Information

1. Section 49F came into force on 1 July 2017.
2. Prior to 1 July 2017, Crimes Act 1958 s 47 contained a composite offence of an indecent act "with or in the presence of" a child under 16. Following the amendments introduced by the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Act 2016, the offence was split so that section 49D addresses sexual touching and section 49F addresses sexual activity in the presence of the child.
3. For offences committed before 1 July 2017, see 7.3.17 Indecent Act with a Child Under 16 (1/1/92 – 30/6/17).
4. For offences involving sexual touching, see 7.3.16 Sexual Assault of a child under 16 (From 1/7/17).

Elements

5. The elements of the offence are set out in s 49F(1) of the Crimes Act 1958. The prosecution must prove that:

   i) The accused (A) intentionally engages in an activity;

ii) The activity is sexual;

iii) Another person (B) is present when A engages in the activity;

iv) A knows B is, or probably is, present when A engages in the activity;

v) B is a child under the age of 16 years;

vi) Engaging in the activity in the presence of B is contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct.

Intentional activity

6. The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intentionally engaged in an activity.
7. The fault element for this element is basic or general intention. Where relevant, the prosecution must prove that the accused engaged in the activity intentionally in the sense that his or her conduct was deliberate rather than inadvertent or accidental.
8. The Crimes Act 1958 does not provide a definition for the word "activity". Dictionary definitions of activity include:
    - "the state of being active: behaviour or actions of a particular kind" (Merriam-Webster)
    - "the state or quality of being active; a specific deed, action, function or sphere of action" (Dictionary.com)
    - "A thing that a person or group does or has done" (English Oxford Living Dictionaries).

Activity is sexual

9. The second element is that the activity is sexual (Crimes Act 1958 s 49F(1)).
10. Section 35D of the Act specifies that an activity may be sexual due to:

    (a) The area of the body that is involved in the region, including genital or anal region, buttocks, breasts;

    (b) The fact that the person engaging in the activity seeks or gets sexual arousal or gratification from the activity; or

    (c) Any other aspect of the activity, including the circumstances in which it is engaged in.

11. Section 35D contains an example of a sexual activity: "A watches pornography in the presence of A's daughter (B) and her friend (C)".[728]
12. Section 49ZC(c) of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that an honest and reasonable mistaken belief that the activity is not sexual is not a defence.

Presence of another person

13. The third element is that another person, B, is present when A engages in the activity (Crimes Act 1958 s 49F(1)).

---

[728] See Interpretation of Legislation Act 1984 s 36A on the interpretation and operation of examples.

14. Section 49F(5) states that a person may be present:

    (a) in person; or

    (b) by means of an electronic communication within the meaning of the Electronic Transactions (Victoria) Act 2000 that is received by B in real time or close to real time.

15. Section 3 of the Electronic Transactions (Victoria) Act 2000 defines an "electronic communication" as:

    (a) a communication of information in the form of data, text or images by means of guided or unguided electromagnetic energy, or both; or

    (b) a communication of information in the form of sound by means of guided or unguided electromagnetic energy, or both, where the sound is processed at its destination by an automated voice recognition system;

16. According to the Explanatory Memorandum for the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Bill 2016, this provision allows the offence to apply "where A engages in sexual activity while communicating with B over the internet. This updates the offence to cover offending using new technologies".

Knowledge of B's presence

17. The fourth element is that the accused knew that B was, or probably was, present when he or she engaged in the activity (Crimes Act 1958 s 49F(1)).

18. According to the Explanatory Memorandum for the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Bill 2016, this replaces the previous fault element of "wilful" in the former Crimes Act 1958 s 47, which was a source of uncertainty.

19. In relation to the former Crimes Act 1958 s 47, it was thought that 'wilful' meant that the accused must have intended that the child be present at the time of the relevant act and that recklessness was not sufficient (R v Papamitrou (2004) 7 VR 375, [43]).

20. In contrast, Crimes Act 1958 s 49G provides that recklessness, in the form of the accused knowing that it is probable that the child is present, is sufficient for this element.

Child Under 16

21. The fifth element requires the prosecution to prove that the complainant was under the age of 16 at the time the relevant activity took place (Crimes Act 1958 s 49F(1)).

Engaging in activity in presence of B contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct

22. The sixth element is that engaging in the activity in the presence of the complainant is contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct (Crimes Act 1958 s 49F(1)).

23. Section 49F(3) of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that:

    > Whether or not engaging in the activity in the presence of B is contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct depends on the circumstances

24. The Act specifies that the circumstances include the purpose of the activity and whether the accused seeks or gets sexual arousal or gratification from engaging in the activity or from the presence of B. However, the circumstances do not include whether:

    - B consents to being present when A engages in the activity;
    - B consents to A engaging in the activity;
    - A believes that B consents to being present when A engages in the activity;

- A believes that B consents to A engaging in the activity (Crimes Act 1958 s 49F(4)).

25. Section 49ZC(c) of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that an honest and reasonable mistaken belief that engaging in the activity in the presence of the complainant was not contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct is not a defence.

Statutory defences and exemption

Similarity in age

26. Section 49U of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that it is a defence to an offence against section 49F(1) if, at the time of the conduct:

    (a) A was not more than 2 years older than B; and

    (b) B was 12 years of age or more.

27. In relation to this defence, the accused's actual age must not exceed the child's by more than 24 months. The availability of the defence is not determined by a measure limited to whole–years (Stannard v DPP (2010) 28 VR 84).

28. To disprove this defence, the prosecution must rebut one or more limbs of section 49V.

29. This defence does not involve a consideration of whether the child consented or whether the accused had a reasonable belief that the child consented. Compare 7.3.12 Sexual Penetration of a Child Under 16 (From 1/7/17).

Reasonable belief as to age

30. Section 49W of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that it is a defence to an offence against section 49D(1) if, at the time of the conduct:

    (a) B was 12 years of age or more; and

    (b) A reasonably believed that B was 16 years of age or more.

31. The accused bears the burden of proving, on the balance of probabilities, that he or she reasonably believed that B was 16 years of age or more (Crimes Act 1958 s 49W(4)).

32. The Note to section 49W states that:

> Whether or not A reasonably believed that B … was 16 years of age or more depends on the circumstances. The circumstances include any steps that A took to find out [B's] age.

33. The Note also specifies that the accused has an evidential burden to establish that B was 12 years of age or more.

34. Unlike the former s 47, a reasonable belief in age is not used as a threshold requirement before consent is relevant. This means that the jury does not need to consider consent, or a reasonable belief in consent, as part of this belief in age defence.

Extraterritorial conduct

35. Subsections (6) and (7) of section 49F give the offence extraterritorial operation.

36. Subsection (6) provides that some or all of the conduct constituting the offence can occur outside Victoria, provided B was in Victoria at the time of the conduct.

37. Similarly, subsection (7) provides that some or all of the conduct constituting the offence can occur outside Victoria, provided A was in Victoria at the time of the conduct.

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.21.1 Charge: Sexual Activity in Presence of Child under 16 (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of sexual activity in the presence of a child under 16. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 6 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – The accused intentionally engaged in an activity.

Two – The activity was sexual.

Three – NOC was present during that activity.

Four – NOA knew that NOC was or probably was present during that activity.

Five – NOC was under the age of 16 years.

Six – Engaging in the activity in the presence of NOC was contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Engaging in activity

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOA [identify relevant activity].

[If the evidence or arguments have placed the intentional or voluntary nature of the acts in issue, add the following shaded section.[729]]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant activity] must have been done intentionally.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves intention in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA touched the outside of NO3P's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the touching"].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA [insert evidence about the relevant act]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Sexual activity

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that [identify relevant activity] is a sexual activity.

The law says that an activity can be sexual because of the area of the body involved, including the genital or anal region, the buttocks or, in the case of a woman, the breasts.

Or the activity can be sexual because the person engaging in the activity seeks or gets sexual arousal or gratification from the activity.

Finally, any other aspect of the activity, including the circumstances in which it happened, can also make the activity sexual.

---

[729] Because of how the offence is defined, the issue of intention is likely inseparable from the question of voluntariness. Where the issue is raised, the judge should direct the jury on the specific matters the jury must consider to find that the accused's conduct was voluntary and intentional (e.g. disproof of accident or proof that the accused was conscious).

The question of whether or not the activity was sexual is for you to decide.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that the activity was sexual because [insert evidence and arguments]. [If relevant add: The defence responded [insert evidence and arguments]].

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that [identify relevant activity] is a sexual activity.

Presence of complainant

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that NOC was present when NOA [identify relevant activity].

The law states that a person can be present during an activity by either being present in person, or by means of an electronic communication that is received in real time. In other words, a person can be present by phone or by web cam, for example.

In this case, the prosecution argues that NOC was present when NOA [identify relevant activity] because [identify evidence and arguments]. [If relevant, add: The defence responded [insert evidence and arguments].]

Knowledge of Accused

The fourth element requires that you reach a conclusion about NOA's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that NOA knew that NOC was present, or knew that NOC was probably present, when s/he [identify relevant activity].

[Identify relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Child under the age of 16

The fifth element relates to the age of the complainant, NOC. The prosecution must prove that s/he was under the age of 16 when the activity occurred.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was under 16 at that time. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[730]

Contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct

The sixth element that the prosecution must prove is that [identify relevant activity] in NOC's presence was contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct.

The law says that whether engaging in an activity in the presence of NOC is contrary to community standards depends on the circumstances, and that this includes the purpose of the activity and whether NOA seeks or gets sexual arousal or sexual gratification from engaging in the activity or from NOC's presence.

The law also says that whether NOC consented to NOA [identify relevant activity] or whether NOC consented to being present when NOA [identify relevant activity] are not relevant to whether [identify relevant activity] in NOC's presence was contrary to community standards. Similarly, whether NOA believed that NOC consented to NOA [identify relevant activity] or whether NOA believed that NOC consented to being present when NOA [identify relevant activity] are not relevant to this element.

[Refer to relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

---

[730] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

Defences

Similarity in Age

[If the accused relies on the similarity in age defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 49U, add the following shaded section.]

For this offence, the law recognises a defence which may be termed "similarity in age". There are two parts to this defence.

First, the accused must be no more than 2 years older than the complainant. In this case, that requirement is met.[731]

Second, the complainant must have been 12 years old or more at the time of the alleged conduct. It is this part of the defence which is in dispute.

As I told you at the start of the trial, the prosecution must prove the accused's guilt. This means the prosecution must prove that at the time of the alleged conduct, NOC was not aged 12 years or older. In other words, the prosecution must prove that at the time of the activity, NOC was aged 11 years or younger.

[Refer to relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Reasonable belief in Age

[If the accused relies on the belief in age defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 49W, add the following shaded section.]

The law states that the accused does not commit this offence if, at the time s/he [describe relevant activity], the accused reasonably believed that the accused was aged 16 years or more. There are two parts to this defence.

First, at the time of the activity, NOC was aged 12 or more. There is no issue in this case that NOC was aged 12 or more at the time of the conduct.[732]

Second, NOA reasonably believed that NOC was aged 16 or more. It is a matter for you to decide whether NOA held this belief, and whether it was reasonable. As part of deciding this issue, you should consider what steps NOA took to find out NOC's age.

Unlike the elements of the offence, this is a matter which the accused must prove. It is an exception to the general rule that the prosecution must prove all matters. However, the accused only need to prove that s/he reasonably believed that NOC was aged 16 or more on the balance of probabilities. In other words, s/he must show that it is more likely than not that s/he believed that NOC was aged 16 or more and that this belief was reasonable. Unlike the prosecution, s/he does not need to prove this matter beyond reasonable doubt.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments.]

---

[731] If the prosecution contests this matter, then the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[732] If the age of the child is in dispute, then this direction must be modified. The prosecution bears the onus of rebutting this threshold requirement, once the accused has satisfied the evidential burden.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of sexual activity in the presence of a child under the age of 16, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

- One – the accused intentionally engaged in an activity.
- Two – the activity was sexual.
- Three – NOC was present during that activity.
- Four – NOA knew that NOC was, or probably was, present during that activity.
- Five – NOC was under the age of 16 years.
- Six – Engaging in the activity in the presence of NOC was contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual activity in the presence of a child under the age of 16.

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.21.2 Checklist: Sexual Activity in Presence of Child under 16 (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Six elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally engaged in an activity; and

2. The activity was sexual; and

3. The complainant was present during that activity; and

4. The accused knew that the complainant was or probably was present during that activity; and

5. The complainant was under the age of 16; and

6. Engaging in the activity in the presence of the complainant was contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct.

Intentional activity

1. Did the accused intentionally [identify relevant activity]?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Activity in Presence of Child under 16

Sexual activity

2. Is [identify relevant activity] a sexual activity?

Consider – An activity may be sexual because of the area of body involved, the fact that the person doing it seeks or gets sexual arousal or gratification from the activity, or any other reason.

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Activity in Presence of Child under 16

Presence of complainant

3. Was NOC present when NOA [identify relevant activity]?

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Activity in Presence of Child under 16

Accused knew that complainant present

4. Did NOA know that NOC was or probably was present when s/he [identify relevant activity]?

If Yes then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Activity in Presence of Child under 16

Complainant under the age of 16

5. At the time of the act, was NOC under the age of 16?

If Yes then go to 6

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Activity in Presence of Child under 16

Contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct

6. Is it contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct for NOA to [identify relevant activity] in the presence of NOC?

Consider – Relevant matters include the purpose of the activity and whether the accused was seeking or got sexual arousal or gratification from engaging in the activity in the presence of the complainant

Consider – Whether NOC consented to being present or the activity or whether NOA believed NOC consented to being present or the activity is not relevant to this element

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Sexual Activity in Presence of Child under 16 (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Activity in Presence of Child under 16

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.22 Sexual Activity in the Presence of a Child Aged 16 or 17 under Care, Supervision or Authority (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Commencement Information

1. Section 49G came into force on 1 July 2017.

2. Prior to 1 July 2017, Crimes Act 1958 s 49 contained a composite offence of an indecent act "with or in the presence of" a child aged 16 or 17. Following the amendments introduced by the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Act 2016, the offence was split so that section 49E addresses sexual touching and section 49G addresses sexual activity in the presence of the child.
3. For offences committed before 1 July 2017, see 7.3.19 Indecent Act with a Child aged 16 or 17 (1/12/06 – 30/6/17).
4. For offences involving sexual touching, see 7.3.18 Sexual Assault of a child aged 16 or 17 (From 1/7/17).

Elements

5. The elements of the offence are set out in s 49G(1) of the Crimes Act 1958. The prosecution must prove that:

   i) The accused (A) intentionally engages in an activity;

   ii) The activity is sexual;

   iii) Another person (B) is present when A engages in the activity;

   iv) A knows B is, or probably is, present when A engages in the activity;

   v) B is a child aged 16 or 17;

   vi) B is under A's care, supervision or authority; and

   vii) Engaging in the activity in the presence of B is contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct.

Intentional activity

6. The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intentionally engaged in an activity.
7. The fault element for this element is basic or general intention. Where relevant, the prosecution must prove the accused engaged in the activity intentionally, in the sense that his or her conduct was deliberate rather than inadvertent or accidental.
8. The Crimes Act 1958 does not provide a definition for the word "activity". Dictionary definitions of activity include
   - "the state of being active: behaviour or actions of a particular kind" (Merriam-Webster)
   - "the state or quality of being active; a specific deed, action, function or sphere of action" (Dictionary.com)
   - "A thing that a person or group does or has done" (English Oxford Living Dictionaries).

Activity is sexual

9. The second element is that the activity is sexual (Crimes Act 1958 s 49G(1)).
10. Section 35D of the Act specifies that an activity may be sexual due to:

(a) The area of the body that is involved in the region, including genital or anal region, buttocks, breasts;

(b) The fact that the person engaging in the activity seeks or gets sexual arousal or gratification from the activity; or

(c) Any other aspect of the activity, including the circumstances in which it is engaged in.

11. Section 35D contains an example of a sexual activity: "A watches pornography in the presence of A's daughter (B) and her friend (C)".[733]

12. Section 49ZC(c) of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that an honest and reasonable mistaken belief that the activity is not sexual is not a defence.

Presence of another person

13. The third element is that another person, B, is present when A engages in the activity (Crimes Act 1958 s 49G(1)).

14. Section 49G(5) states that a person may be present:

(a) In person; or

(b) By means of an electronic communication within the meaning of the Electronic Transactions (Victoria) Act 2000 that is received by B in real time or close to real time.

15. Section 3 of the Electronic Transactions (Victoria) Act 2000 defines an "electronic communication" as:

(a) a communication of information in the form of data, text or images by means of guided or unguided electromagnetic energy, or both; or

(b) a communication of information in the form of sound by means of guided or unguided electromagnetic energy, or both, where the sound is processed at its destination by an automated voice recognition system;

16. According to the Explanatory Memorandum for the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Bill 2016, this provision allows the offence to apply "where A engages in sexual activity while communicating with B over the internet. This updates the offence to cover offending using new technologies."

Knowledge of B's presence

17. The fourth element is that the accused knew that B was, or probably was, present when he or she engaged in the activity (Crimes Act 1958 s 49G(1)).

18. According to the Explanatory Memorandum for the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Bill 2016, this replaces the previous fault element of "wilful" in the former provision, which was a source of uncertainty.

19. In relation to the former Crimes Act 1958 s 47, it was thought that 'wilful' meant that the accused must have intended that the child be present at the time of the relevant act and that recklessness was not sufficient (R v Papamitrou (2004) 7 VR 375, [43]).

20. In contrast, Crimes Act 1958 s 49G provides that recklessness, in the form of the accused knowing that it is probable that the child is present, is sufficient for this element.

---

[733] See Interpretation of Legislation Act 1984 s 36A on the interpretation and operation of examples.

Child aged 16 or 17

21. The fifth element requires the prosecution to prove that the complainant was aged 16 or 17 at the time the relevant activity took place (Crimes Act 1958 s 49G(1)).

Care, supervision or authority

22. The sixth element is that B was under the accused's care, supervision or authority.

23. For information about this element, see Care, supervision or authority into 7.3.14 Sexual penetration of a child aged 16 or 17 (From 1/7/17).

Engaging in activity in presence of B contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct

24. The seventh element is that engaging in the activity in the presence of the complainant is contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct (Crimes Act 1958 s 49G(1)).

25. Section 49G(3) of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that:

> Whether or not engaging in the activity in the presence of B is contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct depends on the circumstances

26. The Act specifies that the circumstances include the purpose of the activity and whether the accused seeks or gets sexual arousal or gratification from engaging in the activity or from the presence of B. However, the circumstances do not include whether:

    - B consents to being present when A engages in the activity;
    - B consents to A engaging in the activity;
    - A believes that B consents to being present when A engages in the activity;
    - A believes that B consents to A engaging in the activity (Crimes Act 1958 s 49G(4)).

27. Section 49ZC(c) of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that an honest and reasonable mistaken belief that engaging in the activity in the presence of the complainant was not contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct is not a defence.

Statutory defences and exemption

Marriage or domestic partnership

28. Section 49Y of the Crimes Act 1958 provides an exception to the offence in s 49G(1). This exception applies if, at the time of the alleged offence –

(a) A and B are married to each other and the marriage is recognised as valid under the Marriage Act 1961 of the Commonwealth; or

(b) A–

(i) is not more than 5 years older than B; and

(ii) is B's domestic partner and the domestic partnership commenced before B came under A's care, supervision or authority.

Reasonable belief as to age

29. Section 49X of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that it is a defence to an offence against section 49G(1) if, at the time of the conduct, the accused reasonably believed that the child was aged 18 or more (Crimes Act 1958 s 49X(1))

30. The accused bears the burden of proving, on the balance of probabilities, that he or she reasonably believed that B was 18 years of age or more (Crimes Act 1958 s 49X(4)).

31. The Note to section 49X states that:

> Whether or not A reasonably believed that B … was 18 years of age or more depends on the circumstances. The circumstances include any steps that A took to find out [B's] age.

Reasonable belief as to marriage or domestic partnership

32. Section 49Z of the Crimes Act 1958 provides a defence to the offence in s 49G(1) which applies if, at the time of the alleged offence –

(a) A reasonably believed that A and B are married to each other and that the marriage is recognised as valid under the Marriage Act 1961 of the Commonwealth; or

(b) A–

(i) was not more than 5 years older than B; and

(ii) reasonably believed that A was B's domestic partner and that the domestic partnership commenced before B came under A's care, supervision or authority.

33. The accused bears the burden of proving, on the balance of probabilities, the reasonable belief referred to in the section (Crimes Act 1958 s 49Z(3)).

34. The Note to the section specifies that the accused has an evidential burden in relation to the relative ages of the accused and the complainant.

Reasonable belief as to care, supervision or authority

35. Section 49ZA provides a defence to a charge under s 49G(1) that applies if, at the time of the conduct constituting the offence, the accused reasonably believed that the complainant was not under his or her care, supervision or authority.

36. The accused bears the burden of proving, on the balance of probabilities, that he or she held this reasonable belief (Crimes Act 1958 s 49ZA(3)).

Extraterritorial conduct

37. Subsections (6) and (7) of section 49G give the offence extraterritorial operation.

38. Subsection (6) provides that some or all of the conduct constituting the offence can occur outside Victoria, provided B was in Victoria at the time of the conduct.

39. Similarly, subsection (7) provides that some or all of the conduct constituting the offence can occur outside Victoria, provided A was in Victoria at the time of the conduct.

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.22.1 Charge: Sexual Activity in Presence of a Child Aged 16 or 17 under Care, Supervision or Authority (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of sexual activity in the presence of a child aged 16 or 17. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 7 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused intentionally engaged in an activity.

Two – the activity was sexual.

Three – NOC was present during that activity.

Four – NOA knew that NOC was or probably was present during that activity.

Five – NOC was a child aged 16 or 17 years.

Six – NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority.

Seven – Engaging in the activity in the presence of NOC was contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Engaging in activity

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that NOA [identify relevant activity].

[If the evidence or arguments have placed the intentional or voluntary nature of the acts in issue, add the following shaded section.[734]]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant activity] must have been done intentionally.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves intention in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA touched the outside of NO3P's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the touching"].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA [insert evidence about the relevant act]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Sexual activity

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that [identify relevant activity] is a sexual activity.

---

[734] Because of how the offence is defined, the issue of intention is likely inseparable from the question of voluntariness. Where the issue is raised, the judge should direct the jury on the specific matters the jury must consider to find that the accused's conduct was voluntary and intentional (e.g. disproof of accident or proof that the accused was conscious).

The law says that an activity can be sexual because of the area of the body involved, including the genital or anal region, the buttocks or, in the case of a woman, the breasts.

Or the activity can be sexual because the person engaging in the activity seeks or gets sexual arousal or gratification from the activity.

Finally, any other aspect of the activity, including the circumstances in which it happened, can also make the activity sexual.

The question of whether or not the activity was sexual is for you to decide.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that the activity was sexual because [insert evidence and arguments]. [If relevant add: The defence responded [insert evidence and arguments]].

For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that [identify relevant activity] is a sexual activity.

Presence of complainant

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that NOC was present when NOA [identify relevant activity].

The law states that a person can be present during an activity by either being present in person, or by means of an electronic communication that is received in real time. In other words, a person can be present by phone or by web cam, for example.

In this case, the prosecution argues that NOC was present when NOA [identify relevant activity] because [identify evidence and arguments]. [If relevant, add: The defence responded [insert evidence and arguments].

Knowledge of Accused

The fourth element requires that you reach a conclusion about NOA's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that NOA knew that NOC was present, or knew that NOC was probably present, when s/he [identify relevant activity].

[Identify relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Child aged 16 or 17

The fifth element relates to the age of the complainant, NOC. The prosecution must prove that s/he was aged 16 or 17 when the activity occurred.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was under 16 at that time. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[735]

Care, supervision or authority

The sixth element that the prosecution must prove is that, at the time that the [identify relevant activity] took place, the complainant was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

[If care, supervision or authority is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it was conceded by the defence that NOA was NOC's [describe relationship] and that the complainant was thus under the care, supervision or authority of the accused [at the relevant time]. While it is for you to determine whether this was the case, you should have no difficulty finding that this element has been proven.

---

[735] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[If care, supervision or authority is in issue and the prosecution relies on a prescribed relationship, add the following shaded section.]

Parliament has defined a number of relationships where a child is deemed to be under the care, supervision and authority of another person. This includes [name relevant relationships from s 37 list].

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA was NOC's [describe relationship]. [Insert prosecution evidence.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

If you find beyond reasonable doubt that NOA was NOC's [identify relationship] at the time of the alleged offence(s), then you will find this element has been proven.

[If care, supervision or authority is in issue and the prosecution does not rely on a standing relationship, add the following shaded section.]

The words "care, supervision or authority" all describe different types of relationships where the accused is in a position to exploit or take advantage of that relationship to influence the child to engage in a sexual act. You should take this into account when deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the complainant was under the accused's care, supervision or authority.

The relationship of care, supervision or authority does not have to be a formal one. There does not, for example, have to have been a formal agreement that the accused would take care of the complainant. An informal relationship of care, supervision or authority is sufficient.

[If relevant, add: You do not need to find that the alleged act of touching was actually connected with, or influenced by, the relationship of care, supervision or authority or that NOA was actually exploiting his/her position of advantage. It is sufficient if you are satisfied that an established relationship of care, supervision or authority existed between NOA and NOC that could have been connected with, or influenced the child to engage in, [identify relevant activity], and that the relationship existed on the day on which the [identify relevant activity] took place.]

In this case the prosecution alleged that NOC was under NOA's [care/supervision/authority]. [Insert prosecution evidence]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine, on the basis of all the evidence, whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority at the time that the sexual touching took place.

[If the accused may be unaware of the facts giving rise to a relationship of care, supervision or authority, add the following shaded section.]

The law states that NOA must know and be aware of the facts that give rise to a relationship of care, supervision or authority. For example, if a teacher with a large number of students did not recognise the complainant was a member of one of his/her classes, then you could not find this element proved.

[Insert relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

[If the accused raises the defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 49ZA of a reasonable belief as to no care, supervision or authority, add the following shaded section.]

This element requires you to look at the facts and decide whether NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority. The prosecution does not need to prove that NOA thought NOC was under his/her care, supervision or authority.

However, the law provides that NOA has a defence to this charge if s/he can show that s/he reasonably believed that NOC was not under his/her care, supervision or authority.

Unlike the elements of the offence, this is a matter which the accused must prove. It is an exception to the general rule that the prosecution must prove all matters. However, the accused only need to prove that s/he reasonably believed that NOC was not under his/her care, supervision or authority on the balance of probabilities. In other words, s/he must show that it is more likely than not that s/he believed NOC was not under his/her care, supervision or authority and that this belief was reasonable. Unlike the prosecution, s/he does not need to prove this matter beyond reasonable doubt.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct

The seventh element that the prosecution must prove is that [identify relevant activity] in NOC's presence was contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct.

The law says that whether engaging in an activity in the presence of NOC is contrary to community standards depends on the circumstances, and that this includes the purpose of the activity and whether NOA seeks or gets sexual arousal or sexual gratification from engaging in the activity or from NOC's presence.

The law also says that whether NOC consented to NOA [identify relevant activity] or whether NOC consented to being present when NOA [identify relevant activity] are not relevant to whether [identify relevant activity] in NOC's presence was contrary to community standards. Similarly, whether NOA believed that NOC consented to NOA [identify relevant activity] or whether NOA believed that NOC consented to being present when NOA [identify relevant activity] are not relevant to this element.

[Refer to relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

Defences

Reasonable belief as to age

[If the accused relies on the belief in age defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 49X, add the following shaded section.]

For this offence, the law recognises a defence which may be termed "reasonable belief in age".

This defence is available if the accused had a reasonable belief that at the time of the activity, the complainant was 18 years of age or more.

Unlike the elements of the offence, this is a matter which the accused must prove. It is an exception to the general rule that the prosecution must prove all matters. However, the accused only need to prove that s/he reasonably believed that NOC was aged 18 or more on the balance of probabilities. In other words, s/he must show that it is more likely than not that s/he believed that NOC was aged 18 or more and that this belief was reasonable. Unlike the prosecution, s/he does not need to prove this matter beyond reasonable doubt.

Marriage or domestic partnership

[If the accused relies on the domestic partnership defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 49Y, add the following shaded section.]

For this offence, the law recognises a defence which may be termed "domestic partnership".

There are three parts to the defence.

First, NOA must be no more than 5 years older than NOC. This applies here.

Second, NOA must be NOC's domestic partner. The law recognises that two people are in a domestic partnership if they are not married but are living as a couple on a genuine domestic basis.

To decide whether two people are domestic partners, you must consider all the circumstances of the relationship, including [add the following factors from Relationships Act 2008 s 35(2), as relevant:

(a) the degree of mutual commitment to a shared life;

(b) the duration of the relationship;

(c) the nature and extent of common residence;

(d) whether or not a sexual relationship exists;

(e) the degree of financial dependence or interdependence, and any arrangements for financial support, between the parties;

(f) the ownership, use and acquisition of property;

(g) the care and support of children;

(h) the reputation and public aspects of the relationship.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Third, the domestic partnership must have started before NOC came under NOA's care, supervision or authority.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Remember, while I called this a defence, it is the prosecution's role to prove guilt. This means that the prosecution must show that this defence of domestic partnership does not apply. In other words, you cannot find NOA guilty unless the prosecution can prove beyond reasonable doubt either that NOA was not NOC's domestic partner, or that the domestic partnership started after NOC came under NOA's care, supervision or authority.

Reasonable belief as to marriage or domestic partnership

[If the accused relies on the reasonable belief in domestic partnership defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 49Z, add the following shaded section.]

For this offence, the law recognises a defence which may be termed "reasonable belief in domestic partnership".[736]

There are three parts to this defence.

First, NOA must be no more than 5 years older than NOC. This applies here.

Second, NOA must have reasonably believed that s/he was in a domestic partnership with NOC.

The law recognises that two people are in a domestic partnership if they are not married but are living

[736] Section 49Z also creates a reasonable belief in marriage defence. If the accused relies on this defence the directions must be modified accordingly.

as a couple on a genuine domestic basis.[737]

To decide whether two people are domestic partners, you must consider all the circumstances of the relationship, including [add the following factors from Relationships Act 2008 s 35(2), as relevant:

(a) the degree of mutual commitment to a shared life;

(b) the duration of the relationship;

(c) the nature and extent of common residence;

(d) whether or not a sexual relationship exists;

(e) the degree of financial dependence or interdependence, and any arrangements for financial support, between the parties;

(f) the ownership, use and acquisition of property;

(g) the care and support of children;

(h) the reputation and public aspects of the relationship.

Third, NOA must have reasonably believed that this domestic partnership started before NOC came under his/her care, supervision or authority.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Unlike the elements of the offence, the accused must prove these matters. It is an exception to the general rule that the prosecution must prove all matters. However, the accused only need to prove that s/he reasonably believed that s/he was in a domestic partnership with NOC which started before NOC came under his/her care, supervision or authority on the balance of probabilities. In other words, s/he must show that it is more likely than not that s/he believed that s/he was in a domestic partnership with NOC which started before NOC came under his/her care, supervision or authority and that this belief was reasonable. Unlike the prosecution, s/he does not need to prove this matter beyond reasonable doubt.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of sexual activity in the presence of a child aged 16 or 17, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

- One – the accused intentionally engaged in an activity.
- Two – the activity was sexual.
- Three – NOC was present during that activity.
- Four – NOA knew that NOC was or probably was present during that activity.
- Five – NOC was a child aged 16 or 17 years.
- Six – NOC was under NOA's care, supervision or authority.

---

[737] Section 35 defines a domestic partner also as a person who is in a registered domestic relationship with the person. If the accused relies on this limb of the definition the directions must be modified accordingly.

- Seven – Engaging in the activity in the presence of NOC is contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual activity in the presence of a child aged 16 or 17.

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.22.2 Checklist: Sexual Activity in Presence of a Child Aged 16 or 17 under Care, Supervision or Authority (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Seven elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally engaged in an activity; and

2. The activity was sexual; and

3. The complainant was present during that activity; and

4. The accused knew that the complainant was or probably was present during that activity; and

5. The complainant was under the age of 16; and

6. The complainant was under the accused's care, supervision or authority; and

7. Engaging in the activity in the presence of the complainant was contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct.

Intentional activity

1. Did the accused intentionally [identify relevant activity]?

If Yes then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Activity in presence of a child aged 16 or 17

Sexual activity

2. Is [identify relevant activity] a sexual activity?

Consider – An activity may be sexual because of the area of body involved, the fact that the person doing it seeks or gets sexual arousal or gratification from the activity, or any other reason.

If Yes then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Activity in presence of a child aged 16 or 17

Presence of complainant

3. Was NOC present when NOA [identify relevant activity]?

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Activity in presence of a child aged 16 or 17

Accused knew that complainant present

4. Did NOA know that NOC was or probably was present when s/he [identify relevant activity]?

If Yes then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Activity in presence of a child aged 16 or 17

Complainant under the age of 16

5. At the time of the act, was NOC under the age of 16?

If Yes then go to 6

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Activity in presence of a child aged 16 or 17

Care, supervision or authority

6. At the time of the activity, was NOC under NOA's care, supervision or authority?

If Yes then go to 7

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Activity in presence of a child aged 16 or 17

Contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct

7. Is it contrary to community standards of acceptable conduct for NOA to [identify relevant activity] in the presence of NOC?

Consider – Relevant matters include the purpose of the activity and whether the accused was seeking or got sexual arousal or gratification from engaging in the activity in the presence of the complainant

Consider – Whether NOC consented to being present or the activity or whether NOA believed NOC consented to being present or the activity is not relevant to this element

If Yes then the accused is guilty of Sexual Activity in presence of a child aged 16 or 17 (as long as you also answered Yes to Questions 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Sexual Activity in presence of a child aged 16 or 17

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.23 Persistent Sexual Abuse of a Child (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Commencement information

1. The offence of "persistent sexual abuse of a child under the age of 16" is currently located in Crimes Act 1958 s 49J. This provision was introduced on 1 July 2017.
2. Prior to 1 July 2017, the offence was found in Crimes Act 1958 s 47A.
3. Crimes Act 1958 s 47A commenced operation on 5 August 1991. It was enacted to overcome problems that can arise when a young child, who has been the subject of repeated sexual abuse by the same person over a lengthy period, is unable to identify with any precision the occasions upon which particular sexual acts occurred (R v Macfie [2000] VSCA 173).

4. The provision was amended in 1997. This amendment removed the requirements that:
    - The child have been under the care, supervision or authority of the accused; and
    - The prosecution prove at least three sexual offences of the same kind.
5. The amendment also amended the requirement for particulars. Prior to the amendment, s 47A(3) specified that "it is not necessary to prove the dates or the exact circumstances of the alleged occasions". Under the 1997 amendments, this was replaced with:

    > It is not necessary to prove an act referred to in sub-section (2)(a) or (b) with the same degree of specificity as to date, time, place, circumstances or occasion as would be required if the accused were charged with an offence constituted by that act instead of an offence against sub-section (1).

6. The 1997 modifications commenced operation on 1 January 1998. The removal of the requirement that the child was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused only applies to acts committed on or after that date (Crimes Act 1958 s 587(3)). The removal of the requirement that the sexual offences were of the same kind, and the changes to s 47A(3) concerning the degree of particulars required, apply to all offences where the charge is filed on or after 1 January 1998, regardless of when the offence is alleged to have been committed (Crimes Act 1958 s 587(5)).
7. For the purpose of s 587(3), if an offence is alleged to have been committed between dates, one date before and one date on or after 1 January 1998, the offence should be treated as having been committed before 1 January 1998 (Crimes Act 1958 s 587(4)).
8. Section 47A was further amended on 1 December 2006. These amendments modified the description of the offence, but not its elements. Previously, the offence was called "maintaining a sexual relationship with a child under the age of 16". By the 2006 amendment, the offence was renamed to its current name of "persistent sexual abuse of a child under the age of 16". This "name–change" applies only to offences committed on or after 1 December 2006 (Crimes Act 1958 s 606A). Unless otherwise indicated, references below to the new offence name apply also to the original offence.
9. The section was further amended on 22 October 2014, to remove the requirement that the child was not married to the accused. This applies only to offences committed on or after that date (Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences and Other Matters) Act 2014 s 5).
10. On 1 July 2017 the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Act 2016 commenced operation. This Act repealed section 47A and replaced it with the offence in section 49J.
11. This topic describes the elements of both the former section 47A offence and the current section 49J offence.

The elements – Pre 1 July 2017

12. Prior to 1 July 2017, persistent sexual abuse of child under the age of 16 has the following two elements:

    i) On at least three occasions the accused committed acts which would constitute an offence under a provision of Subdivisions 8A, 8B or 8C of the Crimes Act;

    ii) These acts were committed against a child who was under the age of 16 at the time.

13. For offences alleged to have been committed prior to 22 October 2014, there is a third element:

    iii) The accused was not married to the child at the relevant time.

14. The offences specified in Subdivisions 8A, 8B or 8C are:
    - Rape (s 38);
    - Indecent Assault (s 39);

- Assault with Intent to Rape (s 40);
- Incest (s 44);
- Sexual Penetration of a Child Under 16 (s 45);
- Indecent Act with a Child Under 16 (s 47);
- Sexual Penetration of a 16 or 17 Year Old Child (s 48);
- Indecent Act with a 16 or 17 Year Old Child (s 49); and
- Facilitating Sexual Offences Against Children (s 49A).

15. Prior to 1 December 2006 s 47A(1) stated that a person who "maintains a sexual relationship" with a child is guilty of an offence. However, the actus reus of the offence was never the maintenance of a sexual relationship with a child. It has always been (in this respect) the commission of the acts outlined above (KBT v R (1997) CLR 417; KRM v R (2001) 206 CLR 221; R v GJB (2002) 4 VR 355).

16. It is therefore not necessary for the prosecution to prove that there was a "relationship" between the accused and the child; that the relationship was a sexual one; that the relationship was "maintained" over a period of time; or that the accused intended that the sexual behaviour would be ongoing. The prosecution merely needs to prove the commission of offences of the specified type on at least three occasions (R v KRM (1999) 105 A Crim R 437; R v Macfie [2000] VSCA 173; R v Sobevski (2004) 150 A Crim R 355).

The elements – Post 1 July 2017

17. Under section 49J(1), the offence consists of two elements:

    (a) A sexually abuses another person (B) on at least 3 occasions during a particular period; and

    (b) B is a child under the age of 16 years during the whole of that period.

18. The term "sexually abuses" is defined in s 49J(5) as conduct that would involve the commission by A of any of the following–

    (a) An offence against a provision of Subdivision (8A) (rape, sexual assault and associated sexual offences);

    (b) An offence against section 49A(1) (sexual penetration of a child under the age of 12);

    (c) An offence against section 49B(1) (sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16);

    (d) An offence against section 49D(1) (sexual assault of a child under the age of 16);

    (e) An offence against section 49F(1) (sexual activity in the presence of a child under the age of 16);

    (f) An offence against section 49H(1) (causing a child under the age of 16 to be present during sexual activity);

    (g) An offence against a provision of Subdivision (8C) (incest).

19. The effect of this revised list is to:

    - update the list to include newly defined offences such as causing a child under 16 to be present during sexual activity;
    - remove the superfluous references to sexual offences against children aged 16 or 17 from the list of notionally available offences; and
    - remove the facilitation offence (now located in s 49S) from the list of included offences.

20. The new definition of the offence also states in clearer language that the child must be under the age of 16 for the whole of the period of the offending. Otherwise, the principles established in relation to the old Crimes Act 1958 s 47A offence continue to apply to the operation of the new s 49J.

Proof of at least three acts

21. The prosecution must prove that on at least three occasions while the complainant was under the age of 16 the accused committed acts of the relevant kind (ss 47A(2), 49J(1)).

22. It is no longer necessary that the acts committed be of a similar nature or constitute an offence under the same provision (ss 47A(2A), 49J(3)). It is therefore possible for a jury to convict an accused if, for example, they find that the accused sexually or indecently assaulted a child on one occasion, sexually penetrated them on another, and committed an indecent act with them (or engaged in sexual activity in their presence) on a third occasion.

23. It is not necessary to prove these acts "with the same degree of specificity as to date, time, place, circumstances or occasion" as would be required if the accused were charged with other offences constituted by those acts (ss 47A(3), 49J(4)).

24. While ss 47A(3) and 49J(4) reduces the specificity with which the relevant acts must be proved, they do not detract from the need to prove the actual commission of acts which constitute the specified sexual offences on at least three occasions.

25. The precise effect of the High Court's decision in Hamra v R [2017] HCA 38 on this requirement remains uncertain.

Pre-Hamra position

26. Prior to Hamra, courts held that the charge cannot be proved by a blanket assertion that on three or more occasions the accused committed one of the specified offences against the complainant (KBT v R (1997) CLR 417; KRM v R (2001) 206 CLR 221; R v SLJ (2010) 24 VR 372; REE v R [2010] VSCA 124).

27. The prosecution must therefore still prove the circumstances or occurrences surrounding each of the acts in sufficient detail to identify each "occasion" (R v SLJ (2010) 24 VR 372; REE v R [2010] VSCA 124; R v Sobevski (2004) 150 A Crim R 355; KRM v R (2001) 206 CLR 221 (McHugh and Kirby JJ, cf. Hayne J)).

28. As this issue is so fundamental, the prosecution should clearly identify the evidence to be relied upon to prove the three occasions well ahead of the trial (REE v R [2010] VSCA 124).

29. Reference to circumstances or occurrences happening at a particular time is the usual way of describing an "occasion" (KRM v R (2001) 206 CLR 221 (McHugh and Kirby JJ); R v SLJ (2010) 24 VR 372).

30. The critical question is not whether acts of the kind alleged would, if proved to have occurred, have constituted three or more of the relevant types of sexual offence. The question is whether the evidence in question proves, beyond reasonable doubt, that the applicant had on three occasions – identified with "some specificity" – done an act which constituted a relevant sexual offence (R v SLJ (2010) 24 VR 372; REE v R [2010] VSCA 124).

31. Repeated references to what the accused "would always" or "would normally" do, in which the complainant is giving an account of what typically or routinely occurred, will not be sufficient. There must be something that distinguishes one occasion from another (R v SLJ (2010) 24 VR 372).

32. Where many occasions of sexual offending have been alleged, it is not sufficient for the prosecution to identify a first and a last occasion with specificity, and identify the third occasion as being "the next occasion after the first". All three occasions must be identified with specificity (REE v R [2010] VSCA 124).

33. If the prosecution cannot give particulars sufficient to identify each of the three occasions relied on to constitute the charge, in the absence of some special factor the proper course will be to stay the proceedings on this charge (KRM v R (2001) 206 CLR 221 (McHugh J)).

Effect of Hamra

34. Hamra v R [2017] HCA 38 concerned the South Australian equivalent to s 49J, which requires proof of two or more acts which constitute a specified offence, separated by at least three days. In the course of the judgment, the Court held that:

    - A jury could infer using deductive reasoning that the necessary number of acts and period of time where the complainant gave evidence of sexual exploitation every day over a two week period, or every weekend over a two month period, without identifying particular occasions (at [28], [46])
    - The Act does not always require evidence which allows acts of sexual exploitation to be delineated by reference to differentiating circumstances (at [45]).

35. The conclusion that a jury could find the offence proved if satisfied that relevant offences were committed every weekend for a period of two months without differentiating the particular occasions is difficult to reconcile with the principles outlined in R v SLJ (2010) 24 VR 372 and REE v R [2010] VSCA 124 that the occasions of each offence must be sufficiently specified.

36. Because the matter was not argued, it is not known whether s 49J is relevantly similar to s 50 of the Criminal Law Consolidation Act 1935 (SA) such that previous Victorian decisions on ss 47A and 49J have been qualified or overruled.

37. In the South Australian Court of Criminal Appeal, Kourakis CJ had noted that the Victorian provision refers to "occasions", whereas the South Australian provision contemplates that it may not be possible to particularise an occasion sufficiently (R v Hamra (2016) 126 SASR 374, [35]). However, this passage was not considered or referred to by the High Court and neither was the earlier High Court decision KRM v R (2001) 206 CLR 221, which had considered the Victorian provision.

38. In obiter remarks made in an appeal against sentence for incest decided after Hamra, the Court of Appeal stated the Victoria offence requires proof of three distinct occasions and that a complainant cannot give evidence of what would typically or routinely occur (McCray v R [2017] VSCA 340, [28]).

39. Judges should therefore be circumspect about the possible relevance of Hamra to this offence and the prudent course is to treat Hamra as irrelevant to the Victorian legislation.

Extended unanimity requirement

40. Where there is evidence a relevant offence was committed on more than three occasions, it will be necessary to direct the jury specifically about the way in which the requirement for unanimity works in this context. In such a case, it is not sufficient for the jury simply to agree that a relevant offence was committed on at least three occasions. They must be in agreement about the three occasions on which a relevant offence was committed. This is known as the requirement for 'extended unanimity' (KBT v R (1997) CLR 417; R v KRM (1999) 105 A Crim R 437; R v Sobevski (2004) 150 A Crim R 355; REE v R [2010] VSCA 124; Chiro v R [2017] HCA 37).

41. Similarly, if there is evidence that more than one relevant offence was committed on any of the alleged occasions, the jury will need to agree about which of those offences the accused committed, rather than simply agreeing that the accused committed a relevant offence on three or more occasions (KBT v R (1997) CLR 417; R v KRM (1999) 105 A Crim R 437; R v Sobevski (2004) 150 A Crim R 355).

42. It is therefore necessary for a judge to make clear to the jury that:

    - They have to be agreed about the occasions on which the accused committed a relevant offence; and

- They have to be agreed about the offences committed on those occasions.

43. The judge should also make clear which alleged acts and occasions the prosecution relies on to prove the offence (R v Sobevski (2004) 150 A Crim R 355).

44. In relation to similar South Australian legislation, the High Court has held that in the event of a guilty verdict, the judge should usually ask the jury to specify which of the particularised offences have been proved beyond reasonable doubt. This unusual process is a consequence of the extended unanimity requirement and the fact that the actus reus of this offence is the commission of other offences (Chiro v R [2017] HCA 37, [37]–[45], [65]–[67]).

45. This process of asking the jury to specify the occasions which they found proved does not involve the jury returning a special verdict. A special verdict would involve the jury making pure findings of fact concerning proof of individual occasions, which the court would convert to a general verdict. In contrast, under the process discussed in Chiro, the jury returns a general verdict of guilty, and is only expected to specify which occasions were proved after they return that verdict (see Chiro v R [2017] HCA 37, [29], [32).

46. Without information from the jury on the nature of its verdict, a judge must sentence on the basis that the jury had convicted the accused of the minimum number of the least serious offences which the prosecution alleged (Chiro v R [2017] HCA 37, [52]–[53]).

47. A jury should therefore be informed during directions that they will be asked to identify the occasions proved (Chiro v R [2017] HCA 37, [47], [49]).

48. As a matter of practice, the judge should provide the jury with a list of the possible occasions in writing, and invite the jury to specify the proved occasions in writing using that list. A template for providing a list of occasions is provided at 7.3.23.9 Jury handout: Identifying occasions for persistent sexual abuse of a child under 16.

49. A jury cannot be compelled to provide this information, or continue to deliberate to identify additional proved occasions after reaching the minimum necessary to give a verdict (Chiro v R [2017] HCA 37, [49], [51]). However, the judge should inform the jury that the information sought will help the judge give effect to the jury's verdict.

Alternative Offences

50. Sections 47A(5) and 49J(7) specifically provide that where a jury is not satisfied of the persistent sexual abuse offence but is satisfied that the accused engaged in conduct during the qualifying period that constitutes one or more qualifying offences, then the jury must find the accused not guilty of the persistent sexual abuse offence and may find the accused guilty of one or more instances of a qualifying offence (Crimes Act 1958 ss 47A(5), 49J(7)).

51. Where the prosecution alleges that the accused committed an offence against s 47A or s 49J, and further alleges that, during the same period, s/he committed specific qualifying offences, the specific qualifying offences averred must be treated as particulars of, and alternatives to, the offence of persistent sexual abuse. A person must not be convicted of both an offence against s 47A or s 49J and the specific offences which are relevant to proving that offence (R v GJB (2002) 4 VR 355; R v Sobevski (2004) 150 A Crim R 355).

52. This is because the offence created by ss 47A and 49J subsumes within its requirement of proof of "at least" three relevant acts all of the acts done by the accused in relation to the child during the period of the relationship which are offences of the relevant kind. Every such act committed within the specified period is capable of being relied upon by the prosecution to prove the offence, and must necessarily be an ingredient or particular of that offence (R v GJB (2002) 4 VR 355).

53. The s 47A or s 49J charge must therefore not be confined to some of the acts allegedly committed by the accused during the relevant period, with other acts alleged to have been committed by the accused during that period charged as substantive offences punishable independently (R v GJB (2002) 4 VR 355; R v RNT [2009] VSCA 137).

54. This does not mean that the offences that the prosecution relies upon to establish a count of persistent sexual abuse cannot be charged separately. It merely means that when charged separately, such counts must be regarded as alternatives to the more general s 47A or s 49J charge, of which they can be seen to be particulars (R v Menta [2004] VSCA 57. See also ss 47A(5) and 49J(7)).

Other Directions and Warnings

55. The fact that it is possible for the jury to convict on the basis of acts which have not been specified with a high degree of particularity creates the potential for unfairness to the accused, who may find it difficult to defend against the allegations. It is therefore important that the trial judge's summing-up include whatever directions are necessary to ensure that the accused's trial is fair (KRM v R (2001) 206 CLR 221 (Kirby J); R v Kemp (No.2) [1998] 2 Qd R 510).
56. This may include addressing the special risk of unfairness that arises from the generalised nature of the allegations, and the difficulties confronting an accused person in meeting such allegations (KRM v R (2001) 206 CLR 221 (Gummow and Callinan JJ); R v Kemp (No.2) [1998] 2 Qd R 510).
57. Consideration should also be given to the need to give a direction about other misconduct evidence (see, e.g. KRM v R (2001) 206 CLR 221; R v J (No 2) [1998] 3 VR 602 at 642–3. See also Tendency Evidence and Other Forms of Other Misconduct Evidence).

Director's Consent

58. A prosecution for an offence under s 47A or s 49J must not be commenced without the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions (ss 47A(7), 49J(9)).
59. It is usual for the prosecutor to advise the court before the case begins that the Director's consent has been obtained and is available in court (in the prosecution file).

Last updated: 30 November 2017

7.3.23.1 Charge: Persistent Sexual Abuse of a Child (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of persistent sexual abuse of a child under 16. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 2 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the complainant, NOC, was under the age of 16 between [insert dates alleged in the count]. In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was under 16 during this period.[738]

Two – on at least three occasions between [insert dates alleged in the count] the accused committed the offence[s] of [insert relevant offences] in relation to the complainant.[739] I will explain the meaning of [this offence/these offences] in a moment.

[738] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[739] The offences that can establish a count of persistent sexual abuse of a child under 16 are offences against a provision of Subdivision (8A) (rape, sexual assault and associated sexual offences), sexual penetration of a child under 12 (s 49A(1)), sexual penetration of a child under 16 (s 49B(1)), sexual assault of a child under 16 (s 49D(1)), sexual activity in the presence of a child under 16 (s 49F(1)), causing a child under 16 to be present during sexual activity (s 49H(1)), incest (Subdivision (8C)).

It is the commission of [this offence/these offences] on at least three occasions that constitutes the "persistent sexual abuse" referred to in the name of this offence. NOA will therefore be guilty of this offence if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that on at least three occasions during the relevant period, [he/she] committed [this offence/these offences] in relation to a child under the age of 16.

[If different types of offences have been alleged, add the following shaded section.]

The offences do not have to be of the same type. That is, you do not need to find that the accused committed three acts of [insert one relevant offence] or three acts of [insert another relevant offence] for this element to be met. The element will be satisfied if, on at least three occasions, the accused committed any of the relevant offences – for example, [insert one relevant offence] on one occasion, and [insert another relevant offence] on two other occasions.

Elements of the constituting offence[s]

[Insert elements of the relevant offence[s] and apply to the facts in issue.]

Specificity of "occasions"

This offence is a little unusual. Ordinarily, the prosecution will need to provide specific details of the offence alleged, such as when and where it took place. However, the law says that this is not necessary in relation to the offence of persistent sexual abuse of a child under 16.

This does not mean that you can convict the accused simply because you believe that, on at least three occasions between [insert dates], they committed [insert relevant offences]. The prosecution must still prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that there were three separate occasions on which NOA committed such an offence, even if they cannot provide precise details about those occasions.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that the offences occurred on the following occasions: [insert details of the occasions alleged to provide the basis of the offence].

Special Directions

[Insert any directions or warnings necessary in accordance with Jury Directions Act 2015 Part 3.]

Need for Unanimity

The need for a specific direction[740] about the requirement for unanimity in the context of this offence, and the content of that direction, will depend on the number of occasions and the number of offences raised by the evidence in the case. Four possible situations may arise:

i) There is evidence that relevant offences were committed on only three occasions, and for each of those occasions there is evidence of only one relevant offence having been committed;

ii) There is evidence that relevant offences were committed on only three occasions, but there is evidence that on one [or more] of those occasions more than one relevant offence was committed;

[740] Note that a general direction about the requirement for unanimity will always be required. See Unanimous and Majority Verdicts.

iii) There is evidence that relevant offences were committed on more than three occasions, but on each of those occasions there is evidence of only one offence having been committed; and

iv) There is evidence that relevant offences were committed on more than three occasions, and there is evidence that on one [or more] of these occasions more than one relevant offence was committed.

There is no need for a specific unanimity direction in relation to the first situation (although a general direction about unanimity will still be required), but a direction will be necessary for each of the other circumstances. The appropriate direction should be selected from the shaded sections below.

[If there is evidence that relevant offences were committed on only three occasions, but there is evidence that on one [or more] of those occasions more than one relevant offence was committed, add the following shaded section.]

I have told you that for this second element to be met, you must be satisfied that, on at least three occasions, the accused committed [insert relevant offences]. In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA committed a number of offences on [one of/some of/each of] those three occasions. [Outline the alleged offences.]

You do not need to find that the accused committed all of these offences. This element will be satisfied even if you determine that NOA committed just one offence on three separate occasions.

However, you must all be in agreement about the three offences committed by NOA. It is not, for example, sufficient for some of you to decide that on [insert occasion] [he/she] committed [insert offence], and for others to decide that on that occasion [he/she] committed [insert different offence].

For this second element to be met, you must all be in agreement about the offence or offences committed on each of the three alleged occasions.

If you find NOA guilty of this offence, I will ask you, after you deliver your verdict, to tell the court which offences you found proved on each occasion. To help you with this, my associate has given you a document that lists the offences alleged. For each offence, please select "proved" or "not proved", depending on what you all agree has been proved beyond reasonable doubt. This will help the court to give effect to your verdict. I will only ask for this document if you find NOA guilty of this offence.

[If there is evidence that relevant offences were committed on more than three occasions, but on each of those occasions there is evidence of only one offence having been committed, add the following shaded section.]

I have told you that for this second element to be met, you must be satisfied that, on at least three occasions, the accused committed [insert relevant offences]. In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA committed such an offence on more than three occasions. [Outline the alleged occasions.]

You do not need to find that the accused committed offences on all of these occasions. This element will be satisfied even if you determine that NOA committed [insert relevant offences] on only three of those occasions.

However, you must all be in agreement about the occasions on which NOA committed such an offence. It is not sufficient for some of you to decide that [he/she] committed an offence on three particular occasions, such as [insert examples from evidence], while others determine that [he/she] committed an offence on a different three occasions, such as [insert examples from evidence].

For this second element to be met, you must all be in agreement that NOA committed [insert relevant offences] on the same three occasions.

If you find NOA guilty of this offence, I will ask you, after you deliver your verdict, to tell the court which offences you found proved. To help you with this, my associate has given you a document that lists the occasions alleged. For each offence, please select "proved" or "not proved", depending on what you all agree has been proved beyond reasonable doubt. This will help the court to give effect to your verdict. I will only ask for this document if you find NOA guilty of this offence.

[If there is evidence that relevant offences were committed on more than three occasions, and there is evidence that on one [or more] of these occasions more than one relevant offence was committed, add the following shaded section.]

I have told you that for this second element to be met, you must be satisfied that, on at least three occasions, the accused committed [insert relevant offences]. In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA committed such an offence on more than three occasions. [Outline the alleged occasions.]

You do not need to find that the accused committed offences on all of these occasions. This element will be satisfied even if you determine that NOA committed [insert relevant offences] on only three of those occasions.

However, you must all be in agreement about the occasions on which NOA committed such an offence. It is not sufficient for some of you to decide that [he/she] committed an offence on three particular occasions, such as [insert examples from evidence], while others determine that [he/she] committed an offence on a different three occasions, such as [insert examples from evidence].

The prosecution also alleged that NOA committed a number of offences on [one of/some of/each of] those occasions. [Outline the alleged offences.]

Again, you do not need to find that the accused committed all of these offences. This element will be satisfied even if you determine that NOA committed just one offence on three separate occasions.

However, you must also all be in agreement about the three offences committed by the NOA. It is not, for example, sufficient for some of you to decide that on [insert occasion] [he/she] committed [insert offence], and for others to decide that on that occasion [he/she] committed [insert different offence].

So for this second element to be met, you must all be in agreement about the three occasions on which NOA committed [insert relevant offences], and you must also be in agreement about the offence [he/she] committed on those occasions.

If you find NOA guilty of this offence, I will ask you, after you deliver your verdict, to tell the court which offences you found proved on each occasion. To help you with this, my associate has given you a document that lists the offences and occasions alleged. For each offence, please select "proved" or "not proved", depending on what you all agree has been proved beyond reasonable doubt. This will help the court to give effect to your verdict. I will only ask for this document if you find NOA guilty of this offence.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of persistent sexual abuse of a child under the age of 16, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

- One – that NOC was under the age of 16 between [insert dates alleged in the count]; and
- Two – that on at least three occasions between [insert dates alleged in the count] NOA committed the offence[s] of [insert relevant offences] in relation to the complainant. This requires the prosecution to prove that [insert summary of elements of the relevant offences].

If you find that either of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of persistent sexual abuse of a child under the age of 16.

Last updated: 30 November 2017

7.3.23.2 Checklist: Persistent Sexual Abuse of a Child (From 1/7/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Two elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The complainant was under 16 between [insert relevant dates]; and

2. On at least three occasions between [insert relevant dates], the accused committed the crime[s] of [identify relevant sexual offences] against the complainant.

Age of complainant

1. Was the complainant aged under 16 at [insert relevant dates]?

If yes, then go to 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of persistent sexual abuse of a child

Commission of offence on at least three occasions

2. Did the accused commit the offence[s] of [identify relevant sexual offence(s)] against the complainant on at least three occasions between [insert relevant dates]?

Consider – See separate document for the elements of [identify relevant sexual offence(s)]

If yes, then the accused is guilty of persistent sexual abuse of a child (as long as you also answered yes to question 1

If no, then the accused is not guilty of persistent sexual abuse of a child

Last updated: 1 July 2017

7.3.23.3 Charge: Persistent Sexual Abuse of Child under 16 (22/10/14–30/6/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should only be used for offences alleged to have been committed between 22 October 2014 and 30 June 2017

I must now direct you about the crime of persistent sexual abuse of a child under 16. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 2 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the complainant, NOC, was under the age of 16 between [insert dates alleged in the count]. In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was under 16 during this period.[741]

Two – on at least three occasions between [insert dates alleged in the count] the accused committed the offence[s] of [insert relevant offences] in relation to the complainant.[742] I will explain the meaning of [this offence/these offences] in a moment.

---

[741] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[742] The offences that can establish a count of persistent sexual abuse of a child under 16 are rape (s 38); indecent assault (s 39); assault with intent to rape (s 40); incest (s 44); sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16 (s 45); indecent act with a child under the age of 16 (s 47); sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year old child (s 48); indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child (s 49); and facilitating sexual offences against children (s 49A).

It is the commission of [this offence/these offences] on at least three occasions that constitutes the "persistent sexual abuse" referred to in the name of this offence. NOA will therefore be guilty of this offence if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that on at least three occasions during the relevant period, [he/she] committed [this offence/these offences] in relation to a child under the age of 16.

[If different types of offences have been alleged, add the following shaded section.]

The offences do not have to be of the same type. That is, you do not need to find that the accused committed three acts of [insert one relevant offence] or three acts of [insert another relevant offence] for this element to be met. The element will be satisfied if, on at least three occasions, the accused committed any of the relevant offences – for example, [insert one relevant offence] on one occasion, and [insert another relevant offence] on two other occasions.

Elements of the constituting offence[s]

[Insert elements of the relevant offence[s] and apply to the facts in issue.]

Specificity of "occasions"

This offence is a little unusual. Ordinarily, the prosecution will need to provide specific details of the offence alleged, such as when and where it took place. However, the law says that this is not necessary in relation to the offence of persistent sexual abuse of a child under 16.

This does not mean that you can convict the accused simply because you believe that, on at least three occasions between [insert dates], they committed [insert relevant offences]. The prosecution must still prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that there were three separate occasions on which NOA committed such an offence, even if they cannot provide precise details about those occasions.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that the offences occurred on the following occasions: [insert details of the occasions alleged to provide the basis of the offence].

Special Directions

[Insert any directions or warnings necessary in accordance with Jury Directions Act 2015 Part 3.]

Need for Unanimity

[The need for a specific direction[743] about the requirement for unanimity in the context of this offence, and the content of that direction, will depend on the number of occasions and the number of offences raised by the evidence in the case. Four possible situations may arise:

i) There is evidence that relevant offences were committed on only three occasions, and for each of those occasions there is evidence of only one relevant offence having been committed;

ii) There is evidence that relevant offences were committed on only three occasions, but there is evidence that on one [or more] of those occasions more than one relevant offence was committed;

[743] Note that a general direction about the requirement for unanimity will always be required. See Unanimous and Majority Verdicts.

iii) There is evidence that relevant offences were committed on more than three occasions, but on each of those occasions there is evidence of only one offence having been committed; and

iv) There is evidence that relevant offences were committed on more than three occasions, and there is evidence that on one [or more] of these occasions more than one relevant offence was committed.

There is no need for a specific unanimity direction in relation to the first situation (although a general direction about unanimity will still be required), but a direction will be necessary for each of the other circumstances. The appropriate direction should be selected from the shaded sections below.]

[If there is evidence that relevant offences were committed on only three occasions, but there is evidence that on one [or more] of those occasions more than one relevant offence was committed, add the following shaded section.]

I have told you that for this second element to be met, you must be satisfied that, on at least three occasions, the accused committed [insert relevant offences]. In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA committed a number of offences on [one of/some of/each of] those three occasions. [Outline the alleged offences.]

You do not need to find that the accused committed all of these offences. This element will be satisfied even if you determine that NOA committed just one offence on three separate occasions.

However, you must all be in agreement about the three offences committed by the NOA. It is not, for example, sufficient for some of you to decide that on [insert occasion] [he/she] committed [insert offence], and for others to decide that on that occasion [he/she] committed [insert different offence].

For this third element to be met, you must all be in agreement about the offence or offences committed on each of the three alleged occasions.

If you find NOA guilty of this offence, I will ask you, after you deliver your verdict, to tell the court which offences you found proved on each occasion. To help you with this, my associate has given you a document that lists the offences alleged. For each offence, please select "proved" or "not proved", depending on what you all agree has been proved beyond reasonable doubt. This will help the court to give effect to your verdict. I will only ask for this document if you find NOA guilty of this offence.

[If there is evidence that relevant offences were committed on more than three occasions, but on each of those occasions there is evidence of only one offence having been committed, add the following shaded section.]

I have told you that for this third element to be met, you must be satisfied that, on at least three occasions, the accused committed [insert relevant offences]. In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA committed such an offence on more than three occasions. [Outline the alleged occasions.]

You do not need to find that the accused committed offences on all of these occasions. This element will be satisfied even if you determine that NOA committed [insert relevant offences] on only three of those occasions.

However, you must all be in agreement about the occasions on which NOA committed such an offence. It is not sufficient for some of you to decide that [he/she] committed an offence on three particular occasions, such as [insert examples from evidence], while others determine that [he/she] committed an offence on a different three occasions, such as [insert examples from evidence].

For this third element to be met, you must all be in agreement that NOA committed [insert relevant offences] on the same three occasions.

If you find NOA guilty of this offence, I will ask you, after you deliver your verdict, to tell the court which offences you found proved. To help you with this, my associate has given you a document that lists the occasions alleged. For each offence, please select "proved" or "not proved", depending on what you all agree has been proved beyond reasonable doubt. This will help the court to give effect to your verdict. I will only ask for this document if you find NOA guilty of this offence.

[If there is evidence that relevant offences were committed on more than three occasions, and there is evidence that on one [or more] of these occasions more than one relevant offence was committed, add the following shaded section.]

I have told you that for this third element to be met, you must be satisfied that, on at least three occasions, the accused committed [insert relevant offences]. In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA committed such an offence on more than three occasions. [Outline the alleged occasions.]

You do not need to find that the accused committed offences on all of these occasions. This element will be satisfied even if you determine that NOA committed [insert relevant offences] on only three of those occasions.

However, you must all be in agreement about the occasions on which NOA committed such an offence. It is not sufficient for some of you to decide that [he/she] committed an offence on three particular occasions, such as [insert examples from evidence], while others determine that [he/she] committed an offence on a different three occasions, such as [insert examples from evidence].

The prosecution also alleged that NOA committed a number of offences on [one of/some of/each of] those occasions. [Outline the alleged offences.]

Again, you do not need to find that the accused committed all of these offences. This element will be satisfied even if you determine that NOA committed just one offence on three separate occasions.

However, you must also all be in agreement about the three offences committed by the NOA. It is not, for example, sufficient for some of you to decide that on [insert occasion] [he/she] committed [insert offence], and for others to decide that on that occasion [he/she] committed [insert different offence].

So for this third element to be met, you must all be in agreement about the three occasions on which NOA committed [insert relevant offences], and you must also be in agreement about the offence [he/she] committed on those occasions.

If you find NOA guilty of this offence, I will ask you, after you deliver your verdict, to tell the court which offences you found proved on each occasion. To help you with this, my associate has given you a document that lists the offences and occasions alleged. For each offence, please select "proved" or "not proved", depending on what you all agree has been proved beyond reasonable doubt. This will help the court to give effect to your verdict. I will only ask for this document if you find NOA guilty of this offence.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of persistent sexual abuse of a child under the age of 16, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

- One – that NOC was under the age of 16 between [insert dates alleged in the count]; and
- Two – that on at least three occasions between [insert dates alleged in the count] NOA committed the offence[s] of [insert relevant offences] in relation to the complainant. This requires the prosecution to prove that [insert summary of elements of the relevant offences].

If you find that either of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of persistent sexual abuse of a child under the age of 16.

Last updated: 30 November 2017

7.3.23.4 Checklist: Persistent Sexual Abuse of a Child under 16 (22/10/14–30/6/17)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Two elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The complainant was under 16 between [insert relevant dates]; and

2. On at least three occasions between [insert relevant dates], the accused committed the crime[s] of [identify relevant sexual offences] against the complainant.

Age of complainant

1. Was the complainant aged under 16 at [insert relevant dates]?

If yes, then go to 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of persistent sexual abuse of a child

Commission of offence on at least three occasions

2. Did the accused commit the offence[s] of [identify relevant sexual offence(s)] against the complainant on at least three occasions between [insert relevant dates]?

Consider – See separate document for the elements of [identify relevant sexual offence(s)]

If yes, then the accused is guilty of persistent sexual abuse of a child (as long as you also answered yes to question 1

If no, then the accused is not guilty of persistent sexual abuse of a child

Last updated: 22 January 2016

7.3.23.5 Charge: Persistent Sexual Abuse of Child under 16 (1/12/06–21/10/14)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should only be used for offences alleged to have been committed between 1 December 2006 and 21 October 2014

I must now direct you about the crime of persistent sexual abuse of a child under 16. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following three elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the complainant, NOC, was under the age of 16 between [insert dates alleged in the count]. In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was under 16 during this period.[744]

Two – the accused and the complainant were not married during this period. Again, there is no dispute that this was the case here.[745]

[744] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[745] If it is alleged that the accused and the complainant were married, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

Three – on at least three occasions between [insert dates alleged in the count] the accused committed the offence[s] of [insert relevant offences] in relation to the complainant.[746] I will explain the meaning of [this offence/these offences] in a moment.

It is the commission of [this offence/these offences] on at least three occasions that constitutes the "persistent sexual abuse" referred to in the name of this offence. NOA will therefore be guilty of this offence if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that on at least three occasions during the relevant period, [he/she] committed [this offence/these offences] in relation to a child under the age of 16 to whom [he/she] was not married.

[If different types of offences have been alleged, add the following shaded section.]

The offences do not have to be of the same type. That is, you do not need to find that the accused committed three acts of [insert one relevant offence] or three acts of [insert another relevant offence] for this element to be met. The element will be satisfied if, on at least three occasions, the accused committed any of the relevant offences – for example, [insert one relevant offence] on one occasion, and [insert another relevant offence] on two other occasions.

Elements of the constituting offence[s]

[Insert elements of the relevant offence[s] and apply to the facts in issue.]

Specificity of "occasions"

This offence is a little unusual. Ordinarily, the prosecution will need to provide specific details of the offence alleged, such as when and where it took place. However, the law says that this is not necessary in relation to the offence of persistent sexual abuse of a child under 16.

This does not mean that you can convict the accused simply because you believe that, on at least three occasions between [insert dates], they committed [insert relevant offences]. The prosecution must still prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that there were three separate occasions on which NOA committed such an offence, even if they cannot provide precise details about those occasions.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that the offences occurred on the following occasions: [insert details of the occasions alleged to provide the basis of the offence].

Special Directions

[Insert any directions or warnings necessary to ensure a fair trial, e.g. a warning about tendency reasoning or another misconduct evidence direction.]

---

[746] The offences that can establish a count of persistent sexual abuse of a child under 16 are: rape (s 38); indecent assault (s 39); assault with intent to rape (s 40); incest (s 44); sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16 (s 45); indecent act with a child under the age of 16 (s 47); sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year old child (s 48); indecent act with a 16 or 17 year old child (s 49); and facilitating sexual offences against children (s 49A).

Need for Unanimity

[The need for a specific direction[747] about the requirement for unanimity in the context of this offence, and the content of that direction, will depend on the number of occasions and the number of offences raised by the evidence in the case. Four possible situations may arise:

i) There is evidence that relevant offences were committed on only three occasions, and for each of those occasions there is evidence of only one relevant offence having been committed;

ii) There is evidence that relevant offences were committed on only three occasions, but there is evidence that on one [or more] of those occasions more than one relevant offence was committed;

iii) There is evidence that relevant offences were committed on more than three occasions, but on each of those occasions there is evidence of only one offence having been committed; and

iv) There is evidence that relevant offences were committed on more than three occasions, and there is evidence that on one [or more] of these occasions more than one relevant offence was committed.

There is no need for a specific unanimity direction in relation to the first situation (although a general direction about unanimity will still be required), but a direction will be necessary for each of the other circumstances. The appropriate direction should be selected from the shaded sections below.]

[If there is evidence that relevant offences were committed on only three occasions, but there is evidence that on one [or more] of those occasions more than one relevant offence was committed, add the following shaded section.]

I have told you that for this third element to be met, you must be satisfied that, on at least three occasions, the accused committed [insert relevant offences]. In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA committed a number of offences on [one of/some of/each of] those three occasions. [Outline the alleged offences.]

You do not need to find that the accused committed all of these offences. This element will be satisfied even if you determine that NOA committed just one offence on three separate occasions.

However, you must all be in agreement about the three offences committed by the NOA. It is not, for example, sufficient for some of you to decide that on [insert occasion] [he/she] committed [insert offence], and for others to decide that on that occasion [he/she] committed [insert different offence].

For this third element to be met, you must all be in agreement about the offence or offences committed on each of the three alleged occasions.

If you find NOA guilty of this offence, I will ask you, after you deliver your verdict, to tell the court which offences you found proved on each occasion. To help you with this, my associate has given you a document that lists the offences alleged. For each offence, please select "proved" or "not proved", depending on what you all agree has been proved beyond reasonable doubt. This will help the court to give effect to your verdict. I will only ask for this document if you find NOA guilty of this offence.

[If there is evidence that relevant offences were committed on more than three occasions, but on each of those occasions there is evidence of only one offence having been committed, add the following shaded section.]

I have told you that for this third element to be met, you must be satisfied that, on at least three occasions, the accused committed [insert relevant offences]. In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA committed such an offence on more than three occasions. [Outline the alleged occasions.]

[747] Note that a general direction about the requirement for unanimity will always be required. See Unanimous and Majority Verdicts.

You do not need to find that the accused committed offences on all of these occasions. This element will be satisfied even if you determine that NOA committed [insert relevant offences] on only three of those occasions.

However, you must all be in agreement about the occasions on which NOA committed such an offence. It is not sufficient for some of you to decide that [he/she] committed an offence on three particular occasions, such as [insert examples from evidence], while others determine that [he/she] committed an offence on a different three occasions, such as [insert examples from evidence].

For this third element to be met, you must all be in agreement that NOA committed [insert relevant offences] on the same three occasions.

If you find NOA guilty of this offence, I will ask you, after you deliver your verdict, to tell the court which offences you found proved. To help you with this, my associate has given you a document that lists the occasions alleged. For each offence, please select "proved" or "not proved", depending on what you all agree has been proved beyond reasonable doubt. This will help the court to give effect to your verdict. I will only ask for this document if you find NOA guilty of this offence.

[If there is evidence that relevant offences were committed on more than three occasions, and there is evidence that on one [or more] of these occasions more than one relevant offence was committed, add the following shaded section.]

I have told you that for this third element to be met, you must be satisfied that, on at least three occasions, the accused committed [insert relevant offences]. In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA committed such an offence on more than three occasions. [Outline the alleged occasions.]

You do not need to find that the accused committed offences on all of these occasions. This element will be satisfied even if you determine that NOA committed [insert relevant offences] on only three of those occasions.

However, you must all be in agreement about the occasions on which NOA committed such an offence. It is not sufficient for some of you to decide that [he/she] committed an offence on three particular occasions, such as [insert examples from evidence], while others determine that [he/she] committed an offence on a different three occasions, such as [insert examples from evidence].

The prosecution also alleged that NOA committed a number of offences on [one of/some of/each of] those occasions. [Outline the alleged offences.]

Again, you do not need to find that the accused committed all of these offences. This element will be satisfied even if you determine that NOA committed just one offence on three separate occasions.

However, you must also all be in agreement about the three offences committed by the NOA. It is not, for example, sufficient for some of you to decide that on [insert occasion] [he/she] committed [insert offence], and for others to decide that on that occasion [he/she] committed [insert different offence].

So for this third element to be met, you must all be in agreement about the three occasions on which NOA committed [insert relevant offences], and you must also be in agreement about the offence [he/she] committed on those occasions.

If you find NOA guilty of this offence, I will ask you, after you deliver your verdict, to tell the court which offences you found proved on each occasion. To help you with this, my associate has given you a document that lists the offences and occasions alleged. For each offence, please select "proved" or "not proved", depending on what you all agree has been proved beyond reasonable doubt. This will help the court to give effect to your verdict. I will only ask for this document if you find NOA guilty of this offence.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of persistent sexual abuse of a child under the age of 16, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOC was under the age of 16 between [insert dates alleged in the count]; and

Two – that NOA and NOC were not married during this period; and

Three – that on at least three occasions between [insert dates alleged in the count] NOA committed the offence[s] of [insert relevant offences] in relation to the complainant. This requires the prosecution to prove that [insert summary of elements of the relevant offences].

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of persistent sexual abuse of a child under the age of 16.

Last updated: 30 November 2017

7.3.23.6 Checklist: Persistent Sexual Abuse of a Child under 16 (1/12/06–21/10/14)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The complainant was under 16 between [insert relevant dates]; and

2. The accused and the complainant were not married during this period; and

3. On at least three occasions between [insert relevant dates], the accused committed the crime[s] of [identify relevant sexual offences] against the complainant.

Age of complainant

1. Was the complainant aged under 16 at [insert relevant dates]?

If yes, then go to 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of persistent sexual abuse of a child

Complainant and Accused not married

2. Has the prosecution proved that the accused was not married to the complainant during this period?

If yes, then go to 3

If no, then the accused is not guilty of persistent sexual abuse of a child

Commission of offence on at least three occasions

3. Did the accused commit the offence[s] of [identify relevant sexual offence(s)] against the complainant on at least three occasions between [insert relevant dates]?

Consider – See separate document for the elements of [identify relevant sexual offence(s)]

If yes, then the accused is guilty of persistent sexual abuse of a child (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1 and 2)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of persistent sexual abuse of a child

Last updated: 22 January 2016

7.3.23.7 Charge: Maintaining a Sexual Relationship with a Child under 16 (5/8/91–30/11/06)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should only be used for offences alleged to have been committed before 1 December 2006

I must now direct you about the crime of maintaining a sexual relationship with a child under the age of 16. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following three elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the complainant, NOC, was under the age of 16 between [insert dates alleged in the count]. In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was under 16 during this period.[748]

Two – the accused and the complainant were not married during this period. Again, there is no dispute that this was the case here.[749]

Three – on at least three occasions between [insert dates alleged in the count] the accused committed the offence[s] of [insert relevant offences] in relation to the complainant.[750] I will explain the meaning of [this offence/these offences] in a moment.

It is the commission of [this offence/these offences] on at least three occasions that constitutes the "sexual relationship" referred to in the name of this offence. NOA will therefore be guilty of this offence if the prosecution has proved, beyond reasonable doubt, that on at least three occasions during the relevant period, [he/she] committed [this offence/these offences] in relation to a child under the age of 16 to whom [he/she] was not married.

[If different types of offences have been alleged, add the following shaded section.]

The offences do not have to be of the same type. That is, you do not need to find that the accused committed three acts of [insert one relevant offence] or three acts of [insert another relevant offence] for this element to be met. The element will be satisfied if, on at least three occasions, the accused committed any of the relevant offences – for example, [insert one relevant offence] on one occasion, and [insert another relevant offence] on two other occasions.

Elements of the constituting offence[s]

[Insert elements of the relevant offence[s] and apply to the facts in issue.]

---

[748] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[749] If it is alleged that the accused and the complainant were married, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[750] The offences that can establish a count of maintaining a sexual relationship are: rape (s 38); indecent assault (s 39); assault with intent to rape (s 40); incest (s 44); sexual penetration of a child under the age of 16 (s 45); indecent act with a child under the age of 16 (s 47); sexual penetration of a 16 or 17 year old child (s 48); indecent act with a 16 year old child (s 49); and facilitating sexual offences against children (s 49A).

Specificity of "occasions"

This offence is a little unusual. Ordinarily, the prosecution will need to provide specific details of the offence alleged, such as when and where it took place. However, the law says that this is not necessary in relation to the offence of maintaining a sexual relationship with a child under 16.

This does not mean that you can convict the accused simply because you believe that, on at least three occasions between [insert dates], they committed [insert relevant offences]. The prosecution must still prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that there were three separate occasions on which NOA committed such an offence, even if they cannot provide precise details about those occasions.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that the offences occurred on the following occasions: [insert details of the occasions alleged to provide the basis of the offence].

Special Directions

[Insert any directions or warnings necessary to ensure a fair trial, e.g. a warning about tendency reasoning or a relationship or context direction.]

Need for Unanimity

[The need for a specific direction[751] about the requirement for unanimity in the context of this offence, and the content of that direction, will depend on the number of occasions and the number of offences raised by the evidence in the case. Four possible situations may arise:

i) There is evidence that relevant offences were committed on only three occasions, and for each of those occasions there is evidence of only one relevant offence having been committed;

ii) There is evidence that relevant offences were committed on only three occasions, but there is evidence that on one [or more] of those occasions more than one relevant offence was committed;

iii) There is evidence that relevant offences were committed on more than three occasions, but on each of those occasions there is evidence of only one offence having been committed; and

iv) There is evidence that relevant offences were committed on more than three occasions, and there is evidence that on one [or more] of these occasions more than one relevant offence was committed.

There is no need for a specific unanimity direction in relation to the first situation (although a general direction about unanimity will still be required), but a direction will be necessary for each of the other circumstances. The appropriate direction should be selected from the shaded sections below.]

[If there is evidence that relevant offences were committed on only three occasions, but there is evidence that on one [or more] of those occasions more than one relevant offence was committed, add the following shaded section.]

I have told you that for this third element to be met, you must be satisfied that, on at least three occasions, the accused committed [insert relevant offences]. In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA committed a number of offences on [one of/some of/each of] those three occasions. [Outline the alleged offences.]

You do not need to find that the accused committed all of these offences. This element will be satisfied even if you determine that NOA committed just one offence on three separate occasions.

[751] Note that a general direction about the requirement for unanimity will always be required. See Unanimous and Majority Verdicts.

However, you must all be in agreement about the three offences committed by the NOA. It is not, for example, sufficient for some of you to decide that on [insert occasion] [he/she] committed [insert offence], and for others to decide that on that occasion [he/she] committed [insert different offence].

For this third element to be met, you must all be in agreement about the offence or offences committed on each of the three alleged occasions.

If you find NOA guilty of this offence, I will ask you, after you deliver your verdict, to tell the court which offences you found proved on each occasion. To help you with this, my associate has given you a document that lists the offences alleged. For each offence, please select "proved" or "not proved", depending on what you all agree has been proved beyond reasonable doubt. This will help the court to give effect to your verdict. I will only ask for this document if you find NOA guilty of this offence.

[If there is evidence that relevant offences were committed on more than three occasions, but on each of those occasions there is evidence of only one offence having been committed, add the following shaded section.]

I have told you that for this third element to be met, you must be satisfied that, on at least three occasions, the accused committed [insert relevant offences]. In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA committed such an offence on more than three occasions. [Outline the alleged occasions.]

You do not need to find that the accused committed offences on all of these occasions. This element will be satisfied even if you determine that NOA committed [insert relevant offences] on only three of those occasions.

However, you must all be in agreement about the occasions on which NOA committed such an offence. It is not sufficient for some of you to decide that [he/she] committed an offence on three particular occasions, such as [insert examples from evidence], while others determine that [he/she] committed an offence on a different three occasions, such as [insert examples from evidence].

For this third element to be met, you must all be in agreement that NOA committed [insert relevant offences] on the same three occasions.

If you find NOA guilty of this offence, I will ask you, after you deliver your verdict, to tell the court which offences you found proved. To help you with this, my associate has given you a document that lists the occasions alleged. For each offence, please select "proved" or "not proved", depending on what you all agree has been proved beyond reasonable doubt. This will help the court to give effect to your verdict. I will only ask for this document if you find NOA guilty of this offence.

[If there is evidence that relevant offences were committed on more than three occasions, and there is evidence that on one [or more] of these occasions more than one relevant offence was committed, add the following shaded section.]

I have told you that for this third element to be met, you must be satisfied that, on at least three occasions, the accused committed [insert relevant offences]. In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA committed such an offence on more than three occasions. [Outline the alleged occasions.]

You do not need to find that the accused committed offences on all of these occasions. This element will be satisfied even if you determine that NOA committed [insert relevant offences] on only three of those occasions.

However, you must all be in agreement about the occasions on which NOA committed such an offence. It is not sufficient for some of you to decide that [he/she] committed an offence on three particular occasions, such as [insert examples from evidence], while others determine that [he/she] committed an offence on a different three occasions, such as [insert examples from evidence].

The prosecution also alleged that NOA committed a number of offences on [one of/some of/each of] those occasions. [Outline the alleged offences.]

Again, you do not need to find that the accused committed all of these offences. This element will be satisfied even if you determine that NOA committed just one offence on three separate occasions.

However, you must also all be in agreement about the three offences committed by the NOA. It is not, for example, sufficient for some of you to decide that on [insert occasion] [he/she] committed [insert offence], and for others to decide that on that occasion [he/she] committed [insert different offence].

So for this third element to be met, you must all be in agreement about the three occasions on which NOA committed [insert relevant offences], and you must also be in agreement about the offence [he/she] committed on those occasions.

If you find NOA guilty of this offence, I will ask you, after you deliver your verdict, to tell the court which offences you found proved on each occasion. To help you with this, my associate has given you a document that lists the offences and occasions alleged. For each offence, please select "proved" or "not proved", depending on what you all agree has been proved beyond reasonable doubt. This will help the court to give effect to your verdict. I will only ask for this document if you find NOA guilty of this offence.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of maintaining a sexual relationship with a child under the age of 16, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOC was under the age of 16 between [insert dates alleged in the count]; and

Two – that NOA and NOC were not married during this period; and

Three – that on at least three occasions between [insert dates alleged in the count] NOA committed the offence[s] of [insert relevant offences] in relation to the complainant. This requires the prosecution to prove that [insert summary of elements of the relevant offences].

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of maintaining a sexual relationship with a child under the age of 16.

Last updated: 30 November 2017

7.3.23.8 Checklist: Maintaining a Sexual Relationship with a Child under 16 (5/8/91–30/11/06)

Click here for a Word version of this document for adaptation

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The complainant was under 16 between [insert relevant dates]; and

2. The complainant and the accused were not married during this period; and

3. On at least three occasions between [insert relevant dates], the accused committed the crime[s] of [identify relevant sexual offences] against the complaint.

Age of complainant

1. Was the complainant aged under 16 between [insert relevant dates]?

    If Yes, then go to 2

    If No, then the accused is not guilty of maintaining a sexual relationship with a child under 16

Marital status

2. Has the prosecution proved that the accused was not married to the complainant during this period?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of maintaining a sexual relationship with a child under 16

Commission of offence on at least three occasions

3. Did the accused commit the offence[s] of [identify relevant sexual offence(s)] against the complainant on at least three occasions between [insert relevant dates]?

Consider – See separate document for the elements of [identify relevant sexual offence(s)]

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of maintaining a sexual relationship with a child under 16 (as long as you answered yes to questions 1 and 2)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of maintaining a sexual relationship with a child under 16

Last updated: 12 September 2019

7.3.23.9 Jury Handout: Identifying Occasions for Persistent Sexual Abuse of a Child under 16

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Explanation

This chapter contains three document templates for use in cases involving persistent sexual abuse of a child contrary to Crimes Act 1958 s 49J (offences alleged on or after 1 July 2017) or s 47A (offences alleged before 1 July 2017). Judges should select the relevant template based on the number of offences and occasions alleged. The document should be provided to the jury during final directions and explained as a means by which the jury can identify the offences and occasions proved, to help the judge to give effect to the jury's verdict in accordance with the principles in Chiro v R [2017] HCA 37.

In each template, the words in the heading contained in [square brackets] should be removed before the document is given to the jury.

Judges will also need to provide details to identify the occasions and the offences involved, consistent with how the occasions and offences have been identified during the trial.

When giving a majority verdict direction, the judge must make clear that references in the document to unanimity must be replaced with references to a statutory majority of jurors. This can be done either by instructing the jury to amend the document, or by giving the jury a fresh copy of the document that explains what a majority verdict is in the case.

Persistent sexual abuse – Identifying occasions proved [Template One – Three occasions, more than three offences]

Note: You can only find the accused guilty of this offence if you unanimously agree that an offence has been proved under each occasion.

First occasion

[Describe the circumstances of the first occasion]

(a) [Insert details of first offence on first occasion]

O Proved

O Not proved

(b) [Insert details of second offence on first occasion]

O Proved

O Not proved

Second occasion

[Describe the circumstances of the second occasion]

(a) [Insert details of first offence on second occasion]

O Proved

O Not proved

(b) [Insert details of second offence on second occasion]

O Proved

O Not proved

Third occasion

[Describe the circumstances of the third occasion]

(a) [Insert details of first offence on third occasion]

O Proved

O Not proved

(b) [Insert details of second offence on third occasion]

O Proved

O Not proved

Persistent sexual abuse – Identifying occasions proved [Template Two – More than three occasions, one offence per occasion]

Note: You can only find the accused guilty of this offence if you unanimously agree that an offence has been proved on at least three occasions.

First occasion

[Describe the offence alleged on the first occasion]

O Proved

O Not proved

Second occasion

[Describe the offence alleged on the second occasion]

O Proved

O Not proved

Third occasion

[Describe the offence alleged on the third occasion]

O Proved

O Not proved

Fourth occasion

[Describe the offence alleged on the fourth occasion]

O Proved

O Not proved

Fifth occasion

[Describe the offence alleged on the fifth occasion]

O Proved

O Not proved

Persistent sexual abuse – Identifying occasions proved [Template Three – More than three occasions, more than one offence per occasion]

Note: You can only find the accused guilty of this offence if you unanimously agree that at least one offence has been proved on at least three occasions.

First occasion

[Describe the circumstances of the first occasion]

(a) [Insert details of first offence on first occasion]

O Proved

O Not proved

(b) [Insert details of second offence on first occasion]

O Proved

O Not proved

Second occasion

[Describe the circumstances of the second occasion]

(a) [Insert details of first offence on second occasion]

O Proved

O Not proved

(b) [Insert details of second offence on second occasion]

O Proved

O Not proved

Third occasion

[Describe the circumstances of the third occasion]

(a) [Insert details of first offence on third occasion]

O Proved

O Not proved

(b) [Insert details of second offence on third occasion]

O Proved

O Not proved

Fourth occasion

[Describe the circumstances of the fourth occasion]

(a) [Insert details of first offence on fourth occasion]

O Proved

O Not proved

(b) [Insert details of second offence on fourth occasion]

O Proved

O Not proved

Fifth occasion

[Describe the circumstances of the fifth occasion]

(a) [Insert details of first offence on fifth occasion]

O Proved

O Not proved

(b) [Insert details of second offence on fifth occasion]

O Proved

O Not proved

7.3.24 Abduction or Detention of a Child under the Age of 16 for a Sexual Purpose

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. Crimes Act 1958 s 49P creates the offence of 'Abduction or detention of a child under the age of 16 for a sexual purpose'.
2. The offence consists of seven elements:

   i) The accused:

   - Takes away or detains the complainant; or

- Causes the complainant to be taken away or detained by a third party

ii) The complainant is a child under the age of 16

iii) The accused knows that the complainant is, or probably is, a child under the age of 16

iv) The person who has lawful charge of the complainant (P) does not consent to the complainant being taken away or detained

v) The accused knows that P does not consent, or probably does not consent, to the complainant being taken away or detained

vi) The accused intends the complainant will take part in a sexual act with the accused, a third party or both vii) The complainant taking part in the sexual act would involve the commission by the accused, the third party or both of an offence against sections 38(1), 39(1), 40(1), 41(1) or a provision of Subdivision (8B) of Division 1 of Part 1 of the Crimes Act 1958 other than s 49P.[752]

3. As explained in R v Nguyen and Tran [1998] 4 VR 394, 409 and Davis v R [2006] NSWCCA 392, [34]–[38], 'abduction' offences have long existed as a particular form of kidnapping.

Commencement information and previous forms of offence

4. Section 49P was introduced through the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Act 2016, and replaced the previous abduction or detention offence in Crimes Act 1958 s 56. The s 49P form of the offence applies to conduct committed on or after 1 July 2017.

5. There are several differences between the current s 49P form of the offence and the former s 55 form of the offence. These are:

   - Section 49P covers detention of a child (like the general abduction and detention offence in s 55), whereas s 56 only covered taking away
   - Section 49P introduces a fault element concerning the accused's knowledge of the age of the child and that the person with lawful charge does not consent, whereas the previous offence did not require proof of these matters (compare R v Kennedy [1981] VR 565, 567-570)
   - Section 49P applies where the intended conduct is that the complainant 'take part in a sexual act', whereas s 56 was limited to an intention that the child take part in an act of sexual penetration
   - Section 55 required that the act of sexual penetration be outside marriage, whereas s 49P identifies particular offences that the intended sexual act would contravene.

Takes away or detains

6. The accused 'takes away' the complainant when their acts are the effective cause of the complainant accompanying the accused to another place (R v Fetherston [2006] VSCA 278, [55]. See also R v Wellard [1978] 1 WLR 921).

---

[752] Crimes Act 1958 s 49P presents these elements in a different order, by swapping the consent and knowledge of age elements. This Charge Book presents the elements in this order so that the jury considers the accused's state of mind about each fact immediately after considering that fact.

7. The offence is designed to protect vulnerable children, including where they have left home without money or accommodation. A wide scope to 'taking away' is confined by the requirement that the accused held the intention identified in the sixth element at the time of the taking away (R v Fetherston [2006] VSCA 278, [56]).

8. While there must be some movement, there is no strict rule regarding how far the accused must take the complainant from the complainant's previous location. The sufficiency of the distance travelled is a jury question to be decided on the facts of the case (R v Wellard [1978] 1 WLR 921; Davis v The Queen [2006] NSWCCA 392, [33]. See, for a further example, R v Mathe [2003] VSCA 165, where dragging the complainant into a ditch beside a footpath was sufficient for an abduction).

9. The offence is complete at the point when the accused takes away or detains the complainant, provided the other elements existed at that time (see R v Manwaring & Ors [1983] 2 NSWLR 82, 84; R v Pollitt (2007) 97 SASR 332, [107]).

Age of the complainant

10. The prosecution must prove that the complainant was under the age of 16 at the time of the taking away or detaining.

Accused's knowledge of age of complainant

11. The third element is that the accused knew the complainant was, or probably was, a child under the age of 16.

12. As explained above, this was not an element of the previous form of the offence in Crimes Act 1958 s 56.

Absence of consent

13. The fourth element is that the person who had lawful charge of the complainant did not consent to the complainant being taken away or detained.

14. The Crimes Act 1958 does not define who has lawful charge of the complainant. In earlier versions of the offence, the equivalent provisions spoke of the child being taken "out of the possession and against the will of his father, mother or other person having the lawful charge of him" (Crimes Act 1958 s 57, as amended by the Crimes (Sexual Offences) Act 1980). The specific reference to the child's father or mother was removed as part of the overhaul of sexual offences by the Crimes (Sexual Offences) Act 1991.

15. "Lawful charge" can arise where the child is subject to a child protection order, such as a Care by Secretary Order (see, e.g. R v Macfie [2000] VSCA 173, [3]).

16. If the element is in issue, the prosecution will need to establish who had lawful charge of the child, and then show that person did not consent to the child being taken away.

17. For this element, it is not necessary to show that the child was in the custody or possession of the person who had lawful charge of the complainant at the time of the taking away. The offence is therefore capable of applying where the accused takes further steps in relation to a child who has already 'run away from home' (see R v Fetherston [2006] VSCA 278, [50]).

18. As this element is concerned with the consent of the person who had lawful charge of the complainant, the consent of the child is not relevant (see R v Fetherston [2006] VSCA 278, [47]–[54]).

19. As an offence in Subdivision (8B) of Division 1 of Part 1 of the Crimes Act 1958, the definition of consent in Crimes Act 1958 s 36 and the deemed non-consent circumstances in Crimes Act 1958 s 36AA may apply to this element (see Crimes Act 1958 s 35). While several of the provisions in ss 36 and 36AA are limited to consent to sexual acts, some of provisions are capable on their face of applying to non-sexual consent. In such cases, it will be a question of statutory interpretation for the trial judge to determine whether the general language used in s 35 must be read down so that consent, for the purpose of s 49P, carries its ordinary meaning, or whether it carries the ss 36 and 36AA meaning. In undertaking this exercise, it is worth noting that the Explanatory Memorandum to the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Bill 2016, which introduced a new s 36, explicitly mentions s 49P as a provision where consent "continues to be mentioned … in other aspects of offences" (at 9).

20. In R v Kennedy [1981] VR 565 at 569, the Court left open the question whether consent which is given without fraud, but in ignorance of the accused's intended sexual acts, is vitiated. The terms of s 49P(1)(c) refer to proof that the person who has lawful charge of the complainant 'does not consent to [the complainant] being taken away or detained'. There is no reference in the statute to the person with lawful charge of the child knowing about the accused's intention that the complainant take part in a sexual act. It is suggested that under s 49P, consent cannot be vitiated by reference to the accused's ultimate act, as that would be to improperly rewrite the section by adding the words 'so that B can take part in a sexual act with A or another person or both' to s 49P(1)(c).

Accused's knowledge of absence of consent

21. The fifth element is that the accused knew that the person with lawful charge of the complainant did not consent, or probably did not consent, to the complainant being taken away or detained (Crimes Act 1958 s 49P(1)(d)).

22. As explained above, this was not an element of the previous form of the offence in Crimes Act 1958 s 56.

Purpose of accused

23. The sixth element is that the accused intended that the complainant would take part in a sexual act with the accused, a third party, or both.

24. Section 35C identifies that a person 'takes part in a sexual act' when the person is sexually penetrated or sexually touched. See 7.3.2 Rape (From 1/1/92) for information on the meaning of sexual penetration and 7.3.5 Sexual Assault for information on the meaning of sexual touching.

Criminality of intended act

25. The seventh element is that the complainant taking part in the intended sexual act would involve the commission by the accused, the third party or both of an offence against sections 38(1), 39(1), 40(1), 41(1) or a provision of Subdivision (8B) of Division 1 of Part 1 of the Crimes Act 1958 other than s 49P.

26. This element will require the prosecution to identify the intended sexual act, and establish that the intended act, if committed, would constitute one of the specified offences.

27. The judge will then need to direct the jury about the elements of the specified offence, and the jury will need to consider, on a hypothetical basis, whether the accused's intended conduct would have involved the commission of that specified offence.

28. The Explanatory Memorandum to the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Bill 2016, which introduced s 49P, observes at 37 that:

> It will often be difficult (and artificial) to distinguish the precise sexual intention of the accused (i.e. it may not be possible to identify whether the accused intended that the sexual act involve penetration or not). Accordingly, new section 49P applies to both penetrative and non-penetrative sexual acts.

29. It is not clear, however, whether imprecision in the identification of the intended offence raises issues of duplicity or uncertainty. It is hoped that prosecutors will not identify a spread of possible offences which the jury must be directed upon.

Last updated: 4 March 2024

7.3.24.1 Charge: Abduction of a Child under 16 for a Sexual Purpose

Click here to download a Word version of this charge

Note: The offence in s 49P can be committed in several ways which are not reflected in the following charge. The charge will need to be modified if:

1. The prosecution relies on proof that the accused detained (rather than took away) the complainant;

2. The prosecution relies on proof that the accused caused the complainant to be taken away or detained (rather than having taken away or detained the complainant personally)

3. The accused intended that the complainant take part in a sexual act with a third person (rather than with the accused)

I must now direct you about the crime of abduction of a child under 16 for a sexual purpose. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 7 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – The accused took the complainant away.

Two – The complainant was a child under the age of 16.

Three – The accused knew the complainant was, or probably was, a child under the age of 16.

Four – The person who had lawful charge of the complainant did not consent to the complainant being taken away.

Five – The accused knew that the person with lawful charge of the complainant did not, or probably did not, consent to the complainant being taken away.

Six – The accused intended that the complainant would take part in a sexual act with the accused.

Seven – The intended sexual act would involve the crime of [identify relevant crime].

I will now explain each element in more detail.[753]

Abduction

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused took another person away.

This requires the prosecution to prove that NOA took NOC away from where he was/she was/they were to some other place.

[If NOA only took NOC a short distance, add the following shaded section.]

The law does not set a minimum distance that must be travelled before this element may be met. It is a matter for you to decide whether NOA took NOC far enough from where NOC wished to be that you can say the accused took NOC away.

[753] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[Summarise evidence and/or arguments.]

Age of complainant

The second element is that the complainant was a child under the age of 16.

[Refer to relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Knowledge of age of complainant

The third element is that the accused knew the complainant was, or probably was, a child under the age of 16.

This requires you to draw a conclusion about NOA's state of mind at the time he/she/they allegedly took NOC away.

You may take into account what they heard and what they saw.

[Refer to relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Absence of consent of guardian

The fourth element the prosecution must prove is that the person with lawful charge of the complainant did not consent the complainant being taken away.

In this case, the prosecution says that NOP[754] was the person with lawful charge of the complainant. [Refer to evidence on why NOP had lawful charge of the complainant.]

Consent is a state of mind. The law says that consent means free agreement. So the prosecution must prove that NOP did not freely agree to being NOA taking NOC away at the time.

[Where a party requests a direction about the meaning of consent, add one or more of the following shaded paragraphs.]

The law says that a person can consent to something only if they are capable of consenting, and free to choose whether or not to engage in or to allow that act.

The law says that where a person has given their consent to something, they may withdraw that consent before that act happens, or while it is happening.

[Where a party requests a direction about the circumstances in which a person is taken not to have consented, add the following shaded section.]

In some circumstances the law says that a person did not freely agree, or consent, to being taken away. These circumstances include [insert relevant section(s) from the following and apply to the evidence:

> (a) the person does not say or do anything to indicate consent to NOC being taken away;
>
> (b) the person submits to NOA taking NOC away because of force, a fear of force, harm of any type or a fear of harm of any type, whether to that person or someone else or to an animal, regardless of—

[754] Name of Person.

(i) when the force, harm or conduct giving rise to the fear occurs; and

(ii) whether it is, or is a result of, a single incident or is part of an ongoing pattern;

(c) the person submits to NOA taking NOC away because of coercion or intimidation—

(i) regardless of when the coercion or intimidation occurs; and

(ii) whether it is, or is a result of, a single incident or is part of an ongoing pattern;

(d) the person submits to NOA taking NOC away because the person is unlawfully detained;

(e) the person submits to NOA taking NOC away because the person is overborne by the abuse of a relationship of authority or trust;

(f) the person is asleep or unconscious;

(g) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of consenting to NOA taking NOC away;

(h) the person is so affected by alcohol or another drug as to be incapable of withdrawing consent to NOA taking NOC away;

...

(k) the person is mistaken about the identity of any other person involved in the act;

(l) the person mistakenly believes that NOA is taking NOC away for medical or hygienic purposes;

...

(p) having given consent to NOA taking NOC away, the person later withdraws consent, and the accused does not stop taking NOC away.]

If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that one of these circumstances existed in relation to NOP, you must find that he was/she was/they were not consenting.

However, you do not need to consider this question only by reference to these particular circumstances. If you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt on any basis arising from the evidence that the complainant was not consenting to being detained, then this element will be proven.

[Summarise evidence and/or arguments.]

Knowledge of non-consent of guardian

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused knew that NOP did not consent, or probably did not consent, to NOC being taken away.

This requires you to draw a conclusion about NOA's state of mind. You can look at the circumstances of the alleged acts, and what NOA, NOC and NOP said and did at the time.

As with the 4th element, this element is about NOP's consent. It does not matter whether NOA thought that NOC was consenting to being taken away.

[Summarise evidence and/or arguments.]

Intention to take part in a sexual act

The sixth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intended that the complainant would take part in a sexual act with the accused.

This requires the prosecution to prove that the accused intended that NOC would be sexually penetrated or be sexually touched by the accused, or would sexually penetrate or sexually touch the accused.

In this case, the prosecution argues that NOA intended that NOC would [identify relevant act].

I direct you as a matter of law that this is a sexual act for the purpose of the law. If you are satisfied that NOA intended that NOC would [identify relevant act], then you may find this element proved.

[Summarise evidence and/or arguments.]

Intended sexual act a crime

The seventh element is that the intended sexual act with the complainant would involve NOA committing the crime of [identify relevant offence].

[Insert relevant directions on the intended crime. Note that it may not be necessary to direct the jury in detail on all elements of the intended crime, as some may overlap with earlier elements of this offence, especially the 'taking part in a sexual act' and the 'age of complainant' elements. Where that occurs, the judge should explain that the intended offence contains certain elements, but that those elements have already been proved if the jury is satisfied of the relevant equivalent elements for the s 49P offence.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of abduction of a child under 16 for a sexual purpose the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – NOA took the complainant away.

Two – NOC was a child under the age of 16.

Three – NOA knew that NOC was, or probably was, a child under the age of 16.

Four – NOP did not consent to the complainant being taken away.

Five – NOA knew that NOP did not, or probably did not, consent to NOC being taken away.

Six – NOA intended that NOC would take part in a sexual act with the accused.

Seven – The intended sexual act would involve the crime of [identify relevant crime].

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of abduction of a child under 16 for a sexual purpose.

Last updated: 4 March 2024

7.3.25 Sexual Offences against Children (Pre-1/1/92)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. The scope of the various sexual offences against children under the Crimes Act 1958 has changed over time. These can be divided into four discrete periods:
    - Offences committed between 1 April 1959 and 28 February 1981;

- Offences committed between 1 March 1981 and 4 August 1991;
- Offences committed between 5 August 1991 and 31 December 1991; and
- Offences committed on or after 1 January 1992.

2. This topic examines the directions a judge must give when:
    - A person is charged with a sexual offence against a child on or after 1 January 2010; and
    - The offence is alleged to have been committed before 1 January 1992.
3. This topic is divided into three broad areas:
    - Sexual offences against a child under 10;
    - Sexual offences against a child aged between 10 and 16;
    - Sexual offences against a child aged between 16 and 18.

Sexual Offences Against a Child Under 10

Elements

4. There are three elements to the statutory offences concerning children under 10. The prosecution must prove that:

    i) The accused took part in a proscribed sexual act with the complainant;

    ii) The accused intended to take part in a proscribed sexual act; and

    iii) The complainant was under the age of 10 at the time the proscribed sexual act took place (Crimes Act 1958 s 46 (pre 1/3/1981), s 47 (1/3/1981 – 4/8/1991), s 45 (5/8/1991 – 31/12/1991)).

5. Consent has never been a defence to this offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 49 (pre 1/3/1981), s 47 (1/3/1981 – 4/8/1991), s 45 (5/8/1991 – 31/12/1991)).

Taking Part in a Proscribed Act of Sexual Penetration

6. Over time, the nature of the proscribed sexual act has changed:
    - Prior to 1 March 1981, the offence prohibited "unlawful carnal knowledge and abuse" of girls (Crimes Act 1958 s 46);
    - From 1 March 1981 to 4 August 1991, the offence prohibited "taking part in an act of sexual penetration", and that phrase was defined by statute (the first statutory definition);
    - From 5 August 1991 to 31 December 1991, a new statutory definition of "sexual penetration" applied to the offence (the second statutory definition).

Unlawful Carnal Knowledge and Abuse

7. At common law, carnal knowledge only consisted of penetration of a vagina by a penis. Other forms of sexual penetration were dealt with under the offence of indecent assault (see, on similar though not identical legislation, R v McCormack [1969] 2 QB 442).
8. This element was met when there was any penetration of the complainant's labia by the penis (R v Lines (1844) 1 Car & K 393; Randall v R (1991) 53 A Crim R 380; R v DD (2007) 19 VR 143).
9. From 5 August 1991, the Crimes Act 1958 defined vagina to include a surgically constructed vagina. It is unclear whether the common law recognised penetration of an artificially constructed sexual organ as sexual penetration (see R v Cogley [1989] VR 799; R v Harris & McGuiness (1988) 17 NSWLR 158).
10. This element was met by penetration "to any extent". Consequently:

- The penetration only needed to be slight or fleeing; and
- It was not necessary for the prosecution to prove that semen was emitted (see Randall v R (1991) 53 A Crim R 380; Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108; R v Pryor [2001] QCA 341).

11. The meaning of the terms "unlawful" and "abuse" in the phrase "unlawful carnal knowledge and abuse" are not clear.

12. While the term "unlawful" may mean "outside the bounds of marriage", there is also authority indicating that the term is surplusage (compare R v R [1992] 1 AC 599 and R v Champan [1959] 1 QB 100, though neither case concerned the specific Victorian provisions).

13. As a matter of prudence, the charge assumes that the prosecution must prove that the accused and complainant were not married in order to prove "unlawful carnal knowledge and abuse".

14. It is not necessary to use the phrase "carnal knowledge" when directing the jury about this element. The judge may instead use the term "sexual penetration", as long as he or she limits the meaning of that phrase to its common law meaning (R v DD (2007) 19 VR 143).

"Sexual Penetration": The First Definition (1/3/81–4/8/91)

15. From 1 March 1981 to 4 August 1991, the Crimes Act stated that "sexual penetration" was:
    - The introduction (to any extent) of a person's penis into the vagina, anus or mouth of another person of either sex; or
    - The introduction (to any extent) of an object that is not part of the body, and which was manipulated by a person of either sex, into the vagina or anus of another person of either sex, other than as part of some generally accepted medical treatment (Crimes Act 1958 s 2A).

16. This definition removed the gendered nature of the offence, which previously could only be committed by a male against a female. Under this definition:
    - Both males and females can be the victim of the offence; and
    - Both males and females can commit the offence, by using an object that is not part of the body.

17. It is unclear whether this definition uses the medical meaning of "vagina" (being the membranous passage or channel leading from the uterus to the vulva), or whether it should be interpreted in a manner consistent with the common law understanding of "sexual penetration" (which includes penetration of the external genitalia) (compare R v Lines (1844) 1 Car & K 393 and Holland v R (1993) 117 ALR 193. See also Randall v R (1991) 53 A Crim R 380 and R v AG (1997) 129 ACTR 1).[755] In cases where this is relevant, judges will need to engage in a process of statutory construction and will need to consider principles concerning the interpretation of ambiguous penal statutes and the interference with fundamental rights (see Coco v R (1994) 179 CLR 427; Bropho v State of Western Australia (1990) 171 CLR 1; Beckwith v R (1976) 135 CLR 569).

18. As was the case at common law, under this definition:
    - The penetration only needed to be slight or fleeting (penetration "to any extent") (Randall v R (1991) 53 A Crim R 380; Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108); and
    - The prosecution did not need to prove the emission of semen (Crimes Act 1958 s 2A).

19. It is not sufficient for the relevant body part to have simply been touched. It must have been penetrated to some extent (Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108).

---

[755] If the legislation uses the medical definition, cases in which only the external genitalia have been penetrated will need to be charged as indecent assault instead.

20. Subject to the statutory exception regarding penetration by an object as part of accepted medical treatment, the purpose of the penetration is irrelevant. It need not have been committed for the purposes of sexual gratification (R v Dunn 15/4/1992 CA NSW).

"Sexual Penetration": The Second Definition (5/8–31/12/91)

21. From 5 August 1991 to 31 December 1991, the Crimes Act stated that "sexual penetration" was:

    - The introduction of a person's penis into the vagina, anus or mouth of another person, whether or not there was emission of semen; or
    - The introduction of a part of a person's body other than the penis into the vagina or anus of another person, other than in the course of an appropriate and generally accepted medical or hygienic procedure; or
    - The introduction of an object into the vagina or anus of another person, other than in the course of an appropriate and generally accepted medical or hygienic procedure (Crimes Act 1958 s 37).

"Taking Part" in an Act of Sexual Penetration

22. For offences committed from 1 March 1981 to 31 December 1991, the prosecution must prove that the accused "took part" in an act of sexual penetration (Crimes Act 1958 s 47 (1/3/1981 – 4/8/1991), s 45 (5/8/1991 – 31/12/1991)).

23. Both parties to an act of sexual penetration are deemed to have "taken part" in that act (Crimes Act 1958 s 2A (1/3/1981 – 4/8/1991), s 37 (5/8/1991 – 31/12/1991)).

24. This means that an accused may be found guilty of the offence whether he or she was sexually penetrating the complainant or was being sexually penetrated by the complainant (see R v JC [2000] ACTSC 72 and Randall v R (1991) 53 A Crim R 380).

Directing the Jury About the Meaning of "Vagina"

25. The common law definition of vagina (and possibly the statutory definitions: see above) includes "the external genitalia". It has been held that this phrase is not within ordinary usage and needs more explanation (R v AJS (2005) 12 VR 563; Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108; R v MG (2010) 29 VR 305).

26. Consequently, where penetration is in issue, the judge should explain to the jury in precise and simple terms, what would constitute penetration of the vagina, and summarise the evidence that relates to that issue (R v AJS (2005) 12 VR 563; [2005] VSCA 288. See also Randall v R (1991) 53 A Crim R 380; Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108; R v MG (2010) 29 VR 305).

Identifying the Penetrative Act

27. While in most cases the prosecution will be able to particularise the method of penetration (e.g. the complainant was penetrated by a penis), in some cases this will not be possible. In such cases, it will be sufficient for the prosecution to particularise the method of penetration by reference to the relevant possibilities (e.g. the complainant was penetrated by a penis, a bodily part or some other object) (R v Castles (Ruling No.1) (2007) 17 VR 329).

28. Where alternative possible methods of penetration are left to the jury, they do not need to unanimously agree about which of those methods was used. They only need to unanimously agree that penetration took place (R v Castles (Ruling No.1) (2007) 17 VR 329).

Intention to Take Part in the Proscribed Sexual Act

29. The second element requires the accused to have intended to take part in the proscribed sexual act (Crimes Act 1958 s 45(1)).

30. The intention must have been to sexually penetrate or be penetrated. An intent to commit an indecent assault is not sufficient (Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108).

31. There will often be no issue about whether the act was intentional. For example, if there is evidence that the penetration took place over an extended period of time, there will ordinarily be no doubt about the accused's mental state (Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108).

32. However, in some cases intent will be in issue. Where this is so, it is of paramount importance that the jury be directed about the prosecution's obligation to establish intent beyond reasonable doubt (R v AJS (2005) 12 VR 563; [2005] VSCA 288; MG v R (2010) 29 VR 305; Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108).

33. For example, a clear direction about intention will be necessary where it is possible that any penetration that occurred was accidental. Such a possibility must be excluded for this element to be proven (Anderson v R [2010] VSCA 108; R v AJS (2005) 12 VR 563; [2005] VSCA 288).

Child Under 10

34. The third element requires the prosecution to prove that the complainant was under the age of 10 at the time the relevant act took place (Crimes Act 1958 s 45(1)).

35. As this is an element of the offence, the jury must find the accused not guilty if it cannot be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the complainant was under 10 at the time of the offence (compare Crimes Act 1958 s 45 as amended by Crimes (Amendment) Act 2000).

Sexual Offences Against Children Aged 10 to 16

36. While the name of the offence for unlawful sexual acts with children aged 10 to 16 has changed over time, the basic elements of the offence have remained the same. The prosecution must prove that:

    i) The accused took part in a proscribed sexual act with the complainant;

    ii) The accused intended to take part in that proscribed sexual act;

    iii) The complainant was under the age of 16 at the time the proscribed sexual act took place; and

    iv) The accused was not married to the complainant.

Taking Part in a Proscribed Sexual Act

37. Over time, the nature of the proscribed sexual act has changed:

    - Prior to 1 March 1981, the offence prohibited "unlawful carnal knowledge and abuse" of girls (Crimes Act 1958 s 46);
    - From 1 March 1981 to 4 August 1991, the offence prohibited "taking part in an act of sexual penetration", and that phrase was defined by statute (the first statutory definition);
    - From 5 August 1991 to 31 December 1991, a new statutory definition of "sexual penetration" applied (the second statutory definition).

38. These changes are described above in relation to the first element of "Sexual Offences Against a Child Under 10".

Intention to Take Part in the Proscribed Sexual Act

39. The second element requires the accused to have intended to take part in the proscribed sexual act (Crimes Act 1958 s 48(1)).

40. This is identical to the second element of sexual penetration of a child aged under 10 (see above).

Child Aged between 10 and 16

41. The third element requires the prosecution to prove that the complainant was between the age of 10 and 16 at the time the proscribed sexual act took place (Crimes Act 1958 s 48(1)).

42. As this is an element of the offence, the jury must find the accused not guilty if it cannot be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the complainant was aged between 10 and 16 at the time of the offence (compare Crimes Act 1958 s 45 as amended by Crimes (Amendment) Act 2000).

Child and Accused Not Married

43. For offences committed between 1 March 1981 and 1 January 1992, there is a fourth element. The prosecution must prove that the accused and the complainant were not married to one another (Crimes Act 1958 s 48).

44. It is unclear whether this is also a requirement for offences committed before 1 March 1981. This will depend on whether the word "unlawful" in the phrase "unlawful carnal knowledge" means "outside marriage", or is mere surplusage (see "Unlawful Carnal Knowledge and Abuse" above).

Date of Offence

45. Prior to 5 August 1991, a statutory limitation period of 12 months applied to this offence if the complainant was aged 12 or above.

46. On 22 October 2014, section 74 of the Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences and Other Matters) Act 2014 commenced. This provision introduced Criminal Procedure Act 2009 section 7A and abolished "any immunity from prosecution arising because of the time limit" which previously applied in relation to these offences. The result is that for trials conducted after 22 October 2014, the prosecution does not need to prove that the complainant was under the age of 12 at the date of the offence. The prosecution will only need to prove that the child was aged between 10 and 16 at the date of the offence.

Aggravating Circumstances

47. The Crimes Act 1958 has always included an aggravated form of the offence of sexual penetration of a child aged 10 to 16, for cases in which the accused was in a position of trust or authority over the complainant.

48. The precise form of this aggravating circumstance has changed over time:

    - Prior to 1 March 1981, the aggravating circumstance was that the accused was a schoolmaster or teacher and the complainant was his pupil;
    - From 1 March 1981 to 31 December 1991, the aggravating circumstance was that the complainant was, either generally or at the time of the offence, under the care, supervision or authority of the accused.

49. In the absence of a clarifying statutory provision,[756] it is likely that the imposition of an increased maximum penalty for offences committed in these circumstances means that the aggravated form of the offence is a separate offence from the basic offence of sexual penetration of a child aged between 10 and 16. If that is correct, then the prosecution must specifically charge the aggravated offence in the indictment, and the judge must direct the jury on the aggravating circumstance as an element of that offence (see R v Satalich (2001) 3 VR 231; R v Courtie [1984] AC 463; R v Hassett (1994) 76 A Crim R 19).

Care, Supervision or Authority

50. The words "care, supervision or authority" are to be given their ordinary grammatical meaning (R v Howes (2000) 2 VR 141). For further information on this point, see 7.3.13 Sexual Penetration of a Child Under 16 (1/1/92–30/6/17).

---

[756] Compare Crimes Act 1958 s 45(5) in the current version of the Act.

Defences

51. The available statutory defences to the various sexual offences against children aged between 10 and 16 have changed over time.

52. Many of these defences concern the existence of consent or the accused's belief in the complainant's consent. Where consent is in issue, the judge must direct the jury in accordance with the current statutory provisions on consent. The transitional provisions on the legislation that introduced changes to the law on consent state that the legislative changes apply to all proceedings commenced after the amending legislation, regardless of when the alleged offence was committed (see Crimes (Rape) Act 1991 s 9 and Crimes Act 1958 s 609). For information on the current meaning of consent, see 7.3.1.3 Consent and Awareness of Non-Consent (Pre-1/7/15).

Offences Committed Before 1 March 1981

53. Prior to 1 March 1981, consent was not a defence unless the girl was older than or of the same age as the defendant (Crimes Act 1958 s 49).

Offences Committed 1 March 1981 to 4 August 1991

54. From 1 March 1981 to 4 August 1991, consent was only a defence if:

    - The accused believed on reasonable grounds that the complainant was of or above the age of 16 years; or
    - The accused was not more than 2 years older than the complainant (Crimes Act 1958 s 48(4)).

55. The accused also had a discrete defence if he or she believed, on reasonable grounds, that he or she was married to the complainant at the time of the alleged offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 48(5)).

Offences Committed 5 August 1991 to 31 December 1991

56. From 5 August 1991 to 31 December 1991, consent was a defence only if:

    - The accused believed on reasonable grounds that the complainant was of or above the age of 16 years;
    - The accused was not more than 2 years older than the complainant; or
    - The accused believed on reasonable grounds that he or she was married to the child (Crimes Act 1958 s 46(2)).

57. During this period, having a belief in marriage was no longer a discrete defence. Instead, such a belief was merely a precondition for the availability of a defence of consent.

Age Difference

58. For offences committed between 1 March 1981 and 31 December 1991, consent is available as a defence if the accused is not more than two years older than the complainant.

59. This defence is not available where the accused's actual age exceeds the complainant's by anything more than 24 months. The availability of the defence is not determined by a measure limited to whole–years (Stannard v DPP (2010) 28 VR 84).

60. It is unclear whether a similar limitation applies to offences committed before 1 March 1981, where the defence of consent was available if the complainant was older than or the same age as the accused. In particular, it is not clear whether "the same age" means having the same date of birth, or includes the situation where the accused and complainant are, at the time of the alleged offence, the same age as measured in whole–years.

Reasonable Grounds

61. For there to be "reasonable grounds" for a state of mind (such as a belief), there must exist facts which are sufficient to induce that state of mind in a reasonable person (George v Rockett (1990) 170 CLR 104).

Burden of Proof

62. Where there is an evidentiary basis for the defence of consent, the prosecution must disprove the existence of consent, or the grounds for a consent defence being available, beyond reasonable doubt (R v Mark & Elmazovski [2006] VSCA 251; R v Deblasis (2007) 19 VR 128; R v Fagone [2008] VSCA 175. Cf R v Douglas [1985] VR 721).

63. Judges should carefully explain the burden of proof to the jury in a way they can understand (R v Fagone [2008] VSCA 175).

Intoxication

64. The fact that the accused had used drugs or alcohol may be relevant to his or her belief that the child was 16 or older (see, e.g. R v Fagone [2008] VSCA 175).

65. However, this issue only needs to be addressed if there is a factual foundation for finding that the accused's drug or alcohol use affected his or her belief that the child was 16 or older. The mere fact that he or she had used drugs or alcohol at the relevant time is not sufficient (R v Fagone [2008] VSCA 175).

66. For further information on the relevance of drug or alcohol use generally, see 8.7 Common Law Intoxication.

Accused's Awareness of the Absence of Consent

67. The provisions regulating when consent is a defence to a sexual offence against a child were drafted in similar terms to the provision restricting when consent is a defence for indecent assault if the complainant is under 16 (compare Crimes Act 1958 s 44 (as implemented by the Crimes (Sexual Offences) Act 1980)).

68. In relation to consent for indecent assault, it has been held that where consent is a defence, the prosecution must prove both that the complainant did not consent and that the accused was aware that the complainant was not consenting or might not be consenting (see Frank v The King [2024] VSCA 37, [33]-[34]; R v Whelan [1973] VR 268; R v Trotter, Unreported, Supreme Court of Victoria Court of Criminal Appeal, 5 December 1985).

69. It is likely that the same approach must be taken for the offences discussed in this chapter.

Last updated: 17 April 2024

7.3.25.1 Charge: Carnal Knowledge of a Girl under 10 (Pre-1/3/81)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for trials involving offences alleged to have been committed before 1/3/1981.

I must now direct you about the crime of carnal knowledge of a girl under the age of 10. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with a girl.

Two – the accused did this intentionally.

Three – the girl was under the age of 10 at the time that the sexual penetration took place.

Four – The complainant was not married to the accused.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[757]

Unlawful Carnal Knowledge

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused sexually penetrated a girl, NOC. [If the conscious, voluntary or deliberate nature of the act is in issue,[758] add: The prosecution must also prove that the relevant acts of the accused were performed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.]

The law defines sexual penetration as the introduction of a person's penis into another person's vagina.

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that NOA introduced his penis to any extent between the outer lips of NOC's vagina.

[If relevant add:

- NOA's penis does not need to have gone all the way into NOC's vagina. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the penis to the outer surface of the external lips of the vagina is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation].

[If the evidence or arguments have placed the conscious, voluntary or deliberate nature of the acts in issue, add the following shaded section.]

For this element to be met, the act of putting NOA's penis in NOC's vagina must have been done consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

In this case [insert evidence and arguments relevant to proof of this element].

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused intended to sexually penetrate the complainant.[759]

---

[757] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[758] Described hereafter as the "voluntariness" requirement.

[759] Because sexual penetration of a child under 10 is an offence of basic intent (the intent to take part in the act of penetration), proof of intent will rarely be separated from proof of the act, and "intention" will rarely be an independent issue. Mental state issues related to the intention to penetrate (e.g. the negation of intent by involuntariness, unconsciousness or accident) should generally be addressed by voluntariness directions.

[If intention is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

This element is not in issue here. [If appropriate, explain further, e.g. "if you are satisfied that the accused [consciously, voluntarily and deliberately] sexually penetrated the complainant, you should have no trouble finding that s/he did so intentionally".]

Child Under the Age of 10

The third element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that she was under the age of 10 when the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case, [describe competing evidence and arguments].

Accused Not Married to the Complainant

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant and accused were not married at the time the act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC and NOA were not married at that time. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of unlawful carnal knowledge of a girl under the age of 10, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA sexually penetrated a girl, NOC; and

Two – that NOA intended to sexually penetrate NOC; and

Three – that NOC was under the age of 10 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place; and

Four – that NOC was not married to NOA at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual penetration of a girl under the age of 10.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

7.3.25.2 Checklist: Carnal Knowledge of a Girl under 10 (Pre-1/3/81)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with a girl; and

2. The accused sexually penetrated the complainant intentionally; and

3. The complainant was under the age of 10 at the time of the sexual penetration; and

4. The complainant was not married to the accused.

Sexual Penetration

1. Did the accused sexually penetrate the complainant?

If yes, then go to 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of carnal knowledge of a girl under 10

Intention

2. Did the accused intend to sexually penetrate the complainant?

If yes, then go to 3

If no, then the accused is not guilty of carnal knowledge of a girl under 10

Age of complainant

3. Was the complainant under the age of 10 at the time of the sexual penetration?

If yes, then go to 4

If no, then the accused is not guilty of carnal knowledge of a girl under 10

Absence of marriage

4. Has the prosecution proved that at the time of the sexual penetration the complainant was not married to the accused?

If yes, then the accused is guilty of carnal knowledge of a girl under 10 (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1, 2 and 3)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of carnal knowledge of a girl under 10

Last updated: 30 May 2014

7.3.25.3 Charge: Sexual Penetration of a Child under 10 (1/3/81–4/8/91)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for trials involving offences alleged to have been committed between 1/3/1981 and 4/8/1991.

I must now direct you about the crime of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 10. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant.

Two – the accused did this intentionally.

Three – the complainant was under the age of 10 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[760]

[760] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

Taking Part in an Act of Sexual Penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant. [If the conscious, voluntary or deliberate nature of the act is in issue,[761] add: The prosecution must also prove that the relevant acts of the accused were performed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.]

The law defines sexual penetration as the introduction of a person's penis or object into another person's vagina or anus. It also includes putting a penis into someone's mouth.

For this first element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove that NOA took part in one of these acts. The law says that both the person who sexually penetrates and the person who is penetrated are regarded as "taking part" in sexual penetration. [If relevant add: This means that if you find that NOA was sexually penetrated by NOC, you will be satisfied that the accused "took part" in that act of sexual penetration.]

In this case the prosecution seeks to prove that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC [describe relevant form of penetration, e.g. "when he took NOC's penis in his mouth"].

[If relevant add:

- [Identify item or body part and actor] does not need to have gone all the way into [NOC/NOA's] [vagina/anus/mouth]. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation].

[If the evidence or arguments have placed the conscious, voluntary or deliberate nature of the acts in issue, add the following shaded section.]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant act of participation, e.g. "introducing his finger into NOC's anus"/"receiving NOC's penis into his mouth"] must have been done consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical procedure or hygienic purposes add the following shaded section.]

However, according to the law, the introduction of an object into a person's [vagina/anus] does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done as part of some generally accepted medical treatment. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done as part of a generally accepted medical treatment.

In this case [insert evidence and arguments relevant to proof of this element].

---

[761] Described hereafter as the "voluntariness" requirement.

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused intended to take part in the act of sexual penetration with the complainant.[762]

[If intention is not in issue, add the shaded section.]

This element is not in issue here. [If appropriate, explain further, e.g. if you are satisfied that the accused [consciously, voluntarily and deliberately] sexually penetrated the complainant, you should have no trouble finding that s/he did so intentionally.]

Child Under the Age of 10

The third element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that s/he was under the age of 10 when the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case, [describe competing evidence and arguments].

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 10, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

- One – that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC; and
- Two – that NOA intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration; and
- Three – that NOC was under the age of 10 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under the age of 10.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

7.3.25.4 Checklist: Sexual Penetration of a Child under 10 (1/3/81–4/8/91)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with a child; and

2. The accused sexually penetrated the complainant intentionally; and

3. The complainant was under the age of 10 at the time of the sexual penetration.

Sexual Penetration

[762] Because sexual penetration of a child under 10 is an offence of basic intent (the intent to take part in the act of penetration), the issue of intention is only likely to arise in cases involving penetration of the accused by the complainant. In cases where the accused is alleged to have penetrated the complainant, proof of intent will rarely be separated from proof of the act, and "intention" will rarely be an independent issue. Mental state issues related to the intention to penetrate (e.g. the negation of intent by involuntariness, unconsciousness or accident) should generally be addressed by voluntariness directions.

1. Did the accused sexually penetrate the complainant?

If yes, then go to 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 10

Intention

2. Did the accused intend to sexually penetrate the complainant?

If yes, then go to 3

If no, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 10

Age of complainant

3. Was the complainant a child under the age of 10 at the time of the sexual penetration?

If yes, then the accused is guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 10 (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1 and 2)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child under 10

Last updated: 30 May 2014

7.3.25.5 Charge: Carnal Knowledge of a Girl Aged between 10 and 16 (Pre-1/3/81)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for trials involving offences alleged to have been committed before 1/3/1981 where consent is not in issue.

If consent is in issue, it will need to be modified accordingly. See 7.3.25 Sexual Offences Against Children (Pre–1/1/92) for guidance.

I must now direct you about the crime of carnal knowledge of a girl aged between 10 and 16. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused sexually penetrated the complainant, a girl, on the dates specified in the indictment.

Two – the accused did this intentionally.

Three – the complainant was aged between 10 and 16 at the time that the sexual penetration took place.

Four – The complainant was not married to the accused.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[763]

[763] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

Unlawful Carnal Knowledge

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused sexually penetrated a girl, NOC [on/between] [identify dates specified in the indictment]. To find this element proven, you must be satisfied that the sexual penetration took place at that time, rather than at some other time.

[If the conscious, voluntary or deliberate nature of the act is in issue,[764] add: The prosecution must also prove that the relevant acts of the accused were performed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.]

The law defines sexual penetration as the introduction of a person's penis into another person's vagina.

The law says that the vagina includes the external genitalia – that is the outer or external lips of the vagina. So the prosecution can prove this element by proving that NOA introduced his penis to any extent between the outer lips of NOC's vagina.

[If relevant add:

- NOA's penis does not need to have gone all the way into NOC's vagina. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the penis to the outer surface of the external lips of the vagina is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation].

[If the evidence or arguments have placed the conscious, voluntary or deliberate nature of the acts in issue, add the following shaded section.]

For this element to be met, the act of putting NOA's penis in NOC's vagina must have been done consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

In this case [insert evidence and arguments relevant to proof of this element].

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused intended to engage in sexual penetration of the complainant.[765]

[If intention is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

This element is not in issue here. [If appropriate, explain further, e.g. if you are satisfied that the accused [consciously, voluntarily and deliberately] engaged in carnal knowledge of the complainant, you

---

[764] Described hereafter as the "voluntariness" requirement.

[765] Because sexual penetration of a child aged between 10 and 16 is an offence of basic intent (the intent to take part in the act of penetration), the issue of intention will rarely be an independent issue. Mental state issues related to the intention to penetrate (e.g. the negation of intent by involuntariness, unconsciousness or accident) should generally be addressed by voluntariness directions.

should have no trouble finding that s/he did so intentionally.]

Girl Aged Between 10 and 16

The third element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that she was aged between 10 and 16 when the alleged act of carnal knowledge took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was aged between 10 and 16 at that time. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[766]

Accused Not Married to the Complainant

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant and accused were not married at the time the act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC and NOA were not married at that time. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[767]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of unlawful carnal knowledge a girl aged between 10 and 16, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA engaged in sexual penetration of a girl, NOC, on the date specified in the indictment; and

Two – that NOA intended to engage in that act of sexual penetration; and

Three – that NOC was aged between 10 and 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place; and

Four – that NOC was not married to NOA at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of carnal knowledge of a girl aged between 10 and 16.

Last updated: 19 March 2015

7.3.25.6 Checklist: Carnal Knowledge of a Girl between 10 and 16 (Pre-1/3/81)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with a girl on the dates specified; and

2. The accused sexually penetrated the complainant intentionally; and

3. The complainant was between the age of 10 and 16 at the time of the sexual penetration; and

4. The complainant was not married to the accused.

Sexual Penetration

[766] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[767] If this element is in issue, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

1. Did the accused sexually penetrate the complainant between the dates specified in the indictment?

Consider – You must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the sexual penetration took place between the dates alleged

If yes, then go to 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of carnal knowledge of a girl between 10 and 16

Intention

2. Did the accused intend to sexually penetrate the complainant?

If yes, then go to 3

If no, then the accused is not guilty of carnal knowledge of a girl between 10 and 16

Age of complainant

3. Was the complainant a girl between the age of 10 and 16 at the time of the sexual penetration?

If yes, then go to 4

If no, then the accused is not guilty of carnal knowledge of a girl between 10 and 16

Absence of marriage

4. Has the prosecution proved that at the time of the sexual penetration the complainant was not married to the accused?

If yes, then the accused is guilty of carnal knowledge of a girl between 10 and 16 (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1, 2 and 3)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of carnal knowledge of a girl between 10 and 16

Last updated: 30 May 2014

7.3.25.7 Charge: Sexual Penetration of a Child Aged between 10 and 16 (1/3/81–4/8/91)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge can be used for trials involving offences alleged to have been committed between 1/3/1981 and 4/8/1991 where consent is not in issue. If consent is in issue, it will need to be modified accordingly. See 7.3.13.9 Charge: Sexual penetration of a Child Under 16 (Pre-1/12/06) – Consent in Issue for guidance.

I must now direct you about the crime of sexual penetration of a child aged between 10 and 16. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following four elements beyond reasonable doubt.

One – the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant in the manner alleged.

Two – the accused did this intentionally.

Three – the complainant was between the age of 10 and 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place.

Four – the complainant and accused were not married at the time of the sexual penetration

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[768]

Taking Part in an Act of Sexual Penetration

The first element relates to what the accused is alleged to have done. The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that the accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with the complainant in the manner alleged.

[If the conscious, voluntary or deliberate nature of the act is in issue,[769] add: The prosecution must also prove that the relevant acts of the accused were performed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.]

The law defines sexual penetration as the introduction of a person's penis, or an object into another person's vagina or anus. It also includes putting a penis into someone's mouth.

For this first element to be satisfied, the prosecution must prove that NOA took part in one of these acts. The law says that both the person who sexually penetrates and the person who is penetrated are regarded as "taking part" in sexual penetration. [If relevant add: This means that if you find that NOA was sexually penetrated by NOC, you will be satisfied that the accused "took part" in that act of sexual penetration.]

In this case the prosecution seeks to prove that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC [describe relevant form of penetration, e.g. "when he took NOC's penis in his mouth"].

[If relevant add:

- [Identify item or body part and actor] does not need to have gone all the way into [NOC/NOA's] [vagina/anus/mouth]. The prosecution can succeed by proving penetration to any extent. Even slight penetration is enough.
- There must have been actual penetration. Mere touching of the [identify item or body part] to the [describe relevant external surface, e.g. "buttocks near the anus/outer surface of the external lips of the vagina/outer surface of the lips"] is not enough.
- This element is concerned with penetration, not ejaculation. The prosecution is not required to prove that there was any ejaculation].

[If the evidence or arguments have placed the conscious, voluntary or deliberate nature of the acts in issue, add the following shaded section.]

For this element to be met, the act of [describe relevant act of participation, e.g. "introducing his finger into NOC's anus"/"receiving NOC's penis into his mouth"] must have been done consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

This means that you must find NOA not guilty unless the prosecution can satisfy you that [describe the finding that proves voluntariness in the circumstance of the case, e.g. "NOA introduced his finger into NOC's vagina deliberately, and not accidentally" or "NOA was conscious and not asleep and dreaming at the time of the penetration"].

---

[768] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[769] Described hereafter as the "voluntariness" requirement.

[In cases involving alleged penetration in the context of a medical or hygienic procedure add the following shaded section.]

However, according to the law, the introduction of an object into a person's [vagina/anus] does not always amount to sexual penetration. It is not sexual penetration if it is done as part of some generally accepted and appropriate medical or hygienic procedure. In this case, the accused submits [refer to relevant evidence]. It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that the insertion of [insert name of object] by NOA into NOC's [anus/vagina], was not done as part of a generally accepted medical or hygienic procedure.

In this case [insert evidence and arguments relevant to proof of this element].

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt is that the accused intended to take part in the act of sexual penetration with the complainant.[770]

[If intention is not in issue, add the shaded section.]

This element is not in issue here. [If appropriate, explain further, e.g. "if you are satisfied that the accused [consciously, voluntarily and deliberately] sexually penetrated the complainant, you should have no trouble finding that s/he did so intentionally".]

Child Under the Age of 16

The third element relates to the complainant. The prosecution must prove that s/he was between the age of 10 and 16 when the alleged act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC was aged between 10 and 16 at that time. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[771]

Accused Not Married to the Complainant

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant and accused were not married at the time the act of sexual penetration took place.

In this case, there is no dispute that NOC and NOA were not married at that time. The main issue in this case is [insert relevant issue].[772]

---

[770] Because sexual penetration of a child aged between 10 and 16 is an offence of basic intent (the intent to take part in the act of penetration), the issue of intention is only likely to arise in cases involving penetration of the accused by the complainant. In cases where the accused is alleged to have penetrated the complainant, proof of intent will rarely be separated from proof of the act, and "intention" will rarely be an independent issue. Mental state issues related to the intention to penetrate (e.g. the negation of intent by involuntariness, unconsciousness or accident) should generally be addressed by voluntariness directions.

[771] If the complainant's age is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[772] If the existence of a marriage is disputed, this section of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of sexual penetration of a child aged between 10 and 16, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA took part in an act of sexual penetration with NOC in the manner alleged; and

Two – that NOA intended to take part in that act of sexual penetration; and

Three – that NOC was between the age of 10 and 16 at the time that the act of sexual penetration took place; and Four – that NOA and NOC were not married at the time of the sexual penetration.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of sexual penetration of a child aged between 10 and 16.

Last updated: 7 August 2015

7.3.25.8 Checklist: Sexual Penetration of a Child between 10 and 16 (1/3/81–4/8/91)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused took part in an act of sexual penetration with a child in the manner alleged; and

2. The accused sexually penetrated the complainant intentionally; and

3. The complainant was between the age of 10 and 16 at the time of the sexual penetration; and

4. The complainant was not married to the accused.

Sexual Penetration

1. Did the accused sexually penetrate the complainant in the manner alleged?

If yes, then go to 2

If no, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child aged between 10 and 16

Intention

2. Did the accused intend to sexually penetrate the complainant?

If yes, then go to 3

If no, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child aged between 10 and 16

Age of complainant

3. Was the complainant a child between the age of 10 and 16 at the time of the sexual penetration?

If yes, then go to 4

If no, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child aged between 10 and 16

Absence of marriage

4. Has the prosecution proved that at the time of the sexual penetration the complainant was not married to the accused?

If yes, then the accused is guilty of sexual penetration of a child aged between 10 and 16 (as long as you also answered yes to questions 1, 2 and 3)

If no, then the accused is not guilty of sexual penetration of a child aged between 10 and 16

Last updated: 7 August 2015

7.3.26 Production of Child Abuse Material

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Commencement information

1. Section 51C of the Crimes Act 1958 establishes that it is an offence to produce child abuse material. The section came into effect on 1 July 2017 (Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Act 2016 s 2).
2. The section replaced the former Crimes Act 1958 s 68 and no longer uses the terminology "child pornography". The Act now uses the term "child abuse material", which incorporates material depicting non-sexual child abuse (Crimes Act 1958 s 51A(1)).

Overview of elements

3. The offence requires that the prosecution prove three elements beyond reasonable doubt:
    - The accused intentionally produced material;
    - The material was child abuse material; and
    - The accused knew that the material was, or probably was, child abuse material (Crimes Act 1958 s 51C(1)).

Intentionally produced material

4. The prosecution must prove the accused intentionally produced the material in question (Crimes Act 1958 s 51C(1)(a)).
5. Material is defined in Crimes Act 1958 s 51A(1) to include film, audio, photographs, printed matter, computer games, text, electronic material or any other thing of any kind.
6. Images can be still, moving, recorded or unrecorded (Crimes Act 1958 s 51A(2)).
7. Electronic material is defined as including data from which text, images or sound may be generated (Crimes Act 1958 s 51A(2)).
8. Material may extend to tactile items, such as sex dolls (CD v Hamence [2017] VSC 753, [28]).
9. The definition of material may be wider than the definitions that applied to the former child pornography offences, which covered film, photograph, publication or computer game, and where publication was defined as any written or pictorial matter, but did not include a film, computer game or an advertisement for a publication, film or computer game (Crimes Act 1958 s 67A (as in force before 1 July 2017); Classification (Publications, Films and Computer Games) Act 1995 (Cth) s 5). In particular, the new definition may cover text or printed matter which is not intended for distribution, whereas under the previous legislation such material was not child pornography as it was not a 'publication' (compare R v Quick (2004) 148 A Crim R 51).
10. Producing material includes filming, printing, photographing, recording, writing, drawing or otherwise generating material (Crimes Act 1958 s 51C(3)(a)).
11. Producing material also includes copying, reproducing, altering or collating material (Crimes Act 1958 ss 51C(3)(b), (c)).

12. The Department of Justice's report, 'Crimes Amendment Sexual Offences Act 2016: An Introduction', notes that this means the same image can be "produced" multiple times. If an image is intentionally downloaded on to a new device or added to a collage, the subsequent action will also amount to producing material.

13. When a computer user views an image on the Internet, that image will automatically be copied to a "temporary Internet cache", where it will remain until the user deletes it, or until the computer overwrites the image after a certain period of time. If a particular user is unaware of the existence and operation of this cache, they cannot be said to have intentionally copied that image to their computer (R v Smith [2003] 1 Cr App R 13; DPP v Kear [2006] NSWSC 1145). In that situation, the offence of accessing child abuse material under Crimes Act 1958 s 51H may be relevant.

Child abuse material

14. The prosecution must prove that the material is child abuse material.

15. Child abuse material is defined as material that:

> (a) depicts or describes-
>
> (i) a person who is, or who appears or is implied to be, a child-
>
> (A) as a victim of torture, cruelty or physical abuse (whether or not the torture, cruelty or abuse is sexual); or
>
> (B) as a victim of sexual abuse; or
>
> (C) engaged in, or apparently engaging in, a sexual pose or sexual activity (whether or not in the presence of another person); or
>
> (D) in the presence of another person who is engaged in, or apparently engaged in, a sexual pose or sexual activity; or
>
> (ii) the genital or anal region of a person who is, or who appears or is implied to be, a child; or
>
> (iii) the breast area of a person who is, or who appears or is implied to be, a female child; and
>
> (b) reasonable persons would regard as being, in the circumstances, offensive;

16. For the purposes of the offence, a child is a person under the age of 18 years (Crimes Act 1958 s 51A(1)).

17. This definition of child abuse material mirrors the use of the terminology in some other Australian jurisdictions (see, e.g. Criminal Code Act 1995 (Cth) s 473.1; Crimes Act 1900 (NSW) s 91FB).

18. The use of the term "breast" connotates a 'visible degree of sexual development' which does not include the chest region of prepubescent girls (Turner v R (2017) 271 A Crim R 54, [59]).

19. Material is not child abuse material if the only reason it would fall within the definition is because it includes descriptions or depictions of prescribed body regions and the body regions are covered up by clothing (Turner v R (2017) 271 A Crim R 54, [51]).

20. Under the definition, the person depicted may be, appear to be, or be implied to be, a child. This reduces the need to prove the chronological age of the child, which can often be difficult to establish beyond reasonable doubt, as it is sufficient to prove that the person appears to be or is implied to be a child (see, on similar legislation, R v Morcom (2015) 122 SASR 154, [76]–[77]).This extends the definition to material produced by artistic means or material that describes fictitious persons. For example, a fictional story that contains explicit descriptions of children being sexually abused will be child abuse material (Martin v R [2014] NSWCCA 124).

21. This element is determined objectively. The court is not required to decide whether the accused intended for the material to be child abuse material. For example, photographs of children fully clothed in non-sexual situations would not constitute child abuse material even if the accused took the photographs for their own sexual gratification (Turner v R (2017) 271 A Crim R 54, [29]–[35]. See also R v Morcom (2015) 122 SASR 154, [22]–[63]).

Offensive to reasonable persons

22. Material will only be child abuse material if reasonable persons would regard the material as being, in the circumstances, offensive (Crimes Act 1958 s 51A(1)).

23. The Department of Justice's report, 'Crimes Amendment Sexual Offences Act 2016: An Introduction', notes that this is a common standard in criminal law and directs attention to the discussion of the matter in Monis v The Queen (2013) 249 CLR 92.

24. The reasonable person standard requires that the circumstances of the allegedly offensive conduct be examined through objective eyes (Monis v The Queen (2013) 249 CLR 92, [44]).

25. Offensive material is material which is likely to 'arouse significant anger, significant resentment, outrage, disgust, or hatred in the mind of a reasonable person in all the circumstances' (Monis v The Queen (2013) 249 CLR 92, [57]).

26. In relation to similar legislation in the Queensland Criminal Code, it has been held that, on appeal, the onus is on the appellant to demonstrate that there was a need for the trial judge to elaborate on the meaning of offensive (R v SDI [2019] QCA 135, [49]–[50]).

Knowledge that the material is child abuse material

27. The accused must have known the material was, or probably was, child abuse material (Crimes Act 1958 s 51C(1)(c)).

28. As noted above, the definition of child abuse material has a content limb, such as depicting or describing the genital or anal region of a person who is or appears to be a child, and an offensiveness limb, that reasonable persons would regard the material as being, in the circumstances, offensive.

29. Crimes Act 1958 s 51U states:

> It is not a defence to a charge for a child abuse material offence that, at the time of the conduct constituting the offence, A was under a mistaken but honest and reasonable belief that reasonable persons would not regard the child abuse material as being, in the circumstances, offensive.

30. It has not been determined how this interacts with the definition of child abuse material. In a case where it arises, the judge should take submissions on how it applies. As a matter of prudence, the model charge assumes that s 51U does not affect the scope of this element. The prosecution must therefore prove the accused knew the material meets both the content limb and the offensiveness limb of the definition.

Exceptions and defences

31. The Crimes Act 1958 provides three exceptions and six defences to the offence of producing child abuse material (see Crimes Act 1958 ss 51J, 51K, 51L, 51M, 51N, 51O, 51P, 51Q, 51R).

32. Four of the defences are only available if the accused has not distributed the child abuse material to a person other than the child depicted (Crimes Act 1958 s 51P, 51Q, 51R), or at all (Crimes Act 1958 s 51O). Distribution for the purposes of these defences includes publishing, exhibiting, communicating, sending, supplying or transmitting the material or making it available to another person (Crimes Act 1958 s 51A(2)(b)).

Administration of law

33. Section 51J of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that a person has not committed a child abuse material offence if the production of child abuse material occurred in connection with the administration of the criminal justice system.

34. The section replaces ss 68(2) and (3), 70(4) and (5) and 70AAAB(6)(a)(i) of the Crimes Act 1958. The new exception operates in a similar fashion as its predecessors, though it condenses the previously extensive list of exempt persons into two broad categories.

35. Actions undertaken in connection with the administration of the criminal justice system includes the investigation or prosecution of offences (Crimes Act 1958 s 51J(a)).

36. The exception extends to employees of the Department of Justice and Regulation who are authorised to engage in the relevant conduct by the Secretary of the Department (Crimes Act 1958 s 51J(b)).

37. Exempt individuals must have undertaken the relevant conduct in good faith (Crimes Act 1958 s 51J).

Classification

38. Section 51K of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that the accused has not committed a child abuse material offence if the relevant material was classified, or would if classified be, anything other than RC.

39. The section replaces ss 68(1A), 69(2) and 70(2)(a) of the Crimes Act 1958. The updated section recategorizes the classification defence as an exception and extends the range of exempt material to include material rated X 18+.

40. Section 51A(1) of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that the relevant classification is one made under the Classification (Publications, Films and Computer Games) Act 1995.

41. The classification of RC means Refused Classification (Classification (Publications, Films and Computer Games) Act 1995 s 7).

Artistic merit or public benefit

42. Section 51L of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that the accused will have a defence when the child abuse material has public benefit or artistic merit.

43. The section replaces s 70(2)(b) of the Crimes Act 1958. The new section has added a requirement to the artistic merit defence that requires that the child abuse material was produced without the involvement of persons aged under the age of 18 years (Crimes Act 1958 s 51L(1)(a)(ii)).

44. Materials that possess public benefit include materials that are for a genuine medical, legal, scientific or educational purpose (Crimes Act 1958 s 51L(2)).

45. In Nugent v Western Australia, the Court of Appeal in Western Australia considered a differently worded exception that applied where the material had recognised scientific merit. The court held that there was a difference between material that may be studied for the purpose of science (including social sciences), and material that is a product of scientific study, and that only the latter type of material fell within the exception (Nugent v Western Australia (2014) 246 A Crim R 165, [66]).

46. The accused bears the burden of proving, on the balance of probabilities, that the material possesses artistic merit or public benefit (Crimes Act 1958 s 51L(3)).[773]

Depictions of the accused

47. Section 51M of the Crimes Act 1958 provides the accused has not committed a child abuse material offence if the accused is a child and:

    - the image depicts the accused alone (Crimes Act 1958 s 51M(1)(c)); or
    - the image depicts the accused as a victim of a criminal offence punishable by imprisonment (Crimes Act 1958 s 51M(2)(c)).

Accused is a minor and of similar age to those depicted

48. Section 51N of the Crimes Act 1958 provides a defence where the accused is a child and the child abuse material depicts those of a similar age.

49. The section replaces elements of ss 70AAA(2) and 70AAA(4) of the Crimes Act 1958. The defence now requires that the accused is no more than 2 years older than the youngest child depicted in the image, regardless of whether that child makes the image child abuse material.

50. The defence is available if:

    - the accused is under the age of 18 years (Crimes Act 1958 s 51N(1)(a));
    - the child abuse material is an image (Crimes Act 1958 s 51N(1)(b));
    - the image depicts one or more persons (Crimes Act 1958 s 51N(1)(c));
    - the image does not depict a criminal act punishable by imprisonment or, in the event that it does, the accused must have reasonably believed it did not (Crimes Act 1958 s 51N(1)(d)); and
    - the accused is or reasonably believed they were no more than two years older than the youngest child depicted in the image (Crimes Act 1958 s 51N(1)(e)).

51. It is immaterial for this defence whether the accused is depicted in the image (Crimes Act 1958 s 51N(1)(c)).

52. The accused carries the burden of proving, on the balance of probabilities that they reasonably believed that they were no more than two years older than the youngest child and that the image did not depict a criminal act punishable by imprisonment (Crimes Act 1958 s 51N(3)).[774]

---

[773] An evidential burden applies to the requirement that material possessing artistic merit was produced without the involvement of persons under the age of 18 years.

[774] An evidentiary burden applies to all other requirements of the defence.

Material depicts accused as a child

53. Section 51O of the Crimes Act 1958 provides a defence where the child abuse material depicts the accused as a child.

54. This section replaces s 70(2)(e) of the Crimes Act 1958 and introduces new safeguards regarding the distribution of the material and the subject matter depicted.

55. Unlike s 51M of the Crimes Act 1958, this defence is available to an accused over the age of 18 years. This broader application is circumscribed by tighter restrictions on the distribution of the material and depictions of criminal activity.

56. The defence is available if:

- the child abuse material is an image (Crimes Act 1958 s 51O(1)(a));
- the image depicts the accused as a child (Crimes Act 1958 s 51O(1)(b));
- the accused has not distributed the image to any other persons (Crimes Act 1958 s 51O(1)(d)); and
- the image does not depict the accused committing an act that is a criminal offence punishable by imprisonment (Crimes Act 1958 s 51O(1)(c)).

57. The accused bears the burden of proving, on the balance of probabilities, that the image depicts them as a child (Crimes Act 1958 s 51O(3)).[775]

Accused is of similar age to child and had child's consent

58. Section 51P of the Crimes Act 1958 provides a defence where the depicted child is close in age to the accused and the accused reasonably believed that the depicted child had consented to the accused producing the material.

59. This section replaces s 70(2)(d) of the Crimes Act 1958 and adds new requirements concerning consent and depictions of criminal conduct.

60. The defence is available if:

- the child abuse material is an image (Crimes Act 1958 s 51P(1)(a));
- the image depicts a child aged 16 or 17 years at the time when the original image was first made (Crimes Act 1958 s 51P(1)(b)(i));
- the accused is no more than two years older than the child (Crimes Act 1958 s 51P(1)(e));
- the accused reasonably believes that they had the consent of the child to produce the image (Crimes Act 1958 s 51P(1)(f));
- the child was not under the care, supervision or authority of the accused when the image was first made or any time prior (Crimes Act 1958 s 51P(1)(b)(ii));
- the accused has not distributed the image to persons other than the child depicted (Crimes Act 1958 s 51P(1)(d)); and
- the image does not depict an act that is a criminal offence punishable by imprisonment (Crimes Act 1958 s 51P(1)(c)).

[775] An evidentiary burden applies to all other requirements of the defence.

61. The accused bears the burden of proving, on the balance of probabilities, that the accused is no more than two years older than the depicted child and he or she reasonably believed the depicted child had consented (Crimes Act 1958 s 51P(4)).[776]

Accused is married to or in domestic partnership with child

62. Section 51Q of the Crimes Act 1958 provides a defence where the child depicted in the child abuse material was married or in a domestic partnership with the accused.

63. The defence is available if:

- the child abuse material is an image (Crimes Act 1958 s 51Q(1)(a));
- the image is child abuse material because it depicts a person other than the accused (Crimes Act 1958 s 51Q(1)(b));
- the accused has not distributed the image to any persons other than the person depicted (Crimes Act 1958 s 51Q(1)(d));
- the image does not depict a criminal offence punishable by imprisonment (Crimes Act 1958 s 51Q(1)(c));
- that other person was aged 16 or 17 years when the original image was first created (Crimes Act 1958 s 51Q(1)(c));
- the accused was validly married to or in a domestic partnership with that other person when the accused produced the material and at the time when the original image was first created (Crimes Act 1958 ss 51Q(1)(e)(ii) and 51Q(f)(i)); and
- the accused reasonably believed, at the time of the offence, the other person consented to the accused producing the image (Crimes Act 1958 s 51Q(1)(f)(ii)).

64. If the accused was in a domestic partnership with the other person, the defence also requires that:

- the accused is no more than two years older than the other person (Crimes Act 1958 s 51Q(1)(e)(ii)); and
- if the child was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused, the domestic partnership commenced prior to relationship of care, supervision or authority (Crimes Act 1958 s 51Q(1)(e)(iii)).

65. The accused bears the burden of proving, on the balance of probabilities, that they reasonably believed the depicted child had consented (Crimes Act 1958 s 51Q(4)).[777]

Reasonable belief in marriage or domestic partnership

66. Section 51R of the Crimes Act 1958 provides a defence where the accused believed that they were married to or in a domestic partnership with the child depicted in the child abuse material.

67. The defence is available if:

- the child abuse material is an image (Crimes Act 1958 s 51R(1)(a));
- the image is child abuse material because it depicts a person other than the accused (Crimes Act 1958 s 51R(1)(b));

---

[776] An evidentiary burden applies to all other requirements of the defence.

[777] An evidentiary burden applies to all other requirements of the defence.

- the image does not depict a criminal offence punishable by imprisonment (Crimes Act 1958 s 51R(1)(c));[778]
- the accused has not distributed the image to any persons other the person depicted in the image (Crimes Act 1958 s 51R(1)(d));
- When the image was first made, the accused reasonably believed that:

i) the child was aged 16 or 17 (Crimes Act 1958 s 51R(1)(e)(i));

ii) the accused and the child were married and the marriage was recognised as valid, or the accused was the child's domestic partner (Crimes Act 1958 s 51R(1)(e)(ii));

- At the time of the offence, the accused reasonably believed that:

i) the accused and the child were married and the marriage was recognised as valid, or the accused was the child's domestic partner (Crimes Act 1958 s 51R(1)(f)(i));

ii) the child consented to the conduct constituting the offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 51R(1)(f)(ii)).

68. If the accused reasonably believed that they were in a domestic partnership with the other person, they must also prove, on the balance of probabilities, that they reasonably believed that:
    - the child was no more than two years younger than the accused (Crimes Act 1958 ss 51R(1)(f)(i) and 51R(4)); and
    - if the child was under the care, supervision or authority of the accused, the domestic partnership commenced prior to relationship of care, supervision or authority (Crimes Act 1958 ss 51R(1)(e)(iii) and 51R(4)).

Last updated: 17 March 2020

7.3.26.1 Charge: Production of Child Abuse Material

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This direction is designed for cases where the child abuse material depicts the child engaged in, or apparently engaging in, a sexual pose or sexual activity. If the prosecution relies on other limbs of the definition of child abuse material, then the direction must be modified.

I must now direct you about the crime of producing child abuse material. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following three elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – The accused intentionally produced material.

Two – The material is child abuse material.

Three – The accused knew that the material was, or probably was, child abuse material.

I will now explain these each of these elements in more detail.

Produced material

The first element the prosecution must prove is that the accused intentionally produced material.

[778] An evidentiary burden applies to these elements.

This requires the prosecution to show that the accused intentionally created[779] the photos[780] in question.

In other words, the prosecution must show that it was the accused who created the photos and that s/he did so deliberately and not accidentally.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Child abuse material

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the material is child abuse material.

The law provides that child abuse material comes in many forms. You must consider three questions:

- One – Does the material depict a person who is child or who appears to be a child?
- Two – Does the material depict the person engaged in a sexual pose or activity?[781]
- Three – Would a reasonable person regard the material as offensive, given all the circumstances?

If you answer yes to each question, then the material is child abuse material.

Depicts or describes a child or someone who is or who appears to be a child

The first question requires the prosecution to show that the person depicted is a child or appears to be a child. For the purpose of this offence, a child is a person under the age of 18.

To prove this first part of the element, the prosecution says [identify relevant evidence and arguments]. In response, the defence says [identify relevant evidence and arguments].

As part of this element, you can take into account your own life experience about how young the relevant person appears to be. You can also take into account how that person is depicted. If the person is depicted as a child, then this part of the element would be proved, even if the person was actually an adult.

Subject matter of the material

The second question looks at what the material shows. It must show the person in a sexual pose or sexual activity.[782]

To prove this second part of the element, the prosecution says [identify relevant evidence and arguments]. In response, the defence says [identify relevant evidence and arguments].

---

[779] If the prosecution relies on a different form of production, this should be modified accordingly.

[780] If the prosecution relies on a different form of material, this should be modified accordingly. In cases where the jury must determine whether the alleged child abuse material is "material" within the meaning of the Crimes Act 1958, the direction should be modified to instruct the jury about the definition of material and how it can apply that definition in the case.

[781] If the prosecution relies on a different limb of the definition of child abuse material, this question should be modified accordingly, such as by asking whether the material depicts the genital or anal region of a person, or the breast area of a person who is or who appears to be female.

[782] If the prosecution relies on a different limb of the definition of child abuse material, this question should be modified accordingly, such as by asking whether the material depicts the genital or anal region of a person, or the breast area of a person who is or who appears to be female.

Offensive to reasonable persons

The third question requires you to decide whether reasonable people would regard the material as being offensive in the circumstances.

For this question you must consider current community standards and values. You must decide whether it offensive when measured against the standards of morality, decency and propriety generally accepted by reasonable adults.

To prove this third part of the element, the prosecution says [identify relevant evidence and arguments]. In response, the defence says [identify relevant evidence and arguments].

Knowledge

The third element the prosecution must prove is that the accused knew that the material was, or probably was, child abuse material.

This requires the prosecution to prove the accused knew that the material contained, or probably contained, the three features that make something child abuse material.

That is, first, the accused knew that the material depicted, or probably depicted, a person who was or appeared to be under the age of 18 years; secondly, that the accused knew that the material depicted, or probably depicted, the person engaging in a sexual pose or sexual activity; and, thirdly, that the accused knew that reasonable persons would, or probably would, regard the material as being offensive in the circumstances.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments.]

Defences

[If the defence has raised any relevant defence or exception, insert appropriate directions on that defence or exception here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find the accused guilty, you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proved the following three elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – NOA intentionally produced material

Two – The material is child abuse material.

Three – NOA knew that the material was, or probably was, child abuse material.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of producing child abuse material.

Last updated: 17 March 2020

7.3.26.2 Checklist: Production of Child Abuse Material

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist is drafted on the assumption that the prosecution relies on clause (i)(C) of the definition of child abuse material. The checklist must be modified if the prosecution relies on a different limb of the definition.

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally produced material; and

2. The material was child abuse material; and

3. The accused knew that the material was, or probably was, child abuse material.

Intentional Production of Material

1. Did the accused intentionally produce material?

1.1. Is the item in question material?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Production of Child Abuse Material

1.2. Did the accused produce that material?

If Yes, then go to 1.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Production of Child Abuse Material

1.3. Did the accused intend to produce that material?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Production of Child Abuse Material

Child Abuse Material

2. Is the material child abuse material?

2.1. Did it describe or depict someone who was, or appears to be, under the age of 18 years?

Consider – The person described or depicted does not need to be a real person

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Production of Child Abuse Material

2.2. Did the material describe or depict that person engaged in, or apparently engaging in, a sexual pose or sexual activity?

If Yes, then go to 2.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Production of Child Abuse Material

2.3. In the circumstances, would reasonable persons regard the material as being offensive?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Production of Child Abuse Material

---

Knowledge of the Accused

3. Did the accused know that the material was, or probably was, child abuse material?

3.1. Did the accused know the material described or depicted, or probably described or depicted, someone who was, or appeared to be, under the age of 18 years?

If Yes, then go to 3.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Production of Child Abuse Material

3.2. Did the accused know the material described or depicted, or probably described or depicted, that person engaged in, or apparently engaging in, a sexual pose or sexual activity?

If Yes, then go to 3.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Production of Child Abuse Material

3.3. Did the accused know that reasonable persons would, or probably would, regard the material as being offensive?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Producing Child Abuse Material (as long as you have answered Yes to all previous questions)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Production of Child Abuse Material

7.3.27 Distributing Child Abuse Material

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Commencement information

1. Section 51D of the Crimes Act 1958 establishes that it is an offence to distribute child abuse material. The section came into effect on 1 July 2017 (Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Act 2016 s 2).

Overview of elements

2. The offence requires that the prosecution prove three elements beyond reasonable doubt:
    - The accused intentionally distributed material;
    - The material was child abuse material; and
    - The accused knew that the material was, or probably was, child abuse material (Crimes Act 1958 s 51D(1)).

Intentionally distributed material

1. The prosecution must prove the accused intentionally distributed the material in question (Crimes Act 1958 s 51D(1)(a)).
2. For information on the meaning of 'material', see 7.3.26 Production of child abuse material.
3. The Crimes Act 1958 contains an inclusive list of ways in which material may be distributed, including:

> Publishing, exhibiting communicating, sending, supplying or transmitting the material to any other person; or > Making the material available for access by any other person (Crimes Act 1958 s 51A(2)(b)).

Child abuse material

4. The second element the prosecution must prove is that the material is child abuse material (Crimes Act 1958 s 51D(1)(b)).
5. For information on the meaning of 'child abuse material', see 7.3.26 Production of child abuse material.

Knowledge that the material is child abuse material

6. The third element the prosecution must prove is that the accused knew the material was, or probably was, child abuse material (Crimes Act 1958 s 51D(1)(c)).
7. As discussed in 7.3.26 Production of child abuse material, the model charge assumes that, despite Crimes Act 1958 s 51U, the prosecution must prove that the accused knew the material meets both the content limb and the offensiveness limb of the definition of child abuse material.

Matters that do not affect the offence

8. Section 51D provides that it is not necessary to prove the identity of any person to whom the material was distributed, or that another person accessed the material (Crimes Act 1958 s 51D(3)).

Territorial operation

9. It does not matter that some of the material was distributed outside Victoria, provided the accused was in Victoria for some or all of the time when the material was distributed (Crimes Act 1958 s 51D).
10. Further, it does not matter that the accused was outside Victoria for some or all of the time when the material was distributed, as long as some or all of the material was distributed in Victoria (Crimes Act 1958 s 51D).

Exceptions and defences

11. The Crimes Act 1958 provides three exceptions and five defences to the offence of producing child abuse material (see Crimes Act 1958 ss 51J, 51K, 51L, 51M, 51N, 51P, 51Q, 51R).
12. Three of the defences are only available if the accused has not distributed the child abuse material to a person other than the child depicted (Crimes Act 1958 ss 51P, 51Q, 51R).
13. For information on the defences and exceptions, see 7.3.26 Production of child abuse material, noting that the defence in Crimes Act 1958 s 51O (image of oneself) does not apply to this offence.

Last updated: 17 March 2020

7.3.27.1 Charge: Distributing Child Abuse Material

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This direction is designed for cases where the child abuse material depicts the child engaged in, or apparently engaging in, a sexual pose or sexual activity. If the prosecution relies on other limbs of the definition of child abuse material, then the direction must be modified.

I must now direct you about the crime of distributing child abuse material. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following three elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – The accused intentionally distributed material.

Two – The material is child abuse material.

Three – The accused knew that the material was, or probably was, child abuse material.

I will now explain these each of these elements in more detail.

Distributing material

The first element the prosecution must prove is that the accused intentionally distributed material.

This requires the prosecution to show that the accused intentionally published, exhibited, communicated, sent, supplied or transmitted the photos to another person.[783] The prosecution can also prove this element by showing that the accused intentionally made the photos available for another person to access.

[If there is uncertainty about who the material was distributed to, add the following direction.]

The law states that it is not necessary to prove who received the photos, or that another person in fact accessed the photos. You must focus on the accused's actions, and whether the accused published, exhibited, communicated, sent supplied or transmitted the photos, rather than whether another person obtained the photos.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Child abuse material

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the material is child abuse material.

The law provides that child abuse material comes in many forms. You must consider three questions:

- One – Does the material depict a person who is child or who appears to be a child?
- Two – Does the material depict the person engaged in a sexual pose or activity?[784]
- Three – Would a reasonable person regard the material as offensive, given all the circumstances?

If you answer yes to each question, then the material is child abuse material.

---

[783] If the prosecution relies on a different form of material, this should be modified accordingly. In cases where the jury must determine whether the alleged child abuse material is "material" within the meaning of the Crimes Act 1958, the direction should be modified to instruct the jury about the definition of material and how it can apply that definition in the case.

[784] If the prosecution relies on a different limb of the definition of child abuse material, this question should be modified accordingly, such as by asking whether the material depicts the genital or anal region of a person, or the breast area of a person who is or who appears to be female.

Depicts or describes a child or someone who is or who appears to be a child

The first question requires the prosecution to show that the person depicted is a child or appears to be a child. For the purpose of this offence, a child is a person under the age of 18.

To prove this first part of the element, the prosecution says [identify relevant evidence and arguments]. In response, the defence says [identify relevant evidence and arguments].

As part of this element, you can take into account your own life experience about how young the relevant person appears to be. You can also take into account how that person is depicted. If the person is depicted as a child, then this part of the element would be proved, even if the person was actually an adult.

Subject matter of the material

The second question looks at what the material shows. It must show the person in a sexual pose or sexual activity.[785]

To prove this second part of the element, the prosecution says [identify relevant evidence and arguments]. In response, the defence says [identify relevant evidence and arguments].

Offensive to reasonable persons

The third question requires you to decide whether reasonable people would regard the material as being offensive in the circumstances.

For this question you must consider current community standards and values. You must decide whether it offensive when measured against the standards of morality, decency and propriety generally accepted by reasonable adults.

To prove this third part of the element, the prosecution says [identify relevant evidence and arguments]. In response, the defence says [identify relevant evidence and arguments].

Knowledge

The third element the prosecution must prove is that the accused knew that the material was, or probably was, child abuse material.

This requires the prosecution to prove the accused knew that the material contained, or probably contained, the three features that make something child abuse material.

That is, first, the accused knew that the material depicted, or probably depicted, a person who was or appeared to be under the age of 18 years; secondly, that the accused knew that the material depicted, or probably depicted, the person engaging in a sexual pose or sexual activity; and, thirdly, that the accused knew that reasonable persons would, or probably would, regard the material as being offensive in the circumstances.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments.]

Defences

[If the defence has raised any relevant defence or exception, insert appropriate directions on that defence or exception here.]

---

[785] If the prosecution relies on a different limb of the definition of child abuse material, this question should be modified accordingly, such as by asking whether the material depicts the genital or anal region of a person, or the breast area of a person who is or who appears to be female.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find the accused guilty, you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proved the following three elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – NOA intentionally distributed material;

Two – The material is child abuse material;

Three – NOA knew that the material was, or probably was, child abuse material.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of distributing child abuse material.

Last updated: 17 March 2020

7.3.27.2 Checklist: Distributing Child Abuse Material

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist is drafted on the assumption that the prosecution relies on clause (i)(C) of the definition of child abuse material. The checklist must be modified if the prosecution relies on a different limb of the definition.

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally distributed material; and

2. The material was child abuse material; and

3. The accused knew that the material was, or probably was, child abuse material.

Intentional Distribution of Material

1. Did the accused intentionally distribute material?

1.1. Is the item in question material?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Distributing Child Abuse Material

1.2. Did the accused distribute that material?

Consider – A person can distribute material by publishing, exhibiting, communicating, sending, supplying or transmitting the material to another person. A person can also distribute material by making the material available to access.

If Yes, then go to 1.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Distributing Child Abuse Material

1.3. Did the accused intend to distribute that material?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Distributing Child Abuse Material

Child Abuse Material

2. Is the material child abuse material?

2.1. Did it describe or depict someone who was, or appears to be, under the age of 18 years?

Consider – The person described or depicted does not need to be a real person

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Distributing Child Abuse Material

2.2. Did the material describe or depict that person engaged in, or apparently engaging in, a sexual pose or sexual activity?

If Yes, then go to 2.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Distributing Child Abuse Material

2.3. In the circumstances, would reasonable persons regard the material as being offensive?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Distributing Child Abuse Material

Knowledge of the Accused

3. Did the accused know that the material was, or probably was, child abuse material?

3.1. Did the accused know the material described or depicted, or probably described or depicted, someone who was, or appeared to be, under the age of 18 years?

If Yes, then go to 3.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Distributing Child Abuse Material

3.2. Did the accused know the material described or depicted, or probably described or depicted, that person engaged in, or apparently engaging in, a sexual pose or sexual activity?

If Yes, then go to 3.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Distributing Child Abuse Material

3.3. Did the accused know that reasonable persons would, or probably would, regard the material as being offensive?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Distributing Child Abuse Material (as long as you have answered Yes to all previous questions)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Distributing Child Abuse Material

Last updated: 17 March 2020

7.3.28 Production of Child Pornography

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Commencement Information

1. The offence of Production of Child Pornography (Crimes Act 1958 s 68) commenced operation on 1 January 1996 (Classification (Publication, Films and Computer Games) (Enforcement) Act 1995 s 2).
2. This offence was amended by the Justice Legislation (Sexual Offences and Bail) Act 2004, to increase the relevant age of a child from "under 16" to "under 18". The revised age limit applies to offences alleged to have been committed on or after 18 May 2004.

Overview of Elements

3. Production of Child Pornography has the following five elements, each of which must be proven beyond reasonable doubt:

   i) The accused printed or otherwise made or produced a film, photograph, publication or computer game;

   ii) The accused intended to print, make or produce that film, photograph, publication or computer game;

   iii) That film, photograph, publication or computer game describes or depicts a person:

   (a) engaging in sexual activity; or

   (b) depicted in an indecent sexual manner or context;

   iv) The person described or depicted in that way is, or appears to be, a minor; and

   v) The accused knew the nature of the film, photograph, publication or computer game, or was aware of its likely nature.

Production of a Film, Photograph, Publication or Game

4. There are two aspects to the first element:

   i) The accused must have printed or otherwise made or produced certain material; and

   ii) The material printed, made or produced must have been a film, photograph, publication or computer game.

5. The terms "printed", "made" or "produced" are ordinary English terms (R v Bowden [2000] 2 All ER 418; R v Atkins [2000] 2 Cr App R 248).
6. It has been held in England that a person who intentionally downloads a copy of a file from the Internet onto his or her computer produces or makes that copied file, because s/he causes it to exist (R v Bowden [2000] 2 All ER 418; R v Atkins [2000] 2 Cr App R 248; R v Smith [2003] 1 Cr App R 13. See also DPP v Kear [2006] NSWSC 1145).[786]
7. The definition of a "photograph" includes a photocopy or other reproduction of a photograph (Crimes Act 1958 s 67A).
8. Crimes Act s 67A specifies that the terms "film", "publication" and "computer game" are to be given the same meaning as in the Classification (Publications, Films and Computer Games) Act 1995 (Cth).
9. A "film" is defined to include any form of recording from which a visual image may be reproduced. This includes cinematographic films, slides, video tapes or video disks (Classification (Publications, Films and Computer Games) Act 1995 (Cth) s 5).
10. A series of separate images downloaded to a computer by a user may also be considered to be a "film" (DPP v Kear [2006] NSWSC 1145).
11. A "computer game" is defined as a computer program capable of generating a display that allows for the playing of an interactive game[787] (Classification (Publications, Films and Computer Games) Act 1995 (Cth) s 5A).
12. Although a "publication" is defined as any written or pictorial material which is not a film, computer game or advertisement for a publication, film or computer game (Classification (Publications, Films and Computer Games) Act 1995 (Cth) s 5), private expressions of thought intended exclusively for private use, and which are not intended or likely to be distributed or disseminated, are not publications (R v Quick [2004] VSC 270).
13. Advertisements for publications, films or computer games are excluded from the definitions of those terms (Classification (Publications, Films and Computer Games) Act 1995 (Cth) s 5). It therefore seems that a person who makes or produces an advertisement containing child pornography will only be guilty of this offence if the advertisement is photographic.

Intention to Print, Make or Produce

14. The second element of this offence requires the accused to have intended to print, make or produce the film, photograph, publication or computer game (R v Bowden [2000] 2 All ER 418; R v Atkins [2000] 2 Cr App R 248; R v Smith [2003] 1 Cr App R 13).
15. A person will therefore not be guilty of this offence if he or she unintentionally downloads a copy of a file from the Internet onto his or her computer (R v Bowden [2000] 2 All ER 418; R v Atkins [2000] 2 Cr App R 248; R v Smith [2003] 1 Cr App R 13. See also DPP v Kear [2006] NSWSC 1145).

---

[786] In Victoria, people who download images of child pornography are usually charged with Possession of Child Pornograpy (Crimes Act 1958 s 70) rather than Production of Child Pornography.

[787] An "interactive game" is one where the way in which the game proceeds, and the result achieved at various stages of the game, is determined in response to the decisions, inputs and direct involvement of the player (Classification (Publications, Films and Computer Games) Act 1995 (Cth) s 5).

16. This may occur due to the way in which the Internet works. When a computer user views an image on the Internet, that image will automatically be copied to a "temporary Internet cache", where it will remain until the user deletes it, or until the computer overwrites the image after a certain period of time. If a particular user is unaware of the existence and operation of this cache, he or she cannot be said to have intentionally copied that image to his or her computer (R v Smith [2003] 1 Cr App R 13; DPP v Kear [2006] NSWSC 1145).[788]

Sexual Activity or Indecent Sexual Context

17. The third element of this offence requires the film, photograph, publication or computer game to depict or describe a person "engaging in sexual activity or depicted in an indecent sexual manner or context" (Crimes Act 1958 s 67A).

18. It is not necessary that the person be engaging in sexual conduct or adopting a sexual pose. It is sufficient if the depiction is of a sexual character, nature or context (Walls v R Vic CC 14/07/2003).

19. It is not necessary that the depiction be of an event that has actually taken place. A fictitious account may depict or describe conduct constituting child pornography (R v Quick [2004] VSC 270).

20. The people depicted in the material do not need to be real people. An account involving fictitious people described as minors will be sufficient for this element to be met (Holland v The Queen (2005) 30 WAR 231).

21. In determining whether material is "indecent", it is necessary to apply contemporary standards and values. This must be assessed using community standards rather than the standards of any particular member of the jury (Walls v R Vic CC 14/07/2003; Phillips v SA Police (1994) 75 A Crim R 480; Crowe v Graham (1969) 121 CLR 375).

22. The context and purpose of the act will also be relevant in determining whether it is indecent. An act done for a legitimate medical purpose may not be indecent even if the same act would be indecent if done for a prurient purpose (R v EG [2002] ACTSC 85; R v Court [1989] AC 28).

Age of the Victim

23. The fourth element of this offence requires a person depicted or described in the way outlined above to be, or appear to be, a minor (Crimes Act 1958 s 67A).

24. The age requirement for this section varies, depending on when the offence is alleged to have been committed:

    - For offences alleged to have been committed on or after 18 May 2004, the person depicted or described in the relevant way must be under the age of 18 (Crimes Act 1958 s 67A).
    - For offences alleged to have been committed prior to 18 May 2004, the person depicted or described in the relevant way must be under the age of 16 (Justice Legislation (Sexual Offences and Bail) Act 2004 s 4).

25. This element will be satisfied if the person depicted or described is under the relevant age limit, even if he or she does not appear to be so (Police v Kennedy (1998) 71 SASR 175).

26. In determining whether the victim "appears to be" a minor, the jury is required to make its own assessment of his or her apparent age (Police v Kennedy (1998) 71 SASR 175).

27. The jury must be satisfied that this element has been proven beyond reasonable doubt. Where the prosecution relies on the victim's "apparent age", this means that the jury must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused appears to be a minor (R v Wescott Vic CC 26/5/2005).

---

[788] While this approach has not been expressly adopted in Victoria, it was referred to in R v Quick [2004] VSC 270 without disapproval.

Knowledge

28. The fifth element of this offence requires the accused to know the nature of the film, photograph, publication or computer game (Police v Kennedy (1998) 71 SASR 175).

29. The precise scope of this element has not yet been determined in Victoria. Following the principles in He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523, it appears likely that the accused will have to have known, or been aware that it was likely, that s/he was printing, making or producing pornographic images of a minor.

Exceptions

30. Section 70AAA of the Crimes Act 1958 sets out exceptions to the offences of production of child pornography, procurement of minor for child pornography and possession of child pornography.

31. Section 70AAA commenced on 3 November 2014, and applies to all proceedings, regardless of when the offence is alleged to have been committed (Crimes Act 1958, s 626(5)).

32. Whenever one of the four exceptions requires a belief by the accused on reasonable grounds, the accused has the burden of proving this matter on a balance of probabilities (s 70AAA(7)). For other matters, the prosecution bears the burden of disproving the exception.

Elements of the exceptions

33. There are four exceptions in s 70AAA, one in each of subsections (1)–(4), and each exception applies only where:

    - the accused is a minor, and
    - the child pornography is an image.

34. For the purpose of this Charge Book, it is assumed that the relevant time for ascertaining whether the accused is a minor is at the date of the commission of the alleged offence although this is not explicit in s 70AAA, which states only that each exception applies 'to a minor'.

Section 70AAA(1)

35. The first exception applies to child pornography of the accused him or herself. It is particularly relevant where a minor produces an intimate 'selfie'. The exception applies where:

    - the accused is a minor,
    - the child pornography is an image,
    - the image depicts the accused alone or with an adult, and
    - the image is child pornography because of its depiction of the accused.

Section 70AAA(2)

36. The second exception applies to pornographic depictions of non-criminal acts between minors. Like all the exceptions, it is directed at behaviour that is not exploitative on the part of the accused.

37. For example, the exception would apply to an image depicting the accused in an act of sexual penetration with another minor up to two years younger, where both are consenting to the act.

38. The exception applies where:

    - the accused is a minor,

- the child pornography is an image,
- the image depicts the accused with another minor,
- the image does not depict a criminal act punishable by imprisonment, and
- the image is child pornography either because of:

(a) the depiction of the accused, or

(b) the depiction of the other minor if, at the time the offence was alleged to be committed, the accused-

- is not more than two years older, or
- believes on reasonable grounds that he or she is not more than two years older than the youngest minor whose depiction makes the image child pornography.

39. This exception does not apply if the image depicts a criminal offence punishable by imprisonment. However, the exception in subsection (3) may be applicable in such circumstances (see below).

Section 70AAA(3)

40. The third exception applies where the child pornography depicts a criminal offence and the accused is the victim of that offence.

41. For example, the exception would apply to an image depicting the accused being raped.

- It requires that:
- the accused is a minor,
- the child pornography is an image,
- the image depicts the accused alone or with another person,
- the image depicts an act that is a criminal offence, and
- the accused is a victim of that offence.

Section 70AAA(4)

42. The fourth exception applies to a pornographic depiction of a person other than the accused, and requires that the image does not depict a criminal offence punishable by imprisonment and the accused is not more than two years older than that person. This exception is most likely to apply where an accused produces an intimate image of another person and covers many instances of 'sexting'.

43. For example, the exception will apply to an image depicting a minor engaging in sexual activity if the accused believes on reasonable grounds that the minor depicted is younger than him or her by up to two years.

44. The exception requires that:

- the accused is a minor,
- the child pornography is an image,
- the image does not depict the accused,
- the image does not depict a criminal act punishable by imprisonment, or the accused believes on reasonable grounds that it does not, and
- the accused-

- Is not more than two years older, or
- Believes on reasonable grounds that he or she is not more than two years older than the youngest minor whose depiction makes the image child pornography.

Age of the youngest minor

45. Section 70AAA(5)(a) specifies that the reference in s 70AAA(4) to 'the youngest minor whose depiction in the image makes it child pornography' is to the age of that minor when the image was made or produced.

46. Section 70AAA(5)(a) only applies for purposes of sub-s (4) and makes no mention of the identical phrase in sub-s (2). It is not clear why the clarification in sub-s (5)(a) would not apply equally to subs(2). For example, s 70AAA(5)(a) is substantially replicated as s 57A(7) of the Classification (Publications, Films and Computer Games) (Enforcement) Act 1995. But, in that version, both exceptions that use the phrase 'the youngest minor whose depiction in the image makes it child pornography' are included.

Defences and Exemptions

Classification by the OFLC

47. The accused will have a defence if s/he printed, made or produced a film, a photograph contained in a publication, or a computer game which, at the time of the alleged offence:
    - Was classified by the Office of Film and Literature Classification (OFLC) as being other than RC,[789] X or X 18+; or
    - Would, if classified by the OFLC, be classified as being other than RC, X or X 18+ (Crimes Act 1958 s 68(1A)).

48. This defence does not cover non-photographic aspects of publications, or photographs which are not contained in publications (Crimes Act 1958 s 68(1A). See also R v Quick [2004] VSC 270).

49. It seems likely that the accused bears the onus of establishing this defence on the balance of probabilities. This was the position agreed to by the parties, and taken by the judge, in Walls v R Vic CC 14/07/2003, in relation to a similarly drafted defence to Possession of Child Pornography (Crimes Act 1958 s 70).

Law Enforcement

50. The Act exempts the conduct of the following people who print, make or produce child pornography in the exercise of functions conferred under the Crimes Act 1958, any other Act, or the common law:

[789] RC means "Refused Classification" (Classification (Publications, Films and Computer Games) Act 1995 s 7).

(a) A member or officer of a law enforcement agency;

(b) A person authorised in writing by the Chief Commissioner of Police who is assisting a member or officer;

(c) A person belonging to a class of persons who have been authorised in writing by the Chief Commissioner of Police assisting a member or officer (Crimes Act 1958 s 68(2)).

Last updated: 8 December 2014

7.3.28.1 Charge: Production of Child Pornography

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of production of child pornography. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – NOA printed, made or otherwise produced[790] a [film/photograph/publication/computer game].

Two – NOA intended to print, make or produce that [film/photograph/publication/computer game].

Three – that the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] describes or depicts a person engaging in sexual activity, or depicts a person in an indecent sexual manner or context.

Four – the person depicted or described in that way is, or appears to be, under the age of [16/18].[791]

Five – at the time the accused printed, made or otherwise produced the [film/photograph/publication/computer game], s/he knew that it contained child pornography, or was aware that this was likely.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Film, photograph, publication or computer game

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused printed, made or otherwise produced a [film/photograph/publication/computer game].

There are two parts to this element, both of which must be proven beyond reasonable doubt:

- First, the item in question – in this case the [describe relevant item] – must be a [film/photograph/publication/computer game].
- Second, the accused must have printed, made or otherwise produced that [film/photograph/publication/computer game].

Film, photograph, publication or computer game

[If it is not disputed that the relevant item is a film, photograph, publication or computer game, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, it is not disputed that the [describe relevant item] is a [film/photograph/publication/computer game], so you should have no difficulty finding this to be the

---

[790] If one or more of the terms "printed, made or otherwise produced" are not relevant in the context of a particular case, they should be removed throughout this charge.

[791] The relevant age is 16 for offences alleged to have been committed before 18 May 2004, and 18 for offences alleged to have committed on or after that date.

case.

[If it is disputed that the relevant item is a film, photograph, publication or computer game, add the following shaded section.]

[For cases involving films, add the following darker shaded section.]

The law says that a "film" is any form of recording from which a visual image may be reproduced. This includes [insert any relevant examples, such as slides, video tapes, cinematographic films].[792]

[For cases involving photographs, add the following darker shaded section.]

"Photograph" is an ordinary English word and does not have any special legal meaning. [If it is alleged that the photograph is a photocopy or reproduction, add: For the purposes of this offence, it includes photocopies or other reproductions of a photograph.]

[For cases involving publications, add the following darker shaded section.]

The law says that a "publication" is any published picture or piece of writing that is not a film, computer game or an advertisement. Because the writing or pictures must be "published", this definition does not include private expressions of thought which are not intended to be circulated or distributed to others – such as those contained in a personal diary or journal.

[For cases involving computer games, add the following darker shaded section.]

The law says that a "computer game" is a computer program that is capable of generating a display that allows for the playing of an interactive game. That is, it is a visual computer program that a person is directly involved in playing. He or she makes various decisions, which are input into the computer. The way in which the game proceeds, and the results achieved at the different stages of the game, will be determined in response to the player's input.

According to the prosecution, the [describe relevant item] is a [film/photograph/publication/computer game], because [insert relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denies this, claiming that [insert relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine whether the [describe relevant item] is a [film/photograph/publication/computer game]. If you are not satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it is, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Printed, made or otherwise produced

If you are satisfied that the [describe relevant item] is a [film/photograph/publication/computer game], you must then determine whether NOA printed, made or otherwise produced that [film/photograph/publication/computer game].

These are ordinary English words, which do not have a specific legal definition. It is for you to determine, based on all of the evidence, whether what NOA did was to print, make or otherwise produce the [describe relevant item].

[Insert relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

---

[792] The definition of a "film" excludes advertisements. If it is contended that the relevant item was an advertisement rather than a film, this issue will need to be addressed.

It is only if you are satisfied that the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA printed, made or otherwise produced the [describe relevant item], and that the [describe relevant item] is a [film/photograph/publication/computer game] that this first element will be met.

Intention

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intended to print, make or otherwise produce the [film/photograph/publication/computer game]. That is, you must be satisfied that NOA deliberately and not accidentally printed, made or produced the [insert relevant item].

[If it is alleged that the accused unintentionally downloaded a copy of a file from the Internet onto his or her computer, add the following shaded section.[793]]

In this case, the defence has argued that the relevant file was unintentionally downloaded onto his/her computer, and that s/he therefore did not intend to make or produce that file. [Explain relevant evidence.]

If a person is not aware that s/he is downloading a file to his/her computer, s/he cannot be said to have intended to make or produce a copy of that file. This element will therefore only be satisfied if the prosecution can prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was aware that the file was being downloaded, and intended to make or produce a copy of it.

Sexual Activity or Indecent Sexual Context

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] describes or depicts a person engaging in sexual activity, or depicts a person in an indecent sexual manner or context.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, it has not been disputed that the [describe relevant item] [describes or depicts a person engaging in sexual activity/depicts a person in an indecent sexual manner or context]. You should therefore have no difficulty finding that this element has been established.

[If this element is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

[If the relevant material does not show people engaging in sexual conduct, add the following darker shaded section.]

For this element to be satisfied, it is not necessary that the people involved actually be engaging in sexual conduct, or adopting an explicitly sexual pose. It is sufficient if the depiction in the material is of a sexual character, nature or context.

[If the relevant material does not depict real people, add the following darker shaded section.]

The people described or depicted in this way do not need to be real people. This element will be satisfied even if the people described as engaging in sexual activity, or depicted in an indecent sexual manner or context, are fictitious.

[If it is alleged that the material depicts a person in an indecent sexual context, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case, it is alleged that the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] depicts a person in an

---

[793] It is unclear whether downloading a file from the Internet constitutes production. See 7.3.28 Production of Child Pornography for further information.

"indecent" sexual manner or context. It is for you to decide whether this is so.

To determine whether something is indecent, you must consider contemporary community standards and values. That is, you must decide whether an ordinary member of the community would consider the depiction to be indecent, in light of our current standards of decency.

In making your determination, you must consider the context in which the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] was produced, and the purpose of its production. For example, a photograph of a naked child in a medical journal may not be indecent, even though the same photograph may be considered indecent if it was in a pornographic magazine.

In this case, the prosecution contends that the [describe relevant item] [describes or depicts a person engaging in sexual activity/depicts a person in an indecent sexual manner or context] because [describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denies this, arguing that [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] does describe or depict a person engaging in sexual activity, or does depict a person in an indecent sexual manner or context, that this third element will be met.

Age

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove relates to the age of the [person/people] described or depicted in the way I have just outlined. For this element to be met, [he/she/one of them] must either be under the age of [16/18], or must appear to be under that age.[794]

These are alternatives. It is not necessary for the prosecution to prove that a person in the material is both under [16/18] and appears to be that young. It will be sufficient if they can prove one or other of these facts beyond reasonable doubt.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, it is not contested that a person in the [describe relevant material] is, or appears to be, under the age of [16/18]. You should therefore have no difficulty finding that this element has been satisfied.

[If this element is in issue, and the prosecution has provided evidence of actual age, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, you have heard evidence that NOV was under [16/18] when the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] was produced. [Summarise relevant prosecution evidence.] The defence denies this, contending [summarise relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine if NOV was under [16/18] when the [describe relevant item] was made. If you find that s/he was, then this element will be met.

However, if you find that this has not been proven, you must then consider NOV's apparent age in the [film/photograph/publication/computer game].

Determining a person's apparent age is something you probably do every day. For example, you may look at a person who you don't know, and based on their physical characteristics you may estimate that they are over 50, or that they are under 20.

---

[794] The relevant age is 16 for offences alleged to have been committed before 18 May 2004, and 18 for offences alleged to have been committed on or after that date.

That is the same process that you need to apply here. You must carefully consider NOV's appearance, and determine whether s/he seems to be under [16/18]. If you find, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he does appear to be under that age, then this fourth element will be established.

[If this element is in issue, and the prosecution is relying on apparent age, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution has not provided any evidence that a person depicted in the material was actually under [16/18]. Instead, they have contended that this element has been met because [a person/people] in the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] appear[s] to be under that age. You must therefore consider the apparent age of the [person/people] in the [film/photograph/publication/computer game].

Determining a person's apparent age is something you probably do every day. For example, you may look at a person who you don't know, and based on their physical characteristics you may estimate that they are over 50, or that they are under 20.

That is the same process that you need to apply here. You must carefully consider the relevant material, and determine whether [the person/any of the people] depicted in it appear[s] to be under [16/18]. If you find, beyond reasonable doubt, that [he/she/at least one of them] does appear to be under that age, then this fourth element will be established.

Knowledge

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that, at the time the accused printed, made or otherwise produced the [film/photograph/publication/computer game], s/he knew that it contained child pornography, or was aware that this was likely.

This requires the accused to have known, or to have been aware that it was likely that, the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] described or depicted a person engaging in sexual activity, or in an indecent sexual manner or context.

It also requires the accused to have known, or to have been aware that it was likely, that [the person/at least one of the people] depicted in that way was under the age of [16/18], or appeared to be under that age.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that the accused had the relevant state of knowledge, because [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing that [insert relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused knew that the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] contained child pornography, or was aware that this was likely, that this fifth element will be met.

Defences

[If any of the exceptions in s 70AAA are relevant, insert appropriate directions on that exception/those exceptions here. See 7.3.28 Production of Child Pornography for guidance.]

[If the defence of classification is raised in respect of a film, a photograph contained in a publication or a computer game, include the following shaded section.]

It is a defence to a charge of production of child pornography that the [film/photograph contained in a publication/computer game] would, at the time it was made, have been classified by the Office of Film and Literature Classification as being other than RC or X 18+.[795]

A [film/photograph in a publication/computer game] may be classified RC or refused classification if it depicts, expresses or deals with matters of sex in a way that offends against the standards of morality and decency generally accepted by the community. This is the highest classification available and will only be given if the material is so offensive that it should not be classified.

A [film/computer game] may also be classified RC if it depicts or describes a person who is, or who appears to be, under the age of 18 in a way that is likely to cause offence to a reasonable adult.

A film will be classified X18+ if it is unsuitable for a minor to see and it contains real depictions of actual sexual activity between consenting adults which contain no violence, coercion or demeaning material that is likely to cause offence to a reasonable adult.

In applying these standards, you must consider community standards and values as they existed when the [film/photograph in the publication/computer game] was made or produced. You must decide whether an ordinary member of the community at that time would consider the material to be offensive.

The defence says that [describe relevant defence arguments]. The prosecution disputes this, saying that [describe relevant prosecution arguments].

This is one of those rare situations in which a matter must be proved by the accused. The prosecution must still prove all of the elements of the offence before you need to consider this defence. However, if you are satisfied that those elements have all been proven, it is defence counsel who must prove the requirements of this defence before you can find the accused not guilty.

Unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – the defence only needs to prove these requirements on what is called the "balance of probabilities". This is a much lower standard than that required of the prosecution when proving an offence. It only requires the defence to prove that it is more probable than not that the [film/photograph contained in a publication/computer game] would be classified as something other than RC or X18+.

[Insert any other defences that are open on the evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of production of child pornography, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA printed, made or otherwise produced a [film/photograph/publication/computer game]; and

Two – That NOA intended to print, make or produce that [film/photograph/publication/computer game]; and

---

[795] This charge assumes that the Office of Film and Literature Classification had not classified the item. If they have, then the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

This charge is based on the National Classification Code 2005 as on 30 July 2007, which contains X18+ classification rather than X classification. If the Code was different at the date of publication, the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

Three – That the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] describes or depicts a person engaging in sexual activity, or depicts a person in an indecent sexual manner or context; and

Four – That the person described or depicted in that way is, or appears to be, under the age of [16/18]; and

Five – That, at the time NOA printed, made or published the [film/photograph/publication/computer game], s/he knew that it contained child pornography, or was aware that this was likely.[796]

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of production of child pornography.

Last updated: 8 December 2014

7.3.28.2 Checklist: Production of Child Pornography

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused printed, made or otherwise produced a [film/photograph/publication/computer game]; and
2. The accused intended to print, make or otherwise produce that [film/photograph/publication/computer game]; and
3. The [film/photograph/publication/computer game] describes or depicts a person engaging in sexual activity, or depicts a person in an indecent sexual manner or context; and
4. A person depicted or described in that way, is or appears to be, under the age of [16/18];[797] and
5. The accused knew that the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] contained child pornography, or was aware that that was likely.

Production of a [Film/Photograph/Publication/Computer Game]

1. Did the accused print, make or otherwise produce a [film/photograph/publication/computer game]?

1.1 Is the item in question a [film/photograph/publication/computer game]?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Production of Child Pornography

1.2 Did the accused print, make or otherwise produce that [film/photograph/publication/computer game]?

If Yes, then go to 2

---

[796] The judge should also summarise any defences or exceptions that are in issue.

[797] The relevant age is 16 for offences alleged to have been committed before 18 May 2004, and 18 for offences alleged to have committed on or after that date.

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Production of Child Pornography

Intention

2. Did the accused intend to print, make or otherwise produce that [film/photograph/publication/computer game]?

If Yes, then go to 3.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Production of Child Pornography

Child Pornography

3.1 Does the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] describe or depict a person engaging in sexual activity?

If Yes, then go to 4.1

If No, then go to 3.2

3.2 Does the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] depict a person in an indecent sexual manner or context?

Consider – Would an ordinary member of the community consider the depiction to be indecent, in light of our current standards of decency?

If Yes, then go to 4.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Production of Child Pornography

Age

4.1 Is a person described or depicted engaging in sexual activity, or in an indecent sexual manner or context, under the age of [16/18]?

If Yes, then go to 5.1

If No, then go to 4.2

4.2 Does a person described or depicted engaging in sexual activity, or in an indecent sexual manner or context, appear to be under the age of [16/18]?

If Yes, then go to 5.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Production of Child Pornography

Accused's Knowledge or Awareness

5. Did the accused know that the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] contained child pornography, or was the accused aware that that was likely?

5.1 Did the accused know that the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] described or depicted someone who was under [16/18], or who appeared to be under [16/18], engaging in sexual activity?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Production of Child Pornography (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1.1, 1.2 and 2, Yes to either question 3.1 or 3.2, and Yes to either question 4.1 or 4.2)

If No, then go to 5.2

5.2 Was the accused aware that it was likely that the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] described or depicted someone who was under [16/18], or who appeared to be under [16/18], engaging in sexual activity?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Production of Child Pornography (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1.1, 1.2 and 2, Yes to either question 3.1 or 3.2, and Yes to either question 4.1 or 4.2)

If No, then go to 5.3

5.3 Did the accused know that the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] depicted someone who was under [16/18], or who appeared to be under [16/18], in an indecent sexual manner or context?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Production of Child Pornography (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1.1, 1.2 and 2, Yes to either question 3.1 or 3.2, and Yes to either question 4.1 or 4.2)

If No, then go to 5.4

5.4 Was the accused aware that it was likely that the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] depicted someone who was under [16/18], or who appeared to be under [16/18], in an indecent sexual manner or context?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Production of Child Pornography (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1.1, 1.2 and 2, Yes to either question 3.1 or 3.2, and Yes to either question 4.1 or 4.2)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Production of Child Pornography

Last updated: 28 February 2008

7.3.29 Possessing Child Abuse Material

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Commencement information

1. Section 51G of the Crimes Act 1958 establishes that it is an offence to knowingly possess child abuse material. The section came into effect on 1 July 2017 (Crimes Amendment (Sexual Offences) Act 2016 s 2).

Overview of elements

2. The offence requires that the prosecution prove three elements beyond reasonable doubt:
    - The accused possessed material;
    - The material was child abuse material
    - The accused knowingly possessed child abuse material (Crimes Act 1958 s 51G(1)).

Possessed material

3. The prosecution must prove the accused possessed the material in question (Crimes Act 1958 s 51G(1)).
4. For information on the meaning of 'material', see 7.3.26 Production of child abuse material.
5. This offence uses the common law meaning of possession (see, in relation to similar legislation, R v Shew [1998] QCA 333; Police v Kennedy (1998) 71 SASR 175). Possession requires proof that the accused has custody or control of material and an intention to possess that material (He Kaw Teh v The Queen (1985) 157 CLR 523; R v Maio [1989] VR 281). For more information on those issues, see 7.6.3 Possession of a drug of dependence.
6. Once a person has possession of goods, he or she remains in possession of goods that are in his or her control, even if he or she has forgotten of the existence of those goods (Police v Kennedy (1998) 71 SASR 175).
7. A person possesses electronic material if he or she controls access to the material. It is not necessary to show that the accused had physical possession of the material (Crimes Act 1958 s 51G(3)).
8. Section 51G provides two examples on how possession of electronic material operates:

    1 A has an online storage account for electronic material accessible with a username and password. A has control of what is stored in the account and can move material around within the account or delete material from the account. A has an electronic folder in the account that A has titled 'personal' in which A puts some electronic child abuse material. A knowingly has possession of child abuse material.

    2 In an online chat A is given a password for a joint email account that is shared with multiple users that A doesn't know. A logs into the email account and views emails that contain child abuse material images. While logged in A has the ability to view, move or delete emails that contain child abuse material. A continues to access the email account to view images. A knowingly has possession of child abuse material.

9. Examples are not exhaustive and may extend but do not limit the meaning of a provision (Interpretation of Legislation Act 1984 s 36A)(1)).

Child abuse material

10. The second element the prosecution must prove is that the material is child abuse material (Crimes Act 1958 s 51G(1)).
11. For information on the meaning of 'child abuse material', see 7.3.26 Production of child abuse material.

Knowingly possessing child abuse material

12. Section 51G requires that the accused must 'knowingly' possess child abuse material. This is consistent with the predecessor offence, which required proof that the accused knowingly possessed child pornography. While there have not been any cases on it, it is likely the requirement of knowing possessing requires proof that the accused knew the material was, or probably was child abuse material. As explained in 7.3.26 Production of child abuse material, this requires proof that the accused knew the material met or probably met both the content limb and the offensiveness limb of the definition of child abuse material.

Territorial operation

13. It does not matter that electronic material was outside Victoria, provided the accused was in Victoria at the time of some of all of the conduct constituting the offence (Crimes Act 1958 s 51G(4)).

14. Further, it does not matter that the accused was outside Victoria for some or all of the time of the conduct constituting the offence, as long as the electronic material was in Victoria (Crimes Act 1958 s 51G(5)).

Exceptions and defences

15. The Crimes Act 1958 provides three exceptions and seven defences to the offence of possessing child abuse material (see Crimes Act 1958 ss 51J, 51K, 51L, 51M, 51N, 51O, 51P, 51Q, 51R, 51T).

16. Three of the defences are only available if the accused has not distributed the child abuse material to a person other than the child depicted (Crimes Act 1958 ss 51P, 51Q, 51R), or at all (Crimes Act 1958 s 51O). Distribution for the purposes of these defences includes publishing, exhibiting, communicating, sending, supplying or transmitting the material or making it available to another person (Crimes Act 1958 s 51A(2)(b)).

17. Most of the applicable defences are explained in 7.3.26 Production of child abuse material. The exception is unsolicited possession under Crimes Act 1958 s 51T, which is described below.

18. It is a defence for the accused to prove, on the balance of probabilities, that:

    - The accused did not intentionally come into possession of child abuse material; and
    - On becoming aware of having come into possession of child abuse material, the accused, as soon as practicable, took all reasonable steps in the circumstances to cease possessing the material (Crimes Act 1958 s 51T).

Last updated: 17 March 2020

7.3.29.1 Charge: Possessing Child Abuse Material

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This direction is designed for cases where the child abuse material depicts the child engaged in, or apparently engaging in, a sexual pose or sexual activity. If the prosecution relies on other limbs of the definition of child abuse material, then the direction must be modified.

I must now direct you about the crime of possessing child abuse material. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following three elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – The accused possessed material.

Two – The material is child abuse material.

Three – The accused knowingly possessed child abuse material.

I will now explain these each of these elements in more detail.

Possessing material

The first element the prosecution must prove is that the accused possessed material.

This requires the prosecution to show that the accused had the photos in his/her custody or control.

[If the case involves electronic material, add the following direction.]

The law states that a person has possession of electronic material if s/he controls access to that material. It is not necessary to show the accused has physical control of the electronic files.[798]

The prosecution must also show the accused intended to possess the photos. This requires you to draw a conclusion about the accused's state of mind.

[Refer to relevant evidence and arguments.]

Child abuse material

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the material is child abuse material.

The law provides that child abuse material comes in many forms. You must consider three questions:

- One – Does the material depict a person who is child or who appears to be a child?
- Two – Does the material depict the person engaged in a sexual pose or activity?[799]
- Three – Would a reasonable person regard the material as offensive, given all the circumstances?

If you answer yes to each question, then the material is child abuse material.

Depicts or describes a child or someone who is or who appears to be a child

The first question requires the prosecution to show that the person depicted is a child or appears to be a child. For the purpose of this offence, a child is a person under the age of 18.

To prove this first part of the element, the prosecution says [identify relevant evidence and arguments]. In response, the defence says [identify relevant evidence and arguments].

As part of this element, you can take into account your own life experience about how young the relevant person appears to be. You can also take into account how that person is depicted. If the person is depicted as a child, then this part of the element would be proved, even if the person was actually an adult.

Subject matter of the material

The second question looks at what the material shows. It must show the person in a sexual pose or sexual activity.[800]

---

[798] If necessary, a judge may provide the jury with an example of possessing electronic material, such as the examples included in Crimes Act 1958 s 51G.

[799] If the prosecution relies on a different limb of the definition of child abuse material, this question should be modified accordingly, such as by asking whether the material depicts the genital or anal region of a person, or the breast area of a person who is or who appears to be female.

[800] If the prosecution relies on a different limb of the definition of child abuse material, this question should be modified accordingly, such as by asking whether the material depicts the genital or anal region of a person, or the breast area of a person who is or who appears to be female.

To prove this second part of the element, the prosecution says [identify relevant evidence and arguments]. In response, the defence says [identify relevant evidence and arguments].

Offensive to reasonable persons

The third question requires you to decide whether reasonable people would regard the material as being offensive in the circumstances.

For this question you must consider current community standards and values. You must decide whether it offensive when measured against the standards of morality, decency and propriety generally accepted by reasonable adults.

To prove this third part of the element, the prosecution says [identify relevant evidence and arguments]. In response, the defence says [identify relevant evidence and arguments].

Knowingly possessing child abuse material

The third element the prosecution must prove is that the accused knowingly possessed the child abuse material.

This requires the prosecution to prove the accused knew that the material contained, or probably contained, the three features that make something child abuse material.

That is, first, the accused knew that the material depicted, or probably depicted, a person who was or appeared to be under the age of 18 years; secondly, that the accused knew that the material depicted, or probably depicted, the person engaging in a sexual pose or sexual activity; and, thirdly, that the accused knew that reasonable persons would, or probably would, regard the material as being offensive in the circumstances.

[Identify relevant evidence and arguments.]

Defences

[If the defence has raised any relevant defence or exception, insert appropriate directions on that defence or exception here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find the accused guilty, you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proved the following three elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – NOA possessed material;

Two – The material is child abuse material;

Three – NOA knowingly possessed child abuse material.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of possessing child abuse material.

Last updated: 17 March 2020

7.3.29.2 Checklist: Possessing Child Abuse Material

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist is drafted on the assumption that the prosecution relies on clause (i)(C) of the definition of child abuse material. The checklist must be modified if the prosecution relies on a different limb of the definition.

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused possessed material; and

2. The material was child abuse material; and

3. The accused knowingly possessed child abuse material.

Possessing material

1. Did the accused possess material?

1.1. Is the item in question material?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Possessing Child Abuse Material

1.2. Did the accused have the material in his or her custody or control?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Possessing Child Abuse Material

Child Abuse Material

2. Is the material child abuse material?

2.1. Did it describe or depict someone who was, or appears to be, under the age of 18 years?

Consider – The person described or depicted does not need to be a real person

If Yes, then go to 2.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Possessing Child Abuse Material

2.2. Did the material describe or depict that person engaged in, or apparently engaging in, a sexual pose or sexual activity?

If Yes, then go to 2.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Possessing Child Abuse Material

2.3. In the circumstances, would reasonable persons regard the material as being offensive?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Possessing Child Abuse Material

Knowingly possessing child abuse material

3. Did the accused know that the material was, or probably was, child abuse material?

3.1. Did the accused know the material described or depicted, or probably described or depicted, someone who was, or appeared to be, under the age of 18 years?

If Yes, then go to 3.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Possessing Child Abuse Material

3.2. Did the accused know the material described or depicted, or probably described or depicted, that person engaged in, or apparently engaging in, a sexual pose or sexual activity?

If Yes, then go to 3.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Possessing Child Abuse Material

3.3. Did the accused know that reasonable persons would, or probably would, regard the material as being offensive?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Possessing Child Abuse Material (as long as you have answered Yes to all previous questions)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Possessing Child Abuse Material

Last updated: 17 March 2020

7.3.30 Possession of Child Pornography

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Commencement Information

1. The offence of Possession of Child Pornography (Crimes Act 1958 s 70) commenced operation on 1 January 1996.
2. This offence was amended by the Justice Legislation (Sexual Offences and Bail) Act 2004, to increase the relevant age of a child from "under 16" to "under 18". The revised age limit applies to offences alleged to have been committed on or after 18 May 2004.

Overview of Elements

3. Possession of Child Pornography has the following three elements, each of which must be proven beyond reasonable doubt:

   i) The accused knowingly possessed a film, photograph, publication or computer game;

   ii) That film, photograph, publication or computer game describes or depicts a person:

      (a) engaging in sexual activity; or

(b) depicted in an indecent sexual manner or context; and

iii) The person described or depicted in that way is, or appears to be, a minor.

Possession of a Film, Photograph, Publication or Game

4. There are two aspects to the first element:

   i) The accused must have knowingly possessed certain material; and

   ii) The material possessed must have been a film, photograph, publication or computer game.

Possession

5. The law relating to possession of child pornography is the common law of possession (R v Shew [1998] QCA 333; Police v Kennedy (1998) 71 SASR 175).

6. At common law, people have in their possession whatever is, to their knowledge, physically in their custody or under their physical control (DPP v Brooks [1974] AC 862; He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523; R v Maio [1989] VR 281; R v Mateiasevici [1999] 3 VR 185).

7. According to this definition, to prove that the accused possessed the relevant material, the prosecution must show that:

   i) The accused had physical custody of or control over that material;

   ii) The accused intended to have custody of or exercise control over that material; and

   iii) The accused knew the nature of the material, or was aware of its likely nature (R v Maio [1989] VR 281. See also He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523).

Custody and Control

8. People may have possession of an item even though they are not carrying the item or do not have it on them, as long as they have physical custody or control over the item (R v Maio [1989] VR 281; R v Mateiasevici [1999] 3 VR 185).

9. A person continues to be in possession of an item even if s/he forgets about its existence. In the absence of external intervention, once a person has possession of an item, s/he will continue to be in possession of that item until s/he takes some step to dispose of the item. The status of an item does not change with fluctuations in the memory of the possessor (Police v Kennedy (1998) 71 SASR 175; R v Buswell [1972] 1 All ER 75).

10. A person will generally not have possession of a film unless the user records or stores the film in some manner. This requires control over the recording, and capacity for subsequent viewing or reproduction (DPP v Kear [2006] NSWSC 1145).

Intention

11. A person will generally not have an intention to possess material that is automatically downloaded from the Internet onto his or her computer (R v Wescott Vic CC 26/5/2005; R v Bowden [2000] 2 All ER 418; R v Atkins [2000] 2 Cr App R 248; R v Smith [2003] 1 Cr App R 13; DPP v Kear [2006] NSWSC 1145).

12. This may occur due to the way in which the Internet works. When a computer user views an image on the Internet, that image will automatically be copied to a "temporary Internet cache", where it will remain until the user deletes it, or until the computer overwrites the image after a certain period of time. If a particular user is unaware of the existence and operation of this cache, he or she cannot be said to intentionally possess the images stored there (R v Smith [2003] 1 Cr App R 13; DPP v Kear [2006] NSWSC 1145).

13. A person will therefore generally not be guilty of possession of child pornography if s/he simply browses Internet sites which contain pornographic images. S/he must intend to possess those images (R v Wescott Vic CC 26/5/2005).

Knowledge

14. It has not yet been determined in Victoria precisely what the accused must have known about the material in his or her custody or control.

15. Following the principles in He Kaw Teh v R (1985) 157 CLR 523, it appears likely that the accused will have to have known, or been aware that it was likely, that s/he possessed pornographic images of a minor.

16. It will be sufficient for the prosecution to prove that the accused once knew that s/he had the relevant material in his or her possession, even if s/he had forgotten about it. This is because a person continues to possess an object s/he has taken possession of, until s/he does something to rid him/herself of it (Police v Kennedy (1998) 71 SASR 175; McCalla v R (1988) 87 Cr App R 372).

Photograph, Film, Publication or Game

17. The material possessed by the accused must have been a photograph, film, publication or computer game (Crimes Act 1958 s 67A).

18. The definition of a "photograph" includes a photocopy or other reproduction of a photograph (Crimes Act 1958 s 67A).

19. Crimes Act s 67A specifies that the terms "film", "publication" and "computer game" are to be given the same meaning as in the Classification (Publications, Films and Computer Games) Act 1995 (Cth).

20. A "film" is defined to include any form of recording from which a visual image may be reproduced. This includes cinematographic films, slides, video tapes or video disks (Classification (Publications, Films and Computer Games) Act 1995 (Cth) s 5).

21. A series of separate images downloaded to a computer by a user may also be considered to be a "film" (DPP v Kear [2006] NSWSC 1145).

22. A "computer game" is defined as a computer program capable of generating a display that allows for the playing of an interactive game (Classification (Publications, Films and Computer Games) Act 1995 (Cth) s 5A).[801]

23. Although a "publication" is defined as any written or pictorial material which is not a film, computer game or advertisement for a publication, film or computer game (Classification (Publications, Films and Computer Games) Act 1995 (Cth) s 5), private expressions of thought intended exclusively for private use, and which are not intended or likely to be distributed or disseminated, are not publications (R v Quick [2004] VSC 270).

24. Advertisements for publications, films or computer games are excluded from the definitions of those terms (Classification (Publications, Films and Computer Games) Act 1995 (Cth) s 5). It therefore seems that a person who possesses an advertisement containing child pornography will only be guilty of this offence if the advertisement is photographic.

---

[801] An "interactive game" is one where the way in which the game proceeds, and the result achieved at various stages of the game, is determined in response to the decisions, inputs and direct involvement of the player (Classification (Publications, Films and Computer Games) Act 1995 (Cth) s 5).

Sexual Activity or Indecent Sexual Context

25. The second element of this offence requires the film, photograph, publication or computer game to depict or describe a person "engaging in sexual activity or depicted in an indecent sexual manner or context" (Crimes Act 1958 s 67A).

26. It is not necessary that the person be engaging in sexual conduct or adopting a sexual pose. It is sufficient if the depiction is of a sexual character, nature or context (Walls v R Vic CC 14/07/2003).

27. It is not necessary that the depiction be of an event that has actually taken place. A fictitious account may depict or describe conduct constituting child pornography (R v Quick [2004] VSC 270).

28. The people depicted in the material do not need to be real people. An account involving fictitious people described as minors will be sufficient for this element to be met (Holland v The Queen (2005) 30 WAR 231).

29. In determining whether material is "indecent", it is necessary to apply contemporary standards and values. This must be assessed using community standards rather than the standards of any particular member of the jury (Walls v R Vic CC 14/07/2003; Phillips v SA Police (1994) 75 A Crim R 480; Crowe v Graham (1969) 121 CLR 375).

30. The context and purpose of the act will be relevant in determining whether it is indecent. For example, an act done for a legitimate medical purpose may not be indecent, even if the same act would be indecent if done for a prurient purpose (R v EG [2002] ACTSC 85; R v Court [1989] AC 28).

Age of the Victim

31. The third element of this offence requires a person depicted or described in the way outlined above to be, or appear to be, a minor (Crimes Act 1958 s 67A).

32. The age requirement for this section varies, depending on when the offence is alleged to have been committed:

    - For offences alleged to have been committed on or after 18 May 2004, the person depicted or described in the relevant way must be under the age of 18 (Crimes Act 1958 s 67A).
    - For offences alleged to have been committed prior to 18 May 2004, the person depicted or described in the relevant way must be under the age of 16 (Justice Legislation (Sexual Offences and Bail) Act 2004 s 4).

33. This element will be satisfied if the person depicted or described is under the relevant age limit, even if he or she does not appear to be so (Police v Kennedy (1998) 71 SASR 175).

34. In determining whether the victim "appears to be" a minor, the jury is required to make its own assessment of his or her apparent age (Police v Kennedy (1998) 71 SASR 175).

35. The jury must be satisfied that this element has been proven beyond reasonable doubt. Where the prosecution relies on the victim's "apparent age", this means that the jury must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused appears to be a minor (R v Wescott Vic CC 26/5/2005).

Exceptions

36. Section 70AAA of the Crimes Act 1958 sets out four exceptions to the offences of production of child pornography, procurement of minor for child pornography and possession of child pornography.

37. Section 70AAA commenced on 3 November 2014, and applies to all proceedings, regardless of when the offence is alleged to have been committed (Crimes Act 1958, s 626(5)).

38. Whenever one of the four exceptions requires a belief by the accused on reasonable grounds, the accused has the burden of proving this matter on a balance of probabilities (s 70AAA(7)).

39. For other matters, the prosecution bears the burden of disproving the exception.

40. These exceptions are explained in 7.3.28 Production of child pornography and apply, with any necessary alterations, to this offence.

Defences and Exemptions

41. Section 70(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 specifies five defences to Possession of Child Pornography:
    (a) Classification by the Office of Film and Literature Classification;
    (b) Artistic merit or genuine medical, legal, scientific or educational purposes;
    (c) Belief on reasonable grounds that:
        - The minor was 18 or older; or
        - The accused was married to the minor;
    (d) The accused was not more than 2 years older than the minor; and
    (e) The accused was one of the minors depicted.
42. It seems likely that the accused will bear the onus of establishing these defences on the balance of probabilities. This was the position agreed to by the parties, and taken by the judge, in Walls v R Vic CC 14/07/2003, in relation to the defence of artistic merit (s 70(2)(b)).
43. Certain acts by law enforcement officers are also exempted from the offence (s 70(4)).

Classification by the OFLC

44. The accused will have a defence if s/he possessed a film, a photograph contained in a publication, or a computer game which, at the time of the alleged offence:
    - Was classified by the Office of Film and Literature Classification (OFLC) as being other than RC,[802] X or X 18+; or
    - Would, if classified by the OFLC, be classified as being other than RC, X or X 18+ (Crimes Act 1958 s 70(2)).
45. This defence does not cover non-photographic aspects of publications, or photographs which are not contained in publications (Crimes Act 1958 s 70(2). See also R v Quick [2004] VSC 270).

Legitimate Purposes

46. The accused will also have a defence if s/he can prove on the balance of probabilities that the film, photograph, publication or computer game:
    - Possesses artistic merit; or
    - Is for a genuine medical, legal, scientific or educational purpose (Crimes Act 1958 s 70(2)(b)).
47. The defence of artistic merit does not apply if the prosecution proves that the person depicted in the pornography was actually under the age of 18 (as opposed to simply appearing to be under 18) (Crimes Act 1958 s 70(3)).
48. A person can only be "actually" under the age of 18 if they are a real person (rather than a fictitious person) (Walls v R Vic CC 14/07/2003).
49. "Artistic merit" is not defined in the Act and should be given its ordinary meaning (Walls v R Vic CC 14/07/2003).

---

[802] RC means "Refused Classification" (Classification (Publications, Films and Computer Games) Act 1995 s 7).

50. For material to possess "artistic merit" it must possess a quality which gives it worth or value according to the standards of art. Art includes exercises in human creative skill and imagination. The expression "artistic merit" suggests an evaluation of the visual impression given by a work, but it does not restrict the assessment to visual impression without regard to the nature and purpose of the work (Walls v R Vic CC 14/07/2003; Kelly-County v Beers (2004) 207 ALR 421).

51. An act is done for a "genuine purpose" if the purpose alleged by the actor is the actual purpose behind the act. Where an act is motivated by several purposes, the dominant purpose must be a medical, legal, scientific or educational purpose (Catch the Fire Ministries v Islamic Council of Victoria (2006) 15 VR 207).

52. There have not yet been any decisions about the meaning of a "medical, legal, scientific or educational purpose". These words are likely to be given their ordinary English meaning.

Belief on Reasonable Grounds

53. It is a defence to prove on the balance of probabilities that the accused believed on reasonable grounds that:

    (a) The minor was aged 18 years or older; or

    (b) The accused was married to the minor (Crimes Act 1958 s 70(2)(c)).

54. For there to be reasonable grounds for a state of mind (such as belief), there must exist facts which are sufficient to induce that state of mind in a reasonable person (George v Rockett (1990) 170 CLR 104).

55. Where a jury finds that a person "appears to be" under the age of 18, it is likely that any belief of the accused's that the person was aged 18 or over would be unreasonable. This limits the practical availability of the defence where the prosecution relies on the apparent age of the minor (Police v Kennedy (1998) 71 SASR 175).

Youth of the Accused

56. In relation to cases involving the possession of films or photographs, the accused may have a defence if:

    - S/he personally made the film or took the photograph; or
    - S/he was given the film or photograph by the minor involved.

57. In such cases, the accused will have a defence if s/he can prove on the balance of probabilities that when s/he made the film or took the photograph, or when she was given the film or photograph, s/he was not more than 2 years older than the minor was or appeared to be (Crimes Act 1958 s 70(2)(d)).

Depiction of the Accused

58. It is a defence to prove that the accused was one of the minors depicted in the film or photograph (Crimes Act 1958 s 70(2)(e)). See also "Exceptions" above.

Law Enforcement

59. The Act exempts the conduct of the following people who possess child pornography in the exercise of functions conferred under the Crimes Act 1958, any other Act, or the common law:

    (a) A member or officer of a law enforcement agency;

    (b) A person authorised in writing by the Chief Commissioner of Police who is assisting a member or officer;

(c) A person belonging to a class of persons who have been authorised in writing by the Chief Commissioner of Police assisting a member or officer (Crimes Act 1958 s 70(4)).

Last updated: 8 December 2014

7.3.30.1 Charge: Possession of Child Pornography

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of possessing child pornography. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – NOA knowingly possessed a [film/photograph/publication/computer game].

Two – the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] describes or depicts a person engaging in sexual activity or depicts a person in an indecent sexual context.

Three – the person depicted or described in that way is, or appears to be, under the age of [16/18].[803]

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Possession of a film, photograph, publication or computer game

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused knowingly possessed a [film/photograph/publication/computer game].

There are two parts to this element, both of which must be proven beyond reasonable doubt:

- First, the item in question – in this case the [describe relevant item] – must be a [film/photograph/publication/computer game].
- Second, the accused must have knowingly possessed that [film/photograph/publication/computer game].

Film, photograph, publication or computer game

[If it is not disputed that the relevant item is a film, photograph, publication or computer game, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, it is not disputed that the [describe relevant item] is a [film/photograph/publication/computer game], so you should have no difficulty finding this to be the case.

[If it is disputed that the relevant item is a film, photograph, publication or computer game, add the following shaded section.]

[For cases involving films, add the following darker shaded section.]

The law says that a "film" is any form of recording from which a visual image may be reproduced. This includes [insert any relevant examples, such as slides, video tapes, cinematographic films].[804]

[For cases involving photographs, add the following darker shaded section.]

---

[803] The relevant age is 16 for offences alleged to have been committed before 18 May 2004, and 18 for offences alleged to have committed on or after that date.

[804] The definition of a "film" excludes advertisements. If it is contended that the relevant item was an advertisement rather than a film, this issue will need to be addressed.

"Photograph" is an ordinary English word and does not have any special legal meaning. [If it is alleged that the photograph is a photocopy or reproduction, add: For the purposes of this offence, it includes photocopies or other reproductions of a photograph.]

[For cases involving publications, add the following darker shaded section.]

The law says that a "publication" is any published picture or piece of writing that is not a film, computer game or an advertisement. Because the writing or pictures must be "published", this definition does not include private expressions of thought which are not intended to be circulated or distributed to others – such as those contained in a personal diary or journal.

[For cases involving computer games, add the following darker shaded section.]

The law says that a "computer game" is a computer program that is capable of generating a display that allows for the playing of an interactive game. That is, it is a visual computer program that a person is directly involved in playing. He or she makes various decisions, which are input into the computer. The way in which the game proceeds, and the results achieved at the different stages of the game, will be determined in response to the player's input.

According to the prosecution, the [describe relevant item] is a [film/photograph/publication/computer game], because [insert relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denies this, claiming that [insert relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine whether the [describe relevant item] is a [film/photograph/publication/computer game]. If you are not satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it is, then you must find NOA not guilty of this offence.

Possession

If you are satisfied that the [describe relevant item] is a [film/photograph/publication/computer game], you must then determine whether NOA knowingly possessed that [film/photograph/publication/computer game].

According to the law, people are said to have in their possession whatever is, to their knowledge, physically in their custody or under their control. This definition of possession requires the prosecution to prove three matters beyond reasonable doubt.

First, the prosecution must prove that the accused had physical custody of, or control over, the [describe relevant item].

[If the case involves internet browsing, add the following shaded section.]

In relation to the Internet, this means that a person will not possess material that they merely look at, or "browse", on a website. To possess that material, a person must do something to take control over it. That is, s/he must do something that gives him/her the ability to control the viewing and reproduction of the relevant material.

Second, the prosecution must prove that the accused intended to have custody or exercise control over the [describe relevant item].

[If it is alleged that the accused unintentionally downloaded a file from the Internet onto his or her computer, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the defence has argued that the relevant file was unintentionally downloaded onto his/her computer, and that s/he therefore did not intend to possess that file. [Explain relevant evidence.]

If a person is not aware that s/he is downloading a file to his/her computer, s/he cannot be said to have intended to possess that file. This element will therefore only be satisfied if the prosecution can prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that NOA was aware that the file was being downloaded, and intended to possess it.

Third, the prosecution must prove that the accused knew that the [describe relevant item] contained child pornography, or was aware that this was likely.

This requires the accused to have known, or to have been aware that it was likely that, the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] described or depicted a person engaging in sexual activity, or in an indecent sexual manner or context.

It also requires the accused to have known, or to have been aware that it was likely, that [the person/at least one of the people] depicted in that way was under the age of [16/18], or appeared to be under that age.

[If there is a dispute over whether the accused had physical custody of the item, add the following shaded section.]

NOA does not need to have been carrying the [describe relevant item], or to have had it on him/her, to have had it in his/her possession. S/he will have been in possession of whatever was, to his/her knowledge, in his/her custody or under his/her control, even if it was not with him/her.

[In cases of joint possession, add the following shaded section.]

It is possible for more than one person to possess an item – so long as they each meet all of the requirements I have just mentioned.

[If the accused claimed to have forgotten that s/he possessed the relevant material, add the following shaded section.]

You have heard evidence in this case that [summarise relevant evidence]. If you find that NOA never knew that s/he possessed the [describe relevant item], then clearly this element will not be satisfied, for s/he will neither have intended to possess it nor have known of its sexual nature.

However, if you find that NOA once knew that s/he possessed the [describe relevant item], but had simply forgotten about it, then this element may be satisfied. It will be satisfied if you decide that NOA once had an intention to possess the [describe relevant item], knew of its sexual nature, and continued to have custody and control over it.

This is because, according to the law, a person continues to have an intention to possess an item s/he has taken possession of in the past, unless s/he take steps to get rid it. His/her possession of that item does not vary according to whether s/he remembers s/he has it or not.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA was knowingly in possession of [describe relevant item and insert relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert any relevant evidence or arguments].

Summary of First Element

To summarise, for this first element to be met, the prosecution must prove:

1. That [describe relevant item] is a [film/photograph/publication/computer game]; and
2. That NOA knowingly possessed that [film/photograph/publication/computer game]. That is, s/he had physical custody or control of it, s/he intended to have such custody or control, and s/he knew that it contained child pornography, or was aware that this was likely.

It is for you to determine, based on all of the evidence, whether all of these requirements have been met. It is only if you are satisfied that the prosecution has proven each of them, beyond reasonable doubt, that this first element will be established.

Sexual Activity or Indecent Sexual Context

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] describes or depicts a person engaging in sexual activity, or depicts a person in an indecent sexual manner or context.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, it has not been disputed that the [describe relevant item] [describes or depicts a person engaging in sexual activity/depicts a person in an indecent sexual manner or context]. You should therefore have no difficulty finding that this element has been established.

[If this element is in issue add the following shaded section.]

[If the relevant material does not show people engaging in sexual conduct, add the following darker shaded section.]

For this element to be satisfied, it is not necessary that the people involved actually be engaging in sexual conduct, or adopting an explicitly sexual pose. It is sufficient if the depiction in the material is of a sexual character, nature or context.

[If the relevant material does not depict real people, add the following darker shaded section.]

The people described or depicted in this way do not need to be real people. This element will be satisfied even if the people described as engaging in sexual activity, or depicted in an indecent sexual manner or context, are fictitious.

[If it is alleged that the material depicts a person in an indecent sexual context, add the following darker shaded section.]

In this case, it is alleged that the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] depicts a person in an "indecent" sexual manner or context. It is for you to decide whether this is so.

To determine whether something is indecent, you must consider contemporary community standards and values. That is, you must decide whether an ordinary member of the community would consider the depiction to be indecent, in light of our current standards of decency.

In making your determination, you must consider the context in which the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] was produced, and the purpose of its production. For example, a photograph of a naked child in a medical journal may not be indecent, even though the same photograph may be considered indecent if it was in a pornographic magazine.

In this case, the prosecution contends that the [describe relevant item] [describes or depicts a person engaging in sexual activity/depicts a person in an indecent sexual manner or context] because [describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denies this, arguing that [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] does describe or depict a person engaging in sexual activity, or does depict a person in an indecent sexual manner or context, that this second element will be met.

Age

The third element that the prosecution must prove relates to the age of the [person/people] described or depicted in the way I have just outlined. For this element to be met, [he/she/one of them] must either be under the age of [16/18], or must appear to be under that age.[805]

These are alternatives. It is not necessary for the prosecution to prove that a person in the material is both under [16/18] and appears to be that young. It will be sufficient if they can prove one or other of these facts beyond reasonable doubt.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, it is not contested that a person in the [describe relevant material] is, or appears to be, under the age of [16/18]. You should therefore have no difficulty finding that this element has been satisfied.

[If this element is in issue, and the prosecution has provided evidence of actual age, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, you have heard evidence that NOV was under [16/18] when the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] was produced. [Summarise relevant prosecution evidence.] The defence denies this, contending [summarise relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to determine if NOV was under [16/18] when the [describe relevant item] was made. If you find that s/he was, then this element will be met.

However, if you find that this has not been proven, you must then consider NOV's apparent age in the [film/photograph/publication/computer game].

Determining a person's apparent age is something you probably do every day. For example, you may look at a person who you don't know, and based on their physical characteristics you may estimate that they are over 50, or that they are under 20.

That is the same process that you need to apply here. You must carefully consider NOV's appearance, and determine whether s/he seems to be under [16/18]. If you find, beyond reasonable doubt, that s/he does appear to be under that age, then this third element will be established.

[If this element is in issue, and the prosecution is relying on apparent age, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution has not provided any evidence that a person depicted in the material was actually under [16/18]. Instead, they have contended that this element has been met because [a person/people] in the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] appear[s] to be under that age. You must therefore consider the apparent age of the [person/people] in the [film/photograph/publication/computer game].

Determining a person's apparent age is something you probably do every day. For example, you may look at a person who you don't know, and based on their physical characteristics you may estimate that they are over 50, or that they are under 20.

That is the same process that you need to apply here. You must carefully consider the relevant material, and determine whether [the person/any of the people] depicted in it appear[s] to be under [16/18]. If you find, beyond reasonable doubt, that [he/she/at least one of them] does appear to be under that age, then this third element will be established.

---

[805] The relevant age is 16 for offences alleged to have been committed before 18 May 2004, and 18 for offences alleged to have been committed on or after that date.

Defences[806]

[If any of the exceptions in s 70AAA are relevant, insert appropriate directions on that exception/those exceptions here. See 7.3.28 Possession of Child Pornography for guidance.]

Even if you find that the prosecution has proven all three elements of this offence, NOA will not necessarily be guilty of this offence. This is because there are certain circumstances in which a person is allowed to possess child pornography. That is, they have a defence to the charge.

[If the defence of artistic merit is open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

Of relevance to this case, the law says that NOA will have a defence to this offence if s/he can prove that the [describe relevant item] possesses artistic merit.

This is an ordinary, English term, which does not have a specific legal meaning. It is for you to determine whether [describe relevant item] has artistic merit.

In deciding this, you should consider the nature of the item and the context in which it was possessed. You may also consider factors such as whether the [describe relevant item] exists to appeal to the aesthetic, rather than erotic, tastes of those who view it, and whether it is a product of human creativity and imagination. However, these are only guides. It is your decision to make, taking into account all of the evidence.

[If the defence of genuine medical, legal, scientific or educational purpose is open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

Of relevance to this case, the law says that NOA will have a defence to this offence if s/he can prove that s/he possessed the [describe relevant item] for a genuine [medical/legal/scientific/educational] purpose.

This is an ordinary English phrase, which does not have a specific legal meaning. It is for you to determine, based on all the evidence, whether NOA genuinely possessed the [describe relevant item] for a [medical/legal/scientific/educational] purpose. That must have been their dominant purpose for having that material.

[If the defendant claims to have believed on reasonable grounds that the minor was aged 18 years or older, add the following shaded section.]

Of relevance to this case, the law says that NOA will have a defence to this offence if s/he can prove that s/he believed on reasonable grounds that the person depicted or described in the [describe relevant material] was aged 18 or older.

This requires the defence to prove that NOA believed that the person depicted or described in the [describe relevant material] was aged 18 or older. It also requires the defence to prove that NOA had reasonable grounds for that belief. For there to be reasonable grounds for a belief, you must be satisfied that the belief was based on facts which would have caused a reasonable person to believe the same thing.

---

[806] If the defendant relies on Crimes Act 1958 s 70(2)(a) (Classification other than RC, X or X18+), then the jury must be directed on this defence. 7.3.28.1 Charge: Production of Child Pornography contains a sample charge for this defence.

This is one of those rare situations in which a matter must be proved by the accused. It is defence counsel who must prove to you that [the item possessed artistic merit/NOA possessed the item for a genuine [medical/legal/scientific/educational] purpose/NOA believed on reasonable grounds that the person was aged 18 over].

This means that, if you are satisfied that the prosecution has proven all of the elements of the offence, you must find NOA guilty unless s/he can prove that s/he met all the requirements of [one of] the defence[s].

However, unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – defence counsel only needs to prove these requirements on what is called the "balance of probabilities". This is a much lower standard than that required of the prosecution when proving an element of an offence. It only requires defence counsel to prove that it is more probable than not that the [item possessed artistic merit/NOA possessed the item for a genuine [medical/legal/scientific/educational] purpose/NOA believed on reasonable grounds that the person was aged 18 or over].

In this case, defence counsel argued that [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments]. The prosecution rejected these arguments, contending that [describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments].

[Insert any other relevant defences here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of possession of child pornography, the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA knowingly possessed a [film/photograph/publication/computer game]. That is:

- The item possessed by NOA was a [film/photograph/publication/computer game]; and
- NOA had physical custody of or control over that [film/photograph/publication/computer game], intended to have custody or exercise control over it; and knew that it contained child pornography, or was at least aware that this was likely; and

Two – That the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] describes or depicts a person engaging in sexual activity, or depicts a person in an indecent sexual manner or context; and

Three – That the person described or depicted in that way is, or appears to be, under the age of [16/18].

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of possession of child pornography.

[If a defence is open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

However, even if the prosecution has proven each of these elements to you, NOA will not be guilty of this offence if s/he has proven that it is more probable than not that [the item possessed artistic merit/NOA possessed the item for a genuine [medical/legal/scientific/educational] purpose/NOA believed on reasonable grounds that the person was 18 or over].

Last updated: 8 December 2014

7.3.30.2 Checklist: Possession of Child Pornography

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused knowingly possessed a [film/photograph/publication/computer game]; and
2. The [film/photograph/publication/computer game] describes or depicts a person engaging in sexual activity, or depicts a person in an indecent manner or sexual context; and

3. A person described or depicted in that way is, or appears to be, under the age of [16/18].[807]

Knowing Possession

1. Did the accused knowingly possess a [film/photograph/publication/computer game]?

1.1 Is the item in question a [film/photograph/publication/computer game]?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Possession of Child Pornography

1.2 Did the accused have physical custody or control over that [film/photograph/publication/computer game]?

If Yes, then go to 1.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Possession of Child Pornography

1.3 Did the accused intend to have custody or exercise control over that [film/photograph/publication/computer game]?

If Yes, then go to 1.4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Possession of Child Pornography

1.4 Did the accused know that the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] contained child pornography, or was the accused aware that that was likely?

1.4.1 Did the accused know that the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] described or depicted someone who was under [16/18], or who appeared to be under [16/18], engaging in sexual activity?

If Yes, then go to 2.1

If No, then go to 1.4.2

1.4.2 Was the accused aware that it was likely that the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] described or depicted someone who was under [16/18], or who appeared to be under [16/18], engaging in sexual activity?

If Yes, then go to 2.1

---

[807] The relevant age is 16 for offences alleged to have been committed before 18 May 2004, and 18 for offences alleged to have committed on or after that date.

If No, then go to 1.4.3

1.4.3 Did the accused know that the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] depicted someone who was under [16/18], or who appeared to be under [16/18], in an indecent sexual manner or context?

If Yes, then go to 2.1

If No, then go to 1.4.4

1.4.4 Was the accused aware that it was likely that the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] depicted someone who was under [16/18], or who appeared to be under [16/18], in an indecent sexual manner or context?

If Yes, then go to 2.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Possession of Child Pornography

Child Pornography

2.1 Does the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] describe or depict a person engaging in sexual activity?

If Yes, then go to 3.1

If No, then go to 2.2

2.2 Does the [film/photograph/publication/computer game] depict a person in an indecent sexual manner or context?

Consider – Would an ordinary member of the community consider the depiction to be indecent, in light of our current standards of decency?

If Yes, then go to 3.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Possession of Child Pornography

Age

3.1 Is a person described or depicted engaging in sexual activity, or in an indecent sexual manner or context, under the age of [16/18]?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Possession of Child Pornography (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1.1, 1.2 and 1.3, Yes to any of questions 1.4.1, 1.4.2, 1.4.3 or 1.4.4, and Yes to either question 2.1 or 2.2)

If No, then go to 3.2

3.2 Does a person described or depicted engaging in sexual activity, or in an indecent sexual manner or context, appear to be under the age of [16/18]?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Possession of Child Pornography (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1.1, 1.2 and 1.3, Yes to any of questions 1.4.1, 1.4.2, 1.4.3 or 1.4.4, and Yes to either question 2.1 or 2.2)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Possession of Child Pornography

Last updated: 28 February 2008

7.4 Other Offences against the Person

7.4.1 Intentionally Causing Serious Injury in Circumstances of Gross Violence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. The offence of intentionally causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence is created by Crimes Act 1958 s 15A.
2. The offence has the following five elements:
   (a) The complainant suffered a "serious injury";
   (b) The accused caused the complainant's serious injury;
   (c) The accused intended to cause serious injury;
   (d) The injury was caused in circumstances of "gross violence"; and
   (e) The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.
3. This offence is an aggravated form of intentionally causing serious injury and differs only in the additional element that the injury was caused in circumstances of "gross violence". This topic only addresses the meaning of gross violence. For information on the other elements, see 7.4.2 Intentionally Causing Serious Injury.

Commencement Date

4. This offence applies to offences committed on or after 1 July 2013, following the commencement of the Crimes Amendment (Gross Violence Offences) Act 2013.

Gross Violence

5. The prosecution must prove that the accused caused serious injury to another in circumstances of gross violence.
6. Section 15A(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 exhaustively defines circumstances of gross violence as one or more of the following:

a) The offender planned in advance to engage in conduct and at the time of the planning–

i) The offender intended that the conduct would cause a serious injury; or

ii) The offender was reckless as to whether the conduct would cause a serious injury; or

iii) A reasonable person would have foreseen that the conduct would be likely to result in a serious injury;

b) The offender in company with 2 or more other persons caused the serious injury;

c) The offender entered into an agreement, arrangement or understanding with 2 or more other persons to cause a serious injury;

d) The offender planned in advance to have with him or her and to use an offensive weapon, firearm or imitation firearm and in fact used the offensive weapon, firearm or imitation firearm to cause the serious injury;

e) The offender continued to cause injury to the other person after the other person was incapacitated;

f) The offender caused the serious injury to the other person while the other person was incapacitated.

Planned in advance

7. The precise meaning of the phrase "planned in advance" has not been considered at an appellate level. In Farha v R, the trial judge had distinguished the sort of planning in advance required for this offence from the level of pre-concert required for complicity. The judge noted that while an agreement for the purpose of complicity could be formed moments before the offending, planning for the purpose of gross violence could not occur at the scene of offending. The Court of Appeal observed that this may have been favourable to the accused depending on what 'in advance' means (Farha v The Queen [2018] VSCA 310, [44]–[51]).

Foresight that conduct would likely cause a serious injury

8. The meaning of the word "likely" varies with context and can range between requiring proof that a matter is a "real chance" through to requiring proof that the matter is more likely than not (see Attorney-General (NSW) v Winters [2007] NSWSC 1071).

9. While there have not been any decisions on the meaning of likely for the purposes of section 15A(2), this Charge Book takes the prudential approach of requiring proof that a reasonable person would have realised that the conduct was more likely than not to cause a serious injury. It is not sufficient that serious injury was possible, or a "real chance" (compare Boughey v R (1986) 161 CLR 10 and Hannes v Director of Public Prosecutions (No 2) [2006] NSWCCA 373).

Incapacitation

10. While this provision has not been interpreted, it is likely that the word "incapacitated" in sections 15A(2)(e) and (f) carries its ordinary meaning of a person being unable to defend himself or herself.

11. In many cases, this will arise when the complainant is rendered unconscious. Future cases may also identify other possible causes of incapacitation.

Alternative offences

12. Intentionally causing serious injury is a statutory alternative to intentionally causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence (Crimes Act 1958 s 422).

13. Intentionally causing injury (Crimes Act 1958 s 18) is an impliedly included offence to a charge of intentionally causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence (see R v Kane (2001) 3 VR 542). See 3.10 Alternative Verdicts on when a judge needs to leave alternative offences.

Last updated: 6 November 2019

7.4.1.1 Charge: Intentionally Causing Serious Injury in Circumstances of Gross Violence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be given if:

i) the offence was allegedly committed on or after 1 July 2013,

ii) the accused has been charged with Intentionally causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence, and

iii) Intentionally causing serious injury and Intentionally causing injury are available alternative offences.

If intentionally causing serious injury or intentionally causing injury are not left as alternative offences, the charge must be modified accordingly.

This charge is designed for cases where the injury is one which endangers life or is substantial and protracted. If the injury involves the destruction of a foetus, the charge will need to be modified.

Charge

I must now direct you about the crime of intentionally causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the complainant suffered a serious injury.

Two – the accused caused the complainant's serious injury.

Three – the accused intended to cause the complainant serious injury.

Four – the accused caused the complainant's serious injury in circumstances of gross violence.

Five – the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Serious Injury

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant suffered a serious injury.

The law defines the word injury to mean physical injury or harm to mental health, whether temporary or permanent. A serious injury is an injury which endangers life or is substantial and protracted.[808]

[If multiple injuries were inflicted, add the following shaded section.]

In making your decision, you do not have to look at each of NOC's injuries separately, and decide whether or not any one of them is a serious injury. A person may suffer a serious injury because of the cumulative effect of several injuries.

[If the physical injuries caused ongoing psychological harm, add the following shaded section.]

An injury may be substantial and protracted because of the combined effect of the immediate physical injuries and prolonged psychological injuries.

In this case, the prosecution alleges that NOC's injuries were serious, because [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denies this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments]. It is only if you are satisfied that NOC's injury endangered his/her life or was substantial and protracted that this first element will be met.

Causation

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused caused the complainant's serious injury.

[If causation is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that doing so caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that [insert relevant causal acts] caused NOC to be seriously injured. However, the defence contends that NOA did not commit those acts. For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason (such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a relevant charge from 7.1.2.1 Charges: Causation should be adapted and inserted here.]

Intention

The third element relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that at the time the accused did the acts that you find caused the complainant's injury, s/he intended to seriously injure NOC.

This element will not be satisfied if NOA only intended to injure NOC, but happened to seriously injure him/her. For this element to be met, NOA must have intended to seriously injure NOC. That is, NOA must have intended to inflict an injury which would endanger NOC's life or which would be substantial and protracted [if necessary, add: or involved the destruction of a foetus other than in the course of a medical procedure].

It is not, however, necessary that NOA intended to inflict the injury that NOC actually suffered. This third element will be satisfied even if NOA intended to inflict a different kind of serious injury.

---

[808] The judge should consider including an example of a serious injury, such as brain damage, or a stabbing which causes significant blood loss.

In this case the prosecution submitted that you can infer that NOA intentionally [describe relevant act and describe relevant evidence and/or arguments]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments]. When you are considering this evidence, you will remember what I told you earlier about drawing inferences.

Gross Violence

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused caused the serious injury in circumstances of gross violence.

The phrase "circumstances of gross violence" has a special legal meaning. To prove this element, the prosecution must show that:

[Add any of the following circumstances which are relevant:

- NOA planned in advance to [describe relevant conduct] and at the time of the planning, s/he intended that the conduct would cause a serious injury;
- NOA planned in advance to [describe relevant conduct] and at the time of the planning, s/he was reckless as to whether the conduct would cause a serious injury;[809]
- NOA planned in advance to [describe relevant conduct] and at the time of the planning, a reasonable person would have foreseen that the conduct was more likely than not to result in serious injury;
- NOA caused the injury in company with 2 or more other people. In this case, the prosecution says that NOA committed the offence in company with [identify alleged co-offenders];
- NOA caused the serious injury as part of a joint criminal enterprise with 2 or more other people. You will recall what I have told you about a joint criminal enterprise;
- NOA planned in advance to have with him/her and use an offensive weapon, firearm or imitation firearm with him/her and s/he used the offensive weapon, firearm or imitation firearm to cause the serious injury;
- NOA continued to cause injury to NOC after NOC was incapacitated;
- NOA caused serious injury to NOC while NOC was incapacitated.]

[If there is a dispute about whether NOC was incapacitated, add the following shaded section.]

A person is incapacitated if he or she is no longer able to defend himself or herself in the circumstances. In this case, the prosecution says that NOV was incapacitated when [describe alleged cause and circumstances of incapacitation]. The defence disputes this, and argues that [identify relevant defence evidence and arguments].

[Identify relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

To prove this fourth element, the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that one [if necessary, add: or more] of these circumstances of gross violence existed.

---

[809] See 7.4.5 Recklessly Causing Serious Injury and 7.4.5.1 Charge: Recklessly Causing Serious Injury (From 1/7/13) for guidance on the meaning of recklessness.

Without Lawful Justification or Excuse

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert directions from the relevant topics here (see Part 8: Victorian Defences.]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of intentionally causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOC was seriously injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that serious injury; and

Three – That NOA intended to seriously injure NOC; and

Four – That NOA caused the serious injury in circumstances of gross violence; and

Five – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of intentionally causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence.

Warning: The following directions should only be given if the judge leaves lesser alternative offences. See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 11 and 3.10 Alternative Verdicts on when to leave lesser alternative offences.

Intentionally Causing Serious Injury

I must also direct you about the crime of intentionally causing serious injury. This is an alternative to the offence of intentionally causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence. That means that you only need to return a verdict on this offence if you find NOA not guilty of intentionally causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence.

The only difference between this alternative offence and the offence on the indictment is that the prosecution does not need to prove that NOA caused the serious injury in circumstances of gross violence. Therefore, if you are satisfied that the other elements have been proved, but are not satisfied that the prosecution has proved the fourth element, then you may find the accused guilty of intentionally causing serious injury.

Intentionally Causing Injury

The next alternative offence is intentionally causing injury. This is an alternative to the offences of intentionally causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence and intentionally causing serious injury.

The offence of intentionally causing injury is very similar to the offence of intentionally causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence, with two important differences: first, the prosecution does not need to prove that circumstances of gross violence existed. Second, the accused only needs to have caused, and to have intended to cause, the complainant to suffer injury rather than serious injury.

So the four elements of intentionally causing injury that the prosecution have to prove beyond reasonable doubt are:

One – That NOC was injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that injury; and

Three – That NOA intended to injure NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

The way that you determine whether these elements have been proved is the same as for the offence of intentionally causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence, apart from the difference in the level of injury required.

This means that, in relation to the first element, it is for you to determine whether NOC suffered physical injury or harm to his/her mental health. The law says that physical injury includes unconsciousness, disfigurement, substantial pain, infection with a disease and an impairment of bodily function. The law also says that harm to mental health includes psychological harm, but not emotional reactions such as distress, grief, fear or anger which do not result in psychological harm. You must therefore decide whether NOC has suffered an injury, as opposed to some superficial or trivial harm.

In relation to the second element, it means that you must be satisfied that it was the accused who caused the complainant's injury.

[If causation is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

As I told you in relation to the offence of intentionally causing serious injury, it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that this caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

This requires you to be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason (such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a brief summary of the relevant issues should be inserted here.]

In relation to the third element, you must be satisfied that NOA intended to injure NOC, and in relation to the fourth element you must be satisfied that s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

Again, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding the fourth element proven.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, summarise the relevant issues.]

If you find that any of these four elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of intentionally causing injury.

Last updated: 29 June 2015

7.4.1.2 Checklist: Intentionally Causing Serious Injury in Circumstances of Gross Violence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The complainant suffered a serious injury; and

2. The accused caused the complainant's serious injury; and

3. The accused intended to cause serious injury to the complainant; and

4. The accused caused the complainant's serious injury in circumstances of gross violence; and

5. The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

Serious Injury

1. Did the complainant suffer a serious injury?

Consider – Injury means physical injury or harm to mental health, whether temporary or permanent

Consider – Serious injury means

(a) an injury (including the cumulative effect of several injuries) that:

(i) endangers life or

(ii) is substantial and protracted; or

(b) the destruction of the foetus of a pregnant woman, other than in the course of a medical procedure, whether or not the woman suffers any other harm

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of intentionally causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence

---

Causation

2. Did the accused cause the complainant's serious injury?

Consider – Were the accused's actions a substantial or significant cause of the complainant's serious injury?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of intentionally causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence

---

Intention

3. Did the accused intend to cause serious injury to the complainant?

Consider – It is not sufficient for the accused to have only intended to cause injury.

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of intentionally causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence

Circumstances of Gross Violence

4. Did the accused cause the serious injury in circumstances of gross violence?

Consider – Circumstances of gross violence include [identify relevant circumstances]

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Intentionally Causing Serious Injury in Circumstances of Gross Violence

Lawful Justification or Excuse

5. Did the accused act without lawful justification or excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of intentionally causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of intentionally causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence

Last updated: 30 May 2014

7.4.2 Intentionally Causing Serious Injury

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. The offence of intentionally causing serious injury is created by Crimes Act 1958 s 16.
2. The offence has the following four elements:
   (a) The complainant suffered a "serious injury";
   (b) The accused caused the complainant's serious injury;
   (c) The accused intended to cause serious injury; and
   (d) The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

"Serious Injury"

3. The Crimes Amendment (Gross Violence Offences) Act 2013 substituted a new exhaustive definition for "serious injury", which had previously been defined inclusively. Due to the operation of the transitional provision, Crimes Act 1958 s 618, the new definition only applies to offences committed on or after 1 July 2013.
4. Where an offence is alleged to have been committed between two dates, one date before and one date after 1 July 2013, the law in force prior to the amendments applies (Crimes Act 1958 s 618).
5. This topic separately describes the operation of this element for offences committed before and after 1 July 2013.

Serious Injury after 1 July 2013

6. From 1 July 2013, Crimes Act 1958 section 15 contains the following relevant definitions:

> Injury means:
>
> a) Physical injury; or
>
> b) Harm to mental health;
>
> whether temporary or permanent
>
> Serious injury means:
>
> a) An injury (including the cumulative effect of more than one injury) that–
>
> i) Endangers life; or
>
> ii) Is substantial and protracted;
>
> b) The destruction, other than in the course of a medical procedure, of the foetus of a pregnant woman, whether or not the woman suffers any other harm.

7. Physical injury and harm to mental health are both defined inclusively. Physical injury includes unconsciousness, disfigurement, substantial pain, infection with a disease and impairment of bodily function. Harm to mental health includes psychological harm, but does not include emotions such as distress, grief, fear or anger unless such emotions result in psychological harm (Crimes Act 1958 s 15).
8. Under the law in force before 1 July 2013, serious injury was inclusively defined to include a combination of injuries and the destruction of a foetus. Whether an injury was serious involved a value judgment by the jury (R v Welsh & Flynn Vic CCA 16/10/1987).
9. In contrast, for offences committed after 1 July 2013 the definition of serious injury is exclusive. Once a jury determines that an injury endangers life, is substantial and protracted, or involves the destruction of a foetus, there is no separate value judgment on whether the injury is a "serious injury".

Serious Injury before 1 July 2013

10. For offences committed before 1 July 2013, "serious injury" is an ordinary English term. It is for the jury to determine, as a question of fact, whether the complainant's injuries are sufficient to qualify as "serious" (R v Welsh & Flynn Vic CCA 16/10/1987; R v Ferrari [2002] VSCA 186).
11. In making this determination, the jury must make a value judgment about the gravity of the complainant's injuries (R v Welsh & Flynn Vic CCA 16/10/1987; R v Ferrari [2002] VSCA 186; R v Cogley [1989] VR 799).
12. The jury may compare the injury in question with injuries which common experience suggests would be superficial or trifling, and therefore fall short of being "serious injuries" (R v Welsh & Flynn Vic CCA 16/10/1987; R v Ferrari [2002] VSCA 186; R v Cogley [1989] VR 799).
13. The injury must be assessed in its context. The complainant's age, gender and state of health may all be relevant when assessing whether the injury is serious. An injury that is inflicted on a frail person may be more serious than the same injury inflicted on a person in good health (R v Welsh & Flynn Vic CCA 16/10/1987; Reyne v The Queen [2022] NSWCCA 201, [123]–[127]).
14. The jury does not need to find that the defendant inflicted "really serious" injury, as was previously the case when the offence required the accused to have caused grievous bodily harm (R v Welsh & Flynn Vic CCA 16/10/1987).

15. The jury is not restricted to considering physical injuries. "Injury" (and by implication "serious injury") includes unconsciousness, hysteria, pain and any substantial impairment of bodily function (Crimes Act 1958 s 15).

16. Under this definition, injury can include infecting a person with a disease. This occurs at the time of infection. It does not matter that the disease or virus takes time to manifest, or that the victim may spontaneously clear the disease without developing symptoms or consequences. Causing injury does not require something immediate or require that future harm be inevitable or even likely (Peters v The Queen (No 2) (2019) 60 VR 231, [61]–[63]).

17. In the case of a disease, the likelihood of future consequences and the nature of those consequences is relevant to whether the injury is serious. This must be assessed at the time of infection, but may be informed by hindsight given subsequent events. The jury is required to decide whether the injury is serious, not whether the injury had serious consequences (Peters v The Queen (No 2) (2019) 60 VR 231, [62], [67]).

18. The prospect that medical treatment may reduce the impact of a disease cannot reverse the seriousness of the injury. The side effects of treatment may instead go to show that the injury is serious (Peters v The Queen (No 2) (2019) 60 VR 231, [69]).

19. The jury is also not restricted to considering the gravity of one particular injury. A serious injury includes a combination of injuries and includes the destruction, other than in the course of a medical procedure, of the foetus of a pregnant woman, whether or not the woman suffers any other harm (Crimes Act 1958 s 15).

20. At common law, there was no clear rule on whether a foetus was considered part of the mother, or whether it had a sui generis status until it was born. Instead, the matter depended on the specific legal context in which the question arose and the effect of any relevant legislation (R v King (2003) 59 NSWLR 472. See also Attorney-General's Reference (No 3 of 1994) [1998] AC 245 and R v Sullivan [1991] 1 SCR 489).

21. Following amendments introduced by the Abortion Law Reform Act 2008, destruction of a foetus can constitute a serious injury, even if the mother does not herself suffer any other harm and it is not necessary to show that the foetus was born alive (Crimes Act 1958 s 15).

22. The definitions of "serious" and "injury" in Crimes Act 1958 s 15 as in force before 1 July 2013 are not exhaustive. Jurors are free to use their own experiences when determining whether or not the complainant has suffered a serious injury (R v Welsh & Flynn Vic CCA 16/10/1987; R v Ferrari [2002] VSCA 186).

23. It is ultimately a matter for the jury to determine whether an injury is sufficiently serious. It is unwise to attempt a more elaborate explanation (R v Rhodes (1984) 14 A Crim R 124).

Causing Serious Injury

24. The complainant's serious injury must have been caused by the accused. For detailed information about causation, see 7.1.2 Causation.

25. The injury does not need to have been caused by the accused personally assaulting the complainant. This element will be satisfied even if s/he caused the injury indirectly (R v Salisbury [1976] VR 452).

Intention to cause serious injury

26. It is not sufficient that the accused intended to do the act that injured the complainant. S/he must have intended to cause serious injury (R v Westaway (1991) 52 A Crim R 336).

27. It is also not sufficient for the accused to have intended only to cause injury. S/he must have intended to cause serious injury (R v Westaway (1991) 52 A Crim R 336; R v Liewes Vic CA 10/04/1997; DPP v Fevaleaki [2006] VSCA 212).

28. The accused does not need to have intended to have caused the precise injury that s/he ultimately caused. It is only necessary that the accused intended to cause an injury that is a serious injury, and actually causes a serious injury (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378).

29. The nature of the accused's acts may provide evidence of his/her intention (R v McKnoulty (1995) 77 A Crim R 333).

30. Intention and causation must always be treated as separate issues. This is especially important if the accused did not directly cause the complainant's injuries. In such cases, the jury must separately assess whether the accused caused those injuries, and whether s/he intended to cause serious injury (R v McKnoulty (1995) 77 A Crim R 333; Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378).

31. The accused's capacity to form the relevant intention may have been affected by drugs and alcohol (R v Mala Vic CA 27/11/1997*; R v Kumar* (2006) 165 A Crim R 48*; R v Faure* [1999] 2 VR 537). See 8.7 Common Law Intoxication for further information on this point.

Without lawful excuse

32. The prosecution must disprove any defences which are open on the evidence (R v Roach [1988] VR 665).

33. Common defences in this area include self-defence (see 8.3 Common Law Self-defence, 8.2 Statutory (Pre-1/11/14) Self-defence and Defensive Homicide and 8.1 Statutory Self-defence (From 1/11/14)) and consent (see 7.4.8 Common Law Assault). See Part 8: Victorian Defences for information concerning other possible defences.

Alternative offences

34. From 1 July 2013, intentionally causing serious injury is a statutory alternative to the more serious offence of intentionally causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence (Crimes Act 1958 s 422).

35. Intentionally Causing Injury (Crimes Act 1958 s 18) is an impliedly included offence to a charge of intentionally causing serious injury (see R v Kane (2001) 3 VR 542). For information on when to leave this as an alternative, see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 11 and 3.10 Alternative Verdicts.

Last updated: 27 October 2022

7.4.2.1 Charge: Intentionally Causing Serious Injury (From 1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be given if:

i) the offence was allegedly committed after 1 July 2013,

ii) the accused has been charged with Intentionally causing serious injury, and

iii) neither Recklessly causing serious injury nor Recklessly causing injury are available as alternative verdicts.

Charge

I must now direct you about the crime of intentionally causing serious injury. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the complainant suffered a serious injury.

Two – the accused caused the complainant's serious injury.

Three – the accused intended to cause the complainant serious injury.

Four – the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Serious Injury

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant suffered a serious injury.

The law defines the word injury to mean physical injury or harm to mental health, whether temporary or permanent. A serious injury is an injury which endangers life or is substantial and protracted.[810]

[If multiple injuries were inflicted, add the following shaded section.]

In making your decision, you do not have to look at each of NOC's injuries separately, and decide whether or not any one of them is a serious injury. A person may suffer a serious injury because of the cumulative effect of several injuries.

[If the physical injuries caused ongoing psychological harm, add the following shaded section.]

An injury may be substantial and protracted because of the combined effect of the immediate physical injuries and prolonged psychological injuries.

In this case, the prosecution alleges that NOC's injuries were serious, because [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denies this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments]. It is only if you are satisfied that NOC's injury endangered his/her life or was substantial and protracted that this first element will be met.

Causation

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused caused the complainant's serious injury.

[If causation is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that doing so caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that [insert relevant causal acts] caused NOC to be seriously injured. However, the defence contends that NOA did not commit those acts. For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason (such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a relevant charge from Causation: Charges should be adapted and inserted here.]

Intention

The third element relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that at the time the accused did the acts that you find caused the complainant's injury, s/he intended to seriously injure NOC.

---

[810] The judge should consider including an example of a serious injury, such as brain damage, or a stabbing which causes significant blood loss.

This element will not be satisfied if NOA only intended to injure NOC, but happened to seriously injure him/her. For this element to be met, NOA must have intended to seriously injure NOC. That is, NOA must have intended to inflict an injury which would endanger NOC's life or which would be substantial and protracted [if necessary, add: or involved the destruction of a foetus other than in the course of a medical procedure].

It is not, however, necessary that NOA intended to inflict the injury that NOC actually suffered. This third element will be satisfied even if NOA intended to inflict a different kind of serious injury.

In this case the prosecution submitted that NOA intentionally [describe relevant act and describe relevant evidence and/or arguments]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments]. When you are considering this evidence, you will remember what I told you earlier about drawing inferences.

Without Lawful Justification or Excuse

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert directions from the relevant topics here (see Part 8: Victorian Defences).]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of intentionally causing serious injury, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOC was seriously injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that serious injury; and

Three – That NOA intended to seriously injure NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of intentionally causing serious injury.

Warning: The following directions should only be given if the judge leaves the lesser alternative offence. See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 11 and 3.10 Alternative Verdicts on when to leave lesser alternative offences.

Intentionally Causing Injury

If you find NOA not guilty of intentionally causing serious injury, you must next consider the offence of intentionally causing injury.[811]

[811] Crimes Act 1958 s 18.

This is an alternative to the offence of intentionally causing serious injury. That means that you only be asked to return a verdict on this offence if you find NOA not guilty of intentionally causing serious injury.

The offence of intentionally causing injury is very similar to the offence of intentionally causing serious injury, with one important difference: the accused only needs to have caused, and to have intended to cause, the complainant to suffer injury rather than serious injury.

So the four elements of intentionally causing injury that the prosecution have to prove beyond reasonable doubt are:

One – That NOC was injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that injury; and

Three – That NOA intended to injure NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

The way that you determine whether these elements have been proved is the same as for the offence of intentionally causing serious injury, apart from the difference in the level of injury required.

This means that, in relation to the first element, it is for you to determine whether NOC suffered physical injury or harm to his/her mental health. The law says that physical injury includes unconsciousness, disfigurement, substantial pain, infection with a disease and an impairment of bodily function. It also includes all the things that you would, as a matter of ordinary experience, call an injury. The law also says that harm to mental health includes psychological harm, but not emotional reactions such as distress, grief, fear or anger which do not result in psychological harm. You must therefore decide whether NOC has suffered an injury, as opposed to some superficial or trivial harm.

In relation to the second element, it means that you must be satisfied that it was the accused who caused the complainant's injury.

[If causation is not in issue*, add the following shaded section*.]

As I told you in relation to the offence of intentionally causing serious injury, it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that this caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

This requires you to be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason (such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a brief summary of the relevant issues should be inserted here.]

In relation to the third element, you must be satisfied that NOA intended to injure NOC, and in relation to the fourth element you must be satisfied that s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

Again, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding the fourth element proven.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, summarise the relevant issues.]

If you find that any of these four elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of intentionally causing injury.

Last updated: 29 June 2015

7.4.2.2 Checklist: Intentionally Causing Serious Injury (From 1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The complainant suffered a serious injury; and
2. The accused caused the complainant's serious injury; and
3. The accused intended to cause serious injury to the complainant; and
4. The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

Serious Injury

1. Did the complainant suffer a serious injury?

Consider – Injury means physical injury or harm to mental health, whether temporary or permanent

Consider – Serious injury means

(a) an injury (including the cumulative effect of several injuries) that:

(i) endangers life or

(ii) is substantial and protracted.

(b) the destruction of the foetus of a pregnant woman, other than in the course of a medical procedure, whether or not the woman suffers any other harm

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Intentionally Causing Serious Injury

Causation

2. Did the accused cause the complainant's serious injury?

Consider – Were the accused's actions a substantial or significant cause of the complainant's serious injury?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Intentionally Causing Serious Injury

Intention

3. Did the accused intend to cause serious injury to the complainant?

Consider – It is not sufficient for the accused to have only intended to cause injury.

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Intentionally Causing Serious Injury

Lawful Justification or Excuse

4. Did the accused act without lawful justification or excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Intentionally Causing Serious Injury (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Intentionally Causing Serious Injury

Last updated: 5 May 2014

7.4.2.3 Charge: Intentionally Causing Serious Injury (Pre-1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be given if:

i) the offence was allegedly committed before 1 July 2013,

ii) the accused has been charged with Intentionally causing serious injury, and

iii) neither Recklessly causing serious injury nor Recklessly causing injury are available as alternative verdicts.

Charge

I must now direct you about the crime of intentionally causing serious injury. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the complainant suffered a serious injury.

Two – the accused caused the complainant's serious injury.

Three – the accused intended to cause the complainant serious injury.

Four – the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Serious Injury

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant suffered a serious injury.

It is a matter for you whether the injury that NOC suffered was a "serious injury". This requires a value judgment, comparing NOC's injury with the range of injuries that a person may suffer.

The law defines the word "injury" to include "unconsciousness, hysteria, pain and any substantial impairment of bodily function". It also includes all the things that you would, as a matter of ordinary experience, call an injury.

For this element to be met, the Crown must prove that the accused caused not only an injury, but a "serious injury". In this context, there are two levels of harm known to the law: "injury" and "serious injury". There are no other classes such as "very serious injury" or "minor injury" or anything else.

You may consider NOC's injuries as lying somewhere on a spectrum of injuries. At one end are trivial injuries like a paper cut or a grazed knee. At the other end of the spectrum are life–threatening injuries or permanent brain damage and the like.

It is a matter for you where on that spectrum NOC's injuries lie. For this first element to be met, you must be satisfied that NOC's injuries justify the description "a serious injury".

In making your determination, you do not have to look at each of NOC's injuries separately, and assess whether or not any one of them is sufficiently "serious". A person may suffer a "serious injury" because of a combination of injuries.

In this case, the prosecution alleges that NOC's injuries were serious, because [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denies this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments]. It is only if you are satisfied that NOC's injury is sufficient grave that it is a "serious injury" that this first element will be met.

Causation

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused caused the complainant's serious injury.

[If causation is not in issue*, add the following shaded section*.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that doing so caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that [insert relevant causal acts] caused NOC to be seriously injured. However, the defence contends that NOA did not commit those acts. For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason (such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a relevant charge from Causation: Charges should be adapted and inserted here.]

Intention

The third element relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that at the time the accused did the acts that you find caused the complainant's injury, s/he intended to seriously injure NOC.

This element will not be satisfied if NOA only intended to injure NOC, but happened to seriously injure him/her. For this element to be met, NOA must have intended to seriously injure NOC.

It is not, however, necessary that NOA intended to inflict the injury that NOC actually suffered. This third element will be satisfied even if NOA intended to inflict a different kind of serious injury.

In this case the prosecution submitted that NOA intentionally [describe relevant act and describe relevant evidence and/or arguments]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments]. When you are considering this evidence, you will remember what I told you earlier about drawing inferences.

Without Lawful Justification or Excuse

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert directions from the relevant topics here (see Part 8: Victorian Defences).]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of intentionally causing serious injury, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOC was seriously injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that serious injury; and

Three – That NOA intended to seriously injure NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of intentionally causing serious injury.

Warning: The following directions should only be given if the judge leaves the lesser alternative offence. See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 11 and 3.10 Alternative Verdicts on when to leave lesser alternative offences.

Intentionally Causing Injury

I must also direct you about the crime of intentionally causing injury. This is an alternative to the offence of intentionally causing serious injury. That means that you only need to deliver a verdict on this offence if you are not satisfied that the prosecution has proved the offence of intentionally causing serious injury beyond reasonable doubt. If you decide that NOA is guilty of intentionally causing serious injury, then you do not need to deliver a verdict on this alternative.

The offence of intentionally causing injury is very similar to the offence of intentionally causing serious injury, with one important difference: the accused only needs to have caused, and to have intended to cause, the complainant to suffer injury rather than serious injury.

So the four elements of intentionally causing injury that the prosecution have to prove beyond reasonable doubt are:

One – That NOC was injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that injury; and

Three – That NOA intended to injure NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

The way that you determine whether these elements have been proved is the same as for the offence of intentionally causing serious injury, apart from the difference in the level of injury required.

This means that, in relation to the first element, it is for you to determine whether the harm NOC suffered was sufficiently severe to be called an "injury", as opposed to merely being superficial or trivial harm.

In relation to the second element, it means that you must be satisfied that it was the accused who caused the complainant's injury.

[If causation is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

As I told you in relation to the offence of intentionally causing serious injury, it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that this caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

This requires you to be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason (such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a brief summary of the relevant issues should be inserted here.]

In relation to the third element, you must be satisfied that NOA intended to injure NOC, and in relation to the fourth element you must be satisfied that s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

Again, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding the fourth element proven.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, summarise the relevant issues.]

If you find that any of these four elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of intentionally causing injury.

Last updated: 29 June 2015

7.4.2.4 Checklist: Intentionally Causing Serious Injury (Pre-1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The complainant suffered a serious injury; and
2. The accused caused the complainant's serious injury; and
3. The accused intended to cause serious injury to the complainant; and
4. The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

Serious Injury

1. Did the complainant suffer a serious injury?

Consider – Injury includes unconsciousness, hysteria, pain and any substantial impairment of bodily function; and Serious injury includes a combination of injuries.

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Intentionally Causing Serious Injury

Causation

2. Did the accused cause the complainant's serious injury?

Consider – Were the accused's actions a substantial or significant cause of the complainant's serious injury?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Intentionally Causing Serious Injury

Intention

3. Did the accused intend to cause serious injury to the complainant?

Consider – It is not sufficient for the accused to have only intended to cause injury.

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Intentionally Causing Serious Injury

Lawful Justification or Excuse

4. Did the accused act without lawful justification or excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Intentionally Causing Serious Injury (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Intentionally Causing Serious Injury

Last updated: 1 July 2013

7.4.2.5 Charge: Intentionally or Recklessly Causing Serious Injury (From 1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be given if:

i) the offence was allegedly committed after 1 July 2013,

ii) the accused has been charged with *I*ntentionally causing serious injury,

iii) Recklessly causing serious injury is available as an alternative verdict, and

iv) neither Intentionally causing injury nor Recklessly causing injury are available as alternative verdicts.

Intentionally Causing Serious Injury

I must now direct you about the crime of intentionally causing serious injury. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the complainant suffered a serious injury.

Two – the accused caused the complainant's serious injury.

Three – the accused intended to cause the complainant serious injury.

Four – the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Serious Injury

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant suffered a serious injury.

The law defines the word injury to mean physical injury or harm to mental health, whether temporary or permanent. A serious injury is an injury which endangers life or is substantial and protracted.[812]

[If multiple injuries were inflicted, add the following shaded section.]

In making your decision, you do not have to look at each of NOC's injuries separately, and decide whether or not any one of them is a serious injury. A person may suffer a serious injury because of the cumulative effect of several injuries.

[If the physical injuries caused ongoing psychological harm, add the following shaded section.]

An injury may be substantial and protracted because of the combined effect of the immediate physical injuries and prolonged psychological injuries.

In this case, the prosecution alleges that NOC's injuries were serious, because [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denies this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments]. It is only if you are satisfied that NOC's injury endangered his/her life or was substantial and protracted that this first element will be met.

Causation

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused caused the complainant's serious injury.

[If causation is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that doing so caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proved.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that [insert relevant causal acts] caused NOC to be seriously injured. However, the defence contends that NOA did not commit those acts. For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason (such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a relevant charge from Causation: Charges should be adapted and inserted here.]

Intention

The third element relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that at the time the accused did the acts that you find caused the complainant's injury, s/he intended to seriously injure NOC.

This element will not be satisfied if NOA only intended to injure NOC, but happened to seriously injure him/her. For this element to be met, NOA must have intended to seriously injure NOC. That is, NOA must have intended to inflict an injury which would endanger NOC's life or which would be substantial and protracted [if necessary, add: or involved the destruction of a foetus other than in the course of a medical procedure].

It is not, however, necessary that NOA intended to inflict the injury that NOC actually suffered. This third element will be satisfied even if NOA intended to inflict a different kind of serious injury.

---

[812] The judge should consider including an example of a serious injury, such as brain damage, or a stabbing which causes significant blood loss.

In this case the prosecution submitted that NOA intentionally [describe relevant act and describe relevant evidence and/or arguments]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments]. When you are considering this evidence, you will remember what I told you earlier about drawing inferences.

Without Lawful Justification or Excuse

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proved.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert directions from the relevant topics here (see Part 8: Victorian Defences).]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of intentionally causing serious injury, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOC was seriously injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that serious injury; and

Three – That NOA intended to seriously injure NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of intentionally causing serious injury.

Warning: The following directions should only be given if the judge leaves the lesser alternative offence. See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 11 and 3.10 Alternative Verdicts on when to leave lesser alternative offences.

Recklessly Causing Serious Injury

If you find NOA not guilty of intentionally causing serious injury, you must next consider the offence of recklessly causing serious injury.[813]

This is an alternative to the offence of intentionally causing serious injury. That means that you will only be asked to return a verdict on this offence if you are not satisfied that the prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that that the accused committed the offence of intentionally causing serious injury.

The only difference between the offence of recklessly causing serious injury and the offence of intentionally causing serious injury relates to the accused's state of mind – the third element of the offence. The other three elements of the offences are identical.

[813] Crimes Act 1958 s 17.

For the third element of recklessly causing serious injury to be met, the prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to seriously injure the complainant. Instead, they must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that at the time the accused did the acts that you find caused the complainant's injury, s/he was aware that those acts would probably result in the complainant being seriously injured, but decided to go ahead anyway.[814] That is, NOA knew that NOC was likely to be seriously injured by his/her actions.

It is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that NOC would be seriously injured. S/he must have known that that consequence was probable.

It is also not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was probable that NOC would be injured by his/her actions. For this element to be met, NOA must have known that it was probable that his/her acts would seriously injure NOC.

In determining this part of the test, you must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew of the probability of NOC's injury. It is not enough that you, or a reasonable person, would have recognised that likelihood in the circumstances.

In this case, the following evidence is relevant to your assessment of NOA's state of mind: [Identify relevant evidence and the inferences to be drawn from that evidence].

Inferring states of mind

[If the jury might infer recklessness by using an objective test, add the following shaded section.]

In determining whether NOA knew that NOC would probably suffer serious injury due to his/her actions, you [can/have been asked to] draw an inference from the probability that [you/the reasonable person] would have foreseen such a consequence in the accused's situation.

I must warn you that, although this is a legitimate step in reasoning towards a conclusion about NOA's state of mind, you must not treat this factor as decisive of the issue. It is not enough that you, or any other person, would have had such an awareness in the circumstances. You must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew that it was likely that NOC would be seriously injured if s/he acted in that way.

In this case the prosecution submitted that NOA was aware of the likelihood that NOC would be seriously injured. [Describe relevant act and describe relevant evidence and/or arguments.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Summary

As I mentioned, the other three elements of recklessly causing serious injury are identical to the elements of intentionally causing serious injury. So the four elements of recklessly causing serious injury that the prosecution have to prove beyond reasonable doubt are:

One – That NOC was seriously injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that serious injury; and

Three – That NOA was aware that his/her acts would probably cause serious injury to NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

If you find that any of these four elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of recklessly causing serious injury.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

---

[814] The words "but decided to go ahead anyway" can be omitted if the judge thinks they are unnecessary or could confuse the jury. See 7.1.3 Recklessness.

7.4.2.6 Charge: Intentionally or Recklessly Causing Serious Injury (Pre-1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be given if:

i) the offence was allegedly committed before 1 July 2013,

ii) the accused has been charged with *I*ntentionally causing serious injury,

iii) Recklessly causing serious injury is available as an alternative verdict, and

iv) neither Intentionally causing injury nor Recklessly causing injury are available as alternative verdicts.

Intentionally Causing Serious Injury

I must now direct you about the crime of intentionally causing serious injury. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following four elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that the complainant suffered a serious injury;

Two – that the accused caused the complainant's serious injury;

Three – that the accused intended to cause the complainant's serious injury;

Four – that the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Serious Injury

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant suffered a serious injury.

It is a matter for you whether the injury that NOC suffered was a "serious injury". This requires a value judgment, comparing NOC's injury with the range of injuries that a person may suffer.

The law defines the word "injury" to include "unconsciousness, hysteria, pain and any substantial impairment of bodily function". It also includes all the things that you would, as a matter of ordinary experience, call an injury.

For this element to be met, the prosecution must prove that the accused caused not only an injury, but a "serious injury". In this context, there are two levels of harm known to the law: "injury" and "serious injury". There are no other classes such as "very serious injury" or "minor injury" or anything else.

You may consider NOC's injuries as lying somewhere on a spectrum of injuries. At one end are trivial injuries like a paper cut or a grazed knee. At the other end of the spectrum are life–threatening injuries or permanent brain damage and the like.

It is a matter for you where on that spectrum NOC's injuries lie. For this first element to be met, you must be satisfied that NOC's injuries justify the description "a serious injury".

In making your determination, you do not have to look at each of NOC's injuries separately, and assess whether or not any one of them is sufficiently "serious". A person may suffer a "serious injury" because of a combination of injuries.

In this case, the prosecution alleges that NOC's injuries were serious, because [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denies this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments]. It is only if you are satisfied that NOC's injury is sufficient grave that it is a "serious injury" that this first element will be met.

Causation

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused caused the complainant's serious injury.

[If causation is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that doing so caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proved.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that [insert relevant causal acts] caused NOC to be seriously injured. However, the defence contends that NOA did not commit those acts. For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason (such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a relevant charge from 7.1.2.1 Charges: Causation should be adapted and inserted here.]

Intention

The third element relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that at the time the accused did the acts that you find caused the complainant's injury, s/he intended to seriously injure NOC.

This element will not be satisfied if NOA only intended to injure NOC, but happened to seriously injure him/her. For this element to be met, NOA must have intended to seriously injure NOC.

It is not, however, necessary that NOA intended to inflict the injury that NOC actually suffered. This third element will be satisfied even if NOA intended to inflict a different kind of serious injury.

In this case the prosecution submitted that you can infer that NOA intentionally [describe relevant act and describe relevant evidence and/or arguments]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments]. When you are considering this evidence, you will remember what I told you earlier about drawing inferences.

Without Lawful Justification or Excuse

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proved.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert directions from the relevant topics here (see Part 8: Victorian Defences).]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of intentionally causing serious injury, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOC was seriously injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that serious injury; and

Three – That NOA intended to seriously injure NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of intentionally causing serious injury.

Warning: The following directions should only be given if the judge leaves lesser alternative offences. See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 11 and 3.10 Alternative Verdicts on when to leave lesser alternative offences.

Recklessly Causing Serious Injury

If you find NOA not guilty of intentionally causing serious injury, you must next consider the offence of recklessly causing serious injury.[815]

This is an alternative to the offence of intentionally causing serious injury. That means that you will only be asked to return a verdict on this offence if you are not satisfied that the prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that that the accused committed the offence of intentionally causing serious injury.

The only difference between the offence of recklessly causing serious injury and the offence of intentionally causing serious injury relates to the accused's state of mind – the third element of the offence. The other three elements of the offences are identical.

For the third element of recklessly causing serious injury to be met, the prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to seriously injure the complainant. Instead, they must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that at the time the accused did the acts that you find caused the complainant's injury, s/he was aware that those acts would probably result in the complainant being seriously injured, but decided to go ahead anyway.[816] That is, NOA knew that NOC was likely to be seriously injured by his/her actions.

It is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that NOC would be seriously injured. S/he must have known that that consequence was probable.

It is also not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was probable that NOC would be injured by his/her actions. For this element to be met, NOA must have known that it was probable that his/her acts would seriously injure NOC.

In determining this part of the test, you must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew of the probability of NOC's injury. It is not enough that you, or a reasonable person, would have recognised that likelihood in the circumstances.

In this case, the following evidence is relevant to your assessment of NOA's state of mind: [Identify relevant evidence and the inferences to be drawn from that evidence].

Inferring states of mind

[If the jury might infer recklessness by using an objective test, add the following shaded section.]

---

[815] Crimes Act 1958 s 17.

[816] The words "but decided to go ahead anyway" can be omitted if the judge thinks they are unnecessary or could confuse the jury. See 7.1.3 Recklessness.

*I*n determining whether NOA knew that NOC would probably suffer serious injury due to his/her actions, you [can/have been asked to] draw an inference from the probability that [you/the reasonable person] would have foreseen such a consequence in the accused's situation.

I must warn you that, although this is a legitimate step in reasoning towards a conclusion about NOA's state of mind, you must not treat this factor as decisive of the issue. It is not enough that you, or any other person, would have had such an awareness in the circumstances. You must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew that it was likely that NOC would be seriously injured if s/he acted in that way.

In this case the prosecution submitted that NOA was aware of the likelihood that NOC would be seriously injured. [Describe relevant act and describe relevant evidence and/or arguments.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Summary

As I mentioned, the other three elements of recklessly causing serious injury are identical to the elements of intentionally causing serious injury. So the four elements of recklessly causing serious injury that the prosecution have to prove beyond reasonable doubt are:

One – That NOC was seriously injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that serious injury; and

Three – That NOA was aware that his/her acts would probably cause serious injury to NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

If you find that any of these four elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of recklessly causing serious injury.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

7.4.2.7 Charge: Intentionally or Recklessly Causing Serious Injury or Injury (From 1/7/13)

Click here obtain a Word version for adaptation

This charge should be given if the offence was allegedly committed on or after 1 July 2013, the accused has been charged with intentionally causing serious injury, and Recklessly causing serious injury, intentionally causing serious injury and recklessly causing injury are all available as alternative verdicts.

If the offence was allegedly committed before 1 July 2013, use Charge: Intentionally or Recklessly Causing Serious Injury or Injury (Pre-1/7/13).

If recklessly causing serious injury is available as an alternative verdict, but intentionally and recklessly causing injury are not, use 7.4.2.5 Charge: Intentionally or Recklessly Causing Serious Injury (From 1/7/13).

If neither recklessly causing serious injury nor recklessly causing injury are available as alternative verdicts, use 7.4.2.1 Charge: Intentionally Causing Serious Injury (From 1/7/13).

This charge is designed for cases where the injury is one which endangers life or is substantial and protracted. If the injury involves the destruction of a foetus, the charge will need to be modified.

Intentionally Causing Serious Injury

I must now direct you about the crime of intentionally causing serious injury. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the complainant suffered a serious injury.

Two – the accused caused the complainant's serious injury.

Three – the accused intended to cause the complainant serious injury.

Four – the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Serious Injury

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant suffered a serious injury.

The law defines the word injury to mean physical injury or harm to mental health, whether temporary or permanent. A serious injury is an injury which endangers life or is substantial and protracted.[817]

[If multiple injuries were inflicted, add the following shaded section.]

In making your decision, you do not have to look at each of NOC's injuries separately, and decide whether or not any one of them is a serious injury. A person may suffer a serious injury because of the cumulative effect of several injuries.

[If the physical injuries caused ongoing psychological harm, add the following shaded section.]

An injury may be substantial and protracted because of the combined effect of the immediate physical injuries and prolonged psychological injuries.

In this case, the prosecution alleges that NOC's injuries were serious, because [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denies this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments]. It is only if you are satisfied that NOC's injury endangered his/her life or was substantial and protracted that this first element will be met.

Causation

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused caused the complainant's serious injury.

[If causation is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that doing so caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that [insert relevant causal acts] caused NOC to be seriously injured. However, the defence contends that NOA did not commit those acts. For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason (such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a relevant charge from Causation: Charges should be adapted and inserted here.]

---

[817] The judge should consider including an example of a serious injury, such as brain damage, or a stabbing which causes significant blood loss.

Intention

The third element relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that at the time the accused did the acts that you find caused the complainant's injury, s/he intended to seriously injure NOC.

This element will not be satisfied if NOA only intended to injure NOC, but happened to seriously injure him/her. For this element to be met, NOA must have intended to seriously injure NOC. That is, NOA must have intended to inflict an injury which would endanger NOC's life or which would be substantial and protracted [if necessary, add: or involved the destruction of a foetus other than in the course of a medical procedure].

It is not, however, necessary that NOA intended to inflict the injury that NOC actually suffered. This third element will be satisfied even if NOA intended to inflict a different kind of serious injury.

In this case the prosecution submitted that NOA intentionally [describe relevant act and describe relevant evidence and/or arguments]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments]. When you are considering this evidence, you will remember what I told you earlier about drawing inferences.

Without Lawful Justification or Excuse

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert directions from the relevant topics here (see Part 8: Victorian Defences).]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of intentionally causing serious injury, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOC was seriously injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that serious injury; and

Three – That NOA intended to seriously injure NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of intentionally causing serious injury.

Warning: The following directions should only be given if the judge leaves the lesser alternative offence. See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 11 and 3.10 Alternative Verdicts on when to leave lesser alternative offences.

Recklessly Causing Serious Injury

If you find NOA not guilty of intentionally causing serious injury, you must next consider the offence of recklessly causing serious injury.[818]

This is an alternative to the offence of intentionally causing serious injury. That means that you will only be asked to return a verdict on this offence if you are not satisfied that the prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that that the accused committed the offence of intentionally causing serious injury.

The only difference between the offence of recklessly causing serious injury and the offence of intentionally causing serious injury relates to the accused's state of mind – the third element of the offence. The other three elements of the offences are identical.

For the third element of recklessly causing serious injury to be met, the prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to seriously injure the complainant. Instead, they must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that at the time the accused did the acts that you find caused the complainant's injury, s/he was aware that those acts would probably result in the complainant being seriously injured, but decided to go ahead anyway.[819] That is, NOA knew that NOC was likely to be seriously injured by his/her actions.

It is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that NOC would be seriously injured. S/he must have known that that consequence was probable.

It is also not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was probable that NOC would be injured by his/her actions. For this element to be met, NOA must have known that it was probable that his/her acts would seriously injure NOC.

In determining this part of the test, you must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew of the probability of NOC's injury. It is not enough that you, or a reasonable person, would have recognised that likelihood in the circumstances.

In this case, the following evidence is relevant to your assessment of NOA's state of mind: [Identify relevant evidence and the inference to be drawn from that evidence].

Inferring states of mind

[If the jury might infer recklessness by using an objective test, add the following shaded section.]

In determining whether NOA knew that NOC would probably suffer serious injury due to his/her actions, you [can/have been asked to] draw an inference from the probability that [you/the reasonable person] would have foreseen such a consequence in the accused's situation.

I must warn you that, although this is a legitimate step in reasoning towards a conclusion about NOA's state of mind, you must not treat this factor as decisive of the issue. It is not enough that you, or any other person, would have had such an awareness in the circumstances. You must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew that it was likely that NOC would be seriously injured if s/he acted in that way.

---

[818] Crimes Act 1958 s 17.

[819] The words "but decided to go ahead anyway" can be omitted if the judge thinks they are unnecessary or could confuse the jury. See 7.1.3 Recklessness.

In this case the prosecution submitted that NOA was aware of the likelihood that NOC would be seriously injured. [Describe relevant act and describe relevant evidence and/or arguments.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Summary

As I mentioned, the other three elements of recklessly causing serious injury are identical to the elements of intentionally causing serious injury. So the four elements of recklessly causing serious injury that the prosecution have to prove beyond reasonable doubt are:

One – That NOC was seriously injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that serious injury; and

Three – That NOA was aware that his/her acts would probably cause serious injury to NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

If you find that any of these four elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of recklessly causing serious injury.

Intentionally Causing Injury

The next offence that you may need to consider is intentionally causing injury.[820] This is an alternative to the offences of intentionally causing serious injury and recklessly causing serious injury, which means that you will only be asked to return a verdict on this offence if you find NOA not guilty of both of those offences.

The offence of intentionally causing injury is very similar to the offence of intentionally causing serious injury, with one important difference: the accused only needs to have caused, and to have intended to cause, the complainant to suffer injury rather than serious injury.

So the four elements of intentionally causing injury that the prosecution have to prove beyond reasonable doubt are:

One – That NOC was injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that injury; and

Three – That NOA intended to injure NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

The way that you determine whether these elements have been proven is the same as for the offence of intentionally causing serious injury, apart from the difference in the level of injury required.

This means that, in relation to the first element, it is for you to determine whether NOC suffered physical injury or harm to his/her mental health. The law says that physical injury includes unconsciousness, disfigurement, substantial pain, infection with a disease and an impairment of bodily function. It also includes all the things that you would, as a matter of ordinary experience, call an injury. The law also says that harm to mental health includes psychological harm, but not emotional reactions such as distress, grief, fear or anger which do not result in psychological harm. You must therefore decide whether NOC has suffered an injury, as opposed to some superficial or trivial harm.

In relation to the second element, it means that you must be satisfied that it was the accused who caused the complainant's injury.

[If causation is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

---

[820] Crimes Act 1958 s 18.

As I told you in relation to the offence of intentionally causing serious injury, it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that this caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

This requires you to be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason (such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a brief summary of the relevant issues should be inserted here.]

In relation to the third element, you must be satisfied that NOA intended to injure NOC, and in relation to the fourth element you must be satisfied that s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

Again, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding the fourth element proven.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, summarise the relevant issues.]

If you find that any of these four elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of intentionally causing injury.

Recklessly Causing Injury

There is one more alternative offence that you may need to consider – recklessly causing injury. This is an alternative to intentionally causing serious injury, recklessly causing serious injury and intentionally causing injury, which means that you will only be asked to return a verdict on this offence if you find the accused not guilty of those three offences.

This offence is identical to the offence of intentionally causing injury, except for the third element – the accused's state of mind. The accused does not need to have intended to cause the injury. Instead, s/he must have been aware that his/her acts would probably injure the complainant.

The way that you determine whether this element has been proved is the same as for the offence of recklessly causing serious injury, apart from the difference in the level of injury required. As I explained in relation to that offence, this element will therefore not be satisfied if NOA was only aware that that it was possible that NOC would be injured. S/he must have known that that consequence was probable, but decided to go ahead anyway.[821]

It is also not enough that you, or a reasonable person, would have recognised that likelihood in the circumstances – you must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew of the probability of NOC's injury.

So the four elements of recklessly causing injury that the prosecution have to prove beyond reasonable doubt are:

One – That NOC was injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that injury; and

---

[821] The words "but decided to go ahead anyway" can be omitted if the judge thinks they are unnecessary or could confuse the jury. See 7.1.3 Recklessness.

Three – That NOA was aware that his/her acts would probably injure NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

If you find that any of these four elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of recklessly causing injury.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

7.4.2.8 Charge: Intentionally or Recklessly Causing Serious Injury or Injury (Pre-1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be given if the offence was allegedly committed before 1 July 2013, the accused has been charged with intentionally causing serious injury, and Recklessly causing serious injury, intentionally causing serious injury and recklessly causing injury are all available as alternative verdicts.

If the offence was allegedly committed after 1 July 2013, use Charge: Intentionally or Recklessly Causing Serious Injury or Injury (From 1/7/13).

Intentionally Causing Serious Injury

I must now direct you about the crime of intentionally causing serious injury. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following four elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that the complainant suffered a serious injury;

Two – that the accused caused the complainant's serious injury;

Three – that the accused intended to cause the complainant's serious injury;

Four – that the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Serious Injury

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant suffered a serious injury.

It is a matter for you whether the injury that NOC suffered was a "serious injury". This requires a value judgment, comparing NOC's injury with the range of injuries that a person may suffer.

The law defines the word "injury" to include "unconsciousness, hysteria, pain and any substantial impairment of bodily function". It also includes all the things that you would, as a matter of ordinary experience, call an injury.

For this element to be met, the prosecution must prove that the accused caused not only an injury, but a "serious injury". In this context, there are two levels of harm known to the law: "injury" and "serious injury". There are no other classes such as "very serious injury" or "minor injury" or anything else.

You may consider NOC's injuries as lying somewhere on a spectrum of injuries. At one end are trivial injuries like a paper cut or a grazed knee. At the other end of the spectrum are life–threatening injuries or permanent brain damage and the like.

It is a matter for you where on that spectrum NOC's injuries lie. For this first element to be met, you must be satisfied that NOC's injuries justify the description "a serious injury".

In making your determination, you do not have to look at each of NOC's injuries separately, and assess whether or not any one of them is sufficiently "serious". A person may suffer a "serious injury" because of a combination of injuries.

In this case, the prosecution alleges that NOC's injuries were serious, because [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denies this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments]. It is only if you are satisfied that NOC's injury is sufficient grave that it is a "serious injury" that this first element will be met.

Causation

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused caused the complainant's serious injury.

[If causation is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that doing so caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that [insert relevant causal acts] caused NOC to be seriously injured. However, the defence contends that NOA did not commit those acts. For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason (such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a relevant charge from 7.1.2.1 Charges: Causation should be adapted and inserted here.]

Intention

The third element relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that at the time the accused did the acts that you find caused the complainant's injury, s/he intended to seriously injure NOC.

This element will not be satisfied if NOA only intended to injure NOC, but happened to seriously injure him/her. For this element to be met, NOA must have intended to seriously injure NOC.

It is not, however, necessary that NOA intended to inflict the injury that NOC actually suffered. This third element will be satisfied even if NOA intended to inflict a different kind of serious injury.

In this case the prosecution submitted that NOA intentionally [describe relevant act and describe relevant evidence and/or arguments]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments]. When you are considering this evidence, you will remember what I told you earlier about drawing inferences.

Without Lawful Justification or Excuse

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert directions from the relevant topics here (see Part 8: Victorian Defences.)]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of intentionally causing serious injury, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOC was seriously injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that serious injury; and

Three – That NOA intended to seriously injure NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of intentionally causing serious injury.

Warning: The following directions should only be given if the judge leaves lesser alternative offences. See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 11 and 3.10 Alternative Verdicts on when to leave lesser alternative offences.

Recklessly Causing Serious Injury

If you find NOA not guilty of intentionally causing serious injury, you must next consider the offence of recklessly causing serious injury.[822]

This is an alternative to the offence of intentionally causing serious injury. That means that you will only be asked to return a verdict on this offence if you are not satisfied that the prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that that the accused committed the offence of intentionally causing serious injury.

The only difference between the offence of recklessly causing serious injury and the offence of intentionally causing serious injury relates to the accused's state of mind – the third element of the offence. The other three elements of the offences are identical.

For the third element of recklessly causing serious injury to be met, the prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to seriously injure the complainant. Instead, they must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that at the time the accused did the acts that you find caused the complainant's injury, s/he was aware that those acts would probably result in the complainant being seriously injured, but decided to go ahead anyway.[823] That is, NOA knew that NOC was likely to be seriously injured by his/her actions.

It is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that NOC would be seriously injured. S/he must have known that that consequence was probable.

It is also not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was probable that NOC would be injured by his/her actions. For this element to be met, NOA must have known that it was probable that his/her acts would seriously injure NOC.

In determining this part of the test, you must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew of the probability of NOC's injury. It is not enough that you, or a reasonable person, would have recognised that likelihood in the circumstances.

In this case, the following evidence is relevant to your assessment of NOA's state of mind: [Identify relevant evidence and the inferences to be drawn from that evidence].

---

[822] Crimes Act 1958 s 17.

[823] The words "but decided to go ahead anyway" can be omitted if the judge thinks they are unnecessary or could confuse the jury. See 7.1.3 Recklessness.

Inferring states of mind

[If the jury might infer recklessness by using an objective test, add the following shaded section.]

In determining whether NOA knew that NOC would probably suffer serious injury due to his/her actions, you [can/have been asked to] draw an inference from the probability that [you/the reasonable person] would have foreseen such a consequence in the accused's situation.

I must warn you that, although this is a legitimate step in reasoning towards a conclusion about NOA's state of mind, you must not treat this factor as decisive of the issue. It is not enough that you, or any other person, would have had such an awareness in the circumstances. You must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew that it was likely that NOC would be seriously injured if s/he acted in that way.

In this case the prosecution submitted that NOA was aware of the likelihood that NOC would be seriously injured. [Describe relevant act and describe relevant evidence and/or arguments.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Summary

As I mentioned, the other three elements of recklessly causing serious injury are identical to the elements of intentionally causing serious injury. So the four elements of recklessly causing serious injury that the prosecution have to prove beyond reasonable doubt are:

One – That NOC was seriously injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that serious injury; and

Three – That NOA was aware that his/her acts would probably cause serious injury to NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

If you find that any of these four elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of recklessly causing serious injury.

Intentionally Causing Injury

The next offence that you may need to consider is intentionally causing injury.[824] This is an alternative to the offences of intentionally causing serious injury and recklessly causing serious injury, which means that you will only be asked to return a verdict on this offence if you find NOA not guilty of both of those offences.

The offence of intentionally causing injury is very similar to the offence of intentionally causing serious injury, with one important difference: the accused only needs to have caused, and to have intended to cause, the complainant to suffer injury rather than serious injury.

So the four elements of intentionally causing injury that the prosecution have to prove beyond reasonable doubt are:

One – That NOC was injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that injury; and

Three – That NOA intended to injure NOC; and

---

[824] Crimes Act 1958 s 18.

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

The way that you determine whether these elements have been proved is the same as for the offence of intentionally causing serious injury, apart from the difference in the level of injury required.

This means that, in relation to the first element, it is for you to determine whether the harm NOC suffered was sufficiently severe to be called an "injury", as opposed to merely being superficial or trivial harm.

In relation to the second element, it means that you must be satisfied that it was the accused who caused the complainant's injury.

[If causation is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

As I told you in relation to the offence of intentionally causing serious injury, it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that this caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

This requires you to be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason (such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a brief summary of the relevant issues should be inserted here.]

In relation to the third element, you must be satisfied that NOA intended to injure NOC, and in relation to the fourth element you must be satisfied that s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

Again, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding the fourth element proven.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, summarise the relevant issues.]

If you find that any of these four elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of intentionally causing injury.

Recklessly Causing Injury

There is one more alternative offence that you may need to consider – recklessly causing injury. This is an alternative to intentionally causing serious injury, recklessly causing serious injury and intentionally causing injury, which means that you will only be asked to return a verdict on this offence if you find the accused not guilty of those three offences.

This offence is identical to the offence of intentionally causing injury, except for the third element – the accused's state of mind. The accused does not need to have intended to cause the injury. Instead, s/he must have been aware that his/her acts would probably injure the complainant.

The way that you determine whether this element has been proved is the same as for the offence of recklessly causing serious injury, apart from the difference in the level of injury required. As I explained in relation to that offence, this element will therefore not be satisfied if NOA was only aware that that it was possible that NOC would be injured. S/he must have known that that consequence was probable, but decided to go ahead anyway.[825]

It is also not enough that you, or a reasonable person, would have recognised that likelihood in the circumstances – you must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew of the probability of NOC's injury.

So the four elements of recklessly causing injury that the prosecution have to prove beyond reasonable doubt are:

One – That NOC was injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that injury; and

Three – That NOA was aware that his/her acts would probably injure NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

If you find that any of these four elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of recklessly causing injury.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

7.4.3 Intentionally Causing Injury

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. The offence of intentionally causing injury is created by Crimes Act 1958 s 18.
2. The offence has the following four elements:
    i) The complainant suffered an "injury";
    ii) The accused caused the complainant's injury;
    iii) The accused intended to cause injury; and
    iv) The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.
3. Although s 18 also proscribes recklessly causing injury, it is a separate offence (R v His Honour Judge Hassett and Anor (1994) 76 A Crim R 19). See 7.4.6 Recklessly Causing Injury for information concerning that offence.

"Injury"

4. The Crimes Amendment (Gross Violence Offences) Act 2013 substituted a new definition for "injury", which had previously been defined inclusively. Due to the operation of the transitional provision, Crimes Act 1958 s 618, the new definition only applies to offences committed on or after the commencement of the amending Act, 1 July 2013.
5. Where an offence is alleged to have been committed between two dates, one date before and one date after 1 July 2013, the law in force prior to the amendments applies (Crimes Act 1958 s 618).

---

[825] The words "but decided to go ahead anyway" can be omitted if the judge thinks they are unnecessary or could confuse the jury. See 7.1.3 Recklessness.

6. This topic separately describes the operation of this element for offences committed before and after 1 July 2013.

Injury after 1 July 2013

7. From 1 July 2013, Crimes Act 1958 section 15 contains the following relevant definitions:

> Injury means:
>
> a) Physical injury; or
>
> b) Harm to mental health;
>
> whether temporary or permanent
>
> Harm to mental health includes psychological harm but does not include an emotional reaction such as distress, grief, fear or anger unless it results in psychological harm;
>
> Physical injury includes unconsciousness, disfigurement, substantial pain, infection with a disease and an impairment of bodily function.

Injury before 1 July 2013

8. For offences committed before 1 July 2013, "injury" is an ordinary English term. It is for the jury to determine, as a question of fact, whether the complainant suffered an injury (R v Welsh & Flynn Vic CCA 16/10/1987; R v Ferrari [2002] VSCA 186).
9. The jury may compare the injury in question with harm which common experience suggests would be superficial or trifling, and therefore fall short of being an "injury" (R v Welsh & Flynn Vic CCA 16/10/1987; R v Ferrari [2002] VSCA 186; R v Cogley [1989] VR 799).
10. The jury is not restricted to considering physical injuries. "Injury" includes unconsciousness, hysteria, pain and any substantial impairment of bodily function (Crimes Act 1958 s 15).
11. The definition of "injury" as in force before 1 July 2013 is not exhaustive. Jurors are free to use their own experiences when determining whether or not the complainant has suffered an injury (R v Welsh & Flynn Vic CCA 16/10/1987; R v Ferrari [2002] VSCA 186).
12. For offences committed on or after 1 July 2013, the Crimes Amendment (Gross Violence Offences) Act 2013 expanded the meaning of the word "injury". Harm to mental health, disfigurement and infection with a disease were not expressly mentioned in the definition of "injury". Decisions from other jurisdictions that harm to mental health and infection with a disease could constitute "grievous bodily harm" may provide guidance on whether those harms can constitute "injury" (see R v Ireland [1998] AC 147; R v Dica [2004] QB 1257; R v Aubrey (2012) 82 NSWLR 748).

Causing Injury

13. The complainant's injury must have been caused by the accused. For detailed information about causation, see 7.1.2 Causation.
14. The injury does not need to have been caused by the accused personally assaulting the complainant. This element will be satisfied even if s/he caused the injury indirectly (R v Salisbury [1976] VR 452).

Intention

15. It is not sufficient that the accused intended to do the act that injured the complainant. S/he must have intended to inflict injury (see R v Westaway (1991) 52 A Crim R 336).

16. The nature of the accused's acts may provide evidence of his/her intention (R v McKnoulty (1995) 77 A Crim R 333).

17. The accused does not need to have intended the precise injury s/he ultimately caused. It is only necessary that the accused intended to cause an injury and actually causes an injury (Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378; R v Demirian [1989] VR 97).

18. Intention and causation must always be treated as separate issues. This is especially important if the accused did not directly cause the complainant's injury. In such cases, the jury must separately assess whether the accused caused the injury, and whether s/he intended to cause the injury (R v McKnoulty (1995) 77 A Crim R 333; Royall v R (1991) 172 CLR 378).

19. The accused's capacity to form the relevant intention may have been affected by drugs and alcohol (R v Mala Vic CA 27/11/1997*; R v Kumar* (2006) 165 A Crim R 48*; R v Faure* [1999] 2 VR 537). See 8.7 Common Law Intoxication for further information on this point.

Without Lawful Excuse

20. The prosecution must disprove any defences which are open on the evidence (R v Roach [1988] VR 665).

21. Common defences in this area include self-defence (see 8.3 Common Law Self-defence, 8.2 Statutory Self-defence (Pre-1/11/14) and Defensive Homicide and 8.1 Statutory Self-defence (From 1/11/14)), and consent (see 7.4.8 Common Law Assault). See Part 8: Victorian Defences for information concerning other possible defences.

Last updated: 1 November 2014

7.4.3.1 Charge: Intentionally Causing Injury (From 1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

This charge should be given if the offence was allegedly committed on or after 1 July 2013. If the offence was allegedly committed before 1 July 2013, use Charge: Intentionally Causing Injury (Pre-1/7/13).

I must now direct you about the crime of intentionally causing injury. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the complainant suffered an injury.

Two – the accused caused the complainant's injury.

Three – the accused intended to injure the complainant.

Four – the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Injury

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant suffered an injury.

The law says that injury means a physical injury or harm to mental health, whether temporary or permanent. Physical injury includes unconsciousness, disfigurement, substantial pain, infection with a disease and an impairment of bodily function. It also includes all the things that you would, as a matter of ordinary experience, call an injury. Harm to mental health includes psychological harm, but not emotional reactions such as distress, grief, fear or anger which do not result in psychological harm.

To prove this element, the prosecution must show that NOC suffered an injury, rather than some superficial or trivial harm.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC suffered an injury because [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments]. It is only if you are satisfied that NOC was injured that this first element will be met.

Causation

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused caused the complainant's injury.

[If causation is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that doing so caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that [insert relevant causal acts] caused NOC to be injured. However, the defence contends that NOA did not commit those acts. For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason (such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a relevant charge from Causation: Charges should be adapted and inserted here.]

Intention

The third element relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that at the time the accused did the acts that you find caused the complainant's injury, s/he intended to injure NOC.

It is not, however, necessary that NOA intended to inflict the injury that NOC actually suffered. This third element will be satisfied even if NOA intended to inflict a different kind of injury.

In this case the prosecution submitted that NOA intentionally [describe relevant act and describe relevant evidence and/or arguments]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments]. When you are considering this evidence, you will remember what I told you earlier about drawing inferences.

Without Lawful Justification or Excuse

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert directions from the relevant topics here (see Part 8: Victorian Defences).]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of intentionally causing injury, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOC was injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that injury; and

Three – That NOA intended to injure NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of intentionally causing injury.

Last updated: 29 May 2015

7.4.3.2 Checklist: Intentionally Causing Injury (From 1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The complainant suffered an injury; and
2. The accused caused the complainant's injury; and
3. The accused intended to cause injury to the complainant; and
4. The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

Injury

1. Did the complainant suffer an injury?

Consider – Injury means physical injury or harm to mental health, whether temporary or permanent

Consider – Physical injury includes unconsciousness, disfigurement, substantial pain, infection with a disease and an impairment of bodily function

Consider – Harm to mental health includes psychological harm but does not include an emotional reaction such as distress, grief, fear or anger unless it results in psychological harm

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Intentionally Causing Injury

Causation

2. Did the accused cause the complainant's injury?

Consider – Were the accused's actions a substantial or significant cause of the complainant's injury?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Intentionally Causing Injury

Intention

3. Did the accused intend to cause injury to the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Intentionally Causing Injury

Lawful Justification or Excuse

4. Did the accused act without lawful justification or excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Intentionally Causing Injury (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Intentionally Causing Injury

Last updated: 1 July 2013

7.4.3.3 Charge: Intentionally Causing Injury (Pre-1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be given if the offence was allegedly committed before 1 July 2013. If the offence was allegedly committed on or after 1 July 2013, use Charge: Intentionally Causing Injury (From 1/7/13).

I must now direct you about the crime of intentionally causing injury. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following four elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that the complainant suffered an injury.

Two – that the accused caused the complainant's injury.

Three – that the accused intended to injure the complainant.

Four – that the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Injury

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant suffered an injury.

The law defines the word "injury" to include "unconsciousness, hysteria, pain and any substantial impairment of bodily function". It also includes all the things that you would, as a matter of ordinary experience, call an injury.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC suffered an injury because [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments]. It is only if you are satisfied that NOC was injured that this first element will be met.

Causation

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused caused the complainant's injury.

[If causation is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that doing so caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that [insert relevant causal acts] caused NOC to be injured. However, the defence contends that NOA did not commit those acts. For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason (such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a relevant charge from Causation: Charges should be adapted and inserted here.]

Intention

The third element relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that at the time the accused did the acts that you find caused the complainant's injury, s/he intended to injure NOC.

It is not, however, necessary that NOA intended to inflict the injury that NOC actually suffered. This third element will be satisfied even if NOA intended to inflict a different kind of injury.

In this case the prosecution submitted that NOA intentionally [describe relevant act and describe relevant evidence and/or arguments]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments]. When you are considering this evidence, you will remember what I told you earlier about drawing inferences.

Without Lawful Justification or Excuse

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert directions from the relevant topics here.]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of intentionally causing injury, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOC was injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that injury; and

Three – That NOA intended to injure NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of intentionally causing injury.

Last updated: 1 July 2013

7.4.3.4 Checklist: Intentionally Causing Injury (Pre-1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The complainant suffered an injury; and

2. The accused caused the complainant's injury; and
3. The accused intended to cause injury to the complainant; and
4. The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

Injury

1. Did the complainant suffer an injury?

Consider – Injury includes unconsciousness, hysteria, pain and any substantial impairment of bodily function.

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Intentionally Causing Injury

Causation

2. Did the accused cause the complainant's injury?

*Consider – Were the accused's actions a substantial or significant cause of the complainant's injury?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Intentionally Causing Injury

Intention

3. Did the accused intend to cause injury to the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Intentionally Causing Injury

Lawful Justification or Excuse

4. Did the accused act without lawful justification or excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Intentionally Causing Injury (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Intentionally Causing Injury

Last updated: 1 July 2013

7.4.4 Recklessly Causing Serious Injury in Circumstances of Gross Violence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. The offence of recklessly causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence is created by Crimes Act 1958 s 15B.

2. The offence has the following five elements:

   i) The complainant suffered a "serious injury";

   ii) The accused caused the complainant's serious injury;

   iii) The accused was reckless about causing serious injury;

   iv) The injury was caused in circumstances of "gross violence"; and

   v) The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

3. This offence is an aggravated form of recklessly causing serious injury and differs only in the additional element that the injury was caused in circumstances of "gross violence". This topic only addresses the meaning of gross violence. For information on the other elements, see 7.4.5 Recklessly Causing Serious Injury.

Commencement Date

4. This offence applies to offences committed on or after 1 July 2013, following the commencement of the Crimes Amendment (Gross Violence Offences) Act 2013.

Gross Violence

5. The prosecution must prove that the accused caused serious injury to another in circumstances of gross violence.

6. Section 15B(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 exhaustively defines circumstances of gross violence as one or more of the following:

(a) The offender planned in advance to engage in conduct and at the time of the planning–

a. The offender intended that the conduct would cause a serious injury; or

b. The offender was reckless as to whether the conduct would cause a serious injury; or

c. A reasonable person would have foreseen that the conduct would be likely to result in a serious injury;

(b) The offender in company with 2 or more other persons caused the serious injury;

(c) The offender entered into an agreement, arrangement or understanding with 2 or more other persons to cause a serious injury;

(d) The offender planned in advance to have with him or her and to use an offensive weapon, firearm or imitation firearm and in fact used the offensive weapon, firearm or imitation firearm to cause the serious injury;

(e) The offender continued to cause injury to the other person after the other person was incapacitated;

(f) The offender caused the serious injury to the other person while the other person was incapacitated.

Foresight that conduct would likely cause a serious injury

7. The meaning of the word "likely" varies with context and can range between requiring proof that a matter is a "real chance" through to requiring proof that the matter is more likely than not (see Attorney-General (NSW) v Winters [2007] NSWSC 1071).

8. While there have not been any decisions on the meaning of likely for the purposes of section 15B(2), this Charge Book takes the prudential approach of requiring proof that a reasonable person would have realised that the conduct was more likely than not to cause a serious injury. It is not sufficient that serious injury was possible, or a "real chance" (compare Boughey v R (1986) 161 CLR 10 and Hannes v Director of Public Prosecutions (No 2) [2006] NSWCCA 373).

Incapacitation

9. While this provision has not been interpreted, it is likely that the word "incapacitated" in sections 15B(2)(e) and (f) carries its ordinary meaning of a person being unable to defend himself or herself.

10. In many cases, this will arise when the complainant is rendered unconscious. Future cases may also identify other possible causes of incapacitation.

Alternative offences

11. Recklessly causing serious injury is a statutory alternative to recklessly causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence (Crimes Act 1958 s 422).

12. Recklessly causing injury (Crimes Act 1958 s 18) is an impliedly included offence to a charge of recklessly causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence (see R v Kane (2001) 3 VR 542). See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 11 and 3.10 Alternative Verdicts on when a judge needs to leave alternative offences.

Last updated: 6 November 2019

7.4.4.1 Charge: Recklessly Causing Serious Injury in Circumstances of Gross Violence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be given if the offence was allegedly committed after 1 July 2013, the accused has been charged with recklessly causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence, and Recklessly causing serious injury and Recklessly causing injury are both available offences.

If recklessly causing serious injury or recklessly causing injury are not left as alternative offences, the charge must be modified accordingly.

Charge

I must now direct you about the crime of recklessly causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the complainant suffered a serious injury.

Two – the accused caused the complainant's serious injury.

Three – the accused was aware that his/her acts would probably cause serious injury to the complainant.

Four – The accused caused the complainant's serious injury in circumstances of gross violence.

Five – the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Serious Injury

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant suffered a serious injury.

The law defines the word injury to mean physical injury or harm to mental health, whether temporary or permanent. A serious injury is an injury which endangers life or is substantial and protracted.[826]

[If multiple injuries were inflicted, add the following shaded section.]

In making your decision, you do not have to look at each of NOC's injuries separately, and decide whether or not any one of them is a serious injury. A person may suffer a serious injury because of the cumulative effect of several injuries.

[If the physical injuries caused ongoing psychological harm, add the following shaded section.]

An injury may be substantial and protracted because of the combined effect of the immediate physical injuries and prolonged psychological injuries.

In this case, the prosecution alleges that NOC's injuries were serious, because [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denies this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments]. It is only if you are satisfied that NOC's injury endangered his/her life or was substantial and protracted that this first element will be met.

---

[826] The judge should consider including an example of a serious injury, such as brain damage, or a stabbing which causes significant blood loss.

Causation

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused caused the complainant's serious injury.

[If causation is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that doing so caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that [insert relevant causal acts] caused NOC to be seriously injured. However, the defence contends that NOA did not commit those acts. For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason (such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a relevant charge from 7.1.2.1 Charges: Causation should be adapted and inserted here.]

Recklessness

The third element relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that at the time the accused did the acts that you find caused the complainant's injury, s/he was aware that those acts would probably result in the complainant being seriously injured, but decided to go ahead anyway.[827] That is, NOA knew that NOC was likely to be seriously injured by his/her actions.

It is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that NOC would be seriously injured. S/he must have known that that consequence was probable.

It is also not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was probable that NOC would be injured by his/her actions. For this element to be met, NOA must have known that it was probable that his/her acts would seriously injure NOC.

In determining this part of the test, you must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew of the probability of NOC's injury. It is not enough that you, or a reasonable person, would have recognised that likelihood in the circumstances.

In this case, the following evidence is relevant to your assessment of NOA's state of mind: [Identify relevant evidence and the inferences to be drawn from that evidence]. When you are considering this evidence, you will remember what I told you earlier about drawing inferences.

Inferring states of mind

[If the jury might infer recklessness by using an objective test, add the following shaded section.]

In determining whether NOA knew that NOC would probably suffer serious injury due to his/her actions, you [can/have been asked to] draw an inference from the probability that [you/the reasonable person] would have foreseen such a consequence in the accused's situation.

I must warn you that, although this is a legitimate step in reasoning towards a conclusion about NOA's state of mind, you must not treat this factor as decisive of the issue. It is not enough that you, or any other person, would have had such an awareness in the circumstances. You must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew that it was likely that NOC would be seriously injured if s/he acted in that way.

---

[827] The words "but decided to go ahead anyway" can be omitted if the judge thinks they are unnecessary or could confuse the jury. See 7.1.3 Recklessness.

In this case the prosecution submitted that NOA was aware of the likelihood that NOC would be seriously injured. [Describe relevant act and describe relevant evidence and/or arguments.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Gross Violence

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused caused the serious injury in circumstances of gross violence.

The phrase "circumstances of gross violence" has a special legal meaning. To prove this element, the prosecution must show that:

[Add any of the following circumstances which are relevant:

- NOA planned in advance to [describe relevant conduct] and at the time of the planning, s/he intended that the conduct would cause a serious injury;
- NOA planned in advance to [describe relevant conduct] and at the time of the planning, s/he was aware that the conduct would probably cause a serious injury;
- NOA planned in advance to [describe relevant conduct] and at the time of the planning, a reasonable person would have foreseen that the conduct was more likely than not to result in serious injury;
- NOA caused the injury in company with 2 or more other people. In this case, the prosecution says that NOA committed the offence in company with [identify alleged co-offenders];
- NOA caused the serious injury as part of a joint criminal enterprise with 2 or more other people. You will recall what I have told you about a joint criminal enterprise;
- NOA planned in advance to have with him/her and use an offensive weapon, firearm or imitation firearm with him/her and s/he used the offensive weapon, firearm or imitation firearm to cause the serious injury;
- NOA continued to cause injury to NOC after NOC was incapacitated;
- NOA caused serious injury to NOC while NOC was incapacitated.]

[If there is a dispute about whether NOC was incapacitated, add the following shaded section.]

A person is incapacitated when he or she is no longer able to defend himself or herself in the circumstances. In this case, the prosecution says that NOV was incapacitated when [describe alleged cause and circumstances of incapacitation]. The defence disputes this, and argues that [identify relevant defence evidence and arguments].

[Identify relevant prosecution and defence evidence and arguments.]

To prove this fourth element, the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt that one [if necessary, add: or more] of these circumstances of gross violence existed.

Without Lawful Justification or Excuse

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert directions from the relevant topics here (see Part 8: Victorian Defences).]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of recklessly causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOC was seriously injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that serious injury; and

Three – That NOA was aware that his/her acts would probably cause serious injury to NOC; and

Four – That NOA caused the serious injury in circumstances of gross violence; and

Five – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of recklessly causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence.

Warning: The following directions should only be given if the judge leaves lesser alternative offences. See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 11 and 3.10 Alternative Verdicts on when to leave lesser alternative offences.

Recklessly Causing Serious Injury

I must also direct you about the crime of recklessly causing serious injury. This is an alternative to the offence of recklessly causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence. That means that you only need to return a verdict on this offence if you find NOA not guilty of recklessly causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence.

The only difference between this alternative offence and the offence on the indictment is that the prosecution does not need to prove that NOA caused the serious injury in circumstances of gross violence. Therefore, if you are satisfied that the other elements have been proved, but are not satisfied that the prosecution has proved the fourth element, then you will find the accused guilty of recklessly causing serious injury.

Recklessly Causing Injury

The next alternative offence is recklessly causing injury. This is an alternative to the offences of recklessly causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence and recklessly causing serious injury.

The offence of recklessly causing injury is very similar to the offence of recklessly causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence, with two important differences: first, the prosecution does not need to prove that circumstances of gross violence existed. Second, the accused only needs to have caused, and to have been aware of the probability of causing, the complainant to suffer injury rather than serious injury.

So the four elements of recklessly causing injury that the prosecution have to prove beyond reasonable doubt are:

One – That NOC was injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that injury; and

Three – That NOA was aware that his/her acts would probably injure NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

The way that you determine whether these elements have been proved is the same as for the offence of recklessly causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence, apart from the difference in the level of injury required.

This means that, in relation to the first element, it is for you to determine whether NOC suffered physical injury or harm to his/her mental health. The law says that physical injury includes unconsciousness, disfigurement, substantial pain, infection with a disease and an impairment of bodily function. The law also says that harm to mental health includes psychological harm, but not emotional reactions such as distress, grief, fear or anger which do not result in psychological harm. You must therefore decide whether NOC has suffered an injury, as opposed to some superficial or trivial harm.

In relation to the second element, it means that you must be satisfied that it was the accused who caused the complainant's injury.

[If causation is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

As I told you in relation to the offence of recklessly causing serious injury, it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that this caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

This requires you to be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason(such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a brief summary of the relevant issues should be inserted here.]

In relation to the third element, you must be satisfied that NOA was aware that his/her acts would probably injure NOC, and in relation to the fourth element you must be satisfied that s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

Again, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding the fourth element proven.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, summarise the relevant issues.]

If you find that any of these four elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of recklessly causing injury.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

7.4.4.2 Checklist: Recklessly Causing Serious Injury in Circumstances of Gross Violence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Five elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The complainant suffered a serious injury; and

2. The accused caused the complainant's serious injury; and

3. The accused was aware that his or her acts would probable cause serious injury to the complainant; and

4. The accused caused the complainant's serious injury in circumstances of gross violence; and

5. The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

Serious Injury

1. Did the complainant suffer a serious injury?

Consider – Injury means physical injury or harm to mental health, whether temporary or permanent

Consider – Serious injury means an injury (including the cumulative effect of several injuries) that:

(i) endangers life or

(ii) is substantial and protracted.

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of recklessly causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence

Causation

2. Did the accused cause the complainant's serious injury?

Consider – Were the accused's actions a substantial or significant cause of the complainant's serious injury?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of recklessly causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence

State of Mind

3. Was the accused aware that his/her conduct would probably cause serious injury to the complainant?

Consider – What did the accused think the likely consequences of his/her actions would be?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of recklessly causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence

Circumstances of Gross Violence

4. Did the accused cause the serious injury in circumstances of gross violence?

Consider – Circumstances of gross violence include [identify relevant circumstances]

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of recklessly causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence

Lawful Justification or Excuse

5. Did the accused act without lawful justification or excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of recklessly causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of recklessly causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence

Last updated: 30 May 2014

7.4.5 Recklessly Causing Serious Injury

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. The offence of recklessly causing serious injury is created by Crimes Act 1958 s 17.
2. The offence has the following four elements:
   i) The complainant suffered a "serious injury";
   ii) The accused caused the complainant's serious injury;
   iii) The accused was reckless about causing serious injury; and
   iv) The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

"Serious Injury"

3. The Crimes Amendment (Gross Violence Offences) Act 2013 substituted a new exhaustive definition for "serious injury", which had previously been defined inclusively. Due to the operation of the transitional provision, Crimes Act 1958 s 618, the new definition only applies to offences committed on or after the commencement of the amending Act, 1 July 2013.
4. Where an offence is alleged to have been committed between two dates, one date before and one date after 1 July 2013, the law in force prior to the amendments applies (Crimes Act 1958 s 618).
5. This topic separately describes the operation of this element for offences committed before and after 1 July 2013.

Serious Injury after 1 July 2013

6. From 1 July 2013, Crimes Act 1958 section 15 contains the following relevant definitions:

Injury means:

a) Physical injury; or

b) Harm to mental health;

whether temporary or permanent

Serious injury means:

a) An injury (including the cumulative effect of more than one injury) that–

i) Endangers life; or

ii) Is substantial and protracted;

b) The destruction, other than in the course of a medical procedure, of the foetus of a pregnant woman, whether or not the woman suffers any other harm.

7. Physical injury and harm to mental health are both defined inclusively. Physical injury includes unconsciousness, disfigurement, substantial pain, infection with a disease and impairment of bodily function. Harm to mental health includes psychological harm, but does not include emotions such as distress, grief, fear or anger unless such emotions result in psychological harm (Crimes Act 1958 s 15).
8. Under the law in force before 1 July 2013, serious injury was inclusively defined to include a combination of injuries and the destruction of a foetus. Whether an injury was serious involved a value judgment by the jury (R v Welsh & Flynn Vic CCA 16/10/1987).
9. In contrast, for offences committed after 1 July 2013 the definition of serious injury is exclusive. Once a jury determines that the injury endangers life, is substantial and protracted or involves the destruction of a foetus, there is no separate value judgment on whether the injury is a "serious injury".

Serious Injury before 1 July 2013

10. For offences committed before 1 July 2013, "serious injury" is an ordinary English term. It is for the jury to determine, as a question of fact, whether the complainant's injuries are sufficient to qualify as "serious" (R v Welsh & Flynn Vic CCA 16/10/1987; R v Ferrari [2002] VSCA 186).
11. In making this determination, the jury must make a value judgment about the gravity of the complainant's injuries (R v Welsh & Flynn Vic CCA 16/10/1987; R v Ferrari [2002] VSCA 186; R v Cogley [1989] VR 799).
12. The jury may compare the injury in question with injuries which common experience suggests would be superficial or trifling, and therefore fall short of being "serious injuries" (R v Welsh & Flynn Vic CCA 16/10/1987; R v Ferrari [2002] VSCA 186; R v Cogley [1989] VR 799).
13. The injury must be assessed in its context. The complainant's age, gender and state of health may all be relevant when assessing whether the injury is serious. An injury that is inflicted on a frail person may be more serious than the same injury inflicted on a person in good health (R v Welsh & Flynn Vic CCA 16/10/1987).
14. The jury does not need to find that the defendant inflicted "really serious" injury, as was previously the case when the offence required the accused to have caused grievous bodily harm (R v Welsh & Flynn Vic CCA 16/10/1987).
15. The jury is not restricted to considering physical injuries. "Injury" (and by implication "serious injury") includes unconsciousness, hysteria, pain and any substantial impairment of bodily function (Crimes Act 1958 s 15).

16. The jury is also not restricted to considering the gravity of one particular injury. A serious injury includes a combination of injuries and includes the destruction, other than in the course of a medical procedure, of the foetus of a pregnant woman, whether or not the woman suffers any other harm (Crimes Act 1958 s 15).

17. At common law, there was no clear rule on whether a foetus was considered part of the mother, or whether it had a sui generis status until it was born. Instead, the matter depended on the specific legal context in which the question arose and the effect of any relevant legislation (R v King (2003) 59 NSWLR 472. See also Attorney-General's Reference (No 3 of 1994) [1998] AC 245 and R v Sullivan [1991] 1 SCR 489).

18. Following amendments introduced by the Abortion Law Reform Act 2008, destruction of a foetus can constitute a serious injury, even if the mother does not herself suffer any other harm and it is not necessary to show that the foetus was born alive (Crimes Act 1958 s 15).

19. The definitions of "serious" and "injury" in Crimes Act 1958 s 15 as in force before 1 July 2013 are not exhaustive. Jurors are free to use their own experiences when determining whether or not the complainant has suffered a serious injury (R v Welsh & Flynn Vic CCA 16/10/1987; R v Ferrari [2002] VSCA 186).

20. It is ultimately a matter for the jury to determine whether an injury is sufficiently serious. It is unwise to attempt a more elaborate explanation (R v Rhodes (1984) 14 A Crim R 124).

Causing Serious Injury

21. The complainant's serious injury must have been caused by the accused. For detailed information about causation, see 7.1.2 Causation.

22. The injury does not need to have been caused by the accused personally assaulting the complainant. This element will be satisfied even if s/he caused the injury indirectly (R v Salisbury [1976] VR 452).

Recklessness

23. To have been reckless about causing serious injury, the accused must have been aware, when s/he committed the relevant conduct, that it would probably cause serious injury (DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2021] HCA 26; DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2020] VSCA 181; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585).

24. The accused must have been aware that serious injury was "probable" or "likely". It is not sufficient for him/her to have been aware that serious injury was merely "possible" or "might" result (R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641; Ignatova v R [2010] VSCA 263; Paton v R [2011] VSCA 72; DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2020] VSCA 181; DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2021] HCA 26).

25. The accused him/herself must have been aware that his/her conduct would probably cause serious injury. It is not sufficient that a reasonable person in the accused's circumstances would have realised that their conduct would be likely to seriously injury the complainant (R v Sofa Vic CA 15/10/1990; c.f. R v Nuri [1990] VR 641).

26. When explaining this element, judges may tell the jury that the accused must have been aware that his or her conduct would probably cause serious injury, but decided to go ahead anyway. The words "but decided to go ahead anyway" do not make proof that the accused was indifferent to the consequences of his or her conduct an element of the offence. Instead, the purpose of the words is to distinguish recklessness from intention. Judges may modify or omit the words "but decided to go ahead anyway" if the words could mislead or confuse the jury (see Ignatova v R [2010] VSCA 263; R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464. Cf R v Sofa Vic CA 15/10/1990; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585; R v Wilson [2005] VSCA 78).

27. It is not appropriate to invite the jury to apply their normal understanding of the meaning of "recklessness". Conventional understanding of the term may include conduct that is negligent (Banditt v The Queen (2005) 224 CLR 262).

Without lawful excuse

28. The prosecution must disprove any defences which are open on the evidence.

Alternative offences

29. From 1 July 2013, recklessly causing serious injury is a statutory alternative to the more serious offence of recklessly causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence (Crimes Act 1958 s 422).

30. Recklessly causing injury (Crimes Act 1958 s 18) is an impliedly included offence to a charge of recklessly causing serious injury (see R v Kane (2001) 3 VR 542). For information on when to leave this as an alternative, see Jury Directions Act 2015 s 11 and 3.10 Alternative Verdicts.

Last updated: 27 October 2022

7.4.5.1 Charge: Recklessly Causing Serious Injury (From 1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be given if the offence was allegedly committed after 1 July 2013. If the offence was allegedly committed before 1 July 2013, use Charge: Recklessly Causing Serious Injury (Pre-1/7/13).

This charge is designed for cases where the injury is one which endangers life or is substantial and protracted. If the injury involves the destruction of a foetus, the charge will need to be modified.

Charge

I must now direct you about the crime of recklessly causing serious injury. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the complainant suffered a serious injury.

Two – the accused caused the complainant's serious injury.

Three – the accused was aware that his/her acts would probably cause serious injury to the complainant.

Four – the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Serious Injury

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant suffered a serious injury.

The law defines the word injury to mean physical injury or harm to mental health, whether temporary or permanent. A serious injury is an injury which endangers life or is substantial and protracted.[828]

[If multiple injuries were inflicted, add the following shaded section.]

[828] The judge should consider including an example of a serious injury, such as brain damage, or a stabbing which causes significant blood loss.

In making your decision, you do not have to look at each of NOC's injuries separately, and decide whether or not any one of them is a serious injury. A person may suffer a serious injury because of the cumulative effect of several injuries.

[If the physical injuries caused ongoing psychological harm, add the following shaded section.]

An injury may be substantial and protracted because of the combined effect of the immediate physical injuries and prolonged psychological injuries.

In this case, the prosecution alleges that NOC's injuries were serious, because [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denies this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments]. It is only if you are satisfied that NOC's injury endangered his/her life or was substantial and protracted that this first element will be met.

Causation

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused caused the complainant's serious injury.

[If causation is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that doing so caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that [insert relevant causal acts] caused NOC to be seriously injured. However, the defence contends that NOA did not commit those acts. For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason (such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a relevant charge from 7.1.2.1 Charges: Causation should be adapted and inserted here.]

Recklessness

The third element relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that at the time the accused did the acts that you find caused the complainant's injury, s/he was aware that those acts would probably result in the complainant being seriously injured, but decided to go ahead anyway.[829] That is, NOA knew that NOC was likely to be seriously injured by his/her actions.

It is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that NOC would be seriously injured. S/he must have known that that consequence was probable.

It is also not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was probable that NOC would be injured by his/her actions. For this element to be met, NOA must have known that it was probable that his/her acts would seriously injure NOC.

In determining this part of the test, you must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew of the probability of NOC's injury. It is not enough that you, or a reasonable person, would have recognised that likelihood in the circumstances.

---

[829] The words "but decided to go ahead anyway" can be omitted if the judge thinks they are unnecessary or could confuse the jury. See 7.1.3 Recklessness.

In this case, the following evidence is relevant to your assessment of NOA's state of mind: [Identify relevant evidence and the inferences to be drawn from that evidence]. When you are considering this evidence, you will remember what I told you earlier about drawing inferences.

Inferring states of mind

[If the jury might infer recklessness by using an objective test, add the following shaded section.]

In determining whether NOA knew that NOC would probably suffer serious injury due to his/her actions, you [can/have been asked to] draw an inference from the probability that [you/the reasonable person] would have foreseen such a consequence in the accused's situation.

I must warn you that, although this is a legitimate step in reasoning towards a conclusion about NOA's state of mind, you must not treat this factor as decisive of the issue. It is not enough that you, or any other person, would have had such an awareness in the circumstances. You must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew that it was likely that NOC would be seriously injured if s/he acted in that way.

In this case the prosecution submitted that NOA was aware of the likelihood that NOC would be seriously injured. [Describe relevant act and describe relevant evidence and/or arguments.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Without Lawful Justification or Excuse

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert directions from the relevant topics here (see Part 8: Victorian Defences).]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of recklessly causing serious injury, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOC was seriously injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that serious injury; and

Three – That NOA was aware that his/her acts would probably cause serious injury to NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proven beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of recklessly causing serious injury.

Warning: The following directions should only be given if the judge leaves lesser alternative offences. See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 11 and 3.10 Alternative Verdicts on when to leave lesser alternative offences.

Recklessly Causing Injury

I must also direct you about the crime of recklessly causing injury. This is an alternative to the offence of recklessly causing serious injury. That means that you only need to deliver a verdict on this offence if you are not satisfied that the prosecution has proved the offence of recklessly causing serious injury beyond reasonable doubt. If you decide that NOA is guilty of recklessly causing serious injury, then you do not need to deliver a verdict on this alternative.

The offence of recklessly causing injury is very similar to the offence of recklessly causing serious injury, with one important difference: the accused only needs to have caused, and to have been aware of the probability of causing, the complainant to suffer injury rather than serious injury.

So the four elements of recklessly causing injury that the prosecution have to prove beyond reasonable doubt are:

One – That NOC was injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that injury; and

Three – That NOA was aware that his/her acts would probably injure NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

The way that you determine whether these elements have been proved is the same as for the offence of recklessly causing serious injury, apart from the difference in the level of injury required.

This means that, in relation to the first element, it is for you to determine whether NOC suffered physical injury or harm to his/her mental health. The law says that physical injury includes unconsciousness, disfigurement, substantial pain, infection with a disease and an impairment of bodily function. It also includes all the things that you would, as a matter of ordinary experience, call an injury. The law also says that harm to mental health includes psychological harm, but not emotional reactions such as distress, grief, fear or anger which do not result in psychological harm. You must therefore decide whether NOC has suffered an injury, as opposed to some superficial or trivial harm.

In relation to the second element, it means that you must be satisfied that it was the accused who caused the complainant's injury.

[If causation is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

As I told you in relation to the offence of recklessly causing serious injury, it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that this caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

This requires you to be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason (such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a brief summary of the relevant issues should be inserted here.]

In relation to the third element, you must be satisfied that NOA was aware that his/her acts were likely to injure NOC, and in relation to the fourth element you must be satisfied that s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

Again, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding the fourth element proven.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, summarise the relevant issues.]

If you find that any of these four elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of recklessly causing injury.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

7.4.5.2 Checklist: Recklessly Causing Serious Injury (From 1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The complainant suffered a serious injury; and
2. The accused caused the complainant's serious injury; and
3. The accused knew that his/her acts would probably cause serious injury to the complainant; and
4. The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

Serious Injury

1. Did the complainant suffer a serious injury?

Consider – Injury means physical injury or harm to mental health, whether temporary or permanent

Consider – Serious injury means:

(a) an injury (including the cumulative effect of several injuries) that:

(i) endangers life or

(ii) is substantial and protracted.

(b) the destruction of the foetus of a pregnant woman, other than in the course of a medical procedure, whether or not the woman suffers any other harm

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Recklessly Causing Serious Injury

Causation

2. Did the accused cause the complainant's serious injury?

Consider – Were the accused's actions a substantial or significant cause of the complainant's serious injury?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Recklessly Causing Serious Injury

State of Mind

3. Was the accused aware that his/her conduct would probably cause serious injury to the complainant?

Consider – What did the accused think the likely consequences of his/her actions would be?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Recklessly Causing Serious Injury

Lawful Justification or Excuse

4. Did the accused act without lawful justification or excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Recklessly Causing Serious Injury (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Recklessly Causing Serious Injury

Last updated: 1 July 2013

7.4.5.3 Charge: Recklessly Causing Serious Injury (Pre-1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be given if the offence was allegedly committed before 1 July 2013. If the offence was allegedly committed on or after 1 July 2013, use 7.4.5.1 Charge: Recklessly Causing Serious Injury (From 1/7/13).

I must now direct you about the crime of recklessly causing serious injury. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the complainant suffered a serious injury.

Two – the accused caused the complainant's serious injury.

Three – the accused was aware that his/her acts would probably cause serious injury to the complainant.

Four – the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Serious Injury

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant suffered a serious injury.

It is a matter for you whether the injury that NOC suffered was a "serious injury". This requires a value judgment, comparing NOC's injury with the range of injuries that a person may suffer.

The law defines the word "injury" to include "unconsciousness, hysteria, pain and any substantial impairment of bodily function". It also includes all the things that you would, as a matter of ordinary experience, call an injury.

For this element to be met, the Crown must prove that the accused caused not only an injury, but a "serious injury". In this context, there are two levels of harm known to the law: "injury" and "serious injury". There are no other classes such as "very serious injury" or "minor injury" or anything else.

You may consider NOC's injuries as lying somewhere on a spectrum of injuries. At one end are trivial injuries like a paper cut or a grazed knee. At the other end of the spectrum are life–threatening injuries or permanent brain damage and the like.

It is a matter for you where on that spectrum NOC's injuries lie. For this first element to be met, you must be satisfied that NOC's injuries justify the description "a serious injury".

In making your determination, you do not have to look at each of NOC's injuries separately, and assess whether or not any one of them is sufficiently "serious". A person may suffer a "serious injury" because of a combination of injuries.

In this case, the prosecution alleges that NOC's injuries were serious, because [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denies this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments]. It is only if you are satisfied that NOC's injury is sufficient grave that it is a "serious injury" that this first element will be met.

Causation

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused caused the complainant's serious injury.

[If causation is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that doing so caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proved.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that [insert relevant causal acts] caused NOC to be seriously injured. However, the defence contends that NOA did not commit those acts. For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason (such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a relevant charge from 7.1.2.1 Charges: Causation should be adapted and inserted here.]

Recklessness

The third element relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that at the time the accused did the acts that you find caused the complainant's injury, s/he was aware that those acts would probably result in the complainant being seriously injured, but decided to go ahead anyway.[830] That is, NOA knew that NOC was likely to be seriously injured by his/her actions.

It is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that NOC would be seriously injured. S/he must have known that that consequence was probable.

It is also not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was probable that NOC would be injured by his/her actions. For this element to be met, NOA must have known that it was probable that his/her acts would seriously injure NOC.

In determining this part of the test, you must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew of the probability of NOC's injury. It is not enough that you, or a reasonable person, would have recognised that likelihood in the circumstances.

In this case, the following evidence is relevant to your assessment of NOA's state of mind: [Identify relevant evidence and the inferences to be drawn from that evidence]. When you are considering this evidence, you will remember what I told you earlier about drawing inferences.

---

[830] The words "but decided to go ahead anyway" can be omitted if the judge thinks they are unnecessary or could confuse the jury. See 7.1.3 Recklessness.

Inferring states of mind

[If the jury might infer recklessness by using an objective test, add the following shaded section.]

In determining whether NOA knew that NOC would probably suffer serious injury due to his/her actions, you [can/have been asked to] draw an inference from the probability that [you/the reasonable person] would have foreseen such a consequence in the accused's situation.

I must warn you that, although this is a legitimate step in reasoning towards a conclusion about NOA's state of mind, you must not treat this factor as decisive of the issue. It is not enough that you, or any other person, would have had such an awareness in the circumstances. You must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew that it was likely that NOC would be seriously injured if s/he acted in that way.

In this case the prosecution submitted that NOA was aware of the likelihood that NOC would be seriously injured. [Describe relevant act and describe relevant evidence and/or arguments.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Without Lawful Justification or Excuse

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proved.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert directions from the relevant topics here (see Part 8: Victorian Defences).]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of recklessly causing serious injury, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOC was seriously injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that serious injury; and

Three – That NOA was aware that his/her acts would probably cause serious injury to NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of recklessly causing serious injury.

Warning: The following directions should only be given if the judge leaves lesser alternative offences. See Jury Directions Act 2015 s 11 and 3.10 Alternative Verdicts on when to leave lesser alternative offences.

Recklessly Causing Injury

I must also direct you about the crime of recklessly causing injury. This is an alternative to the offence of recklessly causing serious injury. That means that you only need to return a verdict on this offence if you find NOA not guilty of recklessly causing serious injury. If you decide that NOA is guilty of recklessly causing serious injury, then you do not need to deliver a verdict on this alternative.

The offence of recklessly causing injury is very similar to the offence of recklessly causing serious injury, with one important difference: the accused only needs to have caused, and to have been aware of the probability of causing, the complainant to suffer injury rather than serious injury.

So the four elements of recklessly causing injury that the prosecution have to prove beyond reasonable doubt are:

One – That NOC was injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that injury; and

Three – That NOA was aware that his/her acts would probably injure NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

The way that you determine whether these elements have been proved is the same as for the offence of recklessly causing serious injury, apart from the difference in the level of injury required.

This means that, in relation to the first element, it is for you to determine whether NOC suffered an injury. The law says that an injury includes unconsciousness, hysteria, pain and any substantial impairment of bodily function. You must therefore decide whether NOC has suffered an injury, as opposed to some superficial or trivial harm.

In relation to the second element, it means that you must be satisfied that it was the accused who caused the complainant's injury.

[If causation is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

As I told you in relation to the offence of recklessly causing serious injury, it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that this caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proved.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

This requires you to be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason (such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a brief summary of the relevant issues should be inserted here.]

In relation to the third element, you must be satisfied that NOA was aware that his/her acts were likely to injure NOC, and in relation to the fourth element you must be satisfied that s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

Again, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding the fourth element proved.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, summarise the relevant issues.]

If you find that any of these four elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of recklessly causing injury.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

7.4.5.4 Checklist: Recklessly Causing Serious Injury (Pre-1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The complainant suffered a serious injury; and
2. The accused caused the complainant's serious injury; and
3. The accused knew that his/her acts would probably cause serious injury to the complainant; and
4. The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

Serious Injury

1. Did the complainant suffer a serious injury?

Consider – Injury includes unconsciousness, hysteria, pain and any substantial impairment of bodily function; and

Serious injury includes a combination of injuries

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Recklessly Causing Serious Injury

Causation

2. Did the accused cause the complainant's serious injury?

Consider – Were the accused's actions a substantial or significant cause of the complainant's serious injury?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Recklessly Causing Serious Injury

State of Mind

3. Was the accused aware that his/her conduct would probably cause serious injury to the complainant?

Consider – What did the accused think the likely consequences of his/her actions would be?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Recklessly Causing Serious Injury

Lawful Justification or Excuse

4. Did the accused act without lawful justification or excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Recklessly Causing Serious Injury (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Recklessly Causing Serious Injury

Last updated: 1 July 2013

7.4.6 Recklessly Causing Injury

Click here for a Word version of this document

1. The offence of recklessly causing injury is created by Crimes Act 1958 s 18.
2. The offence has the following four elements:
   i) The complainant suffered an "injury";
   ii) The accused caused the complainant injury;
   iii) The accused was reckless about causing injury; and
   iv) The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.
3. Although s 18 also proscribes intentionally causing injury, it is a separate offence (R v His Honour Judge Hassett and Anor (1994) 76 A Crim R 19). See 7.4.3 Intentionally Causing Injury for information concerning that offence.
4. The Crimes Amendment (Gross Violence Offences) Act 2013 substituted a new definition for "injury", which had previously been defined inclusively. Due to the operation of the transitional provision, Crimes Act 1958 s 618, the new definition only applies to offences committed on or after the commencement of the amending Act, 1 July 2013.
5. Where an offence is alleged to have been committed between two dates, one date before and one date after 1 July 2013, the law in force prior to the amendments applies (Crimes Act 1958 s 618).
6. This topic separately describes the operation of this element for offences committed before and after 1 July 2013.

Injury after 1 July 2013

7. From 30 January 2014, Crimes Act 1958 section 15 contains the following relevant definitions:

   Injury means:

   (a) Physical injury; or

   (b) Harm to mental health; whether temporary or permanent

   Harm to mental health includes psychological harm but does not include an emotional reaction such as distress, grief, fear or anger unless it results in psychological harm;

   Physical injury includes unconsciousness, disfigurement, substantial pain, infection with a disease and an impairment of bodily function.

Injury before 1 July 2013

8. For offences committed before 1 July 2013, "injury" is an ordinary English term. It is for the jury to determine, as a question of fact, whether the complainant suffered an injury (R v Welsh & Flynn Vic CCA 16/10/1987; R v Ferrari [2002] VSCA 186).
9. The jury may compare the injury in question with harm which common experience suggests would be superficial or trifling, and therefore fall short of being an "injury" (R v Welsh & Flynn Vic CCA 16/10/1987; R v Ferrari [2002] VSCA 186; R v Cogley [1989] VR 799).

10. The jury is not restricted to considering physical injuries. "Injury" includes unconsciousness, hysteria, pain and any substantial impairment of bodily function (Crimes Act 1958 s 15).

11. The definition of "injury" as in force before 1 July 2013 is not exhaustive. Jurors are free to use their own experiences when determining whether or not the complainant has suffered an injury (R v Welsh & Flynn Vic CCA 16/10/1987; R v Ferrari [2002] VSCA 186).

12. For offences committed on or after 1 July 2013, the Crimes Amendment (Gross Violence Offences) Act 2013 expanded the meaning of the word "injury". Harm to mental health, disfigurement and infection with a disease were not expressly mentioned in the definition of "injury". Decisions from other jurisdictions that harm to mental health and infection with a disease could constitute "grievous bodily harm" may provide guidance on whether those harms can constitute "injury" (see R v Ireland [1998] AC 147; R v Dica [2004] QB 1257; R v Aubrey (2012) 82 NSWLR 748; [2012] NSWCCA 254).

Causing Injury

13. The complainant's injury must have been caused by the accused. For detailed information about causation, see 7.1.2 Causation.

14. The injury does not need to have been caused by the accused personally assaulting the complainant. This element will be satisfied even if s/he caused the injury indirectly (R v Salisbury [1976] VR 452).

Recklessness

15. To have been reckless about causing injury, the accused must have been aware, when s/he committed the relevant conduct, that it would probably cause injury (DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2021] HCA 26; DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2020] VSCA 181; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585).

16. The accused must have been aware that injury was "probable" or "likely". It is not sufficient for him/her to have been aware that injury was merely "possible" or "might" result (R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641; Ignatova v R [2010] VSCA 263; Paton v R [2011] VSCA 72; DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2020] VSCA 181; DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2021] HCA 26).

17. The accused him/herself must have been aware that his/her conduct would probably cause injury. It is not sufficient that a reasonable person in the accused's circumstances would have realised that their conduct would be likely to injure the complainant (R v Sofa Vic CA 15/10/1990; c.f. R v Nuri [1990] VR 641).

18. When explaining this element, judges may tell the jury that the accused must have been aware that his or her conduct would probably cause injury, but decided to go ahead anyway. The words "but decided to go ahead anyway" do not make proof that the accused was indifferent to the consequences of his or her conduct an element of the offence. Instead, the purpose of the words is to distinguish recklessness from intention. Judges may modify or omit the words "but decided to go ahead anyway" if the words could mislead or confuse the jury (see Ignatova v R [2010] VSCA 263; R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464; R v Sofa Vic CA 15/10/1990; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585; R v Wilson [2005] VSCA 78).

19. It is not appropriate to invite the jury to apply their normal understanding of the meaning of "recklessness". Conventional understanding of the term may include conduct that is negligent (Banditt v The Queen (2005) 224 CLR 262).

Without Lawful Excuse

20. The prosecution must disprove any defences which are open on the evidence.

Last updated: 27 October 2022

7.4.6.1 Charge: Recklessly Causing Injury (From 1/7/13)

Click here for a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be given if the offence was allegedly committed on or after 1 July 2013. If the offence was allegedly committed before 1 July 2013, use 7.4.6.3 Charge: Recklessly Causing Injury (Pre-1/7/13).

This charge is designed for cases where the injury is one which endangers life or is substantial and protracted. If the injury involves the destruction of a foetus, the charge will need to be modified.

I must now direct you about the crime of recklessly causing injury. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the complainant suffered an injury.

Two – the accused caused the complainant's injury.

Three – the accused was aware that his/her acts would probably injure the complainant.

Four – the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Injury

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant suffered an injury.

The law says that injury means a physical injury or harm to mental health, whether temporary or permanent. Physical injury includes unconsciousness, disfigurement, substantial pain, infection with a disease and an impairment of bodily function. It also includes all the things that you would, as a matter of ordinary experience, call an injury. Harm to mental health includes psychological harm, but not emotional reactions such as distress, grief, fear or anger which do not result in psychological harm.

To prove this element, the prosecution must show that NOC suffered an injury, rather than some superficial or trivial harm.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC suffered an injury because [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments]. It is only if you are satisfied that NOC was injured that this first element will be met.

Causation

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused caused the complainant's injury.

[If causation is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that doing so caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that [insert relevant causal acts] caused NOC to be injured. However, the defence contends that NOA did not commit those acts. For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason (such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a relevant charge from 7.1.2.1 Charges: Causation should be adapted and inserted here.]

Recklessness

The third element relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that at the time the accused did the acts that you find caused the complainant's injury, s/he was aware that those acts would probably result in the complainant being injured, but decided to go ahead anyway.[831] That is, NOA knew that NOC was likely to be injured by his/her actions.

It is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that NOC would be injured. S/he must have known that that consequence was probable.

In determining this part of the test, you must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew of the probability of NOC's injury. It is not enough that you, or a reasonable person, would have recognised that likelihood in the circumstances.

In this case, the following evidence is relevant to your assessment of NOA's state of mind: [Identify relevant evidence and the inferences to be drawn from that evidence]. When you are considering this evidence, you will remember what I told you earlier about drawing inferences.

Inferring states of mind

[If the jury might infer recklessness by using an objective test, add the following shaded section.]

In determining whether NOA knew that NOC would probably be injured by his/her actions, you [can/have been asked to] draw an inference from the probability that [you/the reasonable person] would have foreseen such a consequence in the accused's situation.

I must warn you that, although this is a legitimate step in reasoning towards a conclusion about NOA's state of mind, you must not treat this factor as decisive of the issue. It is not enough that you, or any other person, would have had such an awareness in the circumstances. You must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew that it was likely that NOC would be injured if s/he acted in that way.

In this case the prosecution submitted that NOA was aware of the likelihood that NOC would be injured. [Describe relevant act and describe relevant evidence and/or arguments.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

Without Lawful Justification or Excuse

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert directions from the relevant topics here (see Part 8: Victorian Defences).]

---

[831] The words "but decided to go ahead anyway" can be omitted if the judge thinks they are unnecessary or could confuse the jury. See 7.1.3 Recklessness.

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of recklessly causing injury, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOC was injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that injury; and

Three – That NOA was aware that his/her acts would probably injure NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of recklessly causing injury.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

7.4.6.2 Checklist: Recklessly Causing Injury (From 1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The complainant suffered an injury; and
2. The accused caused the complainant's injury; and
3. The accused knew that his/her acts would probably injure the complainant; and
4. The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

Injury

1. Did the complainant suffer an injury?

Consider – Injury means physical injury or harm to mental health, whether temporary or permanent

Consider – Physical injury includes unconsciousness, disfigurement, substantial pain, infection with a disease and an impairment of bodily function

Consider – Harm to mental health includes psychological harm but does not include an emotional reaction such as distress, grief, fear or anger unless it results in psychological harm

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Recklessly Causing Injury

---

Causation

2. Did the accused cause the complainant's injury?

*Consider – Were the accused's actions a substantial or significant cause of the complainant's injury

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Recklessly Causing Injury

Intention

3. Was the accused aware that his/her conduct would probably injure the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Recklessly Causing Injury

Lawful Justification or Excuse

4. Did the accused act without lawful justification or excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Recklessly Causing Injury (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Recklessly Causing Injury

Last updated: 1 July 2013

7.4.6.3 Charge: Recklessly Causing Injury (Pre-1/7/13)

Click here for a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be given if the offence was allegedly committed before 1 July 2013. If the offence was allegedly committed on or after 1 July 2013, use 7.4.6.1 Charge: Recklessly Causing Injury (From 1/7/13).

I must now direct you about the crime of recklessly causing injury. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the complainant suffered an injury.

Two – the accused caused the complainant's injury.

Three – the accused was aware that his/her acts would probably injure the complainant.

Four – the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Injury

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant suffered an injury.

The law defines the word "injury" to include "unconsciousness, hysteria, pain and any substantial impairment of bodily function". It also includes all the things that you would, as a matter of ordinary experience, call an injury.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOC suffered an injury because [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments]. It is only if you are satisfied that NOC was injured that this first element will be met.

Causation

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused caused the complainant's injury.

[If causation is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that NOA [insert relevant causal acts], and that doing so caused NOC's injury. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If the cause of the complainant's injury is not disputed, but the accused denies committing the relevant acts, add the following shaded section.]

In this case it is not disputed that [insert relevant causal acts] caused NOC to be injured. However, the defence contends that NOA did not commit those acts. For this element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that it was NOA who [insert relevant causal acts].

[If causation is in issue for another reason (such as the existence of multiple possible causes, or the intervention of a third party), a relevant charge from 7.1.2.1 Charges: Causation should be adapted and inserted here.]

Recklessness

The third element relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that at the time the accused did the acts that you find caused the complainant's injury, s/he was aware that those acts would probably result in the complainant being injured, but decided to go ahead anyway.[832] That is, NOA knew that NOC was likely to be injured by his/her actions.

It is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that NOC would be injured. S/he must have known that that consequence was probable.

In determining this part of the test, you must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew of the probability of NOC's injury. It is not enough that you, or a reasonable person, would have recognised that likelihood in the circumstances.

In this case, the following evidence is relevant to your assessment of NOA's state of mind: [Identify relevant evidence and the inferences to be drawn from that evidence]. When you are considering this evidence, you will remember what I told you earlier about drawing inferences.

Inferring states of mind

[If the jury might infer recklessness by using an objective test, add the following shaded section.]

In determining whether NOA knew that NOC would probably be injured by his/her actions, you [can/have been asked to] draw an inference from the probability that [you/the reasonable person] would have foreseen such a consequence in the accused's situation.

I must warn you that, although this is a legitimate step in reasoning towards a conclusion about NOA's state of mind, you must not treat this factor as decisive of the issue. It is not enough that you, or any other person, would have had such an awareness in the circumstances. You must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew that it was likely that NOC would be injured if s/he acted in that way.

In this case the prosecution submitted that NOA was aware of the likelihood that NOC would be injured. [Describe relevant act and describe relevant evidence and/or arguments.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

---

[832] The words "but decided to go ahead anyway" can be omitted if the judge thinks they are unnecessary or could confuse the jury. See 7.1.3 Recklessness.

Without Lawful Justification or Excuse

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

[If no defences are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, there is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe relevant acts], s/he acted without lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert directions from the relevant topics here (see Part 8: Victorian Defences).]

Application of Law to Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of recklessly causing injury, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOC was injured; and

Two – That NOA caused that injury; and

Three – That NOA was aware that his/her acts would probably injure NOC; and

Four – That NOA acted without lawful justification or excuse.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of recklessly causing injury.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

7.4.6.4 Checklist: Recklessly Causing Injury (Pre-1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The complainant suffered an injury; and
2. The accused caused the complainant's injury; and
3. The accused knew that his/her acts would probably injure the complainant; and
4. The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

Injury

1. Did the complainant suffer an injury?

Consider – Injury includes unconsciousness, hysteria, pain and any substantial impairment of bodily function

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Recklessly Causing Injury

Causation

2. Did the accused cause the complainant's injury?

Consider – Were the accused's actions a substantial or significant cause of the complainant's injury

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Recklessly Causing Injury

Intention

3. Was the accused aware that his/her conduct would probably injure the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Recklessly Causing Injury

Lawful Justification or Excuse

4. Did the accused act without lawful justification or excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Recklessly Causing Injury (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Recklessly Causing Injury

Last updated: 1 July 2013

7.4.7 Negligently Causing Serious Injury

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

1. The offence of negligently causing serious injury is created by Crimes Act 1958 s 24.
2. The offence punishes conduct that, if the complainant had died, would have constituted manslaughter by criminal negligence (see R v Shields [1981] VR 717; R v De'Zilwa (2002) 5 VR 408).
3. While the offence mainly operates in relation to injuries inflicted by motor vehicles, that is not its only field of operation (R v Reid Vic SC 9/10/1996. See e.g. R v Peters [2013] VSCA 222 and DPP v Weston [2016] VSCA 243 for cases where the offence could arise in a non-motor vehicle context).

The Elements

4. The offence of negligently causing serious injury has four elements:
   i) The accused owed the complainant a duty of care;
   ii) The accused breached that duty by criminal negligence;
   iii) The act which breached the duty of care was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately;
   iv) The accused's breach of the duty caused the complainant to suffer a "serious injury".
5. The prosecution does not need to establish that the accused intended to cause serious injury. The test for negligently causing serious injury is objective (Nydam v R [1977] VR 430; R v Shields [1981] VR 717).

The accused owed a duty of care

6. The first element the prosecution must establish is that the accused owed the complainant a duty of care (Nydam v R [1977] VR 430; R v Shields [1981] VR 717).

7. Only a legal duty of care can give rise to liability for negligently causing serious injury. Moral duties, such as the obligation to help a stranger in distress or inform emergency services about a fire, are not relevant for this offence (see R v Taktak (1988) 34 A Crim R 334).

8. One duty which commonly arises is the duty owed by the driver of a motor vehicle to take reasonable care for the safety of other road users (see, e.g. Manley v Alexander (2005) 223 ALR 228).

9. For more information about when the accused will owe a duty of care, and the content of that duty, see 7.2.3 Negligent Manslaughter.

The accused breached the duty by criminal negligence

10. The second element the prosecution must prove is that the accused breached the duty of care by criminal negligence (Nydam v R [1977] VR 430; R v Shields [1981] VR 717; Wilson v R (1992) 174 CLR 313).

11. The Court in Aston v The Queen explained how the jury should be directed about this element:

> ...[T]he judge must direct the jury that the required negligence must be of a high order, involving a great falling short of the standard of care which a reasonable person would have exercised in all of the circumstances, and a high risk that death or serious injury would result from the relevant conduct. The judge should also explain that, since the required negligence must be of a high order, and must involve a high risk of death or serious injury, the kind of negligence which might be constituted by momentary inattention or a minor error of judgment, or which might found a simple civil claim for damages, generally would be insufficient to establish the necessary high degree. It will also be necessary for the judge to point to those matters which might constitute a high order of negligence necessary to support a conviction. The judge should bring home to the jury that the offence is not concerned with minor breaches of the expected standard of care, even if they result in someone being hurt. While minor breaches of the standard of care might establish negligence in a civil case, such minor breaches are not sufficient to establish guilt in a criminal case. More is required, in the sense that the conduct must involve a great falling short of the standard of care, and a high risk that death or serious injury would result. Even a substantial departure from the standard of care may not constitute such a great departure sufficient to constitute criminal negligence (Aston v The Queen [2019] VSCA 225, [70]).

12. This is the same degree of negligence required to establish culpable driving by gross negligence (Aston v The Queen [2019] VSCA 225. See also Bouch v The Queen [2017] VSCA 86).

The breach of the duty of care was voluntary

13. The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the act which breached the duty of care was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately (see Ryan v R (1967) 121 CLR 205; Nydam v R [1977] VR 430).

14. While the prosecution does not need to prove that the accused intended to cause serious injury, they must still prove that the relevant act was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately (see R v Haywood [1971] VR 755; R v Vollmer [1996] 1 VR 95).

15. While the law predominantly focuses on the need for an act to be voluntary, there may be cases where the defence argues that an omission is involuntary. In such cases, the judge may need to direct the jury on the need to prove that the omission was conscious, voluntary and deliberate. Alternatively, the judge may identify an act within the omission and may instruct the jury to consider whether the accused committed that act consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

16. For information on voluntariness, see 7.2.1 Intentional or Reckless Murder.

The breach of the duty of care caused serious injury

17. The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the breach of the duty of care caused the complainant to suffer a serious injury.

18. As the prosecution must prove that it was the accused's criminal breach of the duty of care that caused the injury, it is important that the judge precisely identify the allegedly causal act or omission (see Cittadini v R [2009] NSWCCA 302; Justins v R (2010) 79 NSWLR 544).

19. Where the evidence reveals more than one possible breach of duty, the judge must decide, based on the factual circumstances, whether the separate breaches may be aggregated into a single breach for the purposes of causation (R v Pace & Conduit (Ruling No 2) [2008] VSC 308).

20. For further information about causation, see 7.1.2 Causation and 7.2.1 Intentional or Reckless Murder.

21. For further information about what constitutes a "serious injury" see 7.4.2 Intentionally Causing Serious Injury.

Defences

22. The prosecution must disprove any relevant defences, including self-defence, duress and emergency (R v Edwards [2009] SASC 233).

Alternative offences

23. Dangerous driving causing serious injury contrary to Crimes Act 1958 s 319(1A) is a statutory alternative to negligently causing serious injury (Crimes Act 1958 s 422A(1A)).

Last updated: 23 October 2019

7.4.7.1 Charge: Negligently Causing Serious Injury (From 1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used if the accused is charged with negligently causing serious injury by an act and the offence was allegedly committed on or after 1 July 2013.

The charge will need to be adapted if the accused is charged with negligently causing serious injury by an omission.

I must now direct you about the crime of negligently causing serious injury. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that the accused owed the complainant a duty of care.

Two – that the accused breached that duty by being criminally negligent.

Three – that the act which breached the duty of care was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

Four – that the accused's breach of the duty of care caused the complainant to suffer a serious injury.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[833]

Duty of Care

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused owed the complainant a duty of care.

The law imposes a duty [describe class of persons covered by the duty and the content of the duty,[834] e.g. "on a driver to take ordinary precautions to avoid harming people who are on or near the road"].

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, it is not disputed that NOA owed a duty of care to NOC because [describe basis for the duty, e.g. "NOA was driving a motor vehicle and NOC was [on/near] the road"]. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution argued that NOA owed NOC a duty because [describe basis for the duty and summarise prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. In response, the defence argued that [summarise relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

I direct you as a matter of law that if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that [describe findings of fact required to establish the duty], then NOA owed NOC a duty to [describe content of the duty]. If you are not satisfied that this was the case, then you must find NOA not guilty of negligently causing serious injury.

Gross Negligence

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused breached the duty of care by being criminally negligent.

A person acts with "criminal negligence" if his/her acts fall greatly short of the standard of care a reasonable person would have exercised and involved a high risk that death or serious injury would result.

This requires you to compare NOA's conduct with the "standard of care" that a reasonable person would have exercised in the circumstances. Precisely what that standard would have been is for you to decide, taking into account all of the circumstances, such as [describe relevant factors].

This is an objective test. That means that the prosecution does not need to establish that NOA intended to cause death or really serious injury or that s/he realised that his/her conduct was negligent. What matters is what a reasonable person in his/her situation would have known and done.

For this element to be met, you must find that the reasonable person in the accused's situation would have realised that his/her conduct created a high risk of death or really serious injury.

---

[833] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[834] See 7.2.3 Negligent Manslaughter for information concerning the people to whom the accused owes a duty of care and the content of the duty.

In making your determination, you should consider the reasonable person to be the same age as the accused, to have any specialised knowledge and experience the accused had, and to be of ordinary strength of mind. In particular, [describe characteristics of the accused that are relevant to the reasonable person, including training and experience].

[If there are qualities of the accused that are not relevant, add the shaded section below.]

However, the reasonable person is not [describe any adverse traits of the accused that are irrelevant, such as intoxication, concussion or carelessness].

In considering this question, remember that people do not always act perfectly. Even the most careful person can occasionally lose attention for a moment, or make minor mistakes. This offence is not concerned with minor breaches of the expected standard of care, even if they result in someone being hurt. While that might establish negligence in a civil case, it is not sufficient to establish guilt in a criminal case. For a person to be guilty of negligently causing serious injury, more is required – NOA's conduct must have involved a great falling short of the standard of care required and there must have been a high risk that death or serious injury would result. To emphasise the standard required, a substantial departure from the standard of care a reasonable person would exercise may not be enough. There must be a high degree of negligence, involving a great departure from the standard of care required, to constitute criminal negligence.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Voluntariness

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused's act which breached the duty of care was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately. These words each have a special meaning in law, which I will briefly explain.

The term "conscious" excludes the acts of an unconscious person, such as a sleepwalker, or a person rolling over in bed.

The term "voluntary" directs you to the requirement that the act which killed the deceased must be a "willed" act, that is, one resulting from the control by the accused of his/her own actions. This excludes the acts of a person operating in one of a number of rare mental states where the mind loses control of the body's actions.

The term "deliberate" excludes accidental acts, such as the consequences of falling over or fumbling an item.

[If the case involves an accident and the element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, you have heard [counsel/witnesses] describe the [describe relevant event, e.g. 'collision'] as an accident. For the purpose of this third element, you must look at [describe relevant voluntary act, e.g. 'whether the accused took adequate care when driving'], rather than [describe relevant accident, 'whether NOA colliding with NOV's car was an accident']. There is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe alleged breach of the duty of care] s/he did so consciously, voluntarily and deliberately, so you should have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

There is no issue that [if/when] NOA [alleged breach of the duty of care, e.g. "drove negligently"] s/he did so consciously, voluntarily and deliberately, so you should have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If voluntariness is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

The defence argued[835] that the prosecution has failed to prove that [describe alleged breach of the duty of care] was [select term(s), e.g. conscious, voluntary, deliberate].

The defence submitted that this breach was committed [describe and discuss the relevant form of involuntary conduct raised as an issue in the trial, such as reflex acts; physically compelled acts; acts performed in an automatic state]. The prosecution denied that this was the case. [Summarise relevant prosecution arguments and/or evidence.]

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the act which breached the duty of care was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately. If you are not satisfied that this was the case, then you must find NOA not guilty of negligently causing serious injury.

Causing serious injury

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused's breach of the duty of care caused the complainant to suffer a serious injury. There are two parts to this element.

First, the prosecution must prove that NOC suffered a serious injury.

The law defines the word injury to mean physical injury or harm to mental health, whether temporary or permanent. A serious injury is an injury which endangers life or is substantial and protracted.[836]

[If multiple injuries were inflicted, add the following shaded section.]

In making your decision, you do not have to look at each of NOC's injuries separately, and decide whether or not any one of them is a serious injury. A person may suffer a serious injury because of the cumulative effect of several injuries.

[If the physical injuries caused ongoing psychological harm, add the following shaded section.]

An injury may be substantial and protracted because of the combined effect of the immediate physical injuries and prolonged psychological injuries.

In this case, the prosecution alleges that NOC's injuries were serious, because [insert prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denies this, arguing [insert defence evidence and/or arguments].

The second part of this element requires the prosecution to prove that it was the accused's criminal negligence that caused NOC's injuries.

For this part of the element to be met, you do not need to find that NOA's negligence was the only cause, or the direct or immediate cause, of NOC's injuries. However, you must find that it was a substantial or significant cause.

You should approach this question in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

[Summarise any evidence and/or arguments concerning causation.]

It is only if you are satisfied that NOC's injuries were sufficiently grave to be classified as "serious", and that they were caused by NOA's criminal negligence, that this fourth element will be met.

---

[835] If the defence did not raise the issue of voluntariness, but it arises on the evidence, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

[836] The judge should consider including an example of a serious injury, such as brain damage, or a stabbing which causes significant blood loss.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of negligently causing serious injury the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA owed NOC a duty of care; and

Two – that NOA breached that duty of care by being criminally negligent; and

Three – that the act which breached the duty of care was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately; and

Four – that NOA's breach of the duty caused NOC to suffer a serious injury.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of negligently causing serious injury.

Last updated: 23 October 2019

7.4.7.2 Checklist: Negligently Causing Serious Injury (From 1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused owed the complainant a duty of care; and
2. The accused breached the duty of care by being criminally negligent; and
3. The act which breached the duty of care was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately; and
4. The accused's breach of the duty of care caused the complainant to suffer a serious injury.

Duty of Care

1. Did the accused owe the complainant a duty of care?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Negligently Causing Serious Injury

---

Gross Negligence

2. Did the accused breach the duty of care by being criminally negligent?

*Consider – Did the accused's conduct fall greatly short of the standard of care a reasonable person would have exercised, and involve a high risk of death or serious injury?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Negligently Causing Serious Injury

---

Conscious and Voluntary

3. Was the accused's act which breached the duty of care committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Negligently Causing Serious Injury

Causation

4. Did the accused's criminal negligence cause the complainant to suffer a serious injury?

4.1 Did the complainant suffer a serious injury?

Consider – Injury means physical injury or harm to mental health, whether temporary or permanent

Consider – Serious injury means an injury (including the cumulative effect of several injuries) that

(i) endangers life or

(ii) is substantial and protracted

If Yes, then go to 4.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Negligently Causing Serious Injury

4.2 Did the accused cause the complainant's serious injury?

*Consider – Was the accused's negligence a substantial or significant cause of the complainant's serious injury?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Negligently Causing Serious Injury (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2, 3 and 4.1)

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Negligently Causing Serious Injury

Last updated: 23 October 2019

7.4.7.3 Charge: Negligently Causing Serious Injury (Pre-1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used if the accused is charged with negligently causing serious injury by an act and the offence was allegedly committed before 1 July 2013.

The charge will need to be adapted if the accused is charged with negligently causing serious injury by an omission.

I must now direct you about the crime of negligently causing serious injury. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that the accused owed the complainant a duty of care.

Two – that the accused breached that duty by being criminally negligent.

Three – that the act which breached the duty of care was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately.

Four – that the accused's breach of the duty of care caused the complainant to suffer a serious injury.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.[837]

Duty of Care

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused owed the complainant a duty of care.

The law imposes a duty [describe class of persons covered by the duty and the content of the duty,[838] e.g. "on a driver to take ordinary precautions to avoid harming people who are on or near the road"].

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, it is not disputed that NOA owed a duty of care to NOC because [describe basis for the duty, e.g. "NOA was driving a motor vehicle and NOC was [on/near] the road"]. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the prosecution argued that NOA owed NOC a duty because [describe basis for the duty and summarise prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. In response, the defence argued that [summarise relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

I direct you as a matter of law that if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that [describe findings of fact required to establish the duty], then NOA owed NOC a duty to [describe content of the duty]. If you are not satisfied that this was the case, then you must find NOA not guilty of negligently causing serious injury.

Gross Negligence

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused breached the duty of care by being criminally negligent.

A person acts with "criminal negligence" if his/her acts fall greatly short of the standard of care a reasonable person would have exercised and involved a high risk that death or serious injury would result.

This requires you to compare NOA's conduct with the "standard of care" that a reasonable person would have exercised in the circumstances. Precisely what that standard would have been is for you to decide, taking into account all of the circumstances, such as [describe relevant factors].

This is an objective test. That means that the prosecution does not need to establish that NOA intended to cause death or really serious injury or that s/he realised that his/her conduct was negligent. What matters is what a reasonable person in his/her situation would have known and done.

For this element to be met, you must find that the reasonable person in the accused's situation would have realised that his/her conduct created a high risk of death or really serious injury.

---

[837] If an element is not in issue it should not be explained in full. Instead, the element should be described briefly, followed by an instruction such as: "It is [admitted/not disputed] that NOA [describe conduct, state of mind or circumstances that meets the element], and you should have no difficulty finding this element proven."

[838] See 7.2.3 Negligent Manslaughter for information concerning the people to whom the accused owes a duty of care and the content of the duty.

In making your determination, you should consider the reasonable person to be the same age as the accused, to have any specialised knowledge and experience the accused had, and to be of ordinary strength of mind. In particular, [describe characteristics of the accused that are relevant to the reasonable person, including training and experience].

[If there are qualities of the accused that are not relevant, add the shaded section below.]

However, the reasonable person is not [describe any adverse traits of the accused that are irrelevant, such as intoxication, concussion or carelessness].

In considering this question, remember that people do not always act perfectly. Even the most careful person can occasionally lose attention for a moment, or make minor mistakes. This offence is not concerned with minor breaches of the expected standard of care, even if they result in someone being hurt. While that might establish negligence in a civil case, it is not sufficient to establish guilt in a criminal case. For a person to be guilty of negligently causing serious injury, more is required – NOA's conduct must have involved a great falling short of the standard of care required and there must have been a high risk that death or serious injury would result. To emphasise the standard required, a substantial departure from the standard of care a reasonable person would exercise may not be enough. There must be a high degree of negligence, involving a great departure from the standard of care required, to constitute criminal negligence.

[Summarise relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Voluntariness

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused's act which breached the duty of care was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately. These words each have a special meaning in law, which I will briefly explain.

The term "conscious" excludes the acts of an unconscious person, such as a sleepwalker, or a person rolling over in bed.

The term "voluntary" directs you to the requirement that the act which killed the deceased must be a "willed" act, that is, one resulting from the control by the accused of his/her own actions. This excludes the acts of a person operating in one of a number of rare mental states where the mind loses control of the body's actions.

The term "deliberate" excludes accidental acts, such as the consequences of falling over or fumbling an item.

[If the case involves an accident and the element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, you have heard [counsel/witnesses] describe the [describe relevant event, e.g. 'collision'] as an accident. For the purpose of this third element, you must look at [describe relevant voluntary act, e.g. 'whether the accused took adequate care when driving'], rather than [describe relevant accident, 'whether NOA colliding with NOV's car was an accident']. There is no issue that [if/when] NOA [describe alleged breach of the duty of care] s/he did so consciously, voluntarily and deliberately, so you should have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If this element is not in issue, add the following shaded section.]

There is no issue that [if/when] NOA [alleged breach of the duty of care, e.g. "drove negligently"] s/he did so consciously, voluntarily and deliberately, so you should have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If voluntariness is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

The defence argued[839] that the prosecution has failed to prove that [describe alleged breach of the duty of care] was [select term(s), e.g. conscious, voluntary, deliberate].

The defence submitted that this breach was committed [describe and discuss the relevant form of involuntary conduct raised as an issue in the trial, such as reflex acts; physically compelled acts; acts performed in an automatic state]. The prosecution denied that this was the case. [Summarise relevant prosecution arguments and/or evidence.]

It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the act which breached the duty of care was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately. If you are not satisfied that this was the case, then you must find NOA not guilty of negligently causing serious injury.

Causing serious injury

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused's breach of the duty of care caused the complainant to suffer a serious injury. There are two parts to this element.

First, the prosecution must prove that NOC suffered a serious injury.

It is a matter for you whether the injury that NOC suffered was "serious". This requires a value judgment, comparing NOC's injury with the range of injuries that a person may suffer.

The law defines the word "injury" to include "unconsciousness, hysteria, pain and any substantial impairment of bodily function". It also includes all the things that you would, as a matter of ordinary experience, call an injury.

It is not sufficient for you to find that NOC was injured. For this part of the element to be met, the prosecution must prove that s/he suffered a serious injury.

You may consider NOC's injuries as lying somewhere on a spectrum of injuries. At one end are trivial injuries like a paper cut or a grazed knee. At the other end of the spectrum are life–threatening injuries or permanent brain damage and the like.

It is a matter for you where on that spectrum NOC's injuries lie. In making your determination, you do not have to look at each of NOC's injuries separately, and assess whether or not any one of them is sufficiently "serious". A person may suffer a "serious injury" because of a combination of injuries.

[Summarise any evidence and/or arguments concerning the seriousness of the complainant's injuries.]

The second part of this element requires the prosecution to prove that it was the accused's criminal negligence that caused NOC's injuries.

For this part of the element to be met, you do not need to find that NOA's negligence was the only cause, or the direct or immediate cause, of NOC's injuries. However, you must find that it was a substantial or significant cause.

You should approach this question in a common sense manner, bearing in mind that your answer affects whether or not the accused is held criminally responsible for his/her actions.

[Summarise any evidence and/or arguments concerning causation.]

It is only if you are satisfied that NOC's injuries were sufficiently grave to be classified as "serious", and that they were caused by NOA's criminal negligence, that this fourth element will be met.

---

[839] If the defence did not raise the issue of voluntariness, but it arises on the evidence, this section will need to be modified accordingly.

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of negligently causing serious injury the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA owed NOC a duty of care; and

Two – that NOA breached that duty of care by being criminally negligent; and

Three – that the act which breached the duty of care was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately; and

Four – that NOA's breach of the duty caused NOC to suffer a serious injury.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of negligently causing serious injury.

Last updated: 23 October 2019

7.4.7.4 Checklist: Negligently Causing Serious Injury (Pre-1/7/13)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Four elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused owed the complainant a duty of care; and
2. The accused breached the duty of care by being criminally negligent; and
3. The act which breached the duty of care was committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately; and
4. The accused's breach of the duty of care caused the complainant to suffer a serious injury.

Duty of Care

1. Did the accused owe the complainant a duty of care?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Negligently Causing Serious Injury

Gross Negligence

2. Did the accused breach the duty of care by being grossly negligent?

*Consider – Did the accused's conduct fall greatly short of the standard of care a reasonable person would have exercised, and involve a high risk of death or serious injury?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Negligently Causing Serious Injury

Conscious and Voluntary

3. Was the accused's act which breached the duty of care committed consciously, voluntarily and deliberately?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Negligently Causing Serious Injury

Causation

4. Did the accused's criminal negligence cause the complainant to suffer a serious injury?

4.1 Did the complainant suffer a serious injury?

Consider – Injury includes unconsciousness, hysteria, pain and any substantial impairment of bodily function; and

Serious injury includes a combination of injuries

If Yes, then go to 4.2

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Negligently Causing Serious Injury

4.2 Did the accused cause the complainant's serious injury?

Consider – Was the accused's negligence a substantial or significant cause of the complainant's serious injury?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Negligently Causing Serious Injury (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1, 2, 3 and 4.1)

If No, then the Accused is not guilty of Negligently Causing Serious Injury

Last updated: 23 October 2019

7.4.8 Common Law Assault

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Introduction

1. Assault is an indictable common law offence in Victoria (R v Patton [1998] 1 VR 7).[840]
2. Historically, a distinction was drawn between the offences of assault and battery:
   - An assault required the accused to put the complainant in fear of the use of force, but did not require the application of force;
   - A battery required the actual application of force.
3. This distinction is no longer drawn. The offence of assault now incorporates both situations (which are addressed separately below) (Fagan v Commissioner of Metropolitan Police [1969] 1 QB 439; Pritchard v R (1999) 107 A Crim R 88).

[840] In Victoria, a person may also be charged with assault under s 31 of the Crimes Act 1958. See 7.4.9 Statutory Assault.

Assault Involving the Application of Force

The elements

4. Assault involving the application of force has three elements:

   i) The accused applied force to the complainant's body;

   ii) The application of force was intentional or reckless; and

   iii) The application of force was without lawful justification or excuse.

The accused applied force to the complainant's body

5. The prosecution must prove that the accused applied force to the complainant's body (Fagan v Commissioner of Metropolitan Police [1969] 1 QB 439).

6. The force applied need not be violent and may be as slight as a mere touch (Collins v Wilcock [1984] 1 WLR 1172).

7. Force may be applied directly or through the medium of a weapon or instrument controlled by the accused (Fagan v Commissioner of Metropolitan Police [1969] 1 QB 439; Director of Public Prosecutions v K [1990] 1 WLR 1067; Pritchard v R (1999) 107 A Crim R 88; Darby v DPP (NSW) (2004) 61 NSWLR 558).[841]

The application of force was intentional or reckless

8. The prosecution must prove that the application of force was intentional or reckless (Fagan v Commissioner of Metropolitan Police [1969] 1 QB 439; Macpherson v Brown (1975) 12 SASR 184; R v Venna [1976] QB 421; R v O'Conner (1980) 146 CLR 6).

9. For the application of force to have been "reckless", the accused must have realised that his or her conduct would probably result in force being applied to the complainant's body (R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585).

10. The accused will not have acted recklessly simply because he or she ought to have known that his or her conduct would result in such contact. The accused must have adverted to that likelihood (Edwards v Police (1998) 71 SASR 493; Fisher v Police (2004) 154 A Crim R 511).

11. For more information on recklessness generally, see 7.1.3 Recklessness.

Lawful Excuse

12. The prosecution must disprove, beyond reasonable doubt, any justifications or excuses that are open on the evidence (Zecevic v DPP (1987) 162 CLR 645).

13. The following justifications and excuses are discussed below:

    - Consent;
    - Touching in the course of an ordinary social activity;
    - Exercising a lawful power of arrest;
    - Lawfully correcting a child;
    - Self-defence;

---

[841] For example, it has been held that this element has been met where the force was applied via a car (Fagan v Commissioner of Metropolitan Police [1969] 1 QB 439) or a police dog (Darby v DPP (NSW) (2004) 61 NSWLR 558; [2004] NSWCA 431 per Giles JA).

- Ejecting a trespasser.

Consent

14. In some cases, the prosecution may need to prove that the complainant did not consent to the alleged assault (see, e.g. Neal v R (2011) 32 VR 454; R v Stein (2007) 18 VR 376; Parish v DPP (2007) 17 VR 412; [2007] VSC 494; R v McIntosh [1999] VSC 358).

15. Whether consent is available as a lawful excuse will depend on:

    - The extent of any harm caused or risked; and
    - The purpose for which the act was committed (Neal v R (2011) 32 VR 454).

16. See Consent (Non-Sexual Offences) (topic not yet complete) for further information.

Ordinary Social activities

17. An act which is conducted as part of ordinary social activity will not constitute an assault (Collins v Wilcock [1984] 1 WLR 1172).

18. Physical contact that is generally acceptable in the ordinary course of everyday life includes jostling on public transport or in a busy street (Collins v Wilcock [1984] 1 WLR 1172).

Arrest

19. A person exercising a lawful power of arrest is entitled to use reasonable force where necessary to effect the arrest (R v Turner [1962] VR 30).

20. Resisting unlawful arrest may be a defence to assault. For more information about resisting arrest, see 7.4.9 Statutory Assault.

Lawful correction of children

21. The lawful correction of children will generally not be an assault. However, there are strict limits on the rights of parents (or those in loco parentis) to inflict corporal punishment. The punishment must:

    - Be moderate and reasonable;
    - Have a proper relation to the age, physique and mentality of the child; and
    - Be carried out in a reasonable manner (R v Terry [1955] VLR 114).

22. Corporal punishment is not permitted in Victorian Government schools (Education and Training Reform Regulations (Vic), reg 14).

Self-defence

23. People can use reasonable force to defend themselves from unlawful violence, as long as they believe on reasonable grounds that what they are doing is necessary in self-defence and the other elements of the defence are met. The test differs depending on when the offence was alleged to have been committed. For offences committed on or after 1 November 2014, see 8.1 Statutory Self-defence (From 1/11/14) for further information. For offences committed before 1 November 2014, see 8.3 Common Law Self Defence.

Ejecting a trespasser

24. A householder is entitled to use reasonable force to eject a trespasser. However, where the person who enters is a licensee, he or she must be given reasonable time to leave before force can be used against him or her (Robson v Hallett [1967] 2 QB 939; Kay v Hibbert [1977] Crim LR 226).

The accused's acts need not be hostile

25. In Victoria, hostility has sometimes been seen to be an element of assault involving the application of force. For example, some cases define assault as "a blow or other intentional application of physical force to the complainant's body in a hostile manner without his [or her] consent and without lawful justification or excuse" (see, e.g. R v Holzer [1968] VR 481).

26. However, the High Court has held that hostility or hostile intent is not a necessary requirement of assault. It is simply one of the factors to be taken into account when determining whether or not the force used was unlawful. Hostility may turn an otherwise unobjectionable act into an assault (Boughey v R (1986) 161 CLR 10).

27. Thus, the absence of hostility does not, on its own, provide an excuse or justification for an assault (Boughey v R (1986) 161 CLR 10).

Assault Not Involving the Application of Force

The Elements

28. Assault not involving the application of force has three elements:

    i) The accused committed an act that caused the complainant to apprehend the immediate application of force to his or her body;

    ii) The accused intended his or her actions to cause such apprehension, or was reckless as to that outcome; and

    iii) The accused had no lawful justification or excuse for causing the complainant to apprehend the application of immediate force.

The accused caused the complainant to apprehend violence

29. The prosecution must prove that accused committed an act that caused the complainant to apprehend the immediate application of force to his or her body (Knight v R (1988) 35 A Crim R 314*; Fisher v Police* (2004) 154 A Crim R 511; ACN 087 528 774 v Chetcuti (2008) 21 VR 559; Slaveski v State of Victoria [2010] VSC 441; White v State of South Australia (2010) 106 SASR 521).

30. Although the cases often refer to the accused "fearing" the application of force, the complainant does not need to have been frightened. He or she only needs to have apprehended that physical contact would be made without his or her consent (ACN 087 528 774 v Chetcuti (2008) 21 VR 559; Slaveski v State of Victoria [2010] VSC 441).

31. The contact apprehended by the complainant does not need to be grave. Apprehension of any application of force is sufficient (Macpherson v Brown (1975) 12 SASR 184; ACN 087 528 774 v Chetcuti (2008) 21 VR 559; Slaveski v State of Victoria [2010] VSC 441).

32. The complainant does not need to apprehend a specific act. This element will be met where the complainant does not know what the accused is going to do next, but believes that whatever it is, it is likely to be physically violent (Smith v Chief Superintendent, Woking Police Station (1983) 76 Cr App R 234; R v Ireland [1998] AC 147).

33. The complainant does not need to fear that the accused will apply the force personally. This element will be satisfied if the accused causes the complainant to apprehend the immediate application of force by a third party (Macpherson v Beath (1975) 12 SASR 174).

34. This element may be satisfied even though the accused had neither the intention nor the ability to carry out his or her threat (e.g. where the accused points a replica gun at the complainant, but the complainant believes it to be real and apprehends its imminent use) (Barton v Armstrong [1969] 2 NSWR 451; Macpherson v Brown (1975) 12 SASR 184; R v Gabriel (2004) 182 FLR 102).

35. For this element to be satisfied, the complainant must know about the accused's actions (Pemble v The Queen (1971) 124 CLR 107).[842]

36. Evidence that the complainant feared immediate violence can be inferred from his or her actions (e.g. fleeing or hiding from the accused) (R v Mostyn (2004) 145 A Crim R 304).

The complainant must have feared the "immediate" application of force

37. The complainant must have apprehended or expected the immediate or imminent application of force (Knight v R (1988) 35 A Crim R 314; R v Gabriel (2004) 182 FLR 102; ACN 087 528 774 v Chetcuti (2008) 21 VR 559; Slaveski v State of Victoria [2010] VSC 441).

38. Although there has been some confusion about this issue, it now seems clear that the question is not whether the complainant immediately apprehended the application of force (i.e., felt fear as soon as the threat was made), but whether he or she apprehended the immediate application of force (i.e., feared that force would be applied shortly) (Knight v R (1988) 35 A Crim R 314; Zanker v Vartzokas (1988) 34 A Crim R 11; R v Gabriel [2004] ACTSC 30; ACN 087 528 774 v Chetcuti (2008) 21 VR 559; Slaveski v State of Victoria [2010] VSC 441. Cf Barton v Armstrong [1969] 2 NSWR 451; R v Mostyn (2004) 145 A Crim R 304).

39. It is therefore not sufficient for the complainant to have immediately feared that force would be applied at some distant point in the future. The complainant must have apprehended that force would be applied immediately after the threat was made (Knight v R (1988) 35 A Crim R 314; R v Gabriel [2004] ACTSC 30; ACN 087 528 774 v Chetcuti (2008) 21 VR 559; Slaveski v State of Victoria [2010] VSC 441. Cf Barton v Armstrong [1969] 2 NSWR 451; R v Mostyn (2004) 145 A Crim R 304).

40. This does not mean that the complainant must apprehend that the force will be applied without delay. It is enough that the complainant apprehend that it will commence 'soon' (i.e., in the immediate future) (R v Gabriel (2004) 182 FLR 102).

41. In some cases, while the complainant will fear the application of force, he or she will not be sure if it is likely to be applied immediately or at some more remote time. This element will be met as long as he or she apprehends the possibility of its immediate application (R v Gabriel (2004) 182 FLR 102).

Continuing Threats

42. A threat of violence may continue after the relevant words have been uttered (e.g. where the complainant is held prisoner by the accused, who has threatened to harm him or her later) (Zanker v Vartzokas (1988) 34 A Crim R 11).

43. It has been held that in such cases, the requirement for "immediacy" will be satisfied if:

    - The accused's actions caused the complainant to apprehend relatively immediate and imminent violence; and
    - The accused remained in a position of dominance, and in a position to carry out the feared violence at some time not too remote, thus keeping the apprehension ever present in the complainant's mind (Zanker v Vartzokas (1988) 34 A Crim R 11; R v Mostyn (2004) 145 A Crim R 304. But see R v Gabriel (2004) 182 FLR 102).

The apprehension may have been caused by words or gestures

44. While there has been some confusion over whether "mere words" can constitute an assault, it seems that they can (as long as they cause the complainant to apprehend the immediate application of force) (White v State of South Australia (2010) 106 SASR 521; Slaveski v State of Victoria [2010] VSC 441. See also Zanker v Vartzokas (1988) A Crim R 11; R v Ireland [1998] AC 147; R v Gabriel (2004) 182 FLR 102).

---

[842] Thus, if the complainant is unaware of that fact that the accused is pointing a gun at the back of his or her head, there will be no assault (Pemble v The Queen (1971) 124 CLR 107).

45. A physical gesture may also cause the complainant to apprehend the immediate application of force (White v State of South Australia (2010) 106 SASR 521).

Threats from a distance (e.g. telephone threats)

46. There is no rule preventing a threat of violence made from a distance (e.g. a threat made over the telephone or by email) from constituting an assault (Slaveski v State of Victoria [2010] VSC 441. See also Barton v Armstrong [1969] 2 NSWR 451; R v Knight (1988) A Crim R 314; R v Mostyn (2004) 145 A Crim R 304).

47. For such conduct to constitute an assault, all of the elements of the offence must be met – including the requirement that the complainant fear the immediate application of force (Slaveski v State of Victoria [2010] VSC 441; R v Knight (1988) A Crim R 314).

48. Whether or not a threat made from a distance will constitute an assault will depend on the circumstances. For example:

    - If the accused sends the complainant a letter threatening death by shooting, then makes an ominous phone call conveying the impression that he or she has the complainant in the sights of a firearm, there may be an assault.
    - If the accused telephones the complainant and threatens to punch him or her, but it is clear that the threat cannot be carried out immediately (due to the accused's remote location), there will not be an assault (R v Gabriel (2004) 182 FLR 102. See also Barton v Armstrong [1969] 2 NSWR 451; Wilson v Kuhl [1979] VR 315).[843]

49. A silent telephone call may amount to an assault where it causes fear of immediate violence (R v Ireland [1998] AC 147).

The apprehension does not need to have been reasonable

50. Although not clear,[844] it seems that the complainant's apprehension does not need to be reasonable (Macpherson v Beath (1975) 12 SASR 174; White v State of South Australia (2010) 106 SASR 521).

51. Thus, if the accused intentionally puts in fear of immediate violence an exceptionally timid person known to him or her to be timid, the unreasonableness of the complainant's fear may not prevent conviction (Macpherson v Beath (1975) 12 SASR 174).

The fear was created intentionally or recklessly

52. The second element the prosecution must prove is that the accused intended to cause the complainant to apprehend the immediate application of force, or was reckless as to that outcome (Fagan v Commissioner of Metropolitan Police [1969] 1 QB 439; Macpherson v Brown (1975) 12 SASR 184; Knight v R (1988) 35 A Crim R 314; White v State of South Australia (2010) 106 SASR 521).

53. In relation to intention, the prosecution only needs to prove that the accused intended to create in the complainant's mind an apprehension that force would be applied. They do not need to prove that he or she intended to actually apply force (ACN 087 528 774 v Chetcuti (2008) 21 VR 559; Slaveski v State of Victoria [2010] VSC 441; White v State of South Australia (2010) 106 SASR 521).

---

[843] In such circumstances the accused may be guilty of another offence which does not contain an immediacy requirement, such as making a threat to inflict serious injury (R v Gabriel (2004) 182 FLR 102).

[844] In relation to the tort of assault, the apprehension created in the mind of the victim must be objectively reasonable (ACN 087 528 774 v Chetcuti (2008) 21 VR 559; Slaveski v State of Victoria [2010] VSC 441). However, it seems that this is not a requirement in the criminal law.

54. In relation to recklessness, the prosecution must prove that the accused realised that his or her conduct would probably cause the complainant to apprehend the immediate application of force (R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585).

55. The accused will not have acted recklessly simply because he or she ought to have known that his or her conduct would cause the complainant to fear the application of force. The accused must have turned his or her mind to that likelihood (Edwards v Police (1998) 71 SASR 493; Fisher v Police (2004) 154 A Crim R 511).

56. For more information on recklessness generally, see 7.1.3 Recklessness.

Lawful Justification or Excuse

57. The third element the prosecution must prove is that the accused had no lawful justification or excuse for causing the complainant to apprehend the application of immediate force.

58. See the discussion of lawful justification and excuse above (in relation to assault involving the application of force) for further information about this element.

Last updated: 1 November 2014

7.4.8.1 Charge: Assault Application of Force

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of assault. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused applied force to the body of the complainant.

Two – the application of force was intentional.[845]

Three – the application of force was without lawful justification or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in detail.

Application of force

The first element relates to what the accused did. [He/She] must have applied force to the body of the complainant.

It does not matter how much force is applied or for how long it was applied, and it does not need to have harmed the complainant. Even a slight touch is enough.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA applied force to NOC when [insert evidence]. The defence responded [insert evidence].

Intention or recklessness

The second element relates to the accused person's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that the application of force was intentional. For you to be satisfied that the accused's actions were intentional, you must be satisfied that NOA deliberately applied force to NOC's body.

[845] It is also possible for this element to be satisfied by recklessness. In relevant cases the charge will need to be amended accordingly (see 7.1.3 Recklessness for assistance).

Lawful justification and excuse

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that the application of force was without lawful [justification/excuse].

[If any lawful justifications, such as consent, self-defence, arrest, or the lawful correction of children, are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the defence argued that [insert evidence of lawful justification]. The prosecution argued [insert any counter arguments].

[If the excuse of ordinary social activity is open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In this case the defence argued that while NOA did apply force to NOC's body, this was done while [he/she] was carrying out the ordinary social activity of [insert evidence]. Under the law, force that is applied in the course of ordinary social activities is excusable. However, this excuse is limited to touching that is reasonable in our daily interactions. If the force that is applied goes beyond that, the accused will not have a lawful excuse.

[If hostility is in issue, add: Similarly, if the force is applied with a hostile intention, actions that would otherwise be considered excusable may become unlawful. In this case, the prosecution argued that [insert relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence]. It is for you to determine whether NOA did have such a hostile intention, and whether in all of the circumstances this intention made [his/her] acts unlawful].

[If any lawful justifications or excuses are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

Remember, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the application of force was without lawful [justification/excuse]. NOA does not need to prove that [he/she] had such a [justification/excuse].

[If no lawful justifications or excuses are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, it has not been suggested that there was a lawful justification or excuse for the accused's alleged actions. The main issue[s] for you to determine are [refer to facts in issue].

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of assault the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA applied force to NOC; and

Two – that NOA intended to apply force to NOC; and Three – that NOA applied force to NOC without a lawful [justification/excuse].

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of assault.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

7.4.8.2 Checklist: Application of Force

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist is based on an intentional assault. If recklessness is in issue it will need to be amended as necessary.

Three elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused applied force to the body of the complainant; and
2. The accused intended to apply force to the body of the complainant; and
3. The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

Application of Force

1. Did the accused apply force to the body of the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Intention

2. Did the accused intend to apply force to the body of the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Lawful Justification or Excuse

3. Did the accused act without lawful justification or excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of assault (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1 and 2)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Last updated: 2 May 2006

7.4.8.3 Charge: Assault No Application of Force

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of assault. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 4 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused acted in the way alleged.

Two – the accused intended to cause the complainant to apprehend the immediate application of force to their body.[846]

Three – the accused caused the complainant to apprehend the immediate application of force.

Four – the accused had no lawful justification or excuse for their behaviour.

I will now explain each of these elements in detail.

---

[846] It is also possible for this element to be satisfied by recklessness. In relevant cases the charge will need to be amended accordingly (see 7.1.3 Recklessness for assistance).

Actions of the accused

The first element relates to what the accused did. In this case the prosecution alleged that NOA [insert evidence about the accused's threatening behaviour]. The defence responded [insert evidence].

Intention or recklessness

The second element relates to the accused person's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that the accused intended their actions to cause the complainant to apprehend the immediate application of force to their body.

It does not matter whether the accused was able to apply force to the complainant, nor whether they actually intended to apply such force. For this second element to be satisfied, the accused only needs to have intended to create an apprehension in the complainant that force would be applied.

Apprehension of immediate application of force

The third element relates to the effect of the accused's actions on the complainant. The prosecution must prove that the accused's actions caused the complainant to apprehend the immediate application of force to their body.

[If relevant, add: The complainant must apprehend that the force is about to occur. Threats of harm occurring some time in the future are not sufficient.]

Again, it does not matter whether the accused was able to apply force to the complainant, nor whether they intended to apply such force. For this third element to be satisfied, the complainant only needs to have apprehended the immediate application of force to their body.

Lawful justification and excuse

The fourth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused's acts were without lawful [justification/excuse].

[If any lawful justifications, such as consent, self-defence, arrest, or the lawful correction of children, are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, the defence argued that [insert evidence of lawful justification]. The prosecution argued [insert any counter arguments].

[If the excuse of ordinary social activity is open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In this case the defence argued that while NOA did [insert relevant act], this was done while [he/she] was carrying out the ordinary social activity of [insert evidence]. Under the law, a [insert relevant act] that is done in the course of an ordinary social activity is excusable. However, this excuse is limited to [insert relevant act] that is reasonable in our daily interactions. If the [insert relevant act] goes beyond that, the accused will not have a lawful excuse.

[If hostility is in issue, add: Similarly, if the [insert relevant act] is done with a hostile intention, actions that would otherwise be considered excusable may become unlawful. In this case, the prosecution argued that [insert relevant evidence]. The defence responded [insert relevant evidence]. It is for you to determine whether NOA did have such a hostile intention, and whether in all of the circumstances this intention made [his/her] acts unlawful].

[If any lawful justifications or excuses are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

Remember, it is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused's behaviour was without lawful [justification/excuse]. NOA does not need to prove that [he/she] had such a [justification/excuse].

[If no lawful justifications or excuses are open on the evidence, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, it has not been suggested that there was a lawful justification or excuse for the accused's alleged actions. The main issue[s] for you to determine are [refer to facts in issue].

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of assault the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA acted in the way alleged; and

Two – that NOA intended to cause NOC to apprehend the immediate application of force; and

Three – that NOA caused NOC to apprehend the immediate application of force; and Four – that NOA's actions were without lawful [justification/excuse].

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of assault.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

7.4.8.4 Checklist: No Application of Force

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist is based on an intentional assault. If recklessness is in issue it will need to be amended as necessary.

Four elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused acted in the way alleged; and
2. The accused intended to cause the complainant to apprehend the immediate application of force to their body; and
3. The accused's actions caused the complainant to apprehend the immediate application of force; and
4. The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

Application of Force

1. Did the accused act in the way alleged by the prosecution?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Intention

2. Did the accused intend to cause the complainant to apprehend the immediate application of force?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Effect on the Complainant

3. Did the accused's actions cause the complainant to apprehend the immediate application of force?

If Yes, go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Lawful Justification or Excuse

4. Did the accused act without lawful justification or excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of assault (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1, 2 and 3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Last updated: 2 May 2006

7.4.9 Statutory Assault

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Introduction

1. Although s 31 of the Crimes Act 1958 contains only 3 subsections, it establishes 5 distinct offences (see, e.g. R v Galvin (No 2) [1961] VR 740):

   i) Assaulting or threatening to assault a person with intent to commit an indictable offence – s 31(1)(a).

   ii) Assaulting or threatening to assault an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer on duty (or person lawfully assisting an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer on duty) – s 31(1)(b), (ba).

   iii) Resisting an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer on duty (or person lawfully assisting an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer on duty) – s 31(1)(b), (ba).

   iv) Obstructing an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer on duty (or person lawfully assisting an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer on duty) – s 31(1)(b), (ba).

   v) Assaulting or threatening to assault a person with intent to resist or prevent arrest – s 31(1)(c).

2. There have not been any cases concerning the interpretation of the current provisions in s 31. All of the principles mentioned in this topic have been taken from cases concerning previous statutory provisions or similar common law offences. It is assumed that they apply and provide relevant guidance on the current offences.

Commencement information

3. Prior to 2 November 2014, s 31(b) only covered police officers and protective services officers.

4. Under amendments introduced by the Sentencing Amendment (Emergency Workers) Act 2014, the range of workers covered was expanded significantly to include ambulance workers, hospital staff and others. The range was further expanded in relation to custodial officers by the Crimes Legislation Amendment Act 2016. On 5 April 2018, the range of workers was further expanded to include youth justice custodial workers by the commencement of Part 8 of the Children and Justice Legislation Amendment (Youth Justice Reform) Act 2017. See Emergency workers, youth justice custodial workers and custodial officers, below.

Definition of assault

5. "Assault" is defined in s 31(2) to mean the direct or indirect application of force to the body of, or to the clothing or equipment worn by, a person. "Application of force" is defined in s 31(3) to include the application of heat, light, electric current or any other form of energy, as well as the application of matter in solid, liquid or gaseous form.
6. Unlike common law assault (see 7.4.8 Common Law Assault), an assault under s 31(2) must be done with intent to inflict, or being reckless as to the infliction of, bodily injury, pain, discomfort, damage, insult or deprivation of liberty. The assault must also result in the infliction of one of these consequences, although not necessarily the one intended or foreseen.

Assault with intent to commit an indictable offence – s 31(1)(a)

7. Under s 31(1)(a) it is an offence to assault or threaten to assault another person with intent to commit an indictable offence.
8. Whether or not an offence is indictable is a matter of law to be determined by the judge.

Assaulting, resisting or intentionally obstructing an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer on duty – s 31(1)(b), (ba)

9. Under s 31(1)(b) it is an offence to assault or threaten to assault, resist or intentionally obstruct an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer on duty, knowing or being reckless as to whether the person was an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer.
10. Section 31(1)(ba) creates a corresponding offence of assaulting or threatening to assault, resist or intentionally obstruct a person lawfully assisting an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer on duty, knowing or being reckless as to whether the person was assisting an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer.
11. The words "assault", "resist" and "intentionally obstruct" in s 31(1)(b) create three separate offences (R v Galvin (No 2) [1961] VR 740).
12. For each of these offences there are two requirements:

    i) The person assaulted, resisted or obstructed must be an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer, or a person lawfully assisting an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer; and

    ii) The accused must know or be reckless as to the fact that the person is, or is assisting, an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer (R v Galvin (No 1) [1961] VR 733; see also R v Reynhoudt (1962) 107 CLR 381).

Emergency workers, youth justice custodial workers and custodial officers

13. Under Crimes Act 1958 s 31, "emergency worker," "youth justice custodial worker" and "custodial officer" have the same meaning as given in Sentencing Act 1991 s 10AA. That provision contains the following definitions:

Custodial officer means –

(a) a Governor, prison officer, escort officer within the meaning of the Corrections Act 1986; or

(b) a police custody officer within the meaning of the Victoria Police Act 2013; or

(c) a person authorised under section 9A(1) of the Corrections Act 1986 to exercise a function or power of a Governor, a prison officer or an escort officer under that Act; or

(d) a person authorised under section 9A(1A) or (1B) of the Corrections Act 1986 to exercise a function or power referred to in that subsection;

Emergency worker means –

(a) a police officer or protective services officer within the meaning of the Victoria Police Act 2013; or

(b) an operational staff member within the meaning of the Ambulance Services Act 1986; or

(c) a person employed or engaged to provide, or support the provision of, emergency treatment to patients in a hospital; or

(d) a person employed by the Metropolitan Fire and Emergency Services Board established under the Metropolitan Fire Brigades Act 1958 or a member of a fire or emergency service unit established under that Act; or

(e) an officer or employee of the Country Fire Authority under the Country Fire Authority Act 1958; or

(f) an officer or member of a brigade under the Country Fire Authority Act 1958, whether a part-time officer or member, a permanent officer or member or a volunteer officer or member within the meaning of that Act; or

(g) a casual fire-fighter within the meaning of Part V of the Country Fire Authority Act 1958; or

(h) a volunteer auxiliary worker appointed under section 17A of the Country Fire Authority Act 1958; or

(i) a person employed in the Department of Environment and Primary Industries with emergency response duties; or

(j) a registered member or probationary member within the meaning of the Victoria State Emergency Service Act 2005 or an employee in the Victoria State Emergency Service; or

(k) a volunteer emergency worker within the meaning of the Emergency Management Act 1986; or

(l) any other person or body-

(i) required or permitted under the terms of their employment by, or contract for services with, the Crown or a government agency to respond (within the meaning of the Emergency Management Act 2013) to an emergency (within the meaning of that Act); or

(ii) engaged by the Crown or a government agency to provide services or perform work in relation to a particular emergency;

Youth justice custodial worker means a person-

(a) who is employed or engaged by the Secretary to the Department of Justice and Regulation in a remand centre, a youth residential centre or a youth justice centre; and

(b) whose duties include duties in relation to detainees in the custody of the Secretary.

"On duty"

14. Under s 31(1)(b)(i), it is only an offence to assault, resist or obstruct an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer if they are "on duty".

15. Section 31(2A) states that the phrases "emergency worker on duty," "youth justice custodial worker on duty" and "custodial officer on duty" have the same meaning as in section 10AA of the Sentencing Act 1991. Subsections (9) and (10) of that provision state:

(9) For the purposes of this section an emergency worker is on duty if-

(a) in the case of a police officer or protective services officer within the meaning of the Victoria Police Act 2013, the officer is performing any duty or exercising any power as such an officer; or

(b) in the case of an operational staff member within the meaning of the Ambulance Services Act 1986, the staff member is providing, or attempting to provide, care or treatment to a patient; or

(c) in the case of a person employed or engaged to provide, or support the provision of, emergency treatment to patients in a hospital, the person is providing, or supporting the provision of, or attempting to provide or support the provision of, such treatment; or

(d) in any other case, the person is performing any duty or exercising any power in response to an emergency within the meaning of the Emergency Management Act 2013.

(10) For the purposes of this section a custodial officer is on duty if-

(a) in the case of a Governor, prison officer or escort officer within the meaning of the Corrections Act 1986, the Governor or officer is exercising a function or power as a Governor, prison officer or escort officer (as the case may be); or

(b) in the case of a police custody officer within the meaning of the Victoria Police Act 2013, the officer is exercising a function or power as a police custody officer; or

(c) in the case of a person authorised under section 9A(1) of the Corrections Act 1986 to exercise a function or power of a Governor, a prison officer or an escort officer under that Act, the person is exercising a function or power specified in the instrument of authorisation; or

(d) in the case of a person authorised under section 9A(1A) or (1B) of the Corrections Act 1986, the person is exercising a function or power specified in the instrument of authorisation.

(11) For the purpose of this section, a youth justice custodial worker is on duty at any time when he or she is performing a function or exercising a power as a youth justice custodial worker.

16. Prior to amendments introduced on 2 November 2014 in the Sentencing Amendment (Emergency Workers) Act 2014, the equivalent offence applied to a police officer or protective services officer "in the due execution of duty".

17. Given the definitions of the phrases "emergency worker on duty," "youth justice custodial worker on duty" and "custodial officer on duty" in Sentencing Act 1991 s 10AA(9)–(11), it is likely that principles developed in relation to "execution of duty" continue to apply, and may have been broadened on reflect the wider meaning of the phrase "on duty". In relation to emergency workers, youth justice custodial workers and custodial officers other than police or protective services officers, the court should seek submissions on the operation of section 10AA(9) in the circumstances of the case.

18. Authorities on the phrase "execution of duty" stated that it should be given a broad operation, to protect the performance of all police duties (R v K (DPP's Reference 1993 (ACT)) (1993) 71 A Crim R 115).

19. According to the Federal Court (in relation to the Federal Police Act 1979 (Cth)), a member of the police force is acting in due execution of their duty:

> from the moment [the member of the police force] embarks upon a lawful task connected with his [or her] functions as a police officer, and continues to act in the execution of that duty for as long as he [or she] is engaged in pursuing the task and until it is completed, providing that he [or she] does not in the course of the task do anything outside the ambit of his [or her] duty so as to cease to be acting therein (R v K (DPP's Reference 1993 (ACT)) (1993) 71 A Crim R 115).

20. The accused did not need to have known that the person was acting in due execution of duty (cf. knowing they were a member of the police force or person acting in aid of a member of the police force) (R v De Simone [2008] VSCA 216).

21. Where a member of the police force conducts a search of a person for drugs because they are merely "curious" to see whether or not the accused has any drugs, such a search is illegal and the police officer cannot be said to be acting in the execution of their duty (Nguyen v Elliott 6/2/1995 SC Vic).

22. Members of the police force who trespass or use excessive force, or who unlawfully detain a person, are acting in excess of their authority and so are not acting in the execution of their duty (Davis v Lisle [1936] 2 KB 434; R v Galvin (No 1) [1961] VR 733; Collins v Wilcock [1984] 1 WLR 1172).

23. However, members of the police force have an implied licence to enter the path or driveway to a house in the absence of any obstruction or notice indicating that such licence has been revoked (Halliday v Neville (1984) 155 CLR 1).

24. A licence to enter a property may be revoked. If it is, and the member of the police force stays, they will be acting unlawfully and not in the execution of their duty. However, they need to be given time to leave the premises (Robson v Hallett [1967] 2 QB 939).

25. Members of the police force are permitted to tap a person on the shoulder or put a hand on a person's sleeve to get their attention (Donnelly v Jackman [1970] 1 WLR 562; Collins v Wilcock [1984] 1 WLR 1172).

26. Given that the definition of when a police officer or protective services officer is "on duty" requires that the person is "performing any duty or exercising any power as such an officer", it is likely that the principles described above will continue to apply so that a police or protective services officer is not "on duty" when acting beyond his or her authority.

Obstructing an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer

27. For an accused to have obstructed an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer on duty, the accused must have:

    - Acted in a way that prevented the emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer from carrying out their duty, or made it more difficult for them to do so; and
    - Known and intended that their conduct would prevent the emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer from carrying out their duty, or make it more difficult to do so (Lewis v Cox [1985] 1 QB 509; Goddard v Collins [1984] VR 919).

28. It does not matter whether the accused person's actions were "aimed at" or "hostile" towards the emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer. If the accused prevented the emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer from carrying out their duty, or made it more difficult for them to do so, and the accused intended that the conduct should have that effect then it will be obstruction. The motive of the accused is only relevant to any lawful excuse that might be available (Lewis v Cox [1985] 1 QB 509).

29. While obstructing an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer may involve assaulting them, or threatening to assault them, it need not (Lewis v Cox [1985] 1 QB 509; Goddard v Collins [1984] VR 919).

30. Actions which have been held to be obstruction include:

    - Disobeying a member of the police force without lawful justification (Duncan v Jones [1936] 1 KB 218);
    - Giving false information to the police (Rice v Connolly [1966] 2 QB 414);
    - Opening the door of a police vehicle so that the police cannot drive away (Lewis v Cox [1985] 1 QB 509);
    - Preventing a member of the police force from entering a premises in pursuit of a suspect (Swales v Cox [1981] 1 QB 849);
    - Warning an offender that they are about to be arrested (Terbutt v Holmes (1935) 52 WN (NSW) 223).

31. The law in relation to obstruction draws a distinction between actions and omissions. In general, the offence only applies to actions that obstruct the emergency worker. However, this distinction must be applied in a common sense manner, as deliberately remaining at a place, contrary to a lawful direction by an emergency worker, can amount to obstructing (compare O'Hair v Killian (1971) 1 SASR 1; Towse v Bradley (1985) 60 ACTR 1).

Knowledge or recklessness

32. The mens rea for this offence is that the accused knew or was reckless as to whether the person was, or was assisting, an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer (Crimes Act 1958 ss 31(1)(b), (ba)).

33. Consistent with other offences in the Crimes Act 1958, recklessness means acting while aware that it is probable that the person was an emergency worker youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer (see 7.1.3 Recklessness).

34. In accordance with general principles of criminal responsibility, it is likely open to the defence to argue for exculpation on the basis of an honest and reasonable belief that the person was not, or was not assisting, an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer "on duty" (see CTM v R (2007) 236 CLR 440).

35. However, under earlier similar legislation, courts held that a mistaken belief that a police officer (or a person assisting them) did not have the powers they were exercising (e.g. a mistaken belief that a warrant did not give the right to immediate detention) did not provide a defence, as that was a mistake of law and not a mistake of fact (Towse v Bradley (1985) 60 ACTR 1).

36. Where relevant, the court will therefore need to determine whether an asserted belief that the person was not "an emergency worker on duty" is a mistake of fact claim or a mistake of law claim.

Assault with intent to resist or prevent arrest – s 31(1)(c)

37. Under s 31(1)(c) it is an offence to assault or threaten to assault another person with intent to resist or prevent the lawful apprehension or detention of a person.

38. A person can only be found guilty under this sub-section if the apprehension or detention was, or would have been, lawful (R v Wilson [1955] 1 All ER 744; R v Galvin (No 1) [1961] VR 733).

39. If an attempted arrest is not lawful, or a police officer is not acting in the execution of their duty, a person is entitled to use reasonable force in self-defence. Such resistance is lawful, and will be a defence to a charge (Kenlin v Gardiner [1967] 2 QB 510; Bales v Parmeter (1935) 35 SR (NSW) 182; Nguyen v Elliott 6/2/1995 SC Vic; Zecevic v DPP (1987) 162 CLR 645).

40. The accused can submit that he/she/they acted in self-defence due to an honest but mistaken belief that the arrest was unlawful (R v Thomas (1992) 65 A Crim R 269; R v Mark [1961] Crim LR 173; Kenlin v Gardiner [1967] 2 QB 510; Blackburn v Bowering [1994] 1 WLR 1324. But cf. R v Fennel [1971] 1 QB 428; De Moor v Davies [1999] VSC 416. For more information, see 8.1 Statutory Self-Defence (From 1/11/14)).

Last updated: 5 June 2018

7.4.9.1 Charge: Assault with Intent to Commit an Indictable Offence (s 31(1)(a))

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of assault. Under the law, there are a number of different types of assault that a person can be charged with. In this case, the accused has been charged with assault with intent to commit an indictable offence. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused [applied force to the body[847] of the complainant/threatened to apply force to the body of the complainant].

Two – the accused [applied force/threatened to apply force], to the complainant's body with an intention to [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injure the complainant, inflict pain, cause discomfort, cause damage, cause insult or deprive the complainant of liberty].[848]

Three – the accused's actions resulted in the complainant being [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, caused damage, insulted or deprived of liberty].

Four – the accused's actions were done with an intention to commit an indictable offence.

Five – the accused's actions were without lawful excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in detail.

Application of force

The first element relates to what the accused did. The accused must have [applied force to the body of the complainant/threatened to apply force to the body of the complainant].

It does not matter [how the force was applied/what type of force was threatened]. It could involve any type of physical contact, [if relevant, add: such as kicking or punching, pushing or hitting with an object].

[If relevant, add: The application of force could also involve an application of heat, light or electric current to the body of the complainant, or the application of any substance, including liquids or gases.]

It also does not matter how much force was [applied/threatened]. Even a slight touch is enough for this element to be satisfied.

In this case, the prosecution argued that NOA [applied force/threatened to apply force] to NOC when [insert evidence]. The defence responded [insert evidence].

---

[847] Section 31(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that the application of force can also be to clothes or equipment worn by the complainant. In cases involving such an application of force, the wording of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[848] It is also possible for this element to be satisfied by recklessness. In relevant cases the charge will need to be amended accordingly (see 7.1.3 Recklessness for assistance).

Intention or recklessness

The second element relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that the accused [applied force/threatened to apply force] to the complainant's body with an intention to [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injure the complainant, inflict pain, cause discomfort, cause damage, cause insult or deprive the complainant of liberty]. That is, when NOA [touched/threatened to touch] NOC, [he/she] intended or meant to cause one of these consequences.

Result of the accused's acts

The third element relates to the results of the accused's actions. The prosecution must prove that the accused's actions [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injured the complainant, inflicted pain, caused discomfort, caused damage, caused insult or deprived the complainant of liberty].

It is not necessary that the accused intended to cause the particular outcome that resulted from their actions. This element may still be met even if the result of their actions differs from what was intended. What is necessary is that the complainant was [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, damaged, insulted or deprived of liberty].

Intention to commit an indictable offence

The fourth element once again relates to the accused's state of mind. The accused must have acted with an intention to commit an indictable offence.

An "indictable offence" is a particular kind of serious crime. The law sets out clearly what is and is not an indictable offence. In this case the prosecution say that NOA intended to [insert relevant indictable offence]. This is an indictable offence. The elements of this offence are [insert elements of relevant offence].

So for this fourth element to be met, you must be satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that when NOA [applied force/threatened to apply force] to NOC, [he/she] intended to commit the offence of [insert relevant indictable offence].

Lawful excuse

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused's actions were without lawful excuse.

[If any lawful excuses, such as self-defence, are open on the evidence, add: In this case, the defence argued that [insert evidence of lawful excuse]. The prosecution argued [insert any counter arguments].]

[If no lawful excuses are open on the evidence, add: In this case, it has not been suggested that there was a lawful excuse for the accused's alleged actions. The main issue[s] for you to determine are [refer to facts in issue].]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of assault the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA [applied force/threatened to apply force] to NOC's body; and

Two – that NOA [applied/threatened to apply] that force with the intention to [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injure NOC, inflict pain, cause discomfort, cause damage, cause insult or deprive NOC of liberty]; and

Three – that NOA's actions resulted in NOC being [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, damaged, insulted or deprived of liberty]; and

Four – that NOA acted with an intention to commit an indictable offence, in this case [insert relevant offence]; and

Five – that NOA acted without lawful excuse.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of assault.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

7.4.9.2 Checklist: Assault with Intent to Commit an Indictable Offence

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist is based on an intentional assault involving the application of force. If the assault in issue involved a threat to apply force, or the reckless application of force, it will need to be amended as necessary.

Five elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused applied force to the body of the complainant; and
2. The accused intended to [insert one or more of the following: injure the complainant, inflict pain, cause discomfort, cause damage, cause insult or deprive the complainant of liberty]; and
3. The accused's actions resulted in the complainant being [insert one or more of the following: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, damaged, insulted or deprived of liberty]; and
4. The accused acted with an intention to commit the indictable offence of [insert offence]; and
5. The accused acted without lawful excuse.

Application of Force

1. Did the accused apply force to the body of the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Intention

2. Did the accused intend to [insert one or more of the following: injure the complainant, inflict pain, cause discomfort, cause damage, cause insult or deprive the complainant of liberty]?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Result of Accused's Actions

3. Did the actions of the accused result in the complainant being [insert one or more of the following: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, damaged, insulted or deprived of liberty]?

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Indictable Offence

4. Did the accused act with an intention to commit the indictable offence of [insert offence]?

If Yes, go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Lawful Excuse

5. Did the accused act without lawful excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of assault (as long as you have answered yes to Questions 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Last updated: 2 May 2006

7.4.9.3 Charge: Assaulting an Emergency Worker, Youth Justice Custodial Worker or Custodial Officer on Duty (Police Officer) (s 31(1)(b))

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge is designed for cases where the complainant is a police officer. The charge must be adapted where the complainant is a different type of emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer. See 7.4.9 Statutory Assault for guidance on the types of workers covered by the offence.

This charge must also be adapted if the complainant is a person who was lawfully assisting an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer.

I must now direct you about the crime of assault. Under the law, there are a number of different types of assault that a person can be charged with. In this case, the accused has been charged with assaulting a police officer in the due execution of duty. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 7 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the complainant was a police officer.

Two – the complainant was "on duty".

Three – the accused knew that the complainant was a police officer, or knew that the complainant was probably a police officer.

Four – the accused applied force to the body[849] of the complainant.[850]

[849] Section 31(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that the application of force can also be to clothes or equipment worn by the complainant. In cases involving such an application of force, the wording of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[850] It is also possible for this element to be satisfied if the accused threatened to apply force to the body of the complainant. In relevant cases, the charge will need to be amended accordingly.

Five – the accused applied force to the complainant's body with an intention to [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injure the complainant, inflict pain, cause discomfort, cause damage, cause insult or deprive the complainant of liberty][851]

Six – the accused's actions resulted in the complainant being [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, caused damage, insulted or deprived of liberty].

Seven – the application of force was without lawful excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in detail.

Police officer[852]

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant was a police officer. In this case [insert relevant evidence].

On duty[853]

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant was on duty at the time the force was applied. This means that they must have been acting lawfully, performing the duties or exercising the powers of a police officer.

[If there is an issue regarding whether the police officer was acting outside the scope of his or her duties, add suitable directions on the scope of duties. See 7.4.9 Statutory Assault for guidance.]

In this case, the prosecution argued that [insert evidence]. The defence responded [insert evidence]. It is for you to determine whether NOC was actually performing [his/her] duties when NOA [insert evidence].

Knowledge or recklessness that complainant was police officer[854]

The third element relates to what the accused knew. The prosecution must prove that at the time the accused applied force to the complainant's body, he/she/they knew that the complainant was a police officer, or knew that the complainant was probably a police officer.

In this case, the prosecution argued that [insert evidence]. The defence responded [insert evidence].

Application of force

The fourth element relates to what the accused did. The accused must have applied force to the body of the complainant.

---

[851] It is also possible for this element to be satisfied by recklessness. In relevant cases the charge will need to be amended accordingly (see 7.1.3 Recklessness for assistance).

[852] This part of the direction must be modified if the complainant is not a police officer, or if the complainant is a person lawfully assisting an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer.

[853] This part of the direction must be modified if the complainant is not a police officer, or if the complainant is a person lawfully assisting an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer.

[854] This part of the direction must be modified if the complainant is not a police officer, or if the complainant is a person lawfully assisting an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer.

It does not matter how the force was applied. It could involve any type of physical contact, [if relevant, add: such as kicking or punching, pushing or hitting with an object].

[If relevant, add: The application of force could also involve an application of heat, light or electric current to the body of the complainant, or the application of any substance, including liquids or gases.]

It also does not matter how much force was applied. Even a slight touch is enough for this element to be satisfied.

In this case, the prosecution argued that NOA applied force to NOC when [insert evidence]. The defence responded [insert evidence].

Intention

The fifth element relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that the accused applied force to the complainant's body with an intention to [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injure the complainant, inflict pain, cause discomfort, cause damage, cause insult or deprive the complainant of liberty]. That is, when NOA touched NOC, [he/she] intended or meant to cause one of these consequences.

Result of the accused's acts

The sixth element relates to the results of the accused's actions. The prosecution must prove that the accused's actions [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injured the complainant, inflicted pain, caused discomfort, caused damage, caused insult or deprived the complainant of liberty].

It is not necessary that the accused intended to cause the particular outcome that resulted from their actions. This element may still be met even if the result of their actions differs from what was intended. What is necessary is that the complainant was [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, damaged, insulted or deprived of liberty].

Lawful excuse

The seventh element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused's actions were without lawful excuse.

[If any lawful excuses, such as self-defence, are open on the evidence, add: In this case, the defence argued that [insert evidence of lawful excuse]. The prosecution argued [insert any counter arguments].]

[If no lawful excuses are open on the evidence, add: In this case, it has not been suggested that there was a lawful excuse for the accused's alleged actions. The main issue[s] for you to determine are [refer to facts in issue].]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of assault the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOC was a police officer; and

Two – that NOC was on duty; and

Three – that NOA knew that NOC was a police officer or knew that NOC was probably a police officer; and

Four – that NOA applied force to NOC's body; and

Five – that NOA applied that force with the intention to [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injure NOC, inflict pain, cause discomfort, cause damage, cause insult or deprive NOC of liberty]; and

Six – that NOA's actions resulted in NOC being [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, damaged, insulted or deprived of liberty]; and Seven – that NOA acted without lawful excuse.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of assault.

Last updated: 5 June 2018

7.4.9.4 Checklist: Assaulting a Member of the Police Force

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist is based on an intentional assault of a police officer involving the application of force. If the assault in issue involved a threat to apply force, the reckless application of force, or an assault on a person acting in aid of a police officer, it will need to be amended as necessary.

Seven elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused applied force to the body of the complainant; and
2. The accused intended to [insert one or more of the following: injure the complainant, inflict pain, cause discomfort, cause damage, cause insult or deprive the complainant of liberty]; and
3. The accused's actions resulted in the complainant being [insert one or more of the following: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, damaged, insulted or deprived of liberty]; and
4. The complainant was a member of the police force; and
5. The complainant was acting in the due execution of duty; and
6. The accused knew that the complainant was a member of the police force; and
7. The actions of the accused were without lawful excuse.

Application of Force

1. Did the accused apply force to the body of the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Intention

2. Did the accused intend to [insert one or more of the following: injure the complainant, inflict pain, cause discomfort, cause damage, cause insult or deprive the complainant of liberty]?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Result of the Accused's Actions

3. Did the actions of the accused result in the complainant being [insert one or more of the following: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, damaged, insulted or deprived of liberty].

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Member of the Police Force

4. Was the complainant a member of the police force?

If Yes, go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Due execution of Duty

5. Was the complainant acting in the due execution of duty?

If Yes, then go to 6

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Knowledge of the Accused

6. Did the accused know that the complainant was a member of the police force?

If Yes, then go to 7

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Without Lawful Excuse

7. Was the accused acting without lawful excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of assault (as long as you have answered yes to 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Last updated: 2 May 2006

7.4.9.5 Charge: Resisting/Obstructing an Emergency Worker, Youth Justice Custodial Worker or Custodial Officer on Duty (Police Officer) (s 31(1)(b))

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge is designed for cases where the complainant is a police officer. The charge must be adapted where the complainant is a different type of emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer. See 7.4.9 Statutory Assault for guidance on the types of workers covered by the offence.

This charge must also be adapted if the complainant is a person who was lawfully assisting an emergency worker, youth justice custodial worker or custodial officer.

I must now direct you about the crime of assault. Under the law, there are a number of different types of assault that a person can be charged with. In this case the accused has been charged with [resisting/obstructing] a police officer in the due execution of duty. Although it may seem strange, according to the law this is a type of assault. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 6 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the complainant was a police officer.[855]

Two – the complainant was "on duty".[856]

Three – the accused knew that the complainant was a police officer, or knew that the complainant was probably a police officer.

Four – the accused [resisted/obstructed] the complainant.

Five – the accused intended to [resist/obstruct] the complainant.

Six – the accused's actions were without lawful excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in detail.

Police officer

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant was a police officer. In this case [insert relevant evidence].

On Duty

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the complainant was on duty at the time the accused [resisted/obstructed] them. This means that they must have been acting lawfully, performing the duties or exercising the powers of a police officer.

[If there is an issue regarding whether the police officer was acting outside the scope of his or her duties, add suitable directions on the scope of duties. See 7.4.9 Statutory Assault for guidance.]

In this case, the prosecution argued that [insert evidence]. The defence responded [insert evidence]. It is for you to determine whether NOC was actually performing [his/her] duties when NOA [insert evidence].

Knowledge

The third element relates to what the accused knew. The prosecution must prove that at the time NOA [resisted/obstructed] NOC, [he/she/they] knew that NOC was a police officer, or knew that the complainant was probably a police officer.

In this case, the prosecution argued that [insert evidence]. The defence responded [insert evidence].

Resist/Obstruct

The fourth element relates to what the accused did. The accused must have [resisted/obstructed] the complainant.

[In resistance cases add the following: "Resists" is an ordinary English word. It is up to you to determine

---

[855] This element will also be satisfied if the accused resists or obstructs a person acting in aid of a police officer. In relevant cases, this element will need to be modified accordingly.

[856] Where the complainant is a person acting in aid of a police officer, this element will need to be amended to reflect that it is the police officer who must have been on duty.

whether NOA's acts amounted to "resistance", in light of all of the circumstances in the case.]

[In obstruction cases add the following: To find that NOA obstructed NOC in the course of [his/her] duty, you must find that [he/she] acted in a way that prevented NOC from carrying out [his/her] functions as a police officer, or made it more difficult for [him/her] to do so.]

In this case, the prosecution argued that NOA [resisted/obstructed] NOC when [he/she] [insert evidence]. The defence responded [insert evidence].

Intention

The fifth element relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that the accused intentionally [obstructed/resisted] the complainant.

[In resistance cases, add: That is, NOA deliberately meant to resist NOC.]

[In obstruction cases, add: That is, NOA must have known and intended that [his/her] actions would prevent NOC from carrying out [his/her] duties or make it more difficult for [him/her] to do so.]

Lawful excuse

The sixth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused's actions were without lawful excuse.

[If any lawful excuses, such as self-defence, are open on the evidence, add: In this case, the defence argued that [insert evidence of lawful excuse]. The prosecution argued [insert any counter arguments].]

[If no lawful excuses are open on the evidence, add: In this case, it has not been suggested that there was a lawful excuse for the accused's alleged actions. The main issue[s] for you to determine are [refer to facts in issue].]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of assault the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOC was a police officer; and

Two – that NOC was "on duty"; and

Three – that NOA knew that NOC was a police officer or knew that NOC was probably a police officer; and

Four – that NOA [resisted/obstructed] NOC; and

Five – that NOA intended to [obstruct/resist] NOC; and Six – that NOA acted without lawful excuse.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of assault.

Last updated: 5 June 2018

7.4.9.6 Checklist: Resisting a Member of the Police Force

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist is based on resisting a member of the police force. If the complainant was a person acting in aid of a member of the police force it will need to be modified as necessary.

Six elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The complainant was a member of the police force at the time of the alleged crime; and
2. The complainant was acting in the due execution of their duty; and
3. The accused resisted the complainant in the execution of their duty; and
4. The accused knew that the complainant was a member of the police force; and
5. The accused intended to resist the complainant in the execution of their duty; and
6. The actions of the accused were without lawful excuse.

Member of the Police Force

1. Was the complainant a member of the police force at the time of the alleged crime?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Due Execution of Duty

2. Was the complainant acting in the due execution of their duty at the time of the alleged crime?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Resistance

3. Did the accused resist the complainant in the execution of their duty?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Knowledge of the Accused

4. Did the accused know that the complainant was a member of the police force?

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Intention

5. Did the accused intend to resist the complainant in the due exercise of their duty?

If Yes, then go to 6

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Without Lawful Excuse

6. Was the accused acting without lawful excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of assault (as long as you have answered yes to 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Last updated: 2 May 2006

7.4.9.7 Checklist: Obstructing a Member of the Police Force

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist is based on obstructing a member of the police force. If the complainant was a person acting in aid of a member of the police force it will need to be modified as necessary.

Six elements that prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The complainant was a member of the police force at the time of the alleged crime; and
2. The complainant was acting in the due execution of their duty; and
3. The accused obstructed the complainant in the execution of their duty; and
4. The accused knew that the complainant was a member of the police force; and
5. The accused intended to obstruct the complainant in the execution of their duty; and
6. The actions of the accused were without lawful excuse.

Member of the Police Force

1. Was the complainant a member of the police force at the time of the alleged crime?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Due Execution of Duty

2. Was the complainant acting in the due execution of their duty at the time of the alleged crime?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Obstruction

3. Did the accused obstruct the complainant in the execution of their duty?

Consider – did the accused's actions prevent the complainant from carrying out their functions as a member of the police force or make it more difficult for them to carry out those functions?

If Yes, then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Knowledge of the Accused

4. Did the accused know that the complainant was a member of the police force?

If Yes, then go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Intention

5. Did the accused intend to obstruct the complainant in the due exercise of their duty?

If Yes, then go to 6

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Without Lawful Excuse

6. Was the accused acting without lawful excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of assault (as long as you have answered yes to 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Last updated: 2 May 2006

7.4.9.8 Charge: Resisting Arrest (s 31(1)(c))

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of assault. Under the law, there are a number of different types of assault that a person can be charged with. In this case the accused has been charged with assaulting a person with the intention of resisting or preventing their arrest.[857] To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 5 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused applied force to the body[858] of the complainant.[859]

Two – the accused applied force to the complainant's body with an intention to [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injure the complainant, inflict pain, cause discomfort, cause damage, cause insult or deprive the complainant of liberty].[860]

Three – the accused's actions resulted in the complainant being [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, caused damage, insulted or deprived of liberty].

---

[857] Section 31(1)(c) can apply to resisting or preventing any lawful apprehension or detention of a person, not just the arrest of the accused. In relevant cases, this charge will need to be amended accordingly.

[858] Section 31(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 provides that the application of force can also be to clothes or equipment worn by the complainant. In cases involving such an application of force, the wording of the charge will need to be modified accordingly.

[859] It is also possible for this element to be satisfied if the accused threatened to apply force to the body of the complainant. In relevant cases, the charge will need to be amended accordingly.

[860] It is also possible for this element to be satisfied by recklessness. In relevant cases the charge will need to be amended accordingly (see 7.1.3 Recklessness for assistance).

Four – the accused's actions were done with an intention to resist their lawful arrest.

Five – the accused's actions were without lawful excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in detail.

Application of force

The first element relates to what the accused did. The accused must have applied force to the body of the complainant.

It does not matter how the force was applied. It could involve any type of physical contact, [if relevant, add: such as kicking or punching, pushing or hitting with an object].

[If relevant, add: The application of force could also involve an application of heat, light or electric current to the body of the complainant, or the application of any substance, including liquids or gases.]

It also does not matter how much force was applied. Even a slight touch is enough for this element to be satisfied.

In this case, the prosecution argued that NOA applied force to NOC when [insert evidence]. The defence responded [insert evidence].

Intention or recklessness

The second element relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that the accused applied force to the complainant's body with an intention to [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injure the complainant, inflict pain, cause discomfort, cause damage, cause insult or deprive the complainant of liberty]. That is, when NOA touched NOC, [he/she] intended or meant to cause one of these consequences.

Result of the accused's acts

The third element relates to the results of the accused's actions. The prosecution must prove that the accused's actions [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injured the complainant, inflicted pain, caused discomfort, caused damage, caused insult or deprived the complainant of liberty].

It is not necessary that the accused intended to cause the particular outcome that resulted from their actions. This element may still be met even if the result of their actions differs from what was intended. What is necessary is that the complainant was [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, damaged, insulted or deprived of liberty].

Intention to resist lawful arrest or detention

The fourth element also relates to the accused's state of mind. The prosecution must prove that the accused acted with an intention to resist their lawful arrest. "Resists" is an ordinary English word. It is up to you to determine whether NOA's acts amounted to "resistance", in light of all of the circumstances in the case.

In this case, the prosecution argued that NOA resisted NOC when [he/she] [insert evidence]. The defence responded [insert evidence].

Lawful excuse

The fifth element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused's actions were without lawful excuse.

[If any lawful excuses, such as self-defence, are open on the evidence, add: In this case, the defence argued that

[insert evidence of lawful excuse]. The prosecution argued [insert any counter arguments].]

[If no lawful excuses are open on the evidence, add: In this case, it has not been suggested that there was a lawful excuse for the accused's alleged actions. The main issue[s] for you to determine are [refer to facts in issue].]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of assault the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – that NOA applied force to NOC's body; and

Two – that NOA applied that force with the intention to [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injure NOC, inflict pain, cause discomfort, cause damage, cause insult or deprive NOC of liberty]; and

Three – that NOA's actions resulted in NOC being [insert one or more of the following as relevant: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, damaged, insulted or deprived of liberty]; and

Four – that NOA acted with an intention to resist [his/her] lawful arrest; and

Five – that NOA acted without lawful excuse.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of assault.

Last updated: 3 December 2012

7.4.9.9 Checklist: Resisting Arrest

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist is based on an intentional assault involving the application of force, in order to resist arrest. If the assault in issue involved a threat to apply force, the reckless application of force, or another type of apprehension or detention, it will need to be amended as necessary.

Five elements that prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused applied force to the body of the complainant; and
2. The accused intended to [insert one or more of the following: injure the complainant, inflict pain, cause discomfort, cause damage, cause insult or deprive the complainant of liberty]; and
3. The accused's actions resulted in the complainant being [insert one or more of the following: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, damaged, insulted or deprived of liberty]; and
4. The accused acted with an intention to resist lawful arrest; and
5. The accused acted without lawful excuse.

Application of Force

1. Did the accused apply force to the body of the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Intention

2. Did the accused intend to [insert one or more of the following: injure the complainant, inflict pain, cause discomfort, cause damage, cause insult or deprive the complainant of liberty]?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Result of Accused's Actions

3. Did the actions of the accused result in the complainant being [insert one or more of the following: injured, caused pain, caused discomfort, damaged, insulted or deprived of liberty].

If Yes then go to 4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Resisting Lawful Arrest

4. Did the accused act with an intention to resist lawful arrest?

If Yes, go to 5

If No, then the accused is not guilty of assault

Lawful Excuse

5. Did the accused act without lawful excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of assault (as long as you have answered yes to 1, 2, 3 and 4)

If No, then the accused is not guilty

Last updated: 2 May 2006

7.4.10 Threats to Kill

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Making a threat to kill is an offence under the Crimes Act 1958 s 20.
2. The offence has the following three elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:
   (a) The accused made a threat to the complainant to kill either the complainant or another person;
   (b) The accused either:
      i) intended the complainant to fear that the threat would be carried out; or
      ii) was reckless as to whether or not the complainant would fear that the threat would be carried out; and
   (c) The threat was made without lawful excuse.

Threats to Kill

3. The first element is that:

   i) The accused must have declared his or her intention to kill either the complainant or another person;

   ii) That declaration must have been made to the complainant.

Nature of the Threat

4. The Act recognises that a person may make a threat to A, even if the threat is to kill B (Crimes Act 1958 s 20).

5. In most cases, this will raise the question of whether A received the threat. However, in some cases, it may not be necessary to show the threat was received and that it is, instead, sufficient that the threat was made with the intention that it be communicated to A and in circumstances apt to achieve that end (see, e.g. Austin v The Queen (1989) 166 CLR 669; Treacy v DPP [1971] AC 537; R v Lam & Ors (Ruling No 20) (2005) 159 A Crim R 448; Linney v The Queen [2013] NSWCCA 251, [57]).

6. It is not necessary that the complainant have any particular relationship with the person threatened. This element will be satisfied even if the accused threatens to kill someone that the complainant does not know (R v Solanke [1970] 1 WLR 1; R v Syme (1911) 6 Cr App R 257).

7. The threat must be to kill. Threats to cause serious injury or any lesser harm are not sufficient (R v Leece (1995) 125 ACTR 1).

8. It is not necessary that the accused threaten to personally kill the complainant or other person. The threat may be to have someone else carry out the killing (Barbaro v Quilty [1999] ACTSC 119).

9. A threat can be conditional on the occurrence of a future event. It is not necessary that the accused have the immediate capacity or intention to carry out the threat (R v Leece (1995) 125 ACTR 1; Barbaro v Quilty [1999] ACTSC 119).

How Can a Threat be Made?

10. A threat can be made by words or conduct or both (R v Rich Vic CA 17/12/1997).

11. A threat can be made in writing and delivered or left with another person. The threat does not have to be received at the same time that it is made (R v Jones (1851) 5 Cox CC 226).

12. It is not necessary for the prosecution or the judge to identify the precise words or conduct that constituted the threat. Where the accused acted in a continuously threatening and abusive manner, the jury may consider whether his or her conduct as a whole amounted to a threat (R v Rich CA Vic 17/12/1997).

Impact of the Threat

13. It not necessary for the prosecution to prove that the complainant feared that the threat would be carried out, nor is it sufficient for the prosecution to prove that the complainant did feel such fear. (R v Rich Vic CA 17/12/1997; R v Alexander [2007] VSCA 178).

14. In making its determination, the jury must consider the relationship between the accused and the complainant. Violent or colourful language that may appear threatening at first sight, may in fact not be a "threat" when the relationship is taken into account. For example, it may be clear, in the context of the parties' relationship, that the accused did not intend to move beyond heated words and gestures (Barbaro v Quilty [1999] ACTSC 119).

The Accused's State of Mind

15. The second element requires the accused to have either:

i) Intended the complainant to fear that the threat would be carried out; or

ii) Been reckless as to whether or not the complainant would fear that the threat would be carried out (Crimes Act 1958 s 20).

Intention

16. It is not necessary for the accused to have intended to carry out the threat. The only issue is whether the accused intended the complainant to believe that the threat would be carried out (R v Alexander [2007] VSCA 178; Barbaro v Quilty [1999] ACTSC 119).

17. The motive for making the threat is irrelevant (R v Solanke [1970] 1 WLR 1).

18. To establish the requisite intention, all of the circumstances of the statement or conduct must be considered (R v Leece (1995) 125 ACTR 1; R v Alexander [2007] VSCA 178).

Recklessness

19. To have been reckless as to whether or not the victim would fear that the threat would be carried out, the accused must have been aware, when s/he made the threat, that it was probable that the complainant would fear that it would be carried out (see DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2021] HCA 26; DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2020] VSCA 181; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585).

20. The accused must have been aware that it was "probable" or "likely" that the complainant would fear that the threat would be carried out. It is not sufficient for him/her to have been aware that this fear was merely "possible" or "might" result (R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641; Ignatova v R [2010] VSCA 263; Paton v R [2011] VSCA 72; DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2020] VSCA 181; DPP Reference No 1 of 2019 [2021] HCA 26).

21. The accused him/herself must have been aware that the complainant would probably fear that the threat would be carried out. It is not sufficient that a reasonable person in the accused's circumstances would have realised that the complainant would probably fear the threat (R v Sofa Vic CA 15/10/1990; c.f. R v Nuri [1990] VR 641).

22. When explaining this element, judges may tell the jury that the accused must have been aware that the victim would probably fear the threat would be carried out, but decided to go ahead anyway. The words "but decided to go ahead anyway" do not make proof that the accused was indifferent to the consequences of his or her conduct an element of the offence. Instead, the purpose of the words is to distinguish recklessness from intention. Judges may modify or omit the words "but decided to go ahead anyway" if the words could mislead or confuse the jury (see Ignatova v R [2010] VSCA 263; R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464; R v Sofa Vic CA 15/10/1990; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585; R v Wilson [2005] VSCA 78).

23. It is not appropriate to invite the jury to apply their normal understanding of the meaning of "recklessness". Conventional understanding of the term may include conduct that is negligent (Banditt v The Queen (2005) 224 CLR 262).

Threat Made Without Lawful Excuse

24. The threat to kill must have been made without any lawful justification or excuse (Crimes Act 1958 s 20).

25. Self-defence and prevention of crime are common forms of justification in this area (R v Cousins [1982] 1 QB 526). See 8.1 Statutory Self–Defence (From 1/11/14).

26. A person may justifiably make a threat to kill in circumstances where it would not be reasonable to carry out that threat. A threat is a lesser form of harm than the execution of the threat (R v Cousins [1982] 1 QB 526).

Last updated: 28 October 2022

7.4.10.1 Charge: Threat to Kill

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

I must now direct you about the crime of threatening to kill another person. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused made a threat to kill.

Two – the accused either intended the complainant to fear that the threat would be carried out, or knew that the complainant would probably fear that it would be carried out.

Three – the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Making the Threat

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused made a threat to kill.

A threat to kill is made by declaring to another person the intention to kill someone. In this case the prosecution must prove that NOA declared to NOC his/her intention to kill [NOC/NO3P[861]].

[Add any of the directions from the following list that is relevant to the case.]

- This element can be satisfied by a spoken statement, by a written declaration, by conduct, or by a combination of these forms of communication.
- This element will not be satisfied if you consider that the accused's declaration was only a threat to injure [NOC/NO3P].
- The accused does not need to have threatened to immediately kill [NOC/NO3P]. This element will be satisfied as long as the accused threatened to kill [NOC/NO3P], even if that threat was not to be carried out for some time.
- The threat to kill does not need to have been unconditional. This element will be satisfied even if the accused made his/her threat dependent on something else happening first.
- The accused does not need to have threatened to personally kill [NOC/NO3P]. This element will be satisfied if the accused threatened to have another person kill [NOC/NO3P].

In determining whether the accused has made a threat to kill, you must take into account all of the circumstances of the alleged threat [if relevant add: including the relationship between NOA and NOC].

It is important to note that you do not need to determine whether or not NOC himself/herself thought that NOA would carry out the threat. The test is whether a reasonable person would have feared that the threat would be carried out.

Similarly, you do not need to determine whether NOA intended to carry out the threat.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA made a threat to kill by [describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments]. It is only if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused made a threat to kill in the sense that I have described that this first element will be satisfied.

---

[861] Name of the third party who was allegedly threatened by the accused.

Accused's Mental State

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused either:

- Intended the complainant to fear that the threat would be carried out; or
- Knew, when s/he made the threat, that the complainant would probably fear that it would be carried out.

The two mental states I just mentioned are alternatives. This element will be satisfied as long as the prosecution can prove one of them beyond reasonable doubt. I will now examine each in turn.

Intention

This element will be satisfied if the prosecution can prove that the accused intended NOC to fear that his/her threat to kill [him/her/NO3P] would be carried out.

In this case the prosecution submitted that this was the case. [Insert relevant evidence and/or arguments.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to decide whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused had this intention. If s/he did, then this second element will be met.

Knowledge that the Complainant Would Probably Feel Fear

A second way this element can be satisfied is by proving that NOA made the threat to kill knowing that it was probable that NOC would fear that it would be carried out. That is, NOA knew that NOC was likely to believe that s/he was going to kill [him/her/NO3P].

It is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that NOC would feel such fear. S/he must have known that that consequence was probable.

In determining this part of the test, you must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew of the probability of NOC's fear. It is not enough that you, or a reasonable person, would have recognised that likelihood in the circumstances.

In this case, the following evidence is relevant to your assessment of NOA's state of mind: [Identify relevant evidence and the inferences to be drawn from that evidence].

Inferring states of mind

[If proof of the accused's mental state depends on the drawing of inferences, add the following shaded section.]

As I have stated, the prosecution contends that you should infer from the evidence that NOA had the appropriate state of mind at the relevant time.

A person's intention at the time s/he commits an offence may be inferred from what s/he said and did, and also from what s/he failed to say and do. You should look at all of NOA's proven actions before, at the time of, and after the alleged offence. All of these things may help you to determine what NOA's intention was when s/he made the alleged threat to kill.

In particular, the prosecution has asked you to consider [describe evidence]. The defence has asked you to consider [describe evidence].

You will remember what I told you about inferences earlier.[862] In this context, those directions mean that you may only infer that NOA intended NOC to fear that the threat would be carried out, or that s/he knew that such a consequence was probable, if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that that is the only inference open from the facts you have found. If any evidence causes you to have reservations about drawing such an inference, the benefit of your doubts should go to the accused.

[If the jury might infer recklessness by using an objective test, add the following shaded section.]

In determining whether NOA knew that NOC would probably fear that s/he would carry out his/her threat, you [can/have been asked to] draw an inference from the probability that [you/the reasonable person] would have foreseen such a consequence in the accused's situation.

I must warn you that, although this is a legitimate step in reasoning towards a conclusion about NOA's state of mind, you must not treat this factor as decisive of the issue. It is not enough that you, or any other person, would have had such an awareness in the circumstances. You must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew that it was likely that NOC would fear that s/he would carry out his/her threat.

The Accused Need Not Have Intended to Carry Out Threat

As with the first element, this element may be satisfied even if NOA never intended to carry out the threat. All that is required is that NOA intended NOC to fear that the threat would be carried out, or knew that it was probable that NOC would feel such fear.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that [describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence responded that [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Lawful Justification and Excuse

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that there was no lawful justification or excuse for the accused making the threat.

[If no defences are raised, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, there is no suggestion that NOA acted with any lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert directions from the relevant topics here (see Part 8: Victorian Defences).]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of making a threat to kill, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA made a threat to kill; and

Two – That NOA either:

(a) intended NOC to fear that the threat would be carried out; or

(b) knew that NOC would probably fear that it would be carried out; and Three – That NOA had no lawful justification or excuse for making that threat.

---

[862] This charge is based on the assumption that the judge has already instructed the jury about inferences. It will need to be modified if that has not been done.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of making a threat to kill.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

7.4.10.2 Checklist: Threatening to Kill

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused made a threat to kill; and
2. The accused either:
   (a) Intended the complainant to fear that the threat would be carried out; or
   (b) Knew that the complainant would probably fear that the threat would be carried out; and
3. The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

Making a Threat to Kill

1. Did the accused make a threat to kill?

1.1 Did the accused make a threat to the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Threatening to Kill

1.2 Was it a threat to kill [the complainant/another person]?

If Yes, then go to 1.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Threatening to Kill

1.3 Would a reasonable person who was informed about all of the circumstances have feared that the threat would be carried out?

Consider – The complainant does not need to have feared that the threat would be carried out; and

The accused does not need to have intended to carry out the threat.

If Yes, then go to 2.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Threatening to Kill

Accused's State of Mind

2.1 Did the accused intend the complainant to fear that the threat to kill would be carried out?

Consider – The accused does not need to have intended to carry out the threat.

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then go to 2.2

2.2 Was the accused aware that the complainant would probably fear that the threat to kill would be carried out?

Consider – What did the accused think the likely result of his/her actions would be?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Threatening to Kill

Lawful Justification or Excuse

3. Did the accused act without lawful justification or excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Threatening to Kill (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1.1, 1.2, 1.3 and either 2.1 or 2.2)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Threatening to Kill

Last updated: 14 August 2018

7.4.11 Threats to Inflict Serious Injury

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. Making a threat to inflict serious injury is an offence under the Crimes Act 1958 s 21.
2. The offence has the following three elements that the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:
   (a) The accused made a threat to the complainant to inflict serious injury upon either the complainant or another person;
   (b) The accused either:
      i) intended the complainant to fear that the threat would be carried out; or
      ii) was reckless as to whether or not the complainant would fear that the threat would be carried out; and
   (c) The threat was made without lawful excuse.

Threats to Inflict Serious Injury

3. The first element is that:
   i) The accused must have declared his or her intention to inflict serious injury upon either the complainant or another person;
   ii) That declaration must have been made to the complainant.

Nature of the Threat

4. The threat must be to inflict serious injury upon either the complainant or another person.
5. For information on the meaning of the term "serious injury", see 7.4.2 Intentionally Causing Serious Injury.
6. As the threat must be to "inflict" serious injury rather than "cause" serious injury, it is unclear whether a threat to cause serious injury will always be covered by this offence. "Cause" is generally thought to be a wider term, that includes "inflict" (see R v Salisbury [1976] VR 452; R v Mandair [1995] 1 AC 208; R v Ireland & Burstow [1998] AC 147).
7. While the prosecution must prove that the complainant received the threat, s/he need not be the person threatened. The accused may have threatened to inflict serious injury upon another person (Crimes Act 1958 s 21).
8. It is not necessary that the complainant have any particular relationship with the person threatened. This element will be satisfied even if the accused threatens to inflict serious injury upon someone that the complainant does not know (R v Solanke [1970] 1 WLR 1; R v Syme (1911) 6 Cr App R 257).
9. It is not necessary that the accused threaten to personally injure the complainant or other person. The threat may be to have someone else carry out the assault (Barbaro v Quilty [1999] ACTSC 119).
10. A threat can be conditional on the occurrence of a future event. It is not necessary that the accused have the immediate capacity or intention to carry out the threat (R v Leece (1995) 125 ACTR 1; Barbaro v Quilty [1999] ACTSC 119).

How Can a Threat be Made?

11. A threat can be made by words or conduct or both (R v Rich Vic CA 17/12/1997).
12. A threat can be made in writing and delivered or left with another person. The threat does not have to be received at the same time that it is made (R v Jones (1851) 5 Cox CC 226).
13. It is not necessary for the prosecution or the judge to identify the precise words or conduct that constituted the threat. Where the accused acted in a continuously threatening and abusive manner, the jury may consider whether his or her conduct as a whole amounted to a threat (R v Rich Vic CA 17/12/1997).

Impact of the Threat

14. It not necessary for the prosecution to prove that the complainant feared that the threat would be carried out, nor is it sufficient for the prosecution to prove that the complainant did feel such fear. (R v Rich Vic CA 17/12/1997; R v Alexander [2007] VSCA 178).
15. In making its determination, the jury must consider the relationship between the accused and the complainant. Violent or colourful language that may appear threatening at first sight, may in fact not be a "threat" when the relationship is taken into account. For example, it may be clear, in the context of the parties' relationship, that the accused did not intend to move beyond heated words and gestures (Barbaro v Quilty [1999] ACTSC 119).

The Accused's State of Mind

16. The second element requires the accused to have either:

    i) Intended the complainant to fear that the threat would be carried out; or

    ii) Been reckless as to whether or not the complainant would fear that the threat would be carried out (Crimes Act 1958 s 21).

Intention

17. It is not necessary for the accused to have intended to carry out the threat. The only issue is whether the accused intended the complainant to believe that the threat would be carried out (R v Alexander [2007] VSCA 178; Barbaro v Quilty [1999] ACTSC 119).
18. The motive for making the threat is irrelevant (R v Solanke [1970] 1 WLR 1).
19. To establish the requisite intention, all of the circumstances of the statement or conduct must be considered (R v Leece (1995) 125 ACTR 1; R v Alexander [2007] VSCA 178).

Recklessness

20. To have been reckless as to whether or not the victim would fear that the threat would be carried out, the accused must have been aware, when s/he made the threat, that it was probable that the complainant would fear that it would be carried out (R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464; R v Sofa Vic CA 15/10/1990).
21. The accused must have been aware that it was "probable" or "likely" that the complainant would fear that the threat would be carried out. It is not sufficient for him/her to have been aware that this fear was merely "possible" or "might" result (R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641).
22. The accused him/herself must have been aware that the complainant would probably fear that the threat would be carried out. It is not sufficient that a reasonable person in the accused's circumstances would have realised that the complainant would probably fear the threat (R v Sofa Vic CA 15/10/1990; c.f. R v Nuri [1990] VR 641).
23. It is not appropriate to invite the jury to apply their normal understanding of the meaning of "recklessness". Conventional understanding of the term may include conduct that is negligent (Banditt v The Queen (2005) 224 CLR 262).
24. When explaining recklessness to the jury, it is common for judges to require them to also find that the accused was indifferent to the consequences of his or her conduct (see, e.g. R v Sofa Vic CA 15/10/1990; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641; R v Campbell [1997] 2 VR 585; R v Wilson [2005] VSCA 78).
25. While the abovementioned authorities suggest that an indifference to consequences is an independent element of recklessness at common law, there is strong authority for the proposition that an awareness of the probable consequences of conduct is all that is required (R v Crabbe (1985) 156 CLR 464).

Threat Made Without Lawful Excuse

26. The threat to inflict serious injury must have been made without any lawful justification or excuse (Crimes Act 1958 s 21).
27. Self-defence and prevention of crime are common forms of justification in this area (R v Cousins [1982] 1 QB 526).
28. A person acts in self defence when s/he believes, on reasonable grounds, that his/her actions are necessary (Zecevic v DPP (Vic) (1987) 162 CLR 645. See 8.3 Common Law Self-defence).
29. A person may justifiably make a threat to inflict serious injury in circumstances where it would not be reasonable to carry out that threat. A threat is a lesser form of harm than the execution of the threat (R v Cousins [1982] 1 QB 526).

Last updated: 30 November 2015

7.4.11.1 Charge: Threat to Inflict Serious Injury

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge is for conduct occurring on or after 1 July 2013. For conduct before that date, the charge must be adapted.

I must now direct you about the crime of threatening to inflict serious injury upon another person. To prove this crime, the prosecution must prove the following 3 elements beyond reasonable doubt:

One – the accused made a threat to inflict serious injury.

Two – the accused either intended the complainant to fear that the threat would be carried out, or knew that the complainant would probably fear that it would be carried out.

Three – the accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Making the Threat

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused made a threat to inflict serious injury.

A threat to inflict serious injury is made by declaring to another person the intention to seriously injure someone. In this case the prosecution must prove that NOA declared to NOC his/her intention to seriously injure [NOC/NO3P].[863]

The law defines the word injury to mean physical injury or harm to mental health, whether temporary or permanent. A serious injury is an injury which endangers life or is substantial and protracted.[864]

[If there was a risk of multiple injuries, add the following shaded section.]

In making your decision, you do not have to look at each of the threatened injuries individually, and decide whether or not any one of them is a serious injury. An injury may be a "serious injury" because of the cumulative effect of several injuries.

For this element to be met, the prosecution must prove that the accused threatened to inflict not only an injury, but a "serious injury".

[Add any of the directions from the following list that is relevant to the case.]

- This element can be satisfied by a spoken statement, by a written declaration, by conduct, or by a combination of these forms of communication.
- The accused does not need to have threatened to immediately inflict serious injury on [NOC/NO3P]. This element will be satisfied as long as the accused threatened to seriously injure [NOC/NO3P], even if that threat was not to be carried out for some time.
- The threat to inflict serious injury does not need to have been unconditional. This element will be satisfied even if the accused made his/her threat dependent on something else happening first.
- The accused does not need to have threatened to personally inflict serious injury on [NOC/NO3P]. This element will be satisfied if the accused threatened to have another person seriously injure [NOC/NO3P].

In determining whether the accused has made a threat to inflict serious injury, you must take into account all of the circumstances of the alleged threat [if relevant add: including the relationship between NOA and NOC].

---

[863] Name of the third party who was allegedly threatened by the accused.

[864] The judge should consider including an example of a serious injury, such as brain damage, or a stabbing which causes significant blood loss.

It is important to note that you do not need to determine whether or not NOC himself/herself thought that NOA would carry out the threat. The test is whether a reasonable person would have feared that the threat would be carried out.

Similarly, you do not need to determine whether NOA intended to carry out the threat.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that NOA made a threat to inflict serious injury by [describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence denied this, arguing [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments]. This first element will only be satisfied if you are satisfied, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused made a threat to inflict serious injury, which is an injury which endangers life or is substantial and protracted.

Accused's Mental State

The second element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused either:

- Intended the complainant to fear that the threat would be carried out; or
- Knew, when s/he made the threat, that the complainant would probably fear that it would be carried out.

The two mental states I just mentioned are alternatives. This element will be satisfied as long as the prosecution can prove one of them beyond reasonable doubt. I will now examine each in turn.

Intention

This element will be satisfied if the prosecution can prove that the accused intended NOC to fear that his/her threat to seriously injure [him/her/NO3P] would be carried out.

In this case the prosecution submitted that this was the case. [Insert relevant evidence and/or arguments.] The defence responded [insert relevant evidence and/or arguments].

It is for you to decide whether the prosecution has proven, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused had this intention. If s/he did, then this second element will be met.

Knowledge that the Complainant Would Probably Feel Fear

A second way this element can be satisfied is by proving that NOA made the threat to inflict serious injury knowing that it was probable that NOC would fear that it would be carried out. That is, NOA knew that NOC was likely to believe that s/he was going to seriously injure [him/her/NO3P].

It is not sufficient for NOA to have known that it was possible that NOC would feel such fear. S/he must have known that that consequence was probable.

In determining this part of the test, you must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew of the probability of NOC's fear. It is not enough that you, or a reasonable person, would have recognised that likelihood in the circumstances.

In this case, the following evidence is relevant to your assessment of NOA's state of mind: [Identify relevant evidence and the inferences to be drawn from that evidence].

Inferring states of mind

[If proof of the accused's mental state depends on the drawing of inferences, add the following shaded section.]

As I have stated, the prosecution contends that you should conclude from the evidence that NOA had the appropriate state of mind at the relevant time.

A person's intention at the time s/he commits an offence may be identified from what s/he said and did, and also from what s/he failed to say and do. You should look at all of NOA's proven actions before, at the time of, and after the alleged offence. All of these things may help you to determine what NOA's intention was when s/he made the alleged threat to inflict serious injury.

In particular, the prosecution has asked you to consider [describe evidence]. The defence has asked you to consider [describe evidence].

You will remember what I told you about drawing conclusions earlier.[865] In this context, those directions mean that you may only conclude that NOA intended NOC to fear that the threat would be carried out, or that s/he knew that such a consequence was probable, if you are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that that is the only conclusion open from the facts you have found. If any evidence causes you to have reservations about drawing such a conclusion, the benefit of your doubts must go to the accused.

[If the jury might infer recklessness by using an objective test, add the following shaded section.]

In determining whether NOA knew that NOC would probably fear that s/he would carry out his/her threat, you [can/have been asked to] draw a conclusion from the probability that [you/the reasonable person] would have foreseen such a consequence in the accused's situation.

I must warn you that, although this is a legitimate step in reasoning towards a conclusion about NOA's state of mind, you must not treat this factor as decisive of the issue. It is not enough that you, or any other person, would have had such an awareness in the circumstances. You must be satisfied that NOA him/herself actually knew that it was likely that NOC would fear that s/he would carry out his/her threat.

The Accused Need Not Have Intended to Carry Out Threat

As with the first element, this element may be satisfied even if NOA never intended to carry out the threat. All that is required is that NOA intended NOC to fear that the threat would be carried out, or knew that it was probable that NOC would feel such fear.

In this case, the prosecution alleged that [describe relevant prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence responded that [describe relevant defence evidence and/or arguments].

Lawful Justification and Excuse

The third element that the prosecution must prove is that there was no lawful justification or excuse for the accused making the threat.

[If no defences are raised, add the following shaded section.]

In this case, there is no suggestion that NOA acted with any lawful justification or excuse. You should therefore have no difficulty finding this element proven.

[If any defences are open on the evidence, insert directions from the relevant topics here (see Part 8: Victorian Defences.]

Summary

To summarise, before you can find NOA guilty of making a threat to inflict serious injury, the prosecution must prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA made a threat to inflict serious injury; and

Two – That NOA either:

---

[865] This charge is based on the assumption that the judge has already instructed the jury about circumstantial evidence. It will need to be modified if that has not been done.

(a) intended NOC to fear that the threat would be carried out; or

(b) knew that NOC would probably fear that it would be carried out; and

Three – That NOA had no lawful justification or excuse for making that threat.

If you find that any of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of making a threat to inflict serious injury.

Last updated: 2 July 2020

7.4.11.2 Checklist: Threatening Serious Injury

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist is for conduct occurring on or after 1 July 2013. It must be adapted for conduct before that date.

Three elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused made a threat to inflict serious injury; and
2. The accused either:
   (a) Intended the complainant to fear that the threat would be carried out; or
   (b) Knew that the complainant would probably fear that the threat would be carried out; and
3. The accused acted without lawful justification or excuse.

Making a Threat to Inflict Serious Injury

1. Did the accused make a threat to inflict serious injury?

1.1. Did the accused make a threat to the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Threatening Serious Injury

1.2. Was it a threat to inflict serious injury upon [the complainant/another person]?

Consider – A serious injury is an injury which endangers life or is substantial and protracted

If Yes, then go to 1.3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Threatening Serious Injury

1.3. Would a reasonable person who was informed about all of the circumstances have feared that the threat would be carried out?

Consider – The complainant does not need to have feared that the threat would be carried out; and

Consider – The accused does not need to have intended to carry out the threat.

If Yes, then go to 2.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Threatening Serious Injury

Accused's State of Mind

2.1 Did the accused intend the complainant to fear that the threat to inflict serious injury would be carried out?

Consider – The accused does not need to have intended to carry out the threat.

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then go to 2.2

2.2 Was the accused aware that the complainant would probably fear that the threat to inflict serious injury would be carried out?

Consider – What did the accused think the likely result of his/her actions would be?

If Yes, then go to 3

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Threatening Serious Injury

Lawful Justification or Excuse

3. Did the accused act without lawful justification or excuse?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of Threatening Serious Injury (as long as you have also answered Yes to questions 1.1, 1.2, 1.3 and either 2.1 or 2.2)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of Threatening Serious Injury

Last updated: 30 November 2015

7.4.12 Stalking (From 7/6/11)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Operation of Section 21A

1. The offence of stalking is created by Crimes Act 1958 s 21A.
2. The offence was substantially amended in 2003 by the Crimes (Stalking) Act, to achieve the following:
   i) Cover acts of cyberstalking;
   ii) Remove the requirement for proof about the effect the conduct had on the victim, in cases where the accused had the appropriate subjective intention;
   iii) Add the defence of lack of malice; and
   iv) Explicitly allow for extra-territorial operation.
3. The offence was further amended in 2011 by the Crimes Amendment (Bullying) Act 2011, which:
   i) Expanded the definition of stalking to cover threats and abusive or offensive words or actions;

ii) Covers acts of stalking intended to cause psychological harm, suicidal thoughts or self-harm.

4. The new provisions apply to offences alleged to have been committed on or after 7 June 2011 (Crimes Act 1958 s 617(1)).

5. If any of the conduct is alleged to have been committed by the accused occurred prior to 7 June 2011, the offence is alleged to have been committed under the previous provisions (Crimes Act 1958 s 617(2)).

6. This topic addresses offences committed after 7 June 2011. For offences committed before that date, references to self-harm and the expanded definition of psychological harm do not apply.

Elements

7. The offence has the following two elements:

   i) The accused intentionally engaged in a "course of conduct" that included conduct of the type described in ss 21A(2)(a)–(g); and

   ii) The accused either:

   - Committed that course of conduct with the intention of causing physical or mental harm to the victim, including self-harm or of arousing apprehension or fear in the victim for his or her own safety or that of any other person; or
   - Knew that engaging in a course of conduct of that kind would be likely to cause such harm, or arouse such apprehension or fear; or
   - Ought to have understood that engaging in a course of conduct of that kind would be likely to cause such harm, or arouse such apprehension or fear, and it actually did have that result.

A Relevant Course of Conduct

8. There are three aspects to the first element:

   i) The accused must have engaged in a "course of conduct";

   ii) The course of conduct must have included conduct of the type or nature described in ss 21A(2)(a)–(g); and

   iii) The accused must have committed those acts intentionally (R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596).

"Course of Conduct"

9. For the accused's acts to have constituted a "course of conduct", they must have amounted to a pattern of conduct that showed a "continuity of purpose" in relation to the victim (Berlyn v Brouskos (2002) 134 A Crim R 111; Nadarajamoorthy v Moreton [2003] VSC 283; Thomas v Campbell (2003) 9 VR 136; R v Hoang (2007) 16 VR 369; R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596).

10. At the minimum, this requires the acts to have been committed on more than one occasion, or to have been protracted in nature (e.g. an extended act of surveillance) (Gunes v Pearson (1996) 89 A Crim R 297; Berlyn v Brouskos (2002) 134 A Crim R 111; Nadarajamoorthy v Moreton [2003] VSC 283; Thomas v Campbell (2003) 9 VR 136; R v Hoang (2007) 16 VR 369).

11. However, conduct which was committed on more than one occasion, or which was protracted, will not always constitute a pattern of conduct evidencing a continuity of purpose. Something additional about the conduct or surrounding circumstances must be shown before it can be said of the conduct that it amounts to such a pattern (Berlyn v Brouskos (2002) 134 A Crim R 111; Nadarajamoorthy v Moreton [2003] VSC 283).

12. The continuity of purpose must have been in relation to the particular victim. It is not sufficient for the victim to have coincidentally been the subject of actions which were not specifically targeted at him or her personally (R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596).[866]

13. The course of conduct may be spread out over a period of years (see, e.g. R v Hoang (2007) 16 VR 369).

14. An episode of harassment of short duration does not constitute a course of conduct evidencing a continuity of purpose (Nadarajamoorthy v Moreton [2003] VSC 283).

15. If the alleged acts were not premeditated, there cannot have been a continuity of purpose (Thomas v Campbell (2003) 9 VR 136).

Relevant Types of Conduct

16. The course of conduct must have been comprised of one or more of the types of conduct specified in s 21A(2) (DPP v Sutcliffe [2001] VSC 43; R v Orgill [2007] VSCA 236).

17. While ss 21A(2)(a)–(f) identify particular forms or types of conduct, s 21(2)(g) is a 'catch-all' provision, aimed at all other types of conduct which have the effect of arousing apprehension or fear in the victim for his or her own safety or that of any other person (DPP v Sutcliffe [2001] VSC 43).

18. The matters set out in s 21A(2) are not necessarily unlawful. It is the confluence of these actions in a course of conduct directed to a person with a specific intent which constitutes the criminality (Nadarajamoorthy v Moreton [2003] VSC 283).

Following the Victim

19. Section 21A(2)(a) refers to "following the victim or any other person".

20. This requires some motion by the accused and the victim from place to place, or within different areas of the same place (such as a shopping centre or a building) (Slaveski v State of Victoria and Others [2010] VSC 441).

21. The accused will therefore not fall within the scope of s 21A(2)(a) if he or she stands or sits still and stares at the victim as the victim walks past. Following someone with one's eyes is not sufficient (Slaveski v State of Victoria and Others [2010] VSC 441).

22. To "follow" the victim, the accused does not need to physically remain behind the victim (Slaveski v State of Victoria and Others [2010] VSC 441).

23. Thus, an accused who is aware of the victim's daily routine, and is able to anticipate his or her movements, may "follow" the victim by being present outside the victim's home before the victim leaves for work in the morning, and then preceding the victim to various locations throughout the day (e.g. the victim's train station, workplace, place where the victim does his or her shopping) (Slaveski v State of Victoria and Others [2010] VSC 441).

Loitering

24. Section 21A(2)(c) refers to "entering or loitering outside or near the victim's or any other person's place of residence or of business or any other place frequented by the victim or the other person".

25. "Loitering" involves more than simply being and remaining at a place. It conveys a concept of idleness, lack of purpose or indolence (Nadarajamoorthy v Moreton [2003] VSC 283).

---

[866] For example, it will not be sufficient to prove that the accused was undertaking surveillance of a particular location, and coincidentally happened to photograph the same person on more than one occasion. The accused must have intended to target the particular victim (R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596).

26. The accused must have been and remained at or near the relevant place for the purpose of causing physical or mental harm to the victim, or of arousing apprehension or fear in the victim for his or her safety or that of any other person (Nadarajamoorthy v Moreton [2003] VSC 283).

27. A person may therefore not fall within the scope of s 21A(2)(c) if, at the relevant time, he or she was engaged in other activities which render the description of "loitering" inapt in the circumstances, such as handing out brochures for a political protest (see, e.g. Nadarajamoorthy v Moreton [2003] VSC 283).

28. Where there is an issue about whether or not the accused was "loitering", the jury will need to exclude all reasonable hypotheses consistent with the accused not having been "loitering" beyond reasonable doubt (Nadarajamoorthy v Moreton [2003] VSC 283).

Surveillance

29. Section 21A(2)(f) refers to "keeping the victim or any other person under surveillance".

30. "Surveillance" includes the use of cameras and other electrical equipment that enables the accused to keep watch over the victim by recording the victim's movements or activity (R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596).

31. The accused can commit stalking by surveillance by photographing the victim on a number of occasions (R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596).[867]

32. Stalking by surveillance may also be made out by keeping watch over a location with the intent of observing or recording a specific victim's movements (R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596).

33. There is no separate legal test to distinguish between acts of monitoring or observation that amount to "surveillance", and those that do not. Instead, where stalking by surveillance is alleged, the issue remains whether or not the conduct in question meets the "course of conduct" requirements of stalking (R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596).

Causing an Unauthorised Computer Function

34. Section 21A(2)(bb) refers to causing an "unauthorised computer function". This term is defined in Crimes Act 1958 s 247A(1) to mean any of the following:

    (a) any unauthorised access to data held in a computer; or

    (b) any unauthorised modification of data held in a computer; or

    (c) any unauthorised impairment of electronic communication to or from a computer.

35. This definition of "unauthorised computer function" incorporates a number of terms which are also defined in s 247A(1), such as "access", "data", "impairment" and "modification".

Prosecution Must Particularise Relevant Acts

36. The prosecution must particularise the acts said to constitute the course of conduct. If the prosecution wishes to rely upon acts which have not been particularised to establish the course of conduct, they must amend the charge accordingly (Thomas v Campbell (2003) 9 VR 136).[868]

37. While the dates on which the course of conduct is alleged to have begun and ended should be specified in the presentment, it is not essential for the prosecution to prove that the course of conduct continued precisely between those dates (Thomas v Campbell (2003) 9 VR 136).

---

[867] This must occur on a sufficient number of occasions to evidence a continuity of purpose (see above), and must involve the necessary intent in relation to the victim (see below) (R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596).

[868] The prosecution may, however, use uncharged acts to establish a motive or relationship (Thomas v Campbell (2003) 9 VR 136). See Other forms of other misconduct evidence for further information.

38. Thus, the fact that, in the course of the trial, the prosecution confined its allegations to a shorter period than that specified in the presentment does not preclude the possibility of conviction (Thomas v Campbell (2003) 9 VR 136).

Unanimity

39. The jury does not need to be unanimous about the particular acts which constituted the course of conduct. The requirement for unanimity will be met as long as the jury unanimously agrees that the accused engaged in a course of conduct which included any of the matters set out in s 21A (R v Hoang (2007) 16 VR 369; Worsnop v R (2010) 28 VR 187).

Accused's Mental State

40. The second element requires the prosecution to prove that, when the accused committed the course of conduct, he or she intended to cause physical or mental harm to the victim, including self-harm, or to arouse apprehension or fear in the victim for his or her own safety or that of any other person (Crimes Act 1958 s 21A(2)).

41. There are three ways in which the prosecution can prove that the accused had the necessary intent:

    - By proving that he or she actually intended to cause such harm, or arouse such apprehension or fear (s 21A(2)); or
    - By proving that he or she knew that engaging in a course of conduct of that kind would be likely to cause such harm, or arouse such apprehension or fear (s 21A(3)(a)); or
    - By proving that he or she ought to have understood, in all the particular circumstances, that engaging in a course of conduct of that kind would be likely to cause such harm, or arouse such apprehension or fear, and it actually did have that result (s 21A(3)(b)).

42. The first two of these alternatives look solely at the accused's subjective state of mind. If the accused him or herself intended to cause harm, fear or apprehension, or knew that such effects were likely to result from his or her actions, then this element will be met, regardless of whether or not his or her actions actually did cause such harm, fear or apprehension (R v Hoang (2007) 16 VR 369; Georgiou v The King [2022] VSCA 220, [24]).

43. By contrast, the final alternative is an objective test. It focuses both on what the accused should have understood in the particular circumstances in which the course of conduct occurred, as well as on what effect the accused's actions actually had on the victim (R v Hoang (2007) 16 VR 369).

44. The prosecution does not need to prove that the alleged victim was aware of every act committed within the relevant course of conduct. Even for the third alternative, it is sufficient that the overall conduct caused harm or aroused apprehension or fear (Georgiou v The King [2022] VSCA 220, [25]).

45. If the jury is satisfied that either of the two subjective states of mind have been proven, they do not need to consider the objective element (Gunes v Pearson (1996) 89 A Crim R 297; R v Hoang (2007) 16 VR 369).

46. The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused committed each of the individual stalking actions with the necessary intention. It is the "course of conduct" that must have been committed with that intention (Gunes v Pearson (1996) 89 A Crim R 297; Worsnop v R (2010) 28 VR 187).While the jury must unanimously find that the accused committed the course of conduct with one of the specified forms of intention, the jury does not need to be unanimous about which form of intention has been proven (Worsnop v R (2010) 28 VR 187).

47. "Mental harm" is defined to include psychological harm and suicidal thoughts (Crimes Act 1958 s 21A(8)).

48. It is for the jury to determine the meaning of the term "mental harm", giving the words their ordinary English meaning. It is not limited to medically diagnosed psychological illnesses (RR v R [2013] VSCA 147).

49. It does not matter if the accused was only using the victim to make a political point, and did not intend to cause him or her harm, fear or apprehension. If the accused knew that engaging in a course of conduct of that kind would be likely to have such an effect, this element will be satisfied (R v Abbott [2006] VSCA 100).

50. Due to the objective test, it is possible that the accused may be found guilty of stalking even if he or she was so intoxicated that he or she was unable to form the necessary subjective intent (see Berlyn v Brouskos (2002) 134 A Crim R 111).

Performance of Official Duties

51. Section 21A(4) states that the "section does not apply" to conduct engaged in by a person performing official duties for the purpose of enforcing the criminal law, administering an Act, enforcing a law imposing a pecuniary penalty, executing a warrant, or protecting public revenue.

52. While this section has not yet been the subject of judicial interpretation, it seems likely that, where in issue, it will be a matter for the prosecution to disprove beyond reasonable doubt.

53. It is possible that this defence will not be disproved if the accused held a reasonable belief that the alleged acts were part of his or her official duties, even if this was not actually the case. In relevant cases it may be necessary to instruct the jury on this point.

Lack of Malice

54. Section 21A(4A) states that it is a defence to the charge for the accused to prove that the course of conduct was engaged in without malice in the normal course of a lawful business, trade profession or enterprise; for the purpose of an industrial dispute; or for the purpose of engaging in political activities or discussion or communicating with respect to public affairs.

55. The provision places the burden of proof on the accused, without specifying the required standard of proof. It seems highly likely that the standard will be the balance of probabilities.

Extra-Territorial Effect

56. Section 21A has extra-territorial effect where the accused is amenable to Victorian process, and where some of the circumstances which constitute an element of the offence occurred in Victoria (DPP v Sutcliffe [2001] VSC 43).

57. The extra-territorial effect of s 21A was made explicit by the amendments in 2003 (see ss 21A(6) and (7)).

Duplicity

58. In some cases the accused will be charged with a separate offence relating to the acts which constitute the stalking, in addition to the offence of stalking. This will not be duplicitous, as long as the elements of the offences are not identical, and the elements of one of the offences are not wholly included in the other (Thomas v Campbell (2003) 9 VR 136; R v Orgill [2007] VSCA 236).

59. The elements of stalking are not the same as the elements of assault, and not all of the elements of either offence are included in the other. This means that an accused can be convicted of stalking and assault, even where the acts which are relied upon as establishing the course of conduct amounting to stalking are also relied upon as establishing the assault (Thomas v Campbell (2003) 9 VR 136).

60. A person may similarly be convicted of stalking and burglary, even though the burglary constitutes part of the alleged course of conduct for the stalking offence (R v Orgill [2007] VSCA 236).

61. In such cases, care must be taken when sentencing the accused, to ensure that he or she is not punished twice for the commission of elements which are common to the relevant offences (Thomas v Campbell (2003) 9 VR 136; R v Orgill [2007] VSCA 236).

Last updated: 22 March 2023

7.4.12.1 Charge: Stalking (From 7/6/11)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used in cases in which all of the alleged stalking acts were committed on or after 7 June 2011.

Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of stalking. That crime has the following two elements:

One – the accused intentionally engaged in a course of conduct that included particular types of actions.

Two – The accused either:

- Intended that his/her course of conduct harm NOC, or make NOC feel frightened or apprehensive about his/her own safety or about the safety of someone else; or
- Knew that his/her course of conduct would be likely to harm NOC, or to make him/her feel frightened or apprehensive about his/her own safety or about the safety of someone else; or
- Ought to have understood that his/her actions would be likely to harm or frighten NOC, or to make him/her feel apprehensive about his/her own safety or about the safety of someone else, and his/her conduct actually did have that effect.

Before you can find NOA guilty of stalking, you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proven both of these elements beyond reasonable doubt.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Stalking Acts

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intentionally engaged in a course of conduct that included one or more of the following acts:

[Select relevant conduct from the list provided in Crimes Act 1958 s 21A, applying to the evidence and explaining as necessary:

(a) following the victim or any other person;

(b) contacting the victim or any other person by post, telephone, fax, text message, e–mail or other electronic communication or by any other means whatsoever;

(ba) publishing on the Internet or by an e–mail or other electronic communication to any person a statement or other material-

(i) relating to the victim or any other person; or

(ii) purporting to relate to, or to originate from, the victim or any other person;

(bb) causing an unauthorised computer function (within the meaning of Subdivision (6) of Division 3) in a computer owned or used by the victim or any other person;

(bc) tracing the victim's or any other person's use of the Internet or of e–mail or other electronic communications;

(c) entering or loitering outside or near the victim's or any other person's place of residence or of business or any other place frequented by the victim or the other person;

(d) interfering with property in the victim's or any other person's possession (whether or not the offender has an interest in the property);

(da) making threats to the victim;

(db) using abusive or offensive words to or in the presence of the victim;

(dc) performing abusive or offensive acts in the presence of the victim;

(dd) directing abusive or offensive acts towards the victim;

(e) giving offensive material to the victim or any other person or leaving it where it will be found by, given to or brought to the attention of, the victim or the other person;

(f) keeping the victim or any other person under surveillance;

(g) acting in any other way that could reasonably be expected to

(i) to cause physical or mental harm to the victim, including self-harm; or

(ii) to arouse apprehension or fear in the victim for his or her own safety or that of any other person.]

[If the term "following" requires further elaboration, add any relevant paragraphs from the following shaded section.]

- To have "followed" NOC, NOA must have physically gone from one place where NOC was to another place where NOC was. [If relevant add: Those different places could be different locations within the same [add relevant detail, e.g. "building"/"shopping complex"/"park".]]
- It is not sufficient to find that NOA "followed" NOC with his/her eyes.
- To find that NOA "followed" NOC, you do not need to find that s/he physically remained behind him/her. A person who knows another person's routine can "follow" that person by going to the places that he or she knows that person will go to, even if he or she arrives there first.

[If it is alleged that the accused was loitering, add the following shaded section.]

"Loitering" means more than simply being at a place and remaining there. It means being there with no legitimate purpose. To find that NOA was "loitering", you must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that there was no reasonable explanation for his/her presence, other than that s/he wanted to cause physical or mental harm to NOC, or to arouse apprehension or fear in NOC for his/her or someone else's safety.

[If it is alleged that the accused was keeping someone under surveillance add the following shaded section.]

A person can keep someone under surveillance in a number of ways. In this case the prosecution alleges that NOA kept NOC under surveillance by [describe form of surveillance relied on by prosecution, e.g. "by observing/watching/filming/photographing/recording"] [describe object of surveillance, e.g. "him/her/his movements/her activities"].

It is not necessary for you to find that NOA committed all of the acts that I have outlined. For this element to be met you need only be satisfied that NOA intentionally did at least one of the relevant acts.

It is also not necessary for you all to agree about which particular act or acts NOA committed, as long as you all find that s/he intentionally committed at least one of the relevant acts.

However, you must all be satisfied that NOA's acts constituted a "course of conduct".

To be a "course of conduct" the acts must have been committed on more than one occasion, or must have gone on for a prolonged period of time. A short, isolated act cannot constitute a "course of conduct".

However, it is not enough for you simply to find that NOA committed acts on more than one occasion, or committed one prolonged act. You must find that NOA's actions were related in such a way, or had such a "continuity of purpose", that they amounted to a "pattern of behaviour" in relation to NOC. A series of unrelated activities, with no continuity of purpose, will not be a course of conduct.

That course of conduct must have been directed to NOC. This element will not be met if you find that NOC just happened to experience acts which were not specifically targeted at him/her.

It is only if you find that NOA engaged in a "course of conduct" in relation to NOC, that included one or more of the types of acts that I have mentioned, that this first element will be met.

[Insert relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Accused's Mental State

The second element relates to the accused's state of mind and the circumstances in which the course of conduct was committed. This element can be met in three different ways.

First, it can be met if you find that the accused intended to harm NOC – either physically or mentally – or intended to cause NOC to be frightened or apprehensive about his/her own safety, or about the safety of someone else.

[Where mental harm is relevant, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that mental harm includes, but is not limited to, psychological harm and suicidal thoughts. It is a matter for you whether the accused intended to cause "mental harm", giving that phrase its ordinary meaning, as you understand it.

[Where the relevant harm is self-harm, add the following shaded section.]

The law says that, for the purpose of this element, harm includes causing NOC to engage in self-harm.

Second, this element can be met if you decide that the accused knew that his/her conduct would be likely to cause NOC such harm, fear or apprehension.

The third way in which this element can be met is if you find:

- That the accused ought to have understood that his/her course of conduct would have been likely, in the circumstances, to cause NOC such harm, fear or apprehension; and
- That the accused's conduct actually did have that effect.

This is a two part test. In the first part, you decide what the accused ought to have understood. Ought s/he have understood that his/her actions would be likely to cause NOC to suffer physical or mental harm, including self-harm, or to become frightened or apprehensive? This is no longer a question of what the accused actually knew or intended. Instead, it is a question of what the accused ought to have understood when s/he acted in the way that s/he did.

When deciding whether NOA ought to have understood the likely consequences of his/her course of conduct, you should consider what a reasonable person ought to have understood in the same circumstances.[869] Ought a reasonable person, in those circumstances, have understood that if s/he acted in the way that NOA did, s/he would be likely to cause NOC harm, or to make him/her feel frightened or apprehensive about his/her own safety or about the safety of someone else? If so, then NOA also ought to have understood that his/her acts would be likely to have that effect.

But it is not enough to decide that the accused ought to have understood that such harm, fear or apprehension would be the likely result of his/her actions. Under the second part of this test, you must also find that the accused's acts actually physically or mentally harmed NOC, or made NOC feel frightened or apprehensive about his/her own safety or about the safety of someone else.

It is only if you find that NOA both ought to have understood that his/her conduct would have been likely, in the circumstances, to cause NOC harm, fear or apprehension, and that his/her actions actually had that result, that this third way of proving this element will be met.

It is important to remember that these three ways of satisfying this element of the offence are alternatives. You therefore do not need to even consider the question of whether NOA ought to have understood the likely effects of his conduct, and the actual effect his/her conduct had on NOC, if you are satisfied that s/he intended to harm NOC or cause him/her to be frightened or apprehensive, or knew that such harm, fear or apprehension was likely. You only need to be satisfied that one of these three ways of satisfying this element have been proven.

In addition, you do not all need to agree about the particular way in which this element has been satisfied, as long as you all find that it has been proven beyond reasonable doubt.

Remember, though, that if you do rely on the fact that NOA "ought to have understood" that his acts would have been likely to cause NOC harm, fear or apprehension, then you must also find that his/her acts actually had that effect.

[Insert relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Defence: Official Duties

[If the performance of official duties is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

Even if you find that the prosecution has proved each of the elements of this offence, the accused has a defence to this offence if he/she acted while performing official duties for the purpose of [enforcing the criminal law/administering a law/enforcing a law that imposes a fine/executing a warrant/protecting the public revenue].

In this case, the defence argued that when NOA [insert relevant conduct], s/he was not stalking NOC, but was simply doing what his/her job of [insert relevant ground] required him/her to do.

[869] The precise nature of this objective test has not been judicially determined. This paragraph of the charge is based on the assumption that it is appropriate to consider what the reasonable person in the circumstances of the accused ought to have understood.

It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that this was not the case. They can do this in two ways.

Firstly, they can prove that the accused's acts were not part of his/her "official duties". That is, s/he was acting in a way that went beyond what s/he was required to do by his/her job.[870]

Alternatively, the prosecution can prove that the accused did not perform the acts "for the purpose of" [insert relevant ground]. In other words, while in some circumstances the accused may be authorised to act in the way that s/he did, in this particular case the accused was actually acting for reasons other than simply doing his/her job.

In this case, the prosecution argued [summarise prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence responded [summarise defence evidence and/or arguments.]

If you are not satisfied that the prosecution has proved either of these matters, then this defence will be successful and you must find NOA not guilty of stalking. However, if you are satisfied that the accused's acts were not part of his/her "official duties", or that the accused did not perform the acts "for the purpose of" [insert relevant ground], and you are satisfied of the other elements, then you may find NOA guilty of stalking.

Defence: Lack of Malice

[If the defence of lack of malice is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

Even if you find that the prosecution has proven each of the elements of this offence, there are certain circumstances in which a person is allowed to commit acts that would otherwise be called "stalking". That is, s/he has a defence to the charge of stalking.[871]

The law states that it is a defence to the charge of stalking if a person can prove that s/he was acting without malice [in the normal course of a lawful business, trade, profession or enterprise/for the purpose of an industrial dispute/for the purpose of engaging in political activities or discussion or communicating with respect to public affairs].

There are two parts to this defence. First, the accused must prove that s/he was acting without malice. That is, s/he was acting without any spite or ill-will towards NOC, and wasn't intending to cause any harm.

Second, the accused must also prove that s/he was acting [insert relevant ground]. In this case, NOA has argued that when s/he [insert conduct], s/he was not stalking NOC, but was simply [insert evidence, linking it to the relevant ground].

It is NOA who must prove these two matters to you. However, unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – NOA only needs to prove these matters on what is called the "balance of probabilities". That is, s/he needs to prove that it is [870] In some circumstances, it may be necessary for the trial judge to direct the jury about whether the accused reasonably believed s/he was performing his/her official duties.

---

[871] No cases have yet arisen in relation to this defence (s 21A(4A)). This section of the charge is based on the assumption that the accused must prove these matters on the balance of probabilities.

more probable than not that s/he acted without malice and was acting [insert relevant ground].

If you are satisfied that it is more probable than not that NOA was acting without malice and was acting [insert relevant ground], then this defence will be successful and you must find NOA not guilty of stalking. This will be the case even if you find that each of the elements of the offence have been met.

However, if NOA fails to prove to you either that s/he was acting without malice, or that s/he was acting [insert relevant ground], then the defence fails. If you are also satisfied that each of the elements of the offence have been proven, you should find NOA guilty of stalking.

Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, for you to find NOA guilty of stalking, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA intentionally engaged in a course of conduct that included at least one of the acts specified by the law; and

Two – That NOA acted with the appropriate state of mind. That is:

- S/he intended to cause NOC mental or physical harm, including self-harm, or to make NOC fearful or apprehensive about his/her own safety or about the safety of someone else; or
- S/he knew that his/her conduct would be likely to cause such harm, fear or apprehension; or
- S/he ought to have understood that his/her course of conduct would have been likely, in the circumstances, to cause NOC harm, or to make him/her feel frightened or apprehensive about his/her own safety or about the safety of someone else, and his/her conduct actually did have that effect.

[If the defence of official duties is in issue add the following shaded section.]

However, even if the prosecution has proved both of these elements to you, NOA will not be guilty unless the prosecution has proved that NOA was not performing official duties for the purpose of [insert relevant ground].

[If the defence of acting without malice is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

However, even if the prosecution has proved both of these elements to you, NOA will not be guilty if s/he has proven that it is more probable than not that s/he acted without malice and acted [insert relevant ground].

If you find that either of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of stalking.

Last updated: 24 March 2015

7.4.12.2 Checklist: Stalking (From 7/6/11)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist should be used in cases in which all of the alleged stalking acts were committed on or after 7 June 2011.

If the performance of official duties or the lack of malice defence are in issue this checklist will need to be modified.

Two elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally engaged in a course of conduct that included a relevant act; and

2. The accused either:

- Intended to physically or mentally harm the complainant, or to make him or her feel frightened or apprehensive about his or her own safety or about the safety of someone else; or
- Knew that his or her course of conduct would be likely to harm the complainant, or cause the complainant to be fearful or apprehensive about his or her own safety or the safety of someone else; or
- Ought to have understood that his or her course of conduct would be likely to harm the complainant, or cause the complainant to be fearful or apprehensive about his or her safety or the safety of someone else, and the accused's conduct had that effect.

An Intentional Course of Conduct

1.1 Did the accused intentionally do at least one of the acts specified by the law?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of stalking

1.2 Did the accused's acts amount to a "course of conduct" in relation to the complainant?

Consider – Were acts committed on more than one occasion, or go on for a protracted period of time?

Consider – Were the acts related in such a way that they amounted to a pattern of behaviour?

Consider – Was the course of conducted directed to the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 2.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of stalking

The Accused's State of Mind

2.1 Did the accused intend to mentally or physically harm the complainant, or to cause the complainant to be fearful or apprehensive about his or her own safety or the safety of someone else?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of stalking (as long as you also answered 'Yes' to Questions 1.1 and 1.2)

If No, then go to 2.2

2.2 Did the accused know that his or her course of conduct would be likely to cause the complainant the harm, fear or apprehension referred to in 2.1 above?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of stalking (as long as you also answered 'Yes' to Questions 1.1 and 1.2)

If No, then go to 2.3

2.3 Ought the accused to have understood that his or her course of conduct would be likely to cause the complainant the harm, fear or apprehension referred to in 2.1 above?

Consider – What ought a reasonable person have understood in the same circumstances?

If Yes, then go to 2.4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of stalking (as long as you also answered 'No' to Questions 2.1 and 2.2)

2.4 Did the accused's course of conduct actually cause the complainant the harm, fear or apprehension referred to in 2.1 above?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of stalking (as long as you also answered 'Yes' to Questions 1.1, 1.2 and 2.3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of stalking (as long as you also answered 'No' to Questions 2.1 and 2.2)

Last updated: 24 March 2015

7.4.13 Stalking (10/12/03–6/6/11)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Operation of Section 21A

1. The offence of stalking is created by Crimes Act 1958 s 21A.
2. The offence was substantially amended in 2003 by the Crimes (Stalking) Act, to achieve the following:
   i) Cover acts of cyberstalking;
   ii) Remove the requirement for proof about the effect the conduct had on the victim, in cases where the accused had the appropriate subjective intention;
   iii) Add the defence of lack of malice; and
   iv) Explicitly allow for extra-territorial operation.
3. These provisions apply to offences alleged to have been committed on or after 10 December 2003 (Crimes Act 1958 s 598(1)).
4. If any of the conduct alleged to have been committed by the accused occurred prior to this date, the offence is to be dealt with under the previous provisions. This will be the case even if some of the relevant conduct occurred on or after 10 December 2003 (Crimes Act 1958 s 598(2)).
5. The offence was further amended by the Crimes Amendment (Bullying) Act 2011, which only applies to offences committed on or after 7 June 2011. For information on those provisions, see 7.4.12 Stalking (From 7/6/11).

Elements

6. The offence has the following two elements:
   i) The accused intentionally engaged in a "course of conduct" that included conduct of the type described in ss 21A(2)(a)–(g); and

ii) The accused either:

- Committed that course of conduct with the intention of causing physical or mental harm to the victim, or of arousing apprehension or fear in the victim for his or her own safety or that of any other person; or
- Knew that engaging in a course of conduct of that kind would be likely to cause such harm, or arouse such apprehension or fear; or
- Ought to have understood that engaging in a course of conduct of that kind would be likely to cause such harm, or arouse such apprehension or fear, and it actually did have that result.

A Relevant Course of Conduct

7. There are three aspects to the first element:

   i) The accused must have engaged in a "course of conduct";

   ii) The course of conduct must have included conduct of the type or nature described in ss 21A(2)(a)–(g); and

   iii) The accused must have committed those acts intentionally (R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596; [2009] VSCA 7).

"Course of Conduct"

8. For the accused's acts to have constituted a "course of conduct", they must have amounted to a pattern of conduct that showed a "continuity of purpose" in relation to the victim (Berlyn v Brouskos (2002) 134 A Crim R 111; Nadarajamoorthy v Moreton [2003] VSC 283; Thomas v Campbell (2003) 9 VR 136; R v Hoang (2007) 16 VR 369; R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596).

9. At the minimum, this requires the acts to have been committed on more than one occasion, or to have been protracted in nature (e.g. an extended act of surveillance) (Gunes v Pearson (1996) 89 A Crim R 297; Berlyn v Brouskos (2002) 134 A Crim R 111; Nadarajamoorthy v Moreton [2003] VSC 283; Thomas v Campbell (2003) 9 VR 136; R v Hoang (2007) 16 VR 369).

10. However, conduct which was committed on more than one occasion, or which was protracted, will not always constitute a pattern of conduct evidencing a continuity of purpose. Something additional about the conduct or surrounding circumstances must be shown before it can be said of the conduct that it amounts to such a pattern (Berlyn v Brouskos (2002) 134 A Crim R 111; Nadarajamoorthy v Moreton [2003] VSC 283).

11. The continuity of purpose must have been in relation to the particular victim. It is not sufficient for the victim to have coincidentally been the subject of actions which were not specifically targeted at him or her personally (R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596).[872]

12. The course of conduct may be spread out over a period of years (see, e.g. R v Hoang (2007) 16 VR 369).

13. An episode of harassment of short duration does not constitute a course of conduct evidencing a continuity of purpose (Nadarajamoorthy v Moreton [2003] VSC 283).

---

[872] For example, it will not be sufficient to prove that the accused was undertaking surveillance of a particular location, and coincidentally happened to photograph the same person on more than one occasion. The accused must have intended to target the particular victim (R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596).

14. If the alleged acts were not premeditated, there cannot have been a continuity of purpose (Thomas v Campbell (2003) 9 VR 136).

Relevant Types of Conduct

15. The course of conduct must have been comprised of one or more of the types of conduct specified in s 21A(2) (DPP v Sutcliffe [2001] VSC 43; R v Orgill [2007] VSCA 236).

16. While ss 21A(2)(a)–(f) identify particular forms or types of conduct, s 21(2)(g) is a 'catch-all' provision, aimed at all other types of conduct which have the effect of arousing apprehension or fear in the victim for his or her own safety or that of any other person (DPP v Sutcliffe [2001] VSC 43).

17. The matters set out in s 21A(2) are not necessarily unlawful. It is the confluence of these actions in a course of conduct directed to a person with a specific intent which constitutes the criminality (Nadarajamoorthy v Moreton [2003] VSC 283).

Following the Victim

18. Section 21A(2)(a) refers to "following the victim or any other person".

19. This requires some motion by the accused and the victim from place to place, or within different areas of the same place (such as a shopping centre or a building) (Slaveski v State of Victoria and Others [2010] VSC 441).

20. The accused will therefore not fall within the scope of s 21A(2)(a) if he or she stands or sits still and stares at the victim as the victim walks past. Following someone with one's eyes is not sufficient (Slaveski v State of Victoria and Others [2010] VSC 441).

21. To "follow" the victim, the accused does not need to physically remain behind the victim (Slaveski v State of Victoria and Others [2010] VSC 441).

22. Thus, an accused who is aware of the victim's daily routine, and is able to anticipate his or her movements, may "follow" the victim by being present outside the victim's home before the victim leaves for work in the morning, and then preceding the victim to various locations throughout the day (e.g. the victim's train station, workplace, place where the victim does his or her shopping) (Slaveski v State of Victoria and Others [2010] VSC 441).

Loitering

23. Section 21A(2)(c) refers to "entering or loitering outside or near the victim's or any other person's place of residence or of business or any other place frequented by the victim or the other person".

24. "Loitering" involves more than simply being and remaining at a place. It conveys a concept of idleness, lack of purpose or indolence (Nadarajamoorthy v Moreton [2003] VSC 283).

25. The accused must have been and remained at or near the relevant place for the purpose of causing physical or mental harm to the victim, or of arousing apprehension or fear in the victim for his or her safety or that of any other person (Nadarajamoorthy v Moreton [2003] VSC 283).

26. A person may therefore not fall within the scope of s 21A(2)(c) if, at the relevant time, he or she was engaged in other activities which render the description of "loitering" inapt in the circumstances, such as handing out brochures for a political protest (see, e.g. Nadarajamoorthy v Moreton [2003] VSC 283).

27. Where there is an issue about whether or not the accused was "loitering", the jury will need to exclude all reasonable hypotheses consistent with the accused not having been "loitering" beyond reasonable doubt (Nadarajamoorthy v Moreton [2003] VSC 283).

Surveillance

28. Section 21A(2)(f) refers to "keeping the victim or any other person under surveillance".

29. "Surveillance" includes the use of cameras and other electrical equipment that enables the accused to keep watch over the victim by recording the victim's movements or activity (R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596).

30. The accused can commit stalking by surveillance by photographing the victim on a number of occasions (R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596).[873]

31. Stalking by surveillance may also be made out by keeping watch over a location with the intent of observing or recording a specific victim's movements (R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596).

32. There is no separate legal test to distinguish between acts of monitoring or observation that amount to "surveillance", and those that do not. Instead, where stalking by surveillance is alleged, the issue remains whether or not the conduct in question meets the "course of conduct" requirements of stalking (R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596).

Causing an Unauthorised Computer Function

33. Section 21A(2)(bb) refers to causing an "unauthorised computer function". This term is defined in Crimes Act 1958 s 247A(1) to mean any of the following:

    (a) any unauthorised access to data held in a computer; or

    (b) any unauthorised modification of data held in a computer; or

    (c) any unauthorised impairment of electronic communication to or from a computer.

34. This definition of "unauthorised computer function" incorporates a number of terms which are also defined in s 247A(1), such as "access", "data", "impairment" and "modification".

Prosecution Must Particularise Relevant Acts

35. The prosecution must particularise the acts said to constitute the course of conduct. If the prosecution wishes to rely upon acts which have not been particularised to establish the course of conduct, they must amend the charge accordingly (Thomas v Campbell (2003) 9 VR 136).[874]

36. While the dates on which the course of conduct is alleged to have begun and ended should be specified in the presentment, it is not essential for the prosecution to prove that the course of conduct continued precisely between those dates (Thomas v Campbell (2003) 9 VR 136).

37. Thus, the fact that, in the course of the trial, the prosecution confined its allegations to a shorter period than that specified in the presentment does not preclude the possibility of conviction (Thomas v Campbell (2003) 9 VR 136).

Unanimity

38. The jury does not need to be unanimous about the particular acts which constituted the course of conduct. The requirement for unanimity will be met as long as the jury unanimously agrees that the accused engaged in a course of conduct which included any of the matters set out in s 21A (R v Hoang (2007) 16 VR 369; Worsnop v R (2010) 28 VR 187).

Accused's Mental State

39. The second element requires the prosecution to prove that, when the accused committed the course of conduct, he or she intended to cause physical or mental harm to the victim, or to arouse apprehension or fear in the victim for his or her own safety or that of any other person (Crimes Act 1958 s 21A(2)).

40. There are three ways in which the prosecution can prove that the accused had the necessary intent:

---

[873] This must occur on a sufficient number of occasions to evidence a continuity of purpose (see above), and must involve the necessary intent in relation to the victim (see below) (R v Anders (2009) 20 VR 596).

[874] The prosecution may, however, use uncharged acts to establish a motive or relationship (Thomas v Campbell (2003) 9 VR 136). See Other forms of other misconduct evidence for further information.

- By proving that he or she actually intended to cause such harm, or arouse such apprehension or fear (s 21A(2)); or
- By proving that he or she knew that engaging in a course of conduct of that kind would be likely to cause such harm, or arouse such apprehension or fear (s 21A(3)(a)); or
- By proving that he or she ought to have understood, in all the particular circumstances, that engaging in a course of conduct of that kind would be likely to cause such harm, or arouse such apprehension or fear, and it actually did have that result (s 21A(3)(b)).

41. The first two of these alternatives look solely at the accused's subjective state of mind. If the accused him or herself intended to cause harm, fear or apprehension, or knew that such effects were likely to result from his or her actions, then this element will be met, regardless of whether or not his or her actions actually did cause such harm, fear or apprehension (R v Hoang (2007) 16 VR 369; Georgiou v The King [2022] VSCA 220, [24]).
42. By contrast, the final alternative is an objective test. It focuses both on what the accused should have understood in the particular circumstances in which the course of conduct occurred, as well as on what effect the accused's actions actually had on the victim (R v Hoang (2007) 16 VR 369).
43. The prosecution does not need to prove that the alleged victim was aware of every act committed within the relevant course of conduct. Even for the third alternative, it is sufficient that the overall conduct caused harm or aroused apprehension or fear (Georgiou v The King [2022] VSCA 220, [25]). If the jury is satisfied that either of the two subjective states of mind have been proven, they do not need to consider the objective element (Gunes v Pearson (1996) 89 A Crim R 297; R v Hoang (2007) 16 VR 369).
44. The prosecution does not need to prove that the accused committed each of the individual stalking actions with the necessary intention. It is the "course of conduct" that must have been committed with that intention (Gunes v Pearson (1996) 89 A Crim R 297; Worsnop v R (2010) 28 VR 187). While the jury must unanimously find that the accused committed the course of conduct with one of the specified forms of intention, the jury does not need to be unanimous about which form of intention has been proven (Worsnop v R (2010) 28 VR 187).
45. "Mental harm" is not a legal term of art, and there is no requirement to direct the jury about its meaning (R v Hoang (2007) 16 VR 369).
46. It is for the jury to determine the meaning of the term "mental harm", giving the words their ordinary English meaning. It is not limited to medically diagnosed psychological illnesses (RR v R [2013] VSCA 147).
47. It does not matter if the accused was only using the victim to make a political point, and did not intend to cause him or her harm, fear or apprehension. If the accused knew that engaging in a course of conduct of that kind would be likely to have such an effect, this element will be satisfied (R v Abbott [2006] VSCA 100).
48. Due to the objective test, it is possible that the accused may be found guilty of stalking even if he or she was so intoxicated that he or she was unable to form the necessary subjective intent (see Berlyn v Brouskos (2002) 134 A Crim R 111).

Performance of Official Duties

49. Section 21A(4) states that the "section does not apply" to conduct engaged in by a person performing official duties for the purpose of enforcing the criminal law, administering an Act, enforcing a law imposing a pecuniary penalty, executing a warrant, or protecting public revenue.
50. While this section has not yet been the subject of judicial interpretation, it seems likely that, where in issue, it will be a matter for the prosecution to disprove beyond reasonable doubt.
51. It is possible that defence will not be disproved if the accused held a reasonable belief that the alleged acts were part of his or her official duties, even if this was not actually the case. In relevant cases it may be necessary to instruct the jury on this point.

Lack of Malice

52. Section 21A(4A) states that it is a defence to the charge for the accused to prove that the course of conduct was engaged in without malice in the normal course of a lawful business, trade profession or enterprise; for the purpose of an industrial dispute; or for the purpose of engaging in political activities or discussion or communicating with respect to public affairs.

53. The provision places the burden of proof on the accused, without specifying the required standard of proof. It seems highly likely that the standard will be the balance of probabilities.

Extra-Territorial Effect

54. Section 21A has extra-territorial effect where the accused is amenable to Victorian process, and where some of the circumstances which constitute an element of the offence occurred in Victoria (DPP v Sutcliffe [2001] VSC 43).

55. The extra-territorial effect of s 21A was made explicit by the amendments in 2003 (see ss 21A(6) and (7)).

Duplicity

56. In some cases the accused will be charged with a separate offence relating to the acts which constitute the stalking, in addition to the offence of stalking. This will not be duplicitous, as long as the elements of the offences are not identical, and the elements of one of the offences are not wholly included in the other (Thomas v Campbell (2003) 9 VR 136; R v Orgill [2007] VSCA 236).

57. The elements of stalking are not the same as the elements of assault, and not all of the elements of either offence are included in the other. This means that an accused can be convicted of stalking and assault, even where the acts which are relied upon as establishing the course of conduct amounting to stalking are also relied upon as establishing the assault (Thomas v Campbell (2003) 9 VR 136).

58. A person may similarly be convicted of stalking and burglary, even though the burglary constitutes part of the alleged course of conduct for the stalking offence (R v Orgill [2007] VSCA 236).

59. In such cases, care must be taken when sentencing the accused, to ensure that he or she is not punished twice for the commission of elements which are common to the relevant offences (Thomas v Campbell (2003) 9 VR 136; R v Orgill [2007] VSCA 236).

Last updated: 12 September 2013

7.4.13.1 Charge: Stalking (10/12/03–6/6/11)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This charge should be used in cases in which all of the alleged stalking acts were committed between 10 December 2003 and 6 June 2011.

Elements

I must now direct you about the crime of stalking. That crime has the following two elements:

One – the accused intentionally engaged in a course of conduct that included particular types of actions.

Two – The accused either:

- Intended that his/her course of conduct harm NOC, or make NOC feel frightened or apprehensive about his/her own safety or about the safety of someone else; or
- Knew that his/her course of conduct would be likely to harm NOC, or to make him/her feel frightened or apprehensive about his/her own safety or about the safety of someone else; or
- Ought to have understood that his/her actions would be likely to harm or frighten NOC, or to make him/her feel apprehensive about his/her own safety or about the safety of someone else, and his/her conduct actually did have that effect.

Before you can find NOA guilty of stalking, you must be satisfied that the prosecution has proven both of these elements beyond reasonable doubt.

I will now explain each of these elements in more detail.

Stalking Acts

The first element that the prosecution must prove is that the accused intentionally engaged in a course of conduct that included one or more of the following acts:

[Select relevant conduct from the list provided in Crimes Act 1958 s 21A, applying to the evidence and explaining as necessary:

(a) following the victim or any other person;

(b) contacting the victim or any other person by post, telephone, fax, text message, e–mail or other electronic communication or by any other means whatsoever;

(ba) publishing on the Internet or by an e–mail or other electronic communication to any person a statement or other material-

(i) relating to the victim or any other person; or

(ii) purporting to relate to, or to originate from, the victim or any other person;

(bb) causing an unauthorised computer function (within the meaning of Subdivision (6) of Division 3) in a computer owned or used by the victim or any other person;

(bc) tracing the victim's or any other person's use of the Internet or of e–mail or other electronic communications;

(c) entering or loitering outside or near the victim's or any other person's place of residence or of business or any other place frequented by the victim or the other person;

(d) interfering with property in the victim's or any other person's possession (whether or not the offender has an interest in the property);

(e) giving offensive material to the victim or any other person or leaving it where it will be found by, given to or brought to the attention of, the victim or the other person;

(f) keeping the victim or any other person under surveillance;

(g) acting in any other way that could reasonably be expected to arouse apprehension or fear in the victim for his or her own safety or that of any other person.

[If the term "following" requires further elaboration, add any relevant paragraphs from the following shaded section.]

- To have "followed" NOC, NOA must have physically gone from one place where NOC was to another place where NOC was. [If relevant add: Those different places could be different locations within the same [add relevant detail, e.g. "building"/"shopping complex"/"park"].]

- It is not sufficient to find that NOA "followed" NOC with his/her eyes.
- To find that NOA "followed" NOC, you do not need to find that s/he physically remained behind him/her. A person who knows another person's routine can "follow" that person by going to the places that he or she knows that person will go to, even if he or she arrives there first.

[If it is alleged that the accused was loitering, add the following shaded section.]

"Loitering" means more than simply being at a place and remaining there. It means being there with no legitimate purpose. To find that NOA was "loitering", you must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that there was no reasonable explanation for his/her presence, other than that s/he wanted to cause physical or mental harm to NOC, or to arouse apprehension or fear in NOC for his/her or someone else's safety.]

[If it is alleged that the accused was keeping someone under surveillance add the following shaded section.]

A person can keep someone under surveillance in a number of ways. In this case the prosecution alleges that NOA kept NOC under surveillance by [describe form of surveillance relied on by prosecution, e.g. "by observing/watching/filming/photographing/recording"] [describe object of surveillance, e.g. "him/her/his movements/her activities"].

It is not necessary for you to find that NOA committed all of the acts that I have outlined. For this element to be met you need only be satisfied that NOA intentionally did at least one of the relevant acts.

It is also not necessary for you all to agree about which particular act or acts that NOA committed, as long as you all find that s/he intentionally committed at least one of the relevant acts.

However, you must all be satisfied that NOA's acts constituted a "course of conduct".

To be a "course of conduct" the acts must have been committed on more than one occasion, or must have gone on for a prolonged period of time. A short, isolated act cannot constitute a "course of conduct".

However, it is not enough for you simply to find that NOA committed acts on more than one occasion, or committed one prolonged act. You must find that NOA's actions were related in such a way, or had such a "continuity of purpose", that they amounted to a "pattern of behaviour" in relation to NOC. A series of unrelated activities, with no continuity of purpose, will not be a course of conduct.

That course of conduct must have been directed to NOC. This element will not be met if you find that NOC just happened to experience acts which were not specifically targeted at him/her.

It is only if you find that NOA engaged in a "course of conduct" in relation to NOC, that included one or more of the types of acts that I have mentioned, that this first element will be met.

[Insert relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Accused's Mental State

The second element relates to the accused's state of mind and the circumstances in which the course of conduct was committed. This element can be met in three different ways.

First, it can be met if you find that the accused intended to harm NOC – either physically or mentally – or intended to cause NOC to be frightened or apprehensive about his/her own safety, or about the safety of someone else.

Second, this element can be met if you decide that the accused knew that his/her conduct would be likely to cause NOC such harm, fear or apprehension.

The third way in which this element can be met is if you find:

- That the accused ought to have understood that his/her course of conduct would have been likely, in the circumstances, to cause NOC such harm, fear or apprehension; and
- That the accused's conduct actually did have that effect.

This is a two part test. In the first part, you decide what the accused ought to have understood. Ought s/he have understood that his/her actions would be likely to cause NOC to suffer physical or mental harm or to become frightened or apprehensive? This is no longer a question of what the accused actually knew or intended. Instead, it is a question of what the accused ought to have understood when s/he acted in the way that s/he did.

When deciding whether NOA ought to have understood the likely consequences of his/her course of conduct, you should consider what a reasonable person ought to have understood in the same circumstances.[875] Ought a reasonable person, in those circumstances, have understood that if s/he acted in the way that NOA did, s/he would be likely to cause NOC harm, or to make him/her feel frightened or apprehensive about his/her own safety or about the safety of someone else? If so, then NOA also ought to have understood that his/her acts would be likely to have that effect.

But it is not enough to decide that the accused ought to have understood that such harm, fear or apprehension would be the likely result of his/her actions. Under the second part of this test, you must also find that the accused's acts actually physically or mentally harmed NOC, or made NOC feel frightened or apprehensive about his/her own safety or about the safety of someone else.

It is only if you find that NOA both ought to have understood that his/her conduct would have been likely, in the circumstances, to cause NOC harm, fear or apprehension, and that his/her actions actually had that result, that this third way of proving this element will be met.

It is important to remember that these three ways of satisfying this element of the offence are alternatives. You therefore do not need to even consider the question of whether NOA ought to have understood the likely effects of his conduct, and the actual effect his/her conduct had on NOC, if you are satisfied that s/he intended to harm NOC or cause him/her to be frightened or apprehensive, or knew that such harm, fear or apprehension was likely. You only need to be satisfied that one of these three ways of satisfying this element have been proven.

In addition, you do not all need to agree about the particular way in which this element has been satisfied, as long as you all find that it has been proven beyond reasonable doubt.

Remember, though, that if you do rely on the fact that NOA "ought to have understood" that his acts would have been likely to cause NOC harm, fear or apprehension, then you must also find that his/her acts actually had that effect.

[Insert relevant evidence and/or arguments.]

Defence: Official Duties

[If the performance of official duties is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

Even if you find that the prosecution has proved each of the elements of this offence, the accused has a defence to this offence if he/she acted while performing official duties for the purpose of [enforcing the criminal law/administering a law/enforcing a law that imposes a fine/executing a warrant/protecting the public revenue].

In this case, the defence argued that when NOA [insert relevant conduct], s/he was not stalking NOC, but was simply doing what his/her job of [insert relevant ground] required him/her to do.

---

[875] The precise nature of this objective test has not been judicially determined. This paragraph of the charge is based on the assumption that it is appropriate to consider what the reasonable person in the circumstances of the accused ought to have understood.

It is for the prosecution to prove to you, beyond reasonable doubt, that this was not the case. They can do this in two ways.

Firstly, they can prove that the accused's acts were not part of his/her "official duties". That is, s/he was acting in a way that went beyond what s/he was required to do by his/her job.[876]

Alternatively, the prosecution can prove that the accused did not perform the acts "for the purpose of" [insert relevant ground]. In other words, while in some circumstances the accused may be authorised to act in the way that s/he did, in this particular case the accused was actually acting for reasons other than simply doing his/her job.

In this case, the prosecution argued [summarise prosecution evidence and/or arguments]. The defence responded [summarise defence evidence and/or arguments.]

If you are not satisfied that the prosecution has proved either of these matters, then this defence will be successful and you must find NOA not guilty of stalking. However, if you are satisfied that the accused's acts were not part of his/her "official duties", or that the accused did not perform the acts "for the purpose of" [insert relevant ground], and you are satisfied of the other elements, then you may find NOA guilty of stalking.

Defence: Lack of Malice

[If the defence of lack of malice is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

Even if you find that the prosecution has proven each of the elements of this offence, there are certain circumstances in which a person is allowed to commit acts that would otherwise be called "stalking". That is, s/he has a defence to the charge of stalking.[877]

The law states that it is a defence to the charge of stalking if a person can prove that s/he was acting without malice [in the normal course of a lawful business, trade, profession or enterprise/for the purpose of an industrial dispute/for the purpose of engaging in political activities or discussion or communicating with respect to public affairs].

There are two parts to this defence. First, the accused must prove that s/he was acting without malice. That is, s/he was acting without any spite or ill-will towards NOC, and wasn't intending to cause any harm.

Second, the accused must also prove that s/he was acting [insert relevant ground]. In this case, NOA has argued that when s/he [insert conduct], s/he was not stalking NOC, but was simply [insert evidence, linking it to the relevant ground].

It is NOA who must prove these two matters to you. However, unlike the elements of the offence – which the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt – NOA only needs to prove these matters on what is called the "balance of probabilities". That is, s/he needs to prove that it is more probable than not that s/he acted without malice and was acting [insert relevant ground].

---

[876] In some circumstances, it may be necessary for the trial judge to direct the jury about whether the accused reasonably believed s/he was performing his/her official duties.

[877] No cases have yet arisen in relation to this defence (s 21A(4A)). This section of the charge is based on the assumption that the accused must prove these matters on the balance of probabilities.

If you are satisfied that it is more probable than not that NOA was acting without malice and was acting [insert relevant ground], then this defence will be successful and you must find NOA not guilty of stalking. This will be the case even if you find that each of the elements of the offence have been met.

However, if NOA fails to prove to you either that s/he was acting without malice, or that s/he was acting [insert relevant ground], then the defence fails. If you are also satisfied that each of the elements of the offence have been proven, you should find NOA guilty of stalking.

Evidence

[If not previously done, apply the law to the relevant evidence here.]

Summary

To summarise, for you to find NOA guilty of stalking, the prosecution must prove to you beyond reasonable doubt:

One – That NOA intentionally engaged in a course of conduct that included at least one of the acts specified by the law; and

Two – That NOA acted with the appropriate state of mind. That is:

- S/he intended to cause NOC mental or physical harm or to make NOC fearful or apprehensive about his/her own safety or about the safety of someone else; or
- S/he knew that his/her conduct would be likely to cause such harm, fear or apprehension; or
- S/he ought to have understood that his/her course of conduct would have been likely, in the circumstances, to cause NOC harm, or to make him/her feel frightened or apprehensive about his/her own safety or about the safety of someone else, and his/her conduct actually did have that effect.

[If the defence of official duties is in issue add the following shaded section.]

However, even if the prosecution has proved both of these elements to you, NOA will not be guilty unless the prosecution has proved that NOA was not performing official duties for the purpose of [insert relevant ground].

[If the defence of acting without malice is in issue, add the following shaded section.]

However, even if the prosecution has proved both of these elements to you, NOA will not be guilty if s/he has proven that it is more probable than not that s/he acted without malice and acted [insert relevant ground].

If you find that either of these elements have not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, then you must find NOA not guilty of stalking.

Last updated: 24 March 2015

7.4.13.2 Checklist: Stalking (10/12/03–6/6/11)

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document for adaptation

This checklist should be used in cases in which all of the alleged stalking acts were committed between 10 December 2003 and 6 June 2011.

If the performance of official duties or the lack of malice defence are in issue this checklist will need to be modified.

Two elements the prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt:

1. The accused intentionally engaged in a course of conduct that included a relevant act; and

2. The accused either:

- Intended to physically or mentally harm the complainant, or to make him or her feel frightened or apprehensive about his or her own safety or about the safety of someone else; or
- Knew that his or her course of conduct would be likely to harm the complainant, or cause the complainant to be fearful or apprehensive about his or her own safety or the safety of someone else; or
- Ought to have understood that his or her course of conduct would be likely to harm the complainant, or cause the complainant to be fearful or apprehensive about his or her safety or the safety of someone else, and the accused's conduct had that effect.

An Intentional Course of Conduct

1.1 Did the accused intentionally do at least one of the acts specified by the law?

If Yes, then go to 1.2

If No, then the accused is not guilty of stalking

1.2 Did the accused's acts amount to a "course of conduct" in relation to the complainant?

Consider – Were acts committed on more than one occasion, or go on for a protracted period of time?

Consider – Were the acts related in such a way that they amounted to a pattern of behaviour?

Consider – Was the course of conducted directed to the complainant?

If Yes, then go to 2.1

If No, then the accused is not guilty of stalking

The Accused's State of Mind

2.1 Did the accused intend to mentally or physically harm the complainant, or to cause the complainant to be fearful or apprehensive about his or her own safety or the safety of someone else?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of stalking (as long as you also answered 'Yes' to Questions 1.1 and 1.2)

If No, then go to 2.2

2.2 Did the accused know that his or her course of conduct would be likely to cause the complainant the harm, fear or apprehension referred to in 2.1 above?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of stalking (as long as you also answered 'Yes' to Questions 1.1 and 1.2)

If No, then go to 2.3

2.3 Ought the accused to have understood that his or her course of conduct would be likely to cause the complainant the harm, fear or apprehension referred to in 2.1 above?

Consider – What ought a reasonable person have understood in the same circumstances?

If Yes, then go to 2.4

If No, then the accused is not guilty of stalking (as long as you also answered 'No' to Questions 2.1 and 2.2)

2.4 Did the accused's course of conduct actually cause the complainant the harm, fear or apprehension referred to in 2.1 above?

If Yes, then the accused is guilty of stalking (as long as you also answered 'Yes' to Questions 1.1, 1.2 and 2.3)

If No, then the accused is not guilty of stalking (as long as you also answered 'No' to Questions 2.1 and 2.2)

Last updated: 24 March 2015

7.4.14 Conduct Endangering Life

Click here to obtain a Word version of this document

Overview

1. A person must not recklessly engage in conduct that places or may place another person in danger of death (Crimes Act 1958 s 22).
2. This is a general offence of endangerment, which replaced the various specific endangerment offences that existed prior to its enactment (R v Nuri [1990] VR 641).
3. Conduct endangering life is an offence against the person. An accused who creates a risk of death to multiple individuals may be charged with multiple counts of conduct endangering life (R v Bekhazi (2001) 3 VR 321).
4. The offence has the following 5 elements:
   i) The accused engaged in conduct;
   ii) The accused's conduct was voluntary;
   iii) The accused's conduct endangered another person's life;
   iv) The accused acted recklessly; and
   v) The accused acted without lawful authority or excuse (R v Nuri [1990] VR 641; Filmer v Barclay [1994] 2 VR 269; Mutemeri v Cheesman [1998] 4 VR 484; R v Wilson [2005] VSCA 78; R v Abdul-Rasool (2008) 18 VR 586; R v Marijancevic (2009) 22 VR 576).

Conduct

5. The accused must have engaged in the conduct alleged (R v Abdul-Rasool (2008) 18 VR 586).

Voluntariness

6. The accused's conduct must have been voluntary (R v Abdul-Rasool (2008) 18 VR 586; R v Wilson [2005] VSCA 78; R v Marijancevic (2009) 22 VR 576).

7. When explaining this element to the jury, the judge should not use the word "intentional". The terms "intentional" and "voluntary" are not interchangeable (R v Marijancevic (2009) 22 VR 576).[878]

8. It is a misdirection to tell the jury that the trial "starts with the proposition that acts are voluntary". It is for the prosecution to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused's acts are voluntary (R v Marijancevic (2009) 22 VR 576).

Endangerment

9. The accused's conduct must have endangered another person's life (Crimes Act 1958 s 22).

10. For this element to be met, the prosecution must prove that a reasonable person, taking the same actions as the accused, would have realised that his/her conduct:

    - Placed another person in danger of death; or
    - May have placed another person in danger of death (Crimes Act 1958 s 22; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641; R v Holzer [1968] VR 481).

11. According to this test, it is not necessary to prove that a person was actually put in danger. It is only necessary to show that the accused's conduct had the potential to place a person in danger of death (R v Abdul-Rasool (2008) 18 VR 586).

12. The person it is alleged was put in danger (or potential danger) by the accused's conduct must have been alive at the time the conduct was committed (R v Anderson Vic SC 5/12/1997).

Degree of Danger

13. The degree of danger must be an "appreciable risk" of death (R v B Vic SC 19/7/1995; R v Abdul-Rasool (2008) 18 VR 586; Mutemeri v Cheesman [1998] 4 VR 484).

14. An "appreciable risk" means more than a remote or mere possibility of death (R v B 19/7/1995 Vic SC; R v Wilson [2005] VSCA 78; R v D Vic SC 1/5/1996).

15. It is not appropriate to assess the level of dangerousness by reference to a mathematical probability (R v B Vic SC 19/7/1995; R v Boughey (1986) 161 CLR 10; R v D Vic SC 1/5/1996).

16. It is inherent in the notion of risk that the risk may not materialise. However, the risk must be real and not simply hypothetical (R v Abdul-Rasool (2008) 18 VR 586; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641; R v Lam [2006] VSCA 162).

Danger Must Not be Contingent on Other Conduct

17. Conduct endangering life is not a crime of attempt. The conduct of the accused must complete the creation of the risk of death (R v Abdul-Rasool (2008) 18 VR 586).

18. The risk of death must therefore not be contingent on some other conduct that has not occurred. The jury may only consider conduct the accused has actually engaged in. They may not consider any possible future acts the accused may have been going to commit (R v Abdul-Rasool (2008) 18 VR 586; R v Lam [2006] VSCA 162).

---

[878] As far as possible, the use of the word "intention" should be limited to expressing the intention to achieve the consequences of a voluntary or willed act (i.e. to achieve some result or consequence, or to fulfil some purpose) (Timbu Kolian v R (1968) 119 CLR 47; R v Marijancevic (2009) 22 VR 576).

The "Reasonable Person"

19. The reasonable person must be attributed with any knowledge the accused possessed which may have affected his or her assessment of the risk (R v Abdul-Rasool (2008) 18 VR 586; R v Besim (No 2) (2004) 148 A Crim R 28).

20. The reasonable person does not suffer from any defects of reasoning held by the accused. The accused's emotional or mental state must not be attributed to the reasonable person (R v Wills [1983] 2 VR 201; R v Besim (No 2) (2004) 148 A Crim R 28).

Recklessness

21. The accused must have endangered another person's life recklessly (Crimes Act 1958 s 22).

22. This requires the accused to have foreseen that an appreciable risk of death was a probable consequence of his or her conduct (Mutemeri v Cheesman [1998] 4 VR 484; R v Nuri [1990] VR 641*; R v McCarthy* Vic CA 4/11/1993). See 7.1.3 Recklessness for further information about recklessness.

23. The accused does not need to have foreseen that his or her conduct would probably cause death. This element requires the accused to have foreseen that his or her conduct would probably create an appreciable risk of death (R v Toms [2006] VSCA 101*; R v Lam* [2006] VSCA 162).

24. It is not sufficient for the prosecution to prove that the accused foresaw the likely physical result of his or her conduct (e.g. s/he foresaw that if s/he dropped his/her cigarette a fire would probably start). The prosecution must prove that the accused foresaw the risk of death created by his/her conduct (e.g. s/he foresaw that there was an appreciable risk that someone would die in the fire created by his/her cigarette) (Filmer v Barclay [1994] 2 VR 269).

25. The accused's state of mind must be assessed at the time the conduct was committed. It is not sufficient for the prosecution to prove that the accused later realised that his or her conduct was dangerous (R v Wilson [2005] VSCA 78).

